After paying some little attention to that dispute about the functions and future of poetry in which Shelley broke a lance with Peacock, Mr. Osmaston proceeds to express his own views on the subject by making an examination of Matthew Arnold's essay on the Study of Poetry, an essay which he attacks as being "essentially a criticism of form rather than content." He complains that while Arnold makes frequent reference to Aristotle's profound observation that poetry possesses truth that is more philosophical and of a greater seriousness than history, he mistranslates φιλοσοφώτερον in rendering it as "higher truth," that he makes no attempt to define in what this "higher truth" really consists, and that he merely contents himself with citing examples of poetry in which the quality of supreme excellence indubitably appears. Affirming then that while "in the supreme effort of poetry, as in all other works of art, form and content are indissolubly fused together," Mr. Osmaston goes on to claim that despite this, "neither technique, execution, nor expression is the same thing as the fullness of the content," and he goes to Shelley and then to Wordsworth to discover what this "fullness of content," what this profounder truth really is. "According to Shelley," says the essayist, "poetry is a movement of the soul of man as a whole, as itself an ideal Unity, into a yet more complete and comprehensive Unity, within which all reality subsists." This ideal the poet expresses in many ways, as the Unseen Power of several poems, as the Intellectual Beauty of the Hymn, as the Vision of "Alastor," as "That Light whose smile kindles the Universe." And this same "visionary power," this soul of Love and social communion which unites all the children of men and "steals from earth to man, and man to earth," is precisely the "fountain-light," the deeps of the poet's own soul-life itself, which, Mr. Osmaston rightly says, "gives the touch of sublimity, or at least, the spiritual atmosphere to Wordsworth's simplest poems." At this point we must with regret take leave of Mr. Osmaston's most suggestive essay, merely remarking that while the Shelleyan and Wordsworthian "fullness of content" thus expressed will give the clue to much of the "profounder truth" to be found in the poetry of Vaughan, Traherne, Blake, and Rossetti, it contains far too strong a mystical and theosophical tincture to be safely used as the touchstone of such great poetry as, say that of Milton on the religious, or of Browning on the secular plane. In conclusion we should like to congratulate the essayist on the ease and success with which he attacks and crushes that deadly heresy to which John Davidson died a martyr, "that the poet of our present day-time or night-time should accept without reserve the eye of the man of science and should pull off from his poetry all assumption, assertion or hypothesis" that cannot find shelter under the latest and craziest theories of the cosmogony. Most heartily do we recommend Mr. Osmaston's little volume to all lovers of poetry.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL.

We have met the name of Mr. Gilbert Thomas from time to time in various periodicals, and always at the foot of something it has given us pleasure to read. Some of these scattered poems he has now gathered into his first book, Birds of Passage, (2s. 6d. net), but most of the lyrics and sonnets in this dainty volume are new to us. In a day when so many of our poets are going out after bizarre or sordid themes and setting the Muses to bedraggle their garments in very ordinary mud, it is good to come upon a restful, thoughtful little book such as this, that opens the magic door for us into that old world of the spirit that is "full of sweet dreams, and health, and quiet breathing." A note of sincerity runs through all Mr. Thomas's verses; he has no affectations, no ambition to be merely startling, but is one who simply looks into his heart and writes—writes of his own emotions, ideals, aspirations, sings of the commonplace life about him with an insight and a sympathy that enable him to see the soul of beauty that dwells within it all. It is a gracious, charming little book that should make many friends who will look with interest to see Mr. Thomas fulfil the happy promise of this his earliest work.

MR. T. N. FOULIS.

We have received from Mr. T. N. Foulis the first four volumes in the Maxims of Life series (6d. and 1s. net each) compiled and arranged by Alfred H. Hyatt. These charmingly produced booklets contain views and experiences of life gathered from the writings of Napoleon, Madame de Sevigne, La Rochefoucauld and George Sand. Mr. Hyatt has made and arranged his selections admirably, and each little volume is beautifully illustrated by Frederick Carter with decorative sketches in colour and in black and white.

MESSRS. HURST & BLACKETT.

From its opening scene where, in an Italian graveyard, on a beautiful Eastern morning, the young Duca di Fiorestanni places wreaths upon the tombs of his relatives, and spares one wreath for the lovely drowned, American lady he remembered as a child, Miss Edith MacVane's novel, Tarantella (6s.) moves forward on lines which, if familiar, are generally very charming in their blending of American and Italian natures and views. The heroine of this story is the daughter of the drowned lady; the hero is the young Duke who as a child had endeavoured to save her mother. But Cynthia Godfrey is already married when she meets the young Italian—married to a rich but undesirable American—and the course of true love does not run smoothly. To mingle with Cynthia's life comes Cherubina, the young Sicilian wife of the gardener, Tonino, a wildly passionate and jealous girl; and quick tragedy mingles at times with the soft charm of Italy. The story is well and attractively written.

MR. JOHN LANE.

Mr. F. Inglis Powell has a satisfying knowledge of the strange superstitions and beliefs of the Indian peasant, which he puts to excellent account in The Snake (6s.), a story of the occult. But the book will be read rather for its drama than for its contributions to folk-lore, for the author contrives a strong and exciting plot, at the same time presenting a character of more than ordinary interest in Diana Kaye, who makes a highly efficient villainess. The book is one that can be recommended only to those with fairly strong nerves, but the genuine lover of the horror-story should be pleased with it.

MR. EVELEIGH NASH.

There are some gruesome moments in The Radium Terrors (2s. net), but on the whole Mr. Albert Dorington is hardly in his best form. Nevertheless the story of the inception and failure of Dr. Tsarka's brilliant scheme for making money out of a guileless and defenceless public is well worth reading, and the book contains a detective of a kind quite new to fiction, but, perhaps, not uncommon in real life. The book will give you some pleasant thrills, but it is never quite convincing.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL & CO.

Mr. Harold Owen has written a book named Woman Adrift (6s.), with a sub-title "The Menace of Suffragism." So all readers may know fairly well what to expect as to the author's views. But though Mr. Owen has taken the narrow view where the subject of the women-who-must-work-because-they-have-no-one-to-work-for-them is concerned, accusing them of wresting the labour field from men, he is very wise in exposing many of the wrong and exaggerated utterances of the extremists on the suffrage question. Many persons object to the talk of woman's unfair competition, in the labour world, for as long as men are to be found measuring off yards of ribbon in drapers' shops, and filling such like feminine posts, the cry of "Tu quoque!" is allowable. But this volume is one to be read by suffragists and anti-suffragists, for it should bring reason and sanity to both points of view.

MR. T. WERNER LAURIE.

Palgrave's Golden Treasury has been issued in many forms, but we know of no more sumptuous edition of it than this that has just been issued by Mr. Werner Laurie (12s. 6d. net). None of the numerous poetical anthologies that have appeared in the last four decades have succeeded in ousting Palgrave's from its pride of place as the finest anthology of songs and lyrics in the English language. Palgrave was himself a poet, as well as a sensitive and discriminating critic of poetry, and in making his selection he had the high advantage of Tennyson's judgment and advice, and it is not surprising that the result of his labours has satisfied the taste of several generations of readers and arrived at a popularity beyond that of any other book of its kind. This latest edition of it makes a large and handsomely bound volume that is enriched with pictures in colour beautifully reproduced from paintings by Maxfield Parrish.

"Thou shalt at one glance behold
The daisy and the marigold,
White-plumed lilies, and the first
Hedge row primrose that hath burst."—Keats.
Reduced reproduction from a colour illustration by Maxfield Parrish in Palgrave's "Golden Treasury." (Werner Laurie.)

MESSRS. MILLS & BOON.

Mr. Louis Calvert is an excellent actor. The most jovial and unctuous of Falstaffs, the most inimitably complacent of Broadbents. How finely he played a kind of Angelo part in Mr. Eugene Walter's striking drama "Paid in Full!" Pity it is, therefore, that having got a bee in his bonnet to the point of thinking Hamlet mad he should have rashly published his notes on the subject in An Actor's Hamlet (2s. 6d. net). Some of these notes are quite interesting, and a few are really luminous; but many of them seem written not so much because they embody points which struck their author as valuable, as because he hoped by stressing them to bolster up his particular thesis. It is, indeed, astonishing to find an actor of Mr. Calvert's ability assisting to revive one of the most pestilent of Shakespearean heresies. The whole point of Hamlet's character, as depicted by Shakespeare, consists in the delicate equipoise of mentality whereby the Prince, feigning madness the better to achieve his ends, and hovering in sympathy perilously near the verge of distraction, yet manages, thanks to his historic sense, his capacity for getting outside himself, never to upset the balance of his reason. Sometimes, through over-acting his part, Hamlet utters wild and whirling words; but this is merely the vent he makes use of to work off his own nervous excitement. None of his big speeches, properly considered, convey the least hint of a mind disordered.

A NEW VIEW OF WHISTLER

MEMORIES OF JAMES McNEILL WHISTLER

By THOMAS R. WAY. 10s. 6d. net.

 This volume contains 38 illustrations, including a reproduction from an unpublished etching drawn by Whistler and bitten in by Sir Frank Short, A.R.A. An original lithograph sketch, seven lithographs in colour, drawn by the Author upon Brown paper, and many in black and white. The remainder are facsimiles by photo-lithography. The text deals with the Author's memories of nearly twenty years of close association with Whistler. ALSO AN EDITION DE LUXE ON HAND-MADE PAPER, WITH THE ETCHING PRINTED FROM THE ORIGINAL PLATE. LIMITED TO 50 COPIES. 42s. net

THE REAL GUY DE MAUPASSANT

RECOLLECTIONS OF GUY DE MAUPASSANT

By HIS VALET FRANCOIS.

Translated by MINA ROUND. 10s. 6d. net.

With a Portrait and 15 other Illustrations from Photographs by Guy de Maupassant.

 During the last ten years of his life the celebrated French novelist was almost constantly accompanied, both at home and abroad, by his faithful servant Francois, who now gives us an intimate presentation of his master.

OTHER NEW LIBRARY BOOKS

FOOTPRINTS OF FAMOUS AMERICANS IN PARIS.
(With an Introduction by Mrs. JOHN LANE.) By J. J. CONWAY. 12s. 6d. net.

A TRAGEDY IN STONE. By LORD REDESDALE. 7s. 6d. net.

JOURNAL OF A SPORTING NOMAD. 12s. 6d. net. By J. T. STUDLEY.

IN PORTUGAL. By A. F. G. BELL. 7s. 6d. net.

BEAUTY AND UGLINESS. 10s. 6d. net. By VERNON LEE and C. ANSTRUTHER THOMAS.

KEYSTONES OF BUILDING. 2s. 6d. net. By F. INIGO THOMAS.

THE LATEST NOVELS

ELSIE LINDTNER. 3s. 6d. net. KARIN MICHAELIS.
Author of "The Dangerous Age."

THE LAST RESORT. 6s. F. PREVOST BATTERSBY.

ELIZABETH IN RETREAT. 6s. MARGARET WESTRUP.

THE TOMBOY AND OTHERS. 3s. 6d. net. H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON.

AT THE SIGN OF THE REINE PEDAUQUE. 6s. ANATOLE FRANCE.

THE BARMECIDE'S FEAST. 3s. 6d. net. JOHN GORE.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO ST., W.

WARD, LOCK & Co.'s NEW FICTION.

SIX SHILLINGS EACH. At all Libraries & Booksellers.

THE COURT OF THE ANGELS

Justus M. Forman

"Mr. Justus Miles Forman writes with a simple freshness, with a fund of sympathy and insight, as well as with an easy and effective style, so that all he tells us seems quite natural."—Daily Telegraph.

PRIVATE SELBY

Edgar Wallace

"The story is always attractive by the cleverness with which it keeps fantastic history persuasive, and it goes so quickly that it is over before one realises that it is unreal."—Scotsman

A SON OF THE IMMORTALS

Louis Tracy

"Mr. Louis Tracy has devised a very enjoyable story of love and political adventure, which has not a dull moment in it."—Nottingham Guardian.

THE SECRET OF THE SANDS

Fred M. White

A powerful and engrossing mystery story that holds the reader's interest from start to finish.

THE ROSE OF LIFE

Effie A. Rowlands

A remarkably fine love story cleverly developed and fascinating throughout.

THE PIONEER

Harold Bindloss

"Its variety of incident, the engaging qualities of its heroine, and its straightforward singleness of purpose, are elements that should succeed in making this story as popular as any that Mr. Bindloss has produced."—Globe.

THE TOWER HILL MYSTERY

A. Wilson Barrett

"Mr. A. Wilson Barrett's novel stands out as recommended by its own peculiar lightness and ingenuity of handling."—Scotsman.

MY LORD THE FELON

Headon Hill

"Mr. Headon Hill never lets his subject get dull, but with great ingenuity continually produces fresh excitement and surprising developments."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE RIVER OF UNREST

Bertram Mitford

"A tale rich in incident and character, set against an effective background of savagery and mystery."—Scotsman.

HIS LITTLE GIRL

L. G. Moberly

A charming story that will hold its own with Miss Moberly's best.

THE MISSING MISS RANDOLPH

Marie C. Leighton

Marie C. Leighton has done full justice to her reputation as a writer of highly sensational and dramatic fiction.

GOD AND MAMMON (3/6)

Joseph Hocking

"Mr. Joseph Hocking has written many notable novels, 'with a purpose,' but nothing finer than 'God and Mammon.'"—North Devon Journal.

WARD, LOCK & CO., Ltd., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

AN EXCELLENT WORK ON A CRITICAL PERIOD IN CANADIAN HISTORY,

ANNEXATION, PREFERENTIAL TRADE AND RECIPROCITY.

By CEPHAS D. ALLIN, M.A., LL.B., Assistant Professor of Political Science in the University of Minnesota, and GEORGE M.
JONES, B.A., English and History Master in Humboldt Collegiate Institute, Toronto.

Works of an historical nature are rare in Canada, and, such is the condition of scholarship in the country, that only occasionally does a volume come from the Press that possesses outstanding merit. Of this book it may be said that it is one of the few really important historical treatises that have ever appeared in Canada. It deals exhaustively with the period during the late forties of the nineteenth century, when annexation was generally regarded as the only solution of Canada's commercial difficulties. The two authors have examined all the authorities of the period with the utmost discrimination and have compiled a bulky volume—that is the last word on the subject. The book has considerable significance at the present time, as Canada has recently passed through an experience of somewhat similar import. To those who take an interest in Canada's fiscal problems, the work will be found of rare interest.

"A masterly presentation of the Canadian Annexation Movement of 1849-59."—Winnipeg Telegram

"The object in view has been accomplished in a most satisfactory manner."—The Weekly Sun.

"The authors have done their work well. They set forth the somewhat complicated story of a critical time in Canadian history with lucidity and good judgment."—Saturday Night

"Until the publication of this admirably-executed book, it has been extremely difficult, indeed practically impossible, for the student of Canadian history to form any clear idea of the origin, progress and significance of the annexation movement of 1849."—Toronto Globe.

Cloth, 10s. 6d.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,
MANSION HOUSE CHAMBERS, 11, QUEEN VICTORIA ST., LONDON, E.C. Head Office—TORONTO, CANADA.

READERS OUT OF REACH

of a good local bookseller, or who live abroad, are asked to write direct to London for their books, which will be sent by return of post, at lowest cash prices, on receipt of remittance with order.

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there, thus saving postage.

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD

ESTABLISHED
1851

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications.

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp. of Standard Literature.
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 Titles of Publishers' Reminders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices. (Out of print till September.)
3. Colonial Librarian's Handbook, indispensable to Librarians outside Europe, with complete list of Colonial Editions, etc., etc.
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals.

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

23-25 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone: 7463 Central.
Bancroft: London County & Westminster (Leamard Street).

FLOREAT ETONA !

FIRST LARGE EDITION EXHAUSTED.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY. 3/6 net.

ONE OF US

A Novel in Verse

By GILBERT FRANKAU

Read what the Critics say:—

"It is a thing unique."—Mr. James Douglas, in the Star.

"One of the finest satirical poems in the language."
—Evening Standard.

"Makes one gasp."—Daily Chronicle.

"Immensely topical, ingenious, and agile."—Times.

"Every page is instinct with genius."—Cambridge Review.

"One of the wittiest and smartest jeux d'esprit that we have seen for a long time."—World.

"Almost monstrously clever . . . in this form of verse—light, satiric wordily, and picturesque—Mr. Frankau is already a master."—Mr. W. L. Courtney, in The Daily Telegraph.

CHATTO & WINDUS

111, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

M. E. BRADDON'S NOVELS

(COMPLETE LIST).

THE "AUTHOR'S EDITION."

Crown 8vo, red cloth, gilt top, 2s 6d each

"Miss Braddon's name is a household word, and no authoress has surpassed, if indeed they have ever attained, her enormous popularity. Nor is her vogue on the wane or likely to be while the British race preserves its present love for good enthralling fiction. The new 'Author's Edition' is very inexpensive, and is yet worthy a place in any library. Bound in red cloth with gilt tops, the paper and type are all that can be desired, whilst the volume is easy to handle and neat and pleasing to the eye. Gentlewoman."

- 1 LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET*
- 2 HENRY DUNBAR
- 3 ELEANOR'S VICTORY
- 4 AURORA FLOYD
- 5 JOHN MARCHMONT'S LEGACY
- 6 THE DOCTOR'S WIFE
- 7 ONLY A CLOD
- 8 SIR JASPER'S TENANT
- 9 TRAIL OF THE SERPENT
- 10 LADY'S MILE
- 11 LADY LISLE
- 12 CAPTAIN OF THE VULTURE
- 13 BIRDS OF PREY
- 14 CHARLOTTE'S INHERITANCE
- 15 RUPERT GODWIN
- 16 RUN TO EARTH
- 17 DEAD SEA FRUIT
- 18 RALPH THE BAILIFF
- 19 FENTON'S QUEST*
- 20 LOVELS OF ARDEN
- 21 ROBERT AINSLEIGH
- 22 TO THE BITTER-LEND
- 23 MILLY DARELL
- 24 STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS
- 25 LUCIUS DAVOREN
- 26 TAKEN AT THE FLOOD
- 27 LOST FOR LOVE
- 28 A STRANGE WORLD
- 29 HOSTAGES TO FORTUNE*
- 30 DEAD MEN'S SHOES*
- 31 JOSHUA HAGGARD

- 32 WEAVERS AND WEFT
- 33 AN OPEN VERDICT
- 34 VIXEN*
- 35 THE CLOVEN FOOT
- 36 THE STORY OF BARBARA
- 37 JUST AS I AM*
- 38 ASPHODEL
- 39 MOUNT ROYAL
- 40 THE GOLDEN CALF*
- 41 PHANTOM FORTUNE*
- 42 FLOWER AND WEED
- 43 ISHMAEL
- 44 WYLLARD'S WEIRD
- 45 UNDER THE RED FLAG
- 46 ONE THING NEEDFUL
- 47 MOHAWKS
- 48 LIKE AND UNLIKE
- 49 THE FATAL THREE
- 50 THE DAY WILL COME*
- 51 ONE LIFE, ONE LOVE*
- 52 GERARD
- 53 THE VENETIANS
- 54 ALL ALONG THE RIVER
- 55 THOU ART THE MAN
- 56 SONS OF FIRE
- 57 ROUGH JUSTICE
- 58 THE CONFLICT*
- 59 THE INFIDEL
- 60 HIS DARLING SIN*
- 61 LONDON PRIDE
- 62 UNDER LOVE'S RULE

No better proof of the continued popularity of Miss Braddon's stories can be found than in their constant reissue. The publishers have done well to provide the public with a new edition admirably printed put forward in strong well-bound volumes, with gilt edges at the moderate price of half-a-crown each. —Manchester Courier

* The novels marked thus * can be obtained either in 6d. or 7d. Editions

ALSO READY.

THE CHRISTMAS HIRELINGS. Illustrated by F. H. Townsend. 3s. 6d.

LONDON SIMPKIN AND CO., LTD

THE WHITE HOUSE

6s. Also in 7d. Edition

DURING HER MAJESTY'S PLEASURE

6s. Also in 6d. Edition and a 7d. Edition

DEAD LOVE HAS CHAINS

6s. Also in 6d. Edition

HER CONVICT

6s. Also in 6d. Edition

LONDON HURST AND BLACKETT, LTD.

OUR ADVERSARY

6s. Also in 6d. Edition

BEYOND THESE VOICES

6s. Also in 7d. Edition.

A LOST EDEN

3s. 6d. Also in 7d. Edition

THE ROSE OF LIFE

3s. 6d.

AND

M. E. BRADDON'S LAST NEW NOVEL

THE GREEN CURTAIN. 6s.

"Miss Braddon is more wonderful in these her later years, than she ever was in her early ones. As a piece of atmosphere the book is Miss Braddon's best work. As a thrilling, moving story it ranks with the finest of those romances that head the page with 'Lady Audley's Secret,' and are now some seventy or eighty in number."—The Standard

LONDON HUTCHINSON AND CO

HODDER AND STOUGHTON'S SHILLING NET CLOTH LIBRARY

The most beautiful and most representative is. net series of high-class books on the market.

Bound in red cloth, and protected with three-colour wrapper.

NEW VOLUMES, 1912.

THE STRANGE VISITATION Marie Corelli
FRAULEIN SCHMIDT AND
MR. ANSTRUTHER

Author of "Elizabeth in her German Garden"

PARDNERS Rex Beach
MISS BRETHERTON Mrs. Humphry Ward
MOTH AND RUST Mary Cholmondeley
SUSANNA AND SUE Kate Douglas Wiggin
BETTER THAN LIFE Charles Garvice
BESSIE COSTRELL Mrs. Humphry Ward
THE BURNING TORCH F. F. Montresor
THE SPOILERS Rex Beach
THE BARRIER Rex Beach
THE SILVER HORDE Rex Beach
ARIZONA NIGHTS Stewart Edward White
THE RIVERMAN Stewart Edward White
ARAMINTA J. C. Snaith
MAID MARGARET S. R. Crockett
THE PRIEST Harold Begbie
THE MYSTERY OF A
MOTOR CAR William Le Queux
THE UNNAMED Wilham Le Queux
JIM CROW J. J. Bell

Previously Published

LORRIE Charles Garvice
ONCE IN A LIFE Charles Garvice
THE SCRIBBLERS' CLUB Charles Garvice
CINNAMON ROSES Mary E. Wilkins
PIRROSO Anthony Hope
THE CHERRY RIBBAND S. R. Crockett
DODO E. F. Benson
THE PRIDE OF JENNICO A. and E. Castle
THE LAND O' THE LEAL David Lyall
CAPT'N DAVY'S
HONEYMOON Hall Caine
RED POTTAGE Mary Cholmondeley
A MASK OF GOLD Annie S. Swan
THE RAGGED MESSENGER W. B. Maxwell
THE COUNTESS OF MAYBURY W. B. Maxwell
JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN Mrs. Craik
DANESBURY HOUSE Mrs. Henry Wood
THE PILOT AT SWAN CREEK Ralph Connor
BARRIERS BETWEEN Charles Garvice
STAUNCH AS A WOMAN Charles Garvice
THE TRAMPLED CROSS Joseph Hocking
FOLLOW THE GLEAM Joseph Hocking
MRS WIGGS OF THE CABBAGE PATCH Alice Hegan Rice HEARTS IN EXILE John Oxenham
DOCTOR XAVIER Max Pemberton
THE DAYS OF OLD
LANG SYNE Ian Maclaren
SIXTY-NINE BIRNAM ROAD W. Pett Ridge

ROSEMARY IN SEARCH

OF A FATHER C. N. & A. M. Williamson
A WINDOW IN THRUMS J. M. Barrie
THE LITTLE WHITE BIRD J. M. Barrie
WHEN A MAN'S SINGLE J. M. Barrie
BESIDE THE BONNIE
BRIER BUSH Ian Maclaren
AFTERWARDS Ian Maclaren
THE SAINT Antonio Fogazzaro
THE LADY OF THE DECORATION Anonymous
BLACK ROCK Ralph Connor
GWEN Ralph Connor
CONCERNING ISABEL
CARNABY Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler
FUEL OF FIRE Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler
BARBE OF GRAND
BAYOU John Oxenham
JOHN OF GERISAU John Oxenham
THE MAN WHO ROSE
AGAIN Joseph Hocking
DAVID BARING Joseph Hocking
ALLAN QUATERMAIN Rider Haggard
ROSE O' THE RIVER Kate Douglas Wiggin
THE OLD PEABODY
PEW Kate Douglas Wiggin
ROSE OF BLENHEIM Morice Gerard
THE NEW RECTOR Stanley Weyman
THE TRAIL OF THE SWORD Sir Gilbert Parker
BEATRICE OF VENICE Max Pemberton
THE CAGE Harold Begbie
THE PROSPECTOR Ralph Connor
FOR HER ONLY Charles Garvice
THE SPRINGTIME
OF LOVE Charles Garvice
AULD LIGHT IDYLLS J. M. Barrie
LOVEY MARY Alice Hegan Rice
JOSEPH REDHORN J. J. Bell
THOU FOOL J. J. Bell
KATE CARNEGIE Ian Maclaren
YOUNG BARBARIANS Ian Maclaren
THE HERITAGE OF THE FREE David Lyall
LOVE THE MASTER KEY Annie S. Swan
SANDY Alice Hegan Rice
PA GLADDEN Elizabeth Cherry Waltz
I.N.R.I. Peter Rosegger
(A Prisoner's Story of the Cross)
WITH CHRIST AT SEA Frank T. Bullen
MY SWORD FOR LAFAYETTE Max Pemberton
ISOPEL BERNERS George Borrow LITTLE SISTER SNOW
The Author of "The Lady of the Decoration"
ENSIGN KNIGHTLEY A. E. W. Mason

LATEST VOLUMES.

1. THE STRANGE VISITATION, by Marie Corelli.

This story, by the most popular novelist of the day, cannot be obtained in any other form at any other price.

2. FRAULEIN SCHMIDT and MR. ANSTRUTHER, by the author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden."

HODDER AND STOUGHTON, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

Young Writers who desire SUCCESS should apply for free particulars of the Literary Instruction Correspondence Courses of THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY. The most practical and helpful literary courses on the market. Prepared by a Working Author. The Surrey Literary Agency also obtain the best offers for original MSS. Booklet Prospectus free. "Locksley," Presburg Road, New Malden, Surrey.

WHAT IS A LAUGH WORTH?

If you are feeling depressed and "out-of-sorts" a good, hearty laugh is worth a guinea. There are a hundred good, hearty laughs in the new humorous book called "A DOUBLE-DUTCH DIARY," by M. H. A. Jewell, and it costs only 2s. 6d.

Published by ARTHUR H. STOCKWELL, 29, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

REMAINDERS.

Glaisher's May Catalogue of SELECTED Remainder Books, Now Ready. Post Free on application.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Limited, Booksellers, 265, High Holborn, London, W.C., and at 14, George Street, Croydon.

N.B.—It is essential to send for list at once to obtain the best bargains.

S. R. CROCKETT'S New Novel "ANNE OF THE BARRICADES"

The "CHURCH TIMES" says:—

"ANNE OF THE BARRICADES is one of the best stories which Mr. Crockett has ever written. There is proof on every page of very close study of Paris of 1870, during which period the scene is laid, and there are several studies of character which show an unconventional outlook, notably that of Thiers. Of course, the story itself is a thrilling love-story. There are two heroines, Anne, who gives the title to the book, and one Nini, an opera singer. In the outlining of these characters and of the incidents which reveal them to us, Mr. Crockett shows all his old skill, and there are scenes in the book which fire the imagination and bring tears to the eyes. Indeed, it is hardly too much to say that of all the stories which have dealt with the three-fold conflict between the Empire, the Republic and the Commune, none has so clearly shown us the issues, and this without releasing for a moment the interest of the story. Anne is a rare character, and it is her devotion to her father which leads her to become the heroine of the barricades and to give up her life. Mr. Crockett promises us another story dealing with the Commune in the Midi, and if it is as enthralling as this, it will be warmly welcomed."

6

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, London, E.C.

CONSTABLE'S NEW BOOKS

HISTORY OF LONDON

10s. 6d. net HELEN DOU GLAS-IRVINE

"The book is written in a bright, cheerful style which makes it off from a mere compilation of what has been gathered before. It will help the readers to an intelligent view of many difficult points in history, and therefore it may be welcomed as a satisfactory addition to the large mass of London literature." Athenaeum

THE GATEWAY OF SCOTLAND

10s. 6d. net A. G. BRADLEY

Or East Lothian, Lammermoor, and the Merse.

Illustrated with Coloured Plates by A. L. COCHRAN

IN THE CARPATHIANS

10s. 6d. net LION PHILLIMORE

"She adds a graphic pen and a keen eye not only for detail, but for beauty and significance." Times. "Her freshness of mind, her receptivity, and her vivid instinct of beauty make her writing individual and attractive." Athenaeum. "Mr. Phillimore's method of doing it, and telling it, and thinking it, constitutes the charm of this picturesque book." Daily Chronicle

DÉFENSE DE LA POÉSIE FRANÇAISE

5s. net ÉMILE LÉGOUIS

Professeur de Langue et Littérature Anglaise à la Sorbonne. "The interaction of French and English models is admirably demonstrated, and the book, by reason of its lucidity, its fertility of illustration, and its urbanity, is secure of the reception which its scholarship merits." Athenaeum

Constable's ANTHOLOGIES

Just Published

IN PRAISE OF CAMBRIDGE

5s. net SIDNEY WATERLOW, M.A.

IN PRAISE OF EDINBURGH

6s. net ROSALINE MASSON

"Not before has this pious task been done with such thoroughness or loving care." The Observer

Just Published

IN PRAISE OF OXFORD: II.

6s. net Manners and Customs

Recently Published

IN PRAISE OF OXFORD: I.

6s. net History and Topography

Thomas Seecombe, M.A., & H. Spencer Scott, M.A.

In Active Preparation

IN PRAISE OF WINCHESTER

IN PRAISE OF SWITZERLAND

IN PRAISE OF AUSTRALASIA

Constable's NEW 6s. NOVELS

EVE

MAARTEN MAARTENS

Author of "Healers"

Just Published

"Eve" is one of those books that you begin by liking much, and admiring slightly, and end by admiring enormously—and liking. During the earlier chapters of M. Maarten Maarten's new story, I told myself that I must really start for Holland next week if only on the off chance of encountering such delightful persons as the characters in this book. Altogether a strikingly clever novel." Punch

A French Novel in English

THE CITY OF LIGHT

W. L. GEORGE

Just Published

Author of "A Bed of Roses," &c.

"Mr. George has succeeded in writing a novel the power of which cannot be denied. Apart altogether from the question of power of writing, it is a book that there are not many who would possess the qualifications to write. The result is a book that a good many readers will turn to because of the incidental information it conveys of a certain type of Parisian bourgeois life. It holds attention to the end. Altogether Mr. George has given us a noteworthy novel. There is passion in the book, and passion in contrast, moreover, which is the most salutary thing that Art can show us." English Review

A HOOSIER CHRONICLE

Just Published

MEREDITH NICHOLSON

Author of "The House of a Thousand Candles"

"Few men have ever been so well qualified to present the life and ideals of a state as Mr. Nicholson. Certainly none has ever accomplished the task more brilliantly than has been done in this book. It is a picture of American life, made a charming as it is interesting by the author's admirable literary manner and constant humour."

"By a novelist of good standing." The Times

EVE'S SECOND HUSBAND

CORRA HARRIS

Author of "A Circuit Rider's Wife"

THE EXPLOITS OF KESHO NAIK,

DACOIT

Sir EDMUND C. COX

Author of "Achievements of John Carruthers"

Just Published

SUCCESS

UNA L. SILBERRAD

WINTERING HAY

JOHN TREVENA

HERITAGE

VALENTINA HAWTREY

PAUL'S PARAGON

W. E. NORRIS

THE GOOD GIRL

VINCENT O'SULLIVAN

Order Scribner's Magazine

CONSTABLE & CO., LONDON, W.C.

Macmillan's New Books

The Wessex Edition of the Works of Thomas Hardy in Prose and Verse. With Prefaces and Notes. In 20 vols. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net each. Printed from new type. Each volume will have a Frontispiece in Photogravure and Map. Two volumes issued monthly.

5. THE MAYOR OF CASTERBRIDGE.

6. THE WOODLANDERS.

The Sphere. "The Macmillans may be congratulated upon the format of these books. . . . To have got each novel into one volume, so light to hold and so beautifully printed, is a veritable triumph of the book-maker's art."

Letters of William Cowper. Chosen and Edited, with Memoir and a few Notes, by J. G. FRAZER D.C.L. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 8s. net. Eversley Series.

Across Australia. By BALDWIN SPENCER, C.M.G., M.A., F.R.S., and F. J. GILLEN, Special Magistrate and Sub Protector of Aborigines for South Australia. With coloured and other Illustrations and Maps. 8vo. In 2 vols. 21s net.

The Old Irish World. By ALICE STOPFORD GREEN, Author of "The Making of Ireland and Its Undoing," etc. With Maps and Illustrations. 8vo. 4s. net.

France under Richelieu and Colbert. By the late JOHN HENRY BRIDGES, M.B., F.R.C.P. New Edition. With an Introduction by A. J. GRANT, M.A. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

The Origin and Aim of the Acts of the Apostles. Being Six Sermons preached in Worcester Cathedral, in Lent, 1912, with an Appendix on Codex Beza and a Sermon on Christian Unity. By the Rev J. M. WILSON, D.D., Canon of Worcester. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Historical Studies in Philosophy. By EMILE BOUTROUX. Member of the Institute, Professor of the University of Paris. Authorized Translation by FRED ROTHWELL, B.A. 8vo. [Immediately.]

STEPHEN REYNOLDS'S NEW BOOK.

How 'Twas. Short Stories and Small Travels. By STEPHEN REYNOLDS, Author of "Seems So," "A Poor Man's House," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 5s. net
Pall Mall Gazette.—"The merit (of his work) seems to grow with every book he writes. . . . As for the humour, it is perfect, and nobody has better put the salt tang of the sea and the rasp of the hawser into print."

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

Pan's Garden. A Volume of Nature Stories. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "The Centaur," etc. Illustrated by GRAHAM ROBERTSON. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

The Sign. By Mrs. ROMILLY FEDDEN (Katharine Waldo Douglas). Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

The Spectator.—"Alike in atmosphere, aim, and characterization, the book is of uncommon merit; . . . a fine story."
The Ladies Field.—"The Sign" is a most welcome novel, distinguished by a rare delicacy of thought and fineness of perception."
Manchester Guardian.—"Nowhere in recent fiction have we read anything so beautiful as the pilgrimage of little Yves across the landes to the Madonna of Trémour in aid of his sister."

The Friar of Wittenberg. By WILLIAM STEARNS DAVIES, Author of "A Friend of Cæsar," etc. Extra Crown 8vo. 6s. [Immediately.]

Van Cleve. By MARY S. WATTS, Author of "Nathan Burke," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Immediately.]

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Mr. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS

A Woman's Poignant Confession Re-Unites Parted Lovers.
A ROMANCE OF PUBLISHING.

The Public will be interested to learn that the anonymous work

"HE WHO PASSED"

TO M.L.G. (6s.)

has proved to be a REAL HUMAN DOCUMENT, and NOT a work of fiction as hitherto supposed by even the publisher himself, who received the manuscript from a solicitor. Its publication has resulted in bringing together again two lovers parted by a pathetic misunderstanding and doubt which was removed when the book came by chance to the notice of M.L.G., and they are to be married on October 9. The full story of this strange romance in publishing was told recently in the Daily Papers.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A GREAT LADY.

Being more Memoirs of the COMTESSE DE BOIGNE.

(1831-1866.) Edited by CH. NICOLLAUD. Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo. 10s. net.

Previously Published. Uniform with the above

THE MEMOIRS OF THE COMTESSE DE BOIGNE.

Vol. I, 1721-1814. Vol. II, 1815-1819. Vol. III, 1820-1830.

Photogravure Frontispiece. Each Volume, Demy 8vo. 10s. net.

"It is the most vivacious, most human, and most interesting collection of Memoirs which has been given to the world for a long time. There is not a page which should be missed."—Daily Telegraph

GREEK & ROMAN PORTRAITS.

By Dr. HEKLER. 311 Full page Plates. Large 4to. 31s. 6d. net.
This book contains a whole gallery of the masterpieces of portrait sculpture in antiquity. These portraits are not merely iconographic documents, but contributions to the history and analysis of artistic conception throughout the ages.

THE YOUNG NIETZSCHE.

By FRAU FOERSTER-NIETZSCHE. Translated by ANTHONY M. LUDOVICI. With Portraits. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.
"The human touch is in every line of Frau Foerster Nietzsche's portrait."—19th Century Standard

THE MONTESSORI METHOD OF CHILD EDUCATION.

By MARIA MONTESSORI. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
"A great body of intelligent, alert teachers in this country will find in this book a treasure trove of wisdom and a manual of education. Never before has such a combination of genius, inheritance, training, and experience been united as in this woman."—Journal of Education

ANIMAL LIFE IN AFRICA.

By Major J. STEVENSON HAMILTON. Foreword by FLORENCE ROOSEVELT. Illustrated, Maps, Plans, &c. Royal 8vo. 18s. net.
"Vivid, graphic, with scholarly . . . a book of unusual fascination."—Times.

THE LURE OF THE SEA.

Poems. By J. F. PATTERSON. Author of "Tillers of the Soil," etc. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.
"The fresh and living literary gift born of experience."—Times.

NEW 6s. NOVELS

LOVE'S PILGRIMAGE Upton Sinclair

"A novel with many of the elements of greatness—in some ways better than anything Mr. Upton Sinclair has done . . . There are also superbly human touches and felicities of style and thought. It is a fine, distinguished, vital novel."—Observer.

THE COST OF IT Eleanor Mordaunt

"A strong and absorbing story . . . interesting from first to last."—Daily News.

PASSION FRUIT E. C. Vivian

"May be warmly recommended to any reader in search of an interesting and intensely human story, peopled by life-like characters."—Sunday Times.

THE GREATEST RUSSIAN NOVEL THE BROTHERS KARAMAZOV

By DOSTOEVSKY. (864 pp.) 3s. 6d. net.

"It is possible that the greatest literary event of the year in this country will be the appearance of the first volume of Mr. Garnett's translation of the novels of Dostoevsky. . . . In the end his genius simply overwhelms us . . . like some mighty upheaval of Nature."—Daily News.

HEINEMANN'S NEW 7d. NET NOVELS.

BY NOW READY.

Hall Caine	THE BONDMAN
R. L. Stevenson	EBB-TIDE
Jack London	THE CALL OF THE WILD
H. G. Wells	THE WAR OF THE WORLDS
R. Harding-Davis	SOLDIERS OF FORTUNE
E. L. Voynich	THE GADFLY

NEW 1s. NET NOVELS.

By Mrs. Henry Dudeney	THE ORCHARD THIEF
By Charles Turley	GODFREY MARTIN, School-boy
By Lloyd Osbourne	THE ADVENTURER
By E. F. Benson	THE BLOTTING BOOK

2s. NET NOVELS.

By Duncan Schwann	THE BOOK OF A BACHELOR
By Robert Hichens	BELLA DONNA
By Flora Annie Steel	THE GIFT OF THE GODS
By Eleanor Mordaunt	A SHIP OF SOLACE

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 250. VOL. XLII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

JULY, 1912.

PRICE SIXPENCE
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES 143

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 147

THE READER—

Miss Braddon: The Writer and her Work. By CLIVE HOLLAND 149

Robertson Smith. By the Rev.
Professor JAMES DENNEY,
D.D. 157

J. J. Rousseau. By THOMAS
SECCOMBE 162

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE
COMPETITIONS 159

NEW BOOKS—

Stevenson. By NEIL MUNRO 168

Last Essays of a Bookman.
By W H HUDSON 169

William Watson and the Theatre. By FRANCIS BICK-
LEY 170

Goethe. By HENRY MURRAY 171

The Works of Richard Middleton. By W. A. MACKENZIE 172

Mr. Begbie on the Y.M.C.A.
By DR. JAMES MOFFATT .. 173

The Royal Miracle 173

With Napoleon at St Helena
By WALFORD D. GREEN .. 174

An Injured Queen 175

Eight New Novels 175

Two Poets By EDWARD
THOMAS 176

In Forbidden China By Mrs.
ARCHIBALD LITTLE 177

John Buchan's Stories .. 178

A Sailor Poet 178

Homes of Great Londoners.
By HENRY BAERLEIN .. 179

Lady Shelley's Diary. By ROGER INGPEN 179

NOVEL NOTES—

The Little Blue Devil—A Candidate for Truth The Grey Terrace—The House of Robershay—The Good Girl
Denham—The Damsel
Dark—Oh! My Uncle—The Prince and Betty—George
Wendern gave a Party 180-182

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—

By the Way—Behind the Nightlight—The Real Captain Cleveland—Vagrom Men—
Studies in Arcady—Piers
Plowman—Plays and Poems
183 184

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 184

NOTICES.

*All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the
Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK
SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.*

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The August Bookman will contain a special article on A. J. Balfour as a Man of Letters, by James Moffatt, D.D., D.Litt.

We live so rapidly that it seems quite a long time ago since Mr. Edward Booth won his first success with "The Cliff End." He has lately completed a new novel, which Mr. Edward Arnold will publish, and for the background of it has gone to Yorkshire, the scene being principally laid at a popular seaside resort which is thinly disguised under the name of Spaforth.

Mr. Heinemann is publishing a little volume on "The Loss of the Titanic: Its Story and Its Lesson," by Lawrence Beesley, who is one of the survivors from that unprecedented disaster. Mr. Beesley relates the story of the wreck, and deals with its psychology, the way the crowd encountered fear, the general after effect of the experience on those who were rescued, and the superstitious beliefs commonly entertained by seafarers and the world at large.

Messrs. Cassell have a great record as pioneers of the cheap reprint, and we congratulate them on the success of their latest venture in that kind. Their well-known series, "The People's Library," was started four years ago and already over two million copies have been sold, in celebration of which achievement they have just issued a fourteen-page booklet that contains a biographical dictionary of authors whose works are included in the series.

Mr. George Edgar, who is well-known as a contributor to periodical literature, has written a novel of the prize ring days of a hundred years ago. The book is called "The Blue Bird's-Eye," and will be published this month by Messrs. Mills & Boon.

Most of us could name off-hand half-a-dozen ingenious men of letters who have turned their hands to the solving of Dickens' "Mystery of Edwin Drood," but how many of us remember the sequel to that story which was written by Elizabeth Newton (Gillan Vase) and published more than thirty years ago? Among the growing number of those who are wrestling with the problem that Dickens left us, Mrs. Newton has her place with the pioneers. She had been reading the novel in the monthly parts, as they appeared, and was so keenly interested in it that when Dickens died, leaving the tale half told, a friend of hers proposed jestingly that she should finish it herself. At first she laughed at the notion, but it remained with her, and presently she began to attempt the task. "Then," she says, "I felt obliged to go on; I could not stop; I was obsessed with it, and, encouraged by the sympathy of my father and my friend, I wrote on to the end. I am no spiritualist, but really it often seemed to me as if I were only the amanuensis of some one else who dictated. Several chapters, and those the best, were written straight on end without the alteration of a single word."

Mrs. Newton is emphatically opposed to the theory that Edwin Drood was murdered. To attempt any outline of the elaborate and ingenious plot of her sequel is impossible here, and those interested should contrive to get hold of her out-of-print book "A Great Mystery Solved." In this she shows how Jasper, after drugging Edwin's wine, attempted to strangle him with "that great black scarf" of his, the two being alone at night in the churchyard. He has already obtained the key to Mr. Sapsea's vault, having taken it from Durdles, whose liquor he had drugged, whilst he and Durdles rambled who has been Keeper of Prints and Drawings at the British Museum since 1884, and has just retired.

Photo by E. O. Hoppl.

Sir Sidney Colvin,

about the Cathedral the night before, Jasper being curious, as Dickens readers will remember, to view from the Cathedral tower the effect of moonlight shining on the monuments; and having secured the key, he had left Durdles in a drugged sleep whilst he entered the Sapsea vault, removed the body of Mrs. Sapsea from her coffin and carried it in a sack to the mound of slacked lime to which Durdles had already called his attention. He then substitutes Edwin's body for hers in the coffin. "Everyone remembers," says Mrs. Newton, "how Jasper in his opium visions says 'I never saw that before. What a poor, mean, miserable thing it is' That was Mrs. Sapsea's body."

But Edwin was only partially strangled. The scarf round his neck loosens; he revives; gets out of the coffin; replaces the lid and staggers from the vault. He knows that Jasper meant to murder him, and thinks of Rosa, and realises what were Jasper's motives. Before dawn he has left Cloisterham behind, and Mrs. Newton's story follows his life in London, takes up the thread of Mr. Tartar's love for Rosa, and of Jasper's resolute pursuit of her. Durdles, on his habitual "tapping" rambles, discovers one day that the coffin of Mrs. Sapsea is empty, and Mr. Sapsea is involved in considerable scandal and disquiet as a consequence, and when the coffin is opened "nothing is in it but a ring-case containing a row of diamonds and rubies—one link in the

Photo by E. O. Hoppl.

The late Mr. Richard Middleton, whose two posthumous volumes (Fisher Unwin) are reviewed on page 174 chain forging 'and gifted with invincible force to hold and drag.' " Finally, on the eve of discovery, Jasper is forcing his unwelcome attentions on Rosa when she screams, and footsteps are heard approaching. If he cannot keep her alive he will keep her dead, so clasps her and leaps with her into the river. The footsteps were those of Mr. Crisparkle and Mr. Tartar coming to her rescue, but they were too late, and it is Edwin Drood who, from a point lower down the river, jumps in to the rescue and, with the help of two detectives on their way to arrest Jasper, brings Rosa safely ashore. Much has necessarily been omitted from all this, for Mrs. Newton has duly followed the fortunes also of Helena Landless, and has shown us Edwin in disguise serving as clerk to Mr. Grewgious in the stead of Bazzard, who has come into his dead father's money and given himself wholly over to the writing of tragedies; and she now proceeds to relate Jasper's miserable ending and to draw the chequered love affair of Edwin and Rosa to the right Dickensian conclusion. "I have heard it suggested," says Mrs. Newton, "that Datchery was Helena Landless disguised. I cannot imagine this. . . . I have also heard others say that Datchery was Bazzard. But surely Bazzard was, and must ever remain, a born fool."

Sir G. T. Hutchinson.

There is a series of amusing literary caricatures in Mr. Starr Wood's new Summer Annual entitled "Our Rising Authors," the cleverest of which are, perhaps, the representation or misrepresentation of Mr. G. K. Chesterton, Mr. James Barr and Mr. Arnold Bennett.

Mrs. Elizabeth Newton.

Sir George Thompson Hutchinson, who is the second publisher to receive the honour of knighthood in the last three years, is head of the firm of Hutchinson & Co., and managing director of the old-established

Photo by Judith Fletcher, Sydney. Miss Dorothea Mackellar, whose novel (written in collaboration with Miss Ruth Bedford), "The Little Blue Devil" (Alston Rivers) is reviewed on page 180.

Miss Ethel Kidson, whose successful novel, "Herringfleet," has been published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall.

publishing house of Hurst and Blackett. Sir George served his apprenticeship to Alexander Strahan, a publisher of two or three generations ago whose name is on the first editions of many famous books. The firm of Hutchinson & Co. was founded in 1887, and has long since taken its place among the leading London houses of the trade. Sir George has travelled much, and his work in research has been recognised by a Fellowship of the Royal Geographical Society. Several of the serials issued by his firm such as "The Living Races of Mankind," and "The Living Animals of the World," have been edited by Sir George Hutchinson himself, and have met with remarkable success not only in this country but, in translations, all over Europe.

Mr. Holbrook Jackson has completed a sort of companion volume to his "Romance and Reality," which Mr. Grant Richards will publish this month. The book is called "All Manner of Folk," and contains essays on such subjects as "The Self-Sufficient," "Masters of Nonsense," "Concerning Personality," and studies of Synge, Walt Whitman, Max Beerbohm, Richard Jefferies, Edward Carpenter, William Morris, Thoreau, Edgar Allen Poe and H. M. Hyndman. It is illustrated with portraits and caricatures by Joseph Simpson, Gordon Craig, Lovat Fraser, and J. B. Yeats.

The newest of new publishers is Mr. Herbert Jenkins, who was for over ten years manager to Mr. John Lane. Mr. Jenkins has unusual qualifications for success in his enterprise, for he is expert on both the literary and commercial sides of his profession, and moreover is himself an author and a successful author too. His "Life of George Borrow," published last spring by Mr. John Murray, met with unanimous commendation from the critics and is already in its second edition. He has contributed to The Nineteenth Century, Blackwood's, The Fortnightly, The National, The Outlook, and other magazines and journals, and has done excellent work as a Blake enthusiast, in which capacity he discovered the State Papers relating to the poet's trial for High Treason, and located his long undiscoverable grave in Bunhill Fields Burial Ground. The new firm will be known as Herbert Jenkins, Limited, and associated with Mr. Jenkins are Sir George Chubb, Bart. (Chairman), and Mr. Alex. W. Hill, M.A., son of Dr. Alex. Hill, sometime Master of Downing, Chairman of Gilton, and President of the National Home Reading Union. We hope it was a good omen that Mr. Jenkins received his first possible client on the afternoon of the very day on which the announcement of his beginning appeared in the papers. An eager gentleman came into his office with a manuscript, mentioned he had just read an interview with the new publisher in the newspaper, and added "So I rushed round. I'm an American, and I wanted to be in early."

Mr. Herbert Jenkins.

There is a delightful humour and freshness in Mr. E. R. Lipsett's novel, "Didy"; its characters are so carelessly natural and such an air of easy reality pervades it all that one suspects a good deal of it has its roots in personal experience. Mr. Lipsett spent a short time at Heidelberg, but says he took little away from it except pleasant memories of his fellow-students. Then his lot was cast in the South of Ireland where he had to earn his living and, after long striving, secured two journalistic posts which together yielded him a weekly income of less than two pounds. In 1903 he published under another name "Father Clancy," a novel of Irish life; and after working for some time as a free-lance journalist in Dublin went to America in 1907, and was hailed by editors and public as a writer of real character and no mere reporter. But it is not easy to get him to talk about the Americans, though he places it to their credit that they do treat as a brother the stranger within their gates. There is a quaintly whimsical Irish journalist in "Didy," and he goes to America; but the main interest of the book gathers about its masterful but charming heroine, Didy herself, who has gone to America ahead of him, and ahead of another man who is perhaps more important to the story.

Mr. E. R. Lipsett.

Author of "Didy" (Duckworth).

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

July 1st to August 1st, 1912.

Messrs. Allen & Co.

- ALLEN, DAPHNE (Aged 12)—A Child's Vision. 45 Illustrations (4 in Colour). With Introductions by C. Lewis Hind. 6s. net. Designed Cloth Cover in Colour.
INGRAM, ARCHIBALD K.—Basil Vrely. A Tale of Charterhouse. 8 Illustrations. Cloth, 8s. 6d. net.
SHORTT, MISS L. M.—A Practical Italian Grammar. A Second Edition completely revised. Cloth cover, 5s. net.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

- CUNDALL, H. M., I.S.O., F.S.A.—Sudbrook and its Occupants. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

- ALLEN, F. B.A.—Scott: Marmion. 1s. 6d.
EDMONDS, E. W., M.A., B.Sc.—Junior English Composition. 1s. 6d.
FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—Geography of Africa. 8d.
FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—Geography of Asia. 8d.
FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—Junior Geography for 1913. 2s.
FRY, G. C., M.Sc.—Outlines of Physical Geography and the British Isles. 1s. 6d.
GOGGIN, S. E., M.A., and FIELDEN, F. J., M.A.—Shakespeare: Macbeth (Junior Shakespeare.) 1s. 4d.
GOGGIN, S. E., M.A., and WATT, A. F., M.A.—Milton: Comus. 1s.
MARICHAL, J. P. R., L.-ès-L., and GARDINER, L. J., M.A.—New Junior French Reader. 2s.
MOFFATT, C. W. P., M.A., M.B., B.Sc.—Science French Course. 3s. 6d.
PENN, L.L.M., M.A.—Caesar: Gallic War. Book IV, Ch. XX. to Book V, Ch. XXIII. 1s.
PENN, L.L.M., M.A.—Caesar: Gallic War. Book V, Ch. XXV-LVIII. 1s.
RICHARDS, J. F., M.A.—Vergil: Aeneid VIII. 1s.
SHEPHERD, J. W., B.Sc.—Qualitative Determination of Organic Compounds. 4s. 6d.
WEEKES, A. R., M.A., and FIELDEN, F. J., M.A.—Shakespeare: As You Like It. (Junior Shakespeare.) 1s. 4d.

Messrs. Constable & Co., Ltd.

- AMINOFF, BARONESS LÉONIE—The Broad Walk. 1s. net.
BICKLEY, FRANCIS J. M. Synge. 1s. net.
BRADLEY, A. G.—The Gateway of Scotland. Illustrated with 8 Full Page Plates in Colour and numerous Line Drawings by A. L. Collins. 10s. 6d. net.
ELLIS, HAVELOCK—The Task of Social Hygiene. 8s. 6d. net.
GALE, NORMAN—Song in September. 5s. net.
HALIFAX, ROBERT—A Slice of Life.
HARRIS, CORRA—The Recording Angel.
MACDONALD, J. RAMSAY, M.P.—Syndicalism: An Examination. 1s. net.
MALCOLM, MAJOR NEILL—War in Bohemia in 1866.
MALLING, MATHILDE—The Immature Young Minister.
MELLAND, FRANK H., F.R.G.S., F.Z.S., and HOLMELEY, EDWARD H., F.R.A.I.—Through the Heart of Africa. With 80 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

- MITCHELL, EDMUND—Tales of Destiny.
MOORE, FRANKFORT—The Narrow Escape of Lady Hardwell. 6s.
MOUTRAY, J. M., F.R.G.S.—In South Central Africa. With a Map and 45 Illustrations from Photographs. 10s. 6d.
MURRAY, D. L.—Phagocytosis. 1s. net.
PHILLIPS, MARY F.—Tommy Tiggums.
ROBERTSON, RICHMOND, T. M., M.P.—Rationalism. 1s. net.
ROSS, JANE L.—The Fourth Generation. Reminiscences. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.
SHAW, MRS. GEORGE BERNARD (Arranged by)—Selected Passages from the Works of Bernard Shaw. Photogravure Frontispiece. 5s. net.
SULLY, PROFESSOR JAMES, M.A.—Italian Travel Sketches. Illustrated by P. Noel Boyer. 7s. 6d. net.
THOMAS, EDWARD—Lafcadio Hearn. 1s. net.
TYNAN, KATHARINE—Rose of the Garden. 6s.
VERNEDE, R. E.—The June Lady.
WHITE, PERCY.—To-Day. 6s.

Messrs. Digby, Long & Co.

- BROWN, CAMPBELL RAE—The Avenging Kiss. 6s.
DIGBY, MAJOR H. M.—Monograph on Earl of Bristol and Sir Kenelm Digby. 7s. 6d. net.
GRAHAM, WINIFRED—The Spectre of the Past. 6d.
HOPE, MARGARET—Nurs and Her Cousins. 2s. 6d.
LOON, MRS. M. CHAN—Helen Wyverne's Marriage. 6s.

Messrs. Gay & Hancock.

- BURCHFIELD, SIDNEY H.—My Lady of the Buss. A Romance dealing with the Bass Rock. (Gay's Shilling Library.) 1s. net.
MATHIASON, ANNA—The Song of the Evening Stars. With 14 Caricatures by Signor Curcio. 1s. 6d. net.
NEWLAND, SIMPSON—Paving the Way: A Romance of the Australian Bush. (Gay's Shilling Library.) 1s. net.
WILCOX, ELLA WHITFIELD—Six Bad Husbands and Six Unhappy Wives. 1s. net.
WILCOX, ELLA WHEELER—The Diary of a Faithless Husband. 1s. net.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett.

- ASKW, ALICE and CLAUDE—Destiny. 7d.
DONOVAN, DICK—The Fatal Ring. 6d.
FARJON, B. L.—The Betrayal of John Fordham. 6d.
HORNUNG, E. W.—Pecavi. 7d.
ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADELAIDE—Lavender's Love Story. 6d.
RUSSELL, DORA—A Bitter Birthright. 6d.
SERGEANT, ADELINE—A Broken Idol. 6d.
SERGEANT, ADELINE—Jacob's Wife. 7d.
WYLLARDE, DOLF.—As Ye Have Sown. 1s. net.
YARDLEY, MAUD.—To-Day and Love. 1s. net.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

BURGIN, G. B.—A Vision of Balmaine. 6d.
 FOWLER, ELLEN THORNEYCROFT.—The Farringdons. 7d.
 GAILLON, TOM.—A Rogue's Heiress. 6d.
 GARVICE, CHARLES.—Country Love. 6d.
 HAGGARD, H. RIDER.—Faint Margaret. 7d.
 "HANDASYDE."—The Heart of Marylebone. 7d.
 "IOTA."—A Yellow Aster. 7d.
 MALVERY, OLIVE CHRISTIAN.—A Year and a Day. Illustrated. The Story of Miss Malvery's Life and Work. Cloth gilt. 6s.
 REYNOLDS, MRS. HAILLIE.—The Supreme Test. 7d.
 "RITA."—Half a Truth. 6d.
 STACPOOLE, H. DE VERE.—The Ship of Coral. 1s. net.
 SWAN, ANNIE S.—Elizabeth Glen. 6d.
 THURSTON, KATHERINE CECIL.—Max. 1s. net.

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

MACDONALD, FREDERIC W., Rev. M.A.—Reminiscences of my Early Ministry. 2s. 6d. net.
 ENTWISTLE, MISS F. E., LL.A.—Steep Ascent: Missionary Talks for Young People. 2s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

BUMPUS, T. FRANCIS.—Cathedrals of Rome and Southern Italy. 16s. net.
 COLLINS, CHARLES W.—Great Love Stories of the Theatre. 12s. 6d. net.
 HALL, THORNTON.—Love Intrigues of Royal Courts. 1s. reprint.
 HYATT, STANLEY PORTAL.—Fallen Among Thieves. 1s. net.
 INGLEBY, LEONARD CRESWELL.—Oscar Wilde. 2s. 6d. net.
 MARTINDALE, THOMAS.—With Gun and Guide. 10s. 6d. net.
 MOORE, GEORGE.—Spring Days: A Novel. 6s. net.
 MUNDAY, LUTHER.—A Chronicle of Friendship. 12s. net.
 ROTHERY, GUY CADOGAN.—Staircases and Garden Steps. 6s.
 TAYLOR, JOSH.—The Art of Golf. 2s. 6d. net.
 WOODROFFE, DANIEL.—The Rat Trap. 6s. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

BURTON, REV. EDWIN, D.D., Vice-President of St. Edmund's College, Ware, and MYERS, REV. EDWARD, M.A.—The New Psalter and Its Use. 3s. 6d. net.
 CATHCART, E. P., M.D.—The Physiology of Protein Metabolism. 4s. 6d. net.
 CROSS, C. F., and HEVAN, E. J.—Researches on Cellulose. III. (1905-1910).
 DAKIN, H. D., D.Sc., F.I.C.—Oxidations and Reductions in the Animal Body.
 GRAVES, ALFRED PERCEVAL.—Welsh Poetry, Old and New, in English Verse.
 MACKAIL, J. W.—The Life of William Morris. 2 Vols. With Frontispieces. New Edition. Cloth, 4s. net, leather, 6s. net.
 MELLOR, J. W., D.Sc.—Modern Inorganic Chemistry.
 OPPENHEIM, I., M.A., LL.D.—International Law. A Treatise. New Edition, Revised and partly Re-written. 2 Vols. Vol. II.—War and Neutrality. 18s. net.
 PLIMMER, R. H. A., D.Sc.—The Chemical Constitution of the Proteins. Two Parts. Part I.—Analysis. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 5s. 6d. net.
 RHODES, W. G., D.Sc.—A Primer on Alternating Currents.
 ROCHE, REV. WILLIAM, S. J.—The House and Table of God. A Book for His Children Young and Old. With 24 Drawings by T. Baines, Jun.
 RUSSELL, EDWARD J., D.Sc. (Lond)—Soil Conditions and Plant Growth.
 SALMON, STANLEY, B.A. (Oxon)—An Introductory Economic History of England.
 WAKEFORD, REV. JOHN, B.D.—The Word and the World. Pastoral Studies for the Modern Preacher.
 WILSON, H. A., M.A.—Episcopacy and Unity: A Historical Enquiry into the Relations between the Church of England and the Non-Episcopal Churches at Home and Abroad, from the Reformation to the Repeal of the Occasional Conformity Act.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

BOYES, J.—John Boyes, The King of the Waiikuku. 1s. net.
 CORELLI, MARIE.—The Mighty Atom. 1s. net.
 GIBSON, L. S.—The Oakum Pickers. 6s.
 MARRIOTT WATSON, H. B.—The Big Fish. 6s.
 MARSH, RICHARD.—Judith Lee. 6s.
 MAXWELL, W. B.—The Guarded Flame. 1s. net.
 MAXWELL, W. B.—Vivien. 2s. net.
 OLIPHANT, P. L.—Her Scenic Highness. 6s.
 WILLIAMSON, C. N. and A. M.—The Botor Chapter. 2s. net.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

ANON.—Five Spinster. 6s.
 ANNESLEY, MAUD.—My Parisian Year. 10s. 6d. net.
 BUCKROSE, J. E.—The Howlys. 6s.
 CHANNON, E. M.—The Keeper of the Secret. 6s.
 CH. DE CRÉSPIGNY, MRS. PHILIP.—The Five of Spades. 6s.
 GRIBBLE, FRANCIS.—Romance of the Men of Devon. 6s.
 GRIMSHAW, BEATRICE.—When the Red Gods Call. 1s. net.
 HARTLEY, M.—The Man who Saved Austria. 10s. 6d. net.
 LYND, ROBERT.—Rambles in Ireland. 6s.
 PENDERFORD, MARY.—At Lavender Cottage. 6s.
 STANHOPE, GILBERT.—Frederick William II.: A Mystic on the Prussian Throne. 10s. 6d. net.
 SUTCLIFFE, HALLIWELL.—Tales of the Open Hazard. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

FEARIS, WALTER H.—The Treatment of Tuberculosis by means of Carl Spengler's Immune Substances (I.K.) Therapy. With a foreword by Dr. Carl Spengler.
 HOWORTH, SIR HENRY H.—Gregory the Great. With Illustrations, Maps, and Tables.
 KENNEDY, RT. HON. LORD JUSTICE.—The Plutus of Aristophanes.
 LIVINGSTONE, DAVID.—First Expedition to Africa. 1s. net.
 PHILLPOTTS, EDEN.—From the Angle of Seventeen. 3s. 6d.
 SOANE, E. B.—To Mesopotamia and Turkestan in Disguise. With Map.
 TALMAGE, MRS.—Autobiography of T. de Witt Talmage, D.D. With Portraits.
 WAGISWARA, W. D. C., and SAUNDERS, KENNETH J.—The Buddha's Way of Virtue. (Wisdom of the East Series.)
 WILLMOTT, ELLEN A.—The Genus Rosa. Part XXI.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

BENSON, E. F.—Daisy's Aunt. 7d. net.
 BRONTE, CHARLOTTE.—Shirley. 6d. net.
 FRANCE, ANATOLE.—Jocaste et le Chat Maigre (French). 1s. net.
 GREEN, F. E.—The Awakening of England. 2s. net.
 GREEN, F. E.—Recipes of High Class Cookery. 2s. net.
 HUGO, VICTOR.—Histoire d'un Crime. (French). 1s. net.
 HUGO, VICTOR.—L'Art d'être Grand-père. (French). 1s. net.
 MERRIMAN, H. SETON.—The Isle of Unrest. 7d. net.
 RANJITSINHJI, PRINCE.—Jubilee Book of Cricket. 1s. net.
 RIDGE, W. PETT.—Love at Paddington. 2s. net.
 WHITE, E. STEWART.—The Cabin. 2s. net.

Messrs. John Ouseley.

BRAITHWAITE-BATTY, B.—Mrs. Fauntleroy's Nephew. 2s. net.
 BURTON, W. BALDRY, and LEETE, ALFRED.—Spooft. 1s. net.
 MARTIN, STUART.—Inheritance. With Preface by Sir James Vixall, M.P. 6s.
 PEARSE, MARK GUY, and Others.—Wounds of the World. 3s. 6d. net.
 SIEVEKING, I. GIBBERNE.—The Great Postponement. 6s.
 "TWEED, HARRIS."—Knickerbocker Days. 2s. net and 1s. net.
 WHITE, REV. H. C.—Disestablished and Disendowed, or the Fate of an Elderly Curate. 5s. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ALLINSON, A. R.—Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III. 24s. net. set.
 ANDERSON, A. J.—The Tragedy of Sandro Botticelli. 10s. 6d. net.
 ANDOM, R.—Neighbours of Mine. 6s.
 CHESTER BEACH, S.—Déniers à Deux. 5s. net.
 HOLBACH, EDMUND B.—Godoy, The Queen's Favourite. 16s. net.
 FLOWERDEW, HERBERT.—The Villa Mystery. 6s.
 GREEN-EVERETT, E.—Galbraiths of the Wynnyates. 6s.
 HILL, HEPDON.—The Thread of Proof. 6s.
 HOLBACH, MAUD M.—In the Footsteps of Richard Cœur de Lion. 16s. net.
 HOLLANDER, DR. BERNARD.—The First Signs of Insanity. 10s. 6d. net.
 HORN, KATE.—In the Garden of Life. 1s. net.
 KENDALL, OSWALD.—Captain Hawkes, Master Mariner. 6s.
 KOEBEL, W. H.—In Jesuit Land. 12s. 6d. net.
 MACKIRDY, MRS. ARCHIBALD (OLIVE CHRISTIAN MALVERY).—The White Slave Market. 5s. net.
 MAGNAY, SIR WILLIAM.—Paul Burdon. 6s.
 MATHERS, HELEN.—Gay Lawless. 6d.
 MEADE, L. T.—Love's Cross Roads. 6s.
 WHITEING, RICHARD.—No. 4 John Street. 1s. net.
 WILSON WILSON, THEOPHORA.—A Modern Ahab. 6s.
 WODNIL, GABRIELLE.—Maggie of Margate. 6s.
 WYNNE, MARY.—Honour's Fetters. 2s. net.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons.

BRANDAN, JOHN.—My Lady of Aros. With Coloured Frontispiece and Map. Cheaper Edition. 2s. net.
 CASSON, HERBERT N.—Ads and Sales. 6s. net.
 CHAPIN, ANNA ALICE.—The Under Trail. Coloured Frontispiece. 6s.
 HEAD, F. D.—The Transfer of Stocks, Shares, etc. 5s. net.
 TAIT, G. W.—Gold Mine Accounts and Costing. 5s. net.
 VARIOUS AUTHORS.—Lectures on British Commerce. 7s. 6d. net.
 WORSFOLD, W. BASIL.—The Union of South Africa. With Chapters on Rhodesia and the Native Territories of the High Commission. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

BEALE, STEPHEN.—Edward Fitzgerald Beale. 6s. net.
 KIMBALL, GUSTAVUS S.—Commercial Arithmetic. 4s. net.
 LENORE VAN DER VIER.—Wayward. 1s. net.
 TIT OYD, CARO.—Henry Demarest Lloyd. A Biography. 2 Vols. 21s. net.
 SELIGMAN, E. R. A. (edited by).—The Social Evil. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes.

CLEMISHA, H. W., M.A.—A History of Preston in Ampleforth. 7s. 6d. net.
 HERLIZ, G. B., M.A.—The Manchester Parliament, 1759-1912. 2s. 6d. net.
 HOLDEN, I. M.A.—Short History of London.
 SHAW, W. B.—The Story of Presbyterianism in Wigan. 5s. net.
 WATKHOUSE, PAUL, and UNWIN, RAYMOND.—Old Town and New Needs, and the Town Extension Plan.

Messrs. Smith Elder & Co.

BROWNING, ROBERT.—The Work of Robert Browning. Vols. III and IV. 10s. 6d. net each.

Messrs. Stephen Swift & Co.

BECKFORD, WILLIAM.—Translated by SIR F. MURZIALS.—Episodes of Nathel. 21s. net.
 BELLOC, HILAIRE.—Touring (Battle Series). 1s. net.
 HUNDEBERG, AUGUST.—Countdown of a Fool. Only Authorised Translation. 6s.
 LYNCH, ARTHUR, M.P.—A New System of Psychology. 2 Vols. 10s. 6d. net each.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

ASKEW, ALICE and CLAUDE.—Barbara. 6s.
 BODKIN, M. McDONNELL, KC.—Grattan's Parliament: Before and After. 10s. 6d. net.
 COURLANDER, ALPHONSE.—Mightier than the Sword. 6s.
 DINGLE, E. J.—China's Revolution. 15s. net.
 GOUTTSBURY, CULLEN.—Songs out of Exile. 3s. 6d. net.
 HOBHOUSE, L. T.—The Labour Movement. Paper, 1s. net; cloth, 3s. 6d. net.
 LEWIS, ARTHUR D.—Syndicalism and the General Strike. 7s. 6d. net; cloth, 3s. 6d. net.
 MALLIK, MANMATH C.—A Study in Ideals in Great Britain and India. 10s. 6d. net.
 ROBERTSON, WILLIAM.—The Life and Times of John Bright. (New Edition.) 2s. 6d. net.
 SHUSTER, W. MORGAN.—The Strangling of Persia. 12s. 6d. net.
 THOMAS, BERTHA.—Picture Tales from Welsh Hills. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

APPLIN, ARTHUR.—Lady Dorothy's Indiscretion. 6s.
 ASKEW, A. and C.—The Dream Daughter. 6d.
 FORMAN, JUSTUS M.—Buchanan's Wife. 7d. net.
 MITFORD, BERTRAM.—Selmin of Selmingfold. 6s.
 OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—A Maker of History. 7d. net.
 OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—A Millionaire of Yesterday. 2s. net.
 OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—Berenice. 6d.
 OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—Those Other Days. 6s.
 PEMBERTON, MAX.—Pro Patria. 1s. net.
 "RITA."—Fragoletta. 6d.
 TRACY, LOUIS.—Mirabel's Island. 6s.
 TRACY, LOUIS.—Sylvia's Chauffeur. 2s. net.
 WALLACE, EDGAR.—The Duke in the Suburbs. 6d.
 WALLACE, EDGAR.—The Nine Bears. 6d.
 WILSON-BARRETT, A.—The Secret Marriage. 6s.

Messrs. Wells, Gardner, Darton & Co.

GELL, THE HON. MRS.—The Menace of Secularism: A Course of Eight Addresses for Women and Girls on the Crisis in the Church in Wales. 1s.
 WALL, J. CHARLES.—Porches and Fountains: Their Liturgical Uses and Architectural Beauties. 10s. 6d. net.

THE READER.

MISS BRADDON: THE WRITER AND HER WORK.

WRITTEN AND ILLUSTRATED WITH SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHS BY CLIVE HOLLAND

MISS MARY ELIZABETH BRADDON (known in private life as Mrs. John Maxwell) is a Londoner by birth, and comes of an old Cornish family, one member of which sat for Parliament in the reign of Elizabeth; another—Lawrance Braddon—distinguished himself in the reign of Charles II., very much, unfortunately, to the detriment of his relatives and successors, by becoming involved in one of the many political intrigues of the time, and in consequence suffering the forfeiture of his estate. But it must be admitted that a study of the history and pedigree of the Braddon family shows that they were chiefly law-abiding, quiet country folk, content to live in comfort and in the respect of their fellows and neighbours on their estates in that far off western portion of England known as the Duchy of Cornwall. It was certainly not until the generation of the author of "Lady Audley's Secret" that any member of the family succeeded in making, or perhaps even sought to make, the name known to the general public: nor does there seem to have been any considerable tendency in the direction of literary pursuits either in the stock from which the young girl who was to win fame as a novelist came or in the environment in which she was brought up, although, it is true, her mother was an unusually cultivated woman, possessed of a fine critical taste, and able to express her views in articles, contributed to the magazines and periodicals of the day, and in essays. Her father was a writer also, but almost entirely upon sporting subjects to which he was devoted, and her cousin, John Delane, the famous editor of The Times, was as powerful an influence in his age with his pen as he was in his autocratic rule of the "Thunderer." Miss Braddon's only brother, Sir Edward Coventry Braddon, might possibly have attained to some distinction in the world of letters had not the realm of action claimed him for its own. He had a successful career in India, settled in Tasmania, was Premier of the colony during two governments, and afterwards represented it in England for some years in the capacity of Agent-General. During a long and busy life he published a couple of books which at least serve to show that he was not without some literary gifts.

A fresh novel by Miss Braddon is still looked forward to with deep interest, not only by those who have read her books with pleasure since she first began to weave the long series of fascinating works of fiction that appear in "Who's Who" and publishers' catalogues under her name, but by those whose memory of her work may only go back a comparatively few years. But it is difficult, nevertheless, for the present generation of novel readers to appreciate the sway that this most popular of all mid-Victorian novelists held over her public for many years from the date of the publication of "Lady Audley's Secret," more than fifty years ago.

By many critics Miss Braddon, in common with the late Wilkie Collins, is held to have founded a more or less distinct school of sensational fiction. By the use of the word "sensational" we do not, however, intend to imply that the sensationalism of the veteran writer under notice, and that of her equally well-known confrère, the late Wilkie Collins, has anything in common with the sensational rubbish which now pours from the printing press almost every day throughout the year.

Perhaps it would be more correct to say that Miss Braddon revived the mysterious and sensational element in fiction which had its origin in "The Castle of Otranto" and other similar works. But, be this as it may, whether as a founder or as a reviver of a school, Miss Braddon has for a period of nearly fifty years held a place in English fiction to which no other writer has succeeded in attaining.

There is a somewhat trite and familiar saying, "a poet is born not made." And so far as Miss Braddon is concerned we need only substitute the word "novelist" for "poet" to produce an axiom which in her case was undoubtedly correct.

From a photograph taken about twenty years ago, and now first published.

In a recent conversation with her she told us that although her memory is still wonderfully fresh, notwithstanding her seventy-four years, she could not now recall the time when she was not writing. Almost as a child in the nursery she began to write fiction; and when in short frocks at school she used to astonish her schoolfellows by the energy and completeness with which she covered all the sheets of her copy-books, not always, be it remarked, with the moral maxims with which they were headed, but far oftener, indeed, with the beginnings of hair-raising and exciting romances to which her vivid imagination gave birth. Long before she was out of her teens she had essayed, she told us, "nearly every kind of original composition, novels, plays, poems, and history." But she confesses that during this early and experimental period of her apprenticeship to literature she found that it was much more easy to commence a good story than to finish it; and although in note-books and on odd scraps of paper there still remain in her possession a multitude of ideas, plots, studies, and notes for stories, a good deal of this material has never been, and probably never will be, used.

Like many another writer destined to become distinguished by a world-wide fame, Miss Braddon's first joy of seeing herself in print was given her by the editor of a local paper, and it was in the Beverley Recorder, then recently founded and we are pleased to note still existing, that her first published effort appeared. To her great delight a little song, in the measure of the seventeenth century, was accepted, and printed in what is commonly known as "The Poet's Corner." Two of the verses run :-

The front of Lichfield House,
Miss Braddon's home at Richmond.

"All joys on earth have we,
All fears on earth we see,
All cares on earth there be
But never rest

"Youth comes, the all-believing,
Hope comes, the all-deceiving,
Death comes, sad hearts bereaving
Yet comes not rest"

In this ~~we~~ catch an echo of the pessimism supposed to be the bane of all young poets, but which happily for her readers' enjoyment did not develop with the years nor find a place in the fascinating stories which the young writer was afterwards destined to weave for the delight of so many readers.

This little poem in the local paper was very soon afterwards followed by Miss Braddon's first book, a volume of poems entitled "Garibaldi," now, we fancy, forgotten, and certainly long out of print, although at the time of its appearance the poems received many favourable Press notices.

How Miss Braddon became a novelist and not a poet will be of undoubted interest to many readers. It happened in this way. An enterprising Yorkshire printer, getting into touch with her, offered a commission to write a serial story, which in her girlish eyes appeared indeed a dazzling prospect. For she was not only to appear week by week as an authoress, but was to be paid for her story. We fancy that many less enterprising and daring young writers would have been choked off from the enterprise by the demands of the contract, which stipulated, amongst other things, that she should write a serial novel "combining the humour of Dickens with the plot and construction of G. P. R. Reynolds," who just then was one of the most popular and frankly sensational novelists of the time. For the accomplishment of this, we should imagine somewhat difficult task, the said printer was to pay the said author the magnificent sum of £10!

Lichfield House. View of the drawing-room through the small sitting-room, in the latter of which are some fine china and interesting pictures.

Miss Braddon and Mr. W. B. Maxwell.

From a photograph taken at Battle, September, 1911.

Miss Braddon, who must truly have had "ink in her veins" and an astonishing amount of courage in her heart, immediately set to work upon her task, and in the course of a very short time produced the first few instalments of a story called "Three Times Dead," a title which could not possibly fail, we should think, to arouse the interest of the reading public of that day. All was not, however, smooth sailing for our coming novelist. Unfortunately, the whole enterprise collapsed, the printer went into bankruptcy, and the promise of £10 which had lured the future novelist away from poetry into prose never materialized. "Three Times Dead" ceased running after a few instalments, and for many years was not re-issued, although it ultimately appeared in a cheap edition under the new title of "The Trail of the Serpent."

Miss Braddon's initial experience of novel writing was curiously enough almost repeated by the fate which befel her second and much more famous story, "Lady Audley's Secret," first published in 1862. Written when quite a young girl, this story, which may almost be said to have founded a school of English fiction, and is not only world famous but probably Miss Braddon's best selling book after a period of so many years since its first publication, commenced to run in a periodical called "Robin Goodfellow." This unfortunately came to an end after the twelfth number, and the story, Miss Braddon told us, would probably have remained in its fragmentary stage and never have been completed but for a very warmly appreciative letter she received from J. B. Buckstone, a brilliant actor and play writer in the early sixties of the last century, who wrote saying how greatly he had been impressed by the story, and how deeply he regretted its interruption. Buckstone entreated the author to finish the novel, which he said he considered to be of striking interest and admirably suited for stage purposes. This welcome approval from so competent a critic naturally fired the young writer's ambition, and she took up the thread of the story once more. It was continued in another magazine, and whilst running there attracted the notice of the Brothers Tinsley, a recently founded and very enterprising firm of publishers, who, keenly on the look-out to secure new and powerful writers, made Miss Braddon a proposal to publish it, in the three volume form then popular, at the earliest possible date. The offer was accepted, and the final volume was written at high speed against time in order that the book might be printed and published before its conclusion in serial form.

On the day after publication Miss Braddon received a visit from the late Lionel Brough. At this period Mr. Brough, not yet an actor, was interested in the firm of Tinsleys, representing the literary or intellectual element, while the brothers Tinsley supplied the business acumen; and he had come to call upon the young authoress to convey the pleasant intelligence that within twenty-four hours of publication "Lady Audley's Secret" had proved a startling success. A week afterwards all the world and his wife were reading or talking about the book; and edition after edition was called for in such rapid succession that it was impossible to print and bind fast enough to satisfy the unprecedented demand.

Miss Braddon's writing desk.

It is very difficult, of course, accurately to standardize the measure of a book's fame, because standards are always varying, and it is quite possible that nowadays no novel could create quite such a sensation in the widely extended world of readers of fiction that "Lady Audley's Secret" did fifty years ago. But when one comes to apply the test of continued popularity one may very fairly claim for it that "Lady Audley's Secret" is one of those books, comparatively few in number, which have earned a prominent place in English literature.

From the time of its first issue down to the present day it has passed through countless editions, so many, indeed, that I doubt if anyone has ever troubled to count them. Certainly Miss Braddon has never done so. And, of course, the numbers of pirated editions sold in America swell the huge total of known and authorized editions of the book. It can be obtained in all forms and at all prices, and the present generation seem to read it with almost as great pleasure as did their fathers, and even grandfathers, before them.

"Lady Audley's Secret" was, not unnaturally—for Miss Braddon always was a rapid and tireless worker—followed in quick succession by "Henry Dunbar," "Eleanor's Victory," and "Aurora Floyd." In each case the authoress had the pleasure of knowing that her hold upon her immense public was being strengthened as well as maintained.

A very interesting tribute as to the popularity, not alone of "Lady Audley's Secret," but of other of Miss Braddon's works, comes from that great stylist and brilliant writer, Robert Louis Stevenson, who in a hitherto unpublished letter to Miss Braddon from his Samoan home at Vailima, writes: "I remember reading 'Lady Audley's Secret' when I was fifteen, and I wish my days to be bound each to each by Miss Braddon's novels. Apparently I am not alone in this opinion. I have been over by far the greater part of the Pacific. When a ship comes in the local trader or traders are always on the look out for new novels. In a small way the schooner plays the part of a circulating library. But there is one book, I am sorry to be obliged to inform you, which is a mere drug in the market in the Pacific. 'Oh no, I have that already,' is the cry—and the book is 'Aurora Floyd.' After all, it is something to be out and away greater and more popular than Scott, Shakespeare, Homer, in the South Seas, and to that you have attained."

A portion of the back of Lichfield House, which is practically hidden and shaded by fine horse-chestnut trees.

Astounding as the fact may seem when one remembers that nearly all Miss Braddon's novels are upon what a publisher once described as "generous" lines, that is to say of considerably above the average length, she has published more than seventy others since "Aurora Floyd" first saw the light. And even criticism of that somewhat supercilious type which once dealt rather severely with her work has at length nothing but praise for it. Truly Miss Braddon can be said to be an instance of an author who, although attaining a great vogue in a remarkably short time, not only has held her position but also has never stood still. She has certainly never become egotistical or self-satisfied, nor has she ever ceased to strive, not only to do the best that is in her, but in a new book to excel the last.

The Old Georgian Orangery at the end of the Long Walk, Lichfield House.

A well-known critic says of her last novel, "The Green Curtain": "It is so fresh and strong that it is almost impossible to believe that it is not written by the hand of youth; but, of course, of a youth singularly gifted in its grip of craftsmanship, and with a perfection of style. Indeed, it is only in these things that one can detect the practised hand trained by long years of toil."

There are many readers who have more than a moderate acquaintance with her numerous other works who have declared that this last book of hers is equal to those written during the period which human judgment ascribes to the prime of life. Should Miss Braddon not publish another novel, which those who know her and have loved her work sincerely trust will not be the case, this last book will remain a splendid finish and a final indication of the great gifts as a weaver of stories, coupled with indomitable industry and perseverance, with which she has been endowed. But happily there is no reason for fearing that "The Green Curtain" will be the last. The veteran novelist, our readers will learn with delight, is in excellent health, and is at present engaged upon two new books. She is for the moment undecided which she will complete first!

Miss Braddon has, we think—with "Who's Who" and what we fancy is a fairly complete list of her books before us—been unusually successful in the choice of her titles. She has almost without exception selected some striking sequence of words where she has not contented herself merely with calling the book after one of its characters. What better titles, indeed, could you have than "Birds of Prey," "Run to Earth," "Dead Sea Fruit," "To the Bitter End," "Strangers and Pilgrims," "Hostages to Fortune," "Dead Men's Shoes," "The Cloven Foot," "Phantom Fortune," "The Day Will Come," "Thou Art the Man!" "Rough Justice," "The Rose of Life," "During Her Majesty's Pleasure," and "Beyond These Voices"? All of them indicate a faculty for selecting the right word, which is more than half the battle in fixing upon a title for a novel, or indeed any other book.

In response to a question as to how she manages to invent her plots, which form so important a factor in the success of her books, Miss Braddon said: "It is in those brooding hours, described by Tyndall when 'Thought sits waiting and Fancy holds the door,' that the plots of my stories build themselves most readily. When the plot of my tale has been decided, I carry it about with me, in the shape of portable mental luggage, for a long time. Adding to it, shaping it, rounding it off, improving it, and reconsidering it as opportunity occurs. Then comes the pen and paper stage—note-making and so on—and then it is time seriously to tackle the task and write the book itself, which I always do with my own hand. I have no preferences where I write and no particular time for writing."

Photo by Arbus & Bernardi.

Mr. W. B. Maxwell.

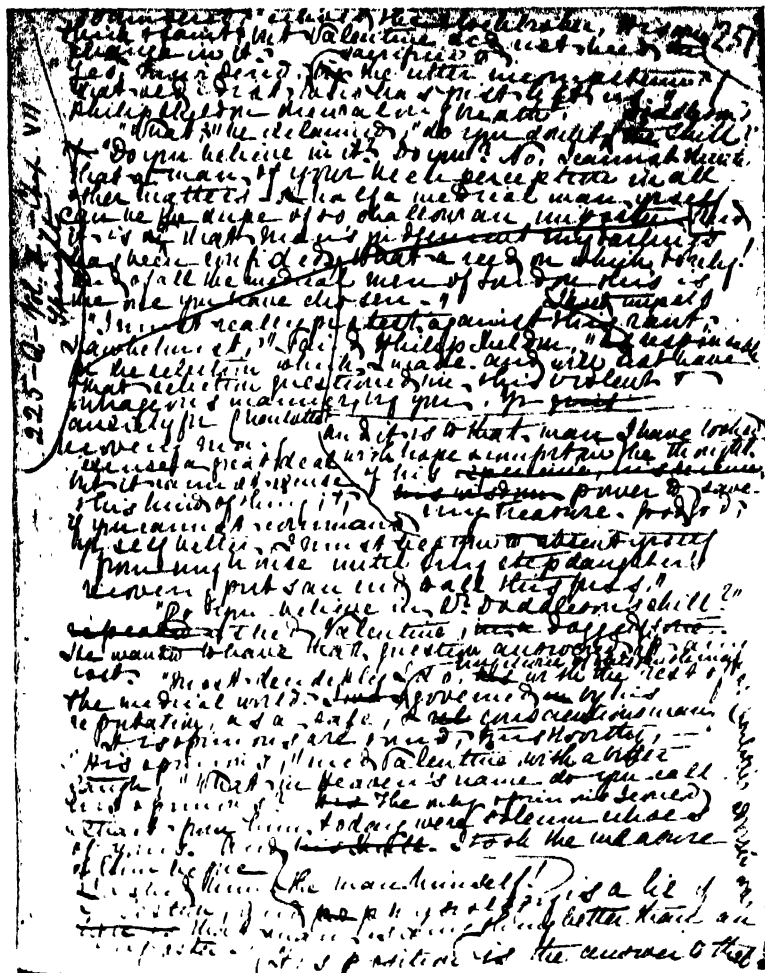

The son of Mrs. John Maxwell (Miss Braddon).

Unlike many literary celebrities of the late Victorian period and present day, Miss Braddon has no love for publicity. Indeed, she has a perfect horror of being honored, and when in former years passing considerable periods of time, as she did, on the Continent, at fashionable resorts and in the large hotels, the discovery of who she was almost invariably led to a burning desire on her part to flee the place forthwith. She has for the same reason never consented to the publication of her photograph, although this decision on her part has, we know from personal experience, been a matter for great regret upon the part of many thousands of her readers, who are constantly writing to well-known photographers in the hope that they may have "taken" Miss Braddon, and have copies for sale; as well as applying to the authoress herself for autograph portraits. We were therefore fortunate in being able to persuade her to grant permission for the publication of the excellent photo, which was taken about twenty years ago.

In addition to the astonishing industry and mental energy which has produced upwards of seventy long novels—as a matter of fact there are some seventy-three, still in constant demand and in print at the present time, selling in every sort of edition and in all countries of the English-speaking race—Miss Braddon has written many stories, which were published as serials anonymously, and not a few verses and essays in newspapers, including contributions to "Punch" during the period it was edited by her old friend the late Sir Francis Burnand, and to "The World" while it was under the control of another old and valued friend, the late Edmund Yates. She has also written several dramas, comedies, and a blank verse play. One of them, "The Missing Witness," a melodrama played very successfully in the English provinces and the United States, is probably well known to many older readers. She is also the anonymous author of quite a number of the farces which were popular in the sixties and seventies of the last century. The serial story which she wrote in French for the Paris "Figaro" some years ago has, we believe, never been translated or re-published in English. All the work we have mentioned would prove a more than full record for most human beings. But, in addition to this, Miss Braddon has yet during her busy life found time to edit several magazines, to write the greater part of those extremely popular Christmas numbers or "Annuals" known as "The Mistletoe Bough," published in the eighties and nineties, and to advise about and re-write the work of many other people.

Reduced facsimile of MS. page of one of Miss Braddon's earlier novels. She has always written her books on large sheets of paper and with her own hand.

We have dealt fairly fully in the foregoing pages with Miss Braddon's work. Now let us try to give our readers an impression at least of the authoress herself. Nowadays those who are fortunate enough to be friends or acquaintances of Miss Braddon can generally find her in her beautiful home, Lichfield House, Richmond-on-Thames. And it was here we again visited her only a few days before this article was completed. Let us say at once that Lichfield House is a delightful and a "truly fit and proper" home for the distinguished novelist, who occupies it with her son, the well-known writer of "Vivien," "The Guarded Flame," "In Cotton Wool," and other notable books. It is a charming, old and spacious Georgian house, retired but a little distance from the road in which it stands, but rich in the possession of a wide-spreading garden, an orchard just big enough to hold half-a-score of apple trees, an ancient quince, and with its turf carpeted in due season by a multitude of narcissi, crocuses, and hyacinths. While at the end of the broad gravel walk, and long greens which suggest the old-fashioned game of bowls, stands a Georgian orangery. This walk, which stretches from the bottom of the grassy slope at the back of the house, is so long as to be almost unique in gardens so near London. The house itself has many historical associations. It was formerly the residence of the Bishops of Lichfield, and by one of those strange chances was also at one time that of the famous opera soprano, Catalani.

When one has strolled in Miss Braddon's garden, at this time of year gay with the colour and sweet with the perfume of many roses and other flowers, and picturesque by reason of its fine horse-chestnuts and shrubs, many of the latter of which the growth of age has turned into almost the size of small trees, one can well realize that one of her chief recreations and pleasures is gardening. Who, indeed, would not be fond of pretending to work as an amateur gardener in an old-fashioned, sweet place like this?

Of her dwelling itself what need one say more than that it forms a fitting environment for its owner, whose charming welcome, old-world courtesy, and delightful conversation leave upon a visitor's mind a deep impression and a fragrant memory. There are many pictures in the house, because both Miss Braddon and her novelist son have the same delight in beautiful things as had the late John Maxwell, her husband, who was for many years also her publisher. Of books there are plenty, as one would naturally expect, covering a wide field marked by a catholicity of taste which Miss Braddon's weight of years has neither dulled nor restricted. Silver, porcelain, bibelots long in the possession of the Braddon or Maxwell families or acquired on one or other of the many Continental journeys in which Miss Braddon formerly delighted; delicate miniatures, and beautiful china, placing a veritable temptation to crime in the way of connoisseurs and collectors, are found in the spacious Georgian drawing-room.

The Lawn and Orchard.

Regarding the other rooms, perhaps the smoking-room is to those who are fond of books the most interesting. For here, in a beautiful old bureau, are stored many of the original MSS. of Miss Braddon's novels, bound in crimson leather.

On the first floor is situated the authoress' own study (and favourite "den"), the walls of which are surrounded by bookcases from floor to ceiling, and every table, and let us add most of the chairs, are encumbered by books and papers, giving a homely touch to the room, where comfort and not pretension reigns.

Miss Braddon has been happy indeed in her homes. Annesley Bank, near Lyndhurst, Hampshire, which was at one time her country house, was given up by her some few years ago with great regret, because she recognized that she was not any longer able to ride and hunt as she had constantly done since a girl, and that it was unlikely she would be able to spend very much time in the New Forest district, beautiful descriptions of which appear in several of her novels, notably "Asphodel" and "Vixen." In the old house at Richmond, where more than half of her life has been spent, and where of late years she has produced the novels that have been so constant a source of pleasure to the great reading public throughout the world, she now chiefly lives; except for occasional absences at Bexhill-on-Sea or Brighton, which are both favourite places of resort with her, owing to their life, brightness, and bracing air.

Miss Braddon, notwithstanding the enormous amount of her literary output, which, as we have stated already, commenced when she was quite a young girl and is still continuing, has been a great reader. She has always endeavoured to keep herself abreast of the progressive thought of the time, and though she puts down as her favourite recreations gardening, travelling, and music, reading still claims a great portion of her spare time.

Concerning this love of reading, Miss Braddon said to us, with a smile: "I can quite truthfully say that from the time I was able to read a story without having to whisper the words as I read them books have been my chief delight. To my mother, indeed, I owe my introduction at a very early age to the great world of imaginative literature. She was a woman possessed of a cultivated mind, a keen wit, and a natural taste for what was best in the literature of the time, as well as being a devoted student of Shakespeare and Scott. One of my earliest and still vivid recollections of literary things is the talk I used to hear in my cousin's, John Delaine's, drawing-room concerning a publication in a yellow paper cover which was the latest number of a new novel by a new writer who was exciting a great deal of attention at the time. That book was Thackeray's 'Vanity Fair,' and by the time 'Pendennis' appeared I was able to share my mother's enthusiasm for his keen, fresh humour, which, much as our natural bent made us appreciate it, we never praised to the depreciation of my first favourite, his great contemporary, Charles Dickens."

The Scene of "Lady Audley's Secret."

A sketch by Herbert Jennings from the original painting by S. Duncan.

But although acquainted with most of the English writers of her own time—a reading period now extending well over sixty years—Miss Braddon says: "I have read a good deal of French, and it was my old friend, George Augustus Sala, a man of wide cultivation and a splendid critic, who introduced me, as it were, to French literature. He first got me to read Honoré de Balzac, of whose books ever since that time I have been a close and delighted student. I have read most of Dumas' historical novels, chiefly for recreation, but I have been often astonished to discover how much more accurate he really is in his treatment of French history than English readers usually credit him with. Of course, as is only natural, when he crosses the Channel his historical blunders are neither few nor insignificant. But this may also be said of most modern French writers, and of English ones when dealing with French historical subjects, though perhaps not to quite so great an extent. "Of course," Miss Braddon continued, "I delighted in the work of Flaubert, Alphonse Daudet, and Guy de Maupassant. Who did not do so? But since their death I have found German, Italian, and Spanish novels more attractive than contemporary French fiction, although I have read occasionally a novel by the younger Daudet, and always with great interest those of Marcelle Tinayre, Edgard Rod, and Claude Farrère. I have also read most of Zola's books at one time or another; and although, of course, I admit that they are disfigured by many faults of taste from an English point of view, I must at the same time confess that I have found them intensely interesting and have always recognized the great power behind his pen. Except for the splendid work of Tolstoy, I cannot pretend to be an ardent admirer of the Russian school of fiction."

In criticisms of several very famous contemporary writers whose books are boomed both by themselves and by their publishers in the most ingenious fashion, Miss Braddon showed a generosity which is not always discoverable in the estimates made by one novelist of the work of other writers of fiction. But throughout the pleasant talks we have from time to time enjoyed with the veteran author nothing, indeed, was more noticeable than her great generosity in appreciating good work, whether in music, art, or literature; of all three of which departments of human activity she seemed to have a wide, up-to-date, and sympathetic knowledge.

Her son, Mr. W. B. Maxwell, and his charming wife live with her at Lichfield House, and in her affection for her grandchildren one obtains an insight into the great love she has for children generally, and, indeed, for all other more or less helpless things.

"I delight in children," she said to us. "They keep one young long past the time when one might reasonably expect to be feeling old." And a pleasant smile lighted up her face as she spoke. "Is not to watch the young mind open and develop one of the most fascinating studies for anyone conceivable? I have always had a great affection for children and animals."

This love of animals, it will be remembered by many readers, was also a distinguishing characteristic of Ouida, one of Miss Braddon's contemporaries, who died but a year or two ago.

With regard to modern English fiction Miss Braddon had much to say that was both interesting and illuminative, although there is not space to touch upon this subject in the present article. But her admiration for the great Wessex novelist, Thomas Hardy, we must mention. "I have a great admiration for the genius of Thomas Hardy," said Miss Braddon. "I have had the pleasure of meeting him on several occasions, and I have read his books again and again. 'Far From the Mad-ding Crowd' is one of my favourites, and I admire immensely 'Tess,' too, although with many another reader I deeply regret the tragic end of that splendid creature. I can, of course, see the greatness of 'Jude the Obscure' as a profound study of human nature and development, but it is all the more painful to read this study of melancholy lives because the author has made them real by his great power, and intensity of purpose. To my mind, both 'Tess' and 'Jude' are heart-breaking books."

A corner of the book-lined study in which Miss Braddon works. The window overlooks the beautiful garden.

With regard to the advice Miss Braddon would give to young authors—and who, indeed, is in a position to give it better?—we have only room for a short synopsis. She said: "If I had any advice to give to young writers it would be, 'Wait till some incident in real life suggests the subject of a story, and when you have let it grow and shape itself in your mind tell your story, and tell it in the best language and in the simplest manner possible. Indeed, I do not know that I could give better advice if I were to talk for quite a long while.'"

Of Miss Braddon's favourites amongst her own books we have gathered during our chats with her on literary topics, that they are "Lady Audley's Secret," "Asphodel," "Vixen," and the historical romances, "London Pride," "Mohawks," and "The Infidel."

"But," said Miss Braddon, "the fact of it is, I am interested in every new book that I write, and it is as difficult to mention favourites amongst literary, as it is unwise to do amongst human, children."

It is not to be wondered at that in the long and full life Miss Braddon has lived she has met many interesting and celebrated people. Concerning these and her circle of friends and acquaintances during the last fifty years, which has included many distinguished in art, letters, science, and music, Miss Braddon said, amongst other things:

"I several times met Robert Browning, by whose personality I was always greatly charmed; and I have been a devoted reader of his poetry, more devoted perhaps after his death than I was during his life. Tennyson, unfortunately, I never met. I should have indeed liked to do so, for I have loved him from the day I read 'The Idylls of the King,' when the little green cloth volume was first published, and when I was young enough to fall in love with Lancelot and weep over the wasted love of Elaine."

In her reminiscences of friends who have gone, Miss Braddon spoke of Charles Reade as "one of the kindest of men, with a heart open as the day to melting charity, stopping at no effort to help the wronged and the oppressed. A delightful companion and ever at his best in conversation where his hearers were fit and few."

Her great contemporary, Wilkie Collins, who passed away now many years ago, she knew quite well. But she never met either Dickens or Thackeray, and has many regrets that she did not do so, as they may be very truly called her literary heroes.

* * * * *

When one has left Lichfield House after a talk with its gracious owner, one is tempted always to ask oneself "what is the general impression left upon one's mind by the personality of a writer whose fame is truly world-wide, and whose charm of manner takes one back into the days when culture was not a garment but rather an evidence of a sweet soul and a well-stored mind?" Let us in conclusion of this article try to epitomise our impressions. First there comes to one's recollection undoubtedly the picture of a charming old lady, with nearly white hair, dressed quietly and with the taste which bespeaks the artistic mind and the means to clothe oneself as one would and should be clothed. Secondly there remains the echo of a gentle voice, with patches of brighter tones in it as some topic of more than usual interest comes up, and engages her attention. Further, there is the underlying feeling that the environment in which Miss Braddon lives is just that which she herself could wish. And lastly there is the abiding and delightful memory of intercourse with one who has known the best of many years, whose interest in the world and its happenings is not even yet flagging, and who is still capable of enjoying the sunshine and meeting the shadows of life with a brave, undismayed, and gracious heart.

ROBERTSON SMITH.*

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR JAMES DENNEY, D.D.

ROBERTSON SMITH has been fortunate in his biographers. He was above all things, they tell us, a man of many friends; and their record of his life, while it has the candid and objective character which he himself would have approved, is marked by affectionate loyalty to his memory. The most interesting parts of it are the beginning and the end—the three-and-twenty years of his home and university life, and the thirteen years which followed his deposition from the Aberdeen Chair. In both the interest is painful, almost tragic. Smith was never at school, and though his home life had joys of its own, its intensity, austerity, and concentration on study, which, when he passed to the university was intensified by an unhealthy ambition, itself fostered from home, was not the life for a delicate child. He distinguished himself in all the ordinary studies, but mainly in those which require accurate knowledge; and when we hear of his assisting the Professor of Physics in Edinburgh and applying for the Chair of Mathematics in Glasgow, we are reminded of another great Orientalist, Renan, who regretted that he had given his life to the petty historical sciences instead of following his early bent and natural gift for the great sciences of nature. Smith became a minister, but never had a charge. At twenty-four he was Professor of Hebrew in the Free Church College in Aberdeen, and about 250 pages of the biography are devoted to the 'case' which was carried on while he filled this post. As a narrative this can never be superseded; it is accurate, supported by references, and intelligible at every point. It is, perhaps, as impartial as any narrative could be of a case in which the narrator had taken a side at the time. There must always be tension between ideas and institutions, because ideas can put up with anything but inconsistency, while institutions must provide for ideas which more or less hold each other in check. They must embody truth and give it free play, yet they represent education also, which means that there is a right and a wrong way of initiating the mind into truth, and even that all the truth is not yet to be told to everyone. The Smith case was a classical instance of the collision of these interests, and it is too much to expect that men temperamentally different will ever exactly agree about the actors in it. Some of those whose names and doings are registered here might well have been forgotten. If there were venerable obscurantists on one side, there were complacent prigs on the other, and there is always Pharisaism on both. The main interest centres round Smith and Rainy, but the ethical questions it raises are not settled when we say that Smith was fighting for the truth. One may be on Smith's side, yet feel it quite impossible to say that Rainy was fighting against the truth. In his own view he was fighting for the truth and for something else—the unity and the peace of the Church. The one really objectionable expression in the biography is that which the authors use in describing the effect, for Rainy and his supporters, of their failure when they first tried to get rid of Smith by administrative process: "they had sold their birth-right and had been cheated out of the mess of pottage." There was no "mess of pottage" in question, and such language would be injurious as well as insulting if it were not inept. It is quite clear that the whole business took Rainy by surprise and that he had no control of the movements in the Church. He was in no sense the protagonist on one side as Smith was on the other: if we are to use the language of the ancient stage, he interposed rather as a deus ex machina to cut a knot that he did not know how to untie and to save the real protagonists from destroying the Church between them. The volume of Essays and Lectures which accompanies the biography is a valuable supplement, enabling us to appreciate the religious and theological views of Smith during his Aberdeen years. In criticism he was at first mainly influenced by Ewald; in theology, while he was always in contact with the Reformation at first hand, he was influenced especially by Rothe and Ritschl. Perhaps lectures a generation old should hardly be published unless there is something very original in them; new as they were to Scotland at the time, the various studies of the doctrine of Scripture here accumulated are not essentially new, and the style is heavy and even verbose. It is rather astonishing to hear Smith speak of "clearness" as the characteristic of Ritschl's lectures; one would rather say that the incurable opaqueness of Ritschl's writings has in some of these papers infected so clear and trenchant a mind as Smith himself. With his removal to Cambridge came "the final and most brilliant phase"

* "The Life of William Robertson Smith." By John Sutherland Black and George Chrystal. (15s. net.) "Lectures and Essays of William Robertson Smith." By John Sutherland Black and George Chrystal. 10s. net. (A. & C. Black.)

Professor William Robertson Smith.

From a posthumous portrait by Sir George Reid, R.S.A., now in the Free Church College, Aberdeen.

From 'The Life of William Robertson Smith,' by John Sutherland Black and George Chrystal. (A. & C. Black) of Smith's life. It was here he wrote his "Burnett Lectures," and became one of the founders of the new science of comparative religion. His biographers seem to be astonished that he found it possible to write "The Religion of the Semites" and at the same time to hold to his old orthodox idea of the uniqueness of the Old Testament as the record of a divine revelation. To the present writer it does not seem incredible. Smith's view of the Old Testament was to him self-evident, and so it is to all who share it. If a man says there is anything in the world like the Old Testament for religious power and value, let him produce it. Smith was surely entitled to say that it had not yet been produced. The last years of his life, with their incredible intellectual achievements, are ennobled by the suffering under which all his work had now to be done. He once met Mark Pattison, and did not like him, but only the historian of Scaliger and Casaubon and Huet could have done justice to a scholarship like his. He knew everything, one is inclined to say that could be learned by assault or by application; his range of exact knowledge would seem fabulous if it were not so well attested. His legend grew up about him in his lifetime, but it was not more wonderful than the truth. What his biographers leave obscure is whether there was an inner side to his mind—whether he had learned the things which do not come by application or assault but by absorption, and which are only given through time and patience. He conquered friends as he conquered knowledge, but though his conversational powers are celebrated, no memorable word of his conversation is preserved, no aphorism with the flavour of experience or personality in it. He could have lectured to Beethoven on the structure and function of every instrument in the orchestra, and if he had met him he would probably have done so; but what this book does not tell us is whether he had any music in his soul. In any case he was one of the most vivid and amazing persons of his time, and well merited this fine memorial.

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

JULY, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original rondeau.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best comment in four or six lines of verse on Dr. Johnson's dictum that "no one but a block-head ever wrote except for money."
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.
- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR JUNE.

- I.—We anticipated a large response to this offer of a PRIZE for the best original sonnet, but nothing so large as it has met with. Among the numerous papers sent in are several poor sonnets, a few that are not sonnets at all, and quite a considerable number that are very good. After careful consideration we have decided to divide the prize and award HALF A GUINEA to Miss D. M. KIRMODE, of 118, Balliam Park Road, S.W., and HALF A GUINEA to Mr. ROGER QUIN, care of Mr. A. Shearer, of 202, Gallowgate, Glasgow, for the following:

COMMERCE.

I saw the heavens full of whirling wheels,
And day as foul as night, and night grown red
With worse than sunset light—the sullen dread
Of ceaseless fires that drove gigantic reels
And shafts and bands. And slowly, as one feels
A nightmare fear, my shrinking eyes were led Past this huge terror, to the black bent head
And body of man, who prays to it and kneels.

And yet I knew (as one knows heaven must be),
That somewhere there were stars and birds and trees,
Moonlight and dawn, and fragrance in each breeze,
And circling all the sea's fierce chastity.
I knelt—I too—and prayed in that foul night:
"O God! give back to this blind fool, his sight."

D. M. KIRMODE.

TO A SKYLARK—

SINGING ABOVE BARNHILL POORHOUSE, GLASGOW.

(BY AN INMATE.)

What blast of Fate, melodious mocker, say,
Has blown thee here—in airy spendthrift glee,
Wasting thy wealth of liquid ecstasy
On hearts too cold to kindle at thy lay?
Thou sing'st of Hope above Hope's grave. Away!
Flee this dark "Hall of Ebbs" through whose aisles
Frail phantoms totter, or, with senile smiles,
Rake the spent ashes of dead yesterday!

Flung from Life's boiling tumult, bruised and sore;
Sick with the shame of what I have become,
My wistful gaze follows thy flight afar.
As some late reveller, when the rout is o'er,
Pauses in his uncertain steps for home,
With blear'd eyes blinking at the morning star.

ROGER QUIN.

Of the many other good sonnets that have been received we print the following:

THE STUDY OF POETRY

Like that fair statue, kissed to life of old;
At love's first touch transformed to human grace,
So now to day stands one with pure pale face
'Midst all the clanging din, the greed for gold.
And the crowds, glancing, find her beauty cold.
Yet, as they hurry to the market-place,
The vision haunts them—brings back for a space
Old dreams which now—lost—shattered—they behold.
Only a few perhaps shall pause and stay;
But they, returning, linger day by day;
Hearts that with passionate love are all a-tune,
For them she flushes to a warm new birth,
And, shedding a rose-glamour o'er the earth,
Dwells ever with them making winter June.

(Annie C. Reay, Langley House, Old Dover Road, Canterbury.)

LOVE.

So fondly do I love thee, dear, so great
And mighty is my love, that if God willed
That every seat but one in Heav'n were filled
And thou and I stood there before the gate
Kneeling with heads bowed low to learn our fate,
And He the King of Kings should bid us choose
The one to enter in, the other lose
For ever midst the turmoil and the hate
Of Hell, his soul then, dear, that seat should be Thine own, and I without one thought of pain
For what I lost through all Eternity
Would never deem my sacrifice in vain
Since it had made thee understand and see How great my love—without one hope of gain
(Ada E. Mann, Lorna Fane, 30, East Parade, Rhyll.)

THREEFOLD MYSTERY.

Into the passionate mystery of thy heart
O Rose immaculate, I peer, and sigh
For who can tell me, Sister, what thou art,
Child of the dread Unknown, whose child am I?
By what perplexed, unhappy ways forlorn
Lost we the white hills of Eternity
What beatific, far, supernal morn
Drenched thy sweet body with auroral dye?
And thou, Consummate Rose of all the year,
Thou, Summer, deathless Queen, who still shalt glow
When o'er my head the guardian grasses blow,
Whisper but one rich word of mystic cheer;
Unveiled but once, O Lady, ere I go
What never mortal man may tell nor hear.
(V. Cameron Turnbull, 110, Guilford Street, W.C.)

SERO TE AMARI.

"Son of man, behold, I take away from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke"—EZEKIEL xxiv. 16.
Too late I knew I loved her, and that she
Was all my eyes desired, and even more.
Things grievous to her heart, that I deplore,
When she was daily by my side to see,
I did and left undone. Had I been kind
I should have mourned her loss, and in a while
Have dried mine eyes, to do so with a smile
Without remorse in every glance behind.
But taken from me by a sudden stroke—
Too late! Too late! became my bitter cry
As all that might have been within me woke
To wring my heart strings; till the day I die
This thought must be the burden of my lot:
I might have made her happy and—did not.
(Thomas Lanfear, 19, Weighton Road, S.E.)

As when one wanders in some hallowed scene,
 Afraid to break the silent sanctity
 With spoken word, lest there perchance should be Raised up discordant echoes where had been Sweet whispering silence: so have I well seen
 That it were vain to break the melody
 Of our glad friendship, which has meant to me
 Far more perhaps than you would have it mean.

And I have kept sweet silence, well content
 To love in secret under friendship's guise;
 To loiter in the presence of your eyes,
 And do your bidding—that were sacrament
 Too precious to endanger with a word
 Which I might wish unsaid, and you—unheard.

(L. Boothroya, Holmleigh, Batley.)

FOR A PRESENT OF FLOWERS.

For all these flowers so fresh and country sweet,
 Accept the thanks of one who may not know
 Just how the roses round your cottage grow,
 Just how your fields are bright with marguerite.
 Thanks once again! And now let me entreat
 Next time you send but one, one that will show
 In its own bloom a garden all ablow,
 And raise my spirits from the eternal street.
 Yes, come yourself, and bring not only all
 The glow and freshness of a countryside;
 For being lovely thou wilt bring to me,
 Chained to a weary oar unmusical,
 A breath of all romance: of Greece defied
 And lovers' deeds in days of chivalry.

(George A. C. Mackinlay, 9, Burnbank Gardens, Glasgow.)

A PAGAN'S TESTAMENT.

When these tired eyes are closed in that long sleep
 Which is the deepest and the last of all,
 Shroud not my limbs with purple funeral pall,
 Nor mock my rest with vainest prayers, nor weep.
 But take my ashes where the sunshine plays
 In dewy meadows splashed with gold and white,
 And there, when stars peep from black pools at night,
 Let the wind scatter them. And on the days
 You wander by those meadow pools again,
 Think of me as I then shall be, a part
 Of earth—naught else. And if you see the red
 Of western skies, or feel the clean soft rain,
 Or smell the flowers I loved, then let your heart
 Beat fast for me, and I shall not be dead.

(Thomas Moulton, 23, Salisbury Drive, Sedgley Park, Prestwich, near Manchester.)

EVENING.

(WHITEGATE, CO. CORK, OCTOBER, 1911.)

Still they toil on, fulfilling the day's work,
 The ploughman and his tired horses, twain,
 While, circling round, the clam'rous seamews lurk,
 Or search fresh furrowed earth in greed of gain—
 High on the hill the horses rest at last,
 And silhouetted 'gainst the evening sky
 I see their heads bent low, with mien downcast
 Their weary master, silent, standing by.
 Afar the distant waters, burnished gold
 Gleam in the radiance of the setting sun—
 The autumn-tinted vale grows grey and cold,
 The toiler's work is o'er, the day is done.
 The seamews one by one are taking flight,
 I, too, turn home as evening fades to night.

(Hilda Mary Dowden, Rockdale, Orwell Road, Rathgar, Dublin.)

We also specially commend the sonnets (many of which are equal in merit to these eight we have found room to print) sent in by Margaret Critchley (Batley), Florence Bagster (Kendal), J. Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke), Miss K. Royds (West Hampstead), W. D. Cocker (Glasgow), Ethel M. Cooke (Norwich), Vivien Ford (Clifton), Marion Burd (Llanfair), Lilian Hyde (Wem), Mrs. H. H. Penrose (Frimley Green), Hester Marshall (London, S.W.), A. Ernest Smith (Leytonstone), W. G. Priest (Norwich), Mrs. Agnes E. M. Baker (West Hampstead), Mrs. Doris Dean (Bromley), Helen A. Cole (Newtownards), Horace M. Walker (Beeston), C. L. Alexander (Harrogate), Mrs. Mackintosh Jowitt (Boscombe), Miss F. Parr (Clifton), Frank Fielding (Blackley), Annie Haupton (St. Helens), D. E. Grant (Smethwick), P. H. Morton (Chingford), M. A. Mügge (Waltham Cross), M. A. P. Price (Aston), Julia M. C. Waltenberg (Leeds), Margaret Dickin (Wrexham), Miss C. M. Walkerdine (Birmingham), Violet D. Dean (Bromley), Kate Lee (Harrow), Mrs. Fortescue (Worcester), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), J. Francis Clifton (West Streatham), H. Douglas Hamilton (Bristol), F. E. Briggs (Crown Hill), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Ellen Beatrice Watts (Penistone), E. N. Overell (Maidenhead), Edmund Howard (Putney), Edwin Waters (Denmark Hill), Olive Turpin (Southport), Herbert Hodder (Kingston-on-Thames), B. G. Brooks (Wood Green), Edith M. Glaister (Waterford), E. W. Higgs (Clapton), Miss E. Moore (Liverpool), Jean M. G. Alexander (Regent's Park), Kitty Lilian Lyon (Wimbledon), Ernest A. Kerstein (Thornton Heath), "Mayfly" (Yorkshire), Joseph Barrow (Morpeth), Ernest Challenger (Nottingham), Mrs. C. B. Irene Bell (London, W.C.), Ellen J. Clutterbuck (Bromley), Janet Macaulay (Rugby), Theodore Maynard (London, W.), Rev. Archibald J. Ashley (Cannock), Mark Anderson (Menstrie), Annie G. Patrick (Birmingham), Mrs. A. R. Keighley (New Brighton), Miss W. D. (Manchester), Kenneth Greenwood (Leeds), James Thompson (Aberdeen), Rosa Waugh (Penarth), E. M. Dale (Crouch Hill), Eva Ridley (Hove), Tom Sefton (Bolton), W. Gregory Harris (Taunton), L. M. Burland (Harlesden), Marie R. Brown (Glasgow), S. A. Doody (Boscombe), A. V. Waller (Sunderland), Wilfred Morris (Bodmin), Edith M. Glaister (Waterford), C. M. J. Jones (York), Maude Collett (Cheltenham), G. Heathcote (Orlestone), Doris M. Tuthill (Oldham), A. J. Parkes (Hull), A. G. McDougall (London, S.W.), H. Elrington (Monkstown), G. Pickering (Hull), Margaret Clive Hildyard (St. John's Wood), John I. Ieckie (Spennymoor), Miss D. Macaulay (Manchester), Rev. E. C. Lansdown (South Woodford), Mabel A. Molyneux (St. Albans), John W. Shanks (Aberdeen), Miss C. Sharp (Tunbridge Wells), A. Elliott (Willington), Gladys Evelyn Warren (St. John's Wood), Kate Bedford (Brighouse), Mona Garrod Turner (Southwold), W. Tempest (Haswell), Evelyn Emily Ife (Plumstead Common), Mrs. H. Sharland (Bristol), Maud M. Stawell (Shrewsbury), B. R. M. Hetherington (Carlisle), Miss D. M. E. Gardom (Redhill), John F. Dyson (Redcar), J. W. James (Cardigan), Berwick Sayers (Croydon), Mildred Emerson (Barnard Castle), Frederic Hudd (Bromley), A. W. Robertson (Newcastle), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood), Mary E. Pearce (Cheltenham), Thomas Hutchinson (Morpeth), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Margaret McIntyre (Ealing), E. W. Higgs (Clapton), Lettie Cole (Pontillas), Margaret F. Barron (S. Tottenham), Albert Fuller (Cardiff), Max Plowman (Enfield), Miss E. M. Adams (Salop), Emily Kingston (Blairgowrie), M. J. Porcher (Oxford), C. Eric Staddon (Luton), Margaret Latham (Reigate), J. A. S. Wilson (Edinburgh), Mary G. Gillespie (Denny), Jean Wilson (Chippenham), Frederic Lois (Plaistow), A. G. McDougall (London, S.W.), L. Golding (Manchester), James Mitchell (Edinburgh), Wilfrid G. Axton (Woodchurch), Richard P. McCoy (Gillingham), Ralph Gardner (Harlesden), Harold Howe (Leeds), Beatrice Fielden (London, W.), Kate Hickson (Leicester), Ernest A. Carr (Tonbridge), Stevens (Benyon), A. J. Thompson (Worthing), M. A. Newman (Badingham), Daisy Melling (Wigan), Norman Boothroyd (Batley), Herbert G. Cooper (Glasgow), A. E. Tomlinson (Middlesbrough), H. R. King (Streatham), S. H. Skaife (Forest Gate), Albert Morrison (Glasgow), J. Matthews (Guernsey), Edyth S. Beves, Whiteley Lumb (Halifax), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), A. J. Dick (High Wycombe), Winifred Goodwin (Clapham), H. Faure (London, N.W.), Mrs. E. H. Marshall (Merton Park), Helga L. S. Ferguson (Usk), Leonard B. Wood (Bowdon), Charles G. Graves (Leamington), Robert White (Edinburgh), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Edward Bradburn (Manchester), Violet Gillespie (Forest Hill), A. E. Turner (West Kensington), H. M. Cresswell

Payne (St. Austell), Ethel Margaret Odell (Forest Gate), Vernon H. Porter (Clapton), J. Evelyn Ball (Ferndown), Gertrude Pitt (Hampstead), J. Drummond R. Monfries (Helensburgh), Lawrence Tarr (East Ham), Norman Davidge Gullick (Chulmleigh), G. R. Harvey (Aberdeen), Miss A. Eleanor Pinnington (Brighton), Julia Wallenberg (Leeds), Miss A. K. Barlow (Blackheath), Eric Taylor Cook (Camden Road, N.W.)

II.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Mr. ERNEST A. CARR, of 12, Park Crescent, Tonbridge, for the following:

THE FAMILY LIVING. BY E. H. LACON WATSON. (John Murray.)

"If two are in the churchyard laid,
Then ye are only five."
WORDSWORTH, We are Seven.

We also print:

THE HERALDS OF THE DAWN.
BY WILLIAM WATSON. (John Lane.)

"You have waked me too soon, I must slumber again."
ISAAC WATTS, The Sluggard.

(J. Richard Ellaway, Lynmoor, Queen's Road, Basingstoke.)

THE COST OF IT. BY ELEANOR MORDAUNT. (Heinemann & Co.)

"The fly that sips treacle is lost in the sweets."
GAY, The Beggar's Opera.

(Mrs. A. Morton Smith, Chin-wangtao, N. China.)

BLINDS DOWN. BY H. A. VACHELL.
(Smith, Elder.)

"I was about to notice, had you not prevented me."
BROWNING, King Victor and King Charles.

(Juliette Samson, Floretta, 108, Sutherland Avenue, Maida Vale, W.)

NO NAME. BY WILKIE COLLINS.

"He answered to 'Hi!' or any loud cry."
LAWIS CARROLL, The Hunting of the Snark.

(Isabel Butchart, Elliscales, Dalton-in-Furness.)

THE DEPARTMENT STORE. BY MARGARETE BOEME.
(Appleton.)

"One mission theirs—to find the stuff;
And all's not much, nor much enough."
ANONYMOUS, The Setting Sun.

(George Stanton, 47, Kirkdale Road, South Wigston, Leicester.)

BETWEEN TWO STOOLS. BY RHODA BROUGHTON.
(Stanley Paul.)

"The one is a Scotchman, the other a Jew."
GOLDSMITH, The Hunch of Venison.

(Margaret C. Hildyard, 8, Queen's Road, St. John's Wood, N.W.)

III.—Easily first in favour with our caricaturists is G. K. Chesterton; next him in order of popularity come G. Bernard Shaw, J. M. Barrie, Arnold Bennett, Rudyard Kipling, A. E. W. Mason, and William de Morgan. We award the PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS to Mr. S. COHEN, of The University, Leeds, for his caricature of Mr. Chesterton, which we reproduce on this page. The best of the other caricatures received are those by A. Cameron Shore (Croydon), May Hughes (Banbury), Henry G. Dowling (Portsmouth), Geraldine Payne Galloway (Thirsk), Tom Sefton (Bolton), A. Bird (Tooting), Albert E. Barnes (Beaconsfield), G. Major (Cardiff), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), E. W. Higgs (Clapton), H.

G. K. Chesterton.

A caricature drawn by S. Cohen.

Kelly (Barrow-in-Furness), Miss Van der Pant (Ashford).

IV.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Miss Irene Pollock Lalonde, of 14, Forester Road, Bath, for the following:

THE NIGHT LAND. BY W. HOPE HODGSON.
(Eveleigh Nash.)

In these days of so much hastily written literature and of so many questionable novels, this tale is as a pearl of great price. It has been written carefully, but lovingly, and it should be read, not by those in search of an hour's distraction, but by those who are willing to pause often, to think, to marvel and to admire. Sometimes we are reminded of Kipling, and yet often the style more strongly resembles Maurice Hewlett's. In a language surely of his own invention, Mr. Hodgson gives us the most touching, exquisite spirit romance that has ever been written.

Among the best of the other reviews sent in are:

CARNIVAL. BY COMPTON MACKENZIE. (Martin Secker.)

To review "Carnival" in a few words is as impossible as to confine the sea within the limits of a pool. There is a largeness of scope, a superabundance of detail, a vitality, a richness of vocabulary and phraseology in this story of a London ballet-dancer's life, that defies condensation. The reader follows with unflagging sympathy and interest Jenny's chequered career, from her inauspicious birth in Hagworth Street, Islington, through the vicissitudes of her professional and family life, her love affairs, friendships, and marriage, to her premature death in Cornwall. The whole is a wonderful kaleidoscope of ever-shifting pictures.

(Kate Lee, 52, Butler Road, Harrow.)

THE JUSTICE OF THE DUKE. BY RAFAEL SABATINI.
(Stanley Paul & Co.).

No one is more conversant with the life of Cæsar Borgia than Mr. Rafael Sabatini. Cæsar Borgia was full of contradictions—ruthless and merciful—swift in action but full of philosophy—cunning in statecraft, yet entirely unconventional in military matters. The various incidents in his life are portrayed with sharpness and accuracy, and the novel is not only thrilling reading but of real historical value. Every chapter has its dramatic incident, but the best of all is the scene where Cæsar wins the love of Guido's daughter, extracts from her her own plans, and then casts her aside.

(D. E. Grant, "Lynton," Lightwoods Hill, Smethwick, Staffs.)

BLINDS DOWN. BY H. A. VACHELL. (Smith, Elder.)

"Blinds Down" is typical of the attitude that many of us voluntarily maintain towards the seamy side of life, ignoring the fact that to close one's eyes to conditions is not to nullify those conditions, and also that the voluntary withdrawal of oneself from any section of life is to stultify and weaken the individual. The tragedy contained in the above story runs the lives and wrecks the happiness of the innocent, as well as of the guilty, and the writer shows in a forcible fashion how irreparable is the harm wrought by so unnatural a mode of existence!

(Miss J. A. Jenkins, Edge Hill College, Liverpool.)

THE ADVENTURES OF MISS GREGORY. BY PERCEVAL
GIBBON (Dent.)

Mr. Gibbon has enriched fiction with a great character in Miss Gregory. Few heroines of fifty have power to charm the blasé reader of to-day, but this remarkable woman does from first to last. She is a modern Betsy Trotwood, with a taste for exploring out-of-the-way corners of the earth—such as West Africa and Russia. The descriptions of foreign life and manners are perfect, and such as we would expect from one who has been a war correspondent. The book is real literature, and full of interest.

(James A. Richards, 10, Park Road, Tenby, S. Wales.)

JOHN CHRISTOPHER. Translated by GILBERT CANNAN, from the French of ROMAIN ROLLAND. (Heinemann.)

It is morbid, unpleasant, almost dull, yet so clever that it compels one to go on reading it. But as one follows the hero through his hard-fought musical career, and many love affairs, despising his unlovable faults, yet admiring much in a character where the artistic temperament beats its wings against solid German fortitude, one sickens of the unveiled detail, the picture becomes ugly, repellent, although still uncomfortably fascinating, one longs for a smothering dab of sunshine splashed in by an impressionist! The translation should attract attention, so admirably has Mr. Cannan preserved the intensely French spirit of the original.

(Gladys Evelyn Warren, 65, Springfield Road, St. John's Wood, N.W.)

We also highly commend the reviews received from Mary Kingdon (Harlow), Margery Wilkins (Uttoxeter), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), Leo Delicati (Bristol), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), Miss Van der Pant (Ashford), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Margy Colman, Alexander McGill (Glasgow), Marie R. Brown (Glasgow), Miss L. Mugford (Sutton-at-Hone), Geraldine Payne Gallwey (Thirsk), Daisy Melling (Wigan), Hester Marshall (London, S.W.), Ernest E. Reynolds (Clapham Common), Annie G. Patrick (Birmingham), Doris Hudson (Hull), X.Y.Z. (Cambridge), W. M. Lodge (Norwood), A. H. Mannington Sayers (Sheffield), M. A. McDermott (Abingdon), Evelyn M. Abbott (Old Malton), Horace W. Walker (Beeston), George Stanton (Leicester), Flora Thompson (Bournemouth), E. V. Overell (Maidenhead), M. A. Newman (Badingham), Frances D. Watson (Heaton Moor), Miss Chamberlain (Llandudno), Norah Strahan (Earl's Court).

THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to the Rev. J. A. S. WILSON, care of Mr. HARDY, 41, Sutton Place, Edinburgh.

J. J. ROUSSEAU.

(1712-1778.)

By THOMAS SECCOMBE.

EVERY year has its own importance in modifying the current of human lives and human destinies; but some years surpass others in conspicuity, notably, it seems to us, the year twelve. In 1612 we lost a popular prince and heir to the throne, whose survival would probably have given our island history a wholly different bent. In the autumn of 1812 began the Moscow campaign. The end of June, 1712, witnessed the birth of J. J. Rousseau. There may be writers in the modern world whose books have had, or are destined to have, more influence than those of Rousseau. Those of Tolstoi, for instance, may come in time to influence more people. Napoleon regarded Rousseau as the most indispensable link in the chain of happenings that led to the Revolution. There are mediæval historians who trace everything in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries to the influence of the Crusades. So in the nineteenth century there are evolutionists who see Rousseau behind every bush, colouring every cloud, precipitating every insurrection. Without going so far as this, it seems to be well within the mark to say that among the book-motors of modern times those known as "La Nouvelle Héloïse," "L'Émile," and "Le Contrat Social," have proved three of the most potent.

In the great century of the Middle Ages (the thirteenth), and again in parts of the seventeenth and eighteenth, France undoubtedly took the lead in human affairs. Its leadership in the thought and letters of the later period was due almost exclusively to two men, neither of them of very exceptional knowledge or powers of thought, but both of them very exceptional writers. They raised the level of literature to a higher power among the arts than it had ever occupied before. Hence their pre-eminent interest to all bookmen.

Of these two men, Voltaire and Rousseau, the second was only half a Frenchman. Five generations of Rousseaus had lived as French settlers by Lake Lemán, and there Jean Jacques was born, on June 28th, 1712. His Genevose origin showed itself in his speech and his style, in his Republicanism, in his substratum of religion, originally Protestant, and in his dislike of the grandeur of great states. Voltaire, in one of his English letters, said that Geneva was a frog which puffed itself out to look like an ox. "Elle est le Gilles d'Angleterre." English influence profoundly affected Rousseau's literature, but it had no very immediate effect upon his life. He was born, he tells us, "infirm et malade. Je coûtai la vie à ma mère, et ma naissance fut le premier de mes malheurs." His father was one of those illusive and unstable sentimentalists which the pen of a Meredith would be required adequately to depict. A long family accumulation of credit for industry, integrity and solvency was by him apparently dissipated. This best of fathers, as he is described, had the dislike of encumbrance peculiar to men of his type, and practically deserted his son, who was apprenticed by an uncle to a brutally coarse and direct engraver in Geneva. Fear of punishment led him to abscond from his native city at fifteen, after which for several years he led a half-roguish, half-innocent rambling existence of the Gil Blas variety.

Jean Jacques Rousseau.

After the painting by Ramsay.

He was a lackey for a time, and his chief commercial asset seems to have been his conversion to Catholicism. It was this which, in 1728, procured his first introduction to the household of that extraordinary fellow-convert, whose influence proved one of the paramount circumstances of his life. Françoise-Louise de la Tour, born at Vevey, in March, 1699, became, in 1713, Madame de Warens. Thirteen years later she abandoned her husband (who was in difficulties) and her religion (which did not pay), and became a kind of paid information agent to the king of Savoy. She was a thoroughly modern woman—clever, charming, adaptable, unprincipled. She looked upon chastity as an old-fashioned prejudice, modesty as a mere maxim of social police, discretion as the rain-proof necessary to avert the scoffs of the vulgar. She was prepared to make the gift of herself as tranquilly and serenely as a kind woman does of her labour when she bustles about to get a tired man a cup of tea. Why, indeed, refuse one's friends a favour which had in her eyes no real importance whatever, except in so far as it might enhance their attachment. All those who pleased her and served her were privileged, her chief favours being shared between Rousseau, who served as her secretary, and Anet, a botanizing gardener and factotum. The intimacy between "Mamma," as she was called, and "Petit" (Rousseau) lasted intermittently until 1741. Yet his sojourn at Les Charmettes—which must ever be approached by the man of feeling as a shrine of reverential pilgrimage—was broken pretty frequently by Bohemian wanderings afoot; and no one has ever thrown over the aimless road-faring of adolescence and inexperience a more seductive and idyllic charm.

After a painting by Latour

Rousseau.

The house at Geneva in which Rousseau was born (1712).

The confessions which enshrine this part of the story are composed of two elements. The first is the syrupy, but poisonous, cup which idealizes the romance of Rousseau and his "Maman." It is all seen through a magic glass which falsifies everything, and is the work essentially of an erotomaniac, shy, morbid and perverse. The other contains wine of an honourable vintage, and illustrates a most important truth—the necessity for a healthy man to renew periodically the material (and animal) side of his nature. This has been adopted almost universally as part of the holiday philosophy of the brain-workers of our own time. Hitherto Rousseau had been an optimist; he still saw things in a haze of tender blue, and in spite of his vagabondage knew very little about human nature. His books were generated largely by the sharp contrast between this imaginary world, the beauty and harmony of which was greatly increased by a very gradual process of reminiscence, and the crowded world of real men into which he was gradually introduced after the transference of his head-quarters from Chambéry to Paris. The first part of his life is bathed in an atmosphere of idyllic vision, the second is submerged in an increasingly dense and atrabilious fog. The works which made him famous are produced by the interaction of the two points of view. Most of his ideas are implicit in his first discourse upon the inequality of men: Man is naturally good, men in the mass irremediably bad. The raw material is sound, the finished product rotten. The idea is largely the old theological one of a primitive Paradise from which man has fallen in the process of becoming social; an idea based partly on reason and partly on sentiment. The sentiment common to all is inherent in the remembrance of a happy, thoughtless and innocent childhood, irrespective of the reflection that a happy infancy is one of the greatest benefits of society, the dearly-bought result of centuries of social action which have secured a measure of security for the weak and defenceless. The rational element is the outcome of the perennial unrest of man. Ignoring the horrors of a perpetual immobility, we are all apt to feel that the misfortunes of man have been largely brought about by his inveterate craving for change.

We rashly infer that the best course for each of us would have been to remain as far as possible as we were, and that it is the mad desire for progress which has been at the root of half humanity's sufferings. This is the fundamental idea of Rousseau—a romantic hypothesis in flat contradiction to the whole teaching of history, for it is based upon the untenable supposition that man is everywhere born free. But the story of man's early innocence and contentment is as unsubstantial as a fairy tale. All that we can learn by observation of ants is that they live invariably in ant hills; of bees, that they live in hives; and of men, that they live and must always live in society. Man lives in a gregarious state as naturally as a fish lives in water, and if it is true that God made the country and man made the town, it is equally true that God made the cavern and man made the home.

Madame de Warens.

book against the human race. I begin to long to walk upon all fours." The essay, despite its philosophic form, is the first of the Rousseau romances, all his books were really romances, and in verve, originality and creative, imaginative quality many consider it the freshest and the sincerest, if not the most eloquent.

The story of the inception of his prize essay of 1749 is told with as much circumstance as if it were the dawn of some new gospel to mankind. Its success made Rousseau the reigning lion in the brilliantly artificial Parisian society of that day. People became wildly curious to see this strange being who wrote with such eloquence and daring originality, who sought no one, and who begged only to be allowed to live his own life with the boarding-house servant who had supplanted "Manman" in his affections. Women tried the most daring ruses to get him to dinner. He tried to offend

The house of Madame de Warens, near Chambéry.

Les Charmettes.

Rousseau's house in the Rue Platrière, Paris.

them by adopting the most boorish behaviour. But this only added to their delight. His social success was intensified by the success of his opera, "Le Devin du Village," and the manie for Rousseau was stimulated to an enormous extent by the appearance of his one ostensible romance, "La Nouvelle Héloïse," the mid-summer night's dream of a poor précepteur—a worthy successor of "Pamela" and pioneer of "Le Disciple." In the romance of "Julie" we are taught the folly of resisting Nature in affairs of the heart. In "Émile" Rousseau seeks to reduce the science of rearing offspring into harmony with the promptings of a like spontaneous instinct.

Rousseau frequenting the salons of the grandes dames, Rousseau composing operas, Rousseau the hermit, Rousseau in England, Rousseau, first the acolyte and then the abomination of the philosophers, becomes more and more an impossible knot to unravel. The complexity of his life reminds us how impossible it is to summarize even an outline into a small compass. Two momentary glimpses must suffice. In 1756 he revisited Chambéry in company with his mistress-wife Thérèse. Poor Mamma! His heart was broken at the sight of her. The only bit of jewellery that was left to her—a little ring—she took from her finger and put on that of Thérèse, who at once returned it, kissing the noble hand and watering it with her tears. "Ah, that was the moment for me to liquidate the debt I owed her. I ought to have left all to follow her, to share her fate, whatsoever it might be. Alas, I did nothing. . . . I sighed, lamented, but did not follow her. Of all the remorse. . . ." Eight years later Mamma died in a hovel. Thérèse, the coarse, the unfaithful, the evil genius of Rousseau's last years, survived until 1801. The philosopher remained poor, a music-copier, and yet a dependent until the end. In 1778 he moved eleven miles from Paris—to Ermenonville. There he died mysteriously on July 2nd in that same year. His ashes were moved to the Pantheon in 1791, to be scattered later, like those of Wyclif, to all quarters of the earth.

We must now turn to the most controversial, if not the most seminal, of all Rousseau's mental issue. The "Contrat Social" is Rousseau's Protestant book; it agrees badly and imperfectly with the rhythm of his other works. Emancipation from the chains of society is his great principle. But there is no such cure for civilization here. Far from enfranchising man from the yoke of social invention, he renders his servitude closer and harder to bear. He had Protestant Geneva and its Spartan ordinances in mind throughout; and yet it was in France, and not in Geneva, that the "Contrat Social"—in some respects the most important of his works—attained its full extent of power and influence. In the next generation it became the Pentateuch of the Constituents and the Koran of the Jacobins. Visionary as it is, the antithesis of the English ideal of liberty, slowly broadening down from precedent to precedent, and obnoxious in every way to the Burkean conception of historical continuity, the "Contrat" is rightly described as one of the most curious and interesting books in existence. Historically an anacoluthon, logically full of gaping flaws, its eloquence and cogency still challenge and even convince.

The house at Ermenonville in which Rousseau died.

Originally born free, men have been reduced to slavery—everywhere. The remedy was not, as might be deduced from his other books, in a patriarchal form of Government, but in a sovereign democracy. To rescue themselves from the ills of wealth and culture men must form themselves into one sovereign people. The people cannot discard their sovereignty. They cannot delegate it to representatives—as the English do. In England the only time of freedom is when—if we suppose universal suffrage—the people are in the elective crisis and are doing their one sovereign act.

In order to escape the bondage to Nature men may mortgage some of their natural rights and accept partial bondage to society, in which each will is free only in so far as it is a part of the general will, influencing all, and being influenced by all. This will in any particular case is found in the will of the majority. Of course this social freedom, according to Rousseau, is not an equivalent for natural freedom, which should be preserved wherever it is possible; but it is the next best thing. Only care must be taken that it does not, as at present, degenerate into tyranny on the one hand and slavery on the other. Though the authority of the sovereign is absolute, inalienable, indivisible, and the source of all laws, yet, since the execution of the laws must be entrusted by law to a part of the sovereign, there is always danger that this part, though possessing no independent authority, will either use the laws for its own benefit or act contrary to the laws, and thus enslave the other part. When this happens the Social Contract is broken, and the parties to it return to the State of Nature, free from all authority, but free at the same time to make a fresh contract.

There is little in Rousseau's "Social Contract" that is absolutely new. He borrowed from Hobbes the true conception of authority, and from Locke the true conception of the ultimate seat and original of authority, and of the two together he made the great image of the sovereign people. Strike the crowned head from that monstrous figure, which is the frontispiece of the "Leviathan," and you have a frontispiece that will serve excellently for the "Social Contract." The idea of the natural pact is borrowed from Spinoza; the idea of the inalienability of popular rights from the Protestant philosopher Althusen's "Politica"; the notion of fraternity from Languet, and that of citizenship again from Spinoza. It is not what Rousseau said that is original, but his way of saying it. The others had accumulated a heap of dry faggots. It was Rousseau that set fire to them and made them dangerous. His analysis is by no means perspicuous. The state of nature and natural rights were unhistorical and preposterous conceptions. He was quite unable to distinguish intelligibly between the general will and the common will. Just as Hobbes tended to confuse personal with juristic sovereignty, so Rousseau tended to confound supreme coercive force with la volonté générale, which is something quite different from it. He tries in vain to reduce a moral ideal to the limits of a legal formula. He dangles before our eyes the picture of a perfect people, freely determined to action by an enlightened reason. When we look closer we see nothing but the grinding tyranny of a many-headed monster. The value of an ideal consists in the possibility of approximating to it. Burke's ideal of a "rational freedom" is better than Rousseau's because it lies within the scope of human endeavour, and is congruous with the constitution of human nature. Rousseau did not take notice of human nature except to condemn it; yet he dreamed of puddling this vile material into the image of a Holy Commonwealth. The Lycurgus necessary to mould the plastic puppet man into the form of such a commonwealth was to be found eventually only in the extremely dubious form of Napoleon, a native of that little island state which Rousseau predicted was one day to astonish the world.

A few words remain to be said about his style, character and influence. His pretensions in the matter of style were not excessive; he admitted freely that it didn't matter to him whether a sentence was good French or sound idiom. The object of writing, as of speaking, was to be understood, and the writer who was intelligible had gained his end. If, in addition, he were lucid, so much the better. "Be clear, therefore, and make everyone who knows French understand you. That is the rule, and if in the process you should commit a hundred barbarisms, no matter; you have written well. I go further and maintain," he adds, "that sometimes you will need to commit a few grammatical mistakes in order to be better understood. To be perspicuous and not either a pedant or a purist, that is your true object!" Despite this candour, which pervaded everything that he wrote, Rousseau is still regarded as one of the great masters of French style. He is not a martinet, either in order or arrangement, but as a master of the flowing and oratorical style he has had few rivals or none. There is an innate harmony between the flow of his rhythm and the development of his ideas—development of his ideas, there is the secret. Few, indeed, have approached him in this mysterious power of wringing the last ounce of meaning out of a philosophical hypothesis. His rose-tinted clouds are perfect, and nothing in prose poetry could very well surpass the exquisite beauty of the sentimental reveries with which he concludes the last of his romances—those imaginative "Confessions."

Rousseau.

From the bust by Houde

"How strange that a man of such exquisite notions Should have sent his poor brats to the Foundling, my dear."

So wrote Tom Moore, who satirised better than he sang. The case of Rousseau is somewhat on a par with that of poor Yorick and other notorious prose poets and sentimentalists who botanised upon their mother's graves. Rousseau was a sentimentalist in excelsis, and his character, though ably defended, can never be satisfactorily cleared of cruel inconsistencies. The best extenuation, after all, is that his mental and physical abnormalities rendered him to some extent, at any rate, morally irresponsible. The fascination of his manner and the seduction of his style rendered his influence dangerously irresistible. The ideal portraiture of his Savoyard vicar made his influence upon religion hardly less potent and pervasive than his philosophic example, of which we have already spoken. In art, and especially in literature, his influence has been almost illimitable. He is the master painter of the picturesque, the Corot of rural sentiment. Of the taste for nature and simple life he is likewise the Arch-evangel. His followers and disciples in French literature alone are legion.

Among French writers alone his influence may be discerned in Bernandi de Saint-Pierre, Mme. de Staël, Lamartine, Chateaubriand, Montalembert, Saintine, De Maistre, Michelet, De Musset, George Sand, Souvestre, De Sénancour, Renan, Bourget, Pouvillon, Coppée, Amiel, Loti. Goethe in his sentimental and Wertherian period was simply steeped in Rousseau, and the same applies to Schiller, Kotzebue, the early German novelists and particularly to Heyse. In England we begin to see the effect of Rousseau very clearly in Cowper, then in Shelley and Keats, Leigh Hunt, Tennyson, Swinburne, Morris, Longfellow and Emerson. Wordsworth is saturated in Rousseau's nature philosophy and reproduces many of his master's errors about the heaven of infancy and the natural state of innocent man. Tolstoi is deeply immersed. He proceeds, it is true, from a mere historical starting point. Man as an agriculturist is his natural man. And he reaches a different goal, the subversion of organised violence which man is deluded into regarding as a safety guard. But for much of the route he follows Rousseau unreservedly. And Rousseau intrudes into modern politics almost hourly. A few days ago a fierce attack was made on him in the French Chamber by an academician, Maurice Barrès, and Rousseau was vehemently defended by a minister from the instant charge of political incendiarism. Only yesterday as I was returning home I heard a lady socialist appeal to her audience with the well-worn maxim: "Man is born free and yet everywhere we see him in chains."

New Books.

STEVENSON.*

The third five-volume instalment of the Swanston edition of Stevenson's works is now in the hands of the subscribers, and includes three of his most characteristic novels, the whole of his poems with seventeen additional pieces not in most editions, and all the plays, written in collaboration with W. E. Henley.

"Deacon Brodie," "Admiral Guinea," "Beau Austin," and "Macaire" have never been successful either from the box-office point of view or in the estimate of the dramatic critics, and the passage of time, which, sooner with prose drama than with any other kind of literature, makes the fashion of the work antique or obsolete, renders it more unlikely, every year, that any of the plays in question can be revived with even moderate popular success. The technique of the dramatist since these plays were written has been altered all in the direction of realism; soliloquies and asides are now supposed to be intolerable, though it only wants a dramatist of genius to restore those old conventions to the importance and acceptance which they once enjoyed; but not by reason of this is the actor-manager indifferent to the plays of Stevenson and Henley. There are purely personal considerations why he will always choose another "Macaire" than this—considerations of vanity and diplomacy; but beyond that, he discerns certain elemental qualities in the plays which in any age would militate against their acceptance on the stage however they may charm in private reading.

With Stevenson, however it may have been with Henley, the mood in which the work was done was inimical to dramatic success. Plays, no more than poems, should be written in fun, as a pleasant literary sport for the leisure hours of gentlemen with the more serious affairs of life for the moment in suspense, and there is every evidence that it was in the same gay irresponsible spirit in which he made Davos Platz wood-cuts that Stevenson gambolled with Thalia. That merry and illuminating essay entitled "A Penny Play, Twopence coloured," gives the clue to Stevenson's attitude to the drama; he was the child of Skelt, and his notion of a play, to the end, appears to have been "Three-fingered Jack," or "Jack Sheppard," touched up with genuine literary style, the characters robust, and coloured with crimson lake, the speeches orotund and rhetorical, the period thrown far enough back to obviate any chance of the audience finding out that action and speech were of no real age or clime but simply Skeltary. The plays, in short, were written with the tongue in the cheek, and no mixed audience will stand that. As literary excursions they may be read repeatedly with pleasure; particularly for their banter, but it is to the sophisticated they appeal; on the stage the brilliance of their writing fails to make up for their inability to rouse emotion. It was the verdict of a quarter of a century ago; it is the verdict of to-day, when the plays are sometimes presented by a repertory company.

* "Catriona," "The Master of Ballantrae," "The Wrecker," "A Child's Garden of Verses," etc., "Deacon Brodie," etc. Vols. XI. to XV. 6s. net each. The Swanston Edition of the Works of R. L. Stevenson. (Chatto & Windus.)

Henley unquestionably provided most of the staying power for both collaborators; he was hopeful that there might be money in them long after Stevenson had come to look on them with indifference or disdain. Of "Deacon Brodie," when produced in 1884, Stevenson wrote that it was "d——d bad." In the following year he wrote significantly to Henley: "Do you think you are right to send 'Macaire,' and 'The Admiral,' about? Not a copy have I sent, nor, (speaking for myself, personally,) do I want sent. The re-perusal of 'The Admiral,' by the way, was a sore blow; eh, God, man! it's a low, black, dirty, blackguard piece, vomitable in many parts, simply vomitable; Pew is in places a reproach to both art and man. What I mean is that I believe in playing dark with second and third rate work; 'Macaire,' is a piece of job work hurriedly bockled." These were views, by the way, emphatically anticipated by his father; they greatly exaggerated the defects of the plays, but with this reservation, father and son were right.

Yet, oddly enough, the spirit of a paper game, with which Stevenson set about play-writing, only to discover that the grown-up world takes its plays seriously, in no way impairs the effect of "A Child's Garden of Verses," also composed in sportive hours the sportive hours, as it happened, of an author at the time experiencing the mingled joys of hemorrhage, sciatica, and ophthalmia. Though the gentle ironist peeps out sometimes in these nursery recollections, and the deliberate artist always, there is never any mood of insincerity; all is bathed in the spirit of a man in whom the thought of his past years did "breed perpetual benediction," in whom the innocence of any childhood was a thing to reverence, at all events to treat with tenderness. It was by "A Child's Garden of Verses" he made his first impression as a poet, and it will probably be found to maintain his poetical reputation longer than any of its successors, for this particular song-sequence is unique in English verse, and the thing essayed can never conceivably be better done. There is, of course, much in "Underwoods," and "Songs of Travel," that delights maturer moods more lastingly; "Home no Home to me," "In the Highlands, in the country places," "Blows the Wind to-day," "The House Beautiful," and almost all the Scots pieces, strike a note peculiarly Stevensonian and beautiful. In the "Additional Poems," given in Vol. XIV. I miss one anonymously published under Henley's editing, when a prize was offered for the identification of its author:

"We found Him tift as in the Dells of May
The Dreaming Dandel finds the earliest Flower:
Thoughtlets we wandered in the Evening Hour:
Annelids and plectils we went our Random Way
In the foot-haunted City, in the Night,
Among the alternate Lamps we went and came
Till, like a humorous Thunderbolt, that Name,
The hated Name of BRASH, assailed our Sight.
We faw, we paused, we entered, feeling Gm.
His Wrath, like a huge Breaker on the Beach,
Broke militant forth: He on the Counter beat
In his infantile Fury; and his Feet
Danced Impotent Wrath upon the Floor within, Still as we fled we heard his Idiot Screech."

"Catriona," and "The Master of Ballantrae," I referred to in a former notice of the Swanston Edition. "The Wrecker," which, with "The Ebb Tide," brought Stevenson first to the attention of many sadly imperipient readers who had never previously found him up to their standard of sensationalism, was probably the most extensively sold of all his larger books. It was the first novel in which he wrote of characters and conditions of life contemporary with himself, so qualifying what Mr. Lang—of all men!—seems to regard as his one deficiency. No modern novel of adventure has a more auspicious opening; the Prologue breathes a tropical and magic air, but that key is not sustained, and though one reads "The Wrecker," again for the sake of Captain Nares, and Loudon Dodd, and the fascinating Jim Pinkerton, one feels that the story could have been told as well and less amorphously by many other practitioners of the police novel.

NEIL MUNRO.

LAST ESSAYS OF A BOOKMAN.*

Bismarck is reported to have said that in diplomacy it is the business of the diplomatist to be diplomatic. The late Churton Collins acted consistently on the maxim that in criticism it is the business of the critic to be critical, and it would be paying poor respect to his memory to ignore his principle when his own work happens to be concerned.

I am sure, too, that he would have been among the first to raise the voice of protest (I have in fact a suspicion that he did raise it) against the rapidly spreading practice of indiscriminate posthumous publication, which as a rule neither enhances the reputation of the dead writer nor adds anything of substantial value to contemporary literature. With the frankness which he himself would have approved and from the point of view which I believe would have been his own, I therefore venture to question the wisdom of this volume of essays. I can appreciate to the full the personal feelings by which its issue was prompted. But if the actual quality of its contents be alone considered, the judgment must be that it falls short of the high standard the writer himself taught us to expect and demand.

* "The Posthumous Essays of John Churton Collins." Edited by L. C. Collins. 6s. net. (Dent.)

The back Verandah at Vallima.

From The Works of Robert Louis Stevenson, Swanston Edition (Chatto & Windus).

This is perfectly natural, since, as Mr. Collins' prefatory note tells us, most of these essays were delivered by his father in the form of lectures. As lectures they doubtless served their purpose and served it admirably. But the conditions of the popular lecture are, or should be, different from those of the printed essay, and it seldom happens that work prepared expressly for one object stands quite satisfactorily the test of the other. In the popular lecture, for instance, there is ample justification for familiar facts, trite observations, and ephemeral details for which the printed essay affords no proper place. Having regard to their original aims, one does not complain that the lecture on Tennyson in this collection is little more than a string of well-worn commonplaces, that on Johnson a slight biographical sketch filled out with stock anecdotes and quotations, that on the Shakespearean Theatres a mere compilation. We can well understand that these pleasantly written papers must have been full of entertainment and stimulus to those who had the opportunity of listening to them. But as essays in a volume, to be read and pondered over, they are bound to seem thin and disappointing.

While, however, this criticism bears upon the volume as a whole, there are divisions of it in respect of which qualification is called for. Here and there, leaving the beaten highways of literary history, the writer strikes out into by-paths of his own choosing, and when he does so, he rarely fails to find something interesting by the way. By far the most suggestive essays in this book are those which institute comparisons between Browning and three great thinkers of the past—one English, one French, and one German—who are seldom named in connection with him: Butler, Montaigne, and Lessing. In the discussion of the Christianity of Lessing and Browning, in particular, a line of inquiry is opened up which will be new to many readers and must prove attractive to all. I have myself often been impressed by the close parallelism in thought between "The Education of the Human Race," with its logically developed thesis of progressive revelation, and "A Death in the Desert," with its mystical rendering of the same fundamental idea. It is this parallelism which Churton Collins is mainly concerned to draw out. He shows that in meeting the rationalistic attacks, in the one case of Reimarus, in the other of Strauss and his school, these two exponents of a purely spiritual conception of religion took up the same position and adopted the same method of defence; both contending that "the truth of Christianity is independent of its historical proof"; both maintaining that though its dogmatic accretions may pass away, its living power is permanent and universal. He also lays stress upon another important point of resemblance between the German humanist and the English poet. Browning, as we all know, was fond of emphasising the incompleteness of all higher truth. In so doing, he was only re-stating in his own language one of the cardinal principles of Lessing's philosophy. Churton Collins does not undertake to decide whether or not Browning was directly indebted to Lessing, though, always rather prone to discover borrowings, he clearly inclines to the conclusion that he was. But he suggests that in any event, "all which is worth serious consideration in his argument is what he has in common with Lessing."

I may add that some of these essays are incidentally interesting, because they give us glimpses of the personality of the writer and of his ideas about literature and life. I have described the essay on Tennyson as little more than a string of well-worn commonplaces; but an individual note is struck in the sentence in which the critic pauses to give surprisingly high praise, not to the poet's art or style, but to his "political teaching"—"It is," he declares, "as sound sentimentally as it is sound in simple reason." His testimony to the spiritual potency of Browning's work is also memorable: "To how many of us has Browning sent new life-blood pulsing into old truths; for how many of us has he rekindled lights that were becoming dim, and taught us to understand and feel what Christianity really means." I do not quote these words because there is anything novel in the thought conveyed. The same idea has been expressed in general terms over and over again. I quote them because obviously they are not an outsider's generalisation, but a bit of personal experience, and in a matter of this kind, every bit of personal experience counts. Most of all perhaps are we interested in the critic's attitude towards Wordsworth—always a touchstone of something more than a man's mere taste in poetry. He unhesitatingly treats him as a great teacher; asserts that we have never done justice to him "because we have not taken him seriously enough"; places him as complement and antithesis beside Shakespeare; proclaims him first in rank in his own order of poetry—the poetry of "essence and spirit." The essay may tell us little that is new about Wordsworth. It tells us much about the writer.

WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON.

WILLIAM WATSON AND THE THEATRE.*

A play which has not yet been acted has a reviewer at a disadvantage. If he is to do his duty, he has to consider, above all other qualities, its merit on the stage. To do this he must make an effort of imagination which is not called for by any other form of literature. If he is dealing with an author whose earlier plays have been performed in the theatre, his imagination has the aid of his memory. For the dramatic quality is probably repeated. One knows, for instance, pretty well what was dramatic and what undramatic in the plays of Mr. Yeats which one has seen; and one can use this knowledge in judging the unplayed page. With a poet's first play, however, the task is harder. This quality and that can be named as good or bad for the theatre, but that does not exhaust the matter. The dramatic is so elusive a spirit, so much more dependent on the author's personality than on such external things as structure, dialogue and so on, that one can never be sure what play will be interesting on the stage until one has seen it there. Yet structure, language and other technical points are all, in the case of a first play, on which imagination has to work.

"The Heralds of the Dawn" is Mr. Watson's first play and must therefore be judged with deference. It certainly looks as if it would not act very well. Eight short scenes, involving four changes of setting, would probably commend the piece to few managers. But managers are treated lightly nowadays, so we need not trouble too much about them. This construction, however, can be criticised on more serious grounds. It breaks the play up too much, gives it a choppy effect. One has not the time to become interested. And when we talk about dramatic quality and the sense of the theatre and so on, we merely mean the capacity for keeping an audience interested. Now one cannot be interested in a story which does not develop: not, that is, in the theatre, and only in the armchair when the story is quite short. But "The Heralds of the Dawn" does not develop. The motive of the play is a moral one. So far so good. Audiences are usually more interested in morals than in art, and the hyper-æsthetic critic, who refused to consider Mr. Watson in his moral side, would encounter much chaste beauty but would miss the main significance of his work. The plot of "The Heralds of the Dawn" is briefly this. Volmar, general of the forces of Idonea, conquers his country's enemy, but, during the campaign, seduces the daughter of a hunter, Abbo of the Woods. Volmar returns in triumph, but, in the midst of the festivities in his honour, Abbo kills him. He is naturally condemned to death, but is saved by the intercession of

* "The Heralds of the Dawn." A Play, by William Watson. 4s. 6d. net. (Lane.)

Hesperus, Crown Prince of Idonea. Clotaire, the old King, father of Hesperus, abdicates in his son's favour and takes poison. All this is doubtful morality and still more doubtful politics, but Mr. Watson is doing no more than uphold what Americans call the Unwritten Law. The time of the play is "the morrow of antiquity," and it symbolises the passing of tyranny, represented by Clotaire and Volmar, and the advent of liberty, represented by Hesperus. This is a promising theme, but it is spoilt by unskilful treatment, by the absence of that development which makes a play interesting. Abbo, for instance, appears for a moment in the first scene, and we are allowed to forget all about him before we see him again. A love affair of Hesperus's is touched on but not worked out; a cedar, the health of which is bound up with that of the royal house, would be significant if introduced as a recurrent motive or symbol, but loses all effect by being used once and dropped; the machinations of the demagogue Brasidas are peculiarly spasmodic and futile. In short, the play is scrappy.

There is one quality, however, which might save it on the stage, as it undoubtedly saves it for the reader. Mr. Watson is a skilled epigrammatist, in the sense that Martial rather than Melager was an epigrammatist. This gift stands him in good stead here. His dialogue is excellent, terse and full of felicities. Most modern blank verse plays are as dull to read as to hear. Mr. Watson's play is certainly not dull to read. It might, therefore, being neither long nor long-winded, keep us interested in the theatre by sheer dexterity of dialogue. Mr. Shaw and Mr. Barker have shown us how many sins good dialogue can cover.

To read "The Heralds of the Dawn" is, at any rate, a pleasure, and not only because it contains such verse as:

"Brasidas, they whose judgment guides this realm
Allow you a large liberty of speech;
Allow to them some liberty of silence.
In statecraft there are things that cannot be
As public as a peepshow at a fair.
The council chamber of a King is secret,
Even as the heart and inwards of thy body
Are secret. To uncover their hid workings
Were to destroy thee, body and heart and all."

Like all Mr. Watson's work, "The Heralds of the Dawn" has lofty purpose, austerity, distinction. There are worse qualities than these in literature.

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

GOETHE.*

The simultaneous appearance of these two handsome and portly volumes, dealing with Goethe, his life, work and influence, just at this present moment, when no particular anniversary or other occasion has befallen to bring their subject more than usually to mind is, one supposes, a mere negligible coincidence. The books are welcome, inasmuch as they will set their readers once more exploring and canvassing the mind and personality of Goethe and the vast mass of written matter—or much of it—in which they found expression. Mr. McCabe's book will hardly succeed in banishing from the public memory some former studies of his subject, notably that of George Lewes. It has the virtues he has given us the right to look for in his work; it is well-documented, thorough, thoughtful, and

* "Goethe: The Man and His Character." By Joseph McCabe. With Portraits. 15s. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

"Goethe and His Women Friends." By Mary Caroline Crawford. With 76 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

The Goethehaus in Frankfurt.

From "Goethe," by Joseph McCabe (Eveleigh Nash)

not unilluminated by flashes of understanding and insight. But it has no markedly novel reading of Goethe's character to offer to us, and its perusal will leave most readers with pretty much the same opinion they held of him before they first opened his pages. Some of Mr. McCabe's critical judgments will indurate rather than alter the views they are intended to affect. His statement, for instance, that "Werther" is Goethe's greatest work will surely come upon most readers of this generation with something of a shock. That "Werther" is a little book of considerable literary power and charm few will deny; that it might, even had it been Goethe's one production, still have held its place in the public memory, may be conceded, but to exalt it over the best parts of "Faust," over such work as either of the Prologues, the Song of the Earth-Spirit, Margaret's Prayer, or the best of the Walpurgis scene, surely smacks of the insanity of eulogy.

Miss Crawford has discharged her more restricted task, of showing Goethe in his relations with the interminable string of women who succeeded each other in his affections, well also. The theme becomes monotonous by very force of variety, and leaves a slight sense of nausea on the normal palate, but that is no fault of Miss Crawford, and the book is as pleasantly written as any such record could be.

Goethe's place in the literary hierarchy is, one may suppose, tolerably fixed and certain by now. He owes it, as is right and just, to what is best and finest amid the huge and hugely diversified mass of his literary remains, which sets him fairly among the great writers of all time. And yet, in reviewing that mass in its entirety, it is possible at moments to ask whether its creator was, after all, of the race of indubitable, authentic, God-born poets; whether he was not rather merely a man of wonderful cleverness, marvellous industry, and vast will-power, a brilliant plodder, a genius not born, but made? Perhaps there is no man who ever held a pen between whose best and whose worst work there is a greater or more impassable gap—not even William Wordsworth. Such a doubt receives, at least, collateral support from the tawdry theatrical fashion in which, while still a young boy, he decided "to seek God in his works, and in the good old Bible fashion to build an altar to Him!" For this purpose he selected some types, such as ores and other natural productions, and arranged them in symbolical order on the elevations of a music stand. On the apex was to be a flame typical of the soul's aspiration, and for this a pastille did duty. Sunrise was awaited with impatience. The glittering of the house tops gave signal; he applied a burning-glass to the pastille, and thus was the worship consummated by a priest of seven years old, alone in his bedroom! Fancy Wordsworth, or Shelley, or Heine, or Coleridge, fancy even Victor Hugo, with all the flamboyant tinsel which mingled and jarred with the fine gold of his temperament, either playing such a trick or recording it of himself! To the English reader it infallibly recalls an intentionally bombastic incident in the first book of the "Dunciad," and also another scene in which a small boy reared an altar unto the Lord in the vast solitude of the African veldt. Miss Olive Schreiner's Waldo does not develop into a world-poet, a companion of princes, and a literary and social Jupiter, but the pitiful little mutton-chop melting on the twelve small stones was surely a more savoury sacrifice than Goethe's pastille.

Goethe's pinchbeck antic with his pastille, kept in mind as a key to the character of the being who played it, becomes dreadfully symbolical of much, a revealing light, a key to unlock the inmost recesses of his soul. His character was abnormal, and abnormal on the poor and shabby side, as was, for instance, his treatment of his mother. That she was a good mother, that she was exceptionally fond of her brilliant and wayward offspring, that she exulted in his growing fame, that the sad solitude of her last years was sweetened by the knowledge that he walked on even terms with earth's greatest, that he was the chosen intimate and adviser of a reigning prince, that he was caressed and flattered by the Conqueror of Europe, is made pathetically clear on every occasion whenever her name emerges among the records of his life. Yet Goethe lived for three-and-thirty years within little more than a hundred miles of her—he in Weimar and she in his native Frankfurt—and visited her only six times. He poured out volumes of cardiphonic drivel on his sweethearts and mistresses, his letters to the mother who would have given her life to save him from a headache would make scarcely a moderate-sized pamphlet. On p. 220 of her book Miss Crawford quotes a few sentences in a letter written by the proud and sad old woman to Fritz von Stein, a little boy who lived in Goethe's entourage:

"Since you are constantly with my son and know more about him than anyone else, how would it be if you were to keep a little diary, and send it to me every month? It need not, indeed, give you much trouble—only something in this way: 'Yesterday Goethe was at the play; in the evening invited out. To-day we had company,' and so on. In this way I should live as it were among you, should rejoice in your joys, and absence would lose much of its unpleasantness."

Fritz acted on the suggestion, and, as a result, Frau Aja heard much more than she had previously done of her son's everyday life.

These were the years in which Goethe was "developing himself," "building his soul-pyramid," and all the rest of it. The same ground-note of low selfishness runs through all his amours. He toyed with the souls of a long succession of women, inspiring passions he never had the faintest intention of gratifying, either by marriage, which was contrary to his "ideal," or in a more questionable fashion, which, as the ladies were mostly of respectable connections, might have brought unpleasant consequences to disturb his Olympian calm.

A great man? Yes—with reservations. A good man? No—with little reservation of any kind. By his fruits shall we know him. Goethe's intellectual offspring of any account are easily numbered and easily appraised. They were Carlyle, with his hero-worship and his intellectual brutalitarianism, which the world tentatively nibbled at and soon rejected, and Nietzsche, with his mock-philosophy of sublimated caddishness, which the world, for the most and better part, has ignored altogether.

HENRY MURRAY.

THE WORKS OF RICHARD MIDDLETON.*

One rises from the reading of these two volumes with the feeling that the end of Richard Middleton came all too soon; that his passage under the stars finished at too early an hour; that his nine and twenty years were but so much promise; and that full achievement lay just beyond the short Night he did not fear but rather sought. One feels that; and yet the feeling may be but a will o' the wisp to lead us astray; very likely it is. Must we consider the man and his work? Must we sever the work from the man? It is not given to all to know the singer, but the first man met in the street may judge the song.

I am, for the moment, concerned with Richard Middleton's song; and I confess that I find it of a monotony which may be divine, but which is—there can be no denial—wearisome. He had many rhythms—he sought variety as he sought pleasure, avidly—but the song was the same, the substance and stuff of it were ever the same: he did not sing dreams, he sang of dreams he had had. The casual reader will say at once: "Richard Middleton was a dreamer." That is just what he was not; he was a man who said he had had dreams, but if dreams he had he kept them jealously to himself, and the hungry of the earth want more from their poets than a disdainful or a pitiful:

"I have seen God: but, hush! I may not speak."

And so, because Richard Middleton does not tell his dream, we are minded to fit him with Mr. Arthur Symonds' estimate of that other strange departed sprite, Ernest Dowson: "He was not a dreamer; destiny passes by the dreamer, sparing him because he clamours for many things. He was a child, clamouring for so many things, all impossible."

In the intervals of "clamouring for so many things," Richard Middleton sang some fine things, things quite pure and exquisite. Almost perfect is this "Nocturne":

"When Sleep puts on the cloak of Death,
And in the city masquerades,
Earth's tired children fight for breath,
And they who sought the dreamy glades
Fall panting on the road, and lie
Like clods beneath the sombre sky.

"But when Death comes like gentle sleep,
And takes our children to her breast,
Our weary eyes forbear to weep—
It is so very good to rest
Quietly in the dreamy corn
Until the breaking of the morn."

Almost perfect, I said; almost, but not quite; for here, twice in two stanzas, do we encounter Middleton's King Charles' head—dreamy, which, with dreams, dreaming, dreamful, was his obsession. The word, one imagines, had an uncanny fascination for him.

This "Nocturne" and "The Song of the King's Minstrel," by their simplicity and directness, are worthy of a place in any anthology. In both these there is the true singing-stuff, elemental and inevitable. But on most occasions Middleton sang a more sophisticated strain, and once or twice he passed the bounds of current decency, as in the lines "To C.M.," where he would be Peeping Tom, spying on the mysteries of the alcove, and in "After

* "Poems and Songs." By Richard Middleton. Introduction by Henry Savage; "The Ghost Ship and Other Stories." Introduction by Arthur Machen. 5s. net each. (Fisher Unwin.)

Love" with its "Let there be lust between us two." Of course, all that was mere braggadocio, the bantam bounce of the late 'nineties that would shock at any price the Puritan fresh from Cowper and Tennyson. And so many of us took it for bravery! Middleton, I feel, would have sacrificed these two pieces, and perhaps also "The Rebel" and the "Epithalamium." The piety of friends has preserved them. The same piety has given us an introduction to the "Poems and Songs" by Mr. Henry Savage, of which the conclusion may be quoted:

"Of his genius I am not using words idly when I say that it is of that rare quality which will sooner or later ensure him a recognised position in the front rank of English poets. Those who are not moved by the beauty of the poetry in this volume may find beauty elsewhere and had better seek it elsewhere. There is that in it beyond the reach of mere criticism. It is of the substance which lives."

Mr. Savage has the fervid courage of the devoted friend; but, honestly, I find that Richard Middleton's songs are Richard Middleton's most discreet and most trustworthy champions.

The prose volume, "The Ghost Ship" (introduced worthily and soberly by Mr Arthur Machen), is truly remarkable. It would be remarkable in any year, not only for its manner but for its matter. In quality, in fineness as in substantiality, it is far above "Poems and Songs"; and just as Middleton found himself, before the end, "drawn towards young children and people who are simple and kindly and not too clever," so it may be conceived that he was also being drawn away from the easy artificialities and affectations of prosody, and towards the more austere beauties of prose. Certainly, in prose he has done fine things. "The Ghost Ship" is greatly imagined—humour, pathos, fantasy, poetry, and cunning earthly philosophy—of these is it mimitably made. I feel that it is a masterpiece. And surely there was never a more sincere, a more poignant bit of self-revelation than "The Great Man": every man who has been called to letters must see himself in this faithful mirror. And for all that "The Coffin Merchant" may owe something to Poe and Stevenson and Ambrose Bierce, and "The Soul of a Policeman" a little to Anatole France; these two sketches are gripping things, eloquent in their almost bald diction, beautiful in their spare lines. Richard Middleton's prose has nerve and vigour that his verse lacks and it has a style that should preserve it long against moth and rust. It is a prose that needs no apologist. It, and not his verse, will make live the name of this hunter after beauty, who gave up the chase ere it was full noon.

W. A. MacKENZIE

priest appears to be necessary, the excitements of the revivalist preacher are absent; in the privacy of its own soul, the spirit turns from evil and faces towards God." In these pages there is no fall of the bell, to satisfy the craving for sensationalism. The book is a study of the work done by the Y.M.C.A. Mr. Begbie tells once more the story of its inception by Sir George Williams; gives several instances of men who have been helped by it to live clean and Christian lives in London; and pleads with characteristic vigour for the support of its new operations in the metropolis. One of the chapters is devoted to a sketch of the Rev. John McNeill, though Mr. Begbie does not mention him by name. Elsewhere, the views of Mr. Virgo are expounded at some length. But the bulk of the book is occupied with life-stories of clerks, barristers, and business men, who have been indebted to the Y.M.C.A. The author admits it has been more difficult to collect materials for this sort of book than for his earlier studies in a lower social stratum. Perhaps that is one reason why there is more of Mr. Begbie, and of Mr. Begbie's preaching, in these pages than in the previous volumes. However, the book is telling in its own way. By far the most interesting study is that of "A soul in the street"; it handles a phase of morbidity due to the unreal conditions of life in a huge city like London, but it is quite off the lines of the conventional religious experience, and it has the notes of a grey, twisted reality.

JAMES MOFFATT.

THE ROYAL MIRACLE.*

We all know that, as a matter of hard fact, Charles II. was one of the least deserving of monarchs and of men, but he was such a genial, gracious, likable ne'er-do-weel, and so much of picturesque incident and romantic sentiment were mingled with the record of his dissolute living that he has taken his permanent place among our gallant, glamorous heroes of song and story. We ought to be sorry that the Roundheads did not capture him when he escaped after Worcester fight, but we are not, and the tale of the adventures through which the Royal fugitive passed, how he was hidden and helped by loyal friends, how narrowly he missed being discovered again and again, makes a page or two of history as vivid and exciting reading as if they were pages of imaginative romance.

It is that thrilling phase of the King's career that has

* The "Royal Miracle" By A. M. Broadley. 16s. net. (Stanley Paul)

MR. BEGBIE ON THE Y.M.C.A.*

In one of his essays, Mr. Russell Lowell tells how an American church was being burned down, and how an anxious farmer rushed up to the scene, gasping: "Hez the bell fell yit?" His one interest in the fire was to hear the clang and crash of the bell, as the tower collapsed. Mr. Begbie appears to have been reproached by some critics of his earlier books upon religious conversion, for encouraging tastes like that of the breathless rustic at the fire. He now takes up his pen to show that "conversion is a quite common experience among ordinary men; is very often nothing more than a secret turning of the face towards God; a private decision to live a new life; a personal and wholly tranquil choice of the soul for Christ as its Master and Saviour. No

* "The Ordinary Man and the Extraordinary Thing." By Harold Begbie. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

SECT. II.

The Nativity of Prince Charles.

I have seen several Nativities, that have been reported to be this Princely Native's true one. But one more especially what all our London Nitrologists reit' recurrently confident is the right. Which was the time of his birth to be, in the year of our Lord 1630. May the 29. 30. P. M. or afternoon. Now we know there can be but one Truth; and if this be it, I would willingly demand what directions those are (by such a correction) should signify these accidents following, which have already hapned unto him? I cannot (by the belt of my skill) discover any, and am therefore apt to suspect the verity thereof.

1. Aged 9 years, broke his Arm, and disfigure in body.
2. Aged 10 years, a slight fever, and spice of the Jaundice.
3. Aged 12 years, the measles, left London &c.
4. Aged 16 years, went to France, had a scarles fever.
5. Aged 20 years, Crowned in Scotland.
6. Aged 21 years, worked at Worcester.

By the time given, before-mentioned, there is but one of these accidents that can have a direction to signify it; and that is the Crowning of him in Scotland; and that's the Midheaven to the ☽ of 11. but

CHARLES II.
Crowned King of Scotland
January 2, 1651

From the portrait in John Gadbury's "Nativity of the late King Charles" (1659) in the possession of Mr. Broadley.

Charles II. in 1651.

From "The Royal Miracle," by A. M. Broadley (Stanley Paul).

furnished matter for this handsome book of Mr. A. M. Broadley's. Never before has the story been told in such minute detail nor so authoritatively. For long past Mr. Broadley has been collecting contemporary pamphlets, letters and documents relating to Charles's wanderings from September 3rd, 1651, to October 15th; and in September last year he took a party of friends on a motor-car pilgrimage from Worcester to Brighton, visiting on the way every remaining house at which Charles stayed, every place in which he lay in hiding, until, by devious courses, he reached the coast and was able to take ship for France. The most wonderful and momentous incident of his flight was probably what is known as "the miraculous divergence," which occurred on September 23rd, 1651, when the King and his handful of followers were fleeing along the Dorchester Road. Lord Wilmot rejoined them near the first milestone on that road with news that more troops were advancing on Bridport from Dorchester, probably with the object of intercepting the fugitives. "The ready wit of Charles stood him in good stead. He at once said that nothing else would save them, but taking the first turning to the left and doubling back to Trent, where their presence had not been as yet suspected. A few minutes later they turned into Lee Lane, and had not long been hidden by its high and leafy hedges when they heard the clatter of the Roundheads' cavalry riding swiftly towards Bridport." This almost casual turning aside not a minute too soon spared the King from capture and took him on the road that led to safety.

In a full and scholarly historical introduction Mr. Broadley treats at large of the flight of the King and the literature that has grown up around it; touches on some of its chief episodes, and has much of interest to say concerning those who aided the King in his extremity, and the identification of His Majesty's hiding-places. He follows this by printing several rare tracts, letters, broadsides and old ballads, all having to do with the King's adventures, and in a series of appendices includes papers read before the members of his last year's pilgrimage concerning Charles's escape from Worcester; the expenses incurred by him in Worcester, as shown by the municipal accounts; a narrative of his sojourn at Brightelmstone, whilst he waited for an opportunity to embark; an itinerary of the flight; the story of the famous motor-car pilgrimage; a careful bibliography; and other supplementary matter. The book is illustrated with numerous portraits and facsimiles, engravings and maps. Within its limits it is a contribution to history so conscientiously and exhaustively written that it is never likely to be superseded; much in the volume is now published for the first time, and one can only congratulate Mr. Broadley upon the knowledge and patient research with which he has accomplished his task, and the ability with which he has marshalled his facts and arranged his documents so as to make the whole record as supremely interesting as it is exact and reliable.

WITH NAPOLEON AT S. HELENA.*

Of writing many books about Napoleon there is no end, and Mr. Watson has achieved a work of length, substance and ingenuity about one of the very least of those who crossed for a moment the orbit of the great man. Piontkowski told the modest truth when he said of himself "I am but a pigmy," but he showed such real devotion to his hero by following him to Elba and S. Helena that he is now rewarded, more than sixty years after his death, by a short volume devoted nominally at least to himself. We say nominally, because in this book Mr. Watson is really wrestling with the shade of Sir Hudson Lowe, and striking some doughty blows in the much-laboured controversy as to the treatment of Napoleon in his last exile. There is no cold impartiality about Mr. Watson, no anxious balancing of judgment; he is the Emperor's man, and after careful study of the Lowe Papers, is clearly convinced that the governor treated his prisoner with unnecessary harshness and incivility. It is generally agreed that Lowe was deficient in tact, but his enemies show little appreciation of his responsibilities and difficulties. Napoleon had escaped once before, at a cost to Europe of many thousand lives. He was always hoping to arouse sympathy in the English Parliament where the Opposition were ready to plead his cause, if by so doing they could damage the Government. His "court" at Longwood was difficult to rule and caused equal trouble to himself and to Lowe. In one essential at least the English Governor showed generosity by raising Napoleon's allowances for his establishment from £8,000 to £12,000 per annum. This useful amelioration was forgotten in what Montholon described to Basil Jackson as the policy of Longwood, the policy of pouring into England pamphlets of grievances "chiefly levelled at the governor as the head and fount of all that was amiss." Mr. Watson has himself an amusing note on the use made of certain Jews in S. Helena in the secret transmission of letters to Europe. He constructs for his readers this picture of Piontkowski:

"Bright-eyed, loose-lipped, gentle-mannered, simple-minded, receptive, romantic, susceptible, swayed up or down by the moment's impulse, and moved to smiles or tears with equal facility—a curious compound of the Slav's fanaticism, the Teuton's Schwärmeri, the Frenchman's vanity, the Oriental's resignation, and the Athenian's gossip-mongering—not a trace of the Roman about him. Withal an amiable and affectionate nature."

Piontkowski was at S. Helena from December 29th, 1815, to October 19th, 1816, when he was deported from the island by order of Bathurst and Lowe, partly because in his signed declaration he had abused the island and its climate, and partly because he had attempted to persuade a young English officer to carry information to Europe. Mr. Watson publishes from the Wilson papers letters written by the Pole after his return to England, in which he describes the life at Longwood. The most interesting portions of these deal with Napoleon himself:

"No man can be more abstemious than he: it is his practice to rise from table with appetite still left, and he drinks only about a quarter of a bottle of claret, mixed with water, at a meal; after dinner he has a small glass of wine of Constantia with the dessert. . . . Napoleon always rides the same horse, which he is very fond of, and caresses and calls his 'faithful,' and he is amused when the horse knows him from afar. . . . He spends the whole day in reading, writing, or dictating the memoirs of his life. The suite assembles at 6 p.m. in the saloon, when the Emperor often speaks of his youth, of which he can recall the minutest circumstances. Even in those days the King of Corsica (Paoli) said: 'Napoleon, you are a man out of Plutarch.'"

Those who are attracted by medical details will find a long and minute account of the Emperor's last illness and death in a note by Mr. Watson. In fact the most valuable portion of the book is in the notes and disquisitions, the vivacious and rather fierce little character sketches, and the "spade-work" which has produced appendices containing facts which may at some future time prove of decisive importance in historical controversy.

Mr. Watson is of the school of writers who are determined that their style shall never be dull, and sometimes the determination is so obvious as to be rather depressing. He will use a phrase like "We must return to our wethers." His writing is virile, he coins words and phrases, (for example, "she had no friends on a cruminal basis") and is a notable polyglot; but he is also at times slangy, allusive and topical, and sometimes tortures our poor mother tongue. When he is dealing with other writers upon S. Helena he becomes a very Dervish of criticism. Forsyth particularly excites him: "licensed fosterling of Themis that he is, he clutches at the scales and claps them on to your eyes!" M. Masson receives a stately compliment, and some severe blows, particularly for his innuendoes against the wife of Piontkowski. Mr. Watson finishes his account of that lady's life during her husband's absence in this triumphant exclamation—"might every grass widow give so clear an account of her late movements when her lord and master comes clattering home from abroad!"

WALFORD D. GREEN.

* "A Polish Exile with Napoleon." Embodying the Letters of Captain Piontkowski to General Sir Robert Wilson and many Documents from the Lowe Papers, Colonial Office Records, Wilson Manuscripts, Capel Loft Correspondence, and French and Genevese Archives hitherto unpublished. By G. L. de St. M. Watson. 12s. 6d. net. (Harper.)

AN INJURED QUEEN.*

Though much has been written about the wrongs and sorrows of Queen Caroline, and she has her place, of course, in all the histories of her time, during the last ninety years only two books have been devoted exclusively to the surprising, rather sordid, very baffling story of her unhappy life. The first was written by an Italian professor; and here in these two handsome volumes of Mr. Melville's, we have the second. Whether Caroline was guilty of anything worse than careless talking and indiscreet behaviour it is impossible to say with certainty; Mr. Melville inclines to give her the benefit of the doubt—for there is a doubt, and a large one; but even if her guilt were sure, after reading Mr. Melville's vivid, sympathetic study of her character, and the whole story of her sufferings, one's blame is swallowed up in pity. Whatever her faults, she was amiable, kindly; her very carelessness and guileless outspokenness were continually delivering her into the hands of her enemies; she was surrounded by treacherous friends who were eager to curry favour with the Prince, her husband, by exaggerating and betraying her smallest follies and bearing false witness against her. And for the Prince himself, the fourth George, that "first gentleman in Europe," nothing in his discreditable career so utterly discredits him as his mean, boorish and heartless treatment of the woman he had married. Mr. Melville has done his work carefully and well; his pictures of the life of the period, and of its leading personalities are admirably drawn; he has laid all reliable authorities under contribution and been enabled, moreover, to enrich his book with some hitherto unpublished documents. He has handled his material with a narrative skill that makes "An Injured Queen," apart from its historical value, a romance of most poignant human interest.

EIGHT NEW NOVELS.

Whatever else may be lacking in modern fiction it is neither literary ability nor variety. During this month I have read to speak only of novels one can recommend with some enthusiasm "Wintering Hay,"¹ Mr. John Trevena's sombre but powerful Dartmoor romance, with its atmosphere of grim tragedy and vividly imagined narrative of disastrous passion; "The Considine Luck,"² a delightfully idyllic love story, that runs a chequered course and by the way gives occasion for some very ably realised pictures of Irish life and the drollery, tenderness, pride and fine simplicities of Irish character; Mr. Charles McEvoy's exhilaratingly fresh and clever comedy of a chivalrous elopement,³ which ends in a fashion that disillusion and shocks you with surprise, though it is the absolutely fitting end for it; "Branston Heath,"⁴ which will please you if you are a good democrat by its high idealism and the profound sincerity of conviction with which it handles the land laws and the terrible problems of modern poverty; "Love's Pilgrimage,"⁵ that is somewhat reminiscent of the anonymous "Diary of Arthur Stirling," with which Mr. Upton Sinclair practically started his literary career, but the later story shows what remarkable progress he has made in the mastery of his art. A real passion burns in his love episodes; he touches on the most delicate mysteries of life with a true spiritual insight; and if his minute presentment of the character of a man of genius sometimes irritates you this is not to say that the picture is not amazingly true. You may or may not sympathise with Mr. Sinclair's fierce attacks on our social conventions, but you can scarcely fail to be taken with the beauty and originality of his story.

* "An Injured Queen: Caroline of Brunswick." By Lewis Melville. 2 Vols. 24s. (Hutchinson.)

¹ "Wintering Hay." By John Trevena. 6s. (Constable.)

² "The Considine Luck." By H. A. Hinkson. 6s. (Stephen Swift.)

³ "Brass Faces." By Charles McEvoy. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

⁴ "Branston Heath." By C. Reginald Enock. 6s. (Dent.)

⁵ "Love's Pilgrimage." By Upton Sinclair. 6s. (Heinemann.)

Queen Caroline with her daughter, the Princess Charlotte.

From an engraving after R. Cosway

From "An Injured Queen," by Louis Melville (Hutchinson).

"Out of the Wreck I Rise," "The Adventures of Miss Gregory," and "Halcyone," have nothing in common with each other except that each is, I think, the best book its author has yet given us. Plots never count for so much in Miss Harraden's novels as her indefinable charm of style, and the rare gift she has of creating character and atmosphere. Her study of the temperament of that little great man Adrian Steel,⁶ is a subtle and admirable piece of work. Crudely speaking, Adrian is dishonest and dishonourable; when, as a dramatic agent, he has cheated his clients out of huge sums of money and is on the verge of discovery and disaster, he does not dream of confiding in his neglected wife, but turns for advice and help to two women whom he had loved and tired of and thrown over years ago. One is a widow now and devoted to social work; the other, morose, level-headed, rather unscrupulous, carries on business in Soho as a dealer in antique jewellery. Both of them still cherish his memory, and when he comes back to them, they forgive him at once, and their love of him and jealousy of each other flame up again, and they are ready to sacrifice themselves and go any lengths to serve him and save him from ruin.

"Halcyone,"⁷ is as far removed as anything could be from those witty, smart society novels that have placed Mrs. Elinor Glyn among our most popular novelists. Wise beyond her years, with the heart of a child, the soul of a mystic, and looking on life always with fearless and innocent eyes, Halcyone, both as girl and as woman, is the strangest, most lovable and delightful of heroines, and this story of her life and of the coming of love into it is clothed in a dream-like beauty and intensely alive with interest. It is no small thing to say that "The Adventures of Miss Gregory" is a better book than "Souls in Bondage," but in the quiet strength of its workmanship, its tense dramatic force, and the sense of effortless ease with which it is written I think it goes beyond that memorable earlier volume. Miss Gregory is "one of those disconcerting women who combine a mannish charm with an entirely feminine strength of personality," and she travels about the world, an understanding, observant, purposeful creature, seeking material for a book she is writing, and always ready to intervene in the affairs of others and help any who are in need of it. Her twelve adventures cover a wide range of experience, and are related with great skill and imaginative force. Picturesque, vivid, crowded with incident, "The Adventures of Miss Gregory" are at once good literature and intensely interesting reading; outside the pages of Kipling, we have had no short stories of recent years that equal them in their constructive art, their knowledge of humanity, and the brilliant imaginative quality of their writing.

⁶ "Out of the Wreck I Rise." By Beatrice Harraden. 2s. net. (Nelson.)

⁷ "Halcyone." By Elinor Glyn. 6s. (Duckworth.)

S. J.

TWO POETS.*

"The Clouds," like Mr. Doughty's last book, "The Cliffs," has been written under the very solemn belief that Britain is to be successfully invaded by Germany. Like "The Cliffs," the new book depicts what Mr. Doughty expects to take place unless we have a strong, perpetual Conservative Government, hundreds of Dreadnoughts, Super-Dreadnoughts, Ultra-Dreadnoughts, conscription, pills to purge democracy, and so on. I have not the least idea whether Mr. Doughty is a false prophet, and, if so, whether the War Office or the Admiralty is aware of his existence, but I hope that thousands of patriots, Conservatives, and Germanophobes, will buy his book when they hear that he blows the last trump of patriotism. Only thus does it seem still possible that Mr. Doughty's poetry might be discovered. Nor would it be a false alarm. For Mr. Doughty is probably the most completely patriotic of English poets. His epic poem, "The Dawn in Britain," treats this island as sacred, and the birth of the idea of British nationality as a holy and mighty thing, and the poem is worthy of the conception. It is no wonder, then, that fear for his country should move him with a religious emotion, a holy wrath, a prophetic pity and dread. Already, in "The Cliffs," he has shown that his conviction has not spoilt his poetry, though it has led it into strange places, far away from Brennus and Caractacus, among German acroplanists and newsboys calling "Piper!" He is a patriot as not even Wordsworth or Milton was, as, perhaps, no Englishman of his class has been since Elizabeth's time. When he speaks we understand that "The Faerie Queene" is not mere poetry. For him Britain is an abode of spirits, men, elves, birds and flowers, which are all children of the divine idea of Britain. He has spoken with the "Muse of Britain." She has answered him, and has, in fact, inspired this book by giving him a vision of what is to come.

The book is a narrative broken up in a not wholly satisfactory way by dialogue, merely to avoid oblique narration. Since only a tiny sacred band has bought "The Cliffs," it is useless to compare "The Clouds" with it. "The Clouds" opens with an indignant lament over this "negligent isle," warning it that never yet has an invader been repulsed from it. A perfectly distinct description follows of the "Muses' Garden," where Cædmon and Chaucer and Spenser dwell. Spenser is the English poet most venerated by Mr. Doughty, and as is natural, this book of "The Muses' Garden" is very Spenserean in language and feeling, but with touches of a sublimity and activity which were beyond that poet. The Muse shows him Britain invaded, and gives him the power to follow "from day to day, with eye and ear" some one among the sufferers. Presently the scene narrows to a workman's family driven by German fire out of their town, and now sitting in a field round a fire of sticks, bidding farewell to one Carpenter, their "gentleman lodger." Him it is that Mr. Doughty is permitted to follow in his long walk homewards from the burned town, up through Ely, Stamford and Dove Dale, and then, finding his mother fled from the invaders, into Wales. The intruding dialogue, good in itself, makes the progress of the narrative uneasy, but granting Mr. Doughty—as the Muse has done—his style and his vision, there is no other fault. Carpenter's journey is through country not much directly afflicted by the invasion, but at every road and at every village he sees hunger, anxiety, sometimes despair, much confusion and dark uncertainty. Now and then a soldier or a sailor brings bad news. At inns and waysides men share news and views. Thus, through Carpenter and those whom he meets, a various and lively picture of the fighting and the effects of it is given. Several of the characters are drawn with some care and always with a manly archaic charm—a publican, a magistrate, a pedlar, a parson, a preacher, several officers, and a councillor gipsying on the banks of the Dove. Now and then companies of soldiers cross his path:

"Erect, alert, the young men hardily pass."

Some of the fields are trodden bare, but the book lacks no loveliness of Nature.

"Leap glad-eyed children hither, gathering posies;
Sweet violet, cicely, dainty ladies' smocks,
With jacinth, medleyed in the thicket grass. . . ."

When the angler in the Dove talks of Izaak Walton and sings a song between a herdgroom and a milkmaid—

"Thine eyes ben two cornflower; they ben so blue"

—it is hard to remember that we are in a country at the edge of famine and destruction, and harder to realise that we are in the twentieth century, where

"Each party outbiddeth other in the State;
That sinks or swims, but through the greedy vote,
Of blind, vindictive, Mafeking populace"

In any case, it is a century where the League of Patriots have "Patria" brodered on their caps by women's hands, and a Welsh bard speaks as on the morning of the world, albeit his fairies are as certainly not Welsh as they are certainly good, but not so good as the English fairies in "The Cliffs."

The book ends inconclusively:

"The rest untold, no living tongue can speak."

The war is not at an end: "Britain begins, in airman-ship, to excel," and has some success by sea. Perhaps the trumpet note has waked to some purpose "virtue, manhood, fortitude of idle Britain," or the patriot Bard could bear no more of the horror. The end is not unsatisfactory. Even in a paraphrase the poem would justify itself as an imaginative forecast. The majestic, steady spirit of the poet makes it something altogether beautiful, in which the prophetic, the realistic and the idyllic are combined. The dignity and sweetness are Spenser's as well as Mr. Doughty's, the sublimity and homeliness are his own, and peculiarly his own. At the same time, I hope that he is tired of airships and invasions.

Mr. Clinton Scollard has written fifty amorous epigrams, and seven or eight times he has succeeded so well that the writing—and the reading—of the others has not been wasted. If I give two examples I shall make it clear at once to a reader of any experience what Mr. Scollard's merits and limitations are. The twelfth is:

"A wondrous book is El Koran,
A book the loving Faithful prize;
Its treasured pages show to man
An open path to Paradise."

"I con the words of El Koran,
Yet when I look within her eyes,
Somehow I deem that I can scan
A nearer path to Paradise."

* "The Adventures of Miss Gregory." By Perceval Gibbon. 6s. (Dent.)

* "The Clouds." By Charles M. Doughty. 5s. net. (Duckworth.)

"Songs of a Syrian Lover." By Clinton Scollard. 1s 6d. net. (Elkin Mathews.)

The twenty-fourth is :

"All the wonder Nebo's summit shows,
All the flawless crown of Hermon's snows,

"All the vernal bloom of Gennesar,
All the bubbling springs of Kerf Hawar,

"All of Omar's mosque, its glow and grace,
What are they if I only see her face!"

A clear, pointed thought neatly and briefly expressed in rhyme is not poetry, but is always a justification for verse. Sometimes it can reflect, as it were, poetry itself, as in the forty-fifth of these :

"As I go up, as I go down,
From khan to khan, from town to town,
I meet with names of old renown
I envy not the mighty dead;
Enough for me if, o'er my head,
He was her lover!—it be said."

Outside of Landor, such epigrams are not easy to find, and inside they are not always better. But fifty is enough unless Mr. Scollard has other impersonations within his range. As a Syrian lover he is charming, though I know nothing of Syria.

EDWARD THOMAS.

IN FORBIDDEN CHINA.*

It is not from many books of travel that the reader rises with the wish that there were more. This is decidedly the feeling produced by the account of the D'Ollone Mission in 1906-1909 through China, Tibet and Mongolia. One regrets parting from the brave Frenchman, with his child-like longing to do something no one has done before, always most naïvely expressed, so that one's heart aches with his when he had at last reached San-tao-ho, with temples "rivaling those of Ellora," "a marvellous phantasmagoria," "fantastic vision," etc., and running through a bundle of journals finds an account of them by M. Chavannes, his predecessor by six months. It must have somewhat mitigated his disappointment that M. Chavannes was a Frenchman, but it never seems to have occurred to him that there might be other predecessors of whom he had not happened to hear. In Lolo-land, which apparently gives its name to the book, he never refers to Mr. Pollard, the English missionary friend of the Lolos. There is only a footnote about Colonel Davies, whose admirable map of this whole region, prepared for our War Office, would make it possible to follow the author in his divagations from the regular roads through the district. With the miserable attempt at a map issued with this volume, even to one knowing the country tolerably familiarly, it has been impossible to ascertain the whereabouts of the mission's wanderings. This has been made no easier by the peculiarities of the translation. It is just as strange in an English book to write of "the Yunnan," "the Szechuan," as it would be to write of "the Yorkshire," "the Middlesex," and, though we do call one river the Red River just as the French do, what they call the Blue River is known by us as the Yangtse. There are also several sentences intelligible only if one thinks what a word for word translation into French would mean.

These defects do not, however, spoil the breezy delight with which the Vicomte describes the dangers he encountered by travelling routes generally considered too disagreeable. In the end he enumerates his gains.

"Two thousand photographs of types, costumes, monuments, and characteristic landscapes; more than 200 complete anthropological mensurations; 46 vocabularies of non-Chinese dialects; 4 dictionaries of native characters previously unknown or undeciphered; 32 Lolo manuscripts; 225 inscriptions relating to historical events, in Chinese, Sanscrit, Tibetan, Mongol, Manchu,

* "In Forbidden China." By Vicomte D'Ollone. Translated from the French of the Second Edition by Bernard Miall. 15s. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

"China As It Really Is." By a resident in Peking. 2s. (Eveleigh Nash.)

Arabic, and Lolo; the almost unique and undiscoverable monographs of forty-two cities; numerous weapons, utensils, examples of pottery, currency, paintings, and finally an abundant harvest of observations. The whole mass of our documents could not be presented in less than seven volumes."

One wonders a little what the French word translated "undiscoverable" was, but this is a goodly mass to have brought back, and it will be particularly interesting to learn what has been ascertained about those most delightful Si Fan, or Western barbarians, whose young men appeared as modest and gentlemanly as they certainly were beautiful. And this leads to another ungracious comment. The Vicomte himself regrets that some of the, as he says, very fine-looking men, they met, do not look well in their photographs. They certainly do not. It is unfortunate travellers will persist in photographing men unaccustomed to cameras, therefore with their mouths open and their foreheads all in furrows, and with the further drawback as a rule of having the scorching sun fall upon their faces, a position becoming to no man, and then palm off these photographs upon us as showing types. But the book is a charming record of adventurous travel with some distinctly purple patches towards the end describing the Dalai Lama and his retinue, when the author had the singular good luck to travel with his very motley and picturesque following on their memorable journey to Peking. This is indeed, perhaps, the most interesting portion of a very agreeable book which does not leave us much the wiser, all the author's researches being kept for less popular volumes. Why are not books of this kind given to boys instead of the blood and thunder imaginations on which they are now so fed up, that their overstimulated fancy seems afterwards unequal to anything but tit-bits and cricket scores?

"China As It Really Is" does not err on the side of giving too much information (201 short pages on Europe as it really is could not tell us very much), but if there is a demand for a light volume about the largest country in the world, the home of a quarter of the human races, this is a very well printed volume on excellent paper. There are twenty-two chapters; that on "Honesty, Commercial and Private" occupies two and a half pages, and in it we find this rather remarkable paragraph:

"The final appeal in China is always to public opinion; in England, to the mere letter of the law. Honesty is the best policy for all in China. In England honesty is the best policy—for dull people only. The astute financier and company promoter, whose cleverness in skirting the law has enabled him to amass a fortune, is by no means a rarity in England: he could not exist in China."

During four years of absence from China rumours have reached me that Chinese business morals have already been greatly deteriorated by intercourse with Europeans, it is comforting to hear that this is not really so. The author seems not to have mixed in Chinese family life, he is certainly quite wrong in attributing so little influence to women, who are the dread of every foreigner attempting to buy land in China, and of whom Chinese men have always struck me as curiously afraid. With regard to a great many other big subjects he, however, seems as accurate as it is possible to be in such small compass, for did not "Chinese Characteristics" Smith once say, "It is impossible to open one's mouth to say the truth about China without telling a lie at the same time." Little girls did not, however, have their feet bandaged in their first or second years. As a portly official once said to me across the dinner-table, "The paw little things must have two years to run." It is about men's matters the author is best informed—the Law, and the causes that led to the revolution; but is it not significant that it is China he is writing about, and he has to devote two chapters to Etiquette? We alas! have not much to write about in England with the School Board training the nation, yet manners in a nation's life play the same part as oil in machinery, and without them there must be ever increasing friction.

MRS. ARCHIBALD LITTLE.

JOHN BUCHAN'S STORIES.*

One feels, in beginning to write of this book, that one should in the first place fill a pipe. The stories are by no means such as tell themselves in smoke-rooms only, but the various supposed narrators and the characters have got a habit of postponing their remarks until their pipes are filled. From this you will be able to deduce, a little roughly, what is Mr. Buchan's entertainment, and yet he does not portray the merely stolid hero. In the "Kings of Orion," for instance, we are told of Tommy Lascelles who misgoverned Deira, for his heart was in remote Bokhara and was threatening the walls of Samarkand. All this, however, was applied in time of trouble, very picturesquely, to assuage Deira. Everything turns out extremely well, but in this tale we have an illustration of imperfect methods. The short story is a thing so difficult to compass, it has rules as inexorable as the sonnet's; and to have red herrings on the path is quite taboo. We here are introduced to Thirlstone and another sportsman who have met in several tight places and are now in a small inn somewhere in Scotland for the fishing. Enter the landlord who announces that one Captain Wiston is expected. Thirlstone wants to leave, at all events he lets his pipe go out, because the Captain in '99 had behaved very badly; in fact the somebody else which inhabits each of us had come to the surface: "when the kings were driven out of Orion, they were sent to this planet and given each his habitation in some mortal soul." This leads Thirlstone to tell the excellent yarn of Tommy, but the point is that the dark allusions to Wiston, of whom we hear no more, should not have been made. That is the inferiority of English as compared with French short stories; the best of our neighbours do not allow anything to be lost in the smoke. And Mr. Buchan deserves to be talked of in the same room as the best of short-story writers. He can lead up to a dramatic point with great artistry, he can make his story one artistic whole, as for instance in "The Lennian," which is perhaps the most interesting of this collection. The local colour is not obtrusively laid on and the whole conception is unusual and attractive. Mr. Buchan deals more frequently with his own native land, the Border, and he is no less pre-occupied with what may happen on the borderland of matter and spirit. "Leithen stopped to refill his pipe," and the resulting story holds us to the end; but more interesting is the South African tale entitled "The Grove of Ashtaroth." Tremendous deeds are done, there is no time for smoking, that is to say, when the story gets up to the climax. Before that: "I was disinclined for dinner, so I had a cutlet in the library and sat smoking till my tongue ached." In this tale the descriptions of tropical nature and sub-tropical human nature are exceedingly well done, and there is much elusive beauty. Nor do these attributes exhaust Mr. Buchan, for in "A Lucid Interval" he shows a very pretty power of satire which Liberals will be the first to enjoy. These stories have nearly all been printed in Blackwood's Magazine, so that a certain high standard of workmanship, research and a genial attitude will not be far to seek. And they are interesting to such an extent that now and then your pipe will go out. The interspersed poems are very well done, though they were not written, perhaps, because they had to be; there is more mystery and beauty, as a rule, in the stories. And one of the finest stories is the first: "The Company of the Marjolaine," which is supposed to be told in a series of letters by a gentleman making the Grand Tour of Europe. The point of view is exactly caught and altogether apart from the extraordinary old man, de jure King of England, and the emissaries who came to the Tre Croci to offer him the American crown, this is a story you cannot afford to miss. Mr. Buchan in print is a good companion; no less good he must be, one supposes, in the flesh when he is stalking, fishing, looking at some Border scenery or smoking in some Border inn.

H. B.

* "The Moon Endureth." By John Buchan. 6s. (Blackwood.)

A SAILOR POET.*

Somehow or other the sea that beats upon our shores has given little of its savour to the poetic literature of our race. We have had quite a large number of prose writers with imaginations stirred by the wonders of the deep, but very few of our poets have been sailormen. There was a chance of our poetry being enriched with something new and strange when Thomas Lodge took to seafaring; but the mind of the Elizabethan poet turned landward, and with the waves breaking over the ship and wetting the paper as he wrote, he composed the pretty idyll of forest life that Shakespeare adapted into "As You Like It." Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner"—the work of a landsman—has more of the magic of the sea in it than anything written since the far-off age when the old Anglo-Saxon poets gazed in wondering terror at the "whale's path," down which their people were rowing to the conquest of England.

An old Isle of Wight pilot said of Tennyson's "Enoch Arden" that it was the work of a man who had only seen the sea from the shore. That is the point of view from which most of the poets of our island race have written about seafaring life. Byron is still our most vivid poet of the sea, though Swinburne has some magnificent marine pictures—Turneresque effects of foam and light and thunder-cloud. It is long since an actual sailorman tried to sing of the things he felt and saw in his hard, rough and adventurous career. Prose yarns there are in plenty, some of them beautifully and subtly told, but few sailors have had a veritable gift for verse. This is why Mr. J. E. Patterson's "The Lure of the Sea" is remarkable. It is informed with the knowledge won by years of actual experience of sea life in all parts of the world. And this knowledge flashes out in little touches of life that none but a sailor could use. Here is a fine character sketch:

"The host—

A man of lumbering middle, big of voice
And oath, his face a dipping sun, and limbs
Like toughened spars—had spent the most of life
"Twixt heaven and changing seas; whereof he told,
At times, such tales as few believed."

No landsman could have done that. The fact that the man is a character in a classic poem in which Pluto figures in a villainous rôle, does not detract from the merits of the work. Mr. Patterson says in his preface that during a spell of vagabondage along the coasts of Greece, he fell asleep one afternoon on the shore, and dreamt that some ancient pirates beached their galley on the spot, and offered up a sacrifice. Out of this dream he has made a strange tale of sailor life in the Ægean two thousand years ago. The pirates pass by an altar to Pluto, and mock at the idea of worshipping a god with no power at sea. Unfortunately, Pluto hears them, and, disguised as a seaman, joins the crew, and tries to wreck the galley. He induces some mermaids to tempt the pirates to ruin, but the men are so drunk that they do not hear the weird songs of the sea-sprites. Then a tempest rises, and though the sirens sing on, the pirates are too hard at work to listen to them. But when the wind lulls, and the men are resting after their toil, a mermaid sings them to sleep, while Pluto steers the galley on to the rocks.

Into this wild, curious and original fairy tale, Mr. Patterson pours much of the living and actual romance of seafaring life. Sometimes we get a jolly chanty, from the boatswain of the pirates' galley, about a voyage to Britain where he saw a mermaid and was wrecked. It is this chanty that brings about the final disaster, for the boatswain's yarn was not founded on fact, and, as every sailor knows, a man who falsely boasts of having heard a mermaid sing, hears one the next time he goes to sea, and dies. At other times we have a chorus of a classic sort, such as that beginning:

"God of yonder rolling seas,
(Swing the offering altar-high!)
God of calm and full-sail breeze, Hear thy seamen cry."

* "The Lure of the Sea." By J. E. Patterson. 5s net. (Heinemann.)

Quite in another vein is the grim modern ballad of the "Ocean Kite," that occurs among the shorter verses at the end of the volume :

"Royals in and staysails fast,
Up she stood like fair renown!
Bows into it, on she passed,
Making tracks for Hoogli's town.
Sixteen knots an hour—her proud fleet's prouder flower—
A-running of her casting down."

At the price of two men's lives, the skipper made Calcutta with two days to spare. We want more ballads of sea life from Mr. Patterson. E. W.

HOMES OF GREAT LONDONERS.*

It would easily be possible to make a book of this kind very doleful, and the writers are not far to seek who would have moralized us out of patience. On the one hand we would be invited to consider how these famous houses in too many instances decline on evil days, whereas the moralizer would have pointed out to us that where the genius has all too often been neglected it is hardly decent to regard his habitation. We are prone to look upon that side of literary people which has no concern with literature; we may not have perused the novels of Miss Blank, but we are glad to read the morbid chronicler who tells us that she lives in Essex and is honorary captain of a fire-brigade. We may be so far interested in the lady, after learning of her ways and her accomplishments, that we proceed to take up one of her romances. This is certainly a step to recommend, for we shall either put her and her works behind us evermore, we shall resist the further blandishments of chroniclers who yearn to tell us what the damsel most affects in motor-cars, in marmalades and men; or we shall find that, after all, her books delight us, and we shall be anxious to learn more of her who wrote them. Mr. Adcock does not deal with writers of to-day, he deals with writers and with artists who are living and who, many of them, will continue to survive so long as England lives. Of course they were but seldom prosperous, as ironmasters would define prosperity, and yet it does not follow that their earthly dwelling was not such as they preferred. In any case the spirit of the dweller and the spirit of the place will have had their communion with each other—and in speaking of such sensitive inhabitants one may put stress on that phenomenon—the house will help us to our understanding of the man. In Mr. Adcock's treatment of the subject there is something very human. Those whom he celebrates are people who inhabited, happily or otherwise, their London houses, but were by no means indifferent to their surroundings. And the point of view is not that of the labourer who shouted to his mate a strong opinion as to Carlyle's sanity when he beheld the old man at his door behaving in a certain way to an Italian organ-grinder. It is good to have these glorious men and women thus described as householders and lodgers; who can tell when all these houses which remain with us will be taken to the other side of the Atlantic? We are not the kind of people—I need scarcely say—who read such books as this because we merely want to pry into the great man's privacy, as I have shown above we are philosophers, the subject being a more difficult, a more momentous sartor resartus. Yet there is a good deal to be said for those who have no higher purpose than to read a book of anecdotes. The illustrations are not so idealised, so fitted out with scrolls and flourishes as has become the habit of some architectural artists. It appears to me that Mr. Frederick Adcock has adhered as closely to the truth as has his brother, when he might have followed certain bad, though picturesque, examples, whose appropriateness one would never call in question if it were to illustrate a "Two to Nowhere," or some other of this writer's fairy volumes. Those who live away from London will especially appreciate these clever pictures, which convey the truth and nothing but the truth. No doubt that can be said of most of the exhibits in the architectural room of the Academy, but they do not attract, and certainly these illustrations do. As we read this present book, whose information is so curious and so charming, we shall take more pride in London. The Americans, of course, will be encountered in the motor chais-à-bancs, with one eye on this book, another on the famous houses.

From "Famous Houses and Literary Shrines of London" (Dent)

HENRY BAERLEIN.

LADY SHELLEY'S DIARY.*

"The Diary of Lady Shelley," which has just been issued under the able editorship of her grandson, Mr. Richard Edgcumbe, is a book to be thankful for. It is entirely unpretentious, but the personal charm of the author is reflected throughout the volume, not a page of which the most hardened person in the art of skipping would wish to leave unread. The book, which is edited and annotated with admirable discretion, contains a short autobiography of Lady Shelley's earlier years, and carries the diary down to March, 1817; but we hope, from what Mr. Edgcumbe says in his preface, that he may be encouraged to give us further portions of his grandmother's diary. The varied nature of its contents may be gathered from some of the editor's remarks :

"We are brought quite naturally into the intimate society of the Empress Marie Louise, the Countess of Albany, Metternich, Canova, Byron, Sir Walter Scott, Brougham, and many others well known to fame. In these pages the facile pen of a brilliant woman inspired by unquenchable enthusiasm has given us a fresh and faithful picture of Society in the reign of George III."

Frances Lady Shelley, the only daughter and heiress of Thomas Winckley, of Preston, a wealthy Lancashire landowner, was born in 1787, and survived until 1870. She was only six years old when she lost her father, and long before his death he had become disgusted with the factories that were rising in the neighbourhood of Preston. "Proud Preston," as it was called, because it was the winter residence of the nobility and the county families. An anecdote illustrating his grand sense of dignity is quoted by his daughter. One morning on going to the fishmonger as usual to select his fish for dinner, he found himself forestalled in the purchase of the finest turbot by a Mr. Horrocks, a cotton-spinner. Mr. Winckley thereupon pronounced Preston no longer a fit place for the residence of a gentleman, and in a towering passion he left his old house never again to return. Mrs. Thomas Winckley was a beautiful but rather worldly woman, who had made a previous marriage. She was in turns impetuously devoted to, or singularly neglectful of, her child; she was fond of dress, cards and other pleasures, and after Mr. Winckley's death she married again.

* "Famous Houses and Literary Shrines of London." By A. St. John Adcock. With 72 Illustrations by Frederick Adcock. 7s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

* "The Diary of Frances Lady Shelley, 1787-1817." Edited by her Grandson, Richard Edgcumbe. 10s. 6d. net. (John Murray.)

Frances Winckley grew up a very beautiful and high-spirited girl, and her natural gifts, no less than her fortune, attracted many prétendants. She confesses to coquetting a good deal, and she even went so far as to accept the hand of a middle-aged widower; but no sooner had she consented to be his wife than she repented, and gave him his congé, which he received with such fury that made her realize she had had a most providential escape.

Matchmakers, however, were busy on her account, and they had determined to marry her off to Sir John Shelley, a fascinating rake, a votary of the Turi and card-table, and seventeen years her senior, whom she describes at her first meeting as "a distinguished-looking young man, with powder covering a rather bald head of hair." He was sixth baronet of the senior creation, and of course only distantly related to the poet, who does not appear in Lady Shelley's story in the present volume. At first there seemed little likelihood of anything coming of the affair, for Sir John did not show much interest in the girl, and she, like a well brought up young person, declared that "it was not possible for me to confess an attachment to a man who had not proposed to marry me. I would not allow myself to feel any deep affection for one who, after all, might only be amusing himself at my expense." Moreover, her half-brother, who acted as her guardian, so far from favouring the suit, on account of the baronet's reputation refused to visit him or ask him to his house. But all these difficulties were at length surmounted, and Frances Winckley became Lady Shelley at the age of twenty. She refers to Sir John as her warm-hearted husband, and gives several instances of his generosity; but she is also frank in describing his peccadillos. It speaks much for her innate goodness of heart when we learn that she succeeded in managing this wild creature, to whom she was so much devoted; her task, however, could hardly have been a sinecure. Many weary nights she passed in waiting for his return while he was squandering his money at the whist-table, where sometimes he contrived to lose thousands at a sitting and often prolonged his play until daylight.

The most interesting portion of "Lady Shelley's Diary" is probably that which describes her friendship with the Duke of Wellington. He was far from insensible to the charm of a pretty woman, and he paid her marked attention from the first. Her admiration for the Duke was very sincere, and, as Mr. Edgumbe says, her portrait of him "in 1815, as he appeared in private life, is an especially valuable contribution to our knowledge of that great man, of whom in his private capacity so little has been written."

Lady Shelley first met the Duke in 1814, after his return from Spain, when he was being fêted and dined everywhere; she describes his manner as formal, and at a first introduction very imposing. But none of his victories and honours had succeeded in turning his brain, and "he retained," she adds, "that simplicity of character and manner which is still his distinguishing excellence." Immediately after the battle of Waterloo the Shelleys visited France, where they renewed their acquaintance with the Duke of Wellington in Paris. On their arrival Sir John went at once to call on the Duke, and within half an hour he returned to call on Lady Shelley, who in describing the meeting says:

"Even in those days Wellington, in London, was treated almost as a sovereign prince. His conversations conferred distinction, his wish was law. And yet what were his former triumphs by comparison with Waterloo? Here was a man, in the very midst of his camp, only a fortnight after that battle, walking unattended from his palace to call upon me the moment that he heard of my arrival in Paris! Wellington entered the room looking as simple and unobtrusive as usual. I must admit that my enthusiasm for this great soldier was so great that I could not utter one word; and it was with the greatest difficulty that I restrained my tears."

Lady Shelley saw a good deal of the Duke, and even rode his famous charger "Copenhagen." She has preserved many of Wellington's sayings, but space will not allow me to quote more than the following examples: In speaking of the losses at Waterloo the Duke said, "I hope to God that I have fought my last battle. It is a bad thing to be always fighting. While in the thick of it I am too much occupied to feel anything; but it is wretched just after. It is quite impossible to think of glory. Both mind and feelings are exhausted. I am wretched even at the moment of victory, and I always say that next to a battle lost the greatest misery is a battle gained."

Wellington, like Napoleon, believed that he was specially protected by Providence, but he also said "It is experience that gives me the advantage over every other officer. Nothing new can happen to me, and I always feel confident that I shall succeed. The troops feel the same confidence in me. For that reason I firmly believe that if anything had happened to me at Waterloo the battle was lost." Wellington related that, just before Waterloo, he was making the above observation to Lord Uxbridge, who soon after was hit by a ball. The Duke added: "It must have passed over me, or my horse. But the finger of God was upon me!"

ROGER INGPEN.

Novel Notes.

THE LITTLE BLUE DEVIL. By Dorothea Mackellar and Ruth Bedford. 6s. (Alston Rivers)

Tony, the "little Blue Devil," so named from one of Kipling's delightful ballads, is a much more credible creation than Antome-Hugues-Phillipe-Stc.-Croix, Lord Trent, facing death in the Australian desert so that his cousin Pamela, as yet an unknown quantity to him, may enjoy the title and estates that rightly belong to him. Motherless, and the outcast son of an original ruffian of a father who leaves him to shift for himself in Paris when he is but ten years old, he becomes by turns cabin-boy on a French fruit-boat, boots at a hotel in Cairo, victim of the Legree-like manager of a New Zealand sheep station, cattle-drover in Australia, tramp, sailor, taxi-driver, engineer, and what-not in various parts of the globe; and we follow his adventures with the interest that attaches to all stories of unconventional vagabondage, especially as they are described with a knowledge of the world and of men and women. His struggles against the odds are depicted with vigour and humour: the born fighter develops before our eyes. When he comes under the influence of Allison, the sweet-natured child-wife of a Philadelphia professor of Greek, we touch with him the shores of old romance. We admire him also during his brief "fling" in London, to which he devotes his hard-won savings. But when he learns by chance of his real identity and runs away into the unknown again, and Pamela, in a sense, follows suit, the many arms of coincidence are stretched like nothing so much as the trade routes on a commercial map of the world. After Pamela has gone through adventures in California as painful in their way as her cousin's in New Zealand, the two meet again unexpectedly in Brisbane, and all ends happily. The style of the book is original and the humour is both mordant and kindly; and no one who takes it up is likely to put it aside unfinished.

A CANDIDATE FOR TRUTH. By J. D. Beresford. 6s. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

Any serious reader of fiction when he closes this book will watch with keen interest for Mr. Beresford's next novel. Mr. Beresford can invent a story interesting throughout, though never exciting or sensational, the plot in fact being always subordinate to the character development of the dramatis personæ. His style has distinction, to which his ironic (though never bitter) humour gives an agreeable flavour. He appears to understand and to have a certain liking for all his characters. The reader will admit that he is suprisingly broad-minded, though he has a few obvious prejudices. Only once has he any bitterness which he seems to share with his hero, Jacob Stahl, against his successful elder brother Eni, in every other instance he makes out some sort of a case for the actions and motives of his characters. In these days when most people are content with a small achievement Mr. Beresford is to be congratulated because he has not feared to attempt something big and because success has crowned his attempt. "A Candidate for Truth," is Vol. II. of a Trilogy of which Vol. I. "The Early History" of Jacob Stahl was published last year. But Vol. II. ends at the beginning of a new era in Jacob's life, and we are led to hope that after much tribulation, Vol. III. will show that he has at length found himself. "A Candidate for Truth" is complete in itself but most readers will want to learn the early history of Jacob. "The Early History" seems to us on the whole the better book of the two, though it contains nothing equal to the sketch of Cecil Barker. Biographies would be much more interesting and life-like if Mr. Beresford's method was adopted by which his hero is shown moving about and living in an actual world, not standing alone on a solitary pedestal; yet (as befits a biography) the hero is always the chief person, the other characters are always fittingly subordinate. Cecil Barker is the most original character in the present volume, and at the same time very true to life. He is in reality an entirely stupid person, having no real power in any direction, he cannot organise, is a poor preacher and makes no pretence to be a thinker or a theologian, yet by his personal magnetism he attracts all sorts of people and makes even clever, good people believe in him absolutely. It is only by actual close contact that those who admire him discover that his self-sacrifice and heroism are merely the manifestation of a relentless and cruel egotism. We should like very much to say something about every character in this book, who have become to us like familiar friends, but space forbids. In conclusion we would advise every one not only to read this volume, but to give it an honoured place on their shelves.

THE GREY TERRACE. By Mrs. Fred Reynolds. 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)

The central figure in Mrs. Reynolds' latest story, which is the best and most convincing she has ever written, is a young doctor, Keith Trent, who goes down to Cornwall to take the place of a friend who is ill. He promptly falls in love with Maisie, who, with her Aunt Charlotte, is staying in the neighbourhood. At a picnic Maisie declares that she could never speak to a man who had killed another. It had happened that just before leaving London Trent saved a woman from a madman's murderous attack. The assailant died, and the young man's conscience was not easy, notwithstanding the assurance of a colleague, Dr. Jeanne Meynell, that death was due to epilepsy. The woman also goes to Cornwall, and sets out to blackmail Trent, who tells Maisie the whole sordid story, and is repulsed. How she learns the true worth of her lover is revealed in later chapters of the book, which is one we can unreservedly recommend. It is a clever story, and the characters are drawn ably and with genuine feeling. Dr. Jeanne is a particularly interesting study, a wholly lovable woman, in the view even of the Rev. Peter, who once regarded her as a "female doctor."

THE HOUSE OF ROBERSHAYE. By Emma Brooke. 6s. (Smith, Elder.)

"There came into a village in the North Country a man who had a picture in his mind," said Robert Robershaye, "just as I suppose artists have a picture in their minds before they begin to paint. His eyes saw the coal mines under the hills, and in them the fires for his boiler houses; he saw in the quarries the walls of his big factories, and in the valley where the brooks ran, and over the hills where the carriers muddled along with their strings of horses in bridle paths and through rough lanes, he saw streets and roads and houses filled by his operatives. Look at an artist now! He stops at canvas and colours. Our grandfather used the valleys and the hills for his picture, he conquered space and made it a road for water, called labourers and operatives round him, and turned the scattered hamlet into a swarming village. Out of his energy he became their provider and ruled them as no king nowadays can rule his subjects." Thus spoke Robert Robershaye of the founder of his house. But Ambrose said: "The aim of all this splendid industrial activity was and is no more than the winning of profits for the House of Robershaye. Our fortune was not raised without the sacrifice and maiming of human lives. Cotton spinning was founded and pursued in horrors until Government interference was necessary. Yet the spinning of cotton is really a wonderful thing. I would ask nothing better than to be director of such an industry, with an object really no less than the wide spreading of well-being. But at present the direct consequence of heaping and gathering for oneself is an industrial war of the few, it may be the single man, against the many." Robert and Ambrose were the heirs of Robershaye, and they were divided in their aims. Robert wished to adopt those methods of American millionaires and financiers that were to Ambrose criminal methods of heaping money. Ambrose loved "the strong confident aspiration, 'If we labour in Thy works with the sweat of our brows, Thou wilt make us partakers of Thy Vision and Thy Sabbath.'" Ambrose wins the victory through his death, and this is essential to the idea in the story; while Robert's mind is struck by conviction, as in "The Ring and the Book" the Pope declared Guido Franceschini might be struck by a suddenness of fate; Guido might "see, one instant, and be saved," the truth being flashed out by one blow. This is not the strongest in handling of her books, but perhaps that is because Miss Brooke has chosen to work upon a theme demanding rather the incisiveness of a man's touch than the less robust brushwork of the woman artist. It is unnecessary to say that the book is one to be read with pleasure, because it is well written. It is a book that must stand out also, because it is informed by a fine moral purpose.

THE GOOD GIRL. By Vincent O'Sullivan 6s. (Constable.)

This is a strong and exasperatingly unpleasant story. Paul Vendred, the only son of a Jansenist Catholic mother and a pleasure-loving father, is left on a threshold of manhood with money, a Cambridge education, and the instincts of a gentleman to face the world. Romantic and weak in will, Vendred falls in love with a face at a concert. He hears the lady sing, finds out she is a Mrs. Dover, and in due time makes her acquaintance. Henceforth, Paul Vendred is the victim of Mrs. Dover's charm, and his property is the prey of Mrs. Dover's husband—a swindler, a liar, a blackguardly adventurer—a man as utterly base as his wife is utterly mercenary, easy going, and pitiless. Between them Vendred hasn't a chance. Do what he will, he cannot keep away from Mrs. Dover, and he marries Dover's daughter by an earlier wife rather than be shut out from the stepmother's society. The marriage, of course, was altogether unsuitable, but it turns out better than might have been expected, for Louise loves Paul, and he too, a kindly man, grows fond of her. But in a black moment, Mrs. Dover again overpowers him, and Vendred falls as he had never fallen before. Louise rushes off—not to be found till she is dead in a Paris hospital. Dover is last heard of in South America, and Mrs. Dover, married to a Signor Beleredi, is singing in an operatic company in Milan, when, for the last time, Vendred, living on very restricted means near Siena, meets her. It is all a very sombre, sordid study of certain temperaments, and why it is called "The Good Girl" we cannot imagine.

DENHAM'S. By Alexandra Watson. 6s. (Smith, Elder.)

The story of a boy's experience at a crammer's school near Geneva. When a would-be reader is told that it contains an accident and the death of a boy, he or she may draw back. Matters of this kind become sentimental on the least provocation, in a school-story. Even Paul Dombey palls upon many just men in the company of Dickens' admirers. But Miss Watson has written a vital, fresh study of school-life. The boy who was born to be a painter and was pushed towards the Army by his stupid mother, the girl who dreaded growing up because it meant long skirts, Price the master, and even the German mistress of the establishment, are a delightful company. Miss Watson has mixed fun and seriousness, and her reward of Bella in the end is a pretty touch. The sub-title, "A Web of Life," is rather heavy for the plot, but it is almost justified by the last few chapters, which follow Ronald after he has left school, and round off the story of the principal characters. There is thought in the book, to the verge of sentimentousness now and then. Still, the irrepressible spirits of the boys break through, and the total impression is thoroughly healthy.

THE DAMSEL DARK. By Clara Turnbull 6s. (Melrose.)

This clever romance is, we understand, a first novel by a new writer, and narrowly escaped winning first place in Mr. Melrose's recent prize novel competition. Set in the troublous times of Stephen the Usurper, when Christ and his saints were said to be asleep, the story is told by Robin, the Red Earl's fool; and Robin tells his tale with wit and cunning, with sparkling philosophy and rare powers of lyrical expression. All unwilling, the Fool is despatched on his good mule Ogier with a contemptuous message from the Red Earl to his niece, the Lady of Tournoir, with whose fair name that lying wench Rumour has long been busy. "The Damsel Dark! why, she is feared afar, hath, 'tis said, a man's strength, a woman's cunning, and a witch's unholy power." Captivated by the charm of this mysterious sorceress, Robin enters her service, there to learn that his lady is no black witch, but the mirror of chivalry, the enlightened champion of the poor and oppressed, knight of knights, yet woman always with a woman's strength and a woman's weakness. The book is crammed with the joy of adventure; it glows with warmth and colour, and places the author at once among the ranks of those born story-tellers who have but to speak and the great story-loving public is at their feet in a moment.

OH! MY UNCLE: Being some Fun with an Undercurrent. By W. Teignmouth Shore. 3s. 6d. net. (Stephen Swift.)

The farcical in fiction is by no means so common that no one on the look-out for diversion should miss so excellent a manifestation of it as is given in Mr. W. Teignmouth Shore's new story. Those matter-of-fact folk who have neither the capacity nor the wish to "see a joke" may perhaps be warned at once to pass on to the next book, for they will find little to approve in "Oh! my Uncle," but all who can delight in fun, who can appreciate a kind of nonsensical drollery (with an undercurrent), who can enjoy a kind of ebullient good spirits enclosed within a book-cover, may be recommended to get hold of the volume, retire to a comfortable chair or a shady nook, and give themselves up to the author's guidance. They will be taken to the Bloomsbury lodgings, and to the well-equipped home of Uncle Daddy, and occasionally into Kensington Gardens or farther afield to Epping and elsewhere, but always they will be in cheerful, light-hearted and fanciful company. The story—for those who want "plot" and action—may be of the thinnest, but the people, Uncle Daddy, the prosperous professor of an unique profession, the imaginative (but a trifle too childish) Lucy, and the nephew Freddie-Fred are engagingly fresh and pleasant company, and their talk and doings are full of fun, while an appeal to the serious side of the reader is to be found in the satiric "undercurrent," which touches upon success and how it is brought about. It may be said that no imitation of Uncle Daddy's methods should be necessary to ensure the success of this book.

THE PRINCE AND BETTY. By P. G. Wodehouse. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

In "The Prince and Betty," Mr. P. G. Wodehouse has followed up the jolly success of "Love Among the Chickens" and "A Gentleman of Leisure." The book certainly makes as attractive a piece of light reading as we have come across for a long time, and from the delightful telegram of pages 3 and 4 to the last line its pleasantness and high spirits never fail. An enterprising financier is struck with the possibilities of Mervo, a tiny island in the Mediterranean. He determines to establish a casino on a palatial scale on that unspoiled spot, and his attempt to invest it with the air of romance that his advertising genius tells him is a necessity induces him to force John Maude upon the republican Mervians as their prince. The experiment succeeds for a time, and then Betty and other complications enter upon the scene. The reader may trust Mr. Wodehouse to see his hero the Prince safely out of the dilemma in which he is placed, and it is unnecessary for us to tell more of the plot. The book is written with all the clan of Mr. Wodehouse in his best mood, and even the grumpiest reader cannot fail to be amused by it. It is exactly the book for summer weather.

GEORGE WENDERN GAVE A PARTY. By John Inglis. 6s. (Blackwood.)

It is inevitable that the title of Mr. John Inglis's story should suggest that "barty" of Hans Breitmann's, which has become a household name, and to some readers the title, possibly by mere association of ideas, will also appear to promise a farcical or at least a humorous story. That Mr. Inglis is possessed of some measure of humour is certain, but his story is mainly a romance of deep love and high finance. A dishonest financial transaction forms the appropriately-shady background. A young Australian of means has been induced by a friend of old times of struggle to put a large sum into a certain Syndicate of a speciously attractive but highly speculative nature. This young Australian, George Wendern, lives in a handsome Kensington house, presided over by a lady housekeeper. He is neighboured by and falls in love with a charming young wealthy American. This happens just when a crisis in the Syndicate's affairs is approaching, and when a law case in Australia is down for trial a case the successful outcome of which would mean two hundred thousand pounds in Wendern's favour. The fair American thinks it her duty to accept the offer of an impoverished peer that her money may be of most use in maintaining some of the glories of English tradition. Poor Wendern receives his refusal just as the double crisis in his financial affairs is approaching, and everything combines to indicate a tragic close to the supper party which he had devised as a surprise to his creditors and those whom he chose to regard as such. Fate, of course, steps in conveniently to give an appropriately happy ending. It is a well told, strongly human story, with incidental light on company making which may serve to put some readers on their guard.

The Bookman's Table.

BY THE WAY: VERSES, FRAGMENTS AND NOTES. By William Allingham. Arranged by Helen Allingham. 5s. net. (Longmans.)

One has no right to judge the verses and fragments that are gathered up in these pages—they are not offered as anything more than rough jottings selected from the poet's note-book—the first draft of a poem, a passing fancy, the germ of a lyric, a scrap of scenic description scribbled down in a careless stanza, a couplet, or a dozen tentative lines, and they are interesting only to those who are interested in William Allingham. But among the prose notes that take up more than half the book are many shrewd opinions on social, political and religious problems, and some quaint bits of literary criticism. Allingham thought Meredith clever, tedious and unreal; Stevenson too elaborate and self-conscious; Whitman, he says, "treats his guests with heaps of uncooked viands; instead of a feast he offers them a larder;" and he thought Fitzgerald's "Omar" not worth thinking twice about—it is "commonplace beyond expression." He was a man of discriminating taste, but had his enthusiasms—chief among them being a fine enthusiasm for Carlyle. Right, or mistaken, their individual outlook, their freshness and downright candour, give his criticisms a savour of their own and a real value.

BEHIND THE NIGHTLIGHT. The By-World of a Child of Three. Described by Joan Maude, and faithfully recorded by Nancy Price. 2s. 6d. net. (John Murray)

This is a charmingly quaint little book about the weird and wonderful things that live in that mysterious land that lies on the other side of the nightlight. The land and its inhabitants have been discovered by a remarkable little girl of three—Miss Joan Maude, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Maude, the well-known actors. There are vivid and concise descriptions of those inhabitants, their habits and peculiarities, and they all have ludicrously appropriate names. Mrs. Maude (Miss Nancy Price) tells us in her preface that she has merely acted as the small author's amanuensis, and has put down everything as nearly as possible in the language of the original. Each animal or elf, she assures us, is entirely the invention of the child's brain, "without suggestion of any kind other than her own imagination." The very young author begins by informing us of the unconventional way in which she made the acquaintance of the Hibbertoo. "He was sitting on the little red stool between me and the nightlight, and when I saw him and he saw me we both laughed, and he said 'Hallo!' and I said 'I am pleased you have come.' There had been no party that day—only medicine—and there was nobody in the room except the black fany who lives on the other side of the nightlight. When we had done laughing—there were all the other people." Then she proceeds to describe in order the most fantastic and astonishing creatures imaginable. The Kiddikee "has yellow silk fur and nineteen legs. He has one ear on one of his legs and one ear on his tail. . . . His teeth are quite green and both his eyes are red. He lives underneath the flower-pot with one caterpillar and two snails, and he always has breakfast in bed on Monday." The majority of these creatures collect various objects. Kiddikee, for instance, specialises in shoes, and the Fritchett or Kickmas collects string, corkscrews, elastic and india-rubber. The Gott family "is very interesting and very large." They collect relations and live under the ground. "That's why the flowers come up so quick, for they and the Gott family terrible nasty to live with, and they get away from them as soon as ever they can." Bomblemass is an unfortunate animal that has to tie his legs on with black silk ribbon. He lives in the piece-bag, and is the only one that never grows teeth. Jonket derives his name from his singular manner of coughing. "He collects coughs in a paper bag, but as soon as he's got enough for a new jonk he gets over excited and pops the bag. Then Bomblemass laughs till his legs get loose, and he has to stop to tie them up." These are only a few samples of the many entertaining animals and oddities that go to make this spontaneous and queerly imaginative little volume one of the most original and most amusing nonsense books ever written.

THE REAL CAPTAIN CLEVELAND. By Allan Fea. 8s. 6d. net. (Martin Secker.)

In "The Real Captain Cleveland," Mr. Allan Fea gives some interesting new particulars of the infamous Captain Gow, who, executed in 1725 for piracy and murder on the high seas, was the subject of one of Defoe's many brochures dealing with crime and villainy, and the original of the Captain Cleveland who figures as the repentant villain in Sir Walter Scott's well-known romance. Apparently, Mr.

Fea belongs to the family of Gow's captor, Mr. James Fea, of Clestrain, and it is to the author's credit that he makes no attempt to palliate the rather shabby and underhand devices whereby his forbear managed to secure, and so to bring to the gallows, his old school-mate. Fortunately for the good fame of James Fea, the scoundrel he succeeded in capturing is revealed as the kind of treacherous and bloody-minded desperado on whom chivalry would have been completely wasted, though we cannot but remember that Clestrain, judged by his very cautious and temperate devotion to the cause of Prince Charlie, seems to have been one of those Highlanders whose notions of loyalty were quite sufficiently canny. Mr. Allan Fea can scarcely be expected to write this kind of narrative with the gusto and literary taste that Mr. John Maschfield always brings to such a task. But he might avoid such slipshod English as "Captain Singleton was never the reckless and murderous ruffian as Gow turned out to be," and "Another youth . . . met two men . . . in a public house . . . and persuaded him to go with them." In this latter sentence Mr. Fea means "and they persuaded him to go with them."

VAGROM MEN. By Alfred F. Story. 2s. 6d. net. (Duckworth.)

STUDIES IN ARCADY. By R. L. Gales. Second Series. 5s. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

Mr. Alfred Story's sketches of "Vagrom Men" have a delicate, indefinable charm, and are written with a thoughtfulness and quiet grace of style that make them worthy of their place in a series that includes "The Roadmender." One could as easily describe the fragrance of flowers as give any adequate impression of such sketches within the scope of this review. There is nothing in them if you attempt a synopsis, we might summarise the little incidents that make up the stories of "The Almshouse," "The Puppet Show," "The Old Schoolmaster," "The Herb Gatherer," but this would give you no sufficient idea of them, for it is the mood, the manner, the atmosphere of them that matter more than all and you can only have these things by reading the book for yourself and surrendering to its subtle spell. It is a restful little book full of delightfully sympathetic pictures of old-world country life and country people, and charged with the kindly humour and homely pathos of life as it is lived by lowly men and women. We have read its ten chapters with the keenest enjoyment of their gentle philosophy and the sensitive literary art with which they are written. Mr. Gales writes also of the country life and rural folk in his "Studies in Arcady," but he does not touch his scenes and characters with the same magic of poetry; he writes in a more practical vein and less of the light of fancy and imagination plays about his work. He writes realistically, and out of a fulness of knowledge; moreover, he is didactic and has strong opinions on the problems of village life and the social questions of the hour. These he discusses with a force and shrewdness that are eminently suggestive, and whether you agree with him or not he always interests you. There are some admirable dissertations on Folk-lore and Tradition; and on Speech and Language; and in a fourth section of his book a very entertaining collection of essays on a very wide variety of topics.

PIERS PLOWMAN. A Comparison with some earlier and contemporary French allegories. By Dorothy L. Owen. 5s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton for the University of London Press.)

Dorothy L. Owen's comparison of Langland's "Piers Plowman," with some earlier and contemporary French allegories, is a volume scarcely suited to the requirements of the average reader. The man, for instance, who is making his first acquaintance with the "Vision" in the suggestive but necessarily truncated version of the poem which Mr. Arthur Burrell has recently edited for "Everyman's Library," will be apt to find Miss Owen's erudition and exact scholarship a long way beyond his need. And—experts apart—we may say that it is only those who have dipped into Professor Skeat's Clarendon Press edition or have some knowledge of M. Jusserand's "Observations," and other contributions to the literature of the subject, who are in a position to appreciate the learning and the discrimination that have gone to the making of this latest study of the earliest English "Tract for the Times"—a study, the only fault of which, if fault it be, is a certain something lacking on the interpretative or æsthetic side. The earlier and contemporary French allegories which Miss Owen examines in this, her thesis approved for the London University's degree of Master of Arts, are "Li Romans de Carité," by Barthélemy, Renclus de Moliens (1180-90); "Le Songe d'Enfer," by Raoul de Houdenc (1214); "Le Tournement de l'Antecrist," by Huon de Méry (1235); "La Voie de Paradis," by Rutebeuf (1270-1285); along with the famous "Le Roman de la Rose," which influenced Langland's greater contemporary, Chaucer; De Guileville's "Le Pèlerinage de Vie Humaine" (1330-1355), and two anonymous and undateable short poems, "Salut d'Enfer" and "De Dame Guile," which may have been composed about the same time as Rutebeuf's works. Miss Owen says that, though she has searched the catalogues of many of the monastic libraries, she can find no external evidence that any of these allegories with, of course, the exception of the "Roman de la Rose," was known in England at the time when "Piers Plowman" was composed, and so, after a detailed examination of the purpose of Langland's work as compared with that of the French allegories, of the dream-setting of the various poems, of personification as employed in them, of the use of such commonplaces of allegorical action as the Quest, Jousting and Warfare, and of the exploitation of such allegorical devices and apparatus as the spiritual armour, dwellings, clothing, steeds, "ladder," food, medicaments, cleansing, documents, sermons, church vestments, magic mirror and tree of charity, she comes to this general and rather lame and impotent conclusion—that there was a common stock of allegorical material of which the writer (or writers) of "Piers Plowman" made use, that part of this material was probably supplied to French and English poets independently by the Scriptural and theological commentaries studied at the time, that Langland probably was acquainted with both the "Roman de la Rose" and the "Tournement de l'Antecrist," and possibly with De Guileville's "Pèlerinage de Vie Humaine," and that "Piers Plowman" differs mainly from kindred French poems in revealing in its author a definite and strongly marked personality, and in alone making use of allegory to record this author's mental and spiritual experiences.

PLAYS AND POEMS. By Oliver Goldsmith. Selected with an Introduction by Thomas Seccombe 2s 6d. net. Red Letter Library (Blackie).

Among all the series of reprints, newer and older, we still retain a special liking for the "Red Letter Library." We like the handy pocket size of it; its artistic format; its clear print and good paper, and the pleasant feel of its soft leather binding. The latest addition to its list includes the two delightful comedies of Goldsmith and the rich handful of his poems that will probably outlast "The Vicar," his charming essays, and everything else he has written. Mr. Seccombe's introduction is scholarly in the best way; he is one of the soundest of critics, and writes from a fulness of knowledge, but he has a lightness of touch, an ease and pleasant clarity of style that add to the value of what he has to say, because they make interesting and attractive reading of it. Almost anybody can acquire information, but there is an art in imparting it that is denied to some of the most studious, and this art is Mr. Seccombe's in a particular degree. He gives you here in some thirty pages a concise biography of Goldsmith, a vivid character sketch of the man, an account of his work, and a just and discriminating criticism of the plays and poems included in this volume. It is an ideal preface for a book in such a series; helpful, suggestive and answering the needs of the student no less than of the general reader.

Notes on New Books.

MR. JOHN LANE.

In Portugal, by Aubrey F. G. Bell (7s 6d. net), is a book full of information pleasantly given. It is not exactly picturesque written, but it tells of picturesque facts and scenes, and shows us a hundred things we could never have gleaned from a guide-book. It tells us of the people, their characteristics, the differences between the Portuguese and the Spanish traits—the differences which are, as the author says, eternal. "The thoughtful humaneness of the Portuguese is poles apart from the noble rashness and imprudence of the Spaniard; the Spaniard's restless discontent is replaced in Portugal by what might almost be called a contented melancholy, a 'humorous sadness.' . . . The Portuguese have a quiet dignity, but personalities are less aggressively emphasized than in Spain; they are vain, but they have not the irascible, susceptible pride of the Spaniard; theirs is a more placid variety." Then the chapters, dealing with city, village, country, show us the beauty and brilliance of the sunshine, the heat, the cool depths of shade. And among the distinct charms of the volume is that of the verses and songs, freely rendered into English. It is a collection of varied information gathered by an open-eyed, open-minded writer.

MESSRS. HURST & BLACKETT.

Mr. Lloyd Williams understands that successful melodrama depends to a great extent upon its villain, and in the figure of Lord Sinthorpe, in his new novel, In Secret Places (6s.), he has given us one of the most complete and sinister scoundrels we can remember ever to have met. Until the strain of his behaviour, allied with constant overwork, begins to tell upon his brain, Lord Sinthorpe possesses few of the ordinary—and none at all of the gentler—attributes of humanity. Yet, somehow or other, most readers will find him distinctly an attractive creation. His schemings have a breadth and devilishness that are singularly likeable—in a novel. And, in addition to its villain, "In Secret Places" possesses quite a passable hero and a very pleasant heroine. Indeed, Mr. Lloyd Williams has written an exceptionally readable sensational story. The book is decidedly long, but even the most exacting of readers will admit that the author gives him plenty of incident for his money. He will find also that Mr. Williams has a sense of humour—a pleasant and unusual occurrence in fiction of this type.

MESSRS. GREENING & CO.

What we are pleased to call "the holiday season" has brought some most appropriate books with it, and one of the best is Mr. William Caine's Save Us From Our Friends (6s.). One seems naturally to use a food simile in describing its merits: it is light, it is pleasant, it is easily digested, it tempts the holiday appetite, it is piquant, yet simple and wholesome. It is in truth merely an account of a holiday at a little French seaside place, where a match-making young wife, very much in love with her own husband, tries to settle the matrimonial affairs of her friends, and drives them nearly crazy. The everyday reality of Mr. Caine's style is most entertaining; the dialogue, while being simply natural, is always brisk and amusing; and the cross-purposes at which the sextet play are life-like without being boring. With a good, easy, capable manner of writing, Mr. Caine has made a very slight theme serve him well. No kit-bag should be without it when the summer exodus takes place.

MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK.

Every beginner in the art of public speaking, if he be a man of sufficient sense to be sure he is not a genius, wishes for some trustworthy guide, or guide-book, to put him on the right lines. The guide-book that seems to us to deserve the beginner's attention and faith is The Art of The Orator, by Edgar R. Jones, with a Foreword by Mr. Lloyd George (3s. 6d. net.). Mr. Jones is firm on the points of accuracy of language and clearness of statement—an admirable standard. Only a week or so ago Dr. Butler, the Master of Trinity, was critically reviewing the oratory of the past, and suggesting that rhetoric itself was of the past. For nearly all practical purposes of to-day the assumption is true; until now even the word "oratorical" is largely suggestive of artificiality, and even insincerity. And when it comes to writing books of instruction on this decayed member of the famous group of mediæval "liberal arts," we ever come back to the difficulty enunciated by the author of "Hudibras:—

"For all a rhetorician's rules Teach only but to name his tools."

The chief merit of Mr. Jones's unpretentious manual is its keeping for the most part to broad general principles. When he comes to details he does not entirely escape the pitfall of confounding the rules regarding the written and the spoken word. In another sense, however, this widens the scope of his appeal, and his book is worthy of the closest study of young writers as well as speakers.

M. E. Braddon's Novels

THE "AUTHOR'S EDITION."

Crown 8vo, red cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. each.

"Miss Braddon's name is a household word, and no authoress has surpassed, if indeed they have ever attained, her enormous popularity. Nor is her vogue on the wane or likely to be while the British race preserves its present love for good enthralling fiction. The new 'Author's Edition' is very inexpensive, and is yet worthy a place in any library. Bound in red cloth with gilt tops, the paper and type are all that can be desired, whilst the volume is easy to handle, and neat and pleasing to the eye."—Gentleman.

1. LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET*
2. HENRY DUNBAR
3. ELEANOR'S VICTORY
4. AURORA FLOYD
5. JOHN MARCHMONT'S LEGACY
6. THE DOCTOR'S WIFE
7. ONLY A CLOD
8. SIR JASPER'S TENANT
9. TRAIL OF THE SERPENT
10. LADY'S MILE
11. LADY LISLE
12. CAPTAIN OF THE VULTURE
13. BIRDS OF PREY
14. CHARLOTTE'S INHERITANCE
15. RUPERT GODWIN
16. RUN TO EARTH
17. DEAD SEA FRUIT
18. RALPH THE BAILIFF
19. FENTON'S QUEST*
20. LOVELS OF ARDEN
21. ROBERT AINSLEIGH
22. TO THE BITTER END
23. MILLY DARELL
24. STRANGERS AND PILGRIMS
25. LUCIUS DAVOREN
26. TAKEN AT THE FLOOD
27. LOST FOR LOVE
28. A STRANGE WORLD
29. HOSTAGES TO FORTUNE*
30. DEAD MEN'S SHOES*
31. JOSHUA HAGGARD
32. WEAVERS AND WEFT
33. AN OPEN VERDICT
34. VIXEN*
35. THE CLOVEN FOOT
36. THE STORY OF BARBARA
37. JUST AS I AM*
38. ASPHODEL
39. MOUNT ROYAL
40. THE GOLDEN CALF*
41. PHANTOM FORTUNE*
42. FLOWER AND WEED
43. ISHMAEL
44. WYLLARD'S WEIRD
45. UNDER THE RED FLAG
46. ONE THING NEEDFUL
47. MOHAWKS
48. LIKE AND UNLIKE
49. THE FATAL THREE
50. THE DAY WILL COME*
51. ONE LIFE, ONE LOVE*
52. GERARD
53. THE VENETIANS
54. ALL ALONG THE RIVER
55. THOU ART THE MAN
56. SONS OF FIRE
57. ROUGH JUSTICE
58. THE CONFLICT*
59. THE INFIDEL
60. HIS DARLING SIN*
61. LONDON PRIDE
62. UNDER LOVE'S RULE

"No better proof of the continued popularity of Miss Braddon's stories can be found than in their constant re-issue. The publishers have done well to provide the public with a new edition, admirably printed, put forward in strong, well bound volumes, with gilt edges, at the moderate price of half a crown each."—Manchester Courier.

* The novels marked thus * can be obtained either in 6d. or 7d. Editions.

LONDON: SIMPKIN AND CO., LTD.

M. E. Braddon's Last New Novel THE GREEN CURTAIN

6/-

"Miss Braddon is more wonderful in these, her later years, than she ever was in her early ones. As a piece of atmosphere the book is Miss Braddon's best work. As a thrilling, moving story it ranks with the finest of these romances that head the page with 'Lady Audley's Secret,' and are now some seventy or eighty in number."—The Standard.

LONDON: HUTCHINSON AND CO.

CONSTABLE'S NEW BOOKS.

THE FOURTH GENERATION: Reminiscences

BY JANET ROSS

Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

These Reminiscences by the daughter of the great Egyptian traveller, Lady Duff Gordon, the author of "Three Generations of English women," will be one of the most important volumes of recollections that have been published for many years. It will contain numerous letters and recollections of (among others) George Meredith, J. A. Symonds, G. F. Watts, B. W. Kinglake, Hon. Mrs. Norton, Richard Doyle, Tom Taylor, Thackeray, Rogers, S. Hilaire, Sir A. H. Layard, Guizot, and will include reproductions of hitherto unpublished works by G. F. Watts, Lord Leighton, Valentine Prinsep, Hon. Mrs. Norton, and Richard Doyle.

LEE THE AMERICAN

(10/6 net)

GAMALIEL BRADFORD, JR.

"Mr. Bradford himself has left no stone unturned in his successful efforts to prove the transcendent merits of his hero, and differs from other enthusiastic admirers of Lee chiefly because he has been more painstaking than they in the collection of evidence wherewith to support his assertions. . . . Mr. Bradford's entertaining memoir is not a military biography of Lee, but a comprehensive attempt, made with notable success, to enable the reader to understand fully what manner of man was this truly greatest of American soldiers."—Westminster Gazette.

HISTORY OF LONDON

(10/6 net)

H. DOUGLAS IRVINE

"The book is written in a bright and fresh spirit which marks it off from a mere compilation of what has been gathered before. It will help the readers to an intelligent view of many difficult points in history, and therefore it may be welcomed as a satisfactory addition to the large mass of London literature."—Athenaeum.

THE GATEWAY OF SCOTLAND

(10/6 net)

A. G. BRADLEY

Or East Lothian, Lammermoor, and the Merse

Illustrated with Coloured Plates by A. L. COLLINS.

Mr. A. G. Bradley has already won a reputation of his own, and any new book which he gives us is assured beforehand of a very hearty welcome. . . . Mr. Bradley may be congratulated on his good fortune and on the great success he has attained in writing an extremely interesting and attractive book. . . . It is hardly possible to say which of the fifteen delightful chapters is the most attractive or the most informing. Mr. Bradley's first few pages on Berwick-on-Tweed are at once an excellent sample of his characteristic style, and an immediate enticement to read the chapters which follow. The skill with which the salient scenes and interesting associations are pleasantly set before the reader deserves every praise."—Bookseller.

Order SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE

CONSTABLE & CO., LTD.

LONDON, W.C.

THE HERO OF

By

HILAIRE BELLOC,

with Illustrations

by

G. K. CHESTERTON.

The Green Overcoat

"Delightfully entertaining."

—Observer.

"Splendid fun."—Daily Chronicle.

"One of the funniest [books of the season]."

—Nottingham Guardian.

"Very clever piece of espièglerie."

—Truth.

"Mr. Chesterton's drawings are clever and as whimsical as Mr. Belloc's text; and that is saying a great deal."

—Pall Mall Gazette.

6/-

BRISTOL: ARROWSMITH. LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL.

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S SEVENPENNY NOVELS

The Best Authors, The Best Books.

THE FIRST LIST OF TWELVE VOLUMES

A. CONAN DOYLE

THE TRAGEDY OF THE KOROSKO (Ready)
UNCLE BERNAC (Ready)

H. SETON MERRIMAN

FROM ONE GENERATION TO ANOTHER (Ready)
THE GREY LADY

ANTHONY HOPE

A CHANGE OF AIR

Mrs. DE LA PASTURE

DEBORAH OF TODS (Ready)

Mrs. ALFRED SIDGWICK

THE INNER SHRINE

BEATRICE HARRADEN

THE SCHOLAR'S DAUGHTER (Ready)

MARJORIE BOWEN

BLACK MAGIC

Mrs. BAILLIE

REYNOLDS

OUT OF THE NIGHT

E. PHILLIPS

OPPENHEIM

THE BLACK WATCHER

Mrs. W. K. CLIFFORD

A FLASH OF SUMMER

HODDER & STOUGHTON, Publishers.
Warwick Square, London, E.C.

Young Writers who desire SUCCESS should apply for free particulars of the Literary Instruction Correspondence Courses of THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY. The most practical and helpful literary courses on the market. Prepared by a Working Author. The Surrey Literary Agency also obtain the best offers for original MSS. Booklet Prospectus free. "Locksley," Presburg Road, New Malden, Surrey.

WANTED.—Latest Edition of "Chambers' Encyclopædia of English Literature."—A.J.H., Box 719, Advertising Dept., c/o. "Bookman," St. Paul's House, Warwick Sq., London, E.C.

TYPE WRITING.—MSS., Plays, Legal Work, etc., 1/- 1,000 words; Technical Work, 1/6. Correct and competent work; prompt return.—Miss d'Etlinger, Post Office, Lingfield, Surrey.

"To the Dickens' student the new book is a mine of knowledge."—Glasgow Evening Citizen.

WHO'S WHO IN DICKENS

By THOMAS ALEXANDER FYFE, Author of "Dickens and the Law," etc. 6/- net.

"To many Dickensians 'Who's Who in Dickens' will be a welcome work. Even among those who think they know the novels by heart, a difficulty in recalling the book wherein some minor character appears is not an uncommon experience. The 'Who's Who' will solve the difficulty in a moment." Truth

"An entertaining volume and a valuable reference book."—London Opinion

HODDER & STOUGHTON, Publishers, Warwick Square, London E.C.

READERS OUT OF REACH

of a good local bookseller, or who live abroad, are asked to write direct to London for their books, which will be sent by return of post, at lowest cash prices, on receipt of remittance with order.

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there, thus saving postage.

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications.

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 140 pp. of Standard Literature
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 Titles of Publishers' Reminders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices. (Out of print till September.)
3. Colonial Librarian's Handbook, indispensable to Librarians outside Europe, with complete list of Colonial Editions, etc., etc.
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals.

ESTABLISHED
1851

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

18-19 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone : 7463 Central.
Bankers : London County & Westminster (Lombard Street)

AN EXCELLENT WORK ON A CRITICAL PERIOD IN CANADIAN HISTORY,

ANNEXATION, PREFERENTIAL TRADE AND RECIPROCITY.

By CEPHAS D. ALLIN, M.A., LL.B., Assistant Professor of Political Science in the University of Minnesota, and GEORGE M. JONES, B.A., English and History Master in Humboldt Collegiate Institute, Toronto.

Works of an historical nature are rare in Canada, and, such is the condition of scholarship in the country, that only occasionally does a volume come from the Press that possesses outstanding merit. Of this book it may be said that it is one of the few really important historical treatises that have ever appeared in Canada. It deals exhaustively with the period during the late forties of the nineteenth century, when annexation was generally regarded as the only solution of Canada's commercial difficulties. The two authors have examined all the authorities of the period with the utmost discrimination and have compiled a bulky volume—that is the last word on the subject. The book has considerable significance at the present time, as Canada has recently passed through an experience of somewhat similar import. To those who take an interest in Canada's fiscal problems, the work will be found of rare interest.

"A masterly presentation of the Canadian Annexation Movement of 1849-50."—Winnipeg Telegram.

"The object in view has been accomplished in a most satisfactory manner."—The Weekly Sun.

"The authors have done their work well. They set forth the somewhat complicated story of a critical time in Canadian history with lucidity and good judgment."—Saturday Night

"Until the publication of this admirably-executed book, it has been extremely difficult, indeed practically impossible, for the student of Canadian history to form any clear idea of the origin, progress and significance of the annexation movement of 1849."—Toronto Globe.

Cloth, 10s. 6d.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,

MANSON HOUSE CHAMBERS, 11, QUEEN VICTORIA ST., LONDON, E.C. Head Office—TORONTO, CANADA.

Macmillan's New Books

The Wessex Edition of the Works of Thomas Hardy in Prose and Verse. With Prefaces and Notes. In 20 vols. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net each. Printed from new type. Each volume will have a Frontispiece in Photogravure and Map. Two volumes issued monthly.

VII.—UNDER THE GREENWOOD TREE.

VIII.—LIFE'S LITTLE IRONIES.

 Prospectus post free on request

The Athenæum—"Its appearance is stately and dignified. The paper is light and agreeable to the touch, and the print large and well ordered."

The Early Naturalists: their Lives and Work (1530-1789). By L. C.

MIALL, D.Sc., F.R.S. 8vo. 10s. net

Country Life—"Professor Miall has performed a valuable service by gathering together the material which he has published under the title 'The Early Naturalists.' It is really a wonderful piece of work, showing how the body of natural history possessed to-day has grown up and developed during the course of centuries."

The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D. Third Edition. 8vo.

Part V.—SPIRITS OF THE CORN AND OF THE WILD.

In two vols. 20s. net

The Works of Francis Parkman. Pocket Edition. With Frontispieces and Maps. Limp Leather Binding. In 12 vols. Extra Fcap. 8vo. 6s. net each.

Vols. I. and II.—THE CONSPIRACY OF PONTIAC. 2 vols.

The Sacred Shrine: A Study of the Poetry and Art of the Catholic Church. By YRJO HILKIN, Author of "The Origins of Art." 8vo. 14s. net.

The Origin and Aim of the Acts of the Apostles. Being Six Sermons preached in Worcester Cathedral, in Lent 1912, with an Appendix on Codex Beza and a Sermon on Christian Unity. By the Rev J. M. WILSON, D.D., Canon of Worcester. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

Historical Studies in Philosophy.

By ÉMILE BOUTROUX, Member of the Institute, Professor of the University of Paris. Authorized Translation by FRED ROTHWELL, B.A. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net. CONTENTS: The History of Philosophy—Socrates—Aristotle—Jacob Boehme—Descartes—Kant.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

Pan's Garden. A Volume of Nature Stories. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "The Centaur," etc. Illustrated by GRAHAM ROBERTSON. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

The Sign. By Mrs. ROMILLY FEDDEN (Katharine Waldo Douglas). Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

The Globe—"Such a novel as this comes as an oasis in the oft times dreary desert of fiction. The novel is quietly and delicately written, and there is power and originality in the theme."

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON

Mr. Heinemann's New 6s. Novels

BETWEEN TWO THIEVES.

By Richard Dehan (Author of "The Dop Doctor")

ADNAM'S ORCHARD.

Sarah Grand

YONDER.

E. H. Young

BURROWERS OF FORTUNE.

J. L. Herbertson

"One of the most thoughtful and interesting pieces of work that this season has given us. The characters are all well drawn and Miss Herbertson is to be congratulated upon a thoughtful and original piece of work."—Ladies' Field

LOVE'S PILGRIMAGE.

Upton Sinclair

A novel with many of the elements of greatness. There are superbly human touches and felicities of style and thought. It is a fine, distinguished, vital novel. —Observer

THE COST OF IT.

Eleanor Mordaunt

"Packed full of character and real life—a fine, powerful and impressive novel."—Daily Telegraph

PASSION FRUIT.

E. C. Vivian

"A book with a thrill in it. A story of gripping interest in which the characters really live."—Ladies' Field

HEINEMANN'S NEW 7d. NET NOVELS.

The Bondman, The Scapegoat, by HALL CAINE; Ebb Tide, by R. L. STEVENSON; The Call of the Wild, by JACK LONDON; The War of the Worlds, by H. G. WELLS; Soldiers of Fortune, by R. HARDING DAVIS; The Gadfly, by E. L. VOYNICH; Her Ladyship's Elephant, by D. D. WELLS; In the Fog, by R. HARDING DAVIS; Typhoon, by JOSEPH CONRAD; The Return of the O'Mahony, by HAROLD FREDERIC; Flames, by ROBERT HICHENS; The Last Sentence, by MAXWELL GRAY.

NEW 1s. NET NOVELS.

The Blotting Book, by E. F. BENSON; The Orchard Thief, by Mrs. HENRY DUDENLY; Godfrey Martin, Schoolboy, by CHAS. TULLY; The Adventurer, by LLOYD OSBOURNE

New Books.

TOLD BY AN EYE-WITNESS

THE LOSS OF S.S. 'TITANIC.'

By LAWRENCE BEISLEY, F.A. (one of the survivors). Crown 8vo. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

"The clear and most coherent story that has yet been told of the world's greatest maritime disaster, told with intense interest and convincing power."—Daily Telegraph

"The many small details of the narrative bring out the scene with extraordinary clearness."—The Times

RECOLLECTIONS OF A GREAT LADY.

Being more Memoirs of the COMTESSE DE BOIGNE.

(1811-1867). Photogravure. Frontispiece. Demy 8vo. 10s. net.

Previously Published in 1 volume with the above

THE MEMOIRS OF THE COMTESSE DE BOIGNE.

Vol. I. 1781-1814. Vol. II. 1814-1860. 111, 182, 183.

Photogravure Frontispiece. Each Volume Demy 8vo. 10s. net.

"It is the most vivacious, most human, and most interesting collection of Memoirs which has been given to the world for a long time. There is not a page which should be missed."—Daily Telegraph

THE YOUNG NIETZSCHE.

By EUGEN FOUERLIER NIETZSCHE. Translated by ANTHONY M. TROVATI. With Portrait. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.

"The intimate study of the man will be of infinitely more value than any number of critical studies could be."—The Times

"Full of the most delightful things. Only his sister could have written this book."—Observer

THE MONTESSORI METHOD OF CHILD EDUCATION.

By MARIA MONTESSORI. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

"A treasure trove of wisdom. Never before has such a combination of genius, inheritance, training, and experience been united as in this woman."—Journal of Education

"The Book is of pregnant significance. It brings out the most vital of callings in a new and true vision."—Athenæum

ANIMAL LIFE IN AFRICA.

By Major J. STEVENSON HAMILTON. Foreword by THEODORE ROOSEVELT. Illustrated. Maps, Plans, &c. Large demy 8vo. 18s. net.

"Vivid, graphic, withal scholarly—a book of unusual fascination."—The Times

"Major Hamilton's book stands in a class by itself and will appeal to almost every type of reader. It is hardly possible to praise it too much."—Pall Mall Gazette

THE SELECTED WRITINGS OF WILLIAM SHARP.

Edited by ELIZABETH A. SHARP. Uniform with the "Works of Fiona Macleod. To be completed in 5 vols. Crown 8vo. 5s. net each. Now Ready Vol. I. POEMS. Vol. II. STUDIES AND APPRECIATIONS.

A Woman's Poignant Confession Re-Unites Parted Lovers. A ROMANCE OF PUBLISHING.

"HE WHO PASSED." TO M.L.G. (8s.)

Has proved to be a REAL HUMAN DOCUMENT. The full story of this strange romance in publishing was told recently in the Daily Papers.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 251. VOL. XLII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

AUGUST, 1912.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES 185-190

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S
£1,000 PRIZE NOVEL
COMPETITION 190

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 191

THE READER—

Mr. Balfour as a Man of Letters.
By JAMES MOFFATT, D.D., D.Litt. 193
Prize Competitions 198
New Thought in France. By DR. WILLIAM BARRY .. 201

NEW BOOKS—

An Irish Cavalier. By ROBERT
LYND 203
How 'Twas. By R. CURIE 204
The Listeners By EDWARD
THOMAS 201
Martin Harvey 205
Lord Redesdale's Essays. By
D. S. MELDRUM 206
The Lady Next Door 206

A History of the Modern World 207

The July Monarchy. By
A. W. EVANS 208

Authentic Ireland By H. A.
HINKSON 209

Dostoevsky Once More. By GEORGE SAMPSON 210

A Chaplet of Pearls 210

The Widow in the Bye Street.
By FRANCIS BICKLEY .. 211

The Three Brontës By W.
E. A. ANON 212

A New Satirist. By H.
BAERLEIN 213

Deep Seas and Shallow. By
J. E. PATTERSON 213

The Holiday Novel .. 214

Four French Adventurers .. 215

The Beginning of Friedrich
Nietzsche By HOLBROOK
JACKSON 215

Mr. Belloc's Moods By WAL-TER JERROLD 216

NOVEL NOTES—

Mightier than the Sword—The Tomboy and Others—Bright Shame—Kingfisher—Blue—Affairs of Men—"Initials
Only"—The Penitent—Phrynette Married—The Blue
Bird's-Eye—The Woman
Between—The Rich Man's Wife—Yesterday—Lady Q.
—The Revolt—The Second Woman—The New Humpty-Dumpty—Rose of the Garden
.. .. 217-220

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—

The Lower Depths—The Church in the Pages of Punch—A Short History of Music in England—Nights at the Play—Some Old English
Worthies—A Psychic Autobiography—Studies and Appreciations—Some Anglo-American Memories .. 221-223

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 223

NOTICES.

*All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the
Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK
SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.*

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The September BOOKMAN will be a special Colonial Number, and will contain an article on the literature of the Colonies and of India. It will deal more especially with the work of living authors, and will be illustrated with numerous portraits.

On another page we announce the result of Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton's Thousand Pound Prize Novel Competition.

Miss Rose Macaulay, the winner of the First Prize of £600 in Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton's £1,000 Prize Novel Competition, is the daughter of Mr. G. C. Macaulay, Lecturer in English at Cambridge University, author of the volume on "James Thomson" in the English Men of Letters series, of a critical study on Francis Beaumont, and editor of many books. Miss Macaulay has been writing stories ever since she was a child; she was brought up partly in Italy, memories of which country play their part in certain of her romances. Her first novel, "Abbot's Verney," was written in 1906, and since then she has published four others, "The Furnace," "The Secret River," "The Valley Captives," and this year "Views and Vagabonds." She began to write "The Lee Shore," the novel that has won the £600 prize, some little while ago, but put it aside when she had done about a third of it and went on with other work. When she saw the £1,000 Novel Competition announced and decided to enter for it, she purposed submitting "Views and Vagabonds," but finding she had still plenty of time to spare altered her mind, took up the unfinished novel, "The Lee Shore," revised what was already written of it, brought it to completion and sent that in instead.

Mr. David Hennessey, winner of the Second Prize in Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton's £1,000 Prize Novel Competition, is a well-known Australian author and journalist. He was Organising Secretary in Sydney for both the Inauguration of the Commonwealth in 1901, and for the Royal Reception in the same year. His prize novel, "An Australian Outlaw," is the first novel he has published since that date, for in these last ten years he has been travelling about the world—spending some little of the time in London—doing miscellaneous journalistic work and collecting materials. Among other books that he has published are "A Lost Identity," "An Australian Bush Track," "Wynnum," and "The Dishonourable"—the two last of which reached a sale of some thirty thousand copies.

Miss D. C. F. Harding.

whose new novel, "Affairs of Men" (Jong Long), is reviewed on page 17.

"Yarns and Talks," is the title of a new collection of essays and tales by Mr. Bart Kennedy that is to be published this autumn by Mr. Stephen Swift.

Mr. Andrew Melrose has just published "The Norse King's Bridal," a new book of translations from the Danish and Old Norse with original ballads, by Miss E. M. Smith-Dampier. Her earlier volume of such ballads and translations attracted much attention and was warmly praised by Mr. Andrew Lang. Miss Smith-Dampier has also written a novel, "Oil of Spikenard," which was very successful with both critics and public.

Mrs. R. S. Garnett, whose new novel, "Amor Vincit," has just been published by Messrs. Duckworth.

People are asking "Who is Dan Chaucer?" author of "The Simple Life Limited," whose brilliant new satirical novel, "The New Humpty Dumpty," has just been published by Mr. John Lane. Well, we would like to disclose the secret, but Mr. Dan Chaucer says we must not. He says there is nothing interesting in his personality beyond the fact that he is partial to toast and bananas; and that as for his personal appearance, if you go to Maidstone on a market day and photograph the first farmer you meet, so long as he has not side-whiskers, you will have a pretty accurate portrait of him. Personally, we should not have described Mr. Chaucer as looking at all like that, but as that is what he thinks he looks like we can only set it down.

Photo by Violet K. Blacklock.

Miss E. M. Smith-Dampier.

Messrs. Longmans have recently published an Anthology of Welsh poetry done into English verse by Mr. Alfred Perceval Graves. This is the first serious attempt that has been made at an anthology of Welsh verse, old and new, in English verse form, and we hope to have something further to say of it next month.

Mr. G. B. Burgin has a new novel coming out with Messrs. Hutchinson this autumn. It is a story of literary and journalistic life in London, embodying some of Mr. Burgin's personal experiences, and certain well-known living authors have unconsciously sat as models for some of its characters.

Miss Frances G. Knowles-Foster, who had a considerable success with her first novel, "Jehanne of the Golden Lips," has lately published a second, "The Written Law," both books being issued by Messrs. Mills & Boon. The first story had for its heroine the famous mediæval Mary Stuart of Naples ; the second is a travel book and an exciting novel in one, and deals with the difficult problem of the marriage of white men with native women as it applies to Burmah. Miss Knowles-Foster has made a very earnest study of this question, and the Law she elaborates offers a new solution to it, and has aroused keen interest in political circles in the East. The Rangoon Gazette thinks the story may prove "much more effectual for its purpose than a complete file of the Confidential Circulars which the various Chief Secretaries have hitherto sent out."

Photo by Sarr & Co.

Miss Knowles-Foster.

Miss Beatrice Irwin, who recently recited selections from her poems, "The Pagan Trinity," (John Lane) at Crosby Hall.

In spite of her youth, Miss Knowles-Foster has found time to explore many lands, and has travelled through Europe, Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Ceylon and India. When making studies for the Burmese book she went with her mother on a cargo boat a thousand miles up the Irawadi to the Chinese frontier ; and she vehemently repudiates the name of globe-trotter, describing herself as a leisurely world-walker and sailor in search of matters of artistic interest. When on her travels she has had many romantic and stirring adventures and some hair-breadth escapes from violent ends. She always wears a weird, but beautiful, gold and pearl Persian pendant-charm, that was given to her as a talisman against accidents ; and so far it seems to have fulfilled its function very thoroughly. Miss Knowles-Foster's home is in Yorkshire, where her ancestors have lived for a thousand years, and when she is not roaming abroad in search of "copy" she amuses herself there with her books, is busy writing in her wonderful museum-like room full of curios, or in adding some new language to the five she already speaks. Before the two novels, she wrote when she was sixteen a little historical tale of Mother Shipton, "The Witch of Knaresboro'," and although she protests that this cannot be really considered a book, it continues to have a large local sale. She has also written stories, travel articles, and reviews of history and fiction for the magazines, and occasionally a ballad of old times in the North Countree.

We deeply regret to record the death of Mr. Andrew Lang, which took place early in the morning of the

Miss Helen C. Roberts, whose novel, "Old Brent's Daughter," was recently published by Messrs. Duckworth 21st of last month. We hope to make further reference to Mr. Lang and his work in our next number.

A St. Andrews resident writes and asks us to find space for this "poor tribute to one so much loved":

"The world is a much poorer place to-day by the passing away of Mr. Andrew Lang, and his many friends and admirers are very sorrowful people. His praises are being sung in every form of writing by able pens, and we are told of his great powers, his astonishing versatility, his unceasing work and extraordinary memory. We know them all, but here, in St. Andrews, the 'little city old and grey,' which has delighted to honour him, as he loved and honoured it, we also have known his genuine goodness (his friends speak of his 'heart of gold') and his unfailing kindness for all, especially any smaller brethren treading the path of letters, to whom he could lend a willing, helping hand. Also his charity and sympathy with bad health and trouble; only conceit, he could not suffer gladly. Now the busy pen is laid aside, the capable brain is at rest forever, and the picturesque, noticeable figure will never again be seen in the quiet

Photo by Miles & Kaye. Morice Gerard
(The Rev. John Jessop Teague), whose new novel, "Crenland Castle," was recently published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

Mr. Holbrook Jackson, in the Costume of a Marshal's man at the Elizabeth Triumph, Shakespeare's England, on July 11th.
Mr. Jackson's new book of essays, "All Manner of Folk," has just been published by Mr. Grant Richards.

old streets, on his way to and from the University Library, on most winter afternoons.

"Before these lines are read he will be laid to rest under the shadow of the ruined towers he knew and loved so well, and it will have been the sad privilege of those who prized his friendship as a dear possession to stand in the group of mourners at his grave—mourners in every sense of the word, and sincere sympathizers with his wife and helpmate, whom he leaves behind.

"That group, to be really representative, should contain old and young, for he loved children, and animals too. He has been known to take home stray dogs and cats and feed and house them, and many a copper has been popped into ragged little urchins' hands by the kind-hearted poet-author."

"Broken Ladders," the new novel by Mr. Andrew Soutar that is published by Messrs. Cassell, has a political setting, but is essentially a domestic story, its purpose being to show how deeply a well-bred woman can be made to suffer by a husband of superficial genius—a Labour leader who has risen from the people but lacks the strength of character to eat criticism. Mr. Soutar has travelled a good deal in the Far East, and when he was out there wrote his Indian story, "The Chosen of the Gods;" but it is the domestic tale that appeals to him in particular. His first story was published by Clement Scott, who wrote him a kindly letter of encouragement, and incidentally advised him that the British reading public has a rooted prejudice in favour of the happy ending, no matter how unreal it may be. That was fifteen years ago, but Mr. Soutar declares that he is as young now as he was then, and that, moreover, he will never grow old, because when he lays down his pen he also lays down his work, and thinks no more of it until he returns to his table. He is not a faddist, he says, in the way of only being able to write in a sealed room; he writes all the better when a noise is going on about him. He has never burnt the midnight oil, frequently goes to bed as early as 8.30, writes only when the spirit moves him, and never after dinner. Whenever writing palls upon him, he turns to ball-punching, boxing, golf, or motoring. Boxing, he confesses, interests him more than any other sport, and if a big contest is taking place at the National Sporting Club he is generally to be found there. Nowadays, Mr. Soutar writes in this country exclusively for the magazines edited by Mr. Newman Flower; but he has a large following in America, where a series of his stories is at present running in Ainslee's Magazine.

Photo by Pym, Strathnam.

Mr. Andrew Soutar.

Joan Maude.

Frontispiece portrait from her book, "Behind the Nightlight" (John Murray), which was reviewed in last month's BOOKMAN.

In a scene of remarkable interest and picturesqueness the striking monument which Bohemia has erected to its greatest historian was unveiled at Prague on the 1st of July, the picturesqueness being heightened by the fact that the unveiling was one of the culminating scenes that marked the sixth Universal Sokol Congress organised by the Bohemian Sokol Union. It was only fitting that the honour paid to Francis Palacky should have been tendered in the jubilee year of the Sokols, for the influence of the historian, with his passionate devotion to the national idea, may be traced in the establishing, by Dr. Tyrs, of the first Sokol Society, in 1862. The Sokol movement—at once the most remarkable patriotic, and the most remarkable gymnastic, organisation in the world—has grown until now the Slav Union of Sokol Societies numbers 200,000 members; and there were grouped about the base of Mr. Sucharda's grand piece of sculpture notable representatives of all the Slavic peoples—Bohemian, Moravian, Polish, Croatian, Servian, Russian, Bulgarian, Montenegrin—besides guests from England, France, and elsewhere, while massed around in the square were thousands of Bohemians and others.

Francis Palacky.

The central figure from the Memorial recently unveiled at Prague.

Francis Palacky, whom all had gathered to honour, is an historian little known to the generality of English readers, as his writings are only obtainable in Bohemian or German; it is interesting to learn, however, that he had a thorough knowledge of English, and numbered Gibbon's "Rome" and Bolingbroke's "Letters on the Study and Use of History" among his favourite books. The son of a Moravian schoolmaster, Palacky, who was born in 1798, came, as author of the "History of Bohemia," to be recognised before his death, in 1876, as "the foremost man of his nation." It is not easy, says Count Lutzow, in his "History of Bohemian Literature," to delineate the circumstances that rendered the publication of Palacky's monumental work a political event in Bohemia, contributing greatly to the revival of national feeling. These circumstances are briefly indicated as the revelation of a glorious past to a people whose sense of nationality had been almost obliterated by oppression. Palacky revealed, as it were, an inspiring palimpsest, the lesson of which fired his compatriots with the idea that what had been might be again. Those who were present at the unveiling of the magnificent monument, and the celebrations on the banks of the Ultava, can alone realize how inspiring that idea has been.

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S £1,000 PRIZE NOVEL COMPETITION.

First Prize, £600. THE LEE SHORE, by R. MACAULAY.

Second Prize, £400. THE OUTLAW, by DAVID HENNESSEY.

Report of the Adjudicators, MISS BEATRICE HARRADEN, SIR W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, and MR. CLEMENT K. SHORTER.

We award the Two Prizes in Hodder & Stoughton's Prize Novel Competition to Miss R. Macaulay, of Southernwood, Great Shelford, Cambridge, author of "The Lee Shore," and to Mr. David Hennessey, of 97, Bridge Road, Richmond, Melbourne, Victoria, Australia, author of "The Outlaw."

"THE LEE SHORE" is above all things an unusual novel. It does not belong to the category of made books manufactured on conventional lines. The author has a real understanding of life and a nameless "something" in her outlook not given to everyone who writes a good and well-constructed novel. The characterisation is admirable, the characters linger in the memory. Peter, the hero, is most lovable and convincing. In grasp, in meaning, in charm of feeling and expression and in humour "The Lee Shore" is easily first among the Competition Novels. It is sure of many admirers and friends. Miss Beatrice Harraden writes: "In my opinion this book is immeasurably ahead of all the others."

Photo by Gyde, Aberystwyth

Miss R. Macaulay.

Winner of the First Prize in Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton's £1000 Prize Novel Competition.

"THE OUTLAW"

is as good an adventure story as has been written for years. It is genuinely interesting and exciting, an excellent, straightforward piece of narrative, told with admirable dramatic force and certainly the best bush-ranging novel since "Robbery Under Arms."

We have no hesitation in saying that the Competition has proved an unqualified success. The interest taken in it has been keen and widespread, and the hundreds of manuscripts submitted have involved an amount of care and labour beyond anything that had been anticipated. MSS. have come not only from all parts of the United Kingdom, but from Canada, Australia, South Africa, and other of the Colonies, and from India. It was found necessary to engage a large and competent staff of readers to give every novel received adequate attention; each novel was read by more than one of them, many of the novels were read and fully reported upon by six different readers and, as may be imagined, all this painstaking consideration and sifting of the good from the bad, and the better from the good meant a great deal of conscientious labour extending over more than two months before a selection of all the best work was ready to be submitted to a final decision of the three judges.

Photo by Fack Studios, Melbourne.

David Hennessey.

Winner of the Second Prize in Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton's £1000 Prize Novel Competition.

Not a few among the remaining novels are of high literary merit, and are sure to find their way into print.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

August 1st to September 1st, 1912.

Messrs. Appleton & Co.

BRADLEY, MARY H.—Favour of Kings. 6s.
CLOCK, S.—Our Baby. 3s.
DIXON, THOMAS.—The Sins of the Father. 6s.
DUNN, S. O.—American Transportation Question. 6s. net.
FORBUSH, W. B.—The Coming Generation. 6s. net.
GILLMORE, RUFUS.—Mystery of the Second Shot. 6s.
KING, C. L.—Regulation of Municipal Utilities. 6s. net.
MUNROB, W. B.—Initiative Referendum and R
FUSEY, W. A.—Care of Skin and Hair. 2s. net

Mr. Edward Ar

BOOTH, EDWARD.—Bella: A Novel. 6s.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

EDGINTON, MAY.—Adventures of Napoleon Prince. 6s.
FRASER, J. FOSTER.—Real Siberia. 1s. net.
LE FEUVRE, AMY.—Country Corner. 3s. 6d.
LE FEUVRE, AMY.—Health and Right Breathing. 1s. net.
LE FEUVRE, AMY.—Health for the Young. 1s. net.
MORLEY, PROFESSOR.—First Sketch of English Literature. (New Edition.) 7s. 6d. net.
PACKER, J. A.—Among the Heretics in Europe. 2s. 6d.
RAYNER, EMMA.—Dilemma of Engeltie. 6s.
SHEARD, VIRNA.—Man at Lone Lake. 6s.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

- JUDE, R. H., M.A., D.Sc., and SATTERLY, JOHN, M.A., D.Sc.—Junior Magnetism and Electricity. 2s. 6d.
 SHEPHERD, J. W., B.Sc.—Qualitative Determination of Organic Compounds.
 STEWART, R. W., D.Sc., and SATTERLY, JOHN, M.A., D.Sc.—Junior Sound and Light. 2s. 6d.

Messrs. J. M. Dent & Co.

- ALLEN, PHOEBE.—The Last Legitimate King of France. With Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.
 BROWNING ROBERT.—The Pied Piper of Hamelin. Illustrated by C. and M. Robinson. With many full-page Drawings. 2s. 6d. net.
 BLAKE, WILLIAM.—The Songs of Innocence and other Poems. Illustrated by C. and M. Robinson. 3s. 6d. net.
 CANTON, WILLIAM.—A Child's Book of Warriors. Illustrated by Herbert Cole. 5s. net.
 CHANDLER, HOWARD, M.A., F.R.S.L.—Plays for Children. 3 Vols. ready. Vol. I.—Hearts are Trumps. Vol. II.—Red Riding Hood and Cinderella. Vol. III.—The Three Questions, and King Alfred and the Cakes. In paper covers, 6d. net.
 CHEVRILLON, ANDRÉ. Translated by ANDREW BOYLE.—The Philosophy of Ruskin. 5s. net.
 CONRAD, JOSEPH.—The Secret Sharer. 6s. net.
 CONVERSE, FLORENCE.—The Children of Light. 6s. net.
 CRAIG, EDWARD GORDON.—Towards a New Theatre.
 DEVEREUX, ROY. Aspects of Algeria. With Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 DITCHFIELD, P. H., M.A., F.R.S.—The Cottages and Village Life of Rural England. Line Drawings by A. R. Quinton. 21s. net.
 FIGGIS, DARRELL.—Book of Essays. 5s. net.
 FRANCE, ANATOLE. Re-told by PETER WRIGHT.—Isee, Princess of the Dwarfs. 7s. 6d. net.
 FROMENTIN, EUGÈNE. Translated by ANDREW BOYLE. The Masters of Past Time. 7s. 6d. net.
 GARDNER, EDMUND G., M.A.—Daute and the Mystics. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.
 KLUCHEVSKY, PROF. VALERIE. Translated by C. D. HOGARTH.—The History of Russia. Vol. II. 7s. 6d. net.
 LEGOUIS, EMILE. Translated by L. Lailavoix. Chancer. 5s. net.
 MYBLOOM, HELENA.—Jolly Cattle and other Swedish Fairy Tales. Illustrated by Charles Folkard. 5s. net.
 O'NEILL, ROSE.—The Kewpies and Dotty Darling. 4s. net.
 SAMSON, HILDE.—Francis Horatio and His Three Companions. 4s. 6d. net.
 SETH, PROF. JAMES, M.A. Edited by OLIPHANT SKEATON, M.A.—English Philosophers and Schools of Philosophy. 5s. net.
 STAWELL, MRS. RUDOLPH.—The Fairy of Old Spain. Illustrated by Frank C. Page. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Gay & Hancock, Ltd.

- BRUCE, ADDINGTON.—Scientific Mental Healing. 4s. 6d. net.
 BURCHILL, SIDNEY H.—My Lady of the Bass. 1s. net.
 MATHEWSON, ANNA, with Caricatures by SIGNOR CARUSO.—The Song of the Evening Stars. 3s. 6d. net.
 NEWLAND, SIMPSON.—Paving the Way. A Romance of the Australian Bush. 7s. net.
 WILCOX, ELLA WHEELER.—Six Bad Husbands and Six Unhappy Wives. 1s. net.
 WILSON, CATHERINE.—The Modern Evangeline. 6s.

Messrs. G. Harrap & Co.

- COTTERILL, H. B.—The Faust-Legend and Goethe's "Faust." 1s. 6d. net.
 DAVIS, T. HADLAND.—Myths and Legends of Japan. With 42 Plates in Colour by Evelyn Paul. 7s. 6d. net.
 EDGAR, M. G.—The Boy's Froissart. With 16 Plates. 5s. net.
 WHEELER, H. F. B.—The Story of Wellington. With 16 Plates. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

- BARKER, H. J.—Swinburne and other Poems. 2s. 6d. net.
 MACDONALD, FREDERIC W.—Reminiscences of My Early Ministry. 2s. 6d. net.
 STUART, ESME.—Harum Scaram's Fortune. 1s. net.
 STUART, ESME.—Harum Scaram's Fortune. 1s. net.
 TOLSTOI.—Tales from Tolstoi. 6d.
 YORKE, CURTIS.—Carpathia Knox. 6d.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

- CHISHOLM, A. STUART M.—Independence of Chile. 7s. 6d. net.
 CROSS, VICTORIA.—Life's Shop Window. 1s. net.
 D'AUVERGNE, E. B.—Light Side of London. 6s. net.
 DYLLINGTON, A.—Suiciders in the House. 6s.
 HALL, A. NEELY.—Handicrafts for Handy Boys. 6s. net.
 INGLEBY, L. C.—Oscar Wilde's Reminiscences. 2s. 6d. net.
 MARTINDALE, T.—With Gun and Guide in New Brunswick. 10s. 6d. net.
 ROBERTS, T. G.—Toll of the Tides. 6s.
 TRELAWEY, GEORGE.—Story of Harry Sinclair. 2s. net.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

- JANE, FRED T.—Fighting Ships, 1912. 21s. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

- AGNUS, CRME.—Nance of Manchester. 6s.
 ALBANESI, MARIA E.—Olivia Mary. 6s.
 Author of "The Wild Olive."—The Street Called Straight. 6s.
 B., T. P.—Beating to Port, and other Poems. 3s. 6d. net.
 BATES, LINDON, Jun.—The Path of the Conquistadores. With 24 Illustrations and a Map. 10s. 6d. net.
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—Buried Alive. A New Edition. 6s.
 CONYERS, DOROTHEA.—Sally. 6s.
 COOK, W. VICTOR.—A Wilderness Wooing. 6s.
 GLEIG, CHARLES.—A Woman in the Limelight. 6s.
 GRAY, ARTHUR.—Cambridge and Its Story. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by Maxwell Armfield. 7s. 6d. net.
 HUTCHINSON, M. F.—The House of Terror. 6s.
 LISLE, DAVID.—A Kingdom Divided. 6s.
 LUCAS, E. V.—A Little of Everything: An Anthology gathered from his many books, gay and grave, verse and prose. 1s. net.
 OXENHAM, JOHN.—The Quest of the Golden Rose. 6s.
 PASTURE, MRS. HENRY DE LA.—The Tyrant. 1s. net.
 FERRIN, ALICE.—The Anglo-Indians. 6s.
 RIDGE, W. PETT.—Devoted Sparkes. 6s.
 SHARPE, MATILDA (Selected by).—Old Favourites from the Poets. 3s. 6d.
 SIDGWICK, MRS. A.—Iamora. 6s.
 SWINNERTON, FRANK.—The Happy Family. 6s.
 WILLIAMSON, C. N. and A. M.—The Demon. A New Novel. 1s. net.
 WILLIAMSON, C. N. and A. M.—The Heather Moon. 6s.
 The Moral Maxims and Reflections of the Duke de la Rochefoucauld. With an Introduction and Notes by George H. Powell. 2s. net.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

- ANNESLEY, MAUDE.—My Parsian Year. 10s. 6d. net.
 ANON.—Eve Spinster. 6s.
 CHANNON, E. M.—Keeper of the Secret. 6s.
 CRESPIGNY, MRS. PHILIP CH. DE.—The Five of Spades. 6s.
 GRIBBLE, FRANCIS.—Romance of Men of Devon. 6s.
 GRIMSHAW, BEATRICE.—When the Red Gods Call. 1s. net. Cheap Edition.
 HARTLEY, M.—The Man Who Saved Austria. 10s. 6d. net.
 LYND, ROBERT.—Rambles in Ireland. 6s.
 PENDERED, M.—At Lavender Cottage. 6s.
 STANHOPE, GILBERT.—A Mystic on the Prussian Throne. 10s. 6d. net.
 SUTCLIFFE, HALLIWELL.—Tales of the Open Hazard. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

- "BROWN LINNET"—The Snarer.
 CABOT, WILLIAM BROOKS.—In Northern Labrador. With 76 Illustrations.
 HEALEY, SIR CHARLES E. H. CHADWYCK.—English Church Law and Divorce. 5s. net.
 IRACE, CHEVALIER TULLIO.—With the Italians in Tripoli. With Illustrations.
 KENNEDY, LORD JUSTICE.—The Plotus of Aristophanes. Translated into English Verse.
 LUCHAIRE, ACHILLE.—Social France in the Time of Philip Augustus. Edited by Louis Halphen. Translated by E. B. Krehbiel.
 LYNCH, BOHUN.—Glamour: A Tale of Modern Greece. 6s.
 NAPIER, LADY OF MAGDALA.—Muddling Through. 6s.
 NEUMAN, B. PAUL.—Simon Brandin. 6s.
 PHILLIPOTS, EDEN.—From the Angle of Seventeen. 3s. 6d.
 PICKERING, MRS. F.—The Enlightenment of Sylvia. 6s.
 STACPOOLE, H. DE VERE.—The Street of the Flute Player. 6s.
 WATNEY, CHARLES, and LITTLE, JAMES A.—The Labour Unrest, Its Aims and Methods Explained.
 WILLMOTT, ELLEN A.—The Genus Rosa. Part XXII.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

- AINSWORTH, HARRISON.—Dictionary of Dates. Vol. II. (Nelson's Encyclopedia Library.) 1s. net.
 AINSWORTH, HARRISON.—Jack Sheppard (Nelson's Classics.) 6d. net.
 HOPE, ANTHONY.—Sophy of Kravonia. (Nelson's Library.) 7d. net.
 VACHELL, H. A.—The Other Side (Nelson's Library.) 7d. net.
 WILKINS, MRS.—By Desert Ways to Baghdad. (Nelson's Library.) 1s. net.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

- COWAN, MISS MINNA G., M.A. (I.C.D.). Garton College.—The Education of the Women of India. With 12 Illustrations. 1s. 6d. net.
 PORTEOUS, ALEXANDER, F.S.A. Scot.—The History of Crief. From the Earliest Times to the Dawn of the Twentieth Century. With Introduction by the Rev. W. P. Paterson, D.D., Professor of Divinity in the University of Edinburgh. With upwards of 180 Illustrations.

Messrs. John Ouseley.

- LEETE, ALFRED, and BALDREY, W. B.—Sport. 1s. net.
 "TWIFED, HARRIS"—Knickerbocker Days. 1s. net.
 WHITE, REV. H. C.—Disestablished and Disendowed, or the Fate of an Elderly Curate. 4s. net.
 WILSON, RATHMELL.—The Experimentalists. A Play. 1s. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

- ANDERSON, A. J.—Romance of Sandro Botticelli. 10s. 6d. net.
 ANON.—Neighbours of Mine. 6s.
 CAMERON, CHARLOTTE.—A Dubair Bride. 6s.
 CHESTER, S. REECH.—Dines a Deux. 4s. net.
 DANBY, FRANK.—Dr. Phillips. 1s. net.
 D'AUVERGNE, EDMUND B.—Godoy, the Queen's Favourite. 16s. net.
 DIEHL, ALICE M.—Confessions of Perpetua. 6s.
 GILL, ANTHONY KIRBY.—The Marble Aphrodite. 6s.
 HARRIS, VIRGIL M.—Ancient Carlos and Famous Wills. 10s. 6d. net.
 HILL, HEADON.—The Thread of Proof. 6s.
 JAMES, A. E.—Her Majesty the Flapper. 6s.
 KENEALY, ARABELLA.—The Irresistible Mrs. Ferrers. 6s.
 KOEBEL, W. H.—In Jesuit Land. 12s. 6d. net.
 RAWSON, MAUD STEPNEY.—The Three Anatomists. 6s.
 WODNILL, GABRIELLE.—Magpie of Margate. 6s.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

- O'CONNOR, MRS. VIOLET (VIOLET BULLOCK-WEBSTER).—The Idea of Mary's Meadow. An exceedingly intimate communication from wife to husband, treating of the growth of the Religious Life and the contriving of the ideal environment for helping a child to become a Saint. 5s. net.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson, Ltd.

- HOUGHTON, STANLEY.—Hindle Wakes. A Play in 4 Acts. Paper, 1s. 6d. net.
 HOUGHTON, STANLEY.—Popular Ballads. Series IV.—Ballads of Robin Hood and other Outlaws. Edited by Frank Sidgwick. 3s. 6d. net.
 PANSON, GUSTAF.—Pride of War: A Striking and Realistic Picture of the present Turko-Italian War in Tripoli. Translated from the original Swedish Lögnera. 6s.

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

- BROWNING, ROBERT.—Browning's Works. Vol. IV. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Stephen Swift & Co.

- HEILGERS, MISS LOUIS.—The Naked Soul. 6s.
 STRINDBERG, AUGUST.—The Confessions of a Fool. 6s.
 WHITBY, DR. CHARLES.—The Doctor and His Work. 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

- ASKEW, ALICE and CLAUDE.—Barbara: A Novel. 6s.
 COURTLANDER, ALPHONSE.—Mightier than the Sword: A Novel. 6s.
 DINGLE, E. J.—China's Revolution, 1911-12. 15s. net.
 MALLIK, MAMMATH C.—A Study in Ideals: Great Britain and India. 10s. 6d. net.
 SHUSTER, W. MORGAN.—The Strangling of Persia. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

- ASKEW, A. and C.—The Stolen Lady. 6d.
 BARR, ROBERT.—Lord Strangleigh, Philanthropist. 2s. net.
 BOOTHBY, GUY.—A Bid for Fortune. 7d. net.
 HUME, FERGUS.—The Mystery Queen. 6s.
 KAYE, WILMOT.—The Red Streak. 6s.
 LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—An Eye for an Eye. 6d.
 LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—Guilty Bonds. 1s. net.
 MITTFORD, BERTRAM.—Ravenshaw of Rietholma. 6d.
 TRACY, LOUIS.—The Pillar of Light. 7d. net.
 WALLACE, EDGAR.—Grey Timothy. 6s.
 WHITE, FRED M.—Claxton's Mill. 6d.

THE READER.

MR. BALFOUR AS A MAN OF LETTERS.

BY JAMES MOFFATT, D.D., D.Lit.

AS a man of letters? Well, the "English Men of Letters" Series has not a place for Marlowe yet, but it has thrown its line over Hume and Adam Smith. Here is the shred of a precedent, if a precedent is required, for writing an article upon Mr. Balfour which is mainly interested in him from the point of view of literature, not of politics or philosophy. The real difficulty is not precedents but materials. It is more than forty years since Mr. Frederic Harrison turned the searchlight of the Fortnightly upon the cleverness and snobbishness of "Lothair." It is seventeen years since he criticised the "Foundations of Belief," but in the later Conservative leader it was philosophic misdeeds and not literary defects which moved him to indignation. As a novel, "Lothair" was witty in itself, and the cause of wit in others. It struck out Bret Harte's brilliant parody as well as Mr. Harrison's article on "The Romance of the Peerage," and although the latter began with the stinging comment that "the literary qualities of the book need detain no man. Premiers not uncommonly write sad stuff; and we should be thankful if the stuff be amusing," the critic's sense of justice led him in the next paragraph to recognize the literary merits of the story before satirising its social and political tone. Mr. Balfour has written several books, but they are not like Disraeli's novels. They are not even about literature. It is almost as difficult to ascertain his literary interests and quality from what he has published as it was for Tariff Reformers and Free Traders during his last Parliament to discover his exact whereabouts on the misty seas of high finance. With this difference, however, that his elusiveness as a man of letters is not tactical; it is due to the fact that his main interests lie, intellectually, in philosophy, from Bacon to Bergson. Only now and then, in some address or casual reference, is it possible for his readers to perceive his literary bearings through the atmosphere of mental distinction which characterizes his pages in Hansard or out of it. He is not a man of letters as Lord Rosebery is, for example, or Lord Morley, or Mr. Wyndham, or Mr. Birrell.

There is an odd illustration of this in the second chapter of "The Foundations of Belief," where he has to discuss the sources of æsthetic pleasure. He gives literature the go-by and chooses to argue the question from music, "partly because, unlike Architecture, it serves no very obvious purpose, and we are thus absolved from giving any opinion on the relation between beauty and utility; partly because, unlike Painting and Poetry, it has no external reference, and we are thus absolved from giving any opinion on the relation between beauty and truth. Of the inestimable blessings which these peculiarities carry with them, anyone may judge who has ever got bogged in the barren controversies concerning the Beautiful and the Useful, the Real and the Ideal, which fill so large a space in certain classes of æsthetic literature. Great indeed will he feel the advantages to be of dealing with an art whose most characteristic utterances have so little directly to do either with utility or truth." We need not discuss how far this view of music would satisfy recent critics and composers. The point is that the line of argument taken here is not one which would have occurred naturally to a genuine man of letters. He would have risked the bog.

But although literature occupies an incidental place in the output, and even in the interests, of Mr. Balfour, he has, of course, been obliged now and then to define his position to it, as a branch of culture. We can see where he stands in one or two of the controversies which are always with us in the land of books. For example, to take one of the least technical, it is a supreme function of literature, according to Mr. Balfour, to cheer us up. "I do not at all deny, of course, that things sad, sorrowful, tragic, even drab, may be and are susceptible of artistic treatment . . . but for my own part I prefer more cheerful weather. Everything, after all, which is real, is a potential subject of literature as long as it is treated sincerely, as long as it is treated directly; as long as it is an immediate experience, no man has the right to complain of it. But it is not what I ask of literature. What I ask from literature mainly is that in a world which is full of sadness and difficulty, in which you go through a day's stress and come back from your work weary, you should find in literature something which represents life, which is true, in the highest sense of truth, to what is or is imagined to be true, but which does cheer us." This is a preference in which he has many stout allies. Sir Henry Taylor and Walt Whitman were poles apart in poetry, but they agreed that this was the chief end of verse. Schopenhauer was not a politician who needed refreshment for the intellect after a Commons debate, but he declared acidly that high culture leads us to seek entertainment almost entirely from books and not from human beings. Even Matthew Arnold held the same view—"The life of the people is such that in literature they require joy." The cheerful note has often been in demand, and in these days when History is raising the tariff against Literature and even Fiction tends in various hands to become utilitarian, it is not the hour to cavil at anyone who believes in literature, were it only because he desires a place for bright pieces on her programme. But literature is surely more than a source of refreshment and exhilaration. If you ask that of it, even "mainly," you are apt to associate it with your jaded moments or with some special form which is soothing and amusing rather than notable. Most of us have had times when, like Thackeray, we have "read novels with the most fearful contentment of mind. . . . Think of a whole day in bed, and a good novel for a companion! No cares; no remorse about idleness; no visitors; and the 'Woman in White' or the 'Chevalier d'Artagnan' to tell me stories from dawn to night." This is where Mr. Balfour's preferences would land many people, I am afraid, who would not realize, as he does, that fiction is a very minor part of the literature which forms our ozone. And even when we take his preference in a guarded sense, it requires some definition. Where, for example, would Ibsen come in? He does not cheer us. But he is literature because he does something else, which is equally vital. Obviously it would be a mistake to construct a criterion of literary excellence out of books which appeal to you on holiday or in bed or after the day's work has left your brain too tired for any pages that will prod the mind.

Photo by J. Russell & Sons. The Rt. Hon. A. J. Balfour, M.P.

No. 10, Downing Street,
the house always occupied by the Premier.

"For Heaven's sake, let us sit upon the ground,
And tell sad stories of the death of kings."

There is a large place in literature for these stories, and they need not be "sad" stuff, in the uncomplimentary sense of Mr. Harrison. Was it not FitzGerald who spent a bright summer morning over Tacitus' account of Nero? Which proves that FitzGerald was a true bookman, and that he knew, like a literary epicure, how to secure the proper relish for sad stories. I was "lying," he remarks drily, "at full length on a bench in the garden; a nightingale singing, and some red anemones eying the sun manfully not far off." That would be nearly as comfortable as lying in bed, and yet it is not incompatible with the enjoyment of books which cannot be called "amusing."

But the pleasure-giving qualities of literature have always appealed with curious force to Mr. Balfour. When he went to address the St. Andrews University students, he took the opportunity of crossing swords with Mr. Frederic Harrison on this very point. He refused to deplore what Mr. Harrison had severely called "this sewage

Photo by J. Valentine, Dundee.

Whittingehame House, Mr. Balfour's residence at Prestonkirk, N.B.

out-fall" of modern fiction, and he protested against the Spartan and rather superior discipline which the "Choice of Books" attempts to lay upon the necks of modern readers. "I am deliberately of opinion," he declared, "that it is the pleasures and not the spiritual or temporal profits of literature which most require to be preached in the ear of the ordinary reader." Again, the anti-utilitarian spirit of this protest is to be welcomed. "Why should not reading be desultory sometimes? Is there any law against indulgence in a literary saunter? Must you never read a book unless you mean to read every word? He has only half learnt the art of reading who has not added to it the even more refined accomplishments of skipping and skimming?" Besides pleading for this freedom from the law of serious purpose in reading, Mr. Balfour claimed that books were meant to satisfy the demands of rational curiosity, and that even the desire to know something about any subject—which is usually all that most of us can hope to know, in the majority of cases—is a legitimate motive for reading. The publishers of shilling textbooks to-day were justified years ago by Mr. Balfour. He met by anticipation the charge that little manuals necessarily encouraged a taste for smattering, the charge which Pope voiced in the lines—

"A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring."

Well, a little learning is only dangerous when it does not know it is little. And who was Pope to throw a stone like this?—Pope, who with the most imperfect knowledge of Greek translated Homer, with the most imperfect knowledge of the Elizabethan drama edited Shakespeare, and with the most imperfect knowledge of philosophy wrote the Essay on Man."

Literary allusions are rare in Mr. Balfour's pages, even when he is writing upon literature, and one is tempted to infer from this glance at Pope that the author's chief

Photo by Elliott & Fry

The Rt. Hon. A. J. Balfour.
(May, 1889.)

period in English literature is the eighteenth century. This is the impression left on my mind by his books. He does admit somewhere that the middle third of the nineteenth century has not much attraction for him; "I turn with pleasure from Thackeray and Dickens to Scott and Miss Austen, even from Tennyson and Browning to Keats, Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Shelley." But I have the feeling, though I cannot bring forward chapter and verse in support of it, that he turns often further back still in English literature, and that his excursions for pleasure in the field of books bring him into the curiously large company of those who haunt the age of Johnson, Swift, Walpole, and Addison. His interest in Berkeley is well-known. It is a philosophical predilection rather than a literary; still, it serves to corroborate the hypothesis which I have just suggested. In that case, Mr. Balfour and Mr. Harrison would be found for once on the same side, interested in an age which, as the latter said, did not do well in verse, though it produced prose which "ever tended to rise into poetry." This is only true of certain sections in the eighteenth century prose. Its

No. 10, Downing Street. Dining Hall known as Pitt's Dining Room.

This is one of the finest apartments in the house. It was built by the great Prime Minister whose name it bears. The table used when the Ministerial dinners take place here is the telescopic one which is seen drawn up against the wall. The room is shown as it was when Mr. Balfour was at Downing Street—he possesses two of the Burne-Jones "Perseus" series, one of which is seen on the wall.

No. 10, Downing Street.
The room that Mr. Balfour used as study and music room.

No. 10, Downing Street.
The room in which Cabinet meetings are frequently held.

No. 10, Downing Street.
The drawing room, or chief reception room, where hang portraits of the First Lords of the Treasury.

qualities of ease and level wit, at any rate, are those of which we are most reminded in Mr. Balfour's own style, not so much in his two large books on philosophy as in his numerous pamphlets, ranging from music to matter, from politics to religion. Huxley, who knew good English when he saw it, once praised the charm of his style, "which flows like a smooth stream, sparkling with wit and rippling with sarcasms enough to take away any reproach of monotony." He may have won this charm before he turned from Thackeray; but if he did not, it shows distinct affinities with the prose of the great essayists in the eighteenth century.

Upon the whole, however, Mr. Balfour cannot be called a man of letters in the strict sense of the term, not even in the sense in which that flexible title could be applied to his hero Bishop Berkeley. He has rarely given himself to literary subjects, and when he has handled them it has been with a general or philosophic air. As for literary allusions and quotations, he appears to avoid them almost as much as D'Artagnan fought shy of classical references in conversation; the sound of them meant something other than business to the musketeer, and the philosopher or politician seems able to make his points without their aid; he prefers the unaffected, unadorned style which misses the virtue of suggestiveness but manages to be as lucid as the writer means to be, or as the subject permits. Mr. Balfour does not often touch on literature, and when he does it is with a going far beyond—I will not say its future capacity, for I do not wish to set bounds to the power of science—but far beyond anything which it can do at present." He added: "The pleasures I derive personally from literary history are biographical." These are characteristic and timely words. Apparently, when Mr. Balfour turns to literature it is personality which he desires to trace, not any evolution of principles or forces. The latter interest him in philosophy and science, but he is alive to the incalculable fact of individual genius in literature, which is not to be melted down into the sociological currents of an age. This is good philosophy, in spite of Taine and his school, and Mr. Balfour's appreciation of it shows that his scientific prepossessions have not warped his sense of what is vital after all and above all in literature.

Photo by H. Walter Barnett. The Rt. Hon. A. J. Balfour.

No. 10, Downing Street. The Garden, on the site of the Royal Cockpit.

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

AUGUST, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original Lyric. Note: Several Colonial readers have written asking us to give more time for sending in papers for this Competition. As we cannot well do that, we announce now that we shall next month and again in the October Number offer further prizes of One Guinea each for the best original Lyric. This will give our Colonial readers the opportunity they ask for.

II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.

III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the most appropriate quotation from English literature to be placed on the Memorial of the late Sir W. S. Gilbert.

IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.

V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR JULY.

1.—Of the large number of Rondeaux sent in for this Competition the majority have been rather disappointing. Some Competitors have sent good verse that bears no resemblance to the Rondeau; some have sent Rondeaux that are not good verse. We publish a few of the best and award the PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA to Miss E. F. PARR, of 12, Worcester Terrace, Clifton, Bristol, for the following:

RONDEAU

Yea, verily, I loved thee once, Atthis, once long time ago"
SAPPHO

I loved you once, long time ago,
In youth, when gods their gifts bestow,
We two set forth new paths to tread
Towards the sunset's flaming red,
With dancing feet and hearts aglow.

Hushed is the music, soft and low,
Which through our dreams was wont to flow,
In silence now we meet . . . 'tis said
I loved you once!

No more for us the spring winds blow,
On misty hills soft falls the snow,
The trees are bare, the rose is dead,
The spirit of romance has fled . . .
Yet, 'tis a solace, dear, to know
I loved you once.

We select for printing:

RONDEAU.

(SWINBURNE'S MODEL.)

Goodbye, Jehane, from love of you I pray
That never, never, may you feel such pain
As I am feeling now when I must say Goodbye, Jehane.

Yet, it in years to come you should again
Return to me, though every hair be grey
And my poor broken life be on the wane,

Still shall you and me, as when yesterday
In young-love wise your cheek to mine was laid,
And you shall dream I said to you in play,
"Goodbye, Jehane."

(Norman Davidge Gullick, Wallingbrook School, Chulmleigh, North Devon.)

RONDEAU

My spinning-girl no distaff plies
'Neath her light foot no treadle flies,
But in her sunny garden close
'Mid roses white, herself a rose,
She spins until the daylight dies.

She takes the blue of Summer skies
She knows wherein the magic lies
Of floating cloud, and wind that blows—
My spinning-girl

Each russet leaf, each bird that flies,
Her radiant fancy doth dispose
To deck her spinning-music flows
From her sweet lips With lore lit eyes
She weaves a story, sweet and wise,
My spinning-girl

(A. M. Bowyer-Rosman, 40, Oxford Gardens, Ladbroke Grove, W.)

The Tennis Court, where greenly grows
The grass, as anybody knows,
Is just the place to introduce
A maid and man without excuse,
And there I met—well, call her "Rose"

And through the Summer when we chose,
We often, as you might suppose,
Put to a very proper use
The Tennis Court

The season drew towards a close;
Summer began to take a doze,
And when with racket and the Deuce
We made a temporary truce,
We were another pair of those—
The Tennis Caught.

(M. Thorpe, "Trevone," 41, Glenwood Road, Catford, S.E.)

RONDEAU.

Thou art so fair that all the morning air
Is filled with voices, singing praise of thee;
And only I am silent, for I dare
Not praise thy grace of form and beauty rare,
Lest in the song my hidden heart thou see.

And seeing, trill thy silver laugh of glee
At my long-sheltered love at last laid bare.
For kind of heart thou hast not need to be
Thou art so fair.

How couldst thou have for my poor heart a care,
Who from thy lovers' bows most swiftly flee,
Leaving them, worn and weary, to despair,
Their fullest homage given uselessly
Alas! thy beauty needs no praise of me,
Thou art so fair

(Mona Garrod Turner, Gazebo, Walberswick, Southwold.)

YOU CAME TO ME.

You came to me when skies were grey,
When ev'ry bird had hushed its lay,
Your tender tones, your winsome guise
Made me forget the leaden skies,
And hours bereft of warblings gay

Even fears that made my heart their prey,
Your gentle presence charmed away;
With Love's effulgence in your eyes
You came to me.

"God guard you, dearest, now and aye!"
At night and morn I fondly say
You led me to Love's paradise,
Where hand in hand, more pure and wise,
I walk with you, and bless the day
You came to me.

(Rev. Edwin C. Lansdown, The Manse, Derby Road South Woodford, N.E.)

And we specially commend the Rondeaus received from D. M. J. James (Huntly), Alice Grant Rosman (Ladbroke Grove), Joseph Barrow (Morpeth), Bernard Delorme (Canonbury), Mary Allan (Kilbarchan), R. S. Pollard (Longsight), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Annie G. Patrick (Birmingham), Mrs. Bond (Pinnet), Gladys Evelyn Warren (St John's Wood), Rose E. Sharland (Bristol), Thomas Hutchinson (Morpeth), J. Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke), E. Cornell (Upper Norwood), M. Thorpe (Catford), Margaret McIntyre (Ealing), Theodore Maynard (London, W.), Elizabeth A. Brielby (Hull), Emily Kingdon (Blairgowrie), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Arthur M. Berry (Luton), Percy Thomas (Hornsey), Robert White, Jun. (Edinburgh), Edmund Howard (Putney), E. M. Lindsay (Ealing), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Florence Bagster (Kendal), Ellen L. Clutterbuck (Bromley), G. Pickering (Hull), E. W. Priest (Norwich), Kitty Lilian Lyon (Wimbledon), Annie Hampton (St. Helens), Eric Trayler Cook (London, N.), Edwin Waters (Denmark Hill), B. G. Brooks (Wood Green), Margery Finch (Portsmouth), Cynthia Wontner (St. Leonards), Violet Pascoe Williams (Blackheath), E. W. Higgs (Clapton), Vernon H. Porter (Clapton), Gertrude Pitt (Hampstead), Miss C. M. Walkerdine (Birmingham), Jean Wilson (Cluppenthorn), Edward Ward (South Shields), Annie C. Reay (Canterbury), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), Maude Collett (Wimbledon), Winifred Goodwin (Clapham), Ethel Goodwin (Clapham), Miss B. Vickery (Bradford), Miss G. Hennings (St. Albans), Horace W. Walker (Beeston), M. A. Molyneux (St. Albans), Evelyn Emily Ho (Plumstead Common), John V. Shanks (Aberdeen), Tom Sefton (Bolton), Rev. J. A. S. Wilson (Edinburgh), Miss Poole (Canterbury), A. H. Scales (Paddington), Miss Creighton (St. Helens), Hester Marshall (London, S.W.), Anita Lea (Liverpool)

II. The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Mr. J. RICHARD ELLAWAY, of Lynmoor, Queen's Road, Basingstoke, for the following:

THE ORDINARY MAN AND THE EXTRAORDINARY THING. BY HAROLD BUCHER. (Hodder & Stoughton)

"He never used a big, big D"

W. S. GIBBERT, H.M.S. Pinafore.

We also print:

MISS BRADDON BY CLIVE HOLLAND.

"Come, mistress, you must tell us another tale"

SHAKESPEARE, Othello V. 1.

(Ernest A. Fuller, 10, The Circus, Greenwich, S.E.)

OH! MY UNCLE BY W. THIGMOUTH SHORE. (Swift.)

"My aunt! my poor deluded aunt!

Her hair is almost gray"

O. W. HOLMES—My Aunt.

(Charles Powell, "Dovedale," Victoria Park, Manchester.)

THE ORDINARY MAN AND THE EXTRAORDINARY THING BY HAROLD BUCHER (Hodder & Stoughton)

"Oh goes his bonnet to an oyster wench."

SHAKESPEARE—Richard II.

(Ernest S. Heron, 13, Grange Road, Chester.)

THE GOOD GIRL BY VINCENT O'SULLIVAN (Constable.)

"Up rose the sonne, and up rose Finche"

CHAUCER—The Knightes Tale.

(Mary Beale, 16, Stafford Road, Croydon)

A CANDIDATE FOR TRUTH BY J. D. BLISFORD. (Sidgwick & Jackson)

"Politics we bar"

W. S. GIBBERT—"Princess Ida."

(Rev. F. Herb, Rowlands Castle, Hants.)

THE MOON ENDURETH

BY JOHN BUCHAN (Blackwood)

"This requires some little reflection"

EDWARD LEAR—The Duck and the Kangaroo.

(Miss M. K. Perkins, 24, Claremont Road, Highgate, N.)

III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best four or six lines of verse on Johnson's dictum that "no one but a blockhead ever wrote except for money" is awarded to Mr. WILLIAM SUTHERLAND, of 2, North Grove, Roker, Sunderland, for the following:

When Johnson penned these lines on pell
He forged a dart to wound himself,
For he who writes gross gold to get
Has missed a nobler mark, and yet
The scribe who does not write to make it,
Would be a blockhead not to take it.

Good replies have also been received from E. Hunt (North Cornwall), R. S. Pollard (Longsight), Miss E.

4, Carlton Gardens, Mr. Balfour's London Residence.

The Rt. Hon. A. J. Balfour.

From a painting by Sydney Hodges, presented to the Constitutional Club (Northumberland Avenue) in 1894.

Reproduced by permission of the Committee of the Club.

Adams (Whitchurch), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Lettie Cole (Pontilas), Herbert Hodder (Kingston-on-Thames), H. W. Walker (Beeston), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Mrs. E. M. Knight (Rushden), G. F. A. Salmon (Penzance), Marie R. Brown (Glasgow), Margaret Dickin (Wrexham), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Maurice Frank (Stockwell), Miss Watson (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Doris Dean (Bromley), E. W. Higgs (Clapton), Miss E. F. Parr (Clifton), Winifred Goodwin (Clapham), A. R. Williams (Worcester), Ethel Goodwin (Clapham), Thomas Lanfear (London, S.E.), Kitty L. Lyon (Wimbledon), E. J. Thomas (Bristol), Joseph Barrow (Morpeth), E. J. Seymour (Kilburn), Albert Fuller (Cardiff), Albert E. Barnes (Beaconsfield), T. Maynard (London, W.), T. J. Anderson (St. John's Wood), M. A. Newman (Badingham), Margaret Denchfield (Banbury), Geo. Stanton (Leicester), Jean Wilson (Chippenham), Geraldine Tatlow (Chippenham), Margery Finch (Portsmouth), Miss Walkerdine (Birmingham), S. A. Doody (Boscombe), Rev. A. J. Ashley (Cannock), Donald R. Gooding (Southwold), A. Eleanor Pinnington (Brighton), Miss M. E. Fulkes (Upper Tooting), Laurence Tarr (East Ham), Alicia Williams (Bath), A. V. Waller (Sunderland), Ethel M. Odell (Forest Gate).

IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. Ernest A. Carr, of 12, Park Crescent, Tonbridge, Kent, for the following:

THE CELESTIAL OMNIBUS. BY E. M. FORSTER.
(Sidgwick & Jackson.)

The short story—most fugitive of literary forms—is here rendered classic by real dignity and distinction. These half-dozen subtle allegories are classical also in another sense; despite their modern setting, they are steeped in a pagan and pre-Christian atmosphere. The petty unrest of our time is ironically contrasted with ancient qualities—worship of simple beauty, imagination, a lofty and gracious quietude. One feels, too, the presence of vast primal influences; Pan moves through the thicket, dryads still haunt the groves that the builder has spared. This slender, spacious book offers "infinite riches in a little room."

We also select for printing:

FELIX CHRISTIE. BY PEGGY WEBLING. (Methuen.)
"Felix Christie" is a clever study of a young New Englander, who comes to the Old Country intending to make his name as a violinist and develops instead into a successful author. But the explanation of Christie's birth seems hardly sufficient to account for the very rapidly-formed friendship with Houghton Buckley and his family, which strikes one as slightly improbable, and it is also a little difficult to believe in Felix's strong attachment to Pearl. The book, however, contains one or two admirable scenes, while both Mrs. Christie and Lady Buckley are almost masterpieces as character sketches.

(Marjorie C. Barnard, 39, Nevern Square, S.W.)

THE GREAT STATE. Edited by H. G. WELLS, LADY WARWICK and G. R. S. TAYLOR. (Harpers.)

Milestones are extremely necessary things on a long walk. They are essential for a civilized community. "The Great State" is a national milestone, but it is hidden behind a hedge. It fails from over-modesty. H. G. Wells opens with a skilful and fundamental diagnosis of the social situation, and then steps gingerly towards a constructive scheme. He reminds us of the "Fabian Essays," whose policy became a laughing-stock, and himself takes safety in generalities. Here are essays for the politician, woman, doctor, artist or churchman in Utopia, but the most inspiring of all is Chiozza Money's "Work in the Great State." Every word carries conviction and stimulates dissatisfaction.

(R. S. Pollard, 14, Portland Road, Manchester.)

BLINDS DOWN. BY HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL.
(Smith, Elder & Co.)

Mr. Vachell's latest book, "Blinds Down," is one of his best. Divided into two parts, the first is undoubtedly the most powerful. The delineation of Rosetta's character is especially skilful, while the description of the two sisters and their surroundings could hardly be bettered. The second part drags somewhat, and we find it hard to believe that the daughter's life would be so exactly similar to the mother's. But the conversation and the dramatic moments, particularly when Rosetta reveals herself, are finely handled, and the life in the sleepy old town is a singularly accurate picture.

(Eleanor Pocock, 3, St. Stephen's Road, Ealing, London, W.)

STORIES WITHOUT TEARS. BY BARRY PAIN.
(Mills & Boon.)

There are few writers who see and record so much humour in everyday life as Mr. Barry Pain. For witty brevity he is incomparable. These stories are as good as any he has hitherto given us, especially the moral tales which conclude the volume. The plain girl who could make omelettes aux fines herbes: the desert which advertised its sunsets in vain; the schoolboys who organised the Banana Club—are all interesting and amusing creations; in fact, every one of the narratives is original, yet natural and instinct with quiet observation.

(Miss L. Mugford, Sutton-at-Hone, Near Dartford, Kent.)

QUEEN OF THE GUARDED MOUNTS. BY JOHN OXENHAM.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

This beautiful tale breaks like a freshet into the stale stream of modern fiction. The scenery, the clearly-visualised characters, the illuminating style, all fill the memory with pleasant mind-pictures. Clearest of all is the sweet figure of Renée de St. Aubin, who, with her father and brother, flees from their Breton home on Mont St. Michel to take refuge from the Revolution on our Cornish Mount St. Michael. Round the three refugees and round the twin Mounts of Brittany and Cornwall, is woven a deft story, full of action, continuous interest, and the exhilarating freshness of the sea.

(Alan C. Fraser, Highlands, Dodington, Bridgwater.)

CHARITY. BY R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM.
(Duckworth.)

Mr. Cunningham Graham has been called "The Aristocrat of English Letters," and it is a title distinctly applicable to the man. The stories—or rather sketches—in this volume, depend very largely on their style. All of them—especially the Spanish scenes and portraits—are alive with colour. And one of the studies, "Aunt Eleanor," carries with it an immensity of reality which none but a master could have achieved. For simple effectiveness, this picture of a Scoto-Yorkshire lady of the old school, whose chiefest joys were horses, hunting, and divines "in black Geneva gowns," is, we imagine, almost unsurpassed.

(J. F. Harris, St. John's College, Cambridge.)

We also highly commend the reviews sent in by Mary Kingdom (Mallaig), Geraldine Payne-Gallwey (Thirsk), A. R. Williams (Worcester), M. A. Newman (Badingham), Mary Cleland (Ellesmere), Alexander McGill, Junr.

No. 10, Downing Street. The room used by Miss Balfour as her boudoir.

(Glasgow), Miss H. Bellis (Southport), Miss F. Cartér-Squire (Shipley), Gertrude Pitt (Hampstead), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), Miss A. M. Weir (Arbroath), Maurice Frank (Stockwell), Catherine R. Glasgow (Westbury), Flora Thompson (Bournemouth), E. W. Higgs (Clapton), Frances D. Watson (Heaton Moor), Frank Haigh (Halifax), Miss L. Chamberlain (Llandudno), Florence Kari (Gloucester), George Stanton (Leicester), Miss Van der Pant (Ashford), Claude L. Penrose (Woolwich), X. Y. Z. (Cambridge), Gladys E. Warren (St. John's Wood), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Birmingham), D. E. Grant (Smethwick), Mary Ide Lantour (Ashford), Irene Pollok Lalonde (Bath), Hester Marshall (London, S.W.), L. Welby (Shanklin), Beatrix Terry (London, S.W.).

V. THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Mr. Ernest A. Fuller, of 10, The Circus, Greenwich, S.E.

NEW THOUGHT IN FRANCE.*

BY DR. WILLIAM BARRY.

M. BOUTROUX has found in his English translator such an excellent medium by whom to convey his mind to us that I am tempted to ask for more—a very little more, but of infinite utility as the world goes. To these thoughtful addresses a brief set of definitions might have been attached. The average reader, who knows what scientific and philosophic terms may mean as one of George Eliot's characters knew Latin—all in general but nothing in particular—should be charitably put in remembrance of the precise intent lurking under such words as "concept" and "intuition," "positive sciences," "synthetic and analytic relations," and even "empirical and logical," but especially should he learn how to distinguish between "concept" and "reason." For lack of some preliminary instruction touching the value of its pieces a game of mental chess may bring only confusion and checkmate to the player we call in from the street. M. Boutroux comprehends his own meaning so well; he does, for the most part, lay it before us with such grace and lucidity, that these precautions added would give to his arguments ten-fold power. He is dealing with real objects and interests common to all. But how few have ever looked at the A.B.C. of metaphysics! Yet this, quite strictly, is the subject in hand, namely, whether beyond physics and physical science there is anything to know, any kind of action not reducible to these phenomena, their laws, and formulæ, and consequences.

I will throw the question into an easier shape. For many years past, as those who study French life and French politics are aware, the governing authorities in Paris have made a dead set at religion—the Catholic being charged in the foreground—as if what we understand by it were some inferior, degenerate, and uncivilized form of thought, or, as they say, "mentality." What do these lawgivers, who control the state education from primary schools to Paris University, aim at substituting for the religion they proscribe? M. Boutroux keeps at a distance from political strife, but the answer is plainly indicated where he speaks, in his second lecture, on the attitude taken up by French "independent" moralists towards the old dogmatic or Christian creed. There is no mystery in it. The so-called "positive," otherwise "determinist," principle recognizes only one method of investigation, which it applies to every object, real or possible, and that is the method of "science." I call particular attention to the following significant passage—a master-key that will unlock many closed doors—"Nature, pure and simple," says M. Boutroux, "constitutes for present-day philosophy the collection of facts that are observable by our senses, and that determine one another in the manner conceived by science." Facts observed by the senses, brought into relation under laws which are only abbreviated summaries of these very facts, behold the subject-matter and the method which "positive science" claims to make its own, while undertaking to explain phenomena by them universally. "Observe and arrange," that is the whole secret; and the faculties involved are the senses with their corresponding memories. But as religion is much more than a collection of sensible events; and since it appeals to personalities conceived as outside and above "nature pure and simple," either it is a fiction or its validity is established by methods unknown to the experimentalist who cannot go beyond "the absolute assimilation of man with things."

In the French State schools this "absolute assimilation" has been taught under the name of "independent morality" for twenty-five years and upwards. The social order is explained as a system of mechanical forces ; and then children hear themselves exhorted to cultivate certain ideals, e.g., patriotism, liberty, fraternity, and other shibboleths of the year 1789. But these children are not only scientific phenomena ; they have strong appetites and growing passions ; and how will the teacher inspire them with motives to curb their wild desires ? What sanction except the fear of the policeman or of public opinion will he invoke ? These arguments may be effective to restrain bad conduct, but they will never make any conduct good ; for as motives they have nothing moral in them. As was excellently said long ago, all they could produce in human nature would be a species of " retrieving," and man would come forth from such an education about as moral as his dog or his horse. In fact, he comes forth, if we are to rely on French criminal statistics, much less disciplined than the animals we train. " Independent morality " is verbiage ; its code is a copy-book ; and there can be no such thing as duty in a machine. But men are not machines ; all too easily they take their place, like Bill Sykes, in a Newgate Calendar.

* "The Beyond that is Within," and other Addresses." By Emile Boutroux, Member of the French Institute, Professor of Modern Philosophy at the University of Paris. Translated by Jonathan Nield. 3s. 6d. net. (Duckworth & Co.)

Stripping the facts of those delicate wrappings in which M. Boutroux, always polite, has folded them up, I could exhibit some very unpleasant illustrations of a morality divorced from religion after this manner in France. But he, with a certain gracious timidity and self-control, points out why it must be so ; on " the data of positive science " no sufficient reasons are discoverable why the laws of ethics should bind us. No, indeed, self-will is not good will, and how can it be changed to good will without loving good ? Where in physical relations shall we find the power to change it ? Nevertheless, without the goodwill of multitudes society cannot endure. The French State religion is melting away into moral anarchy. The school has become a forecourt of the prison.

Alarmed by these and the like observations, founded on a great consensus of testimonies from all sides, M. Boutroux is led to ask whether we must not " overstep the range of science ; " whether its method is the only valid one ; and whether its principle of " continuity " or " identity " can be applied when it yields results so little to our satisfaction as men, who feel bound, after all, to " follow our star," the true ideal ? Science takes " the Given " for its province ; is there not a " Beyond," in us and above us, to which we are akin ? Ought we not to say with Pascal that man stands midway between the cause and the effect ? that in his life—the life he is called upon to live as reasonable and loving—the scheme of things arrives at an interpretation in any other way unattainable ? The instrument by which this harmony is effected M. Boutroux denominates reason ; it is " the faculty which, above physical and logical relations, sets relations of concrete intelligibility—interconnecting no longer facts or concepts, but living beings."

A question here forces itself on our notice which cannot be passed over. Has this eminent French professor made acquaintance with Cardinal Newman's " Grammar of Assent " ? I think it most unlikely. Yet Newman wrote before 1870, " Our most natural mode of reasoning is not from propositions to propositions, but from things to things, from concrete to concrete, from wholes to wholes." The " reason " of M. Boutroux is the " illative sense " of Newman, in touch with life. And it is life which proclaims by hard stubborn facts, " chieft that winna' ding," the bankruptcy of physical science when attempting to domineer over things too high for it. Our author drives the lesson home. " It is just because of its construction," he says, " under the guidance of reason, that the object with which reflective and scientific thought confronts its concepts possesses an objective value." This " inner Beyond " of which we are conscious, is " the condition of the essential elements of human life, viz., action, volition, and perception, as therein revealed to us." And the more expressive are those forms in height and depth of being, so much the more will they repay our efforts to develop them as living powers. Physical science may reckon its triumphs precisely because it has, in its own province, aimed at the mastery of nature by well devised experiment, which always combines intuition with concept, and both with concrete reality. But so does art, so metaphysics, and surely religion has ever implied the communion of spirit with spirit.

I cannot pause here to do more than suggest how like is this argument of M. Boutroux to Mr. Balfour's general reasoning in " The Foundations of Belief." The French writer offers it in a constructive way, and very gently, as to men lately convalescent from materialism. He might, with Mr. Balfour, have made it the fulcrum of a terrible dilemma ; either admit these grand human acquisitions to be real and not delusive, or confess that science itself has no more solid basis in fact than they have. A third line of inference may be followed, closely resembling Newman's in the " Grammar," if we affirm that life has its rights, its justification, and its inward harmony, not only as certain as physical science ever could show, but more primitive and of larger compass. The stroke which establishes art, metaphysics, and religion in their respective sovereignties, reveals the abysses of consciousness and conscience, or in St. Paul's magnificent language, the " deep Things " of God and man. Thus will the " inner Beyond," once it is acknowledged, " bestow a real value," says M. Boutroux, " upon those methods of inward and outward observation which at an earlier stage we felt bound to reject as insufficient." Using plainness of speech we may translate these carefully toned-down words into a series of English sentences, thus : the admission of a faculty which apprehends and judges the concrete is the only possible alternative to scepticism ; but, if admitted, that faculty will declare the existence of other worlds besides " Nature pure and simple," worlds therefore " supernatural " from the point of view taken by physical science, not continuous with it, nor to be interpreted in its technique ; summing up the whole in Schopenhauer's memorable dictum, " There is a metaphysics."

The reality and the function of " wisdom " or philosophy have in this manner been ascertained. It " looks for the connection between science and action ; it responds to the need of knowing whether existence, in so far as it transcends the compass of science, is still within the grasp of the intellect, of the reason, of human thought." M. Boutroux, as we gather from these words, would not be rightly numbered with pure mystics. The harmony that he desires to see accomplished between all the varying lines of human action and reflection is, like that contemplated by Aristotle, a creation of the mixed, but it must be a living mind imparting to its own vision the judgment of reality without which all would be a dream. He calls on those who are now opponents to be reconciled, not by the suppression of any element in our complex nature, but by enlarging the circle in which every one may find its place. I consider his persuasive volume to be among the most notable symptoms—and they are multiplying—of New Thought in France. When that thought has gained its legitimate influence the Republic will no longer banish the name of God from its decrees and religion from its schools. I have given myself the pleasure of analysing briefly M. Boutroux's admirably-timed lectures; and I can pay them no more sincere compliment.

New Books.

AN IRISH CAVALIER.*

Lady Burghclere has written a most attractive biography. It would be pleasant to add that she has written a fresh and judicial history, but it would not be true. She has attempted to give us here (despite the modesty of her title) not only the life but the times of Ormonde, and, while the life is a great success both in interest and in portraiture, the times are a success only in interest. Lady Burghclere seems to have made no deep study of seventeenth-century Ireland. She light-heartedly entitles the fifth chapter in her first volume "Massacre and Rebellion," for instance, thus giving an entirely false conception of the nature of the rising of 1641. It is surely time that responsible historians should cease to perpetuate an ancient calumny originally invented for political reasons. Lecky was no partisan of the native Irish, but he has stated it as his deliberate judgment that "the rebellion was a defensive war, entered into in order to secure a toleration of the religion of the Irish people . . . It may boldly be asserted that the statement of a general and organized massacre is utterly and absolutely untrue." Unfortunately, Lecky only touched seventeenth-century Ireland in passing; not until we have someone to do for Ireland of the seventeenth century what Lecky did for Ireland of the eighteenth century, are writers such as Lady Burghclere likely to cease repeating the old prejudices and errors. But, even without another Lecky, it is strange that she should permit herself to say of a people who were fighting for the freedom of their religion and the repossession of their homes that "it was no exalted patriotism, but pillage and revenge that commended the war to the natives of Ulster."

More original, as an instance of Lady Burghclere's failure to grasp the realities of seventeenth-century Ireland, is her condonation of Wentworth's attempt to suppress the Irish woollen industry.

"[Wentworth] has frequently been reproached" (says the author) "for wilfully destroying the cloth manufacture, in order that the Irish, who, as regards bare necessities, were a self-sufficing people, should be kept dependent on England. But Free Traders should hesitate before they endorse this accusation, since his action consisted in repealing the prohibition to support wool."

Unfortunately for Lady Burghclere, the "accusation" against Wentworth of undermining the woollen trade of the Irish for English ends is made on the strength of his own letters on the matter: "for," he wrote, "they [the Irish] might beat us out of the trade itself by underselling us which they were able to do." There may be theories of Imperialism according to which Wentworth's action is defensible. But to defend it on the ground of Free Trade is like defending some of the great assassinations of history on the ground of eugenics. It is to ignore equally the larger consequences of the deed and the motives of the perpetrator.

In spite of the gaps and errors in the historical background against which we see him, however, Ormonde stands out in the present volumes with a wonderful reality and spell; the fact that, in comparison with nearly all whom he served, he was so much the man of honour, gives his figure an abiding interest of nobleness. Exceptional in strength, witty, judicious, tolerant, fearless, a ruler of men, he was for long the bulwark of the Stuart power in Ireland—the very model of the best sort of Cavalier. His loyalty to the Stuarts seems to me one of the psychological puzzles of history. As a youth, he saw his family robbed and ruined by one Stuart and one Duke of Buckingham; as an old man, towards the end of a life of service, he found himself ignored and ostracized by another Stuart and another Duke of Buckingham; yet never for a moment did his loyalty to the throne waver. He accepted the service of the monarchy as a sort of religious duty. "However ill I may stand at Court," he declared in a fine sentence, "I am resolved to live well in the chronicle." Both in his notion of duty and in his thirst for fame he is like a character out of the Heroic Age. It would not be far from the truth to say that he served king first and conscience afterwards. Yet there was not a servile inch in his body. When the all-powerful Wentworth ordered peers and commoners alike to lay aside their swords on entering the Parliament in Dublin, Ormonde alone resisted the officer's attempt to disarm him at the door and told him that "if he had his sword it should be in his guts." It was a dangerous piece of independence, and it was doubtful for some time whether it was going to ruin Ormonde or to make him. And though, nearly forty years after this, he was submissive enough under the slights of Charles II., he was good-humouredly, not cravenly, so. When, during this period, Colonel Cary Dillon came to ask him to further his interests with the king, observing that he had no friend at Court but God and His Grace, the Duke replied with a whimsical cynicism: "Alas! poor Cary, I pity thee; thou couldest not have two friends that had less interest at Court, or less respect shown them there."

* "The Life of James, First Duke of Ormonde, 1610-1688." By Lady Burghclere. Portraits. 2 Vols. 28s. net. (John Murray.)

From "The Life of James, Duke of Ormonde," by Lady Burghclere (John Murray)

Kilkenny Castle.

There is no period of his life when Ormonde shows more attractively than in those times of misfortune. He was born to be a figure of romance, but he becomes doubly so when King Charles publicly frowns upon him and when Buckingham's scoundrels, Flood and the others, set upon him at night in St. James's Street and gallop him off towards the gallows at Tyburn with the intention of stringing him up there. Lady Burghclere excels in giving us a vivid narrative of adventures of this romantic sort. She brings out the quality of the man clearly, too, by the method of her narrative—his tolerance, his serenity, his unfailing humour, his outspokenness, his fidelity to what will seem to most people nowadays a narrow conception of public duty. His extraordinary Cavalier loyalty is seen in his perfectly sincere reference to the dead Charles II.—the King who "had used him, laughed with him, flouted him, and leant on him"—as the "best King, the best master, and (if I may be so saucy as to say so) the best friend that man ever had." It was because, little of a mystic though he was, he had a kind of religious loyalty to kings in his blood, that he who might have revolutionized Ireland never did anything bigger than carry on the King's Government in it. He was a great Cavalier, even a great governor, rather than a great statesman. It is fitting that he should have been buried in Westminster Abbey, for he faithfully represented the English and not the Irish interest in Ireland. At the same time, even those who hold that his ideals were absolutely wrong must respect him as the noblest of the moderate men who appeared on the other side in the age of the Stuarts.

ROBERT LYND.

HOW 'T WAS.*

Mr. Reynolds' great reputation is hardly likely to be increased by this very unequal book. Some of the sketches in it are worthy to rank with the best work in "A Poor Man's House" or "Alongshore," but some are most decidedly not. The fact is, there must always be a danger in collecting together in one volume work from many different papers and reviews which have appeared over a considerable number of years, and the book before us is a very fair example of what that danger is. Considering that Mr. Reynolds is a writer of really remarkable ability, it must be admitted that he has done himself a dis-service in printing here such sketches as "The Log of the Bristol Beauty," "Robbery Robbed," "Dear Papa's Love-Story," "A Marriage of Learning," and some of the cat studies. However, it is no good cavilling too much, especially when one comes to consider how many capital, and even impressive, things there are left. Of the thirty sketches and stories that make up this curiously varied book, perhaps one would not be far wrong in picking out the following seven as the ablest things in it: "An Unofficial Divorce," "The Beach-comber," "Silly Saltie," "A Love's Hunger," "May-Babies," "Self-Exiled," "A Third-Class Journey." They show Mr. Reynolds at that high level of clear and vivid portraiture, of finished and simple writing, that cause his best work to be excellent in so singular a degree. The truth is that he belongs to a very rare class of realist—that is, a realist who does not exaggerate realism in much the same way as the romantics invariably exaggerated romance. In dealing with the fisher-folk of the West Country he seems to have attained an extraordinary understanding of the psychology of a class, and he conveys it to us with great literary cunning. No sooner does he begin to talk in dialect than he appears instinctively to enter into the thoughts of his fishermen. The kind of awkwardness which acts like a barrier between class and class is broken down at a touch. It is very interesting to watch how naturally he slips into their souls just by slipping into their speech. It is in this respect that he is unique, and it would sound to most people like a truism to suggest that he is better employed writing about the inhabitants of the sea-shore than about anything else. And yet readers of the "Holy Mountain" will remember how brilliantly he succeeded on altogether different ground, and one would not willingly have missed that racy book. And here, too, strangely enough, the story which of all others has most riveted us is neither a story of the sea nor a satire such as the "Holy Mountain," but the haunting and tender study of stifled love, called "A Love's Hunger." This is the story of a girl who marries a doctor who loves her, but is never able to tell her so—not even on his death-bed. In the very fullness of its restraint it is profoundly moving. It has the sweet and indefinable sadness of a Turgenev story. Here, then, is Mr. Reynolds in a new and exquisite vein, which most certainly he ought to develop further. The only other piece we need mention particularly is the travel sketch, named "A Third-Class Journey," which relates how the author and his mate Jim, went for a holiday to Marseilles. This, which is much the longest thing in the book, is but a plain record of events and sensations, but it is told with a distinction and a detailed and unobtrusive realism that mark Mr. Reynolds as a writer of true originality.

* "How 'Twas: Short Stories and Small Travels." By Stephen Reynolds, 5s. net. (Macmillan.)

In short, "How 'Twas," though it is disappointing in the sense that most mélanges are, and because its best work is not superior to the best work in some of Mr. Reynolds' other books, is, nevertheless, a remarkable performance. It certainly contains mediocre things, but it also contains things which are representative of its author's finest achievements.

RICHARD CURLE.

THE LISTENERS AND OTHER POEMS.*

Reverie has never made a more magical book than Mr. Walter de la Mare's third book of poems. For the most part, either they take the form of childish memories or their atmosphere is like that of overpowering memory. Never was child so tyrannous a father to the man. He does not recall things as Jefferies did the yellowhammer singing in the sun upon an ash branch in the field called Stewart's Mash, but always drowned, softened, reduced, and with a more or less distinctly sad sense of remoteness. Sometimes he announces the element of memory by beginning "When thin-strewn memory I look through" or "Once" or "One Summer's day," while in "The Journey" voices "seemed" to cry "vaguely from the hiding-place of memory." The number of poems thus labelled is small, but coming together at the beginning they give an unmistakable keynote to the whole.

In one poem he relates how Martha used to tell the children stories beginning "Once upon a time":

"And her beauty far away
Would fade, as her voice ran on,
Till hazel and summer sun
And all were gone:—
"All foredone and forgot;
And like clouds in the height of the sky,
Our hearts stood still in the hush
Of an age gone by."

Even so is the world often "all foredone and forgot" in

* "The Listeners and other Poems." By Walter de la Mare. 2s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

these poems, and the poet's and the reader's hearts thus stand still—to see the three cherry trees:

"There were three cherry trees once,
Grew in a garden all shady;
And there, for 'delight of so gladsome a sight,
Walked a most beautiful lady,
Dreamed a most beautiful lady . . ."

or the very old woman living alone, who once was young,

"But age apace
Comes at last to all;
And a lone house filled
With the cricket's call;
And the scampering mouse
In the hollow wall."

Once he goes far back—"hundreds of years away"—and sees a Guinevere, a Helen, and a Cleopatra, unlike those of any other poet. Once the witch's eyes slant "through the silence of the long past." Once he uses the device of an epitaph:

"Here lies a most beautiful lady, Light of step and heart was she."

The scene of one poem is a stone house, in a forest by a lake, named only "Alas." At the moonlit door of another lone house a traveller knocks:

"But only a host of phantom listeners
That dwelt in the lone house then,
Still listening in the quiet of the moonlight
To that voice from the world of men"

Or the scene is the palace of the King of Never-to-be or a graveyard, or in "the shades of Arabia." Arabia is the name of one of Mr. de la Mare's provinces, and it is a proof of his mastery that he can use this name and make it so perfectly his own while retaining all that the name means to those who are neither travellers nor geographers. It would be valuable and delightful to study the elements which contribute to the mystery of these poems. There are palaces, cottages, orchards, graveyards, all having something of the partly conventional, partly fantastic quality of those things to a child of small experience: the graveyard in particular is such a perfect idea of a graveyard as a child might make out of a story or a poem, yet I do not know where to find a more vivid sense of the grave than in this first verse of "The Bindweed":

"The bindweed roots pierce down
Deeper than men do lie,
Laid in their dark-shut graves
Their slumbering kinsmen by."

Mr. de la Mare's birds and flowers are most beautiful, but his book is not natural history. His "Owl and Newt and Nightjar, Leveret, Bat and Mole," are of the sixteenth century. The Asphodel and Anemone are among his flowers, as Lethe is among his rivers. Dreams come to him from "gloomy Hades and the whispering shore." His hawthorn "hath a deathly smell." His snow frightens the starlings with its pale glare. There are witches in his country who carry "charms and spells and sorceries" in their packs. Cupid has once been met there, certainly alive. But the dead in that country are more than the living.

Without such a study, it is clear that Mr. de la Mare's magic is very richly compounded of childish experience, of Nature and books, of queer, half-understood or misunderstood things, and of the oldest mysteries. For all the atmosphere is tinged with sadness; very beautiful things—"and clash of silver, beauty, bravery, pride"—are seen in a faintly malevolent haze of time or distance. That when the poet speaks in his own person his melancholy should be overt cannot surprise anyone who realises how few of any man's hours can after all be given to reverie; how difficult or unlovely must appear the broken, scattered, or jangled things outside that province. He writes as an "exile" who would certainly not write if he were not exile, if he could always be at "Alas" or the "Dark Chateau," or upon those mountains whose "untroubled snows" his ghost is thirsting for. He is one of the most welcome of the many exiles who have been among us.

EDWARD THOMAS.

MARTIN HARVEY.*

We could wish this book to be read by every young actor, and placed in the hands of every young playgoer. Mr. Edgar is out to champion no peculiar views of art, unless it be that the art of the stage should be taken seriously; but even this championship, if it be granted, is in the nature of an unrehearsed effect. He is an avowed admirer of his subject, an admirer of old standing, who has seen our youngest actor-manager not only in London, but in Liverpool and Manchester, Glasgow and Edinburgh; and has watched his slow, sure progress with growing enthusiasm.

Mr. Martin Harvey's progress from humble walking gentleman to the central figure in "Edipus Rex" is full of fascination; and in inducing him to talk about himself and his art Mr. Edgar has placed us under a double obligation, and provided the ordinary reader as well as the playgoer with several hours of delightful literary recreation. The book is full of good stories. To some of us not the least attractive part of the work will be found in the pages devoted to Sir Henry Irving, and the old days at the Lyceum. We see again from a very intimate standpoint the man who must be regarded as the pioneer of modern English acting. "In the theatre," Mr. Martin Harvey is recorded as saying, "Irving was a great teacher of technique. No one could teach better than Irving, if the actor were prepared to take a lesson. Many people with him were not prepared to learn, and did not. I have seen Irving teach a man how to play his part, and in doing so hold the whole company hushed and on the verge of tears. I have heard the same man, after the rehearsal, turn to his fellows with no more to say than, 'The old man is very tiresome this morning! What is called the

* "Martin Harvey: Some Pages of His Life." By George Edgar. With 20 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. (Grant Richards.)

Martin Harvey.

A portrait study by H. Walte Sanderson.
From "Martin Harvey," by George Edgar (Grant Richards).

technique of acting has always appealed strongly to Mr. Martin Harvey. In this lies the secret of his hold upon the public. He "sees in his body the instrument of his art—it is what the paint and brushes are to the painter, the music score to the composer, the written word or the printed book to the writer." As Mr. Edgar says:

"The ceaseless effort to improve and control every physical attribute has left its mark upon his personality. The years he has spent in cultivating his physical resources mark him out from the race of ordinary men, by the sound of his voice, the unconscious personal grace betrayed by his movements and the attention he gives to such details as the spontaneous emphasis of a word of conversation by the appropriate gesture."

There is an appreciative foreword from the pen of M. Maeterlinck, concerning Mr. Martin Harvey's impersonation of Pelléas. And the volume, which shows us the man as well as the actor, is embellished by some very attractive photographs.

LORD REDESDALE'S ESSAYS.*

This book is pleasant reading because it draws upon the full experience of one who is under no compulsion to write. It is never wearisome, for the author is never wearied. Even when what he says is not new, the old is enlivened by his own interest in it, and fortunately his interest is not diminished in the subject of Japan on which, many years ago now, he established himself as an authority with something fresh to say.

Lord Redesdale was brought up on Harrison Ainsworth, with the result that the Tower of London has inspired in him a life-long reverence. Kit and Mauger and Simon Renard and the Hot Gospeller were very real personages to him, and he believed without doubting the story of Anne Boleyn's ghost as told him by an old officer of the Coldstreams. He fed his young imagination upon this tragedy in stone. It was his very good fortune, therefore, to be able later in life to do something for the material fabric of his visions. The Tower, being a palace, a prison and a fortress with barracks, receives the attentions of the Lord Chamberlain, the Constable of the Tower, and the War Office. The structure itself is the concern of the Office of Works, of which Lord Redesdale became Secretary in 1874. The ancient buildings were then in a very bad way. They had not been used as a palace since the reign of James II., they were no longer a prison, and in the zeal to make the most of them as barracks the authorities had hidden away all the romance behind wretched military stores. The Hawthorn tower had been burned down, and on its site rose a warehouse that masked the whole Tower from the river. Public interest in it had fallen away when it ceased to be the fashion to go there to see the lions. Its menagerie, dating from the coming of three leopards (a compliment to the royal coat-of-arms of England) from the Emperor Frederick in 1235, was removed in 1826 to found the Zoological Gardens in Regent's Park. Mr. Planché had just started in earnest on his battle with the War Office which insisted on a "line of Kings," or at any rate of great personages in armour, from Norman times. As Mr. Guy Laking says in an interesting note on the armoury of the Tower, Rowlandson's aquatint of 1781 reveals almost as much absurdity as was witnessed a hundred years earlier by Mons. Teravin de Rocheford, who was shown among the Tower's arms a musket of William the Conqueror.

All this is leading up to the author's share in the interesting incident he relates in the chapter that gives a title to his volume. Of all the buildings in the Tower, none had suffered more neglect than the Chapel of St. Peter ad Vincula. Macanlay has a purple passage upon its barbaric defacement, and Lord Redesdale's account is not less condemnatory if more matter-of-fact. Accordingly when Sir John Taylor reported in 1876 that something must be done at once if the chapel were to be saved, Queen Victoria signified to Lord Redesdale her acquiescence in the necessary work, at the same time enjoining care and reverence in disturbing the bones of the illustrious dead lying in it. A plan was prepared showing the position in which, according to the best historical authorities, the various persons had been interred and a beginning was made on the north side of the chancel, where it was believed was the grave of Anne Boleyn. There was a thrill of emotion, the author tells us, when at two feet below the surface they came upon the bones of a woman of from twenty-five to thirty years of age. Anne Boleyn was twenty-nine at the time of her death, and there could be no doubt that this was indeed the unhappy Queen.

"The bones were slender and beautifully formed—narrow feet and hands, delicate limbs in excellent proportion, the vertebrae very small, the atlas (the joint nearest the skull) tiny—(remember her laughing at her 'lyttel neck' on the eve of her execution!) Every particle of earth was passed through a sieve, so that not a splinter of bone should be left, and all the remains were piously gathered together for re-burial."

Later on, digging to the south of Anne Boleyn's grave, the workmen found the bones of a tall stalwart man, corresponding to the description of the Duke of Northumberland. The skull was there, however, and would not the "head of a traitor" have been exposed on London Bridge? But the records when turned up showed that as an act of grace the Duke's head was buried with his body, and that what seemed to raise a doubt was converted into indirect testimony of accuracy.

As has been indicated, on the subject of Japan—that is in the greater part of the book—Lord Redesdale is unfailingly fresh. He writes also on Leonardo da Vinci, landscape gardening, the history of paper, and if none of his essays on these has the deep interest of that on the Tower, each has individuality. His views on photography will not please all its practitioners, we own ourselves in agreement with him in condemning those experiments in reflections which torture "the countless smiles of the sea" into the grievances of a circus clown. But the opinions in this volume, though quite definite, are aired with charm, and are never provocative.

D. S. MELDRUM.

THE LADY NEXT DOOR.*

Mr. Harold Begbie's abrupt transformation from a man of versatile talent into a writer with the inspiration of genius is one of the most curious events in the modern literary world. It would make another striking foot-note to William James's revolutionary study of the varieties of religious experience. Mr. Begbie is now distinguished from a hundred writers with whom he used to rank by the sharp and clear insight into human nature with which a profound and settled faith in God has suddenly endowed him. He has broken clean through the fabric of our materialistic civilisation. He sees this strange, novel, complex system of industrialism, in which we are all now entangled, in an old and yet a new light. Regarding all the intricate machinery of the most advanced societies he asks: "What is its ultimate effect upon the human spirit?" To him the world, with all its new inventions and its new organisations, remains what it was at the beginning—a place of spiritual conflict in which souls are shaped and character moulded.

In his present book he applies his illuminating way of studying modern problems to one of the most hackneyed topics in British politics. "The Lady Next Door" is Ireland—a young and capable matron, seated at a fireside, who raises her grey eyes to the visitor and says with a whimsical play of laughter at her lips: "I wish to do my own housekeeping. I think I can do it in a better way and more cheaply than other people can do it for me. I want to be left alone to attend to my own business and bring up my own family in my own way." The old gentleman next door, says Mr. Begbie, may be alarmed by this

* "A Tragedy in Stone, and Other Papers." By Lord Redesdale. 7s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)

* "The Lady Next Door." By Harold Begbie. 6s. (Hodder and Stoughton.)

ambition, but the lady really has no more evil intent against his prosperity than to sell him the surplus of her butter and eggs.

So the book begins. But after discussing the lady's affairs in a fresh, picturesque and telling manner, Mr. Begbie draws an extraordinary and arresting conclusion. In spite of his own impassioned and settled belief in the fundamental ideas of Protestantism, he inclines to think that Catholic Ireland, after a generation of self-government, will become a centre of radiating spiritual influences that may yet save the Anglo-Saxon race from the greatest of all maladies—atrophy of the soul.

"In Catholic Ireland—even in the most ignorant of the peasants, the most demoralised of the urban population—spiritual life is the supreme reality. . . . One is tempted to cry out to England, with all the energy of one's soul, that she has taken a wrong road, that ruin awaits her in the near distance, that at all hazards she must stop and get back as soon as possible to the path of nature . . . I believe it is good for England to possess, close at her luxurious door, this modest, affectionate and thrifty people who are struggling to live the spiritual life."

In "Aspects of the Irish Question"* Mr. Sydney Brooks has written in small compass a comprehensive book on Ireland, remarkably fair in tone, except, perhaps, in regard to the character of the Irish priesthood. He is convinced that when Ireland takes completely in hand the management of her own affairs there will be a quiet but effectual revolt against the political power of the parish priest. In his view it is the English Government that is responsible for the present political influence of the Roman Catholic clergy, that has been converted into a kind of moral police force by English statesmen, the purchase price in this transaction being the control by religious bodies of the instruction of the people. This, maintains Mr. Sydney Brooks, is the origin of the real "Rome Rule," which will be effectively destroyed in a struggle between clericals of all creeds against the popular control of education.

A HISTORY OF THE MODERN WORLD.

The downfall of Napoleon marked the end of a great epoch in history, but the century that followed has been of immense interest and importance in the development of the world. It has seen the establishment of a new Europe with a different balance, with new ideas of inter-relations, it has seen the emergence of the United States as a great world power, the phenomenal birth of Japan, the signs that prelude the rousing of China, the partition of Africa, the consolidation of Italy and of Germany. It has had its share of wars, shattering and constructive, of statesmanship in mighty schemes, of unprecedented works of engineering, of great scientific discovery, of new ideas of life and sociology. While lacking a Napoleon in whom a whole era might be summed up and concentrated, the century that has just ended produced a great number of men of wide and wise ideas and policy, whose work and influence while less dazzling than Bonaparte's, were tremendous factors in moulding the destinies of the modern world. A plain impartial history of the past hundred years cannot fail to be of absorbing interest.

Yet in looking through Mr. Browning's two large volumes, it was impossible not to wonder just for what public it was written. Hardly for the historian or the advanced student of history, who would go for his information to the sources from which Mr. Browning drew. For Mr. Browning expressly and truly declares in his preface that his book "has no pretensions to originality or research. It is a plain account of the political events of ninety-five years, more than seventy of which have passed during the writer's lifetime, and nearly seventy within his recollection." For thirty years Mr. Browning taught history in Cambridge University, and during that time most of the material of

* "Aspects of the Irish Question." By Sydney Brooks. 3s. 6d. net. (Maunsell.)

+ "A History of the Modern World, 1815-1910." By Oscar Browning, M.A. 2 Vols. 21s. net. (Cassell.)

Photo by J. Palmer Clarke, Cambridge

Mr. Oscar Browning.

the present book formed the subject of his lectures. And this seems to me to be indicated in the very personal manner which is often discernible in the pages before us. The earlier part of the book is concerned with matters chiefly European, and for this Mr. Browning has had the usual accepted authorities to help him in framing his narrative, which certainly gives an excellent facts of events, though it seems to demand no little previous knowledge on the part of the reader. But towards the latter part of the work we begin to find less a history than an exposition of Mr. Browning's personal bias in his way of recounting events. This would be delightful in a series of articles for the reviews, or in lectures, but seems to detract from the value of any history seriously intended to represent the course and tendencies of the affairs of the world.

For example, when it becomes necessary to speak of Chamberlain's adoption of the policy of Tariff Reform.

"Now, however, for what reason can only be conjectured, Chamberlain lent the force of his will and his great influence over the masses to attempt to reverse this policy (Free Trade). He had recently paid a visit to South Africa, during which he must have become convinced that the Boer War, for which he was ready to assume the responsibility, was a blunder, if not a crime; and the idea of inaugurating a new policy with which his name might be connected may have occurred to him in his solitary broodings, either on the illimitable veldt or on the voyage home."

"Protection is the coward's refuge. . . . Happily the danger has been averted."

Now, anyone may legitimately hold strongly to Free Trade or to Tariff Reform, and he may legitimately and laudably express his adherence, and Mr. Browning has every right to his opinions and to free speech. But that is not how a great historian writes.

Again, there is a remarkable proportion of space devoted to the details of various wars. Surely in a history of the modern world it is less important to know the movements of a campaign—especially when at the most only a cramped and insufficient account can be given, than the movements and progress of national and international affairs. Yet quite one-sixth of the two volumes is devoted to war narrative, while many of the most truly important happenings and phenomena of recent times are neglected. From the most diligent reading of this work it would be impossible to obtain any inkling of the tremendous rise of Germany as a naval power, the Kaiser is hardly mentioned, nor do we hear of the great European statesmen of to-day; the revolution in Turkey is not spoken of, nor is there a word of the progress of the Labour movement, nor of the phenomenon of the Trusts in America. The truth is that the scope of the work was too great for any but the most consummate skill in handling and arranging with due regard to perspective and proportion. The attempt is to be commended, but the result is not altogether satisfactory. Beyond doubt every reader of such a book will cavil at finding in it things which seem to him scarcely deserving of extended treatment, and at not finding any mention of matters that, in his judgment, are of the highest importance. But this work transgresses to an extent that is impossible to attribute to the caprice of a captious reader; the information conveyed is trustworthy—our complaint is against the extraordinary omissions and the lack of proportion in the plan.

F. M. A.

THE JULY MONARCHY.*

"Since I have reached the age of reason," writes the Comtesse de Boigne in one of the later chapters of this supplementary volume of her memoirs, "I have seen three powerful Governments fall, all by suicidal abuse of the principle which brought them into being. The Empire had fallen by its obstinate persistency in despotism and war; the Restoration by a senseless and inopportune revival of legitimist claims; the July monarchy by a reluctance, which reached the point of cowardice, to abandon strict legal forms, and to disregard the Paris middle class." The present volume opens with France settling down after the events that led to the July monarchy, and it closes with "universal suffrage for the first time in operation," and the cries of "Long live Reform!" which ushered in the Second Republic. It was for the most part a strange and incoherent episode in French history. The shadow of the great Revolution lay upon men's minds; the menace of the holy alliance was in their thoughts; while the working classes, ignorant, poor, and lacking political power, were beginning to be stirred by the Socialistic teaching of Louis Blanc and his like. "The time for purely political movement in France is past," wrote Stein in 1842, "the next revolution must inevitably be a social revolution." The memories of Chateaubriand, of Talleyrand, of Pasquier, of Guizot, and of a crowd of others, give us the varying phases of public opinion during this period, but inasmuch as these men were, like Madame Roland, stating a case for impartial posterity, their writings belong to a category different from those of Madame de Boigne.

That lady, as those will remember who have read the former volumes which M. Charles Nicoulland has given to the world, was the daughter of the Marquis d'Osmond, and a lady-in-waiting to Madame Adélaïde, Louis XVI.'s aunt. She was educated by a sister of Marie Antoinette, Queen Caroline of Naples, and formed a close friendship with Queen Caroline's daughter, afterwards Queen Marie Amélie. At eighteen, Adèle de Boigne married the Comte de Boigne, a soldier of fortune, who proposed to her because another lady rejected his addresses. Guizot, who met her shortly before her marriage, describes her as most engaging, "singing, dancing, talking, listening, observant," and possessing a "just and quick instinct of the interests of existence and of high breeding." It is through the eyes of this quick, observant lady that we are able to observe the transformations in French society and politics through three different Governments.

Anecdotes are the small change of history, and one told by Madame de Boigne in the first chapter of this volume, is a good illustration of the causes that brought about the July monarchy. When Charles X. had abdicated, she tells us "etiquette was the only thing that preserved its rights." During the retreat of the royal family to Cherbourg there was no diminution of these rights.

"As I have been led to speak of this gloomy voyage, I may here set down a small anecdote of which I have special knowledge, for the purpose of showing how far the observance of etiquette enveloped our unfortunate princes with its trivialities. They were to dine at Laigle with Mme. de Caudecoste, who received them most readily. The officials of the household preceded the party; everything was placed at their disposal; they demanded a square table, and as there was none to be found, they sawed a fine mahogany table into that shape, as the king, they said, could not eat at a round table. If I am not mistaken, such care at such a time is sufficiently significant, and seems to me to excuse many reproaches that have been often repeated."

Nor was the attitude of the legitimist aristocracy a whit less ridiculous. At first they were frightened and kept quiet, but after the trial of Charles X.'s minister it was evident that the Government did not wish to be severe, and the Legitimists began their demonstrations. The sack of the Archbishop's palace checked their ardour, but "herded in the same drawing-rooms, they rubbed shoulders, and, feeling themselves universally hostile, they believed themselves to be the world." This world accordingly determined to ruin Paris. Economies were made on servants and horses, and there was a great parade of countermanding orders for furniture, jewels, and so forth. "Ladies set off to the country without buying summer hats, and made their maids turn their last year's dresses." It was thought that when they came back Paris would be in submission. "They honestly expected," says Madame de Boigne, "to find grass growing in the streets of the criminal city." Judge of their astonishment when they saw "more splendid carriages, more diamonds, and more outward magnificence in the town than it had ever seen, and discovered that Paris was already more brilliant than it had been before the Restoration."

A large section of the present volume is devoted to the one feature of the legitimist conspiracies that is not wholly contemptible—the romantic, ridiculous, yet courageous and devoted attempts of the Duchesse de Berri to restore the throne to the Duc de Bordeaux. A woman of unusual personal charm, able to win people over to projects that their better judgment regarded as hopeless, the Duchesse was a resolute if imprudent leader. Among her many qualities, a knowledge of geography was not the most remarkable. When the royal family were escaping to England, as they neared the English coast, the Duchesse suddenly burst into the cabin where the princess and the chief passengers were assembled, asserting that the captain of the vessel was guilty of infamous treachery. It appears that she had overheard the pilot explaining that he proposed to enter the roadstead of St. Helen's, as the wind was unfavourable for Spithead, and she at once saw herself chained upon the lonely rock that had harboured a far more formidable claimant to the throne of France. It required all the captain's diplomacy, reinforced by a study of the map, to quiet the Duchesse's alarm.

Apart from these conspirators pour vivre, the book contains many amusing anecdotes, as well as some fresh light upon the men who strove, honestly if unsuccessfully, to give France a stable government, and to reconcile authority with freedom. We meet Chateaubriand in his political aspect, though it is true that Madame de Boigne has too keen an eye for all that was tawdry and affected in his character; we see her discreet adorer, Pasquier; we see Talleyrand waiting in Palmerston's ante-room, and we are shown the death-bed of that aged and versatile diplomatist. In fact, we see something of every man of eminence who held the public eye during the eighteen years of the July monarchy, and we see them through the shrewd, ironical, piercing, yet on the whole tolerant eyes, of a great lady who, born while Louis XV. was king, lived to see France twice a republic.

A. W. EVANS.

* "Recollections of a Great Lady: Being More Memoirs of the Comtesse de Boigne." Edited from the original MS. by M. Charles Nicoulland. 10s. net. (Heinemann.)

AUTHENTIC IRELAND.*

Ireland has suffered much in the past from conventions, literary as well as political. To-day she is not yet rid of them. The literary convention of the past died hard, but it died largely through the influence of the Gaelic League. The curious thing about these literary conventions, both that of yesterday and that of to-day, is that they are both of English not of Gaelic origin. The stage Irishman is an exaggerated fact, but still a fact deriving from the eighteenth century. You have only to read Sir Jonah Barrington and his Anglo-Irish contemporaries to understand how essentially English the stage Irishman was. He was invented by Englishmen settled in Ireland, and as Englishmen were the only people who then counted for anything they successfully imposed on a voiceless people the typical Irishman of tradition. This Irishman possessed in an exaggerated degree the ideal English qualities. He was impossibly courageous, incredibly chivalrous. He loved well, fought and drank hard. That is just what the Anglo-Irishman did a hundred years ago, and the ruined mansions which dot the country, are memorials of his wild and reckless life, ending in ruin. But the Irishman proper did nothing of the kind. Circumstances as well as his race proclivities prevented him.

This brings me to Mr. Padraic Colum's remarkable book "My Irish Year," a book instinct with knowledge of the heart and soul of Irish life, full of poetry and of the glamour of Ireland, but withal sane and nearly always philosophic in its outlook. "Because of his conspicuous courage and his impassioned speech," writes Mr. Colum, "the Irishman has been credited with a quality that is supposed to go with these—the lover's passion and the lover's devotion. But love, as the English and the Continental writers think of it, has very little place in Irish life. Amongst the peasantry love-making is more often a subject for satire than for romance, and our cousins—the Gaels of Scotland—say of us, 'Comh neamhghradhmhar le Eireannach,'—'as loveless as an Irishman'." This, I think, explains why so many Irish become celibates, as priests or nuns: it certainly accounts in large measure for the unromantic marriage customs, the absence of wooing, the hard bargaining over the dowry, and the disparity in age of the contracting parties, for a girl in her teens will often be betrothed to a man old enough to be her grandfather, and as likely as not to one whom she has never before met.

Mr. Colum has not taken a return ticket from Paris, London, or Dublin, to the heart of Ireland in search of "copy," nor has he passed by the priest, in pursuit of a fairy. He claims that the life which he describes may stand for the life of the Catholic peasantry, and his claim is just. He does not blunder after the new Irish Convention with the assertion that a belief in the fairies implies Paganism. He knows the spiritual life of the people too intimately for that. "What are the fairies?" he asked a blind wanderer. "I will tell you what the fairies are," was the answer. "God moved from His seat, and when He turned round Lucifer was in it. Then Hell was made in a minute. God moved His hand and swept away thousands of angels. And it was in His mind to sweep away thousands more. 'O, God Almighty, stop!' said the Angel Gabriel. 'Heaven will be swept clean out.' 'I'll stop,' said God Almighty. 'Them that are in Heaven, let them remain in Heaven. them that are in Hell, let them remain in Hell, and them that are between Heaven and Hell let them remain in the air. And the angels that remained between Heaven and Hell are the fairies.'"

* "My Irish Year." By Padraic Colum. 10s. 6d. net. (Mills & Boon.)

They are the old gods of the Celts. The attitude of the people toward them is expressed in the charm that is uttered in Arran.

"We accept their protection
And we refuse their removal
Their backs to us
Their faces from us
Thro' the death and passion
Of our Saviour, Jesus Christ."

Mr. Colum is an outspoken critic of evils whether of home origin or imposed by what is practically a foreign government. He is naturally indignant that every year Ireland has to contribute £1,400,000 for the upkeep of 11,000 soldiers, called the Royal Irish Constabulary, a sum largely in excess of the grant for national education. That the latter is totally inadequate, Dr. Starkie, the Resident Commissioner of Education, recently declared at Cork, in a speech as remarkable for its courageous outspokenness as for its eloquence and patriotism, adding significantly that if the grants were stereotyped, as is foreshadowed in the Home Rule Bill, the cause of Irish education would be put back a century.

"My Irish Year" is an epitome of Irish life. It is inevitably a sad book, because it is true, and there are passages, such as Grama's wake or last dancing party before she sets out for America, which wring the heart almost too poignantly. But there is laughter as well as tears, and a new word has been added to the vocabulary of the Irish peasantry, and that word is Hope.

H. A. HINKSON.

Irish Parliament House, College Green.
Now the Bank of Ireland

From a drawing by Miss Myra K. Hughes, reproduced in "My Irish Year" (Mills & Boon) by permission of the artist.

DOSTOIEVSKY ONCE MORE.*

To that revival of interest in Dostoevsky of which I recently spoke in THE BOOKMAN added testimony appears in the shape of Merejkovsky's familiar essay, translated by Mr. G. A. Mounsey, and produced as a charming pocket volume by Mr. Moring. Described exactly, the subject of the essay is the art of Dostoevsky as shown in his best and best-known book, "Crime and Punishment"; and its very limitation of range is likely to commend the little treatise to the English general reader, who knows just that one novel, and would be puzzled, perhaps, rather than instructed, by references to names and incidents in the remoter works. The translation reads smoothly enough, though I think (pedantically, no doubt), that Mr. Mounsey ought to avoid such a slovenly use of the plural as "Turgenev is less of a psychologist than are Leo Tolstoy or Dostoevsky." Moreover, a knowledge of Russian literature need not prevent an Englishman from being familiar with English. Thus, on two occasions, Mr. Mounsey refers darkly to a mysterious character of Byron's called "Kean." "Childe Harold" and "Don Juan" we know; "The Corsair" and "Manfred" we have heard of; but who is this that comes with histrionic style and title? The explanation, I suppose, is that Mr. Mounsey has transliterated the Russian form of "Cam" into "Kean"—no great crime, perhaps, did the mistake not indicate rather less knowledge of Byron than anyone who writes should have. Has the Pilgrim of Eternity wandered so far onward out of our sight that we have forgotten the very names of his poems?

No objection, certainly, can be raised to the English into which Mrs. Garnett has put "The Brothers Karamazov," first of the new complete set that Mr. Heinemann promises to issue. All prosperity to his enterprise! Indeed, if our bookmen still have consciences in this morally difficult age of commerce they will simply be bound to buy this volume; for does not the publisher offer them eight hundred and forty pages of excellently printed and excellently translated Russian classic literature for three-and-six, that is, at the rate of twenty pages a penny? The force of cheapness could no further go! I wonder whether, as a point of tactics, "The Brothers Karamazov," Dostoevsky's last novel, was the wisest choice as a beginning. There is this in its favour: it is probably the least known of all his works, no other really full translation exists—the French version, in which most of us knew it, being incomplete and unreliable; it is concerned fully with many of those difficulties of criminal psychology that Dostoevsky loved to unravel; and it contains a set of extraordinarily vivid characters that could come from no country but Russia. On the other hand, the book is formless, protracted and obscure, and it may easily prove forbidding to the reader whose idea of Russian fiction has been formed by the less authentically autochthonous Turgenev or the clear and universal Tolstoy. However, there it is! and if the reader finds its opening slow and confused, I can only counsel him to have patience. I suggest, by the way, to Mrs. Garnett, that a list of the characters with the variants of their names would be distinctly helpful.

Merejkovsky, like most other critics, cannot resist the temptation to label the three great Russian novelists with the obvious epithets; and so, with him, Tolstoy is the prophet, Turgenev the artist and Dostoevsky the psychologist. Now such labels are very harmless and amusing to play with, as long as they do not mislead us. Here, however, and especially in the case of Tolstoy, it is plain that they do mislead us. The obvious implication is that there is some sort of mutual exclusiveness about prophet and artist, or about artist and psychologist; or, at any rate (if that is going too far) that because Tolstoy was a moralist he was therefore less of an artist than Turgenev. In other words, it is assumed that if a writer is a prophet he cannot be an artist, and if he is an artist he cannot be a prophet. How the people whose commonest possession is the Book containing Isaiah, the Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Ezekiel, and the Parables of Jesus; how the countrymen of Shakespeare, Milton, Shelley, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Browning, Bunyan and Blake can allow themselves to be bullied into sheepishly and tacitly assenting to a proposition that asserts a contradiction between literature and prophesy passes my utmost efforts of comprehension. It seems to me just as sensible to say that my bookcase is only a bookcase when there are no books in it, or that my kit-bag ceases to be a kit-bag as soon as it has suits and shirts in it, as to say that literature is only artistic when it conveys no message. Literature being the art of saying, such criticism comes to this: that literature only says something when it says nothing and says it rather prettily. The confusion comes from our stupid habit of talking about words instead of about things, the habit that is responsible for nearly all the fallacies and empty arguments in art, politics and religion. It ought to be obvious, even to the people who say that Tolstoy is a prophet but that Turgenev is an artist, that Tolstoy, merely as an artist, is greater than either Turgenev or Dostoevsky. Really, it is time that people stopped talking about the author of "Anna Karénina," of "War and Peace," of "Ivan Ilyitch," of "Resurrection," and of numberless perfect short stories as if he had written nothing but four page tracts for a missionary society. If you have any doubts about the artistic greatness of Tolstoy, take this book of Dostoevsky's as a text to study. Compare it with "Anna Karénina" which is just as long, or with "War and Peace," which is twice as long, and you will be compelled to acknowledge that in mastery of structure, texture, characterisation and economy—that is, in mere novelistic technique apart from any question of ethics, Dostoevsky is hardly worthy to unlace the latchet of the master's shoes. Wonderful as it is, "The Brothers Karamazov" can scarcely be called a novel at all. It is like a great mosaic floor inlaid over its vast surface with homiletic symbols and with lonely, detached figures of men and women in the wild attitudes of their soul's agony.

GEORGE SAMSON.

A CHAPLET OF PEARLS.*

Mr. Luther Munday has compressed at least three books into one—three books that would each have made the fortune of their author. As a volunteer gunner he has had experience of the sea, and loathes it. As a volunteer river policeman he has watched "The Bridge of Sighs" at night or rowed noiselessly up to the portholes of suspicious craft. He knows all the joys and sorrows of a Ceylon tea-planter's life before rubber began to boom. Like Ruskin's fishing boat, he has made his way against the "fittful, implacable smiting" of the black waves of misfortune. Failure to transform himself into a popular basso profundo did not daunt him, and he turns his bitter disappointment to humorous account by giving a long list of all the flatly contradictory maxims poured into his unfortunate ear by his teachers.

Wherever he was, whatever he suffered, he exercised his invaluable art or instinct for friendship; and so he came at length to find safe anchorage for his storm-tossed boat for a time in the secretariat of the Lyric Club. There he met everybody who was distinguished in the world of intellect. Something is said about everybody. The book is almost a "Who's Who," a humorous, entirely charitable collection of thumb-nail sketches.

From the Lyric Club it was a short step to stage management, and some of his most racy pages—and at least three-quarters of them are racy—are devoted to this

* "Dostoevsky: From the Russian of Merejkovsky." By G. A. Mounsey. 1s. 6d. net. (Alexander Moring.)

"The Brothers Karamazov." A Novel in Four Parts and an Epilogue, by Fyodor Dostoevsky. Translated by Constance Garnett. 3s. 6d. net. (William Heinemann.)

* "A Chronicle of Friendships." By Luther Munday. 12s. 6d. net. (Werner Laurie.)

topic. Read the history of the skeleton performance, a copyright performance, of "Trilby":—

"I took the part of Svengali: the charwoman read the part of 'Trilby' in boots and stockings, so she may or may not have had inverted dimples on her little pink toes."

Read, too, the inimitable account of the command performance at Balmoral, and the subsequent rush across 600 miles of sea and land to Dublin.

It is said of some geniuses that there is no subject they take up that they do not illuminate. We may say equally of Mr. Luther Munday that there is no personality he introduces us to that he does not exalt in our esteem. A delightful picture is drawn of Sir Charles Wyndham's generosity, and of Sir Herbert Tree, "who never thought in three-penny-bits." Not to be soon forgotten is the memory of Terriss getting the barmaid to write his signature with suitable variations on photographs of himself, forwarded for the purpose by languishing ladies, whose affections were thus wilfully beguiled. A whole chapter is devoted to paradoxical apothegms on the affections, and it is interesting to note that before "Cyrano de Bergerac" saw the light Mr. Munday performed that hero's task for an enamoured, but not highly-gifted, friend and was nearly found out. Amid the host of stories that coruscate in these pages, one, which especially shows the heart of the man, concerns a 'tiniest little Tich performing mite," who behind the scenes at the Alhambra was seen to "kneel down, pray, and cross herself before commencing her dangerous turn."

Lujavette.

Luther Munday, 1896.

THE WIDOW IN THE BYE STREET.*

What Mr. Masfield has already achieved is, when one thinks of it, extraordinary. The difficulties against which he has had to contend, before arriving at any adequate and consistent expression, must have been enormous. Most men, dowered with such a temperament, would never have become artists at all, though they would have dreamed of doing so all their days, and would certainly have made little else of their lives. For here obviously (judging him only by the written word) is a man singularly open to influences, reacting to every stimulus.

John Davidson, in perhaps the finest poem he ever wrote, describes the poet as

A mouthpiece for the creeds of all the world. . . .
A martyr for all mundane moods to tear. . . .
A trembling lyre for every wind to sound.

But the poet, if in conception he be a slave, must in creation be a master. Though he be receptive of all influences, swayed by every mood, he must be able to cry halt to mood and influence. Otherwise, they will swirl and eddy past him, and be gone before he has spoken the word that shall make them his captives. The poem will never be written.

That Mr. Masfield has this mastery need not be said. For his poems have been written. But in reading them one becomes aware how sensitive, how receptive, how fluid a nature they express. Always Masfield's, never imitative, they yet call to mind the verses of numerous other men, chiefly of those who, young in the 'nineties, were slightly Mr. Masfield's seniors. And one gets inevitably the impression that that necessary command of mood has come with more difficulty to him than to most writers of his executive ability.

* The Widow in the Bye Street. By John Masfield. 3s. 6d. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

Nor is this all. Not only has he had to stand braced against the wind of outer influence, but he has also had an inner conflict to settle. There are two John Masfields, no easy mates. The one loves passionately the stars, great waters with their ships, woman's loveliness, and all the ageless beauties of art. The other is as passionately concerned with the piteous problems of life as it is lived, with poverty and harlotry and crime. In others, besides Mr. Masfield, these two are housed and combative. But rarely are they so evenly matched as in him.

The failure to persuade these antagonists to harmony is the cause of all the fault that can be found with most of his work. In his earlier poems his fight was mainly with the outer influences and the love of beauty was constantly predominant. Then, in some of his lyrics and some of his yarns of the sea, one side of his personality found exquisite expression. But in the more ambitious works of later years, when the clash of diverse characters has called into play the whole of their creator's temperament, this unreconciled duality has too often been evident. Because of it "The Street of To-day" fell, literally, into halves.

Even "The Tragedy of Nan," that lovely play, suffers. Synge, as interested in life as his friend, saw it calmly and synthetically, so that it is never possible to divide his realism from his poetry. Mr. Masfield sees, as it were, creatively with one eye, analytically with the other, so that the beauty and reality in his work seem separate things, linked rather than fused. It is this which places "Nan" on a lower plane of achievement than "Riders to the Sea."

By this lack of unity between the two qualities, each is stultified and given the semblance of insincerity. Yet it is his sincerity alone which has saved the power of Mr. Masfield's hand from frustration. It has made him steadfast against the fitful gusts without. By its means he has driven gradually down to the meeting-place which there must be for any two qualities, however diverse, having their roots in one being.

"The Widow in the Bye Street" marks the discovery of that meeting-place. That, rather than the special breadth of its appeal, is the reason why it is the finest of all that Mr. Masefield has yet written. "The Everlasting Mercy" is an arresting poem, but in it the old conflict is still apparent. It contains passages of purely lyrical beauty which have no counterpart in "The Widow in the Bye Street." It also contains passages open to a charge of mere crude realism which cannot be brought against the later poem. In "The Widow in the Bye Street" all Mr. Masefield's passionate love of loveliness is utterly fused with the violent and unlovely story, which glows with an inner harmony. The poem, it is true, ends on a note of idyllism which recalls Theocritus; but this is no touch of external decoration. Inevitably the story has worked towards this culmination. Through the anxious mother's early fears and their realisation when the evil woman comes into her boy's life, through the boy's passion, his moral disintegration, his jealousy and sudden irrevocable crime, through his purification by suffering and the mother's final happy madness, we are carried unquestioning to this lovely picture of the reapers singing in the Shropshire fields. The poem is full of intimate felicities, but the beauty of the whole forbids their extraction. At last Mr. Masefield has given his complex temperament adequate, synthetic expression.

Art is an expression of personality; but the personality as well as the expression offers itself for judgment. There are, it may be, those who dislike Mr. Masefield's attitude towards life; who think that an artist, at any rate, should be more confident and gay, a creator of beauty entirely, a prober of disease not at all. Mr. Masefield's synthesis will not satisfy them. Yet to have found that synthesis, to have made his disgust of ugliness, as well as his love of beauty, creative, is his distinction; and his intense desire for a noble and seemly world is one of the fine things of modern literature.

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

THE THREE BRONTËS.*

The Brontë literature grows with uncomfortable luxuriance, and it would be wise for the "experts" to moderate their activities unless and until they have something of importance to say. Miss Sinclair who has already written a small book has now written a larger one. She tells us that its composition was "hard and terrible" for her; and that she had already said nearly all that she had to say. This confession of the author of a book of two hundred and fifty pages is not an auspicious beginning, but the book contains some excellent matter notwithstanding. Her judgments of those who have preceded her as critics of the household of genius at Haworth are sometimes severe and not always consistent. Mrs. Gaskell's "Life of Charlotte Brontë" is rightly characterised as "a masterpiece" (p. 36), and "the finest, tenderest portrait of a woman that it was ever given to a woman to achieve" (p. 47). One of the best passages in Miss Sinclair's book is that in which she describes the effect upon her, when a child, of reading the book. Yet Mrs. Gaskell is accused of "indiscretions" and of "having repaid" Mr. Brontë "shockingly" for the confidence he had placed in her (p. 10). Madame Duclau is reproved for reviving Branwell's story of his adulterous passion, and the Abbé Dimnet for persisting in believing in that scandal. "It is inconceivable that Mrs. Gaskell should have dragged the pitiful and shameful figure of Branwell into the light" (p. 41) Miss Sinclair thinks. On the contrary it is inconceivable that any honest biographer should omit the sordid figure of Branwell from the tragic scene. Swinburne is not only blamed for thinking that Charlotte did not care for children, but the opposite is declared to be the key to her character. Miss Sinclair in her text (p. 115) says that Charlotte had read Balzac, and in a footnote on the same page owns that she had not. The error is unimportant for, as she adds, there were "the clever, wicked, sophistical, and immoral French books" that Charlotte had read in 1840. But is it not part of our national "make-believe" that the existence of sexual sin could then, if not now, only be learned from foreign literature? At what historical period could people live in England and not be aware of its existence? The moorland district in which the three Brontës lived and the England of which it was part was not Arcadia ethically, nor was it Utopia socially. Branwell's vices were flagrant and unconcealed, and his sisters had no reason for disbelieving the story of guilty love which he told them, and which Charlotte repeated to Mrs. Gaskell. Miss Sinclair thinks that Branwell's case was pathological; but whatever it may have been at the end, it was not so at the beginning. The boy's early talent led father and sisters alike to look upon him as the genius and hope of the family. What is left of his writing does not justify their high estimate of his powers, but in spite of immaturity there is still some promise. The early performances of the sisters are in striking contrast to the final splendours. In each case there was fire beneath the smoke. If whilst there was still time Branwell had forsworn alcohol and had listened to his better angel there would have been a wondrous lightening of the gloom in the dreary parsonage house, and for him at least a useful career instead of the squalid tragedy of his wasted life. But it was not to be. Mr. Malham-Demabley's fantastic theory that Charlotte was the author of "Wuthering Heights" is not shared by Miss Sinclair, who holds that it was the reading of that story that awakened the fire of genius that flames in "Jane Eyre." When Charlotte, at Manchester, in attendance on her then blind father, received back the MS. of "The Professor" with a request for a longer story she immediately began to write "Jane Eyre" in response to that suggestion. In "The Professor" she depended upon her Brussels experience, in "Jane Eyre" on genius and native invention. Such in effect is Miss Sinclair's theory. It is one of the substantial contributions which this volume makes. Another is that some at least of the episodes of the lost "Gondal Chronicles" are to be found in the poems which by the skill and industry of Mr. Clement Shorter are now in the hands of the public. She thinks that he has not "quite realized the splendour of his find." This is a very unusual fault to find with the editor of a literary discovery. In 1845 Emily and Anne were on one of the few journeys of their lives. "And during our excursion we were Ronald Macalgin, Henry Angora, Juliet Augusteena, Rosabella Esmaldan, Ella and Julian Egremont, Catharine Navarre and Cordelia Fitzaphnold, escaping from the palaces of instruction to join the Royalists who are hard pressed at present by the victorious Republicans. The Gondals still flourish bright as ever." The sisters had then left girlhood behind them, but still allowed their imagination to play in the childish fancy of imaginary realms of kingly splendour and vicissitude. Miss Sinclair has done well to call special attention to these episodic poems, for they raise the Gondal legend from mere puerility to something of tragic force.

Of the three Brontës it is evident that Emily makes the strongest appeal to the sympathies of Miss Sinclair, and the best of the book is that which deals with the spirit, austere and aloof, which flamed steadfastly in "Wuthering Heights." It is a pity that Miss Sinclair has not bestowed a more rigid revision and a sterner compression on her "appreciation," but it contains matter for which Brontë students will be grateful and suggestions that cannot be ignored. It may be doubted if full justice has yet been done to Anne, but Miss Sinclair's estimate of Charlotte has something of freshness and that of Emily is finely conceived and finely expressed.

WILLIAM E. A. AXON.

* "The Three Brontës." By May Sinclair. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

A NEW SATIRIST.*

Possibly among the multitudinous admirers of Lord Byron there are some who would have given much to know his attitude with reference to motors, auction-bridge and the gigantic modern shop. For 3s. 6d. net they now have got the opportunity to learn not only these but many other matters from the bard who graciously admits his brother to a place beside him in the sun:

"Maestro! hast thou used them all? Hast toyed
With every sound that rolls a stanza fleetier?
Must I—whose songs on stronger wings are buoyed,
Sounder of technique, and in scansion sweeter—
Outstretch these hands across the sundering void
To rape once more the magic of that metre
Which thou, combining utile cum dulci,
Did'st bone from my lamented confrère Pulci?"

Mr. Frankau, in so far as he is not that heavenly creature, warbling because it must—does he not tell us of his Muse, the Microbe-muse, that:

"Vainly the lactic Lancers of Bulgary Strive to evict her from my little Mary"— is the son of that well-known authoress, one of whose books is called "The Heart of a Child." May we presume that at no stage of his interesting development was Mr. Frankau (or his hero, Jack, which is much the same) anything like an ordinary child?

"The hero whom I sing is commonplace,
One of the many boys the Bath Club bar knows"—

Well, he is the only one who has discovered that the Bath Club, among its numerous amenities, is furnished with a bar. We will pass over his terrific, tragic episode at Eton. But no, for the sake of one glorious rhyme we must quote a stanza on the Fourth of June:

"My hero's parents patronized the function,
Proud of their child as they that rear on Mellin.
They'd journeyed overnight from Sidmouth Junction,
Father and mother and fair sister Helen;
Haling Aunt Ermytrude without compunction
From her herbaceous hermitage at Welwyn;
Heedless that bonnet, parasol and bodice ill
Became the day, so she would add a codicil."

After his expulsion Jack goes forth to meet a dozen fates and Elsa Pumpnickel's environment is not more shrewdly told than that of Susie, Mame and Marion Vermont, daughters of a Butter Trust:

"So that Mame paled and Marion grew dumb
And Susie's lips forgot their chewing-gum."

From New York, to save him from the wiles of Prudence Swift, these charming sisters drag him off to Florida. But you will not read this novel for its plot, its antiquated, modern plot. You will revel in the rhymes, the edifying details, the occasional glimpses of beauty, the pervading satire, the—in fact you certainly will read this book. It is perfect entertainment, and if you should hesitate to give it to your aunts, they surely will be reconciled by the most generous death of Ermytrude, which happened just in time to save our hero from committing suicide:

"Truth is, that public whom we bards deride, Yet pander to, is tired of suicide."

From this book one may learn not only how to live and how to die, but how to play poker and how to love (with variations) and how to play most other games. The opening of the Great Shop is thus immortalized:

"Howl, Harrod, howl! Let Gordon Selfridge wail!
Mingle your tears with Woolland's, William Whiteley!
Lord Mayors, nor Concert-teas, nor Great White Sale,
Nor shopmen serving never so politely,
Nor any Bargain Basement, shall avail
To raise the takings you weep over nightly;
Since London waked to read that black decree,
'Our Opening Week—All Wares Eleven-Three.'

"Panting they tore from Wandsworth's leafy glades,
From Streatham's hill where chapel nigh to church is,
From Walton's pines and Ilford's soapy shades,
From Sundridge Park embowered of silver birches:
Married and mateless—mothers—spinster maids,
Letting lone parrots languish on their perches—
By tram and tube and train and taxi-cab
The women of a nation came to grab."

* "One of Us: A Novel in Verse." By Gilbert Frankau. 3s. 6d. net. (Chatto & Windus.)

As for the plot, we may mention that the owner of this shop is the Napolconic, Transatlantic husband of Prudence Swift. However in the end all is peace. Our hero comes back to the "cocoa-kisses" of the charming Alice, whose vast estates march with his own in Devon, and we may surmise—we are expressly told that it is the part of lesser authors to conduct their puppets to the altar—we may well surmise that, in a little time, our Jack will be behaving even as his amiable, ruthless father saw fit to behave in Canto IX., when the prodigal came back from Cuba. I would fain quote both the wind and whirlwind. The fish, etc., of their orgy in Havana—"Followed strange fish, most hard to rhyme and scan"—does not cause us more delight than the beautiful description of the monster trout of Devon, which he captures in the presence of Alice. And many hundred readers will be captured by Mr. Frankau.

HENRY BAERLEIN.

DEEP SEAS AND SHALLOW.

A few pages of Commander Crutchley's really interesting autobiography* are enough to make us understand that he is one of the old-time "sea dogs"—one of a breed that was, irrespective of late disasters, more efficient, more eager to bite and tenacious in holding on, than the present breed is. Again and again he shows us this fact, shortly, saltily, personally, yet, happily, in a manner that neither reflects a ship's log-book, a telegraphic message, nor the quick, stop-short verbal habits of certain professional writers who aim at being strong and original and cannot understand why they are not granted a public diploma of success for either quality. And if the Commander's English could have been better than it is, if it were less colloquial and more literary, more as the purist would have it be—what of that? Here we have the actions, the man and his reflections on both, and on many other men and things, and a few women, who come and go in his pages, all done in a manner that—well, the best simile that comes to mind at the moment is that the record is very like sailing (from being close hauled nearly to running) in a strong breeze, rather "puffy," and bright sunlight, along a wide, erratic stream with many a sandbank, many a half-submerged rock and many a sharp turn to increase the excitement of the run. You have the warm sunshine; the quick change in circumstances; the exhilaration of movement; the danger; the sang-froid of men who revel in the game, yet are not cynical to the fact that they may go over at any moment, and who are faced with the ever-pressing question: Shall we—will he—get there? Indeed, the rocks, shoals and bends in the channel come so quickly on each other's heels, and are often of too large a nature for inclusion here, that one is puzzled what to break out as samples of the ship's cargo. However, here is a simple little bit, apropos the above "doggy" preference. The place is Cape Town, some thirty or thirty-five years ago, apparently; and the immediate scene, the cabin of the s.s. Roman.

"On the return trip from Algoa Bay we went into dock to complete loading, and there occurred an incident I shall always remember with amusement. Leigh (who appears to have been Warleigh, the captain) had taken under his protection a curious specimen of a pariah dog that used to prowl round the docks, and the poor beast was rather at a loss to understand the vast amount of consideration shown him. He was permitted to sleep in his master's cabin, and generally was made a pet. One night after dinner, when we had a young fellow named Hanbury dining with us, Leigh had retired to his cabin, got into his pyjamas, and prepared to go to sleep, attended by the faithful hound. Now, as it happened, Hanbury had a dog also, a bull terrier, and as Garrett, Hanbury and I went to say good night to Leigh, the dog came also. No sooner did he catch sight of the stray dog than he went for him, and the next moment the two were on the top of Leigh in his bunk, indulging in a wonderful scuffle. It was a trifle difficult to differentiate between barks and yells, for Leigh under the dogs was yelling to Garrett to take the dogs away, and that was eventually done—when we were able to stop laughing."

* "My Life at Sea: Being a 'Yarn' Loosely Spun for the Purpose of Holding together certain Reminiscences of the Transition Period from Sail to Steam in the British Mercantile Marine (1863-1894)." By Commander W. Caius Crutchley, R.D., R.N.R., F.R.G.S. With a Preface by Earl Brassey, G.C.B. With Twelve Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

Just as there is always room and a welcome for the life yarn of the sailor who can make the spinning both literary and salty, as Commander Crutchley does, so there was room for Mr. Methley's story of the lifeboat,* which, from its very nature and purpose hardly lends itself to quotation. We have had the coming, development, etc., of the lifeboat done before to-day. But the present one is not merely more up-to-date than the others were; it is more concise, better written, better constructed, has more finish generally and goes further afield. After a notable salvage of life from a wreck, and even when a lifeboat's crew have been at drill only, one often hears the remark: "Whatever did they do before there were lifeboats?" And to all and sundry here is Mr. Methley's answer: "It is related that after the hurricane of 1703, the worst perhaps on record, some two hundred shipwrecked sailors were stranded on the Goodwins, with the certainty of speedy death by drowning when the tide rose. The Mayor of Deal called upon the 'hovellers' and boatmen to assist in their rescue, but, so the story runs, they were too busy saving a rich harvest of floating and stranded property. The Revenue men were appealed to, but they refused to lend their boats on the grounds that they were not intended for such service. At last the devoted Mayor called together a band of his fellow townsmen, seized the Customs' boats by force, and launched them to the rescue." And from what we have read generally and have seen we find no reason to doubt this story. Moreover, it shows, to some extent, how very modern the lifeboat is, and what strides have been made in its development since Wouldhave and Greathead—both "Tynesiders"—competed to produce the first idea of a practical lifeboat, the former man being successful and the latter not so.

J. E. PATTERSON.

THE HOLIDAY NOVEL.†

We have come to the time of year when Pierrot is King: not the white-faced innocent, the futile rival of Harlequin; but the seaside gentleman with a banjo who happens not to be a nigger. The influence of Pierrot is everywhere; and the book-trade knows it. While our seashore songsters are singing the ditties that are tiresome and winning the silver pennies of the crowd, there is little desire for serious reading. All that man wants is holiday idleness, a supply of cooling drinks, and the literature that does not furrow the brain unduly. There is an ample supply of such. Here are seven novels calculated to please all tastes. Would you smile, be sympathetic, or sentimental; would you shudder, laugh, or be serious—and how serious farce may be!—or would you merely enjoy? All these emotions may be experienced in this summer library of seven.

Mr. Thomas Cobb gives us a characteristic novel in "The Voice of Bethia." It will be described by many as "pretty"; and, truly, that is just the adjective for this particular book. Bethia is a dear girl; as sweet, beautiful and unselfish a clergyman's daughter as ever gave a three-penny-bit to a churchwarden's plate. Being one of seven sisters she goes into an office to earn her living, but soon finds herself unsuited to the artistry of the type-machine. However, the luck that looks after the lovely, looks well after her. There is a blind man who needs the companionship of a sympathetic soul, to read to him and help him through the ordeal of his darkness. Bethia suits; eventually there are wedding-bells. We pass on to a volume of more serious intent, but of similar tendency, by our good friend, Mrs. Croker. The title, "The Serpent's Tooth," is suggested by King Lear's complaint of the ingratitude of his daughters. On this occasion it is Cara Blagdon who is ungrateful; and really there is not a little excuse for that blazing and bounding child. Her mother, when only seventeen, had been married through the devices of a scheming aunt to a rake. She is crude and he is a black-guard, though his naughtiness is rather overdone. Very soon the marriage is a failure, as the Silly Season correspondent would say. Letty, the wife, then makes a serious mistake, and in spite of her innocence is divorced, turned out, removed from her child; is alone, yet ever lovely. Eventually she steals her daughter and endures years of privation with a patience which does not impress us as it ought to do, until—the end! Mrs. Croker has written the story with care, and it will amuse the holiday-maker, but it tends to become tedious and her characters are too monotonously good or bad as the case may be. But what shall we say of "The Silent Valley"? Here is a house party of six or seven who deserve to have their heads well knocked together. They talk—how they talk! They pose—how they pose! They spout minor poetry by the prosaic mile. Let us not be unjust. This is one of the most conscientious books published. Miss Child-Pemberton has tried really hard to make a company of would-be clever people interesting, but they would not! She has done her level best; but the characters are too much for her. They fill the silent valley with the noise of words; talking cloudily of art and poetry and life, always with their eye on the camera and the readers that may be. To meet them in real life—Eugene, Averil, Jocelyn—but that would be too painful! Let us fly to what sanctuary we may find in "The Room of Mirrors." A shocker! A shocking shocker; shocking because its end is nothing! It is for all the world like a sham fight with mock casualties, wherein after much confusion and banging, the slain arise and walk away as if they had not been through the astounding experience of death. Mr. Flowerdew thrills us repeatedly; and if he had managed a concluding great surprise, as he should have done, we might have jumped with joy. There is a novelist, Auguste Zant, who is a monster for achieving reality. To imagine is not enough for him; he wants to study the effects of horrors through experience, and so induces a poor young man—we hope it is not the person portrayed on the cover, who is not nearly nice-looking enough!—to come to his house and be a subject of creepy experiments. There, with snakes and a typist, Zant works on the nerves and the feelings of the poor young man, until we feel we really do want to know the why and the wherefore of it all; and thereupon find there is neither wherefore nor why. There is one characteristic about these summer books; they cause us to fly eagerly to the next on the list. Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer has so much acumen, literary experience, and skill, that we open with confidence his "sheer comedy"—which is more like farce, but we will not quarrel about sub-titles—"The Panel," and, reading it, feel gradually less confident. This is not worthy of Mr. Hueffer. It has literary quality, without doubt; as a frivolous and light-hearted as a book of its type, should be; but "The Fifth Queen" and other of his works insist on pointing a contrast. The story is one of the knock-about character. Thanks to a sliding picture and a mysterious doorway it is possible for persons in a house-party to visit each other's bedrooms; and so it comes about that a fascinating major has no less than four ladies in his room in the course of one evening. Be not nervous, gentle reader! Mr. Hueffer in this book is quite proper. He is spirited also, and sometimes, in the earlier part especially, is amusing; so that for idle days and heat waves, when it is almost too tiring to reach the quenching drink, and the brain is not feeling very intellectual, "The Panel," will do.

* "The Lifeboat and Its Story." By Noël T. Methley, F.R.G.S. 7s. 6d. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

† "The Voice of Bethia." By Thomas Cobb. 6s. (Mills and Boon.)—"The Serpent's Tooth." By B. M. Croker. 6s. (Hutchinson.)—"The Silent Valley: An Episode." By Harriet L. Child-Pemberton. 6s. (Constable.)—"The Room of Mirrors." By Herbert Flowerdew. 2s. net. (Evelyn Nash.)—"The Panel: A Sheer Comedy." By Ford Madox Hueffer. 6s. (Constable.)—"The Friar of Wittenberg." By William Stearns Davis. 6s. (Macmillan.)

Having written so far, we realize that our review of these summer books has been not uproariously joyous; but now we can rejoice. The sixth dish in this literary banquet is a very fine historical novel, treating of Luther and his part in the Reformation. "The Friar of Wittenberg," is a most admirable romance, even brilliant in its telling and portraiture. Although treating of a period which still may rouse the angers mis-called religious it is liberal in spirit and can only trouble the determinately fanatical. It has a few slips and, here and there, an Americanism peeps out; but, taken all through, it is something—a rare thing—for which we can cordially thank the United States, a moving, well-written, inspiring and uplifting romance.

L.

FOUR FRENCH ADVENTURERS.*

If the famous incident of the Koeppenick tailor did not remind one that "big wigs" can be successfully impersonated even at the present day it would be hard to believe the record of the four French charlatans which Mr. Dewey has so graphically set forth. All four men live in or about the Napoleonic period, and all four displayed an enterprise and daring of imagination to which the Tichborne or the Druce claimants could never pretend. The most amusing record, perhaps, is that of the "ingenious Monsieur Collet," whose impersonations are bewilderingly numerous. At one moment he was a simple Neapolitan parish priest, at another Monseigneur Pasqualini, an Italian bishop; now he was the spurious Marquis Dada, and now again the Inspector-General Count Charles Alexander de Borromeo reviewing troops and gratifying his dupes with promises that they should receive the grand cordon of the Legion of Honour. The sums of money that he stole or borrowed on false pretences were enormous, and Mr. Dewey mentions it as a curious fact that although Collet was repeatedly searched when in prison he was never without ready money to his hand. Pierre Coignard, the second of these impostors, was a man of a different type. Having assumed the name of the Comte de Pontis de Sainte-Hélène he proved himself to be a genuinely fine soldier and rendered the Spanish General Mina such distinguished services that he was decorated for his gallantry. Subsequently he passed into the French service and became a trusted and honoured officer in Marshal Soult's army. After the fall of Napoleon the Count won the high favour of Louis XVIII., and it is with a feeling akin almost to regret that we read of his having been eventually exposed as the ex-convict Coignard and as the author of various crimes. He appears to have been a man of considerable dignity, and, if his fate was well-deserved, Mr. Dewey's account of his trial shows clearly enough that justice was meted out in the France of those days in a most injudicial fashion. Charles of Navarre, as the next of these impostors is called, does not cut a very interesting figure. He had, to be sure, adventures enough and to spare, but the impression which one gets from Mr. Dewey's narrative is that the man himself was almost indifferent as to whether he succeeded in establishing his claim to be Louis XVII. The last study is of the lives of Louis and Anna de Marsilly. Both man and woman were adventurers of the gallant type dear to the writer of the "shilling shocker," and their extraordinary career has, as Mr. Dewey points out, a timely interest owing to the persistence of Carlism in Spain and Miguelists in Portugal down to our own times.

THE BEGINNING OF FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE.*

The publication in English of the first half of the authoritative biography of Friedrich Nietzsche, gives students of the philosopher in this country the opportunity of being able to trace the evolution of his ideas in relation to his life. Such a proceeding would hardly be necessary in reference to the author of a merely formal philosophy, but Nietzsche is not a formal philosopher; further, he died before even completing his work, although he accomplished sufficient not only to revolutionize modern ideas, but to give us a very clear conception of his aim and outlook. These, however, are so peculiarly personal both in expression and in appeal, and they come so frankly into conflict with accepted ideals and visions, that there is a curiosity about his life, down even to its simplest habits, which in the case of most philosophers might be questionable, but in his case is more legitimate. We have a right to inquire as to the kind of man it was who gave the proud philosophy to the world which aimed at transvaluing the principles and ideals of civilization, and clearing the way for the appearance upon earth of a species as superior to man as man is to ape. Frau Förster Nietzsche, the philosopher's sister and intimate companion, is the rightful chronicler of Nietzsche's life, and in the first volume of the biography upon which she is engaged, "The Young Nietzsche," she tells her story so frankly and so sympathetically, and with such a clear

* "The Young Nietzsche." By Frau Förster Nietzsche. Translated by Anthony M. Ludovici. 15s. net. (Heinemann.)

Friedrich Nietzsche.

From "The Young Nietzsche," by Frau Förster Nietzsche (Heinemann).

* "Four French Adventurers." By Stoddard Dewey. 2s. net. (Nelson.)

sense of essentials, that her work is bound to win for her the thanks of a very large number of readers throughout civilization.

The life of Friedrich Nietzsche was a surprisingly simple one, and the gradual spreading of his fame hardly disturbed the even rhythm of his days. In his youth he was an enthusiastic skater and swimmer, and it is probable that had his health permitted it he would have indulged in such vigorous exercises in after years. He served his period in the Army and acquitted himself well, both in horsemanship and other soldierly duties, although it was an accident associated with the former which was an early cause of ill-health. Later, patriotism caused him to rejoin the forces during the Franco-German War, and he served on the hospital staff until sickness again drove him forth. Even during the days of his professorship at Bâle he was not averse to physical exercises. He was a good walker, and it comes as a pleasant shock to find that he took part in dances, and was considered quite an acquisition at such functions. From what his sister tells us, the erudite Professor Nietzsche must, at one time, have been looked upon as what is called "a dancing man," in the collegiate circles of Bâle. But with a fuller knowledge of his life that does not surprise so much, for, in spite of the fact that Nietzsche was a student and thinker, first and last, and naturally of a sedate habit, he was also of a cheerful and merry disposition. He and his sister got keen delight out of many innocent incidents in life, and she recounts circumstances in connection with Nietzsche's journey to Erlangen, where he was to join the ambulance staff, during the war, which reveal the high spirits of quite ordinary folk:

"Fritz was in splendid condition, radiant with health, and overflowing with life and lust of action . . . he was full of that spirit peculiar to the recruit, and in him it was all the more delightful as it was beautified by his intellect. We even sang; none of the ordinary war songs, but one which my brother had only just come across while reading the paper in the railway carriage, and which he had immediately set to music."

It is characteristic, also, that both were "very much ashamed of themselves" afterwards. But withal the light-heartedness of certain of his moods, Nietzsche's life was one of high seriousness. It was, finally, a life of thought, indeed, that very preponderance of thought was both its weakness as well as its strength, for it not only gave the world a new point of view, it broke the delicate mechanism of the brain which evolved that point of view. He possessed to an abnormal extent what he himself might have called, a will to thought, and all his life, from the early days of his school training at Pforta, down to the collapse of his intelligence, he seemed to be drilling himself for more and more intellectual power. He had little cause to cleanse his life of hampering dross, for a saintlier man never lived, but, nevertheless, he was always striving to clean away anything that might come between will and brain. He lived to think; to evolve out of himself a new culture for his nation primarily, and, secondarily, for the world. For although he was a severer critic of German culture than even Heine, he was always a German, as was proved during the war, when he abandoned the Swiss naturalization, which he had adopted for professional reasons at Bâle, and joined the colours of his own fatherland.

In many respects Nietzsche was the typical professor, but he broke away from professional habits by insisting always upon the association of life and ideas. That, doubtless, was the cause of the opposition he received from those who were admirers of his learning and mental stature. He used, deliberately, an academic training for non-academic ends, or, rather for ends with which learning, in its professional aspects, had small sympathy. Capable of abstract thought in its highest degree, he always strove to apply his theories to life, to test his abstractions by experience; and he desired others to adopt that attitude towards his work. One feels whilst reading "The Young Nietzsche" in the presence of a being which deliberately cultivates itself, so that it can express in finer and deeper terms the processes of that cultivation. Nietzsche treated his brain as a fastidious cutler might treat a knife-blade which he knows is capable of supreme hardness and sharpness, and he refines and grinds and tests it to so high a degree that it finally breaks in his hands. Frau Förster Nietzsche does not take us to the breaking point of the blade; her first volume ends with the blade at its brightest and keenest. She traces for us the growth of his mind up to the production of "The Birth of Tragedy" and "Thoughts out of Season," and right through the friendship with Richard Wagner, the termination of which properly marks the close of Nietzsche's first period.

"In his love and reverence for this man," she says, "he spent the most beautiful years of his existence, and all his loftiest hopes for the future were associated with the master's name. We can, therefore, understand with what bitter feelings he left Bayreuth; he had lost his faith in Wagner's Art, and all the glorious dreams and hopes of his youth faded through this heart-rending experience."

At that stage in his career, then, "The Young Nietzsche" fittingly closes. But the next stage, the history of which by his sister, will be awaited so keenly, is not, after all, a new stage; it does not represent a change in attitude, but a progress free of encumbrance. Wagner was not so much an influence in Nietzsche's life as an incident, a very important incident, but no more than that. What really happened was that Nietzsche read into Wagner's art his own philosophy, and both he and Wagner were under the impression, with occasional but passing doubts, that the two things were the same. The discovery of the error was inevitable sooner or later; it came in 1876, leaving Friedrich Nietzsche free to evolve Zarathustra, and Richard Wagner free to evolve Parsival.

HOLBROOK JACKSON.

MR. BELLOC'S MOODS.*

Mr. Belloc's books are twins in that they make their appearance together, but they are twins most dissimilar in every fashion—from the vivid green of one to the autumnal brown of the other, from subject matter to price. It is presumably impossible to establish a standard price for works of the imagination, and these two volumes may well set readers wondering what it is that governs the fixing of the market value of a given book. It is easy to believe that five people will find entertainment in "The Green Overcoat," for every one that falls under the spell of "The Four Men." The length of the tale is but little more than that of the "Farrago." Both volumes are illustrated—the cheaper one to far better purpose than the dearer, and yet the latter (after due allowance for discount) costs more than twice as much as the former. These are publishers' mysteries. Their paternal twinship is the only reason for considering them together, though in their very contrasts of theme and style may be found interesting evidence of their author's versatility, of his capacity for being himself at one time and letting himself go, as it were, in masquerade at another.

"The Green Overcoat" is a frankly ridiculous story; a long laugh, as it were, at the sensational fiction monger who piles strange happenings upon strange happenings in the working out of a mystery. In an epistle dedicatory to Mr. Maurice Baring, who made a green elephant the centre of a play, Mr. Belloc whimsically shows how much an overcoat and an elephant have in common. In the story he sets forth how strange a series of events may follow upon a professor of psychology, finding that some one else had taken his coat, borrowing that of another guest at a party. It was, in this case, a singular overcoat—an overcoat that might have come from the wardrobe of the celebrated Green Man of Brighton—and in one of its pockets there was a fat cheque book! The wearing of the overcoat, and the temporary possession of the cheque book took Professor Higginson along strange paths—to forgery and fame. It is an exuberant, almost boyishly exuberant, piece of fooling with occasional touches of satire that need not disturb the comfort of the reader who seeks but diversion. Mr. G. K. Chesterton provides a number of appropriately ridiculous illustrations.

* "The Four Men: A Farrago." By Hilaire Belloc. 2s. net. (Nelson.)—"The Green Overcoat." By Hilaire Belloc. 6s. (Arrowsmith.)

Very different is the second of Mr. Belloc's literary twins; one that—to carry out the conceit—bears much more markedly the paternal characteristics. It is, to return to terms of books, a pæan in praise of Sussex, a medley of poetry and philosophy, of country lore (often, it may be, invented for the occasion) and aspects of nature, of quaint stories and the laudation of ale. In the diversity of its themes touched upon during a journey, in spirit, as it were, it reminds one of the work of a very different writer, a writer with whom Mr. Belloc has probably but little sympathy: "The Voyage on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers" of Thoreau. Mr. Belloc, however, did not set out to loaf and invite his soul. The five days of which he here gives account began with a sudden resolve to see the best loved bits of Sussex again, and so, from near the Kentish border, he stepped westward, having picked up three companions, Grizzlebeard, the Sailor and the Poet, all like himself, devoted lovers of Sussex and scorners of the neighbouring counties. From Robertsbridge to Harting they walked by lanes and woods, hills and valleys, with halts at wayside inns, and as they walked they talked, uttering truths and lies, poetry and prose, in a fashion which some readers will find most engaging. Readers who are sticklers for facts, who, as Meredith put it, are "hot for certainty in this our life," will, it may well be believed, find little to attract them in a book which, to those others who would be proud to be included among Elia's "matter of lie men," should be a lasting joy. It is indeed a most engaging "farrago" that Mr. Belloc has given us in this account of a five days' walk by a fortuitous quartet of Sussexians. Whether the walk took place exactly as narrated, or whether the "Four" are but so many manifestations or projections of the writer's own individuality matters not at all. The book's the thing, and a very pleasant, healthy and arid thing it is; a companionable book; a book that sympathetic readers will be willing to take up again and again that they may re-read of how, in the Sailor's view, all men are hunted, of the wonderful doings at the Battle of Battle, when the tailed ones of Kent fled from the onslaught of the men of Sussex, of the way in which Mr. Justice Honeybubble delivered a considered judgment in a village inn, or of how all the men of great fame of early ages died in quest of that potent drink, Sussex ale from the inn at Washington. It is a book which those will like hugely, who like it at all, and the popular price at which it is published should ensure its finding a large number of such. Freshness of humour and thought are set forth with a kind of Rabelaisian gusto. Some of the snatches of song are likely long to stick in the memory, and many men beyond the bounds of Mr. Belloc's favoured county newly favoured in having so devoted a son will "sing Gohar." The volume has five excellent (mounted) views of Sussex scenery, and a number of dainty vignettes.

"The Green Overcoat" is a droll story to be read for a couple of hours' farcical entertainment. "Four Men" is a permanent addition to our friendly books, books for the bedside, or the pocket

WALTER JERROLD.

Novel Notes.

MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD. By Alphonse Courlander
6s. (Fisher Unwin.)

Probably the working life of the London journalist, the manifold labours that go to the production of a great newspaper, the almost magical power for good or evil that is in the hands of the masters of the Press, the whole glamour and fascination of Fleet Street have never been more vividly and intimately described than they are in "Mightier than the Sword." But these, of course, are only the atmosphere and hidden or obvious influences and environment of the book; they supply the stage, the scenery,

Mr. Alphonse Courlander.

the particular world in which Humphrey Quain is to work out his destiny. At the age of twenty Humphrey arrives in London and is fortunate enough to secure a small opening on the staff of a typically modern daily paper, and it is not long before he is heart and mind absorbed in the rush and hurly-burly of a reporter's career. There is a glowing, passionate interval when love for the first time comes to him and his thoughts are filled with the image of Lilian Filmer—a pretty typist, some few years older than himself; he contrives to speak with her, to strike up a friendship which rapidly ripens into something more on both sides. Even when he sees her in her squalid home, and has glimpses of a drunken wastrel of a father hovering in the background, it only heightens his chivalry, and he is eager to marry her and lift her out of such surroundings. But he mentions his resolve to marry and the great newspaper owner, his chief, who for romantic reasons takes a special interest in him, flicks him with a scornful word or two and a curt warning that such a marriage at his age will mean the ruin of his career, and recognising the cold truth of this he braces himself to end his engagement and see Lilian no more. He is an admirably natural young man, with enthusiasm and ideals, but they are shallower than he thinks. He has already met another girl with whom Lilian contrasts very unfavourably, and who is hovering, an unconscious influence, at the back of his mind, it is not long before he is in love with her, but this is a gentler flame than the first, and he is determined that they will not marry for some years, even though she has money of her own and is anxious that he should quit the reporter's business and give himself to literature. All his ideas of happiness are made subservient to his success as a journalist, and there is a grim irony in the closing incident that renders his soaring hopes and his success futile. The characters of these two girls, of Humphrey, and of the motley throng of journalists with whom he comes in contact, are drawn with keenest insight and understanding. Apart from its brilliantly realistic study of the modern newspaper world, "Mightier than the Sword," is a poignant story of love and ambition that should add considerably to Mr. Courlander's reputation. He has done other good work, but none that is finer than this.

THE TOMBOY AND OTHERS. By H. B. Marriott Watson. 3s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)

Clad in scarlet, Neapolitan cap on her head set rakishly askew, it is in a punt that the Tomboy makes her boisterous appearance; and undoubtedly a punt with plenty of cushions to sprawl upon is the ideal place to enjoy this book of bubble stories. Lighter stories than these it would be difficult to find. Of the thirty which make up "The Tomboy and Others," only half-a-dozen concern the exploits of the Tomboy, whose brown, freckled face beams afresh with every new disaster or contretemps that falls to her credit. She heaps confusion on your innocent flirtations; she lures you unsuspectingly on to a slide which swerves into a deep pond; or should you join a birds'-nesting party, she gives a zest to it by vol-planing from the higher branches, and choosing your head as the spot to alight upon. Bright dialogue of the ballroom type characterises most of the other stories in the book, but perhaps most entertaining of all is the Bank Holiday study of "The Last Tram" with its delightful negro touch. "The Tomboy and Others" has made its appearance at the right time of the year—the holiday season—and a heat wave should prove its best friend.

BRIGHT SHAME. By Keighley Snowden. 6s. (Stanley Paul)

Nobody who has followed the work of Mr. Keighley Snowden can have failed to recognise how remarkably his powers have developed and matured in his last two or three novels. His outlook on life has always been wide and thoughtful, but his style has grown clearer, terser, and his grip on his subject larger and more sure. In "Bright Shame" he takes up a curiously interesting ethical problem and handles it courageously and with a ripe knowledge of the human heart, so that, when all is said, the fact that young Frank is the son Stephen Gaunt had not known had been born to the girl he had deserted comes to be important only as it serves to furnish incidents and events that bring out the character of Stephen; of Frank himself; of Stephen's half-brother Jacob and his wife, Ruth, who adopted the boy when his mother died, and are anxious, now the one-time ne'er-do-weel Stephen has returned, that the truth about Frank's birth should not transpire. The hard, stubborn Yorkshire tradesman, Jacob, with his narrow religion and his shrewd business instincts; his wife, childless, loving, very womanly; and the brilliant, kindly, worldly-wise Stephen are admirably drawn and contrasted; and no less ably drawn on their smaller scale are Frank, and the minor people of the story. It is a story that, as Mr. Snowden observes in a postscript, "makes for more liberty of thought than the existing social order contemplates"; the sort of novel that offers a view of life for thoughtful persons to consider and a tale that will take the interest of the general reader at the outset and not lose it till the end is reached.

KINGFISHER BLUE. By Halliwell Sutcliffe. 6s. (Smith, Elder.)

When one has resolutely determined not to be balked by Mr. Sutcliffe's rather irritating trick of making his hero eternally apostrophize his friend Anthony and Anthony's wife it is possible to settle down happily to this simple, wholesome tale. Jack is filled with jealousy and hatred of Mary Ogilvie who marries the firm friend of his bachelor days, and for a long time he cannot think of her except as "The Supplanter." Little by little, however, he thaws, and he finds himself unconsciously coming under her fascination. His friend Anthony is a good-natured country squire without an atom of brain or imagination in his composition. He himself is of finer clay, and so he responds to Mary when she argues that it is his duty to join the County Council, and, later, to enter Parliament. Thus in this "threesome" it is Anthony rather than Jack who finds himself the odd man out, and this position is emphasized by the fact that Mary and Jack fall in love with each other. Both of them are, however, much too loyal to injure Anthony, and their love and personal desires are honourably renounced.

AFFAIRS OF MEN. By D. C. F. Harding. 6s. (John Long.)

"Affairs of Men," is set in a background of luxurious country and town houses, expensive motor cars, horses and traps, pompous butlers, idle young gentlemen and fascinating young ladies. A pleasant enough prospect, you will say, but in these days of prolific novel-writing not capable of very original treatment. Yet Miss D. C. F. Harding has contrived to present us with a really capable novel. Lord Gerald Strathmore, "All-British" as he is described, married the whimsical and bewitching Hebe Campbell. The arrival from abroad of two of Lord Gerald's brothers, in temperament totally different, provides the material for the story. Dick, the artistic brother, and Hebe, Gerald's wife, are irresistibly attracted one to another. Of course trouble ensues. How, profiting by sad experience, Hebe learned to love her husband more dearly, and Dick found his "white love" is for the reader to discover. Dick's wife, Joan Tate, was the daughter of his old tutor, Walter Tate, a lovable old gentleman who, bereft of his wife when his little daughter was two, had spent his life in her service, sheltering her from the world and imbuing her with artistic ideals. "Affairs of Men" is well worth reading if only for the sake of making Joan's acquaintance, and Miss Harding is to be congratulated on such a delightful creation.

INITIALS ONLY. By Anna Katharine Green. 6s. (Eveleigh Nash.)

In this book the author of "The Leavenworth Case" treats her readers to a murder mystery worked out with no little ingenuity. Published without the solution, it may well be doubted whether it would not have defied the skill of the most astute students of mysterious crimes, even had a substantial cash prize been the reward of success. A beautiful and popular American lady—the daughter of a millionaire—falls dead in one of the public rooms in a fashionable hotel in New York. On examination it is found that she has to all appearance been stabbed to the heart. In view of the fact that no one had been seen to approach her for some considerable time before the tragedy, it is suggested that she may have been shot—the noise of the report being drowned by the music of the hotel band—but this theory is negated by the fact that no bullet or other missile is found in the wound. The absence of any weapon near her similarly disposes of the suggestion of suicide. It is a baffling problem, ultimately solved by the aid of Sweetwater, a detective of infinite patience and resource, and his pursuit of various clues leads us into strange labyrinths and gives rise to strongly dramatic situations. The tale is lucidly told, the reader's memory is not taxed by a superabundance of characters, and the interest never flags. Anarchists, an airship, tenement life in New York—the book lacks nothing of the life and colour of modernity, and the secret of the murder—for it is a murder—is decidedly original.

THE PENITENT. By René Bazin. 6s. (Eveleigh Nash.)

Since René Bazin made a name in modern French literature by his study of peasant life, "La Terre qui Meurt," his work has been somewhat unequal. When he gets a fine theme, with a wealth of movement and colour in it, he does excellently. In "The Penitent," however, a strange and pathetic short story, peculiarly French in its circumstances, has been lengthened into a novel. M. Bazin's delicate and quiet art of composition is scarcely equal to the work of expanding an episode into long narration. He is at his best when he is reducing a crowded and violent study of life into a clear, simple and exquisitely coloured piece of literature. In a way, "The Penitent," is a further working out of the fundamental idea of "The Dying Land." The great town, with its glitter, licence and whirl of life, is shown acting with evil influence upon the peasantry, detaching them from the health and hardihood of farm life, and ruining them in body and soul. The pretty wife of a Breton smallholder tries to help her husband over a period of difficulty by going as a wet nurse to a rich France, where well-to-do women of the urban classes have for some hundreds of years been averse from undertaking one of the chief duties of motherhood. Rousseau attacked them for it in the middle of the eighteenth century: but they are now more anxious to preserve their figures than ever they were, and a large multitude of healthy young peasant women leave their husbands and their children in order to nourish the babies of rich ladies. In M. Bazin's story, the young peasant woman does not go back home. Her husband leaves the farm and tramps about the country with his motherless children, and after some years of wandering misery, he is seriously injured in an accident. Then, however, the penitent returns; and so, somewhat against the logic of a painful but true tale, a happy ending is obtained.

PHRYNETTE MARRIED. By Marthe Trolly-Curtin. 6s. (Grant Richards.)

Phrynette, the lively French girl whose company we have enjoyed before, is now married, but one has grave doubts whether she has settled down! She is an extraordinary little minx, who cannot understand why Austen, her English husband, should go tiger-hunting in India and leave her with her "ugly twins." She recounts all that she feels and does during his absence, and, although one sometimes begins to lose patience with her, she is so utterly frank that one can only forgive her little indiscretions. Phrynette is a true creature of impulse, a bundle of delicious femininity, whose humour is as fresh as it is genuine. She has an extremely lively imagination, which now and then runs riot, and as a consequence she occasionally indulges in absurd escapades and some very free opinions. Her greatest adventure, when she goes on an "unsentimental journey," turns, fortunately for Phrynette, into nothing but farce, for, although it seems a "simple thing" to elope, "one cannot imagine into what inconvenient situations it may drag one." She finds a refuge with dear old Dr. Médor, who has a habit—which will be shared by the reader—of laughing when Phrynette talks "serious thoughts."

THE BLUE BIRD'S-EYE. By George Edgar. 6s. (Mills and Boon.)

There is a freshness and vigour of life in "The Blue Bird's-Eye" that make it seem a very oasis in the desert of average new fiction. There is nothing involved or particularly ingenious in the plot; the charm of the book lies in its characterisation and in the strong and breezy simplicity of its story. The interest of it is quickened and it gets a tang of added excitement from the cunningly easy abduction of Rosa Dering by the raffish and rascally Colonel Darleigh, and the headlong pursuit of her by her father, Sir John, her lover, Captain Harry Trevelyan, and the gipsy girl who is the means of putting them on her track; but the main force of the story lies in the terrific prize-fight between the Game Chicken and the Young Ruffian—in the strenuous preparations for this great event, in Dering's unscrupulous attempts to maim the Game Chicken and smuggle him away into durance so that he may not be able to put in an appearance, for on the appearance of this untried champion to meet the Young Ruffian on an appointed day depends his own ruin and the salvation from ruin of his enemy Sir John Dering. He issued his challenge, and Sir John, a good but rash sportsman, promptly took it up—the man who was at first to fight in his behalf has been permanently injured in an apparent accident, and he has no alternative but to forfeit the stakes and be reduced to beggary or to find at short notice another champion who can stand up to the redoubtable Young Ruffian. He finds a substitute in the Game Chicken, who has never yet proved his prowess, and Mr. Edgar keeps the reader triumphantly and keenly in suspense as to the issue until the fight is accomplished; and a more stirring description of a prize-fight has never been written. The destinies that hang on the result of this heroic combat invest it with far more than ordinary interest and significance. Mr. Edgar has caught the atmosphere of his period and the spirit of certain phases of its fashionable life with remarkable skill, and has given us an epic of the prize ring of a hundred years ago that is full of romance and yet wears a face of convincing reality. If this is, as we believe, a first novel, it is certainly one of the most brilliant first novels we have read for a long time.

THE WOMAN BETWEEN. By Edmund Bosanquet. 6s. (Long.)

We believe that Mr. Edmund Bosanquet made a hit with "A Society Mother," and the fate of "The Woman Between" is probably already decided. The new novel exhibits many of the same traits as were evident in its predecessor—the somewhat delicate nature of the main idea and the inoffensive manner of its treatment, allied with a brisk and readable style. In other respects, however, we fear that we do not consider it nearly equal to the earlier book. It is an unconvincing story, treated in a manner which is, to say the least, improbable, and it contains but one or two effectively drawn characters, while frankly we cannot believe in the heroine at all. In fact it is nothing more than a feuilleton, designed for the smart set. Regarded as such it is easy enough to read—even to enjoy mildly; but we had thought better of Mr. Bosanquet, and we are still sure that he can, and he cares, do really good work. But he must not waste his gifts upon empty and machine-made situations.

THE RICH MAN'S WIFE. By Dick Donovan and E. Way Elkington. 6s. (Ham-Smith.)

"Imagine a perfectly lovely woman, rich as Cræsus, with enough money on her back to keep you and me for a year. . . . and yet not loud, but simply beautifully formed, with a hand and arm that would break a sculptor's heart"—and there, in the words of its hero, you have the heroine of "A Rich Man's Wife." Perhaps she is not entirely a sympathetic heroine, for she does encourage the hero in spite of her marriage to the Rich Man, who is not such a bad fellow in his peculiar way. But at any rate she is comprehensible and natural, and she never does anything very wrong. The hero, in his turn, behaves remarkably badly to his devoted Connie, whom he loves with what he believes to be the better side of his nature—to discover later that he was mistaken in believing that affection and love are the same thing. There you have the tangle of

Photo by Ernest Mills.

Mr. George Edgar.

"The Rich Man's Wife," and you may be quite sure that two such deservedly popular authors as Messrs. Dick Donovan and E. Way Elkington keep things going briskly from the first page to the last of a very readable book.

YESTERDAY. By Anna Costantini. 6s. (Greening.)

Viareggio is not a place which literary English people ever can ignore, and in this book we have a most convincing picture of the sort of life which the Italians lead there in the months of summer. A feature, in fact, of this novel is the authenticity with which the upper classes in that country are portrayed; and if we sometimes feel that the game is not worth the candle, that the Signora Costantini could apply her talents to a more deserving study than these intricate intrigues, yet we admit that she does it very well. The American heroine is the necessary foil, and if there is not the same variety as in "Ragna" with its beautiful Norwegian scenes, we notice many touches of realism, many vivid descriptions that make us hope that some day, when the authoress joins to her great knowledge of Italian life a greater—shall we say prettiness? her books will be as popular as those of Harland and Marion Crawford.

LADY Q. By Margaret Baillie Saunders 6s. (Hutchinson.)

With such grim power is the note of overwhelming desolation sounded in the opening chapter of this carefully constructed novel that it haunts the reader through all the lighter passages and persists to the end. Picture a November dawn rising wet and grey over Docker's Marshes. "Monstrous heaps of slag and shard and red-rusty iron loom heavily through the nebulous fog-daylight, inexpressibly symbolical of the wreckage of human endeavour. Here and there an irrelevant canal slinks through the lone acres of dun-coloured bog-grass, and a few low-built factories with upstanding shafts fringe the River Lea, that grey ribbon border of London town." Here it is that fate brings together two women, one a flutter of rags, Anna Flavian, outcast, thief and blackmailer, the other the richly clad body of a suicide. To Anna good clothes mean a new lease of life, and she robs the dead woman of her costly raiment, placing her own rags on the corpse. A direct consequence of this ghastly theft is that it saddles Anna with the care of the suicide's child, and with this secret always in the background we watch her, cold, calculating, scheming, until eventually she becomes Lady Q. the wife of Sir Jeremy Quitchett. When it is mentioned that Sir Jeremy proves to be the father of the suicide, it will be seen that there is plenty of opportunity for big scenes. The shock he receives on learning that his daughter died apparently in rags all but kills him, his life being saved by the self-sacrifice of Anna, whose confession leads to her downfall. "Lady Q." is full of excellent character sketches. The author's pictures of the hard-working community at St. Dunstan's, Docker's Marshes, and of the Jewish household which harbours the suicide's child are vividly and sympathetically realised.

THE REVOLT. By Putnam Weale. 6s. net. (Methuen.)

There is a fine feeling for breadth, an outlook as from a mountain top in Mr. Weale's work. From the time when his hero, in early youth, listens to the endless pattering of the water-coolies' feet, and hears their never changing chant, to the day when countless soldiers in red trousers tramp past his window at Gambetta's funeral, we have the same sort of feeling that Addison had, when he contemplated in his vision, the long procession of humanity over the bridge of life. This detachment from the humming world is the keynote of the book. It colours all the hero's many introspective fancies. It gives a breezy, mental atmosphere which would be still more satisfying did not the author occasionally ascend too high, into mystical cloud regions where we do not breathe freely. The story is a conventional one, and the treatment is not far removed from the conventional. It is the dialogue, the suggestiveness of it, the far depths of soul to which it opens the door, that makes the book. We have seldom read dialogue so transparent.

THE SECOND WOMAN. By Norma Lorimer. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

It is extremely inartistic to find a foot-note in a novel, referring the reader to a guide-book, after he has been enjoying a descriptive passage, and crediting the writer with observation and insight. Miss Lorimer should know better than this. Her account of the Palio at Siena did not require a foot-note. As a matter of fact, her Italian scenery is preferable to her psychology, and this is what spoils a novel of some charm and power. She makes her heroine quixotically resolve to leave her husband, when that youthful artist met anyone who was his affinity, but Laura unluckily leaves him before making sure that his affinity really cared for him, and the result is a tangled situation. If the grasp of character had been equal to the descriptive power in the story, it would have been quite a fresh romance.

THE NEW HUMPTY-DUMPTY. By Daniel Chaucer. 6s. (John Lane)

The new Humpty-Dumpty is the young King of Galizia whose people have rebelled, set up a Republic and made it necessary for him and his mean, pompous old mother to escape out of it. They settle down in England, very much as a certain real King and his household are settled in exile amongst us at this time; and presently a little group of plotters is gathered about them scheming and intriguing to replace the dispossessed monarch on his throne. It is an amazing group, including an American millionaire, an English Lady and his Lordship, her dissipated husband, a fatuous chauffeur, a light-comedy actress, a Lady of lighter reputation still, a bumptious Cockney journalist and, for leader of them all, the Russian Count Macdonald—a wholly likeable and charming character, the one utter idealist and fine spirit in the sordid, self-seeking, shoddy company. The American millionaire helps to finance the adventure with a couple of millions on the understanding that he receives valuable mining concessions; the English Lady Aldington and her husband contribute to the treasury because they own profitable tin mines in the country that the Republic is governing; the Count who, under the tuition of the egregious Cockney journalist, Mr. Pett, has been an Anarchist and a Socialist and squandered his fortune for the good of those causes, has now taken up the King's cause on pure idealistic grounds and for no possible good to himself. Incidentally, he is hampered with a very jealous wife, the daughter of a London shopkeeper, a girl he had married in his Socialistic days; he is further hampered by the American millionaire's sentimental daughter falling in love with him, and by falling in love himself with the unhappily married Lady Aldington. Which opens the door to some biting satire on our divorce laws, as the whole story opens it to a satiric handling of modern methods of company promotion, and to an ironic presentation of the grotesque realities that underlie the outward glory and dignity of kingship. The characterisation is masterly, and the satire of the book, especially when it is concerned with the futile personality of the exiled King, or that of a certain degenerate Russian Grand Duke, or that of the great little Mr. Pett cuts home, but it is all done with so light and whimsical a touch that even when it is most biting it is irresistibly amusing. There is nothing cleverer or more entertaining among the new novels than this witty and brilliant story of how all the King's financiers, and motley hangers-on, and that one delightful idealist went to work to put Humpty Dumpty together again.

ROSE OF THE GARDEN. By Katharine Tynan. 6s. (Constable.)

No character in the eighteenth century lends herself more fascinatingly to the business of romance than the lovely Lady Sarah Lennox; and surely nobody could have fashioned a more charming story of her life than Miss Katharine Tynan has done in "Rose of the Garden."

Miss Tynan has entered very sympathetically into the individuality of her heroine and, with the assistance of some of Lady Sarah's own letters, sets before us a remarkably vivid and attractive picture of that unfortunate lady. We follow her career, that now sparkles with happiness and excitement, now descends into depths of melancholy, from the days of her bewitching youth to the golden prime of womanhood, when the sorrows and difficulties which so persistently beset her path are all falling away from her at last. The book has that elusive quality that we speak of as charm; it unfolds a glamorous and moving story skilfully, delicately, and with a deft narrative art that recreates the atmosphere of the long past and recaptures our interest in one of the most winsome women that Sir Joshua Reynolds's canvases helped to make famous.

The Bookman's Table.

THE LOWER DEPTHS. By Maxim Gorky. Translated from the original Russian by Laurence Irving 2s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin)

Grim, drab, sordid, squalid - you may call "The Lower Depths," all this and sometimes even worse; it could hardly picture the lower depths and be otherwise; but it holds your interest irresistibly and impresses you with a sense of its unexaggerated reality, its stark and terrible truthfulness. It is so baldly true that it takes no trouble to elaborate a plot; it uncovers a cellar for you, one of the commonest of Russian common lodging-houses, and shows you the outcast, almost dehumanised wretches who make their home in it, individualises them, reveals their inmost character with a wonderful vividness, and with a few subtle, illuminating touches brings out the stories of their strange and broken lives in the course of their desultory conversation. There is humour in the play—the sort of wry, grotesque humour that mostly has a hint of tears in it; there is the pathos that is inseparable from sickness and poverty, even when the poor are the veriest rascals, and perhaps the most dreadful thing in it is the lightness, the indifference with which these hopeless creatures speak of death and look upon the dead. Life is so cheap with them, it is so little worth having that none of them seem to be much troubled at the thought of losing it. These people are not creations, they are actual living men and women, and Gorky, by the magic of his genius, has simply transferred them from that unspeakable lodging-house to his pages. In the ordinary meaning of the word "The Lower Depths" is not a play; it is just a powerfully written, tragic thing that regards life from no moral but from a finely and profoundly humanitarian standpoint and is great literature because it is so greatly human. Mr. Laurence Irving's translation is an excellent piece of work that faithfully preserves the half barbaric spirit of its original.

THE CHURCH IN THE PAGES OF "PUNCH." By the Rev. D. Wallace Duthie. 6s. net. (Smith, Elder.)

In one of the shortest prefatory notes ever contributed by way of introductory blessing to another man's work, the Right Hon. G. W. E. Russell describes this volume as "an extremely amusing and also an instructive book." Primarily it is, doubtless, intended to be entertaining, but incidentally the author touches upon many matters that have agitated men's minds during the lifetime of Punch, and is perhaps inclined occasionally to take the jester over seriously, especially in the later decades when he has been moved more by desire for drollery than inspired by purpose. In his early years Punch was rarely forgetful of the fact that a jest may be the feather to carry the shaft of satire, and he commonly wrote on serious matters with a serious purpose underlying his fun. He was a fellow of strong views, given to strong expression of them, and had a fierce feeling against Roman Catholics especially—one of the first secessions from his staff was in consequence of the way in which that feeling was expressed. But, as Mr. Duthie points out, the whirligig of time brought about its revenge, and before Punch had attained to middle age, "a Roman Catholic sat in the seat of the scornful—his own editor's chair." It is conceded that many of the abuses connected with the Church which Punch again and again made the objects of his satire or his fun have been reformed, that he has, on the whole, expressed the sense of the nation on given matters. Mr. Duthie has not sought to go through the long row of Punch volumes from 1841 to the present, and to give a chronological record of the pertinences and impertinences concerning Churchmen and Church matters, but has grouped typical jests and comments on particular subjects, such as "Punch and Ritualism," "Punch and the Bishops," "Punch and Dissent," "Punch and the Jews," and so forth, and has done so in a pleasant, genial fashion which suggests that the Church bears no malice for some of the asperities which Punch has at times uttered against some of her members.

A SHORT HISTORY OF MUSIC IN ENGLAND. By Ernest Ford. 5s. net. (Sampson Low.)

The distinguishing characteristic of this book is its broad common-sense. This quality it was, rather than any brilliant cunning of the baton, which gave its value to Mr. Ernest Ford's work as conductor of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, and those who appreciated his enthusiasm in this capacity will be prepared to read with pleasure his plain, straightforward exposition of the main facts of English musical history, illuminated here by his fervent patriotism. In his modest preface the author disclaims any technical value for his work, and it is obviously not written as a text-book. Probably he is right in thinking that it will be of interest mainly to the general reader in search of information on such subjects as "Music before and during the Reformation," "The Progress of Orchestral Music," "Musical Education in England," and "Distinguished Musicians of the Nineteenth Century," more especially as each of the ten chapters is made, by recapitulation, practically complete in itself. The last-named section is sure to prove attractive by reason of the personal anecdotes it contains of Sims Reeves, Lady Hallé, Sir Charles Hallé, and Sir Arthur Sullivan. Mr. Ford comments on the "interesting experiment Mr. Hammerstein is now making," with his usual soundness of view. He is of opinion that opera must be sung in English, and that the charges for admission must be moderate, before any operative enterprise can hope for success. More than this, he says: "The thoughts of all Englishmen must necessarily turn to (the) native product," and hints that an opera from the pen of Sir Edward Elgar would arouse interest in the opera as a form of musical art. It might, were it a fact that the public as a whole understands the operative idea. Unfortunately, this is not by any means the case; hence the necessity of any pioneer movement being constructed on educative lines. There is a remarkable omission in the book, inasmuch as no reference is made to the growth of the competitive musical meeting, which is, without doubt, one of the most useful and widespread influences in the direction of education in music at present at work in this country. At the end of his "General Survey" the author gives his considered judgment in the following words: "Although unable to take the roseate view of the position of native music in England that is often expressed . . . I think it will be generally agreed that there are many signs, at once indicative of hopefulness and, already, great and assured progress. England . . . may well be happy in the prospect of a noble art restored to her. In that firm faith I close these pages."

Maxim Gorky.

From "The Lower Depths," by Maxim Gorky. (Fisher Unwin.)

NIGHTS AT THE PLAY. By H. M. Walbrook. 5s. net. (W. J. Ham-Smith)

Mr. Walbrook, we fear, is an incurable optimist. In a preface to a collection of theatrical notices which he has recently published under the title of "Nights at the Play," he tells us that his "book appears in a moment of renewed hope for the future of the British theatre." He has hopes for the future of the drama in the provinces based seemingly on the founding of local play-producing theatres, the Abbey Theatre in Dublin, Miss Horniman's repertory theatre at Manchester, and a house run on similar lines at Glasgow. And he seems to think that all must be well with London, since it has welcomed "The Theatre of Ideas"—whatever that theatre may be—the ideas being those, we gather, of such a heterogeneous crowd of dramatists as the respective authors of "Strife," "An Englishman's Home," "Nan," "Diana Dobson's," "Hannele," "The Blue Bird," and "The Passing of the Third Floor Back." In comment on this alleged generous "welcome" we should like to enquire: How many times were "Strife" and "Nan" played, and what amount of profit did they bring to the exchequer? To share Mr. Walbrook's optimism indeed, we should have to ignore the fact that the mass of the English theatre-going public never has had, and never seems likely to have, any taste for the drama as a means of intellectual or even histrionic expression—last season, for instance, the great successes have been won by a couple of Mr. Shaw's farces ("Man and Superman," and "Fanny's First Play") and two light musical plays ("The Quaker Girl," and "The Count of Luxembourg.") We should also need to forget sundry circumstances of topical interest, to wit that Miss Lena Ashwell is no longer in the list of play-producers; that a brilliant young dramatist like the author of "Irene Wycherley" has had to wait more than four years before being able to get his second play produced; that Mr. Charles Frohman seems now definitely to have abandoned his Repertory Theatre scheme; that in his latest comedy, Sir Arthur Pinero has given us a piece so technically old-fashioned as to contain two acts of exposition to one of drama; that the actor-manager was never in more complete command of the theatre than at present; that our two most accomplished actors—Mr. Forbes Robertson and Mr. Willard—cannot afford the luxury of playing in London; and that our leading Shakespearean theatre is controlled by a player who is physically and temperamentally unequal to playing tragic or even romantic rôles. We commend these signs of the "progress" of theatrical art in London to the attention of Mr. Walbrook, assuring him, meantime, that we have read his theatrical notices with considerable interest, and that finding ourselves in agreement with most of what he says, we feel bound to hail him as a sensible and discerning master of his craft.

SOME OLD ENGLISH WORTHIES. Edited, with Notes and Introduction, by Dorothy Senior. 10s. 6d. net. (Swift.)

The old English "worthies" dealt with in this volume are Thomas of Reading, George a Green, Roger Bacon, and Friar Rush. They are, of course, familiar enough to students of Early English legendary lore, but they are here presented in a form which should introduce them to a far wider public than has hitherto had access to them. The editor of the volume, in her admirable introduction, points out that, though here and there it has been necessary to alter the phraseology and orthography, she has endeavoured to adhere to the spirit of the originals. In this she has been wholly successful. "Thomas of Reading" is taken from a copy of the edition of 1632 printed in London by Elz. Allde for Robert Bird. The legend deals with "The Six Worthy Husbands of the West," so-called by Henry I., who were among the nine most famous clothmakers of their day. Robin Hood, Maid Marian, and other well-known figures, appear in "George a Green" the pindar, or pound-keeper, of Wakefield. "The Legend of Friar Bacon" is perhaps the best known of the four, and is from a chapbook dated 1661. The fourth story gives "The History of Friar Rush," an entertaining legend with a moral. All the narratives are full of curious and interesting lore, and their readers will be grateful to the editor for the copious explanatory notes she has appended. The book has been tastefully bound, and the type is good.

A PSYCHIC AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By Amanda T. Jones. 4s. 6d. net. (William Rider & Son, Ltd.)

The "Realm of Pysche" is one of many enchantments, and not a little illusion. Ego and vanity run riot in certain quarters of it, and there is much winnowing to be done. But one can deal with the present work without qualms. Miss Amanda Jones, the well-known American poetess, tells the story of her long and remarkable life in a keen, vivacious style, and her account of the many instances of spiritual interposition and guidance in her career have too many parallels in modern literature to make them seem intrinsically improbable. The book is fortified by an introduction by Professor James H. Hyslop, distinguished in psychical science, who testifies to the strength and value of the narrative. Quite apart from the psychical phenomena of which the book treats (and which are not for all readers) we found in Miss Jones's record much of general interest on the human side, as dealing with the views and experiences of an American woman of cultivated and alert mind, with a wide and mature outlook on life. Those who are interested in feminine movements will find congenial reading in Miss Jones's account of the career of the "Women's Company for Working Women, started by a Woman." Men crept in by craft and guile, however, and the Company was "whirled away."

STUDIES AND APPRECIATIONS. By William Sharp. 5s. net. (Heinemann.)

These essays, all of which deal with literary subjects, show William Sharp in the guise in which he was best known before his identity with the mysterious Celtic poetess was revealed—as the conscientious and satisfactory editor of the Canterbury Poets. Some of them appeared as introductions in that or other series, and suffer from the limitation imposed by their original destination; the papers, for instance, on the sonnet and on great odes, which one would have thought it scarcely worth while to reprint apart from their contexts, so clearly are they intended to tickle the palate of the reader as yet ignorant even of the best of English poetry. Others, however, which are equally informative, fully justify their inclusion; for they deal with matters on which many people will be glad of instruction, such as "The Heroic and Legendary Literature of Brittany," modern Italian poetry, and the Felibridge. Nor must it be supposed that because these essays are full of facts they are therefore devoid of the virtues of criticism. The book has been given for a motto some words of Sharp's own: "When I speak of Criticism I have in mind not merely the more or less deft use of commentary or indication, but one of the several ways of literature, and in itself a rare and fine art: the marriage of science that knows and of spirit that discerns. The basis of criticism is imagination, its spiritual quality is simplicity, its intellectual distinction is balance." Good words, which Sharp strove, not altogether unsuccessfully, to live up to. He was no Pater, nor even an Arthur Symonds or a Lionel Johnson, but he had a sane and observant outlook, and his paper on Sainte-Beuve illustrates the clearness and soundness of his views of the critic's function. That paper is one of the best here printed. It is an admirable gift in an essayist, and more especially in an editor, that he should be able to interest at once those who know and those who do not know the subject in hand. Sharp had this gift, as the essay on Sainte-Beuve and others amply demonstrate. His account of the Felibridge, for instance, is excellent whether read as criticism or as history, and admirable for its avoidance of over-enthusiasm. One feels occasionally in reading these pages that Sharp, like other modern critics, was rather prone to think too much of contemporary stuff which time would prove ephemeral. But it is a more gracious failing than the carping of the laudator temporis acti, nor was it Sharp's in any marked degree. His knowledge of southern literatures seems to have been extensive. His essay on D'Annunzio is good, though he shows the Englishman's characteristic timid fascination before that exotic genius. The translations from Breton popular songs are well done, interesting in themselves and interesting as being the only place in "Studies and Appreciations" where the author's Celtic proclivities come into prominence.

ANGLO-AMERICAN MEMORIES. Second Series. By George W. Smalley. 12s 6d. net (Duckworth)

In Victor Hugo's diary for 1866 there is a note that Mr Smalley of the New York Tribune came to Guernsey from America especially to see the poet. The interview must have been somewhat remarkable, for Hugo goes on to say, "Mr. Smalley does not speak a word of French, and I not a word of English." Perhaps this was the beginning of Mr. Smalley's study of the leading personalities of our time. Half a century of first-rate journalistic work has made him a charming and illuminating observer of the characters and actions of the captains of modern civilisation. On the title page of his new volume of "Anglo-American Memories," he cites Machiavelli's saying: "Among all my possessions I have found none I prize so much as the knowledge of the actions of great men." The fact is the author is an agent of that American spirit of curiosity in regard to the chief characters in European affairs, which is a connecting force of some importance between the old world and the new. On the whole, the people of the Mother Country of the Anglo-Saxon races must feel grateful to him for the kindly sympathetic insight he has displayed in their affairs; for he has put before his readers in New York a very friendly and very interesting series of studies of the leading personages in our social and political life. On one occasion, indeed, he was able to render to our country a political service of high value. Our Ambassador at Washington, Lord Pauncefoot, got into serious trouble with the American public. A semi-official despatch from Berlin, in 1902, accused him of having initiated, during the Spanish-American war, a plan of European intervention vehemently hostile to the United States. The despatch went on to suggest that it was only through the energetic action of the German Emperor that the scheme of Lord Pauncefoot had been defeated. Mr Smalley saw President Roosevelt, and obtained permission to state publicly that the President himself had declared that the Berlin story was, on his own knowledge, false. The result was that the German Ambassador, Baron Holleben, in whose name the accusation had been made, was discredited. The worry of the affair killed Lord Pauncefoot, and President Roosevelt broke all etiquette by attending the funeral service of the British Ambassador, and lining the road along which the burial procession passed with fifteen hundred American troops. No foreign journalist has, out of simple loving friendship for our country, done what Mr. Smalley did in the Pauncefoot-Holleben intrigue. But then Mr. Smalley is not a foreigner; he is a kinsman. A great ambassador of journalism, he has worked well and long to establish and maintain a fraternal relationship between Great Britain and the United States. In order to understand our country, he has become intimately acquainted with the best minds and strongest characters of our age; and though he has not kept a journal and seldom taken a note, his portraits of our politicians, soldiers, society leaders, actors and men of letters are wonderfully vivid and uncommonly entertaining. His book abounds in good stories and keen touches of characterisation. And what gives a piquancy to his biographical studies is the fact that they deal mainly with persons still in active life: there is no flattery or sharpness, but a kind and yet shrewd appreciation of character that makes the work the most readable and interesting set of biographical essays that has appeared for some years.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. WARD, LOCK & CO.

Three first-rate sensational stories that Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. have added to their new list of sound, readable fiction are Rogues in Arcady, by Sir William Magnay; A Son of the Immortals, by Louis Tracy; and The Missing Miss Randolph, by Marie Connor Leighton (6s. each). There is adventure and mystery, and a stirring love romance in each one of them, and we strongly recommend them to readers who, when they sit down to a work of fiction, want to be recreated by a rattling good tale. A rattling good tale, too, with humour in it, as well as love and adventure, is Private Selby, by Edgar Wallace (6s.), and the story of Dick Selby and the delightful Brown Lady makes as charming and clever a book as any Mr. Wallace has given us—which is saying a great deal for it, but not a word too much.

MR. B. H. BLACKWELL.

The Making of Oxford, by Rhoda Murray (1s. net), is a popular history of the city of Oxford, as distinct from the University. It is a picturesque, admirably written story, and of necessity touches also on the life of the University where it is inseparable from the life of the city itself. The more or less traditional records of early Oxford are full of interest, but it was in the middle ages that both city and University reached a Portionists' Hall.

Holywell Manor House.

fulness and vigour and variety of experience that it has been long in surpassing. With very little change mediæval Oxford lasted, indeed, as Miss Murray says, till nearly the end of the eighteenth century, and for some six hundred years the city was striving against the dominance of the University, to which its mayors again and again refused to take the oath of allegiance, and were excommunicated and fined for their contumacy until an Act of Parliament in 1859 put an end to the strife by abrogating any such oath. The book is carefully and attractively written, and the many thumb-nail drawings by the author, scattered through the text, are beautiful little examples of black and white art.

MR. STEPHEN SWIFT.

If he has done nothing else, Mr. Litchfield Woods has at least created a very unusual character. The figure of Professor Snaggs dominates his novel, A Superman in Being (6s.), to the almost complete exclusion of everything else—minor characters, plot, or construction. In fact, we agree entirely with the publisher's statement that the book "is not, in the usual sense, a story of love and marriage." It is not, in the usual sense, a novel at all. Professor Snaggs, the distinguished historian, has lost his eyesight, and is therefore dependent, to some extent, upon the offices of his clever and attractive secretary, with whom he has had a liaison. This means little to the Professor, who considers himself exempt from the ordinary rules of morality, but it means a good deal to the secretary when she falls in love with a fairly normal young man—also clever. The Professor's intuition informs him how matters stand, and in a series of monologues, which comprise practically the whole of the book, he proves first that the young man is worthy of his bride, and then induces him to marry her when he knows the truth about her. The whole thing is very amusing, exceedingly clever, and equally unpleasant.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO.

The title of Sir Thomas Browne's masterpiece has been frequently imitated of late, and now we have a prose variant on the Religio Laici in A Layman's Philosophy, by Alexander Davis (3s. 6d. net). This is a curious little work which may best be described as a series of detached thoughts on ethics and religion. It is the result, we are told, of "years of reflection on the actualities of human existence," making "no pretence to original scientific research or a detailed analysis of the riddle of existence." Preliminary explanations are generally a mistake, and it is in spite of them, and not because of them, that we would testify to the sincerity and sanity and broad-mindedness of this little volume. The author has necessarily, from his self-imposed limits, had to be brief and general; but the results of his reflection are germinative of reflection on the part of his readers. He is stimulative and suggestive, and can write of dogmas without himself being dogmatic. It is characteristic of the author's method that his resultant principle is the cautious one of "the greatest good to the greater number." The book is marred by a few unfortunate misprints: e.g., "Diety" (p. 37); "segrated" (p. 57); "unearthened" (p. 127). Seven, apparently, is the author's unlucky number.

MR. EVELEIGH NASH.

The already enormous family of Sherlock Holmes' descendants is now augmented by an American kinsman. The publisher's note, in the modern candid and anticipatory style, informs us regarding The Black Hand, by Arthur B. Reeve (2s. net), that "many think them quite as good as the stories of Sherlock Holmes." While admitting that the stories that make up the volume have many good qualities as magazine fiction, we cannot endorse this high opinion. In point of ingenuity, originality and neatness of construction there seems to us no ground of comparison, and we must add that the medium of expression is transparently Transatlantic. The amateur in this case is Craig Kennedy, "a college professor," and his assistant is "a newspaper man," who had formerly "roomed together" with the professor. The twelve stories make a bold attempt to describe the latest scientific discoveries pressed into the service of crime from the microphone, which records the slightest criminal whisper, to the chair "wired under the arm in such a way as to betray on an appropriate indicator in the next room every sudden and undue emotion." When the assistant asked the professor, "How do I come in?" the answer was: "Well, for one thing, you'll get a scoop, a beat." Without knowing the exact meaning of the terms, we feel certain that no reader of this volume will fail to get a "scoop" and a "beat."

MR. JOHN MURRAY.

The author of With Dante in Modern Florence (6s. net) has here written a book which will interest even the hitherto uninterested both in Dante and in Florence. Miss Mary E. Lacy has undertaken the task of reconstructing Florence as Dante knew it, and with that intelligent patience which can accomplish so much she has, so to speak, removed the stones of many a present building and has shown us the contemporary surroundings of the Divine Poet. But to show the actual Florence of the period is an extremely difficult task, and our chief praise goes out to Miss Lacy for the accomplishment of a task which she did not undertake—that of rekindling life in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. With thorough ability she has avoided pedantry yet given each and with a genuine charm she has seized upon the picturesque and salient matters. The volume will be a valuable companion to any traveller whose goal is the beautiful city of Dante's birth.

Photo: Alinari.

Statue of Dante, by Dorni, Loggia of the Uffizi.

From "With Dante in Modern Florence" by Mary E. Lacy (John Murray).

MESSRS. SIDGWICK AND JACKSON.

The author of Treasure of Thule, Mr. B. D. Steward (6s.), must blame his own daring if he finds that his "Romance of Orkney" is criticized in comparison with William Black's minor classic. It is no discredit to the author of what we may take to be a first novel that the comparison seems to reveal many crudities. A chance meeting at the Stores in London brought together Edward Nichol, a house-master at Maltby, and an old Maltbeian, Robin Jones. They follow a holiday cruise for Nichol in Jones's yacht to one of the Orkney Islands, of which, as it turns out, Nichol is one of the claimant owners. The other claimant is Cecil Lubbock, the daughter of an eccentric Danish professor, and by a liberal use of the arm of coincidence Mr. Steward brings all his company together on the island. We have then much deciphering of Runic inscriptions, relieved by the love-making of the claimants. And the story proceeds through many pleasant descriptions of happy picnics to the final solution of all contending claims by matrimony. If on the romantic side Mr. Steward's pretty story certainly derives from William Black, on the schoolmaster side he proves himself an equally devout admirer of "Stalkey & Co." But if both his romance and his slang are derivative, he is fully entitled to the credit of his own high spirits, that carry him successfully through a very agreeable holiday yarn.

MR. H. J. DRANE.

If Mr. Edgar Frere's story—Rebels (6s.)—when stripped to its bare essentials, depends upon a somewhat commonplace love plot, it is lifted considerably above the average novel by its fresh and vigorous treatment. Mr. Frere has a few obvious faults. He is inordinately fond of epithets; his sentences are at times a trifle clumsy; and he has a surreptitious hankering after "fine writing." But these blemishes are more than counterbalanced by his gift of natural humour, by his interesting philosophical outlook upon life, and by his power of telling a story rapidly and well. If anything, indeed, Cavendish is made to rush about the world rather too much before he finally is admitted to a partnership in the firm of solicitors whose managing clerk and right-hand man he had been, and thus is enabled to marry Aileen Fitz-Oakley. Aileen herself, too, has an adventurous career, but no fault can be found with that, because to fit we owe the really admirable picture of Mr. Algernon Browning and his humbugging literary association. As that ridiculous person would have said, Mr. Frere's novel is a "veritable feast of good things," and when he has learned to employ his thoughts in a less recklessly profuse manner Mr. Frere ought to write a novel which will be really first class.

Messrs. Methuen's New Books

- THE VIGIL OF VENUS, and other Poems. By 'Q' (Sir A. T. QUILLER-ROUCH), Author of 'The Golden Pomp.' Crown 8vo. 3/6. [Ready]
- BEATING TO PORT, and other Poems By T. P. B. Crown 8vo. 3/6 net. [Ready]
- POEMS OF LIFE AND FORM. By L. F. WYNNE FFOULKES. Crown 8vo. 5/- net. [Sept. 12]
- ENGLISH AND WELSH CATHEDRALS. By T. D. ATKINSON. With 26 Illustrations in Colour by WALTER DEXTER, R.B.A., 20 in monotone, and 48 plans. Demy 8vo. 10/6 net. [Sept. 19]
- RODIN. By MURIEL CIOLKOWSKA. With 25 Illustrations. Demy 16mo. Gilt top. 2/6 net. [Little Books on Art]
- MEMORIES. By Sir FREDERICK WIDMORE. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. [Ready]
- SIXTY YEARS OF A SOLDIER'S LIFE. By Major-General Sir ALFRED E. TURNER, K.C.B. With 2 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. [Sept. 26]
- THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF THE CONDÉS (1530-1740). By H. NOEL WILLIAMS. With 17 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 15/- net. [Sept. 12]
- QUEEN HENRIETTA MARIA AND HER FRIENDS. By HENRIETTA HAYNES. With 11 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10/6 net. [Sept. 5]
- A BOOK OF FAMOUS WITS. By WALTER JERROLD. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7/6 net. [Sept. 12]
- CARDINAL DE RICHELIEU. By ELEANOR C. PRICE. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10/6 net. [Sept. 19]
- A LIFE OF SAPPHO. By MARY MILLS PATRICK, Ph.D. With many Illustrations. Fcap. 8vo. 3/6 net. [Sept. 5]
- STUART LIFE AND MANNERS: A Social History. By P. F. W. RYAN. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10/6 net. [Sept. 26]
- QUESTIONS OF TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW. By Sir ALFRED MOND, Bart., M.P. Crown 8vo. 1/- net. [Sept. 26]
- THE GREAT SALVATION: A Study of the Epistle to the Hebrews. By C. R. CUFF, LL.B. Fcap. 8vo. 3/6 net. [Ready]
- INSTINCT & EXPERIENCE. By C. LLOYD MORGAN, LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S. Crown 8vo. 5/- net. [Sept. 5]
- THE COMPLETE YACHTSMAN. By B. HECKSTADT-SMITH, Secretary of the Yacht Racing Association, and Captain ERNEST DU BOULAY. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 15/- net. [Ready]
- HOW TO PLAY GOLF. By HARRY VARDON. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 5/- net. [Sept. 12]
- 'THE AUTOCAR' ROAD BOOK. By CHARLES G. HARPER. In four Volumes. With Maps. Crown 8vo. Each 7/6 net. [Ready]
- THE PATH OF THE CONQUISTADORES. By LINDON BATES, Jn., Author of 'The Russian Road to China.' With 24 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo. 10/6 net. [Ready]
- THE INDIAN SCENE. By J. A. SPENDER. Crown 8vo. 3/6 net. The Author's Impressions of a first journey to India. [Sept. 25]
- BRITISH PLANT GALLS: A Classified Text-Book of Cecidology. By E. W. SWANTON. Illustrated with 32 Plates, 16 in Colour, and 16 from Photographs. Crown 8vo. 7/6 net. [Sept. 12]
- THE OLD ENGLISH COUNTRY SQUIRE. By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A. With 24 Illustrations, of which 8 are in Colour. Demy 8vo. 7/6 net. [Sept. 12]

Methuen's Popular Novels. Crown 8vo. 6/- each.

- THE BIG FISH. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. Author of 'Alice of Asia.' [Ready]
- HER SERENE HIGHNESS. By PHILIP LAURENCE OULHANT. [Ready]
- JUDITH LEE: Some Pages from her Life. By RICHARD MARSH. Author of 'A Royal Discretion.' With 4 Illustrations. [Ready]
- THE OAKUM PICKERS. By I. S. GIBSON. Author of 'The Ships of Desart.' [Ready]
- HAUNTING SHADOWS: or, The House of Terror. By M. F. HUTCHINSON. [Ready]
- A WILDERNESS WOOING. By W. VICTOR COOK. Author of 'Anton of the Alps.' [Ready]
- NANCE OF MANCHESTER. By ORME AUGUS. Author of 'Sarah Tullon's Lovers.' [Ready]
- REMITTANCE BILLY. By ANTHON HILLIERS. Author of 'Memories of a Person of Quality.' [Ready]
- A KINGDOM DIVIDED. By DAVID LIPSI. Author of 'A Painter of Souls.' [Ready]
- IT HAPPENED IN SMYRNA. By THOMAS EDGELOW. [Ready]
- A WOMAN IN THE LIMELIGHT. By CHARLES GREGG. Author of 'The Nancy Manoeuvres.' [Ready]
- BURIED ALIVE. By ARNOLD BENNETT. Author of 'Clayhanger.' A New Edition. [Ready]
- THE STREET CALLED STRAIGHT. By the Author of 'The Wild Olive.' [Ready]
- THE ANGLO-INDIANS. By ALICE PERRIN. Author of 'The Charm.' [Ready]
- THE QUEST OF THE GOLDEN ROSE. By JOHN OXENHAM. Author of 'The Long Road.' [Ready]
- OLIVIA MARY. By E. MARIA ALBANESI. Author of 'The Glad Heart.' [Ready]

- BETTY HARRIS. By JENNIFER LEE. Author of 'Uncle William,' etc. Crown 8vo. 6/- net. [Ready]
- SALLY. By DOROTHY CONYERS. Author of 'Two Impostors and Tinker.' [Ready]
- LAMORNA. By Mrs. A. SUDGOW. Author of 'The Severins.' [Ready]
- THE HAPPY FAMILY. By FRANK SWINERTON. Author of 'The Young Idea.' [Ready]
- DEVOTED SPARKES. By W. PETER RIDGE. Author of 'Nine to Six-Thirty.' [Sept. 5]
- THE HEATHER MOON. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON. Authors of 'The Lightning Conductor.' [Sept. 5]
- THE SUBURBAN. By H. C. BAILEY. Author of 'Storm and Treasure.' [Sept. 5]
- HONOURS EASY. By Mrs. J. O. ARNOLD. Author of 'The Fiddler.' [Sept. 5]
- DARNELEY PLACE. By RICHARD BAGOT. Author of 'Donna Diana.' [Sept. 12]
- LONDON LAVENDER. By E. V. LUCAS. Author of 'Mr. Ingleside.' [Sept. 12]
- THE HOLIDAY ROUND. By A. A. MURNE. Author of 'The Day's Play.' [Sept. 12]
- CHARLES THE GREAT. By Mrs. H. H. PENROSE. Author of 'The Sheltered Woman,' etc. [Sept. 12]
- THE ROYAL ROAD. By ALFRED OULIVANT. Author of 'Owd Bob.' [Sept. 19]
- MARY PECELL. By Mrs. BETTIE LOWNDES. Author of 'The Uttermost Farthing.' [Sept. 19]
- THE SILVER DRESS. By Mrs. GEORGE NORMAN. Author of 'Lady Fanny.' [Sept. 19]
- A KNIGHT OF SPAIN. By MARJORIE B. WEN. Author of 'I Will Maintain.' [Sept. 19]
- THE ACE OF HEARTS. By C. THOMAS STANFORD. [Sept. 26]

D. Appleton & Company.

THE STREETS OF ASCALON.

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS, author of "The Common Law." Illustrated by Charles Dana Gibson. 441 pages. 6s.
A new full length society novel.

THE PRICE SHE PAID: The Story of a Woman's Struggle.

By DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS, author of "The Husband's Story." 6s.

In a powerful and dramatic story the author tells how the heroine "paid the price" of a marriage for money.

THE SINS OF THE FATHER.

By THOMAS DIXON, author of "The Clansman." With 10 full-page Illustrations. 6s.

A romance of the South and by far the most virile and powerful novel the author has yet written.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SECOND SHOT.

By RUFUS GILLMORE. 6s.

An unscrupulous financier disappears and is subsequently found dead. The efforts of two smart reporters to unravel the mystery make a detective story of unusual fascination.

THE FAVOUR OF KINGS.

By MARY HASTINGS BRADLEY, author of "When a Man Loves." Illustrated. 6s.

A historical novel of the court of King Henry the Eighth.

LONDON: 25, BEDFORD STREET.

FORTHCOMING VOLUMES

IN WERNER LAURIE'S

COLONIAL LIBRARY.

THE NIGHT OF TEMPTATION.

A LONG NEW NOVEL BY VICTORIA CROSS.

EVERY MAN'S DESIRE.

By MARY GAUNT, Author of "The Uncounted Cost."

THE STORY OF HARVEY SINCLAIR.

By GEORGE TREFAWNEY, Author of "In a Cottage Hospital."

THE RAT TRAP.

By DANIEL WOODROFFE, Author of "The Beauty Shop."

HILARY'S CAREER.

By PARRY TRESCOTT, Author of "Catherine."

THE TOLL OF THE TIDES: A NOVEL OF LABRADOR.

By THEODORE GOODRIDGE ROBERTS.

THE STRANGER IN THE HOUSE.

By ANTHONY DILLINGTON, Author of "Pretty Babaia."

MURDER LIMITED.

By RANGER GULL.

PEOPLE OF THE WILD.

By F. ST. MARK. Illustrated J.

IN A LONDON GARDEN.

By BARRY PAINE, Author of "Stories in Grey."

THE LIGHT SIDE OF LONDON.

By E. B. D'AUVERGNE. Illustrated.

Forthcoming Cheap Reprints at 1s. net.

Crown 8vo. With Picture Covers.

LIFE'S SHOP WINDOW.

By VICTORIA CROSS.

LOVE INTRIGUES OF ROYAL COURT.

By THORNTON HALL.

THE UNCOUNTED COST.

By MARY GAUNT.

BLACK SHEEP.

By STANLEY PORTAL HYATT.

FALLEN AMONG THIEVES.

By STANLEY PORTAL HYATT.

SIX WOMEN.

By VICTORIA CROSS.

SCARLET KISS.

By CERTIE DE S. WENTWORTH JAMES.

DOWNWARD: A SLICE OF LIFE.

By MAUD CHURTON BIRBY.

WERNER LAURIE, Ltd, 14, Clifford's Inn, LONDON.

Also published in
HODDER AND STOUGHTON'S
FAMOUS COLONIAL LIBRARY
Paper and Cloth Editions

AT THE VILLA ROSE

By A. E. W. MASON 2/- net.

Also issued in Hodder & Stoughton's
Colonial Library, Paper and Cloth Editions

NOW READY 6/-

The Surnstile
A. E. W. Mason

Author of
"The Broken Road,"
"The Four Feathers,"
etc.

HODDER AND STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

CLOTH
1/-
NET
256 pages.

HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

LEATHER
2s. 6d.
NET.
256 pages.

OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE.

EDITORS: HERBERT FISHER, M.A., F.R.A., Prof. GILBERT MURRAY, D.Litt., LL.D., F.R.A., Prof. J. ARTHUR THOMSON, M.A., Prof. WM. T. BREWSTER.

The Sixth Ten Volumes Ready early in September.

51. WARFARE IN BRITAIN. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.A. (With Maps).
52. GREAT WRITERS OF AMERICA. By Prof. W. P. TRINT and Prof. J. ERSKINE.
53. THE MAKING OF THE EARTH. By Prof. J. W. GREGORY, F.R.S. (Maps and Figures).
54. ETHICS. By G. W. MOORE, M.A.
55. MASTER MARINERS. By J. R. SPIERS.
56. THE MAKING OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By Prof. B. W. BACON, LL.D., D.D.
57. THE HUMAN BODY. By Prof. A. KEELIE, M.D. (Illustrated).
58. ELECTRICITY. By Prof. GILBERT KAPP, D.Litt.
59. POLITICAL ECONOMY. By Prof. S. I. CHAPMAN.
60. MISSIONS: Their Rise and Development. Mrs. CREIGHTON.

COMPLETE DESCRIPTIVE PAMPHLET. POST FREE.

Important Works to be Ready Shortly.

- A NATURALIST IN OCEANIA. By ALBERT STUART MEEK. With an Introduction by the Hon. Walter Rothschild, and edited by FRANK FOX. Medium 8vo. Cloth 10s. 6d. net.
- THE LATTER-DAY SAINTS: A STUDY OF MORMONISM IN THE LIGHT OF ECONOMIC CONDITIONS. By RUTH KAUFFMAN and REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN. Medium 8vo. Cloth 10s. 6d. net.
- MORE REMINISCENCES. By The Right Hon. ROBERT TARKENTON, P.C., LL.D. Medium 8vo. Cloth 10s. 6d. net.
- WITHIN: THOUGHTS DURING CONVALESCENCE. By SIR FRANCIS I. YOUNGHUSBAND. Square Crown 8vo. Cloth 3s. 6d. net.
- INITIATION TO PHILOSOPHY. By AUGUST EMIL FAGUET, Professor at the University of Paris. Translated into English by SIR HOMER GORDON, Bart. Crown 8vo. Cloth 2s. 6d. net.
- NERVATION OF PLANTS. By FRANCIS G. HEATH, author of "Our Wood and Trees," "The Fern World," etc. Crown 8vo. Cloth 3s. 6d. net.
- THE LOST LANGUAGE OF SYMBOLISM. By HAROLD BAYLEY. With about 1,200 Illustrations in the text. In 2 Vols. Medium 8vo.
- THE MINERAL KINGDOM. By DR. RICHARD BRAUNS, Professor of Mineralogy in the University of Bonn. Translated by C. J. SPENCER, M.A., F.G.S. Demy 4to. About 450 pages with 275 figures in the text, and 91 full page plates of which 71 are chronolithographs, and 18 from half tone blocks. Now complete in 25 parts at 2s. each net, or beautifully bound in Half Morocco, £2 10s. net.
- RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. By FRANCESCO RUFFINI, Rector of the University of Turin. With a Special Supplementary Chapter for the English edition, and an Introduction to English readers by Prof. J. H. BERRY, of Cambridge. Forming Volume XXXI in the Theological Translation Library. Demy 8vo. Cloth.
- BIBLE READING IN THE EARLY CHURCH. By DR. ADOLF HARNACK. Forming Volume 5 in his New Testament Studies, and Volume XXXV in the Crown Theological Library. Crown 8vo. Cloth 5s. net.
- AN INTRODUCTION TO THE PHILOSOPHY OF PROFESSOR RUDOLF EUCKEN. By DR. W. TUDOR JONES, Translator of Prof. EUCKEN'S most important work "The Truth of Religion." Crown 8vo. Cloth.

A most opportune and authoritative publication.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY

Containing articles from twenty English and twenty-two German authoritative writers, among whom may be mentioned:—

- By the Rt. Hon. LORD HALDANE OF OLOAN, Lord Chancellor of England.
By Rt. Hon. ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR, P.O., F.R.S., M.P.
By Rt. Hon. A. BONAR LAW, M.P.
By SIR WILLIAM RAMSAY, K.O.B., F.R.S., D.Sc.
By SIR ALFRED MOND, Bart. M.P.
By SIR THOMAS BARCLAY, LL.B., Ph.D.
By Rt. Hon. SIR RUFUS ISAACS, P.O., K.O., M.P.
By J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, M.P.
By NORMAN ANGELL, Author of the "Great Illusion."
By PRINCE LIOHNSKY, Member of the Upper House.
By DR. ADOLF WERMUTH, Oberbürgermeister of Berlin.
By VICE-ADMIRAL KARL GALTIER.
By His EXCELLENCY VON HOLLEBEN, late German Ambassador to the United States.
By VICE-ADMIRAL VON ANHEFELD.
By THEODOR WOLFF, Editor "Berlin Tageblatt."
By ARTHUR VON GWINNER, Director of the German Bank and Member of the Upper House.
By His EXCELLENCY DR. WILHELM WUNDT.
AND MANY OTHERS.

In Medium 8vo. with wrapper in colours, containing flags of both nations. Stiff boards, 1s. net.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

Messrs. Longmans & Co.'s List.

THE INNER HISTORY OF THE NATIONAL CONVENTION OF SOUTH AFRICA. By the Hon. Sir EDGAR WATSON, K.C.M.G., M.L.A. 10s. 6d. net.

THE RISE OF SOUTH AFRICA: A History of the Origin of South African Colonisation and of its Development towards the East from the Earliest Times to 1857. By G. F. CORY, Kings College, Cambridge, Professor in the Rhodes University College, Grahamstown, South Africa. In 4 vols. 8vo.

Vol. I. From the Earliest Times to the Year 1820. With Map, Plans and Illustrations. 15s.
Vols. 2, 3 and 4 in preparation.

Works by P. A. SILBURN, D.S.O., Member of Parliament of the Union of South Africa.

THE EVOLUTION OF SEA POWER. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

THE COLONIES AND IMPERIAL DEFENCE. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE GOVERNANCE OF EMPIRE. With a Map. 2vo. 9s. net.

JOCK OF THE BUSHVELD. By Sir PERCY FITZPATRICK K.C.M.G. With 24 full page Illustrations (1 Coloured) and numerous Marginal Illustrations by J. CARWELL. Seventh Impression. Large crown 8vo. 6s. net.

Abridged Edition. With Coloured Frontispiece, 1 Full Page and numerous Illustrations in the Text. Crown 8vo. 4s.

School Edition. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

Dutch Edition. crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. Arranged for School Use, 1s. 6d.

Works by F. W. FITZSIMONS, Curator of the Port Elizabeth Museum.

SOUTH AFRICAN SNAKES AND THEIR VENOM, AND HOW TO TREAT SNAKE BITE. New Edition. Enlarged and Thoroughly Revised. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

THE MONKEYFOLK OF SOUTH AFRICA. With 60 Illustrations. 8vo. 5s. net.

Works by J. P. JOHNSON, Member of Council of Geological Society of South Africa.

THE STONE IMPLEMENTS OF SOUTH AFRICA. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 4to. 10s.

THE PRE-HISTORIC PERIOD IN SOUTH AFRICA. With 8 Plates and 47 other Illustrations. Post 4to. 10s.

GEOLOGICAL & ARCHEOLOGICAL NOTES ON ORANGIA. With 45 Illustrations. Post 4to. 10s.

THE MINERAL INDUSTRY OF RHODESIA. Interleaved with blank paper for Notes. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

BLACK AND WHITE IN SOUTH AFRICA: A Study in Sociology. By MAURICE E. EVANS, C.M.G. With a Preface by Lt. Col. Sir MATTHEW NATHAN, G.C.M.G., late Governor of Natal. With a Map. 8vo. 6s. net.

RURAL ECONOMY IN THE BOMBAY DECCAN. By J. KEATINGE, Indian Civil Service, Director of Agriculture, Bombay Presidency. With Map and 4 Charts. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

INDIAN SHIPPING. A History of the Sea-borne Trade and Maritime Activity of the Indians from the Earliest Times. By RADHAKUMUD MOOKERJI, M.A., Pre-mand Roshand Scholar, Calcutta University, and Hemchandra Basu Mallik, Professor of Indian History in the National Council of Education, Bengal. With an Introductory Note by BRAJENDRANATH SEAL, M.A., Ph.D., Principal, Maharaja of Cooch Behar's College, India. 4to. 7s. 6d. net.

THE POSITION OF WOMEN IN INDIAN LIFE. By Her Highness the MAHARANI OF BARODA and S. M. MITRA. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

BIG-GAME SHOOTING IN UPPER BURMA. By Major G. P. EVANS, Indian Army. With a Glossary of Burmese Words, a Map, and 11 Photographs from the Author's Collection of Trophies. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

THE FIRST DECADE OF THE AUSTRALIAN COMMONWEALTH: a Chronicle of Contemporary Politics, 1901-1911. By HENRY GYLES TURNER. 8vo. 9s.

WELSH POETRY OLD AND NEW IN ENGLISH VERSE. By ALFRED PERCEVAL GRAVES. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE FROM 'BEOWULF' TO SWINBURNE.

By ANDREW LANG, M.A. Crown 8vo. 6s.

Also in Five Parts. Part I—Early and Mediæval Literature, 1/4. Part II—Chaucer to Shakespeare, 1/4. Part III—Elizabethan and Jacobean Literature, 1/4. Part IV—Eighteenth Century Literature, 1/4. Part V—Nineteenth Century Literature, 1/6.

'LONGMANS' POCKET LIBRARY.

Fcap. 8vo., gilt top, 2s. net in cloth, 1s. net in leather.

WILLIAM MORRIS

The Life of William Morris. By I. W. MACARTH, M.A., LL.D. With 2 Illustrations. Two vols.

The Life and Death of Jason. A Poem.

Poems by the Way.

News from Nowhere: or, An Epoch of Rest. Being some Chapters from an Utopian Romance.

ANDREW LANG

New and Old Letters to Dead Authors.

Ballads and Lyrics of Old France. With other Poems.

Ballads and Rhymes from 'Balades in Blue China' and 'Rhymes in Mode'. With Frontispiece.

Books and Bookmen. With new Preface specially written for this New Edition. Nearly Ready.

* Messrs Longmans will be pleased to forward a complete list on application.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.
NEW YORK, BOSTON, CHICAGO, BOMBAY, AND CALCUTTA.

MR. ANDREW MELROSE'S FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

FIRST AUTUMN LIST.

Peeresses of the Stage.

By GORDON MEGGY. Demy 8vo, illustrated, gilt top.
Price 10s. 6d.

Probably few people realize how largely the English peerage has, within the last fifty years, been recruited from the Stage. Mr. Meggy, from exceptionally intimate knowledge, has made a book which is at once piquant, unique, and of genuine value for the future historical biographer.

Old Paris.

By HENRY C. SHELLEY.
Cloth, gilt top, demy 8vo, fully illustrated. Price 12s. 6d. net.

Germany and the German Emperor.

By G. H. PERKIS.
Demy 8vo, gilt top. Price 10s. 6d. net.
A profound, far reaching study of the modern German character as an evolution of German political history.

Following the Drum:

Chapters in the Daily Life of a Common Soldier.

By HORACE WYNHAM. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
With many full-page illustrations, and drawings in the text by EDGAR LANDER.
A fascinating and amusing book by a "gentleman ranker."

Legends. Autographical Chapters.

By AUGUST STRINDBERG. Crown 8vo. Price 5s. net.
Translated by C. FIELD.
As chapters of morbid self-revelation, Strindberg's "Legends" has few parallels in literature; as studies in morbid Psychology it is probably unique.

Applied Socialism:

A Study of Socialistic Principles in their Application to the State.

By JOHN SPARGO. Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 6s. net.

Writing the Short Story.

By J. BERG ESENWEIN.
Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 6s. net.
No more practical book on the subject is conceivable, and every author specializing on the "Short Story" would find the purchase of a copy a profitable investment.

The Tourist's Russia.

By RUTH K. WOOD.
Crown 8vo, cloth, with maps and illustrations. Price 6s. net.
The only handy Guide to Russia written in English.

New Novels at 6s. All done in Colonial Style.

The Port of Dreams.

By MIRIAM ALEXANDER, Author of the "House of Lisronan."

The Return of Peter Grimm.

By DAVID BELASCO.

Sanna of the Island Town.

By MARY E. WALLER. Crown 8vo, cloth. Price 6s.
A new novel by the Author of "The Woodcarver of Lympus." For characterization, description and fine sentiment it is equal to anything the author has ever written.

Rusted Hinges: A Novel on a New Plan.

By A. ST. CLAIR HARNETT.

Love in a Motor Car.

By RAYMOND NEEDHAM.
An extremely witty, amusing, and well-bred novel of a motoring tour in Touraine.

"John."

By A. STRAHAN ROWE.
A singularly fascinating story of re-incarnation marked by pure idealism, as well as by a fine literary gift.

Wild Justice.

By FRANCES CLARE.
A novel which is bound to attract enormous attention.

ANDREW MELROSE, 3, York Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

THE POET OF CANADA.

DR. W. H. DRUMMOND'S BOOKS.

The Habitant and other French-Canadian Poems.

Illustrated by F. S. COBURN. Crown 8vo., Cloth.
5/- net.

The Voyageur.

Illustrated by F. S. COBURN. Crown 8vo., Cloth.
5/- net.

Johnnie Croteau and other Poems.

Illustrated by F. S. COBURN. Crown 8vo., Cloth.
5/- net.

The Great Fight.

Illustrated by F. S. COBURN. Crown 8vo., Cloth.
5/- net.

The Poetical Works of William Henry Drummond.

New edition. Printed on Bible Paper. Portrait in Photogravure. One volume. Cloth.

A STORY OF JAMAICA.

The Story of Quamin.

By Mrs. W. H. Drummond.
Crown 8vo., Cloth. A Tale of the Tropics. 5/- net.

NEW FICTION.

SIX SHILLINGS.

Through the Postern Gate.

By FLORENCE L. BARCLAY. Author of the "The Ro-ary," etc. Illustrated in colour by F. H. TOWNSEND.
"Through the Postern Gate" is an idyllic love story, set in the pleasant surroundings of an old Cambridge Garden. It is an exceedingly readable romance. — Bookman.

The Blackberry Pickers.

By EVELYN ST. LEGER.
"ARE YOU A BLACKBERRY PICKER?"

Palmers Green.

By STEWART CAVEN.
Romance and Psychology in London suburbs, by a new Author.

Who?

By ELIZABETH KENT. With Coloured Frontispiece.
An absorbing Detective Story.

TWO SHILLINGS NET.

Their Hearts' Desire.

By FRANCES FOSTER PERRY. Frontispiece by Harrison Fisher. (Mauve Library.)
A sweet story of Christmas sentiment.

The Mission of Victoria Wilhelmina.

By JEANNE BARTHOLEW MAGOUN. With coloured frontispiece.
A moving human story of a girl's ordeal.

The Lovers of Sanna.

By MARY STEWART CUTTING. With frontispiece.
A breathless love story.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS,

24 BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Pitman's "All Red" Series.

Each volume in demy 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, with coloured map, about 20 full-page illustrations, 500 pp. 7/6 net.

The "All Red" Series is intended to supply full and recent information concerning the constituent portions of the British Empire. Each volume deals with the various departments of the life of the particular country. Religious, political, social, industrial, educational, and so forth. Chapters also are added on the history, and the natural features of the country described, and characteristic illustrations are reproduced.

THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA.

With chapters on Rhodesia and the Native Territories of the High Commission. JUST PUBLISHED

By W. BASIL WORSFOLD, Sometime Editor of "The Johannesburg Star"

THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

By ALGERNON E. ASPINALL, Secretary to the West India Committee

THE DOMINION OF CANADA.

By W. L. GRIFFITH, Secretary to the Office of the High Commissioner for Canada

THE COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA.

By the HON. BERNHARD R. WISE, (formerly Attorney-General of New South Wales)

THE DOMINION OF NEW ZEALAND.

By SIR ARTHUR P. DOUGLAS, BC (formerly Under-Secretary for Defence, N.Z.)

OTHER VOLUMES IN PREPARATION.

Pitman's Early Autumn Books.

FLEET STREET IN SEVEN CENTURIES.

Being a History of the growth of London beyond the Walls into the Western Liberty and of Fleet Street to our time.

By WALTER GEORGE BELL. With a Foreword by SIR WILLIAM P. REID. Forty-six illustrations; drawings by F. R. WY. HANSLEY FLETCHER, R. ANNING BELL, F. E. KNIGHTLEY; reproductions of old prints, original documents, maps, and photographs. In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 620 pp. 15/- net.

WANDERINGS ON THE ITALIAN

RIVIERA. The Record of a leisurely tour in Liguria.

By FRIDERIC LEES, Author of "A Summer in Touraine". With frontispiece in colour by EDITH S. LEES, and 60 photographic illustrations by the Author, and a map. In large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top. 7/6 net.

FAMOUS SPEECHES (Second Series.)

Selected and Edited, with Introductory Notes, by HERBERT PAUL, Author of "The Life of Froide". In demy 8vo, cloth gilt. 7/6 net.

THE INNER LIFE OF GEORGE ELIOT.

By CHARLES GARDNER. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top. 5/- net. Ready shortly.

FICTION.

THE UNDER TRAIL.

By ANNA ALICE CHAPIN. In crown 8vo, cloth gilt, with illustrations. 6/-

THE PLEASURING OF SUSAN SMITH.

By HELEN M. WINSLOW, Author of "Peggy at Spinsters Farm," etc. Illustrated by JESSIE GILLESPIE. In crown 8vo, cloth. 3/6 net.

MY LADY OF AROS.

By JOHN BRANDANE. Cloth, with coloured frontispiece and map. Cheaper Edition. In crown 8vo. 2/- net.

AUTUMN LIST POST FREE.

LONDON: SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, LTD.,
1, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

Stanley Paul's List.

Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III.

Personal Reminiscences of the Man and the Emperor. By the late BARON D'AMIEL. Fully Illustrated. Two vols. 24s. net.

In the Footsteps of Richard Coeur de Lion

MAUD M. HORBACH. Illustrated. 16s. net.

Godoy, the Queen's Favourite

EDMUND B. d'AUVERGNE. Illustrated. 16s. net.

In Jesuit Land: The Jesuit Missions of Paraguay.

Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

What Germany Wants

W. N. WHITIS. Crown 8vo. 2s. net.

The Romance of Sandro Botticelli

By A. J. ANDERSON. Author of "The Romance of Fra Filippo Lippi," etc. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

Cameos of Indian Crime

By H. J. A. HERVEY. Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

The Royal Miracle (Charles II.)

By A. M. BROADLEY. Crown 4to. Profusely Illustrated. 16s. net.

The Retrospect

By ADA CAMBRIDGE. 6s.

Impertinent Reflections

By COSMO HAMILTON. 2s. net. Fifth Thousand

The Ridge of the White Waters

By WILLIAM C. SUTLEY. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

The First Signs of Insanity

Their Prevention and Treatment. By BERNARD HOLLANDER, M.D. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt. 10s. 6d. net.

The Motor

A Practical Work of Original Information and Reference for Owners and Makers. By JOHN ARMSTRONG. Demy 8vo. 160 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

The White Slave Market

Seventh Edition

By OLIVE CHRISTIAN MAULVERLY (Miss Atcham) and W. N. WHITIS. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Ancient, Curious, and Famous Wills

By VIRGINIA M. HARRIS. Royal 8vo. 485 pp. cloth gilt. 10s. 6d. net.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

MAGGIE OF MARGATE

PAUL BURDON

LOVE'S CROSS ROADS

THE VILLA MYSTERY

THE BAN

BRIGHT SHAME

GALBRAITH OF WYNYATES

BRASS FACES

THE NEW WOOD NYMPH

SWELLING OF JORDAN Coralie Stanton & Heath Hosken

RETURN OF PIERRE Donal Hamilton Haines

THE CAREER OF BEAUTY DARLING Dolf Wyllarde

A DURBAR BRIDE Charlotte Cameron

NEIGHBOURS OF MINE By the Author of "We Three and Troddles"

THE ROMANCE OF BAYARD Col. Andrew C. F. Haggard

A MODERN AHAB Theodora Wilson Wilson

THE THREAD OF PROOF Hendon Hill

THE GARDEN OF LIFE (1s. net) Kate Horn

EXOTIC MARTHA Dorothea Gerard

PRINCE AND PRIEST Beryl Symons

LOVE IN ARMOUR Philip L. Stevenson

THE JUSTICE OF THE DUKE Rafael Sabatini

DAMOSSEL CROFT R. Murray Gilchrist

A ROBIN HOOD OF FRANCE Michael W. Kaye

THE CONSORT Mrs. Everard Cotes (Mrs. Jeannette Duncan)

THE LOVES OF STELLA Mrs. Shiers Mason

THE INCORRIGIBLE DUKANE George C. Shedd

LONESOME LAND B. M. Bower

THE CONFESSIONS OF PERPETUA Alice M. Diehl

LONDON: STANLEY PAUL & CO., 31, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

READY SHORTLY. PRICE 6/-

Also published in HODDER AND STOUGHTON'S

Paper and Cloth Editions.

FAMOUS COLONIAL LIBRARY

The Lost World

by
A. Conan Doyle

Author of "The White Company," "The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes," etc.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

THE BOOK OF THE MOMENT. (Second Imp.)

6/-

PRIDE OF WAR

By GUSTAF JANSON.

6/-

(Translated from the Swedish original "LOGNERNA.")

"This is a very fine book, which sets its Author at once among the great writers of Europe."—Illustrated

"This is one of the few novels one rises from reading with a decided inspiration. If you buy this book, you will keep it, and often read it. It is of more value than half a dozen ordinary summer stories."—Weekly Times.

"IT SHOULD CERTAINLY BE READ AND WILL BE."—Manchester Guardian

2nd Impression

3rd Impression

A CANDIDATE FOR TRUTH

By J. D. BIRCHFORD.
Author of "The Early History of Jacob Stahl" and "The Hampdenshire Wonder" HERSELF

By LILLIE SINGWICK.
Author of "Promise" (2nd Impression) and "The Gentleman" (2nd Impression)

THE WOMAN WONDERFUL

A STORY OF SOUTH AFRICA

By WILLIAM HENRY.
"One of the best novels of the year."—Cambridge Review

THE READY GUIDE TO BRITISH BIRDS

Crown 8vo, 2/6 net

"We consider this compact little book—which can be conveniently carried in the pocket—a great advance on anything of the sort hitherto attempted. The information given is exactly what the novice requires and no more."—Illustrated

HINDLE WAKES

A Play in Four Acts. As performed at the Playhouse
By STANLEY HOUGHTON. Cloth, 2/- net; paper, 1/6 net

ILLUSTRATED BY P. A. STAYNES

6/-

GULLIVER'S VOYAGES

TO LILLIPUT & BROBDINGNAG.

6/-

net.

net.

ILLUSTRATED BY P. A. STAYNES

With full page colour pictures and over 50 line drawings. Printed throughout in colours. In designed cover. Large sq. 8vo, 6/- net

ADELPHI

SIDGWICK & JACKSON

LONDON

Young Writers who desire SUCCESS should apply for free particulars of the Literary Instruction Correspondence Courses of THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY. The most practical and helpful literary courses on the market. Prepared by a Working Author. The Surrey Literary Agency also obtain the best offers for original MSS. Booklet Prospectus free. "Locksley," Presburg Road, New Malden, Surrey.

TYPE WRITING. MSS., Plays, Legal Work, etc., 1/6 1,000 words; Technical Work, 1/6. Correct and competent work; prompt return. Miss d'Etlinger, Post Office, Lingfield, Surrey.

TO BE PUBLISHED THIS AUTUMN
PRICE 6/- AND IN HODDER AND STOUGHTON'S FAMOUS
COLONIAL LIBRARY

PAPER AND CLOTH EDITIONS.

THE SIGN AT SIX

BY

STEWART EDWARD WHITE

Author of "The Riverman,"
"The Blazed Trail," etc. . .

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, London, E.C.

John Long's Popular Novels

6s. At all Libraries and Booksellers. 6s.

THE STORM-DOG (3rd Edition) Lillian Arnold

AFFAIRS OF MEN (2nd Edition) D. C. F. Harding

THE MODERN MARKET PLACE "Coronet"

THE ORDEAL OF SILENCE (3rd Edition) By a Peer

THE WASTER Mrs. Henry Tippet

THE SPINSTER (10th Edition) Hubert Wales

PILLARS OF SMOKE Mrs. Stanley Wrench

THE WOMAN BETWEEN (3rd Edition) Edmund Bosanquet

MY ESCAPES By a Bachelor

John Long's New and Forthcoming Books

Pheasants: In Covert and Aviary.

By FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S. With four magnificent Coloured Plates from life by H. GRONFELD, and numerous other Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 8vo. Price 10s. 6d. net

Prospectus, with Coloured Plate, post free

King René D'Anjou and his Seven Queens.

By EDGEMUND STALLY. With Coloured Frontispiece and numerous Portraits. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net Lords & Ladies of the Italian Lakes.

By EDGEMUND STALLY. With Coloured Frontispiece and numerous Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net

Through Dante's Land: Impressions in Tuscany.

By Mrs. COLQUHOUN GRANT. Author of "Britanny to Whitehall" &c. With 32 Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net

Sensations of Paris.

By ROWLAND STRONG. Author of "White to Pink in Paris" &c. With upwards of 60 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 10s. 6d. net

Stories of Society.

By CHARLES F. JERKINGHAM. ("Marmaduke" of Truth) With numerous Portraits. Demy 8vo. Price 10s. 6d. net

The Viceroy of Ireland.

By CHARLES O'MAHONY. With Photogravure and numerous other Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 16s. net

Robespierre and the Woman he Loved.

By HECTOR HEUSCHMANN. English Version by Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT. With numerous Portraits. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net

Rose Bertin: The Creator of Fashion at the Court of Marie Antoinette.

By EMIL LANGADE. English Version by Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT. With Photogravure Portrait and 24 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net

Belgium: Her Kings, Kingdom, and People.

By JOHN DE COURCY MACDONNELL. Fully Illustrated. Demy 8vo. Price 15s. net

The Eastern Pyrenees and Andorra.

By V. C. SCOTT O'CONNOR. Author of "The Silken East," "Mandalay," &c. With eight Illustrations in Colour, and 150 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 10s. 6d. net

Gun Dogs.

By FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S. Author of "Lemmers: Their Points and Management" With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 8vo. Price 5s. net Hounds.

By FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 8vo. Price 5s. net

Bohemian Days in Fleet Street.

By a Journalist. Demy 8vo. Price 10s. 6d. net

The Memoirs of Albert Pulitzer.

By his Son, WALTER PULITZER. With Photogravure, numerous other Portraits, and facsimile Letters. Demy 8vo. Price 15s. net

Madame du Barry.

By EDMOND and JULES DE GONCOURT. With Photogravure Portrait and numerous other Portraits. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net

JOHN LONG, LTD., 12, 13 and 14, Norris Street, Haymarket, London.

Macmillan & Co.'s List

H. G. WELLS' NEW NOVEL MARRIAGE.

By H. G. WELLS, Author of "Tono-Bungay," etc.
Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Sept. 6.]

MAURICE HEWLETT'S NEW NOVEL

Mrs. Lancelot: a Comedy of Assumptions. By MAURICE HEWLETT, Author of "The Forest Lovers," etc. Extra crown 8vo. 6s. [Sept. 17.]

ALGERNON BLACKWOOD'S NEW BOOK

Pan's Garden. A Volume of Nature Stories. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "The Centaur," etc. With Drawings by GRAHAM ROBERTSON. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

The Athenæum.—"Pan's Garden" is a rich book, twenty five years ago it would have entitled its author to fame, and even to-day the individuality expressed in it is rare enough to be distinguished from that of any of his confrères. Brilliant imagination is displayed in the book."

The Goodly Fellowship. By RACHEL C. SCHAUFFELER. Extra crown 8vo. 6s.

* * A love story of missionary life in Persia.

Part V. Just Published.

The Golden Bough: A Study in Magic and Religion. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D. Third Edition. Revised and Enlarged. 8vo.

Part V.—SPIRITS OF THE CORN AND OF THE WILD.
In two vols. 20s. net.

The Observer.—"Dr. Frazer handles his tremendous subject with the dexterous ease of an athlete playing with a weight that would crush a less perfectly trained man. Ease, precision, and wit mark his writing on every page. His is a work which must help what Emerson called 'the ascending effort of mankind.'"

The Early Naturalists: their Lives and Work (1530-1789). By L. C. MIALI, D.Sc., F.R.S. 8vo. 10s. net.

The Athenæum.—"Prof. Miall is to be congratulated on having produced a work of distinct historical value to all interested in biological studies."

Letters of William Cowper. Chosen and Edited with a Memoir and a few Notes by J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L. 2 vols. Globe 8vo. 8s. net.
[Eversley Series.]

Life of William Morris. By ALFRED NOYES. Crown 8vo. 2s. net.
[English Men of Letters.]

THE POCKET PARKMAN.

The Works of Francis Parkman.
Pocket Edition. Limp Leather Binding. In 12 vols.
With Frontispieces and Maps. Extra Fcap. 8vo. 6s. net each.

The Conspiracy of Pontiac. 2 vols.

Count Frontenac.

The Jesuits.

La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West. 1 vol.

Montcalm and Wolfe. In 2 vols.

The Old Régime in Canada. 1 vol.

The Oregon Trail: Sketches of Prairie and Rocky Mountain Life. 1 vol.

Pioneers of France in the New World. 1 vol.

A Half Century of Conflict. In 2 vols.

Historical Studies in Philosophy.

By ÉMILE BOUTROUX. Member of the Institute, Professor of the University of Paris. Authorized Translation by FRED ROTHWELL, B.A. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

The Observer.—"We urge all students of philosophy to obtain this book at once and read it."

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

MR. HEINEMANN'S FIRST AUTUMN LIST

A FREE FARMER IN A FREE STATE.

By J. W. ROBERTSON SCOTT ("Home Counties"). Crown 8vo. With 96 pp. of Illustrations. 6s. net.

GERMAN MEMORIES.

By SIDNEY WHITMAN. Demy 8vo., with Portraits. 7s. 6d. net.

THE MARQUISE DE CUSTINE.

Demy 8vo 10s. net.

MICHAEL ANGELO.

By ROMAIN ROLLAND (Author of "John Christopher"). With 24 plates in Monochrome 6s. net

THE SELECTED WRITINGS OF WM. SHARP.

In 5 Vols (uniform with "The Collected Works of Fiona Macleod") Cr. 8vo 5s. net each. Ready: Vol. III—PAPERS CRITICAL and REMINISCENT. [Previously published: Vol. I.—POEMS. Vol. II.—STUDIES AND APPRECIATIONS.]

"CHINA JIM."

By Maj.-Gen. J. HARRIS Cr. 8vo 3s. 6d. net

PRESERVING MR. PANMURE.

A Play by Sir ARTHUR PINERO. Crown 8vo. Cloth, 2s. 6d.; Paper, 1s. 6d.

THE LOSS OF S.S. TITANIC.

By LAWRENCE BEESLEY, B.A. (One of the Survivors) 2nd Imp. Cr. 8vo. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

A New Art Series.

FRENCH ARTISTS OF OUR DAY.

Each Vol 2s. 6d. net

Mr. Heinemann will issue a series of volumes written by French critics on the Painters of the Nineteenth Century. Each volume will contain a short biographical and critical study of the master and 48 plates selected from his works

The first 3 vols. are:

COURBET. By LÉONCE BÉNÉDITE.

MANET. By LOUIS HOURTICQ.

PUVIS DE CHAVANNES. By ANDRÉ MICHEL.

THE GREAT ENGRAVERS.

Edited by ARTHUR M. HIND. Each vol. with 64 pages of Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.

The Two New Volumes are

REMBRANDT; MARCANTONIO.

[To follow shortly: HOLBEIN; BARTOLI GZZI; FRAGONARD; HOGARTH. Previously published: DÜRER; MANTEGNA; VAN DYKE; WATTEAU AND BOUCHER; GOYA; J. R. SMITH.]

LITTLE BOOKS ABOUT OLD FURNITURE.

By J. P. BLAKE AND A. E. REVEIRS-HOPKINS. Each vol. 2s. 6d. net. The new vol. is CHIPPENDALE.

[To follow shortly: THE SHERRATON PERIOD. Previously published: TUDOR TO STUART; QUEEN ANNE.]

New and Recent 6/- Novels.

BETWEEN TWO THIEVES.

By Richard Dehan (Author of "The Dop Doctor")

"Beside the current fiction of the hour, its note is as that of a cathedral organ against penny whistles."—Daily Mail.

THE MARRIAGE OF KETTLE.

C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne

ALEXANDER'S BRIDGES. (2s. net.)

Willis S. Cathers

YONDER.

E. H. Young

BORROWERS OF FORTUNE.

J. L. Herbertson

THE COST OF IT.

Eleanor Mordaunt

A UNIFORM EDITION OF E. F. BENSON'S NOVELS, richly bound, at 2s. net per volume. The Vols. now ready are: "DODO," "MAMMON & CO.," "THE VINTAGE," and "THE LUCK OF THE VAILS."

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 252. VOL. XLII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

SEPTEMBER, 1912.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES 225

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 229

THE READER—

The Literature of Greater Britain By A. ST. JOHN AD-COCK 233

Andrew Lang By EDMUND
GOSSE, C.B. 256

PRIZE COMPETITIONS 254

NEW BOOKS—

Anatole France By RICHARD
CURIE 259

The Fourth Generation. By
W. A. MACKENZIE 259

Welsh Poetry. By FRANCIS
BICKLEY 260

The Anglo-Indians 261

Napoleon III. 261

Fleeming Jenkin 262

The Daughters of Louis XV. 262

Things in General. By JOSEPH CLAYTON 263

Between Two Extremes .. 264

A New Morris. By DIXON
SCOTT 264

Simple Seventeen. By KIGH-
LEY SNOWDEN 266

A Child's Visions 266

NOVEL NOTES—

Pan's Garden The Daughte of Brama—Pride of War -
Prince and Priest The Storm—Dog - An English man The Sweetness of Life —Broken Ladders—Knickerbocker Days The Soul of the Dancer—The Big Fish -
The Oakum Pickers 267 270

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—

A Life of Emanuel Swedenborg—Royal Romances of
To-Day The Norse King's Bridal—In Praise of Cambridge In Praise of Edinburgh 270—272

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS 274

NOTICES.

*All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the
Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK
SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.*

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The October BOOKMAN, an Autumn Double Number, will be also a special Whistler Number, and will be illustrated with numerous portraits and reproductions of paintings and drawings. It will contain articles on Whistler by Joseph Pennell, and G. S. Layard, and among other important contributions will be "English Literature, 1880-1905," by G. H. Mair; "The Red Hand of Ulster," by Shan Bullock; "Swift's Letters," by Y.Y.; "Two Dramatists," by Darrell Figgis; "John Drinkwater's Poems," by Francis Bickley; "Lang's History of English Literature," by F. G. Bettany; "Prose Rhythm," by Dixon Scott, etc., etc.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton are publishing next month a book by Sir W. Robertson Nicoll on "The Problem of Edwin Drood: a Study in the Methods of Dickens." Besides investigating the problem, Sir William Nicoll has made a close study of Dickens's methods of constructing his plots and developing his narratives, and has based his conclusions largely on unpublished material.

Messrs. Hutchinson are publishing this month "Greuze and his Models," by Mr. John Rivers. It takes the form of an unconventional biography in which an attempt is made to reconstruct vividly and picturesquely the every-day life of this most popular of eighteenth century artists amid the quaint scenes and characters of old-time Paris. The volume will be illustrated with forty-five full page plates.

Mr. Tighe Hopkins, who is well-known for his studies in prison life, has written a new book on this subject, "Wards of the State," which Messrs. Herbert & Daniel are issuing this autumn. It offers an unofficial view of Prison and the Prisoner.

Although it was only published a month ago, Mr. George Edgar's remarkable novel of the Prize Ring, "The Blue Bird's-Eye," is already in its third edition, and the Musson Book Company have arranged to publish it in Canada. Mr. Edgar has had the uncommon distinction of seeing his two first books make their appearance simultaneously—"The Blue Bird's-Eye" with Messrs. Mills & Boon, and his gossip biography, "Martin Harvey," with Mr. Grant Richards. A new comer in the book-world, Mr. George Edgar has served a long apprenticeship as a journalist and miscellaneous writer for the magazines and newspapers. He began in the provinces on the reporting staff of the Liverpool Post, and continued the same class of work in various provincial centres for some years, the most interesting period of which was, he says, a stay of eighteen months on the Blackpool Gazette News. His staff engagements ended when he came to London twelve years back. Here he strove as a freelance; the first paper to take work with anything like regularity from him was the Manchester Daily Dispatch, and he has been more or less associated with the Hulton group of papers ever since. During that early period he also contributed a good many signed articles to the Morning Leader, and latterly he has seemed almost ubiquitous—scarcely

Photo by U.S.A. Studios.

Mrs. Alice Perrin, the well-known novelist of Indian life, whose new novel, "The Anglo Indian" (Methuen), is reviewed on page 261.

a week passing but his name has appeared over some characteristic article in the Daily Mail, Daily News, T.P.'s Weekly, Manchester Sunday Chronicle, Evening Standard, or other of the weeklies or dailies of London or the provinces. Incidentally, he edited for twelve months Modern Business, for the Caxton Publishing Company, and for Messrs. Newnes their successful serial publication, Careers, a work on employments, which was completed in eighteen parts.

Nowadays, Mr. Edgar has become a novelist almost by accident. He had written a considerable variety of short stories, but had not seriously thought of attempting a novel until after he had placed his business in the hands of an agent. One day, without consulting him, the agent arranged a contract for him to write a long story which should deal with the golden days of pugilism, the firm who required it having concluded that he could do this because he had written rather freely on various aspects of that decaying sport.

Miss Chapin, whose new novel, "The Under Trail," Messrs.
Pitman are publishing.

From force of habit, for he had made a rule in earlier and harder times of never declining work that was asked of him, he promptly wrote "The Blue Bird's-Eye," which was a great success as a serial and has certainly proved a most successful novel in book form, so much so that Mr. Edgar has decided to devote himself mainly to novel writing in future, and has made arrangements for other books that will keep him busy for the next three years.

Photo by Conrad Priestley.

Miss Daphne Allen, whose remarkable book of paintings and drawings is reviewed on page 266.

Mr. Coulson Kernahan is making a new departure. We are used to him as the writer of charming poetic prose fancies, such as "God and the Ant," of thrilling

Photo by Ferd/fledin, Stockholm.

Gustaf Janson.

Author of "The Pride of War."
(Siddgwick & Jackson).

sensational novels, of carefully finished short stories, of scholarly essays, but now he is to come before us in a new guise as the author of a humorous volume for old and young to be called "The Bow-Wow Book," and to be illustrated drawings of Mr. Lawson Wood. It will be published next month by Messrs. James Nisbet and Company.

"Windfrint Virgin" is the title of a new novel of London life by Mr. Wilkinson Sherren, which Mr. Ham-Smith is publishing.

"To Algernon Charles Swinburne, and Other Poems" is a new volume of verse by Mr. Henry J. Barker that Messrs. Jarrold will publish this month.

Photo by Orr & Co., Johannesburg.

Mr. William Westrup,

the South African novelist, whose new novel, "The Debt," is to be published shortly by Messrs. Alston Rivers Gustaf Janson, whose latest book, "The Pride of War" we review elsewhere, has been described as the Rudyard Kipling of Sweden. He was born in Stockholm, on August 2nd, 1866, and began life as a painter, but later adopted literature as his profession. His first book "An Upstart" was published in 1898. He has since written a number of striking novels, many of which have been translated into most of the European languages. He has travelled in Italy and the North of Africa and there obtained the local colour for "Pride of War." This work has been hailed on the Continent as a masterpiece, not only by the foremost leaders of the movement for International Arbitration, but by those critics who have judged it solely as literature.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton have published in a sixpenny volume a collection of the remarkable series of articles on "What the Worker Wants," that appeared in the columns of the Daily Mail. Eight of these articles are by H. G. Wells, who opened the discussion, and others are by thinkers such as Frederic Harrison, H. M. Hyndman, John Galsworthy, labour leaders such as Vernon

Mr. Thomas Dixon.

Author of "Sins of the Fathers" (Appleton).

Hartshorn, Philip Snowden, George Barnes, practical men of business such as Sir Walter Runciman, Seebohm Rowntree, statesmen such as Earl Grey and Lord Hugh Cecil, great landowners like the Duke of Marlborough. The articles are full of suggestion and of profound importance for their many-sided consideration of that Labour Unrest which is a significant, troublesome, but perhaps hopeful signs of the times.

Mr. Thomas Dixon, one of the most popular of American novelists and dramatists has had a remarkable and remarkably varied career. He was born in North Carolina, the son of a Baptist minister of old Revolutionary stock, at the age of twenty had been elected to the North Carolina legislature, and before he was three years older had become a successful lawyer. Then he abandoned law and politics to enter the ministry, and was successively pastor at Raleigh, at Boston, and of the People's Temple, New York. His first five books were volumes of sermons, and books dealing with religious problems, and he was nearly forty when, ten years ago, he published "The Leopard's Spots," his first novel. Its success was immediate, and of this and the five novels Mr. Dixon has since written over a million copies have been sold. Three of them, "The Leopard's Spots," "The Clansman," and "The Traitor," belong to a trilogy whose purpose is to dispel what he considers the false idea of the negro that is given in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and to make a passionate plea for the purity of the white race and the improvement of our breed of men. His other three novels form another trilogy to expose "the delusions of Socialism." In his latest novel, "Sins of the Father" (published by Messrs. Appleton), he again deals with the race problem in its intimate relations to the home life of the people; the story, whose dramatic interest centres on the passion of a man of culture and refinement for a woman of the lower race, is a new and ampler version of his drama on the same theme that has already been enormously successful on the American stage.

Photo by Mr

Mrs. Campbell Lethbridge.

"The Shoreless Sea," published by Messrs. Holden & Hardingham, is Mrs. Campbell Lethbridge's first novel, but she is well-known as a writer of successful feuilletons, and of short stories. Mrs. Lethbridge was educated abroad and has lived chiefly in Austria, a country that she knows thoroughly, and to which she is devoted. Like most novelists she is ambitious to write a play that shall prove as successful as her book.

Mrs. Mary Gaunt has nearly completed a new novel, a story of West Africa which she is naming "Via Dolorosa," and Mr. Werner Laurie will publish it in due course. Mrs. Gaunt is one of the most successful of recent Australians who have come to make their homes in England. She is the daughter of a Colonial Judge; and it was eleven years ago, after she had been left a widow, that she came to settle in London. Seven years before that her first novel, "Dave's Sweetheart," was published here by Mr. Edward Arnold, and she still considers it the best story that she ever wrote. A young girl, living in a country town of Victoria, she wrote it and posted it across "home," and was not so surprised as she ought to have been that Mr. Arnold accepted it, paid her fifty pounds for it, and that when it was published it was very satisfactorily reviewed. It was only when she came to take to literature for a livelihood, she says, that she found how toilsome and stony was the path she had chosen; and yet in the long run she does not and has no reason to regret her choice. "A newcomer in London has this to learn," is Mrs. Gaunt's experience, "not that people whose new novel, "Prince and Priest" (Stanley Paul), is reviewed on page 267.

Photo by Walford Jenkins, Kensington.

Mrs. Beryl Symons.

will not accept a new point of view, they will, but that the point of view must be presented in such fashion as will be generally acceptable. That lesson I took years to learn." But the success of her last book, "Alone in West Africa" (Laurie), should satisfy her that she has learned it. She feels that her upbringing in a land where conventions do not count has helped her greatly, in broadening her outlook and making her self-reliant, but she finds as a result of her early freedom she cannot reconcile herself to the orthodox etiquettes and amenities of life in a large city; she likes reading stories of quiet English life but is unable to write them. Her one London novel, "The Mummy Moves," was of the sensational sort and its interest depended on a mystery. She finds her best inspiration in the more strenuous life of the outskirts of the Empire, and the wander lust is always carrying her abroad to renew acquaintance with such places. When her new book is out of hand she purposes writing one about the castles that dot the shore of the Gold Coast—mediaeval castles, old and quaint and full of wonderful old-world stories—and she will illustrate it with a series of unique photographs that she took when she was out there a little while ago.

Mr. W. Coffey, of the National Union of Bookbinders, wrote the following letter to us last month, with reference to our Miss Braddon Number, but it arrived too late for our August issue: "It is not a point of much importance and perhaps for that reason Mr. Clive Holland omits to mention it in his admirable article in your July Number. I refer to the fact that "Three Times Dead, or The Trail of the Serpent," appeared in serial form in a weekly entitled the Halfpenny Journal, in 1862 or 1863. I remember it well as it was the first of Miss Braddon's works that I read. Later, as an apprentice, I not only read many of her books with great delight but both as apprentice and journeyman worked on them and helped to turn out many thousand copies in more than one workshop. I think the Halfpenny Journal was controlled by Mr. Maxwell. There was a similar and rival publication running at the same time entitled the Welcome Guest. Both have long ceased to exist."

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

September 1st to October 1st, 1912.

Messrs. Appleton & Co.

BRADLEY, MARY H.—The Favor of Kings 6s.
BRUIRE, H.—The New City Government 6s. net.
BURKS, J. W. and JESSIE—Health and the School 6s. net.
CHAMBERS, R. W.—Blue Bird Weather 3s. 6d. net.
CHAMBERS, R. W.—Streets of Ascalon 6s.
CLIVELLAND, J. A., and POWELL, J. W.—Railroad Finance 10s. 6d.
DIXON, THOMAS—The Sons of the Father 6s.
EDDY, A. J.—The New Competition 7s. 6d. net.
ELWOOD, C. A.—Sociology 10s. 6d. net.
GIBBS, G. O.—The Maker of Opportunities 6s.
GILLMORE, R.—The Mystery of the Second Shot 6s.
HALL, G. STANLEY—The Founders of Modern Psychology 10s. 6d.
HUGHES, R.—Mrs. Budlong's Christmas Presents 2s. net.
HYDE, G. M.—Newspaper Reporting and Correspondence 6s. net.
IRWIN, W.—Where the Heart Is 2s. net.
LEONHAUSER, N. L.—Handbook of Municipal Accounting 4s. 6d. net.
LINCOLN, J. C.—The Postmaster 6s.
MONTGOMERY, R. H.—Auditing, Theory and Practice 21s. net.
PATTULLO, G. O.—The Sheriff of Badger 6s.
PHILLIPS, D. G.—The Price She Paid 6s.
POST, M. D.—The Nameless Thing 6s.
SKINNER, H. D.—Faith Brandom 6s.
SMITH, S. G.—Democracy and the Church 6s. net.
WRIGHT, M. T.—The Characters 6s.
YOUNG, MARTHA—Behind the Dark Pines 6s.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

ALLEN, PHILIP—Peeps at Heraldry 1s. 6d. net.
BAIKIE, REV. JAMES—Ancient Egypt.
BELL, WARREN—Black Exams 3s. 6d.
BRADSHAW, LESLIE HAVYRGAL—The Right Sort 1s. 6d.
BROWN, PERCY—Picturesque Nepal 7s. 6d. net.
BROWN, EDITH A.—Ida 1s. 6d. net.
CHATTERTON-HILL, GEORGE—The Sociological Value of Christianity 7s. 6d. net.
CHEYNE, MRS. ELIZABETH GIBSON—The Voice of One Crying 2s. 6d. net.
CHEYNE, REV. T. K.—Mines of Isaiah Re-explored 5s. net.
DICKIE, REV. J. F.—Germany 20s. net.
FERGUSON, DANIEL—British Ferns, Club-Mosses and Horse-Tails 1s. 6d. net.
FINNEMORE, JOHN—America 1s. 6d. net.
FINNEMORE, JOHN—Holland 1s. 6d. net.
FINNEMORE, JOHN—The Barbary Rovers 1s. 6d. net.
HALL, REV. CHAS. A.—Romance of the Rocks 1s. 6d. net.
HOME, GORDON—The Great Western Railway 1s. 6d. net.
HOPE, ASCOTT R.—Hero and Heroine 3s. 6d.
MALONE, H. L'ESTRANGE—Florence 1s. 6d. net.
MALONE, H. L'ESTRANGE—Java 1s. 6d. net.
MALONE, H. L'ESTRANGE—Newfoundland 1s. 6d. net.
MALONE, H. L'ESTRANGE—Nipping Bear 3s. 6d.
MITTON, G. E.—The South-Eastern & Chatham and London, Brighton & South Coast Railways 1s. 6d. net.
SHERINGHAM, H. T.—Aesop's Fables 6s. and 10s. net.
SHERINGHAM, H. T.—Coarse Fishing 3s. 6d. net.

SHERINGHAM, H. T.—Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales 6s. and 10s. net.
WATSON, REV. DAVID—Social Problem and the Church's Duty 6d. net.
WESTELL, W. PERCIVAL—Natural History of the Garden 1s. 6d. net.
WESTERMAN, PERCY F.—The Sea Monarch 3s. 6d.
WHEELER, POST, LUT D.—(Translated by)—Russian Wonder Tales 6s.

Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons.

BOWLINE, J. SKIPPLER, and GREGORY, R. R. C.—Yarns from a Captain's Log. 6s.
CRAWFORD, ALEXANDER—Monseu Camflex 6s.
LUCOEL, W. J.—The Second City 6s.
GRAN, PROF. SSOK—Jean Jacques Rousseau With Three Portraits. 12s. 6d. net.
GRIER, SYDN' V. C.—One Crowded Hour 6s.
HASSALL, ARTHUR—History of British Foreign Policy.
KNIPP, SEBASTIAN—My Water Cure 3s. 6d.
MC CARTHY, M. J. J.—The Irish Revolution Vol. 1. The Murdering Time With Portraits 10s. 6d. net.
ROBERTSON, J. LOGIE—History of English Literature In Three Parts 1s. 4d. each.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

APEL, M.—Success for Boys 1s. net.
BALLANTYNE, R. M.—(a) Coral Island (Famous Reward Series.) 1s. 6d.
BALLANTYNE, R. M.—(b) Dog Cruise (Famous Reward Series.) 1s. 6d.
BRIDGEMAN, PERCY—White Gauntlet 6s.
CARPENTIER, BISHOP W. BOYD—Life's Tangled Thread 1s. net.
DARK, SIDNEY—Thackeray (Little Books on Great Writers Series.) 1s. net.
DORLING, HENRY TAFFRELL—All About Ships 6s.
ELLIS, R. A.—Spiderland 3s. 6d. net.
FEUVRE, AMY LE—Four Gates 6s.
GILLIE, REV. R. C.—Evangelicalism 1s. net.
HAGGARD, H. RIDER—King Solomon's Mines 7s. 6d. net.
HOWES, MISS EDITH—Rainbow Children 3s. 6d. net.
JEFFREY, H. J.—Popular Botany 3s. 6d. net.
JONES, BERNARD E.—Conjuring Apparatus 1s. net.
JONES, BERNARD E.—Wireless Telegraphy 1s. net.
KEARON, RICHARD—Nature's Carol Singers 3s. 6d.
NUTTALL, MRS. CLARKE—Wild Flowers as They Grow. Vol. IV. 5s. net.
PEMBERTON, MAX—Virgin Fortress 6s.
ROBERTS, CHARLES G. D.—Babes of the Wild 6s.
ROBERTS, REV. RICHARD—High Road to Christ 2s. 6d. net.
ROBSON, ISABEL STUART—Mrs. Pederson's Niece 2s. 6d.
SHAW, CAPTAIN FRANK—Sons of the Sea 3s. 6d.
TALHOT, F. A.—Motor-Cars and Their Story 21s. net.
TERRELL, DOROTHY A'BFCKETT—Sister in Chief 3s. 6d.
THOMAS, H. H.—Indoor Gardening 1s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
VAIZEY, MRS. G. DE HORNE—Sisters Three 2s. 6d.
VAIZEY, MRS. G. DE HORNE—Tom and Some Other Girls 2s. 6d.
WOOD, ERIC—Boy's Book of Adventure 3s. 6d.
YONGE, CHARLOTTE M.—Daisy Cham. (Famous Reward Series.) 1s. 6d.
Little Folks Volume 3s. 6d. and 5s.
Bo Peep Volume 2s. 6d. and 3s. 6d.
Cassell's Annual for Boys and Girls 4s. and 3s. 6d.

Messrs. W. & R. Chambers, Ltd.

- AUTHOR OF "LADDIE"—Phoebe's Hero. Illustrated. 2s. 6d.
 BALDWIN, MAY.—Corah's School Chums. With 6 Colour Plates by W. Rainey. 3s. 6d.
 BALDWIN, MAY.—A City Schoolgirl. With 6 Colour Plates by T. J. Overnell. 5s.
 BATCHELOR, MISS M.—Sallie's Children. With 6 Colour Plates by Gordon Browne. 3s. 6d.
 BUSTER BROWN'S Fun and Nonsense. Illustrated in Colour. 3s. 6d. net.
 CHAMBERS' Etymological Dictionary. New and Enlarged Edition. 4s. net.
 CHAMBERS, ROBERT.—Traditions of Edinburgh. New Edition. With 40 Colour Plates and over 60 Pen-and-Ink Sketches by James Riddell, R.S.W. 2rs. net.
 CURREY, COMMANDER E. HAMILTON, R.N.—The Captain of the King's Guard. With 6 Colour Plates by W. H. C. Groome. 5s.
 HORSLEY, REGINALD.—The Red Hussar. With 6 Colour Plates by H. C. Eamshaw. 3s. 6d.
 JACOBSON, RAYMOND.—Tabitha Smallways. With 6 Colour Plates by Mabel L. Atwell. 3s. 6d.
 LYNN, ESCOTT.—A Cavalier of Fortune. With 6 Colour Plates by W. H. C. Groome. 3s. 6d.
 MEADE, L. T.—Peggy from Kerry. With 8 Colour Plates by Miss A. Anderson. 6s.
 MEADE, L. T.—Kitty O'Donovan. With 6 Colour Plates by J. Emmett. 5s.
 NEEDHAM, ALICIA ADELAIDE.—Songs for Little Singers. 1s. 6d. net.
 PARKER, MISSES.—The History of the Hopper. Illustrated in Colour. 3s. 6d. net.
 READE, CHARLES.—The Cloister and the Hearth. With 20 Colour Plates and Pen and Ink Sketches by Gordon Browne. 10s. 6d. net.
 The Pinwheel Book to Cut and Glue. 3s. 6d. net.
 WIEDERSHEIM, GRACE G.—Kaptin, Kiddo and Poppo. 3s. 6d. net.
 WIEDERSHEIM, GRACE G.—Peggy Wiggy. 1s. 6d. net.
 WIEDERSHEIM, GRACE G.—Ducky Daddie. 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

- ANDOUN, MARGUERITE.—Valentine. 6s.
 "BELLAVATILL." (Edited by) Digestions. Being Quotations from the Works of F. Temple Thurston. 3s. 6d. net.
 BETHAM EDWARDS, MISS.—In French Africa. 10s. 6d. net.
 GOULDSBURY, C. J.—Life in the Indian Palace. 7s. 6d. net.
 GRIBBLE, FRANCIS.—Romances of the French Theatre. 1rs. net.
 HAMILTON, CECILY.—Marriage as a Trade. 1s. net.
 THOMAS, EDWARD.—George Borrow. The Man and His Books. 10s. 6d. net.
 THURSTON, F. TEMPLE.—The Antagonist. 6s.
 THURSTON, F. TEMPLE.—Manager. 2s. net.
 THURSTON, F. TEMPLE.—Sally Bishop. A Romance. 2s. net.
 TOYNBEE, WILLIAM (Edited by).—The Diaries of William Charles Macready. 2 Vols. 25s. net.
 WALLACE, DR. ARTHUR RUSSELL.—Man's Place in the Universe. 1s. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

- DE SELINCOURT, HUGH.—A Daughter of the Morning. 6s.
 GIBBS, A. HAMILTON.—Chuckle & Son. 6s.
 "LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE."—The Favourite of Louis XIV. 7s. 6d. net.
 KNOTT, HORACE W. C.—Pansy Meares. A Novel. 6s.
 PENNY, F. L.—The Outcast. 6s.
 PICKTHALL, MARMADUKE.—Larningadow. 6s.
 PRESLAND, JOHN.—Marcus Ambius. A Drama. 5s. net.
 SHELLEY, PERCY BYSSHE (Edited by R. H. SHIPPERD). Complete Poetical Works. In 2 Vols. 2s. net and 3s. net per volume.
 SYRETT, NINETTA.—Three Women. 6s.
 THOMAS, EDWARD (Editor).—The Pocket George Borrow. Chosen passages from Borrow's Works. 2s. net and 3s. net.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

- BARTHELE, F. A. M.A.—Logic Exercises. 2s. 6d.
 DUMVILLE, B. M.A., F.C.P.—Mental Processes. A Handbook of Psychology for Teachers.
 GREIN, PROFESSOR J. A. B.A.—Pestalozzi, Life and Work of.
 ROBERTS, G. A. M.A.—New Junior French Course. 2s. 6d.
 TATE, A. J. M.A.—New Junior Latin Reader. 2s.
 THOMPSON, J. V. M.A.—New Junior Latin Course. 2s. 6d.

Messrs. Constable & Co., Ltd.

- BULL, RENE (Illustrator).—The Arabian Nights. 10s. 6d. net.
 DE LA MARE, WALTER.—A Child's Day. 5s. net.
 DOWD, T. C.—Polly of the Hospital Staff. 3s. 6d. net.
 HARRIS, ORRA.—The Recording Angel. 6s.
 LOLLIE, FREDERIC.—The Romance of a Favourite. 10s. 6d. net.
 MALCOLM, MAJOR NIEL.—War in Bohemia in 1866. 5s. net.
 MALLING, MATHILDE.—The Immaculate Young Minister. 6s.
 ROBINSON, W. HEATH.—Bill the Murderer. 10s. 6d. net.
 SHAW, MRS. BERNARD (Editor).—Selections from the Works of Bernard Shaw. 5s. net.
 SLADEN, DOUGLAS, and HUMPHRIS, E.—Adam Lindsay Gordon. 10s. 6d. net.
 VERNED, R. E.—The June Lady. 6s.
 WASHBURN, C. C.—Pages from the Book of Paris. (New Edition.) 5s. net.

Mr. Henry Frowde.

- HAMILTON, I.—The People of God. In 2 volumes. Vol. I, Israel, Vol. II, The Church.
 ROGERS, R. W.—Cuneiform Parallels to the Old Testament.
 STEBBING, WILLIAM.—Truths or Truisms, Part II.; and on Oxford India Paper. The Novels of Sir Walter Scott in twenty-four volumes. With more than 900 Illustrations. Three Editions. On Oxford India Paper.
 Four volumes in the Oxford Library of Translations: Philostratus in Honour of Apollonius. Translated by J. S. Phillimore. 2 Vols.—Tacitus Histories. Translated by W. Hamilton Fyfe. 2 Vols.—Companion to Roman History by H. Stuart Jones.

Messrs. Gay & Hancock, Ltd.

- WIGGIN, KATE DOUGLAS.—Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm. (Popular Reprint. 1s. net.)
 WILSON, CATHERINE.—The Modern Evangeline. 6s.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

- ANONYMOUS.—The Bride's Breviary. 6s.
 BARCLAY, MRS. HUBERT.—A Dream of Blue Roses. 6s.
 BARN, KITTY.—To Morrow. 3s. 6d.
 BARRIE, J. M.—Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens. Vellum, 30s. net; cloth, 15s. net.
 BEACH, REX.—The Net. 6s.
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—How to Live on Twenty-four Hours a Day. Mental Efficiency.—Literary Taste.—The Human Machine.—The Feast of St. Friend. 1s. net, each.
 BREASTED, PROF. J. H.—Development of Religious and Ancient Thought in Egypt. 10s. 6d. net.
 CLIFFORD, MRS. MILLS.—Where the Rainbow Ends. 1s. net.
 CROCKETT, S. R.—Princess Penelope. 2s. net.
 CROCKETT, S. R.—Love in Permekeety Town. 2s. net.
 CROCKETT, S. R.—Sweethearts at Home. 6s.
 CUMMING, E. D.—With Rod and Gun. 10s. 6d. net.
 DISSMAN, PROF. ADOLF, D.D.—St. Paul in the Light of Social and Religious History. 10s. 6d. net.
 DUFFY, CAROLINE ABBOTT.—The Beauty of Life. 6s. net.
 DUFFOLD, EDWARD J.—The Fables of Æsop. Cloth, 15s. net. Illustrated.
 DICKENS, CHARLES.—The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club. Illustrated in Colour by Frank Reynolds. Cloth, 15s. net.
 FOSTER, A. A.—The Message of Robert Browning. 5s. net.
 FORSYTH, REV. PRINCE T. D.D.—Marriage: Its Ethics and Religion. 2s. 6d. net.
 FREEMAN, R. AUSTIN.—The New Inn Mystery. 6s.
 FRID, A. H.—The German Emperor and the Peace of the World. 6s.
 FYFE, REV. DAVID, M.A.—The Essentials of Christian Belief. 3s. 6d. net.
 GARVICE, CHARLES.—Two Maids and a Man. 6s.
 GERARD, MORICE.—One of Marlborough's Captains. 6s.
 GERMAN, CROWN PRINCE OF.—From My Hunting Day Book. 6s. net.
 GORDON, REV. ALAN D., Litt.D.—The Poets of the Old Testament. 6s. net.
 GRANT, LADY SYBIL.—The Chequer Board. 6s.
 HAYLING, G. and M.—Tybald. 6s.
 HENSON, REV. CANON HENSLY, D.D.—Puritanism in England. 5s. net.
 HUGHES, RUPERT.—The Old Nest. 5s.
 JEFFERSON, REV. C. L., D.D.—The Minister as Shepherd. 3s. 6d. net.
 JOWETT, REV. J. H., M.A., D.D.—The Preacher: His Life and Work. 5s.
 KIPLING, RUDYARD.—The Song of the English. Illustrated in Colour by W. Heath Robinson. 6s. net.
 KNIGHT, REV. G. H.—Abiding Help for Changing Days. 3s. 6d.
 KNOWLES, JOSEPHINE PITCAIRN.—In an Upholstered Cage.
 LEMBI RGFR, ERNST.—Master Mammot of Five Centuries. Vellum, £2s. net.
 LEMBI RGFR, ERNST.—Rubayat of Omar Khayyam. Illustrated by Edmund Dulac. Cloth, 15s. net.
 LOFTHOUSE, PROF. W. F.—Ethics and the Family. 7s. 6d. net.
 MACAULAY, ROSE.—The Lee Shore. (Hodder & Stoughton's £1,000 Prize Novel Competition.)
 MACKAY, REV. W. MACKINTOSH, B.D.—Bible Types of Modern Women. 6s.
 MACLEAN, DONALD.—John Scarlett. 6s.
 MARCHMONT, ARTHUR W.—The Lagrange Square Mystery.
 Mc GILLOCH, W.—Bengal Tales. 6s.
 MORGAN, REV. G. CAMPBELL, D.D.—The Messages of the Books of the Bible. (1) Matthew to Colossians, (2) Thessalonians to the Revelation. 3s. 6d. net.
 OPPENHEIM, J. PHILLIPS.—The Lighted Way. 6s.
 PATTERSON, REV. R. J. H.B.—Catch my Pal. 2s. net.
 PAUL, HERBERT.—Queen Anne. 7s. 6d.
 PEMBERTON, MAN.—Bestree of Venice. 2s. net.
 PRATZ, CLAIRE DE.—France from Within. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.
 RAL, MRS. MILNE.—A Bottle in the Smoke. 6s.
 REYNOLDS, MRS. BAILLI.—A Make-shift Marriage. 6s.
 REYNOLDS, MRS. BAILLI.—The Notorious Mrs. Lash. 2s. net.
 RICE, ALICE HEGAN.—A Romance of Billy Goat Hill. 6s.
 RODIN, AUGUSTE.—Art. 10s. net.
 SMITH, REV. PROF. DAVID, M.A., D.D.—The Historic Jesus. 2s. 6d. net.
 SNOWDEN, PHILIP, M.P.—The Living Wage. 6s.
 SWAN, ANNIE S.—Woven of the Wind. 3s. 6d.
 SWAYNE, MARTIN.—The Day that Changed the World. 6s.
 SWAYNE, MARTIN.—The Sporting Instinct. 6s.
 TEMPEST, EVELYN.—The Rogue's March. 6s.
 THE AUTHOR OF "THE FAIRY OF THE DECORATION"—The Lady Married. 6s.
 TYNDALF, WALTER, R.I.—An Artist in Egypt. Cloth, 15s. net. Edition de Luxe, vellum, £2 2s. net.
 WEFMAN, STANLEY.—The Wild Geese. 2s. net.
 WIGGIN, KATE DOUGLAS.—A Child's Journey with Dickens. 1s. net.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett.

- HAMILTON, COSMO.—The Outpost of Eternity. 6s.
 TIBBITS, MRS. WALTER.—Cities Seen in East and West. With numerous Illustrations. 16s. net.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

- HAMILTON, HON. MRS. (EDITH HENRIETTA FOWLER).—Lord Wolverhampton. A Biography, with Photogravure Plates and other Illustrations. 2rs. net.
 MAXWELL, W. B.—General Mallock's Shadow. 6s.
 ORZY, BARONESS.—Meadow Sweet. 6s.
 WHITE, GRACE MILLER.—From the Valley of the Missing. 6s.

Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack.

- BESANT, MRS. ANNIE.—Theosophy. 6d. net.
 BRYCE, ALEX., M.D., D.Ph.—Dietetics. 6d. net.
 BRINTON, SELWYN, M.A.—Penguin. 1s. 6d. net.
 CORDEK, FRED, F.R.A.M.—Beethoven. 1s. 6d. net.
 CORDEK, FRED, F.R.A.M.—Wagner. 1s. 6d. net.
 COWEN, SIR FREDERIC.—Mendelssohn. 1s. 6d. net.
 COWEN, SIR FREDERIC.—Mozart. 1s. 6d. net.
 GOODRICH, E. S., M.A., F.R.S.—Evolution. 6d. net.
 HARLEY, J. H., M.A.—Syndicalism. 6s. net.
 INNES, A. D.—A History of the British Nation. 3s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSTONE, HILDA, M.A.—Oliver Cromwell. 6d. net.
 JONES, A. J., M.A., B.Sc., Ph.D.—Eucken. 6d. net.
 LANDON, RONALD.—Schumann. 1s. 6d. net.
 LANDON, RONALD.—Tchaikowsky. 1s. 6d. net.
 LEIGHTON, PROFESSOR GERALD, M.D.—Embryology. 6d. net.
 MACPHERSON, H., F.R.A.—Practical Astronomy. 6d. net.
 ROBERTSON, W. A., F.F.A.—Insurance as a Means of Investment. 6d. net.
 STALEY, EDGECUMBE.—The Charm of Gainsborough. 6d. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 STALEY, EDGECUMBE.—The Charm of Millais. 6d. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 STALEY, EDGECUMBE.—The Charm of Holman Hunt. 6d. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 STALEY, EDGECUMBE.—The Charm of Leighton. 6d. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 STALEY, EDGECUMBE.—The Charm of Whistler. 6d. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 STALEY, EDGECUMBE.—The Charm of Rembrandt. 6d. net and 1s. 6d. net.
 STEVENSON, THOMAS.—Chrysanthemums. 1s. 6d. net.
 TAYLOR, PROFESSOR A. E., F.B.A.—Aristotle. 6d. net.
 WATT, REV. I. MACLEAN.—Carlyle. 6d. net.
 WALKER, SYDNEY F., R.N., M.I.C.E.—Aviation. 6d. net.

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons.

- ARMSTRONG, JESSIE.—Zeph Miller. Illustrated. 2s.
 BARTON, F. TOWNEND, M.R.C.V.S.—My Book of Favourite Dogs. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by G. Vernon Stokes. 3s. 6d. net.
 CARRERAS, THEO.—A Year with Nature. With about 100 Illustrations in duo tone and line. 2s. 6d.
 DANDO, W. P., F.Z.S.—More Wild Animals and the Camera. With 12 Mounted Collotype Plates, 58 cuts in duo tone, and End Papers. 6s. net.
 DEBENHAM, H. M.—Una's Friends. Illustrated. 2s.
 ELLIS, W. CLINTON.—Idle Hands. 6s.
 FOWELL, OLIVIA.—Brave Girls All. With 9 Illustrations in Colour and duo tone by Elizabeth Farnshaw. 3s. 6d.
 HAWKES, CLARENCE.—The King of the Thundering Herd. The Biography of a Bison. Illustrated by Charles Copeland. 3s. 6d.
 HUTCHESON, J. C.—Bob Strong's Holidays. Illustrated in Colours by Charles Norman. 2s. 6d.
 LEIGHTON, ROBERT.—The Bravest Boy in the Camp. With 5 Illustrations in Colour and duo tone by Charles Norman. 2s. 6d.
 LITTLE, MAY.—More Up-to-date and Economical Cookery. 2s. 6d. net.
 MEICALL, W. C.—The Boy Skipper. Illustrated in Colours by Charles Norman. 2s. 6d.
 OVERTON, ROBERT.—Lights Out. Illustrated in Colours by Charles Norman. 2s. 6d.
 OVERTON, ROBERT.—Friend or Fortune. Illustrated. 2s.
 PROLIFERO, FRNEST.—Scholars and Scouts. With 9 Illustrations in Colour and duo tone by F. F. Hely. 3s. 6d.
 REID, L. C.—Jarynthia. Illustrated. 2s.
 RIGBY, ARTHUR.—Conway Drewe. Illustrated. 2s.
 SFWELL, ANNA.—Black Beauty. The Autobiography of a Horse. With 18 plates in Colour by Cecil Aldin. 7s. 6d. net.
 STEPHING, GRACE.—The Bother of a Boy. Illustrated. 2s.
 STEWART, FEMIE.—Mona. A Many Idyll. Illustrated. 2s.
 SYLVA, CARMEN.—Thoughts of a Queen. 3s. net.
 TIDDEMAN, L. F.—The Coming of Carina. With 5 Illustrations in Colour and duo tone by Berta van Gilbert. 2s. 6d.
 YORKE, CURTIS.—The Medicotts. Illustrated. 2s.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

- BUMPUS, T. FRANCIS.—The Cathedrals of Rome and Southern Italy. 16s. net.
 CHISHOLM, A. STUART.—The Independence of Chili. 7s. 6d. net.
 CROSS, VICTORIA.—Lily's Shop Window. 1s. net.
 D'AUVERGNE, E. B.—The Light Side of London. 6s. net.
 INGLEBY, LEONARD CRESSWELL.—Oscar Wilde. Some Reminiscences. 2s. 6d. net.
 LANG, ELSIE M.—Old English Towns. 6s. net.
 TRELAUNY, GEORGE.—The Story of Harvey Sinclair. 2s. net.
 VALOIS, G. M.—Antiques and Curios in Our Homes. 6s. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

- BENSON, R. HUGH.—The Child's Rule of Life. Illustrated by Gabriel Pippit. 1s. net, paper covers; 2s. net, cloth.
 CUTHBERT, PATRIC R.—Life of St. Francis of Assisi. 12s. 6d. net.
 EDGAR, LADY.—A Colonial Governor in Maryland. Horatio Sharpe and his Times, 1753-73. 10s. 6d. net.
 FITZSIMONS, F. W.—South African Snake—its Venom, and how to treat Snake Bites. 12s. 6d. net.
 HARRIS, FRANK.—Gravitation.
 JERRY, R. R.—Old Rhymes with New Tunes. 2s. 6d. net.
 LANG, ANDREW.—Books and Bookman, Pocket Edition, with new Preface specially written for this Edition. 2s. net, cloth; 3s. net, leather.
 MACY, S. B.—The Book of the Kingdom. Being the Bible Story from the Birth of Samuel to the Death of David. 3s. 6d. net.
 MORRIS, WILLIAM.—Collected Works. Vols. XIII to XVI. f12 12s. net set of 24 vols.
 SOMERVILLE, E. GE.—The Discontented Little Elephant. 1s. 6d. net.
 TAWNEY, R. H.—Agrarian Problem (The) in the Sixteenth Century.
 WAKEFORD, REV. CANON JOHN.—The Word and the World. Pastoral Studies for the Modern Preacher.
 WILSON, REV. H. H.—Episcopacy and Unity.
 WOOD, MICHAEL.—The House of Peace. 4s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

- ARNOLD, MRS. J. O.—Honours Easy. 6s.
 ATKINSON, T. D.—English and Welsh Cathedrals. With 20 Illustrations in Colour by Walter Dexter, R.B.A. 10s. 6d. net.
 BAGOT, RICHARD.—Barneley Place. 6s.
 BAILEY, H. C.—The Suburban. 6s.
 BOWEN, MARJORIE.—A Knight of Spain. 6s.
 DITCHFIELD, P. H., M.A., F.S.A.—The Old English Country Square. With 24 Illustrations, of which 8 are in Colour. 10s. 6d. net.
 GIBBINS, H. DE B., M.A., Litt.D.—Industry in England. Historical Outlines. With 6 Maps. Seventh and revised Edition. 10s. 6d.
 HAYNES, HENRIETTA.—Queen Henrietta Maria and Her Friends. With 12 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 JERROLD, WALTER.—A Book of Famous Wits. With 12 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
 LOWNDES, MRS. BELLOC.—Mary Pechell. 6s.
 LUCAS, E. V.—London Lavender. 6s.
 MILNE, A. A.—The Holiday Round. 6s.
 MOND, SIR ALFRED, BART., M.P.—Questions of To-day and To-morrow. 1s. net.
 MORGAN, C. LLOYD, LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S., Professor of Psychology and Ethics in the University of Bristol.—Instinct and Experience. 5s. net.
 NEVILL, LADY DOROTHY (Edited by her Son).—My Own Times. 15s.
 NORMAN, MRS. GEORGE.—The Silver Dress. 6s.
 OLLIVANT, ALFRED.—The Royal Road. 6s.
 PATRICK, MARY MILLS, Ph.D.—A Life of Sappho. With many Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.
 PENROSE, MRS. H. H.—Charles the Great. 6s.
 PRICE, ELEANOR C.—Cardinal de Richelieu. With 12 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 RIDGE, W. PETT.—Devoted Sparks. 6s.
 RYAN, P. F. W.—Stuart Life and Manners: A Social History. With 10 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 SPENDER, J. A.—The Indian Scene. 3s. 6d. net.
 SQUIRE, JACK COLLINGS, R.A.—William the Silent. With 12 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 TURNER, MAJOR-GENERAL SIR ALFRED E., K.C.B.—Sixty Years of a Soldier's Life. With 2 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.
 THOMAS-STANFORD, C.—The Ace of Hearts. A Romance of High Politics. 6s.
 VARDON, HARRY, and HOWARD, R. E.—How to Play Golf. With 48 Illustrations. 5s. net.
 WILLIAMS, H. NOEL.—The Love Affairs of the Condés (1530-1740). With 17 Illustrations. 15s. net.
 WILLIAMSON, C. N. and A. M.—The Heather Moon. 6s.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

- ABRAHAM, G. D.—British Mountain Climbs. New Edition. 5s. net.
 ABRAHAM, G. D.—Swiss Mountain Climbs. New Edition. 5s. net.
 ARMSTRONG, CECIL F.—A Century of Great Actors (1750-1850). 10s. 6d. net.

- BARR, ROBT.—The Palace of Logs. 6s.
 HUCKROSE, J. F.—The Browns. 6s.
 GERARD, LOUISE.—The Swimmer. 6s.
 STEVENS, E. S.—My Sudan Year. 10s. 6d. net.
 TROUBECK, G. E.—Rambles in Florence. Illustrated.
 TROUBRIDGE, LADY.—Stonelight. 6s.
 WILLCOCKS, M. P.—The Wind Among the Barley. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

- HONEY, T. G., D.Sc., F.R.S.—Volcano. Third (Enlarged) Edition. 6s. net.
 CABOT, WILLIAM BROOKS.—In Northern Labrador. With 76 Illustrations.
 HOWORTH, SIR HENRY H., K.C.LI.—St. Gregory the Great. 12s. net.
 KENNEDY, RT. HON. LORD JUSTICE.—The Plots of Aristophanes. Translated into English Verse. 5s. net.
 LUCHAIRE, ACHILLE.—Social France in the Time of Philip-Augustus. Edited by Louis Halphen. Translated by E. B. Kitchin.
 LYNCH, BOHUN.—Glamour. 6s.
 MACDONNELL, PROFESSOR A. A., and KELLY, DR. A. B.—Vedic Index of Names and Subjects. Indian Records Series. 2 Vols.
 MCCONNELL, RAY MADDING, Ph.D.—Criminal Responsibility and Social Restraint.
 NAPIER, LADY OF MAGDAIA.—Muddling Through. 6s.
 NEUMAN, B. PAUL.—Simon Brandin. 6s.
 OSTLER, ALAN.—The Arabs in Tripoli. With an Account of the Desert War.
 PICKERING, MRS. F.—The Enlightenment of Sylvia. 6s.
 SOANE, J. B.—Through Mesopotamia and Turkestan in Disguise. With Map.
 STACPOOLE, H. DE VTRI.—The Street of the Flute Player. 6s.
 TALMAGI, MRS.—The Autobiography of T. De Witt Talmage, D.D. With Portraits.
 TEMPLE, SIR RICHARD C., BART.—Letters and Character Sketches from the House of Commons, 1886, 1887.
 WATNEY, CHARLES, and LITTLE, JAMES A.—Industrial Warfare, its Aims and Methods Explained.
 WEIGALL, MISS RACHEL (Edited by).—Correspondence of Lord Burghersh, 1808-40. With Illustrations.
 WILLMOTT, MISS ELLEN A.—Genus Rosa. Part xxiv.
 WYNDHAM, HON. MRS. HUGH.—The Correspondence of Sarah, Lady Lyttelton, 1787-1870. With Portraits.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

- BUCHAN, JOHN.—Frederick John. 7d. net.
 DOYLE, A. CONAN.—Mischief Maker. 7d. net.
 DU BAY, CAPTAIN RAYMOND.—15,000 Miles in a Ketch. 2s. net.
 MARRIAT, CAPTAIN.—Masterman Ready. 6d. net.
 O'CONNOR, J. P.—Some Old Love Stories. 1s. net.
 PUGH, EDWIN.—The City of the World. 2s. net.
 WATSON, DR.—The Book of Diet. 2s. net.

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co., Ltd.

- BEVAN, TOM.—One of the Awkward Squad. 3s. 6d.
 CLARKE, REV. W. K. LOWTHER (Edited by).—Facing the Facts. With Contributions by various well-known Writers. Cheap Edition. 3s. 6d. net.
 KIRKMAN, COULSON.—The Bow-Wow Book. 2s. 6d. net.
 MACKIE, JOHN.—A Bush Mystery. 3s. 6d.
 MOORE, DOROTHEA.—Nadia to the Rescue. 3s. 6d.
 MOORE, DOROTHEA.—Terry, the Girl Guide. 3s. 6d.
 RHODES, KATHLYN.—School-Girl Honor. 3s. 6d.
 RUSSELL, LADY AGATHA.—Golden Grain. 2s. net.
 ST. MARKS, FRANK.—On Nature's Trail. 6s. net.
 TORREY, DR. R. A.—The Gift of the Lessons, 1913. 1s. net.
 WATSON, FREDERICK.—The Ghost Rock. 3s. 6d.
 WESTERMAN, PERCY.—The Flying Submarine. 3s. 6d.

Mr. David Nutt.

- BUCHLY.—St. Francis of Assisi. 1s. 6d.
 BUCHLY.—The Secret of Germany's Expansion. 1s. 6d.
 BUCHANAN.—Epistles of St. Paul.
 BOULET DE MINTEL.—Prominent English Men and Women in Paris during the Thirties. 12s. 6d.
 FERGUSSON.—Ochil Fairy Tales. 3s. 6d.
 FRENCH, CANON.—Prehistoric Faith. 3s. 6d.
 HALL, A.—Godmother's Stories. About 6s.
 JONES, H.—The Social Life of a South African Tribe. 8s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

- COWAN, MINNA G., M.A.—The Education of the Women of India. 12 Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.
 MACKINNON, RLV. ALBERT G., M.A.—God's Right-of-Way Through a Young Man's Life. 1s. 6d. net.
 ZWEMER, SAMUEL M., D.D., F.R.G.S.—The Moslem Christ. Illustrated and Facsimiles. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. John Ouseley, Ltd.

- ARMYTAGH, H. I.L.D., etc.—Humour of Science. 3s. 6d. net.
 BLAKLEY, ETHEL.—Dorothy Gayle. 6s.
 BUCHANAN, ALFRED.—The Modern Heloise. 6s.
 CURTIS, CAPTAIN HENRY.—Idna's Lover. 6s.
 FAIRWEATHER, LEONORA.—An Englishwoman in Germany. 2s. 6d. net.
 FENNIMORE, JOHN.—The House of the Kaid. 6s.
 FRASER, PROFESSOR NELSON.—America, Old and New. 7s. 6d. net.
 HILL, CHATTEKTON.—The Philosophy of Nietzsche. 7s. 6d. net.
 JONES, W. BRAUNSTON.—Our Nance. 6s.
 LUSK, LEWIS.—Sussex Oak. 6s.
 MCCLYMONT, JAMES K.—Metrical Romances and Ballads. 3s. 6d. net.
 MCCLYMONT, JAMES K.—Characters in Outline. 3s. 6d. net.
 OLIVER, D. E.—The English Stage. 1s. 6d. net.
 PRICE, DOUGLAS, M.A.—The Soul of Judas. 2s. net.
 SADLER, S. H.—Trunkles. 2s. net.
 WARD, C. H. DUDLEY.—Boadicea. (Historical Novel.) 6s.
 WILSON, RATHMELL.—The Experimentalists. 1s. net.
 WINTLE, HAROLD.—Until that Day. 6s.
 WINSLOW, DR. FORBES.—The Insanity of Passion and Crime. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.

- ALLAN, A. D. H.—Waters from Deep Springs. 3s. 6d. net.
 WOOD, WALTER.—The Battleship: Being the Story of the Greatest Naval Weapon from the First Ship-of-the-Line to the Present-day Leviathans. With 103 Illustrations by Frank H. Mason, R.B.A., and from Engravings, Plans and Photographs. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

BEESTON, J. L.—Dagobert's Children. 6s.
 BRAME, CHARLOTTE.—A Struggle for a Ring. 6d.
 CHESTER, S. BEACH.—Diners a Deux. 5s. net.
 DRUMMOND, HAMILTON.—Justice of the King. 6d.
 HORN, KATE.—Susan and the Duke. 6s.
 JAMES, A. E.—Her Majesty the Flapper. 6s.
 KENDALL, OSWALD.—Captain Hawkes, Master Mariner. 6s.
 KENEALY, ARADELLA.—The Irresistible Mrs. Ferrers. 6s.
 KOEBEL, W. H.—In Jesuit Land. 12s. 6d. net.
 LLOYD, J. A. T.—The Three Destinies. 6s.
 MACKIRDY, MRS. ARCHIBALD, and WILLIS, W. N.—The White Slave Market. Eighth Edition. 5s. net.
 MILES, ALFRED H.—In the Lion's Mouth. 5s.
 MILES, ALFRED H.—Where Duty Calls. 5s.
 PEARCE, CHAS. E.—The Star of the East. 6s.
 RAWSON, MAUDE STEPNEY.—The Three Anarchists. 6s.
 STANDING CROSS PERCY.—Guerrilla Leaders of the World. 6s. net.
 SUTCLIFFE, HALLIWELL.—Priscilla of the Good Intent. 6d.

Messrs. Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

BERRY, A. J., M.A. (Oxon.)—Visual and Observational Arithmetic. 2s. 6d. net.
 BERRY, A. J., M.A. (Oxon.)—Language and Sense Training Games. 1s. 6d.
 BERRY, A. J., M.A. (Oxon.)—Pitman's Speed Tests and Guide to Rapid Writing in Shorthand. 2s. net.
 BERRY, A. J., M.A. (Oxon.)—Miscellaneous Readings in Pitman's Shorthand, No. 1. Cloth, 1s. net; Paper, 8d. net.
 CHAPIN, ANNA ALICE.—The Under Trail. With Coloured Frontispiece. 6s.
 DOWLER, FRANK, and HARRIS, E. M.—Auditing, Accounting, and Banking. 5s. net.
 GARDNER, CHARLES, M.A.—The Inner Life of George Eliot. 5s. net.
 LEES, FREDERIC.—Wanderings on the Italian Riviera. With 60 Illustrations, Coloured Frontispiece, and Map. 7s. 6d. net.
 PAUL, HERBERT.—Famous Speeches. (Second Series.) 7s. 6d. net.
 SLATER, J. A., B.A., LL.B.—Pitman's Commercial Encyclopædia and Dictionary of Business. Vol. 3. Cloth, 7s. 6d. net; Half leather, 10s. 6d. net.
 THATCHER, J. WELLS.—Pitman's Guide to the Law of Licensing. The Handbook for all Licence-Holders. 5s. net.
 TWM OR NANT.—Nonconformity: An Impartial Investigation. 1s. net.
 TWM OR NANT.—Junk's Inside. With Coloured Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.
 WORSFOLD, W. BASIL.—The Union of South Africa (Pitman's All Red Series.) With 24 full-page plate illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.
 WORSFOLD, T. CATO, LL.D.—The Law of Repairs and Dilapidations. 3s. 6d. net.
 WINSLOW, HELEN M.—The Measuring of Susan Smith. Illustrated. 1s. 6d. net.
 WINSLOW, HELEN M.—The Company Secretary's Vade Mecum. 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

CAVEN, STEWART.—Palmer's Green. 6s.
 CURTIS, EDMUND.—Roger the Great of Sicily. 5s. net.
 FAIRCHILD, ARTHUR H. R.—The Making of Poetry. 5s. net.
 HOSFORD, HESTER.—Woodrow Wilson. 6s. net.
 KENT, ELIZABETH.—Who? 6s.
 KEY, ELLEN.—Love and Ethics. 1s. net.
 MAGOUN.—The Mission of Victoria Wilhemina. 2s. net.
 PERRY, FRANCES FOSTER.—Their Heart's Desire. 2s. net.
 PUTNAM, GEORGE HAVEN.—A Prisoner of War in Virginia. 3s. 6d. net.
 PUTNAM, GEORGE HAVEN.—Memor of George Palmer Putnam. 6s. net.
 REED, MYRTLE.—The White Shield. 6s. net.
 SERVIS, GARRETT P.—Astronomy in a Nutshell. 2s. net.
 SERVIS, GARRETT P.—The Lovers of Sanna. 2s. net.
 ST. LEGER, EVELYN.—The Blackberry Pickers. 6s.
 TAYLOR, BAYARD.—Boys of Other Countries. 7s. 6d. net.
 TYRRELL, HENRY.—Shenandoah. 6s. net.
 TYRRELL, HENRY.—Abbas Effendi. 5s. net.

Messrs. Fleming H. Revell Co.

FARIS, JOHN T., D.D.—Men Who Made Good. 3s. 6d. net.
 PECK, GEORGE CLARKE, D.D.—The Method of the Master. 3s. 6d. net.
 PELL, EDWARD LEIGH, D.D.—Secrets of Sunday School Teaching. 3s. 6d. net.
 MCGILVARY, DANIEL, D.D.—A Half Century among the Siamese and the Lao. With an Introduction by Arthur J. Brown, D.D. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
 MARTIN, T. T.—God's Play with Men. 3s. 6d. net.
 MILLIGAN, ROBERT H.—Fetich Folk of West Africa. Illustrated. 6s. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

CALTHROP, DION CLAYTON.—St. Quin. 6s.
 HUTCHINSON, A. S. M.—The Happy Warrior. 6s.
 LATHBURY, MISS EVA.—The Shoe Pinches. 3s. 6d. net.
 MOORE, MISS LESLIE.—The Notch in the Stick. 6s.
 WESTRUP, WILLIAM.—The Debt. 6s.

Messrs. Sampson, Low, Marston & Co.

CLARK, ALFRED.—As it is in Heaven. (Neatly boxed.) 7s. 6d. net.
 KENNEDY, BART.—A Tramp in Spain. 40 full-page Illustrations. 6s. net.
 LINDSAY, FORBES.—Panama and the Canal To-day. 53 Illustrations and 5 Maps. 12s. 6d. net.

Mr. Robert Scott.

EMMET, REV. CYRIL, M.A.—The Epistle to the Galatians. 3s. 6d. net.
 FIELD, CLAUD. (Compiled by).—Jewish Legends of the Middle Ages. Illustrated by May Mullner. 2s. 6d.
 LACEY, REV. T. A., M.A.—Marriage. 5s. net.
 LEES, REV. HARRINGTON C., M.A.—Jesus Only. 3d.
 LEES, REV. HARRINGTON C., M.A.—The Sunshine of the Good News. 3s. 6d. net.
 REASON, REV. WILL.—Ten Minute Talks with Boys and Girls. 2s. net.
 ROSTRON, REV. S. NOWELL, M.A.—The Christology of St. Paul. 5s. net.
 SHEPPARD, REV. W. J. L.—The Parochial Mission. 2s. 6d. net.
 WALPOLE, REV. BISHOP G. H. S., D.D.—The People's Prayer Book. Containing also the People's Psalter, 2s. 6d. net; combined with Hymns Ancient and Modern, 3s. 6d. net.
 YOUNG, REV. F. A. C., M.A.—Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, Book V., Analysis of. (Introduction, Notes and Examination Questions.) 3s. net.
 GRAY BOOKLETS SERIES:—
 *Dante Gabriel Rossetti, 1s. net; Oliver Wendell Holmes, 1s. net; Whitlittier, 1s. net; Leigh Hunt, 1s. net; Adelaide Proctor, 1s. net; Miss Mitford, 1s. net; Carlyle, 1s. net; Ruskin, 1s. net; Tannahill, 1s. net; Dr. Brown, 1s. net; Byron, 1s. net; A Birthday Book, 1s. net.

The Walter Scott Publishing Co., Ltd.

ASHWORTH, FORDE.—Paul Anstruther. 3s. 6d.
 HUDSON, HELEN and ROBERT.—Only a Pitman: A Story. 1s. net.
 MALHAM-DEMBLEBY, JOHN.—Original Tales and Ballads in the Yorkshire Dialect. 6s.
 MEADE, L. T.—The Other Woman. 1s. net.

Mr. Martin Secker.

BLACK, CLEMENTINA.—The Cumberland Letters. 16s. net.
 DOUGLAS, NORMAN.—Fountains in the Sand. 7s. 6d. net.
 MACKENZIE, COMPTON.—Kensington Rhymes. 5s. net.
 STRAUS, RALPH.—Carriages and Coaches. 18s. net.
 SWINNERTON, FRANK.—Gissing: A Critical Study. 7s. 6d. net.
 THOMAS, EDWARD.—Swinburne: A Critical Study. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson.

STOTT, BEATRICE.—Rosemary and Rue. 6s.
 SWIFT, JONATHAN.—Gulliver's Voyages to Lilliput and Brobdingnag. With 8 Colour Plates and over 80 Line Drawings in the Text by P. A. Staynes. 6s. net.

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

BROWNING, ROBERT.—Centenary Edition. Vols. V. and VI.: The Ring and The Book. With 4 Portraits. 10s. 6d. net each.
 LESLIE, A. S., and SHIPLEY, A.E., F.R.S.—The Grouse in Health and in Disease. New Edition. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Stephen Swift & Co.

BEADLE, CHARLES.—A White Man's Burden. 6s.
 BELLOC, HILAIRE.—Croc (British Battle Series). 1s. net.
 BELLOC, HILAIRE, and CHESTERTON, CECIL.—The Party System. 1s. net.
 BLUNT, WILFRID STAWEN.—The Land War in Ireland. 10s. 6d. net.
 BRYANT, ROBERT.—Revelations. 5s. net.
 ELLER, GEORGE.—Secret Diplomacy. 3s. 6d. net.
 GEORGE, HELEN.—The Clay's Revenge. 6s.
 GREIG, TERESA HILLINGTON.—The Consumer in Revolt. 1s. net.
 HEILYERS, LOUISE.—The Naked Soul. 6s.
 HIGHT, GEO. AINSLIE.—Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." 5s. net.
 KASBESK.—Victims. 6s.
 KAUFFMAN, REGINALD WRIGHT.—Broken Pitchers. 6s.
 LOFTUS, PIERRE.—The Conservative Party and the Future. 1s. net.
 RANSOME, ARTHUR.—Bohemia in London. 2s. net.
 RIDDELL, WALTER.—Husband and Lover. 6s.
 Round About a Rectory. By the Author of "Leaves from a Life." 6s.
 SCHULHEIS, L. M.—The English Summer. 6s.
 SCHVAN, AUGUST.—The Great Solution. 1s. net.
 STAFFORD, JOHN.—How to Make Money. 1s. net.
 VALMER, LOUISE.—The Tenor's Melodrama. 6s.
 WITHAM, J. MILLS.—Broom. 6s.

Mr. Elliot Stock.

ALVES, LT.-COL., M.A.—Two Stumbling Blocks. 3s. 6d. net.
 ASHBY, REV. LEONARD, M.A.—To Whom Shall we Go? 2s. net.
 DAY, ELSIE S.—The Church Catechism With Hints to those who Teach it. Introduction by the Bishop of Edinburgh. 6d. net.
 DENISON, REV. PREB. H. P.—The True Religion. 5s. net.
 HOSFORD, REV. W. POPHAM.—Life, Death and the Hereafter. 3d. net.
 MERCER, REV. B. S.—The Lord's Prayer. 6d. net.
 MEISSNER, A. F., F.R.S.S.—Notes on Epworth Parish Life. 5s. net.
 RIDGRAVE, REV. H. H., M.A.—The Practical Principles of Jesus. 2s. 6d. net and 5s. net.
 SLATER, J. J. GREGSON.—Should I Go to the Bar? 7s. 6d. net.
 TAYLOR, THE LATE REV. HUGH.—The Gospel Plan, in Easy Texts. New and Revised Edition.

Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein & Co.

BALDWIN, J. MARK.—Position of Landscape in Art. 5s. net.
 CHATTERTON, F. KEHLE.—King's Cutters and Smugglers.—10s. 6d. net.
 COX, J. CHARLES, LL.D., F.S.A. (General Editor County Churches' Series.) Notes County Churches. 2s. 6d. net per vol.
 CROMARTIE, COUNTESS OF.—The Golden Guard. 6s. net.
 DUVEIN, EDWARD.—Colour in the Home. 12 2s. net.
 HIND, LEWIS.—Brabazon Brabazon, Art of. 2s. net.
 JAMES, S. HOUCHER.—Soul's Destiny. 5s. net.
 WEEKS, KENNETH.—Driftwood. 3s. 6d. net.
 WEEKS, KENNETH.—Esau and the Beacon. 5s. net.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

BONNEY, T. G.—The Building of the Alps. 12s. 6d. net.
 BRADLEY, R. N.—Malta and the Mediterranean Race. 8s. 6d. net.
 BROWN, H. ROWLAND.—Butterflies and Moths at Home and Abroad. 7s. 6d. net.
 CANNAN, PROFESSOR EDWIN.—The Economic Outlook. 5s. net.
 DINGLE, E. J.—China's Revolution. 15s. net.
 DUCKWORTH, F. R. G.—From a Pedagogue's Sketch-Book. 5s. net.
 EUCKEN, PROFESSOR RUDOLPH.—Main Currents of Modern Thought. 12s. 6d. net.
 KEBBEL, T. E.—The Battle of Life. 10s. 6d. net.
 MACGOWAN, J.—Men and Manners of Modern China. 12s. 6d. net.
 MAJOR, REV. H. D. A.—The Gospel of Freedom. 2s. 6d. net.
 MALDIK, MAMMATH C.—A Study in Ideals in Great Britain. 10s. 6d. net.
 MILLER, H. CRICHTON.—Hypnotism and Disease. 5s. net.
 PALMER, JOHN.—The Censor and the Theatres. 5s. net.
 PENSONBY, ARTHUR, M.P.—The Decline of Aristocracy. 7s. 6d. net.
 SPENCER, REV. FREDERICK A. M.—The Meaning of Christianity in India. 7s. 6d. net.
 WHITE, STEWART EDWARD.—The Adventures of Bobby Orde. 6s.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

BINDLOSS, HAROLD.—Dust of Conflict. 7d. net.
 BINDLOSS, HAROLD.—The Trustee. 6s.
 LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—Day of Temptation. 7d. net.
 OPPENHEIM, E. P.—The Mortu Mummer. 2s. net.
 PHILLIPOTS, EDEN.—The Lovers. 6s.
 TRACY, LOUIS.—The Wheel of Fortune. 1s. net.
 WHITE, FRED M.—The Open Door. 6s.

Messrs. Wells, Gardner, Darton & Co.

BRETHERTON, R. H.—The Fiddle String. 1s. net.
 CHAMBERS, C. J.—The Boy Scouts' Book of Plays. 4d. and 6d.
 HERR, F. D.—William Dalrymple Maclean, Archbishop of York. 2d. net.
 MARCHANT, BESSIE.—The Sibly of St. Pierre. Illustrated by W. Rainey. 2s. 6d.
 SMITH, E. VAUGHAN.—The Boy from Green Ginger Land. Illustrated. 2s.
 SMITH-MARTYNS, M.—The King's Scout. Illustrated by C. E. Brock. 2s.
 STALEY, REV. VERNON.—Thomas Thelluson Carter of Clewer. 2d. net.
 TYTLER, ANN FRASER.—Lella or the Island. Revised and Illustrated. 1s. 6d.

THE READER.

THE LITERATURE OF GREATER BRITAIN.

By A. St. JOHN ADCOCK.

WRITING his "Oceana,"¹ in 1885, Froude discussed the politics of Australia, its gold mines, its water supply, had a good word for its eucalyptus trees, and was only sorry he had not seen a laughing jackass ; but all he had to say of its literature was : " They have had one poet—Gordon—something too much of the Guy Livingstone type, an inferior Byron, a wild rider, desperate, dissipated, but with gleams of a most noble nature shining through the turbid atmosphere. He, poor fellow, hungering after what Australia could not give him—what perhaps no country on earth at present could give him—had nothing to do but shoot himself, which he accordingly did."

This was to overlook Henry Kendall, as fine a poet as Gordon, and the best of some even earlier poets, such as Harpur and M'Crae ; it was to overlook, too, one of the biggest things in Australian literature, Marcus Clarke's sombre, powerfully realistic novel of old penal settlement days, " For the Term of his Natural Life," which was published in the 'seventies. But then Froude rather despised novels ; he found some on the ship and they bored him so that he had to fall back on the Plato and Homer he carried with him in his bag. And to this day when a man sits down to write of Australia he usually adopts Froude's attitude towards its literature : if he does not ignore it altogether, he remarks airily that it has none, or qualifies this statement with a dark saying that it has none which is distinctively Colonial.

I do not propose to say that myself because I am not sure that I know what it means. It seems to suggest that if an Englishman transplants himself to Australia, he and his descendants ought to cut themselves off from their only possible past and begin afresh as an entirely new race, and that should they become authors they must assert their independence and originality by writing exclusively about the bush, cattle-stations, gum trees, gold mining, blue jays and the wallaby, as if, forsooth, genius, wherever it happens to be housed, should keep its fancies always playing in its back yard, and never allow them to take a flight beyond sight of its own town pump. Shakespeare did not stake out a little claim in England only ; Keats and Shelley found their highest inspiration in the mythology of ancient Greece, as Milton and Bunyan found theirs in the Hebrew Bible. Great literature is, of course, as universal as the sea and the stars ; it never has been and never can be a purely local product. Love and sorrow, pity and laughter, life and death, the tragedy of the days that are no more and the eternal hope of to-morrow—all the large concerns out of which literature is fashioned, are necessarily the same in Australia as they are in the Old Country, and you do not make them distinctively Colonial by giving them a setting of eucalyptus forests nor render them less essentially Colonial by laying on such local colour lightly or not at all.

Moreover, most of Australia's authors were born in England, or of fathers who had emigrated thence ; they grew up under English influences, were nurtured in English literary traditions, and naturally and rightly feel themselves to be in the line of succession that has come down through Chaucer and Shakespeare and Wordsworth, and so long as they continue to write in English for English-speaking peoples it is as absurd to ask that their work should be distinctively Colonial as it would be to expect that everything Stevenson and Barrie wrote should be distinctively Scottish.

Another hardship inflicted on the Colonial author is that he is too often labelled as if he were a copy of some similar English writer. Thus, Gordon is called the Australian Burns, or Byron ; Kendall the Australian Shelley ; Brunton Stephens the Australian Swinburne when he writes seriously, and the Australian Calverley in his lighter moods ; others are dubbed the Australian Keats, the Australian Adelaide Anne Proctor, the Australian Stevenson ; and there are enough Australian, Canadian and South African Kiplings to people a small town. Kipling's influence has been among them, no doubt, so has poet Harte's, Swinburne's, de Maupassant's, and Stevenson's ; but I think it probable that the " Australian Kiplings " have been less influenced by the English master than by their own Adam Lindsay Gordon, whose verse, in its forceful colloquialisms and the vigour and swing

Photo by H. Walter Barnett.

" Rolf Boldrewood."
(T. A. Browne.)

¹ Longmans.

and trick of its metres, has much in common with the work of the later and greater poet. However this may be, Australia's men of letters are far from being so derivative as to deserve the wholesale labelling they have had to endure, and if none of them has yet achieved anything that shall give him place with our greatest, what then? They have not been fostered in a world of art and culture that has been maturing in readiness for them for over six or seven centuries past. The first thing needful to settlers in a new, raw land is, of course, that they should live, reclaim the wilderness, build cities, establish governments, and the wonder is that in the single century or so of their existences the four English Colonies—Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa—have not only moulded themselves into mighty and prosperous nations; but amidst the stress and difficulties of those titanic labours, have found inclination, opportunity, inspiration to produce literatures that, besides being amazingly varied and plenteous, do add something that is new and intrinsically good to the glorious literature that is the common inheritance of the English race.

AUSTRALIA.

It is with a sort of pleasant surprise that you come upon Charles Lamb walking in the dawn-light of Australian literature. In the Examiner for 1820 he reviewed the "First Fruits of Australian Poetry," written and published at Sydney by his friend, Barron Field. It is commonplace stuff enough, and has no more life in it now than belongs to a museum specimen, but it keeps a perennial interest because Lamb touched it. In his whimsical way he praised these verses, and writing to Field, a judge at New South Wales, told him that Coleridge and Wordsworth were "hugely taken with your Kangaroo."

A. B. Paterson.

The two greatest novels of Australian life, and the first two of any importance (for Marcus Clarke's did not appear till 1874), were written by Englishmen. "It is Never Too Late to Mend,"¹ that sensation-ally successful story of prison life and the goldfields, was published in 1856, when, so far as I can remember, Reade had never been in the Colony; but before he wrote "Geoffrey Hamlyn"² (1859), Henry Kingsley had returned home from roughing it among the miners there and serving in the mounted police, and his pictures of Australian scenery and of life in the bush and at the diggings are vividly real. But the recognised patriarch of Australian literature is Charles Harpur, an Australian born, who lived the life of a squatter, mitigated the loneliness and monotony of his labours by writing much verse and published a volume in 1840, which was absorbed into a complete edition of his works that was issued in 1883, fifteen years after his death. In the 'fifties came Gordon³ and Henry Kendall,⁴ and the principal names that have risen in Australian poetry between then and our own day are George M'Crae, John Farrell,⁵ Brunton Stephens,⁶ Victor Daley,⁷ Will Ogilvie,⁸ Bernard O'Hara, Bernard O'Dowd, George Essex Evans,⁹ Roderick Quinn, Le Gay Brereton,¹⁰ Henry Lawson,¹¹ Hugh M'Crae, Grace Jennings Carmichael,¹² Dorothea Mackellar,¹³ Henry E. Clay,¹⁴ A. B. Paterson,¹⁵ Patchett Martin and Edwin Brady.¹⁶ I have probably missed out a few that are as good as some I have included, for Australia has by now produced nearly five hundred poets, and I will not pretend that I have read the works of them all.

¹ Chatto & Windus.

Adam Lindsay Gordon.

From a pen and ink sketch.

Ten years ago, poor Essex Evans, a poet of a small but true gift, happened to write to me, and we kept up a correspondence from that time until he died a little while back. We had in common an admiration for the "Convict Once" of Brunton Stephens, whom he knew, and amongst a good deal of Australian literature that he sent over to me was a bound volume of "The Antipodean," an excellent Annual that he edited first in collaboration with Tighe Ryan, then with A. B. Paterson. It enjoyed the distinction of a London edition that was published by Chatto & Windus, but three years saw the end of it. Essex

Evans was very pessimistic on the literary life in Australia. He was Registrar of Births and Deaths at Toowoomba, and complained that the place

² Ward, Lock.
³, ⁴ Melbourne: Robertson & Co.
⁵, ⁶, ⁷, ⁸, ⁹, ¹¹, ¹⁴,
¹⁵ Melbourne: Angus & Robertson
¹⁰, ¹⁸ Melbourne: T. C. Lothian.
¹² Melbourne: Melville & Mullen.
¹³ Melbourne: Australian Authors' Agency.
¹⁶ Elkin Matthews.

Brunton Stephens.

had no breath of literary atmosphere; that he felt cut off wholly from the life he wanted to live, and all through his letters he was yearning to come over to England and try his fortune in Fleet Street. I told him truthfully what I thought of his chances if he came, and he never made the perilous adventure.

Many have made it and gone back broken and disillusioned; but not a few have made it and been justified of their enterprise. They will tell you that Australia has too small a literary public to offer the author a satisfactory career. Magazines and reviews do not flourish there because it is impossible, considering the size of the population, to obtain profitable circulations for them. Newspapers have a happier record; but though they may live by serving the interests of business and industrial circles, they give much more encouragement to literature than our English papers do. E. C. Buley, an old Sydney Bulletin contributor, and now a successful journalist in London, pays a high tribute to the Bulletin's work in this way, but adds:¹ "At present London proves an irresistible magnet for Australians following the artistic professions. Even if the Australian community were less commercial and more artistic, London would still offer a wider sphere, and more congenial surroundings as well as larger rewards. It is not in Australia then, but in London that the successful painters, singers, authors and actors expect to crown their careers."

Nevertheless, this curious fact remains—that more poets are living and publishing in Australia than in England, and their works have immeasurably larger sales there than any but the very chief of our present-day poets ever attain here. Victor Daley runs through three editions; Henry Lawson puts out a volume of poems that sells sixteen thousand copies; Will Ogilvie sells fifteen thousand; A. B. Paterson sells ten, fifteen, and his book of ballads, "The Man from Snowy River"² has gone into its fiftieth thousand. It is because I know there is nothing approaching that demand for poetry over here that I consistently advise our home poets to emigrate, and wonder why they do not. Several Australian poets have in the last few years come over and published books in London; I have two such on my shelves—Miss Veronica Mason's charmingly simple and graceful verses in "I Heard a Child Singing,"³ and the thoughtful "Poems,"⁴ of Mary E. Richmond; but I should be surprised to learn that either of these had met with a twentieth part of the success that Mr. Will Ogilvie, say, enjoyed in his own country.

Most of the poets who are regarded as possessing that blessed quality which is distinctively Australian, write of cattle-raising and driving, gold mining and the rough life of the Bush, but I think Bernard O'Dowd⁵ is as strongly national as any of them, though he leaves these matters mostly aside and devotes himself to expressing the attitude of an Australian towards the larger social issues of his day and people and those things of the spirit that cannot be localised. He is a man of culture and a democrat in grain; an LL.B. of Melbourne University and assistant librarian at Melbourne Supreme Court. In a significant and thoughtful booklet, "Poetry Militant," he sets forth his poetical creed; he holds that nowadays politics, religion, sex, science and social reform are truer subjects for poetry than war or sport which are tacitly admitted "into the funny charmed circle of the arena poetic," and in his own work which ranks high in the Commonwealth, and has received no small meed of praise among us from such papers as the Spectator and The Times, he lives up to that fine belief. Born in a Victoria mining township he has been writing and lecturing since 1880, and he would seem to share the general view of Australia as a literary centre. He tells me "the sale and display of local books are hampered by the rivalries of booksellers who are also publishers. The want of an independent and weighty literary magazine (all attempts at establishing one have failed financially) is badly felt. Review work is largely left for the odd moments of the partially educated news reporters, and, with rare exceptions, they have not the courage to pronounce for or against a book before seeing a London opinion on it." There are schools of literature, he adds, at all the Universities, but "judging by results, their influence has been practically nil."

John Bernard O'Hara,⁶ on the other hand, also a Melbourne University

George Essex Evans.

Mills, Melbourne.

John B. O'Hara.

Photo by Eden Studios, Melbourne.

Bernard O'Dowd.

Photo by Williams, Sydney.

J. Le Gay Brereton.

¹ "Australian Life in Town and Country." (Newnes.)

² Macmillan.—³ Elkin Mathews.

⁴ Elkin Matthews.

⁵ "The Seven Deadly Sins."—"The Silent Land."—"Downward."—"Dominions of the Boundary."—"Poetry Militant" (Melbourne: T. C. Lothian).—⁶ "Songs of the South" (2 series).—"Lyrics of Nature."—"A Book of Sonnets."—"Odes and Lyrics."—"Calypso and Other Poems." (London: Ward, Lock & Co. Melbourne: Melville & Mullen).

Mrs. Alice M. Dale.

which have had London editions) are more austere classical and have a higher technical finish. He, too, feels that when a great Australian literature comes to be written it will not concern itself overmuch with the crude robustness of the Bush, the vigour and quaintness of local vernacular, or other such purely transitory phases of colonial life, but will have its roots in the imperishable English literary traditions, and will find its themes, perhaps with the unique loveliness of Australian scenery for an environment, "in the mighty destiny of a Continent as yet populated merely on its fringes, the inevitableness of its democratic tendencies, its energetic people, its brief but picturesque history."

Of the younger poets none has reached a higher level of achievement or given greater promise than John Le Gay Brereton and Christopher Brennan. So far Mr. Brennan has published but one small volume. "XXI. Poems: Towards the Source," but in this and Mr. Le Brereton's "Sea and Sky,"¹ to say nothing of his other four books of verse, one has some of the most delicate and essentially poetical work that has yet been written in Australia. Mr. Le Brereton, by the way, is Assistant Librarian of Sydney University, and a notable student of the Elizabethan dramatists; his striking one-act tragedy, "To-morrow," based on the life-story of the Elizabethan Robert Greene, has attracted more attention than any other of his writings both in England and the Colony, and was successfully staged by the Sydney University Dramatic Society.

These and other such of the younger generation have had the advantage of growing up in a more congenial atmosphere of culture and lettered plenty than was available to the majority of their predecessors, and whether this will result in their developing a stronger note of originality, as well as a more polished technique, still remains to be seen.

The most considerable literature of Australia, as of most nations, has taken poetic form; she has done nothing of moment in philosophy, a respectable quantity of good work in history, criticism, travel, and the department of belles lettres, and an immense variety of clever and readable fiction. Nothing, perhaps, that has surpassed in strength and value "For the Term of his Natural Life," except the one immortal book of Rolf Boldrewood, but a fair proportion that is in its kind, arresting and thoroughly alive. Rolf Boldrewood has written about a score of novels, but the one that has made him famous dwarfs the rest, as Blackmore's "Lorna Doone" towered above everything else he ever wrote. I have seen "Robbery Under Arms"² spoken of as great prose; it is not that, and does not pretend to be, but it is a great romance. It is presented as the life story of an old-time bushranger, written by himself while he lies in jail under sentence of death, and it is rightly written in a careless, colloquial, sometimes slipshod fashion that is cunningly in keeping with the character of the man; its descriptions of Australian scenery, the daring, lawless lives of the murderous outlaws who menaced the highways, the goldfields, and the primitive townships in the first half of last century give it historical value apart from the absorbing interest of its robust, exciting narrative, which is none the less entertaining for being more than half true and having its sanction in official records. Much of it is written out of the personal knowledge and experience of the author. Though he was born in London in 1826, Rolf Boldrewood went early to Australia, was educated at Sydney College, and became a pioneer squatter in Victoria. Later, he was a Police Magistrate, and Warden of Goldfields. Archibald Marshall³ describes him as "the most modest of men, with an air of old-world courtesy," and says that he wrote his numerous books in the intervals of more strenuous work, "rising at three in the morning if necessary, and riding perhaps fifty miles between getting up from his desk and sitting down to it again, but keeping on steadily because he had a large family to bring up."

"Robbery Under Arms" was first published in Australia in 1880; an English edition appeared in 1889;

¹ London: Macmillan.

² "Sunny Australia." (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Photo by Crown Studios, Sydney.

Miss Josephine Fotheringham.

Photo by Appleby, Sydney.

Arthur W. Jose.

³ Melbourne: T. C. Lothian.

Ambrose Pratt.

and since then it has gone through more editions than I have stopped to count. It yielded its author, as he confessed to an interviewer on his eighty-third birthday, £1,780 in its first year, and never less than £150 a year ever after. It was dramatised, and he received £6 a week from it during its run on the stage. But his other books have only brought him a profit of from £100 to £1,000 each.

No other Australian novelist can rival Rolf Boldrewood in point of popularity, but of the many who have written fiction that has, by virtue of its literary quality or narrative skill, achieved more or less of popular success one must mention Henry Lawson;¹ William Hay,² Donald Maclean,³ "Co-ee,"⁴ Ambrose Pratt,⁵ "Sundowner,"⁶ Simpson Newland,⁷ Alice M. Dale,⁸ Alexander Macdonald, author of "God Disposes," Robert Macdonald, author of "Danger Mountain," Norman McKeown,⁹ Josephine Fotheringham, "Steele Rudd," (A. H. Davies),¹⁰ "Ada Cambridge" (Mrs. Cross),¹¹ Rose Boldrewood,¹² daughter of Australia's premier novelist, Herbert C. MacIlwaine,¹³ Mrs. Aeneas Gunn,¹⁴ who won a reputation over here with her delightful story of children, "The Little Black Princess," and has recently published a realistic study of life on one of the great cattle runs, "We of the Never Never"; Louise Mack;¹⁵ and the latest arrival in these ranks, John Sandes, whose remarkable first novel, an imaginative, dramatic romance the interest of which centres on a mysteriously wrecked and sunken ship that cannot be identified, is published in England this month.¹⁶ Miss Fotheringham was born in the Orkneys, and began her literary career by contributing to Chambers' Journal, but she has lived for over twenty years in the Commonwealth and is editor of Young Australia. Ambrose Pratt is well known to English readers for his stories of Bush life and adventure. He was writing verses and short tales in the Sydney Bulletin before he was twenty; has travelled all over the Australian hinterland, and in trading schooners round the coast. After leaving Sydney University he became a lawyer and practised for some years, relieving his legal cares with visits to Europe, Asia and Africa and the writing of "Vigorous Daunt, Billionaire," "The Remittance Man," "Jan Digby,"

Photo by Lallie Charles. Mrs. Mary Gaunt.
Author of "Fools Rush In." (Heinemann.)

and other sensational stories, including "Three Years with Thunderbolt," the success of which led him to desert the law and devote himself wholly to the writing of fiction and to journalistic work on the editorial staff of the Melbourne Age. Nearly all his novels have been published also in America and England, his latest, "A Daughter of the Bush," making its appearance here only last month. Mrs. Alice M. Dale has not perhaps been so successful in this country as she deserves to be, though her three novels have been published here as well as in Australia, and the third of them, "Marcus Warwick, Atheist," is a story that handles very ably the eternal religious problems out of which Mrs. Humphry Ward has woven some of the most famous of her books. Mrs. Dale was born at Sheffield and as a beginner contributed to Household Words and All the Year Round, but after her marriage she went to Australia and has been living in Sydney since 1885. Ada Cambridge is best known, I suppose, by her novels, for long past they have had a wide circle of readers, here and in the Colony; but she has written also two admirable volumes of personal recollections, "Thirty Years in Australia,"¹⁷ and "The Retrospect,"¹⁸ a pleasant, gossip account of a recent visit to England with the memories it aroused of the childhood and girlhood that she passed here. Mrs. Barton Baynton has written at least two powerful books—"Human Toll," and "Bush Studies"; Louis Stone's story, "Jonah," is a brilliantly realistic study of life among the Sydney larrikins; and there is good work in Miss Mary Grant Bruce's "Timothy in Bushland,"¹⁹ the first of her many novels that has come to me. Steele Rudd is by way of being one of Australia's best sellers just now; two of his books, "On Our Selection" and "Our New Selection" have sold over three hundred thousand copies in Australia and New Zealand, and a dramatised selection of the former is having phenomenally successful tours in both countries. One other novelist who can by no means be overlooked at this moment is David Hennessey: he is a successful author and journalist in Australia where he has published three or four novels that have had remarkably large sales, and the other day, his new novel, "The Outlaw," was awarded second prize in Hodder & Stoughton's £1,000 Prize Novel Competition. Two of his novels, "Wynnum" and "The Dishonourable," enjoyed a very wide popularity in the Colony; for ten years past Mr. Hennessey has written no fiction but he has at length broken that long silence with a romance that promises to repeat the sensational success of "Robbery under Arms." Hundreds of novels have been written about life in the Bush and the roaring days of the bushrangers, but, so far, with the multitude, there is only one such that counts, and it is high time a second arrived.

- ¹ "When the Billy Boils." (Melbourne: Angus & Robertson.)
- ² "Captain Quadring." (Constable.)
- ³ "The Man from Curdis River." (Hodder & Stoughton.)
- ⁴ "The Silver Queen." (Ouseley.)
- ⁵ "A Daughter of the Bush." (Ward, Lock & Co.) etc.
- ⁶ "Told by the Taffrail." (Chatto & Windus.)
- ⁷ "Paving the Way." (Gay & Hancock.)
- ⁸ "Marcus Warwick, Atheist." (Kegan Paul.)
- ⁹ "The Muckrake." (Constable.)
- ¹⁰ "On Our Selection," etc. (Sydney: N.S.W. Bookstall Co.)
- ¹¹ "A Marked Man." (Heinemann.)—"Fidels." (Hutchinson.)—"Path and Goal." (Methuen), etc.
- ¹² "Complications at Collaroi." (Ouseley.)
- ¹³ "Fate the Fiddler." (Constable.)
- ¹⁴ "Bett-Bett: A Little Black Princess." (Hodder and Stoughton.)—"We of the Never Never." (Hutchinson.)
- ¹⁵ "Wife to Peter." (Alston Rivers.)
- ¹⁶ "Designing Fate." (Hodder & Stoughton.)

¹⁷ Methuen. ¹⁸ Stanley Paul & Co. ¹⁹ Ward Lock.

Several of the names I have given in the above summary are perhaps little known to the English reading public, but they are nearly all familiar in Australia as household words, and equally familiar there are many names that I leave unmentioned because they are only attached to the sort of popular fiction that is never strong enough to cross the seas or keep its freshness beyond the day after to-morrow. There is growing up in the Commonwealth, as Mr. Ambrose Pratt says, a strong demand for novels of an exclusively Australian interest, and this has led to a phenomenal output of such severely localised stories as Herbert Gibson satirises in his recipe: "How to Write an Australian Novel":

"You must have a squatter's daughter
And a hero who has caught her
In the clutches of his passion like a vice;
You must have a fat old squatter,
And must make him make things hotter
For the hero than the hero thinks is nice.

"And the maiden must be lovely,
And the hero pick-and-shovel—
Just at present—but a cultured kind of bloke
With a college education
Who has hoofed it to the station,
And is sinkin' tanks and post-holes for a joke

"You may call the maiden Dora,
And must work the native flora
And the fauna in your tale for all they're worth;
And a suitable location
For her fat old father's station
May be anywhere 'twixt Narrabri and Perth.

"As the story waxes duller
Introduce some local colour,
Which is usually understood to be Almost anything Australian
From a bleary-eyed Bacchanalian
In a 'shanty,' to a parrot on a tree . . .

"In the last concluding pages
Of the novel's later stages
Get the squatter in the clutches of the Bank;
Have him rescued in the sequel
By the man who's now his equal—
That's the bloke who sunk his post-holes and his tank.

"Rope the man and maid together——" and you have finished another romance of the orthodox, easily saleable pattern.

I am not sure that one or two of the authors I have named do not occasionally indulge in that sort of book, but no such mechanical, ready-made devices enter into the attractively natural stories of the two ladies who have probably obtained a wider circle of English readers than has any Australian novel writer except Rolf Boldrewood. Ethel Turner

"¹ "Ironbark Splinters from the Australian Bush." (Werner Laurie.)

Photo by Kerry & Jones, Sydney.

Miss Lillian Turner.

Miss Ethel
Turner.
(Mrs. Curlewis.)

(Mrs. Curlewis) and Lillian Turner are English by birth, but went to Australia as children and have their home there still. They made their beginnings in literature, Lillian Turner, the elder sister, by winning with "The Lights of Sydney" the first prize offered in a Novel Competition by Messrs. Cassell, and Ethel Turner by writing "Seven Little Australians,"² which was published in 1894, and brought the author this encouraging note from George Meredith:

"DEAR MADAM,—Unlike many of the books I receive, yours has given me pleasure. I am introduced to an ideal nursery of real children, whose humours, characteristics and chatter are redolent of their stage of life as breath of the nodding meadow-flowers. This claims my gratitude and I render it warmly, with the certainty that your hand will not fail when you try it upon larger things, as you will, for evidently you have the literary gift."

Both sisters have written a goodly list of stories, largely of the kind that found such favour with Meredith; and Mrs. Curlewis, who has recently been on a tour round the world, has just published, in "Ports and Happy Havens,"³ a very entertaining account of places she saw and people she met on her journey.

Coming to the more distinguished work in general literature, we have Professor Tucker's "Introduction to the Natural History of Language," Professor Gregory's "Dead Heart of Australia,"⁴ E. J. Banfield's "Confessions of a Beachcomber,"⁵ Miss Clowes's "On the Wallaby through Victoria,"⁶ "Explorers of East, West and Central Australia," by Ernest Favenc;⁷ "The English Colony in New South Wales," by David Collins;⁸ Dom Norbert Birt's "Benedictine Pioneers in Australia";⁹ Sir Henry Parkes's "Fifty Years in the Making of Australian History";¹⁰ "The Native Tribes in Australia," by A. W. Howitt;¹¹ The Rev. C. H. Matthew's "Parson in the Australian Bush";¹² "The Natives of Australia," by N. W. Thomas;¹³ C. E. W. Bean's "On the Wool-track,"¹⁴ and "The 'Dreadnought' of the Darling";¹⁵ the newly published "Across Australia,"¹⁶ by Baldwin Spencer and F. J. Gillen, "The Beliefs of Unbelief,"¹⁷ by W. H. Fitchett, and "The Growth of the Empire,"¹⁸ and "The History of Australasia," by Arthur W. Jose, a Balliol scholar, who was a schoolmaster at Bathurst, N.S.W., from 1885 to 1892, and afterwards for nearly ten years a Sydney University Extension Lecturer. His two Histories were the outcome of these Lectures, the audience at which consisted largely of clerks, farmers, shopkeepers—hard-working men bent upon mental improvement; the first book has had three Australian and two English editions, and the second is now in its fourth edition. Other of Mr. Jose's books are "Australasia,"¹ and "Two Awheel,"² a series of sketches of Australian life and scenery, and he is at present engaged on a history of recent political and social developments in the Commonwealth. For some years Mr. Jose acted as reader for Messrs. Angus & Robertson, of Sydney, the principal publishers in Australia, and he says that, in his experience, "though the Australian writer is alert to seize new points of view and capable of long-continued hard work, he is greatly lacking in appreciation of form. If he is a poet he will not be at the pains of eliminating roughnesses of diction or metre, if he is writing about facts that he has laboured without stint to ascertain, he often has not the aptitude to set them in any logical order. This is probably due to the circumstance that few writers here can adopt literature as a profession, the gains are not enough, and there is too much other work to be done; and we have not the plethora of literary periodicals that offer such large markets to authors in England and the United States, and the few leisured folks to be found among us are rarely interested in any sort of literature."

² Ward Lock. ³ Hodder & Stoughton. ⁴ John Murray. ⁵ Fisher Unwin. ⁶ Heinemann. ⁷ Whitcombe & Tombs. ⁸ Herbert & Daniel. ⁹ Longmans. ¹⁰ Macmillan. ¹¹ Edward Arnold. ¹² Constable. ¹³ Alston Rivers. ¹⁴ Macmillan. ¹⁵ Cassell. ¹⁶ John Murray.

E. W. Cole.

Whatever other Australian authors it omits my catalogue must include a note of the strongly individual miscellaneous works in fiction, travel and adventure of Louis Becke,³ who, born in New South Wales, has lived and travelled much in the South Seas and gathered there material for the best of his books. Australia has, by the way, only two writers who know the fine art of the short story. Becke is one, and Henry Lawson is the other. There are things in Lawson's "While the Billy Boils," and "Joe Wilson and his Mates," that stand as literature, higher than anything else in Australian fiction. Some time ago the Spectator expressed surprise that "one we would venture to call the greatest Australian writer should be practically unknown in England"; and I doubt if Lawson is any better known here to-day than he was then.

You may learn a good deal of early Australia and New Zealand by reading Kershaw's amusing "Colonial Facts and Fictions,"⁴ and for some able and pleasant studies of field and wood and bird and animal life in Australia you may go to Amy Mack's "Bush Days,"⁵ or "A Bush Calendar."⁶ Bernard Wise, of Sydney, has written an invaluable general view of the colony, both as a country and as a nation, in "The Commonwealth of Australia"⁷; and for a story of Australia's past, its aborigines, and every aspect of its present-day life there is the breezily written "Australia"⁸ by Frank Fox, who is the author also of "Ramparts of Empire,"⁹ a view of the Navy from an Imperial standpoint; and two volumes of "Peeps at Many Lands,"¹⁰ including Australasia and other parts of the Empire. But for the most popular Australian studies of English history, if not the most popular of all Australian books, the palm must certainly go to Dr. W. H. Fitchett's "Deeds that Won the Empire."¹¹ Dr. Fitchett describes this as a "literary accident." He was asked to write for the Melbourne Argus a series of articles on the great events in British history, the idea being to "seize the anniversary of one notable event after another and write a sketch of it." The articles caught on immediately, they became the rage, and were read eagerly in the towns, in the Bush, in remote Tasmanian mines; fathers read them to their children, schoolmasters to their pupils, they formed a text for pulpit discourses. Presently, they were collected and published locally in two small volumes, that reached England, were eulogised by the Times and Spectator, and Mr. St. Loe Strachey gave them to Mr. Murray Smith, of Smith, Elder & Co., saying significantly "There's a book!" A cablegram promptly invited Dr. Fitchett to write a sketch for the Cornhill on the battle of Minden; before long half a dozen leading English publishers were anxious to republish "Deeds that Won the Empire," and when Messrs. Smith, Elder issued it the Admiralty took it for the libraries of all our warships, and it was adopted in some of our public schools. At six shillings it went through twenty-seven editions; the sixpenny edition sold over a hundred thousand copies, and is still selling. And yet, with Dr. Fitchett literature is only a by-product; he cultivates it, not on a little oatmeal, but in moments stolen from sleep or snatched from other duties. He began as a youthful Methodist parson in charge out in the backblocks; for seventeen years he was in active ministerial work with important charges, and for many years now he has been Principal of the Methodist Ladies' College in Melbourne. Nevertheless, he has found time to write a "Life of Wesley"; he used to edit the Australian Review of Reviews, and at present edits a religious paper, The Southern Cross, and a monthly magazine, Life. Lately he declined to write a History of England in five volumes for one great English publishing house, and just now has in hand a book on "Red Letter Days in Australian History," and a couple of religious books on the lines of "The Unrealised Logic of Religion." He is likewise contemplating another work dealing with certain fields of English history. "Australia and New Zealand have an eager appetite for good reading," he says: "and what may be called indigenous literature finds generous treatment; but the population of Australia and New Zealand put together is less than that of London, and this makes a small constituency for a new book. But British publishers and readers are very generous to writers on this side of the world, and I think there is a great future for Australian literature, though as yet we have produced no separate type of literature which can be recognised and labelled as Australian."

W. H. Fitchett.

¹¹ Smith, Elder.

¹, ² Dent. ³ Fisher Unwin, etc. ⁴ Chatto & Windus.
⁵, ⁶ London: Australian Book Co. ⁷ Pitman. "All Red" Series.
⁸, ⁹, ¹⁰ A. & C. Black.

All my life, as far back as I can remember, I have been familiar with the face of "Cole's Fun Doctor," described as "the funniest book in the world." Continually coming across it on bookstalls and in shop windows, I have carelessly taken it for granted that "Cole" was an English author, and I have only just discovered, to my shame, that he is an Australian, and has written and compiled several other volumes, some of them of serious and permanent interest.¹ Moreover, E. C. Cole is the founder and proprietor of the famous Book Arcade in Melbourne, and now, in his eighty-first year, counts as one of the most remarkable and enterprising men in that enterprising city. The best anthologies of Australian poetry were compiled by Bertram Stevens, editor of the Sydney Bulletin's Red Page "The Golden Treasury of Australian Verse," and "An Anthology of Australian Verse,"² and this month brings us an interesting and, within its scope, very adequate anthology in prose and verse, "In Praise of Australia," compiled by another Australian author, Miss Florence Gay;³ but Douglas Sladen did yeoman service in this direction long since and deserves the gratitude of all who are interested in the literature of Australia for his "Australian Poets," "A Century of Australian Song," and "Australian Ballads and Rhymes."⁴ He has lately completed a biography of Adam Lindsay Gordon which Messrs. Constable are publishing.

Douglas Sladen, however, is not an Australian, though he lived there for four years, and was the first holder of the Chair of History in Sydney University; and as I must make an end somewhere I draw the line at any but Australian authors. There are a number of these yet to whom the limited scope of this article allows me to make only passing reference, for though they were born in Australia they crossed to the home country when they were young, or after they had scored a sufficient success to warrant the venture, and we have annexed them to ourselves and listed them among English authors. There is Mrs. Humphry Ward, for instance (of whom J. Stuart Walters has lately written an admirable critical biography)⁵ she was born in Tasmania, but left it for England when she was a child; there is Marriott Watson, born in Australia and educated in New Zealand, but who would think of calling him an Australian now? And from various parts of the Commonwealth have come Professor Gilbert Murray, E. W. Hornung, Goring Thomas, Albert Dornington, Lady Doughty,⁶ Mrs. Campbell Praed, Mrs. Mary Gaunt, Winifred James, Fergus Hume, and many another. Nat Gould, whose sporting novels⁷ have reached a total sale of over a million, was English born, but spent many years in Australia, and the same is to be said of Humphrey Nisbet, who has written some capital Australian romances of which "Bail Up!"⁸ a vivid bushranging tale, has probably been the most generally popular; of Mrs. Mannington Caffyn, who woke to find herself suddenly famous for "The Yellow Aster"; of Gordon Inglis, who is publishing a book on "Sport and Pastime in Australia,"⁹ and of Wyatt Tilby who is preparing for his series, "The English People Overseas," a volume on "Australasia."¹⁰ Sir Gilbert Parker¹¹ and Foster Fraser¹² are among the almost innumerable English travellers who have written books on Australia, but I must not attempt even the scantiest list of these for I have overrun my space already.

NEW ZEALAND.

I have not set out to write anything in the nature of a history of Colonial literature, but merely to register briefly, and without serious attempt at comment or criticism, what the Colonies have done in literature and more especially what is being done by their living authors. Otherwise, I should have to begin this section by filling many columns concerning the wonderful folk tales of the Maoris and the songs of their minstrels. A selection of these latter have been translated by James Cowan, and one of the former is the theme of Alfred Dommett's great narrative poem, "Ranohi and Amohia," which really is distinctively New Zealand literature and the Colony's highest poetical achievement. But Dommett was an Englishman who went out with the earliest settlers in 1842, and returned home thirty years later. He was that friend Browning wrote of in the poem that opens with the question, "What's become of Waring?" Another and more famous Englishman associated with the early literature of New Zealand is Samuel Butler. He emigrated to Lyttelton as a sheep farmer in 1860, when he was five-and-twenty, and whilst he was running his sheep-station at Canterbury, worked on the staff of the Canterbury Press and contributed to its pages an article on "Darwin Among the Machines," which in later years he elaborated into "Erehwon."

But of present day New Zealand literature there is comparatively little that has come to the knowledge of the stay-at-home Englishman. I remember reading some years back a striking novel of local life by William Satchell¹³ and Reginald Horsley, a New Zealander by adoption, who has returned to Scotland, wrote a vigorous and picturesque story of the Maori wars, "In the Grip of the

Photo by Buchner, Sydney.

Arthur H. Adams.

¹ "A White Australia Impossible."—"Federation of the Whole World."—"Truth"—"The Fun Doctor" (Stanley Paul & Co.).

² Macmillan.

³ Constable.

⁴ Walter Scott (Canterbury Poets.)

⁵ Kegan Paul.

⁶ John Long.

⁷ Chatto & Windus

⁸ "The Cheerful Way." (A. & C. Black.)

⁹ Methuen.

¹⁰ Constable.

¹¹ "Round the Compass in Australia" (Hutchinson.)

¹² "Australia." (Cassell.)

¹³ Methuen.

Hawk."¹ For descriptions of the New Zealand backblocks and sketches of present-day life and character among the modern Maoris, you may go to "In the Maoriland Bush,"² by that much-travelled Britisher, W. H. Koebel.

I am told that Miss Mackay and Arnold Wall have done notable work in poetry; and I know that Thomas Bracken has, and that Arthur H. Adams is the most promising of the Colony's poets, and so far as we can see over here, is one of the three most significant of its younger novelists, the others being G. B. Lancaster (Miss Lyttleton),³ a writer of strong imaginative and emotional qualities; and Pember Reeves (Mrs. Blanco White),⁴ daughter of the New Zealand statesman. Mr. Adams was born forty years ago, and was educated at Otago University. He threw up his legal studies to join the Wellington Evening Post as junior reporter, and presently was contributing verses to the Sydney Bulletin. In due course he collected these into "Maoriland and Other Verses," a book which sold five thousand copies and brought him into immediate recognition as New Zealand's national poet. During a three years' visit to England at the beginning of the century he published here his second book of poems⁵ and his first novel.⁶ Returning home, he became associate editor of the New Zealand Times, then editor of the literary section, otherwise the Red Page, of the Sydney Bulletin, which he is still editing. Mr. Adams has written a number of plays and is arranging to publish a volume of them; they have been produced by the Repertory Theatre, Adelaide, by the Stage Society and other organisations of Sydney, and a one-act play of his was staged at the Little Theatre, in London. Unlike other Colonial authors he "finds that publication in Australia is more financially profitable than publication in London"; but he agrees that "it is necessary for an Australian writer to bid for the recognition of the London critics." His duties as a critic take up most of his time, but he has completed another novel of adventure on the grotesque lines of "Galahad Jones,"⁷ and with something of the same setting as he used for that novel and his later story, "A Touch of Fantasy."⁸ His work in fiction differs from that of the majority of Australasian writers in that he presents the life of the town and not of the backblocks; in particular he is giving himself to depicting the romance of Sydney and, as everybody knows who has read those last two novels of his, he finds that romance in abundance in the apparently commonplace existences of bank-clerks, shop-girls and the motley dwellers in suburban boarding-houses.

I must acknowledge that I have no personal acquaintance with anything accomplished by New Zealand in biography and general literature except James Drummond's "Life and Work of Richard Seddon", J. Cowan's "Maoris of New Zealand," the Rev. G. Clarke's "Early Life in New Zealand," James Collier's monumental biography of Sir George Grey (Whitcombe and Tombs), "The Dominion of New Zealand," by Sir Arthur Douglas (Pitman), G. W. Rusden's "William Shakespeare,"⁹ and his "History of New Zealand"¹⁰; and the useful and beautifully illustrated volume on "New Zealand," written by the Hon. W. Pember Reeves, the High Commissioner for the Colony, in Messrs. Black's series of colour books.

Photo by Eric Macdonald, New York

"Ralph Connor"
(Rev. Charles W. Gordon.)

CANADA.

It is with Canada as with Australasia—nearly all the books written about the country tell you something of nearly everything in it except its literature. I happen to possess a stout tome dedicated to giving portraits and information concerning leading Canadians, for the use of newspaper writers. It is rich in railway magnates, politicians, famous agriculturists, but no author of any description is allowed to show his face among them. Even Wilfred Campbell himself, one of Canada's foremost poets and men of letters, can write an otherwise informing and charming book about his native land and think it sufficient to say no more of its literature than this:¹¹

"The trackless forest is no longer assailed by the puny hands of a few settlers endeavouring to carve out a home for themselves in the wilderness. Railways and government survey have changed all this. The outsider must realise that we, as a people, have passed into a more advanced if less picturesque stage, and that even the literature of our country no more represents the backwoods and the Indian, and he who would so represent us misrepresents our true condition. The life of the canoe and the wilds is long past, and as alien from the great modern life of cultured Canada as it is from the civilisation of London. We have a few writers who, without any true grip of the Canadian life as it is, and seeking what they falsely think makes their work unique, strain to make out that the spirit of Canada is yet to be found in the wilds; but these are mere

¹ Jack. ² Stanley Paul. ³ "The Altar Stairs" (Hodder & Stoughton) etc. ⁴ "The Reward of Virtue." (Heinemann.) ⁵ "London Streets." (John Lane.) ⁶ "Tussock Land." (Fisher Unwin.) ⁷, ⁸ John Lane.

⁹, ¹⁰ Melbourne: Melville & Mullen.

¹¹ "Canada." By Wilfred Campbell. Illustrated by T. Morris Martin. (A. and C. Black.)

Photo by Fach Bros., New York.

Ernest Thompson Seton.

posers, who do not count in our real advancement—flies on our national wheel, such as are found in every country. Even these men produce their literary pabulum in the heart of America or Canadian cities."

Which would seem to say that the years of the Klondyke rush are so long gone by that all traces of them are covered up; that the wild life on the Yukon which shows so glamorously in many of Jack London's powerful stories is entirely a thing of the past. It may be so; Dr. Campbell is a better authority on that matter than any Englishman could be; and yet I wonder? It is not easier for one man living in the heart of a cultured, well-ordered city to imagine that the outskirts of his country are in a state of whirling, highly-coloured anarchy than it is for another to persuade himself that the rest of the land is as peaceful and law-abiding as his own surroundings, that the savage fringes have been civilised, that under the magic wand of masterly governing the very wilderness blossoms as the rose. And there is evidence on the other side. Dr. Campbell lives at Ottawa, and up at Winnipeg is "Ralph Connor" (the Rev. Charles Gordon); both are Canadian born, but I have an idea that Dr. Campbell is more of the cultured city man than Ralph Connor, who has lived and worked in the rough, less-civilised quarters of the Dominion, and has gathered his personal experiences up into that healthfully realistic series of romances that have made him the most famous of living Canadian novelists in England as well as in Canada.¹ Ralph Connor strikes no note of exaggeration; he has seen the sterner side of Canadian existence and felt the tonic joy that is in it as well as the strife and the hardship. Writing of scenes and people that are familiar to him, he sketches with a quiet humour and pathos, and a keen understanding of humanity, the life-dramas of the town, of the small shopkeeper, of the college student; he sketches too, the life of the worker on the great rivers, or across the vast prairies, of the mining prospector, and the rancher, and under his spell you feel that in the wilds and in the cities there are not different and alien spirits but that everywhere the same spirit prevails, the living spirit of Canada which is happily a spirit of many moods and not of one only. Even in London we are not so cultured as to have no crust to our bread; there are regions of our town as savage and remote from civilisation as any outlands of the Empire.

¹ "Black Rock," "The Sky Pilot," "The Doctor of Crow's Nest," "The Man from Glengarry," "The Settler," etc., etc. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

If the stories told of wild life in Canada by such novelists as Roger Pocock,² Harold Bindloss,³ Lawrence Mott,⁴ and G. B. Burgin,⁵ stood alone I would be willing to discredit them; for they are not Canadians. Three of them are roving Englishmen who seem most at home in places where there are no houses; and Mr. Burgin is so tame that you can see him almost any day of the week eating with a knife and fork at a London club. All the same, he has been frequently to Canada, and if Old Man is a myth and there is no general tendency to make free with revolvers at Four Corners he has been taking advantage of our innocence who stay at home and accept his word for these things. But there is the Canadian, Canon Wharton Gill⁶: his vigorous, many-coloured story of life in a prairie settlement is alive with rugged characters and rough adventure and reads like truth. There is Norman Duncan, whose intimate, sharply realised tales⁷ of the hard, primitive, perilous lives lived by the Newfoundland fishermen read like very truth also and yet are of wild life enough in all conscience.

² "Jesse of Cariboo." (Murray.)

³ "A Sower of Wheat." (Chatto & Windus), etc.

⁴ "Prairie Snow and Sea" (John Murray.)

⁵ "Dicky Dilver." (Hutchinson), etc.

⁶ "Love in Manitoba" (Toronto: Musson Book Co. London: Stephen Swift)

⁷ "The Way of the Sea." (Hodder & Stoughton)

Photo by Lichtkunst, Munich.

G. G. D. Roberts.

There is Mrs. Arthur Murphy, who has been actively engaged in the timber industry in Manitoba, and has filled "Janey Canuck,"¹ and "Open Trails,"² with pictures of the rough life she has known and the homely philosophy and kindly large-hearted humour it has taught her; and above all there is Ernest Thompson Seton—he has found wild life enough to write about, though it is the wild-animal life of his own land rather than of its people. Read his "Biography of a Grizzly,"³ his "Monarch, the Big Bear,"⁴ "Life Histories of Northern Animals,"⁵ "Wood Myth and Fable,"⁶ or what is to my thinking, the most fascinating of his works, "Wild Animals I Have Known."⁷ They have this much in common with such books of Jack London's as "The Call of the Wild,"⁸ and "White Fang,"⁹ that Bliss Carman.

In his own field he has but one rival, and that is Charles G. D. Roberts, a thoroughbred Canadian, born in New Brunswick. Mr. Roberts, however, has a many-sided reputation; his work has a wider scope and greater variety.¹⁰ He was for a time editor of The Week, and assistant editor of the Illustrated American; he has been Professor of English and French Literature at King's College, Nova Scotia, and has written a History of Canada. We know him best for his inimitable stories of animal and bird life, and his forcefully written tales of men and women who face existence in those wilder outposts of Canada that Dr. Campbell would discourage us from believing in. He is one of the most popular of magazine writers here no less than in the Americas, and there he is known, too, as a poet of rare achievement. His "Babes of the Wood"¹¹ is a nature study for younger readers, and very graceful and attractive work in a similar kind has been done by Edith Howes.¹²

But I suspect that, after all, Dr. Campbell was not retreating to such wild life as gets into the pages of writers like these. He had in mind, perhaps, the more violent work of such younger authors as Robert W. Service. And I am open to admit that nothing would convince me that in "The Trail of '98"¹³ Mr. Service supplies a faithful presentment of what life actually was in any part of Canada fourteen years ago. The story is the ruddiest Adelphi melodrama; readable enough; full of go and movement; but as far from being like life as a nightmare is. Nevertheless, it

R. W. Service.

Frederick George Scott.

five years of the backwoods before he went to school at the Collegiate Institute of Toronto. Later he had three years of art training in London and so became artist and author too, and has illustrated his books with his own graceful and vivid drawings. Since the early eighties he has been studying natural history in Manitoba and has for some while past been Naturalist to the Government of that province.

^{1, 2} Cassells.³ Hodder & Stoughton.^{4, 5} Constable.⁶ Hodder & Stoughton.⁷ David Nutt.^{8, 9} Heinemann and Nelson.¹⁰ "More Kindred of the Wild." "The Backwoodsmen," "Kings in Exile," "Neighbours Unknown." (Ward, Lock), etc.¹¹ Cassell. ¹² "The Sun Babes." "Rainbow Children." (Cassell.)¹³ Fisher Unwin.

Photo by Francis de Gough.

Mrs. W. H. Drummond.

W. H. Drummond.

does catch glimpses of the truth, and in his stirring Kiplingesque songs and ballads he has found his right work and done it with a gusto that has carried his verses through to an enormous popularity.¹ His "Songs of a Sourdough" have reached their twenty-fourth edition. Mr. Service is a bank clerk; he lives in the cultured atmosphere of a Canadian city and writes of the very wildest of wild Canadian life, but he writes rather as one recalling the past, of the old-time place miner and, with an amazing realism and virility, of that "Spell of the Yukon" which may now have lost its potency but is full of glamour still in the remembrance. If I were put to it to name the poet who stands supreme among the poets not only of Canada but of all the Colonies I should name Bliss Carman.² He is not perhaps in the highest sense a great poet, but he is a great singer. His verse carries no weight of thought; it is purely lyrical, purely poetical, and its magic is such that one cannot say exactly what constitutes its chief charm whether it is certain natural flowering qualities it has, its easy grace, its perfect air of spontaneity, the flowing, careless simplicity of its language that breaks without effort into the airiest and loveliest of fancies. More than all, there is a quick sensitiveness running through his lines, like the delicate veins that make a

Photo by E. Parnell, Hove.

F. A. Talbot.

Author of "The Garden of Canada"

tracery along leaves and petals of flowers, and such an ever-present fineness of feeling and emotion underlying them that you are continually coming to sudden passages that touch you strangely not because of any sharp pathos that is in them but because of the sheer beauty of their elusive butterfly fancifulness. He is happiest among flowers and the old simplicities of the natural life. See how

¹ "Songs of a Sourdough," "Ballads of a Cheechako." (Fisher Unwin.)

² "Songs of the Sea Children," "Songs from a Northern Garden." (John Murray.)

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

Wilfred Campbell.

crowned Wilfred Campbell as the first of Canadian poets, and I recognise that there is a good deal to be said for their claim. The two men are so different that you cannot justly compare them. Bliss Carman is an unpremeditating, vagabond spirit, he belongs to the woods and the fields, and the big open spaces almost as intimately as does god Pan himself; and Wilfred Campbell is the poet of culture, more as Arnold was; his Pegasus runs nobly in harness; he has done distinguished work in great fields of poesy where Carman has never trodden. His dramas are touched with passion and rise to high imaginative moments; his odes have the right stately march; nobody has written richer or lovingly he writes of quaint French-Canadian legends, of children, and the homely, sunbrowned people who inhabit remote and lonely country places. I am not sure that I do not like as well as any of his poems, "In a Grand Pré Garden," with that unforgettably beautiful fantasy of the flowers:

"With their innocent grave faces lifted up to meet my own.
They are but the stranger people,
swarthy children of the sun,
Gypsies tenting at our door to vanish ere the year is done."

Bliss Carman has gone from Canada; he has long been a busy journalist in New York; but his poetry belongs to Canadian literature, and cannot be taken away from it. There are sound judges in the Dominion, I know, who have

Photo by A. M. Cunningham, Hamilton, Canada.

Miss Mabel Burkholder.

Author of "The Course of Impatience Carningham"

more burningly emotional patriotic verse than he has in some of his sonnets and his "Sagas of Vaster Britain"; and he has moods in which he catches glimpses of the very soul of unreclaimed nature, as in the opening of "The Spring Spirit":

"I, poor Satyr in the glade,
Saw a wonder, half afraid."

Certainly, and in any case, Wilfred Campbell is the most representative Canadian man of letters

Photo by Calbraith, Toronto

Miss Pauline Johnson's birthplace, "Chiefswood," near Brantford, on the banks of the Grand River.

Miss A. M. Teskey.
Author of "The Yellow Pearl"

seven years ago,¹ and another that is to include also of course all his later work is now in preparation,² and I gather that the publishers are confident of an unprecedented demand for it. I have not been able to do more than make casual reference to Dr. Campbell's memorable work as an historian, his latest in this direction being the first volume of "The Scotsman in Canada" (of which the second is written by another eminent Canadian author, Professor George Bryce),³ its strongest appeal is inevitably to those of Scottish nationality, but it reveals, as one of Dr. Campbell's critics says, "the breadth of outlook and insight into human nature, the passionate devotion to the Empire and belief in the high destiny of the British race that have characterised unfailingly all that has come from his pen."

Of other notable histories written by Canadians I can only mention in passing one or two of the more recent, as W. L. Griffith's, "The Dominion of Canada"⁴; "Annexation, Preferential Trade, and Reciprocity,"⁵ an outline of the Canadian Annexation Movement by Cephas D. Allen and George M. Jones; Dr. George Bryce's "Romantic Settlement of Lord Selkirk's Colonists"⁶; and in general literature there is Agnes Dean Cameron's travel-book, "The New North"; Mrs. S. J. Graham's "Etchings from a Parsonage Veranda"; Agnes

¹ Toronto, New York, London and Edinburgh: Fleming H. Revell Co.

², ³ Toronto and London: Musson Book Co.

⁴ Pitman. "All Red" series.

⁵, ⁶ Musson Book Co.

and the most versatile. He was born at Berlin, Ontario; educated at Toronto University, and Cambridge, Mass.; and holds an appointment under Government as an officer of the Archives of Canada. A few years ago a special edition of his poems was issued by Mr. Carnegie to his colleges in Great Britain and America; a collected edition of them was published in Canada, America and England Laut's "Lords of the North"; Katharine Hughes's "Life of Father Lacombe", to say nothing of the work of such French-Canadian authors as Madame Gerin-Lajoie, Mdlle. Laure Conan, Madame Dandurand, and Sir Adolph Routhier.

It would be unpardonable in even the baldest record of Canadian poets to omit the name of the late French-Canadian Poet-Laureate, Dr. Louis Frechette; of the late Archibald Lampman, of Frederick George Scott,⁷ Arthur Stringer, Agnes Maule Machar (both of whom have also written much good fiction), and Robert J. C. Stead, whose breezy, masterly "Songs of the Prairie"⁸ take us out into the wilds again. I am conscious that I ought to say more of such poets as Lampman, Stringer and Scott in particular, but I must make room to add something concerning two of the most characteristic of all Canadian poets, William Drummond and Pauline Johnson.

Drummond is, as Dr. Campbell has said, "perhaps the most noted depicter, with the pen, of French-Canada"; perhaps, too, he is the truest. He was a hard-working doctor, a man of a large, kindly, genial personality, who lived and laboured among the people he wrote about, and when you have read his four volumes of ballads and lyrics⁹ (of which Messrs.

Putman promise a collected edition) you feel that you know the French-Canadian nearly as intimately as if you also had lived beside him. The poems are written in the quaint patois of the habitant; they would lose half their strength and colour and atmosphere if they were not; but this presents no difficulties that are not easily overcome, and they are well worth overcoming for the sake of the stories that are embodied in the poems—stories that are redolent of all the odd humour and hardness and

⁷ Poems. (London and Toronto: Musson Book Co.)

⁸ Toronto: W. Briggs.

⁹ "The Habitant," "The Voyageur," "Johnny Corneau," "The Great Fight." (Putnams.)

Photo by the Mora Studio, Gore.

Miss Edith Howes.
Author of "The Sun Babies"

Miss Jean N. M'Ilwraith.
Author of "A Diana of Quebec."

Mrs. Virna Sheard.
Author of "The Man at Lone Lake"

Canon Ellis Wharton Gill.
Author of "Love in Manitoba."

tenderness and wistful ideality of the French-Canadian character. It is not surprising that "The Habitant" had a sale of over twenty-five thousand copies, and that the later volumes have enjoyed an equally generous vogue. Within his limits Drummond was an authentic poet, and

"There was no better loyalist than this whose humours played

In pleasant human wise to serve the State two races made."

To his fourth, and posthumous volume, his wife, Mrs. May Harvey Drummond, contributes a sympathetic and very interesting biographical preface. She, by the way, has her own place among Canada's miscellaneous writers. She has written pleasantly on the customs and folklore of Jamaica, and recently published a delightful tale of the tropics, "The Story of Quamin."¹

No author in the Dominion has a greater claim to being a Canadian than has Miss Pauline Johnson. Her mother was an Englishwoman, who had made her home in Canada, but her father was the late G. H. M. Johnson (Onwanonsyshon) the Head Chief of the Six Nations Indians, of the blood royal of the Mohawk tribe, and a scion of one of the fifty noble families belonging to the historical federation founded by Hiawatha over four hundred years ago. First known as the Brotherhood of the Five Nations, it was renamed the Iroquois by early French missionaries and explorers, and in the long fighting with both French and Colonial Revolutionists the Iroquois Indians became famous for their loyalty to the British Crown, and were eventually granted for their fealty the magnificent lands bordering the Grand River in the County of Brant, Ontario. There the tribes still live, and in this Reserve, on her father's estate, "Chiefswood," Pauline Johnson (Tekahionwake) was born.

"Copper-tinted face, and smouldering fire

Of wilder life, were left me by my sire
To be my proudest claim ; " and she inherited too, for it breathes through some of her finest poems, that loyalty of her Red ancestors to the British flag. After 1892, when she came prominently before the Canadian public by giving a series of recitals from her poems, she travelled considerably about Canada and in England, and repeated those recitals with astonishing success. Whilst she was in London, in 1894, Mr. John Lane published a volume of her verses, "The White Wampum," and in 1903, she published a second volume, "Canadian Born," which reached a second edition within a year. There is fire and passion in these poems of hers, especially in the ballads of the stirring days when the Indian braves still took the war-path. That is a vivid, wonderfully living ballad of "Ojison," the squaw of a Mohawk chief who was carried off by a Huron warrior, and during the long, reckless ride pretended to have been won to love him for his dashing courage, persuaded him to loose her hands so that she might clasp him round the waist to hold herself on the horse, then, feeling cautiously, gripped his scalping knife, cunningly drew it and buried it to the haft in his back, and rode back alone to her tribe. "As Red Men Die," relates with equal force and intensity how a captive chief of the Mohawks dies defiantly, dancing his war dance amid the flames that consume him. But there is pathos and tenderness in such poems as "Workworn," "My English Letter," "Dawendine"; a Whistler-like impressionism in such word-etchings as "Joe," "Marshlands," "Rain-fall," "Under Canvas," and a glorious trumpet-note of patriotic pride and triumph in "Canadian Born," and "The Riders of the Plains," and for its picturesque realism and the haunting melody of its lines probably none of her poems has had a wider popularity than her "Song My Paddle Sings."

"August is laughing across the sky,
Laughing while paddle, canoe and I
Drift, drift,
Where the hills uplift
On either side of the current swift."

But with all her patriotism and her love of modern Canada, she is at her highest when she is back among the legends and stories of the race that is her own and with which she remains in profoundest sympathy, understanding and sharing their ideals and even envying the Redskin's destiny when at last his soul goes out towards the Happy Hunting Grounds :

"Sailing into the cloud-land, sailing
into the sun,

Into the crimson portals ajar when life is done ;—

O ! dear dead race, my spirit too
Would fain sail westward unto you "

Latterly, unhappily, Miss Johnson's health has broken down, and she now lies dangerously ill in hospital at Vancouver ; and so great is the hold she has taken on the admiration and affection of the Canadian public that some of the leading citizens of Vancouver, her adopted city, have formed a trust and are issuing for her benefit a complete edition of her works in poetry and prose, and it is to be published this autumn on both sides of the Atlantic,² the collected poems bearing the fitting title of "Flint and Feather."

Goldwin Smith was ours to begin with, but he gave himself to Canada, and before the close of his long life was the greatest of Canadian journalists and one of her leading historians. Grant Allen, on the other hand, was a Canadian, but he came over here and we kept him, as we have since received from Canada Sir Gilbert Parker³, Miss Lily Dougall,⁴ Robert Barr,⁵ James Barr, Beckles Willson, who has written some excellent Canadian travel and historical works,⁶ and Sara Jeanette Duncan (Mrs. Cotes), who has long since exchanged Canada for Simla, and whose well-known novels of Anglo-Indian and American life

¹ Musson Book Co. ² "Pierre and his People," "The Seats of the Mighty," (Methuen). "The Right of Way," "The Trail of the Sword," "The Lane that had no Turning," (Hodder and Stoughton.) ³ "Beggars All." (Longmans), etc. ⁴ "Cardillac." (Mills & Boon), etc. ⁵ (Constable.)

¹ Putnam's.

Miss Pauline Johnson.
(Tekahionwake)

have recently achieved the distinction of a collected edition.¹ A. S. Bradley,² though he has written largely of the Dominion, was born and remains an Englishman; and the same is true of F. A. Talbot,³ who was at one time one of the young lions of Carmelite House; but Miss Jean N. McIlwraith, despite the fact that she is taken up now with American journalism, is a Canadian by birth, and still has her home there. Among other books, she has written some of the ablest novels that have come from the Britains overseas. One recalls her "Curious Career of Roderick Campbell"⁴ with admiration, and only last week she published "A Diana of Quebec,"⁵ a brilliant romance of Canada during the later years of the American War of Independence, Nelson, then in the beginnings of his career, playing a principal part in it. Other modern Canadian novelists whose reputations have spread beyond the limits of the Dominion are Adeline M. Tesky,⁶ W. A. Fraser, Isabel Eccleston Mackay,⁷ Valance Patriarch, Virna Sheard,⁸ Jennie B. Williams, Marian Keith,⁹ Mrs. Macdonald (L. M. Montgomery),¹⁰ and, one of the newest and most promising, Mabel Burkholder, who in "The Course of Impatience Carningham"¹¹ tells an entertaining story of Canadian town life, and gives some light, clever sketches of the conditions of the factory workers. I had got this article half written before I heard of what I have it on good authority—is the best-selling novel in Canada—"The Golden Dog," by William Kirby.¹² I at once procured the book and read it, and, though it is a little old-fashioned in style and a little verbose and leisurely to modern thinking, it is a gallant, full-blooded, abundantly interesting story of the picturesque days when the French were still masters of Quebec. The author died two years ago. After he had written his book, it seems, he could not get it accepted, and it was first published in New York. Its instant and huge success resulted in its being issued in his own land—Canada; and now that it has achieved an English edition I shall be curious to see how the seasoned novel readers of the old country accept it.

Nearly unique among Canadian writers of fiction is Stephen Leacock. I am pleased to know that he was born in England, and that, though he is now a Professor of Political Economy, of all things!) at the McGill University, Montreal, he retains his sense of humour intact; and if you have not read the irresponsible parodies and burlesques in his two other books¹³ you should make amends to yourself at once by getting the new one in which he sketches the characters and tells the stories of some of the dwellers in a little Canadian town.¹⁴ The outline of autobiography with which he prefaces his stories is as delightfully amusing as anything he has written; he is frivolous in his treatment of the scholastic achievements which ended in his taking the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in 1903; but if the meaning of this degree is, as he says, that "the recipient of instruction is examined for the last time in his life, and is pronounced completely full. After this no new ideas can be imparted to him," it is certain that it has not incapacitated him from imparting to others ideas and narratives that are fresh and new and full of the most irrepressible laughter. He has wrought his book out of the humours of one of those little Canadian towns that "spread their square streets and trim maple trees beside placid lakes almost within echo of the primeval forest," and his quaint, whimsical pages have given me so much pleasure that I am glad he went from England, and can even forgive him for becoming a Professor of Political Economy, since these misfortunes have produced such happy consequences.

SOUTH AFRICA.

The prevailing note in Canadian literature is one of high seriousness; it has humour, but of the quiet, thoughtful, sympathetic kind that rarely goes to irresponsible lengths. It began in a lighter strain, and Judge Haliburton's "Sam Slick, the Clockmaker," was the Nova Scotian fountain-head of what we now recognize as typical American humour. But, looking from then till now, you will find that the fantastically whimsical, broadly burlesque merriment of Stephen Leacock is near to being a unique thing in the literature of Canada. America has her full share of that boyish, high-spirited sense of fun; Australia has hers; but there is very little of it again in South Africa. It would be strange were it otherwise, for unlike the history of the other colonies that of South Africa has until quite recent years run through storm and darkness and the Valley of the Shadow; naturally, her literature reflects these things, and such humour as it has is of the grim sort.

As a personal opinion, I think the biggest book that has yet come out of South Africa is Olive Schreiner's "Story of an African Farm."¹⁵ It is years since I read it, but I have the vividest recollection of its minutely drawn Boer and English people and of its wonderfully atmospherized picture of Dutch-Afrikaner life on the Karoo, now swept by torrential rains, now parching under blazing suns in seasons of prolonged drought. It offers a strong protest against the wrongs that women endure; but more to the purpose is the powerful, sometimes sordid, but always true and profoundly human, story that it tells. In his valuable, most interestingly written history of "The Union of South Africa,"¹⁶

Photo by Kate Pragnell.

Miss Gertrude Page.

¹ Constable.

² "The Fight with France for North America," "Canada in the Twentieth Century," "The Making of Canada" (Constable).

³ "The Garden of Canada." (Cassell.)

⁴ Constable. ⁵ Smith, Elder.

⁶ "The Yellow Pearl" (Hodder & Stoughton.)

⁷ "The House of Many Windows." (Cassell.)

⁸ "The Man at Lone Lake." (Cassell.)

⁹ "Usbeth of the Dale." (Hodder & Stoughton.)

¹⁰ "Anne of Green Gables." (Pitman.)

¹¹ Mussion Book Co. ¹² Jarrold

¹³ "Literary Lapses." "Nonsense Novels." (John Lane.)

¹⁴ "Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town." (John Lane.)

¹⁵ Hutchinson. ¹⁶ Pitman.

Mr. Basil Worsfold, sometime editor of the Johannesburg Star, places Sir Percy Fitzpatrick's "Jock of the Bushveld" as a remarkable companion picture to Olive Schreiner's masterpiece. Apart from Jock, he says, and the wild life of the Bushveld, there is excellent character drawing; "but the white men are English, not Dutch, and the natives are natives as developed under English, not Dutch, influence." But most of the best South African novels were written by Englishmen who lived awhile out there and came home again, and their work belongs to English literature, and prominent among these are Sir H. Rider Haggard,¹ Perceval Gibbon,² Stanley Portal Hyatt,³ Ernest Glanville,⁴ Bertram Mitford,⁵ a notable world-traveller who has spent half his life in South Africa, and probably written more stories about it than any other man living, and Douglas Blackburn,⁶ whom Hyatt has called "the father of the modern school of South African novelists." Latterly we have had some very able novels from Cynthia Stockley,⁷ from F. E. Mills Young,⁸ from Gertrude Page (Mrs. Dobbin),⁹ a colonist of only eight years' standing, whose novels have earned her the title of "The Wizard of Rhodesia"; from Will Westrup,¹⁰ who I believe still lives in the colony; another, who still belongs to it, Francis Carey Slater,¹¹ has published at least one volume of artistic and virile short stories that have South Africa for their stage; and one who has always belonged to it, being colonial born, W. C. Scully, has put some of the cleverest work in South African fiction into his two volumes - "Between Sun and Sand," and "Kaffir Stories"; while that notable traveller, H. A. Bryden, in addition to numerous books about travel and sport in Africa, has spun two series of immensely good yarns in his "Tales of South Africa" and "From Veldt Camp Fires."¹²

It would need a separate article to say anything adequate of the travel records of such explorers as Livingstone, Stanley, Mungo Park, and of the histories of South Africa and records of its wars with the Boers and with the Zulus, the Matabele, and other such savage races, one of the newest of which records comes from Col. Hamilton-Browne, who fought at Isandlwana;¹³ the last Boer War has a vast library to itself of histories, narratives of war-correspondents, novels, verse, and such important miscellaneous volumes as the "Secret Service in South Africa" of Douglas Blackburn and Captain Caddell;¹⁴ and the latest phase of South Africa's development has already produced a notable history from the Hon. R. H. Brand.¹⁵

If all this enormous output were duly apportioned, however, most of it would be found under the names of Englishmen who were only temporarily resident in the colony; and South Africa, like Australasia, has so far done its most interesting, most voluminous and distinctively Colonial work in verse. The father of South African poetry was Thomas Pringle, a friend of Scott's, who emigrated to the colony in 1820, and founded two papers there, which were suppressed because of their too-outspoken criticism of the Government. His best known poem is "Afar in the Desert"; but I prefer the faithful, sympathetic sketches he gives in other of his poems of the Bushman, the Kaffir, the Hottentot, for there is no denying that his verse is very pedestrian, there is scarcely a line that gives you the sudden thrill and uplift that is in the gift of authentic poetry; he abounds in commonplace thought respectably clothed, but the man's sympathy with the enslaved, degraded, dispossessed native, his deep resentment of wrong and injustice, make his verse good poetry if it cannot make it great. Following Pringle comes a lengthy flow of names, most of which would have no meaning in an English ear, but there is a numerous company of living poets, many of whose names and works have come over to us.

Perhaps the oldest and certainly one of the most accomplished of these is William Elijah Hunter, who dedicates his collected poems¹⁶ to the Rev. John Bransby, "Edgar Allen Poe's schoolmaster and mine." He is a Somersetshire man, but was educated at King's Lynn Grammar School. In 1863 he went out to Natal as headmaster of a public school near Pietermaritzburg, and later was ordained by Bishop Colenso and officiated at St. Peter's Cathedral there. He left Natal after the Zulu War, and worked as a clergyman on the diamond fields. During his Natal days he wrote and published much verse in the Natal Witness, and his three volumes contain work that is always thoughtful and instinct with feeling. Since his retirement to Cambridge, Cape Town, in 1909, he has written, among other poems, two sustained monologues, "An Old Kaffir Garrulises" and "A Missionary Returns Thanks," both of which gained first prizes in The State literary competitions. A fine catholic spirit breathes through the verse of H. V. Ellis; but more essentially South African in its atmosphere and choice of subject is the work of Denys Lefebvre ("Syned")¹⁷ of Lance Fallow, who has found inspiration no less in the lives of modern settlers and miners than in the vicissitudes of the old Dutch pioneers; of Mrs. Beatrice Bromley, Lynn Lyster, and Kingsley Fairbridge. President Reitz has translated Burns into Dutch, and another Dutch poet, Jan Celfiers, has won a large vogue among Dutch readers with his lyrics of South African rural life.

Perceval Gibbon began his literary career with a volume of verse—"South African Sketches"—that he

Photo by R. J. Nicholas.

W. E. Hunter.

¹ "She" (Longmans). "King Solomon's Mines" (Cassell). "Red Eve" (Hodder & Stoughton), etc.

² "Souls in Bondage," "Vrouw Grobelaar's Leading Cases" (Blackwood).

³ Marcus Hay (Constable). "Black Sheep" (Laurie), etc.

⁴ "Tales from the Veldt" (Chatto and Windus), etc.

⁵ "The River of Unrest" (Ward, Lock).

⁶ "The Gun Runner" (Chatto & Windus), etc.

⁷ "Jumbo" - "Prince of Prinsloo" (Macmillan).

⁸ "Poppy," "The Claw" (Hurst & Blackett).

⁹ "Sam's Kid," "Grit Lawless" (John Lane).

¹⁰ "Love in a Wilderness," "The Edge of Beyond" (Hurst & Blackett).

¹¹ "The Land of To-morrow" (Alston Rivers).

¹² "The Sunburnt South" (Digby Long).

¹³ Hurst & Blackett.

¹⁴ "A Lost Legionary in South Africa" (Werner Laurie).

¹⁵ Cassell.

¹⁶ "The Union of South Africa" (Henry Frowde).

¹⁷ Grahamstown: African Book Co.

¹⁸ "The Lone Trek" (Elkin Mathews).

published during his early Colonial days, and no other of the Colony's poets has more subtly caught the spirit of her mountain solitudes, or are more finely steeped his imaginings in the loneliness, the majesty, and the magic of the illimitable veldt. W. C. Scully, who, in addition to the other prose I have mentioned, has lately been publishing his reminiscences in The State and is issuing a new prose volume this month,¹ has passed the best years of his life in the Civil Service of his native land, and as a magistrate in the Transkei gained an intimate acquaintance with native character and customs, and uses that knowledge to excellent purpose in many of his poems—in "Zulu Pictures," for instance, in "The Cattle Thief," "The Witch Doctor," and "'Nkongane," a perfect etching of one of Dingann's warriors in his old age—a sly, cringing, garrulous, hypocritical, degenerate, old, old man, whose memory still glows

"With the ardour of blood-stained days
And deeds long past—you were one of the doers—
Of spears washed red in the blood of foes,
Of villages wrapped in red flame, of fields
Where the vultures gorged, of the deadly close

Of the impi's horns, and the thundering shields."

Photo by O'Flynn, Johannesburg.

F. E. Walrond.

His descriptive poems, too, such as "The Naloon," and the sonnet "Namequeland," have a fine sombreness of tone and colour and equally impressive is his longer, more sustained effort—the "Voices of Africa,"² which passes the cities and places and peoples of ancient and modern Africa in review. I have been especially taken with some of the work of William Blane.

He has roughed it on the diamond fields of Kimberley and the gold fields around Johannesburg, and "received the thought and inspiration" for the larger part of his work as a poet from those fields and the men who worked on them with him. He has a Wordsworthian simplicity of phrase, and his chief appeal lies in a certain homeliness of fancy and philosophy, a love of nature, and a wistful reaching after the higher life of the spirit. There is nothing in Colonial poetry more deeply charged with emotion, more tremulously alive with a sense of heartbreak and ineffable sorrow, than the natural, unstudied, human cry of the watcher by that death-bed so piteously revealed in "A Prayer"³:

... I cannot even frame my prayer aright,
And only know
That with her life the loveliness and light
Of mine would go. ...

Be near me too! When for her voice, her touch
I yearn alone—

¹ "The Ridge of the White Waters" (Stanley Paul)

² "By Veldt and Kopje" (Fisher Unwin.)

³ "The Silent Land." (Elton Stock.)

Be near me, Chieft, for I shall need Thee much
When she is gone."

Besides doing miscellaneous work as a journalist, Mr. Blane has published two volumes of poems, and is now making a lengthy stay in England and arranging for the publication of a third. He takes a dubious but not unhelpful view of the literary outlook in South Africa, though at present there is little "distinctively" South African literature, and the evident strain after producing some is not healthy. Whatever is distinctive will grow naturally and is not to be had by taking thought. There is a good sale for books in the Colony, he says, but chiefly for the kind known as light literature: "The Colonial and the Colonist devote little or no time to heavy reading, and the lover of books is scarce." The literary and journalistic professions out there, he adds, are neither easy nor profitable. "Except in the case of half-a-dozen editors, there are no good posts, and these are precarious owing to financial and political control. The 'free lance' has a hard time, and often goes to the wall, despite abilities which would have carried him through in any English provincial town. The payment for accepted work is less than in London, although the cost of living is three times as great. Literature in its higher forms is making an effort to assert itself, but all the conditions are against it. Yet something has been done. One after another literary journals have been started—and failed, till to-day The State is almost the only survivor.

Francis Carey Slater.

But this has assumed a rank and form not before equalled, and if its financial backing continues it may go on and be imitated. The philosophic writer has not yet asserted himself, if he exists, and if he did hardly any would attend to his message. Poetry is read by few. Publishers are only so in name and do not give encouragement to local work—they say it does not pay. There is little thought of anything except money, money all the time. Still, there are signs of a change. I know at least a score of men who work away hopefully and look for better conditions in the near future, and the Union has improved the position."

Withal, and though poetry in South Africa may be read only by the few, Mr. Blane's first volume has had a sale of three thousand, and his second of one. Few readers, forsooth! Why, a poet who could sell like that in this country would feel justified in sending round to the nearest florist's and ordering his laurel-wreath at once.

Representative of the more promising of the younger school of South African poets are Francis Slater, Cullen Gouldsbury and F. E. Walrond,⁴ who hails from Glasgow, went out in 1904 to be a clerk in a Johannesburg bank, and already is subdued by the strange spell of the land of his adoption, so that the beauty and terror, the mystery and elusive fascination of it seem for ever haunting him and striving after utterance in his lines. Mammon appears to be a sort of foster-father of the Muses in South Africa, for Francis Carey Slater¹ is another bank clerk. He comes of an old Colonial family; his father was a farmer, landowner, and J.P. in Cape Colony. He has the true lyrical gift and a gentle reflective note that is very charming, but I prefer him in such delightful narrative poems as "A Veld Patriarch," with this effortless, picturesque opening:

⁴ "The Lady Beautiful." (Elkin Mathews.)

"Oom Piet and I were sitting on the stoep,
Before us, clear against the cloudless sky,
The mountains of the Dragon reared their heads:
Rugged old warriors, grey with their long watch,
Bescarred by many a storm, bleached by the sun,
And scourged by all the wayward winds of heaven!
The blue-black shadows lingered on the slopes
Like browsing herds; the daughters of the hills Clapped their white hands, and wimpled through the vales
With merry peals of laughter."

Mr. Slater is still quite young, but I think with Professor Purves, who is probably the leading authority in South Africa on the literature of the country, that he is already "one of the most accomplished of Colonial-born South African poets." The latest of their poets to arrive here is Cullen Gouldsbury, whose "Songs Out of Exile"² were published in England last July. He has a strong, sinewy line, a vividness and vigour and headlong sweep that are somehow reminiscent of Kipling, so of course somebody has called him the South African Kipling. But Mr. Gouldsbury is no copy of his master; he has come under Kipling's bracing influence, but has retained his individuality, and in such alert, clear-cut verses as "The Pace of the Ox," "The Testing of the 'Mlimo,'" "Zama and Zirwa," "The Song of the Carriers," to name no more, he has something new to say and says it newly.

There are Herbert Price, F. C. Kolbe, Herbert Tucker, Edith Vivian, Theodore Van Beek, and at least a dozen of others worthy of a niche in this record, but I have failed to obtain their books, and know no more of them than you may learn for yourself from the two judiciously selected and extremely interesting anthologies of South African verse that have been compiled by E. H. Crouch,³ who will live in the history of South African literature as one of the first and most reliable shepherds of its poetry. It is fitting that the man who has done so much for the poets there and brought them so happily into his fold should be by birth a Colonial. He came to London to complete his education, and was then apprenticed here in the hardware trade, returning to his native land in 1880 to establish at East London a business which had become the most important in its line in that town before he retired into private life in 1900. I say into private life, but he has been serving on the Municipal and Divisional Council of Cambridge, Cape Town, ever since 1905. He is a clever painter in oils, and has accumulated a huge library, that contains many rare old books and valuable first editions. He has travelled considerably; more than once revisiting England, where he is a Freeman of the City of London and a Member of the Honourable Fishmongers Company; and to the fact that he makes a particular hobby of literature, more particularly of poetry, we owe these two volumes that are now the standard anthologies of South African verse. Another good anthology, which admits some of Mr. Crouch's flock and takes in a few that he has missed, is the "Veldsingers Verse"⁴ compiled from the works of the members of the Veldsingers Club, "a small company of South Africans," as Olive Schreiner explains in her foreword, "mainly living in Johannesburg," and "bound to one another by their love of verse."

INDIA.

There is no lack of Histories of Indian Literature, but most of them are of little service to the ordinary mortal. They are too severely academic; too largely given over to learned disquisitions on intricacies of philology, nice questions of race, and purely scholastic matters, that are absorbing only to the ferocious student whose interest in literature is limited to the science of words and its bloodless technical side. There is no earthly reason why a History of Literature should not be as interesting to the average reader as any other history of what men have thought and done, but to be so it needs writing by such as can forget how accomplished they are, and have no desire but to interest others in what interests themselves. I happen to have three that are so written,⁵ but no History of Indian Literature, even the greatest, has any significance for us in this article, because the splendid literature of India is no part of the literature of Greater Britain. It was in being before England began to dream of becoming a nation, and in the hundred years or so that the Empire of India has been united to the British Empire none of the great things that have been added to its literature have been written in our language.

Then for the thousands of other books about India—social and political histories, books of travel and sport, poetry such as Laurence Hope's,⁶ that was written in India and has caught the mystic spirit of the East, biographies of famous Anglo-Indians, memoirs, romances and novels almost without number, translations of Indian classical writings—new books in this kind, or new editions of them, are continually appearing; several of the series of cheap reprints include some, and every

Photo by Stoneham, London.

Edward Heath Crouch.

¹ "Footpaths through the Veldt," "In Mimosa Land." (Blackwood.)

² Fisher Unwin.

³ "South African Poetry and Verse," "Sonnets of South Africa." (Fifield.)

⁴ J. M. Dent.

⁵ "A History of Sanskrit Literature," by A. A. Macdonell (Heinemann), "A Literary History of India," by R. W. Frazer, "A Short History of Indian Literature," by E. Horowitz. (Unwin.)

⁶ "Indian Love," "The Garden of Kama," etc. (Heinemann.)

week brings its fresh quota to our doors.¹ The literature that the Boer War occasioned is as a drop in the ocean compared to the literature of every description that has accumulated around the Indian Mutiny. But scarcely any of this comes within our province, for it is nearly all written by Englishmen, and when an Englishman lives and dies in India—even though he is born there as were Thackeray, Kipling, Laurence Oliphant, Eden Phillpotts, and Lord Roberts (an author by virtue of his "Forty-one Years in India," and his great book on Wellington)—he never becomes an Indian, as when he is born or settles in one of the Colonies he becomes a Canadian, an Australasian or a South African.

Speak of Indian literature to the normal Englishman and he naturally thinks of Kipling, for Kipling is the great interpreter through whom the millions of us have come to know India. He has not only helped us to realise the actual lives of the English out there; he first fashioned the native, whom we had known only as we know a picture in a book, into a creature of flesh and blood for us. "Kim," and some of his stories and poems are more valuable to the human student of Indian life and character than all the histories that were ever written. It is scarcely believable that it is about a quarter of a century ago since like a new planet he rose into our ken with the "Departmental Ditties." Thacker published it in India, where he was then a hard working journalist, and I remember what a sort of stirring in the air it occasioned when it began to appear on sale over here. Close on its heels from the Indian publisher came "Soldiers Three," "The City of Dreadful Night," "Under the Deodars," "Wee Willie Winkie," in the little grey, pamphlet-looking volumes that are now worth their weight in gold, and I had my share of the general excitement that was roused by the advent of that rare thing, a new note in our literature. But all this is of the past; Kipling has taken his assured place in the hierarchy of English letters, and has exerted a more potent influence on his English contemporaries, especially in the Colonies, than any author of our time.

But if Kipling stands supreme on his own ground he does not stand alone. No one compares with him as an Anglo-Indian poet, but amongst other imaginative writers who have given us novels of Indian life of high literary quality and enduring interest are Mrs. Flora Annie Steel,² Mrs. Alice Perrin,³ Mrs. F. E. Penny,⁴ Mrs. Maud Diver,⁵ and Sidney C. Grier.⁶ There are good stories and some illuminating sketches of native character in Sir Edmund Cox's "Achievements of John Caruthers," and in his recently published book, "The Exploits of Kesho Nark, Dacot,"⁷ and good first novels have come from E. M. Dutt,⁸ and Kathleen P. Emmett,⁹ new recruits to the ranks of Anglo-Indian novelists. A. E. W. Mason has won his fame in other fields, but his Indian story, "The Broken Road,"¹⁰ is among the most brilliant of his books.

This, however, is merely by the way. My purpose is to touch on work that has been done in English by native Indian writers, and only on typical examples of that. There is a goodly number of native journalists writing in English, and writing remarkably well, and for books—Her Highness Nawab Sultan Jahan Begam, the ruler of Bhopal recently wrote "An Account of My Life," but it was written in her own language and translated by her educational adviser, Mr. C. H. Payne;¹¹ the Jain of Nawanagar (better known to us as Ranjitsinhji) wrote his "Jubilee Book of Cricket"¹² in English, and to mention only a few names of Indian authors whose reputations have reached many of us, the Maharaja Cooch Behar has written well on sport; Rajendralala Mitra on matters of antiquarian lore; Muharaini Baroda on "Women in India"; Syed Amir Ali, a judge of the Calcutta High Court, has published books on legal and other subjects; and B. C. Chatterjee stands high among Bengalese novelists. I have read no better novel written by a native Indian in our language than "The Prince of Destiny,"¹³ It is the story of an Indian student's

Photo by Reginald Haines.

Rudyard Kipling.

¹ "The Buddha's Way of Virtue," Translated by W. D. C. Wagswara and K. I. Saunders. "Brahma-Knowledge," by L. D. Barnett. (John Murray. Wisdom of the East Series) "Buddhism," by Mrs. Rhys Davids. (Williams & Norgate. Home University Library.) "A Fly on the Wheel: How I Helped to Govern India," by Lieut.-Col. T. H. Lewin. (Constable.) "The Charm of India," An Anthology. Edited by Claud Field. (Herbert & Daniel.) "Cameos of Indian Crime," by H. Hervey. (Stanley Paul.) Captain L. J. Trotter's "Life of Warren Hastings," "Hudson of Hudson's Horse," and "The Bayard of India." (Dent. Everyman's Library.) "Indian Sculpture and Painting," by E. B. Havell; Sir Bampfylde's "Studies of Indian Life and Sentiment," (Murray.) Colonel Younghusband's "India and Tibet," (Murray) and his "Relief of Chitral" (Macmillan) Rev. E. L. Elvin's "India and the Indians"; Lord Curzon's "East and West" (Murray), "The Web of Indian Life," by Margaret Noble (Sister Nivedita). (Heinemann). "The Lawrences of the Punjab," by F. P. Gibbon. (Dent). "A Year with the Gackwar of Baroda," by the Rev. E. St. Clair Weeden (Hutchinson). "Reminiscences of the Mutiny," by W. Forbes-Mitchin, and Sir G. O. Trevelyan's "Cawnpore." (Macmillan.)

² "The Potter's Thumb." (Heinemann.) "The Face of the Waters." (Hodder & Stoughton).

³ "The Charm," "The Anglo-Indians." (Methuen), etc.

⁴ "Caste and Creed," "The Rajah." (Chatto & Windus), etc.

⁵ "Captain Desmond, V.C." (Blackwood) "The Awakening." (Hutchinson), etc.

⁶ "The Power of the Kings," "The Advanced Guard." (Blackwood), etc.

⁷ Constable.

⁸ "The Way of an Eagle." (Unwin.)

⁹ "The Silver Zone." (John Murray.)

¹⁰ Smith, Elder.

¹¹ John Murray.

¹² Ward, Lock.

¹³ Rebman.

life in London, and was as emphatic on the dangers of European education to the average Hindoo as Mr. Mason is in "The Broken Road." But Sarath Kumar Ghosh follows his hero's career after he returns to India, and in an enlightened spirit of patriotism sets himself to show what is at the root of the real British peril in India, and how India and England might be brought to a better understanding of one another. Very adequately representative of the poetry written in English by native Indians is the work of Manmohan Ghose.¹ It is scholarly, rather laboriously correct; you feel that the poet is working in a medium that is not natural to him, hence he can never let himself go; he is picking his way carefully through a lyric when he should be soaring on swift wings; he has to give to his syntax the thought that should be surrendered to his theme. His verse is above the average of that of minor English poets; now and then, simply because he has to watch his words and strive for expression, he lights on a magic or startlingly vivid phrase; but on the whole this want of spontaneity makes it no more than a very clever performance, and that is not sufficient for poetry. Finer and more charming, perhaps, are the English poems of the young Hindu poetess, Toru Dutt, but they too are flawed by that touch of artificiality which comes of writing in a foreign tongue, and the same weakness will keep the translations of her uncle, Romesh Chunder Dutt, from being read largely by other than the student Romesh Chunder Dutt² was one of the most cultured and distinguished of modern Hindu's; he wrote many books in English and in Bengali; and an excellent biography has been written of him by his son-in-law, Mr. J. N. Supta.³ He studied at London University College, under Professor Henry Morley, passed his examinations and entered the Indian Civil Service, won a high reputation as a divisional commissioner and administrator, and sat for a while on the Bengal Legislative Council. All the time he was working loyally for the advancement of the Empire and the good of his countrymen; and all the time, too, he was devoting himself to the pursuit of literature. "I learnt Sanscrit," he wrote of himself,

"after I learnt English, and what a change from the poetry of the West to the poetry of the East! What repose and softness, what warm tints and brilliant lights, what scenes of loveliness and images of beauty! For real poetry of

¹ Songs and Elegies. (Elkin Matthews.)

² "The Civilization of India," by Romesh C. Dutt. (Dent.)

³ Dent.

Romesh C. Dutt.

the highest order go to the grand old Indian epics." It was curious, as he said, that he learnt to appreciate Bengali literature after he had learnt to appreciate Shakespeare and Scott. He had studied English literature with enthusiasm but with a discriminating judgment. He translated the two great Indian epics, the "Mahabharata," and the "Ramayana," into English.⁴ Not the whole of them, for the "Mahabharata" alone runs to ninety thousand couplets and is, as he remarked, "about seven times the size of the Iliad and the Odyssey put together"; he set himself to cut away all unessential episodes and detach the leading narrative, and thus we have in each of those translations he made in to English verse. He wrote books on "The Peasantry of Bengal," "Three Years in India," "The Literature of Bengal," but he was too sound a critic not to realise that "except as a medium for imparting information to the West of the riches of ancient India, the ambition of an Indian to produce anything enduring in English is foredoomed to failure." He and his people rate, I believe, as his finest imaginative work the four historical novels that he wrote in Bengali, one of which "Madhabi Kankan," he translated into English as "The Slave Girl of Agra."

Bengal's chief living poet and man of letters, Rabindra Nath Tagore, is at present visiting England. He is an accomplished English scholar, deeply versed in our language and literature but he has always written in his own tongue. His name is practically unknown to our public, and we are incompetent to judge him, but it is, we are told, "a household word in the Bengali-speaking world. His songs are heard everywhere from the Northwest to Burmah. His poems and dramas, stories and essays, printed in the Indian magazines or circulated in cheap editions, count their readers by tens of thousands. He is the acknowledged master of Bengali literature." He has been translating a selection of his poems into English prose and arrangements are being made to publish the volume this autumn under the editorship of W. B. Yeats.

Nevertheless, if the native Indian may not hope to write anything enduring in English, he writes a good deal in it that is interesting and valuable. S. Radhakrishnan has just published a learned and very admirably written work on "Essentials of Psychology"; S. M. Mitra is publishing this month a collection of his Anglo-Indian studies; and there are native Indian authors who bid fair to become formidable competitors for the average English novelist. I have heard from several who are keen to win success in this direction and whose outlook and experiences are typified in those of S. B. Banerjea, a well known Calcutta journalist. After he had taken his degree in the Inter Arts examination, his father wished him to study for the bar, and he was prepared to obey, but a break-down of his health intererred with his plans. During his illness, more as a pastime than otherwise, he devoted himself to novel writing, and by the time he was better, the scribbling fever had taken him too strongly to be resisted. He contributed articles gratis to divers papers; tried them with short stories which were rejected, then had the satisfaction of getting an article accepted and well paid for by a Chicago weekly. The editor of that weekly invited further contributions, and he proceeded to deluge him with stories and articles which all came back. In despair, he took himself severely to task and realised that all was not well with his English, so he had a course of lessons in article and short story writing from an American school of journalism. What he learned of his faults there was, he says, "an eye-opener"; and as a result of this tuition he was presently contributing freely to various Indian and English journals. In 1907, reprinting several of his newspaper and magazine sketches, he published his first book, "Misunderstood." His next, a scientific romance of the Jules Verne pattern called "1513 Sal," appeared in 1908; but this was written in the Indian vernacular—it was, he remarks, the first scientific romance published in the Bengali language, and he is now preparing an English translation of it. In 1909 he published in Allahabad a play in one act, "The Inimitable Mrs. Markhamby," and a sensational novel, "Thieves and Swindlers," and in London another novel, "The Adventures of Mrs. Russell." In 1910 appeared his "Tales of Bengal,"¹ which was eulogised in a column review by The Times, and in two columns by The Anglo-India Journal, which followed our own bad example with the Kipling school and dubbed him "the Bengali George Eliot", and last year came a volume of "Indian Detective Stories."²

Photo by Elliott & Fry. S. M. Mitra.

⁴ Dent. (Everyman's Library.) ⁵ Henry Frowde.

Mr Banerjea has for some four or five years been active on the staff of an Anglo-Indian daily, and is Calcutta correspondent of a prominent Continental daily. He complains that there is no literary life in India "as one finds it in Europe and America. Here, ninety-nine authors out of a hundred have to publish books at their own expense; seventy per cent. of them fail to pay their way, twenty-five per cent. return a little to their authors, and only five per cent. prove really successful, in this last class being included law books and school and college texts as well as fiction. The reason for this is that the buying public is so small. Things would undoubtedly be improved if enterprising publishers of the Western type would come into being here. As for journalistic life, the less said about it the better, few journals yield a sufficient revenue, and the rest struggle and live precarious lives." He is at present engaged on a semi-religious novel and a small book dealing with the supernatural, and is laying plans, which he believes will mature triumphantly, for starting an English daily in Calcutta.

Whether India will ever make any appreciable addition to the literature of Greater Britain is a matter that is still on the knees of the gods; but the Colonies have already added to its riches, and it would not be surprising if the great creative English literature of the future came from them rather than from us. When wealth accumulates it is not only men that decay, and where there is too much criticism there is never enough new literature. It may seem strange at first blush, especially when their rawness and lack of cultured environment is considered, that the literature of the Colonies should have run so largely to poetry, but there is nothing strange in that, of course, for poetry is one of the attributes of youth. Was it not said when our nation was younger that England, too, was a nest of singing birds? But we are past our nonage. Born to a glorious literary heritage, with a great literature ready made for us, we have less incentive to increase it than to write about and to criticise it. Our morning is behind us, the bloom has been rubbed from our enthusiasms—in a word, we are grown up, and I sometimes fancy that, in our literary aspect, we have arrived at that mature, uninspired, mid-day stage when a man is not so naturally disposed to be restless and over-energetic as to settle to a comfortable after-lunch nap. With the Colonies it is all otherwise. They are still at the beginning; they have not had time yet to do much for themselves and happily have not had everything done for them; and the distinctive note of their literature for, after all, it has one—is its abounding youthfulness, its vigour and freshness, its eagerness of achievement, the sense of impetuous aspiration and undeveloped power that underlies its often careless utterance. They are still at the beginning, with everything to do, a great literature yet to make, the world before them; and they are going forward in that strength of their youth with the dawn still in their faces.

S. B. Banerjea.

¹ Longmans. ² Gay & Hancock.

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

SEPTEMBER, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original LYRIC.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best epitaph on the late summer in four lines of verse.
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.
- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR AUGUST.

- I.—The PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best Lyric is awarded to Miss Helen K. Watts, of Lenton Vicarage, Nottingham, for the following:

TO A LANDSCAPE ARTIST.

Thus our Mother, Nature, "From the world I veil me:
Old and weary-hearted may not read mine eyes:
'Tis the deathless children in a rapture wise
Love me as if human, as a spirit hail me!"

So you follow, follow, where Her robes are sweeping
Warm ethereal light across the morning sky,
Where the contemplative shining waters lie,
All Her gentlest secrets in their quiet keeping Trees have whispered to you, "Little human Brother, Mystically tender is Her veiled face"

We who once have seen its dear elusive grace
Serve in patient rapture evermore the Mother!"

Winds have touched your spirit with Her fleetest feeling,
Dreamy smiles and passions wistful unto tears:
Night has murmured, sleeping, "As my Silence nears,
Lo, the moments of Her mightiest revealing!"

So you follow, follow, passionately tender,
With a child's wise rapture, till She knows you true:
Till She turns to greatly give Herself to you,
And your eyes behold Her in unveiled splendour!

John from dreary Patmos saw a City golden Gloriously builded in the desert skies:
Pictured it sublimely unto blinder eyes
Till they too in vision saw the Unbeholden!

Lo, we walk unseeing over fields Elysian,
Darkly through the glowing Paradisal light,
Till the Heaven about us flashes into sight
Underneath the fingers of the Sons of Vision!

HELEN K. WATTS.

We select for printing:

FEET IN THE SNOW.

Little feet in the snow,
Tell me, where do you go?
And tell me, who did you bear?
Was it a maiden fair?
Say, was she tall and slender?
Her eyes, were they merry or tender?
Her lips, did they mock or smile?
I shall know in a little while,
For know, little feet in the snow,
I shall follow wherever you go.

Little feet in the snow,
Do you know why I love you so?
Your stainless soul I have read
In your firm white maiden tread.
The thoughts you shed around
Were pure as the snow on the ground.
But alas! Busy snowflakes white
Fast cover your traces light;
I shall never know where you go,
Little feet in the snow

(Dorothy Poole, South Lawn, Godalming.)

PARTING.

Love, I have come to waken you,
With lips a-tremble, heart a-sore;
The world is sleeping while we two
Must meet this once, and meet no more:
The mighty moon is near, my love,
The wistful stars are sad on high,—
And there is no one here, my love,
But God—and you and I!

Feel your bosom beating fast,
See the tears upon your face,
Farewell!—this kiss must be our last,
And thus the last, the last, embrace:
Be strong, and do not fear, my love,
—speak this bitter sad goodbye,
For there is none to hear, my love,
But God—and you and I!

(Norman Davidge Gullick, 6, Chantry Road, Clifton, Bristol.)

LOVE-IN-A-MIST.

Love in a garden playing
Spied where two friends drew nigh,
Carelessly laughing and talking.
Love, grown suddenly shy,
Hid in a tangle of misty green
Watching the two stroll by.

Nobody saw the rascal.
(Nobody looked to see.)
Love selected his arrow,
Fitted it in with glee,
Laughing, sped it upon its course
Then turned him round to flee
But subtle tendrils held him
Snared at ankle and wrist.
Vainly the culprit struggled,
Trying each turn and twist,
Till the lovers parted the tangle
And there lay Love in a mist.

(Guenn F. Newnham, "Westbrook," York Avenue, Gillingham, Kent.)

There are good Lyrics, too, among the many others that have been sent in, and we select from among them for special commendation those written by Isidore G. Ascher (London, W.), E. R. (Hull), Lorna Fane (Rhyl), C. G. Taylor (Heswall), M. S. Carter (Brighton), Margaret McIntyre (Ealing), Diana Royds (Bournemouth), T. Scharf (London, N.E.), Violet Pascoe Williams (London, S.E.), Bertram N. Parker (Matlock Bath), Anita Lea (Liverpool), Wayland Young (Sheffield), Maude Collett (Wimbledon), W. G. Priest (Norwich), Wilfrid M. Appleby (Southend-on-Sea), Mona Garrod Turner (Southwold), Miss I. M. S. Keely (Twickenham), John Helston (New Wandsworth), B. G. Brooks (Wood Green), Rose M. Lomas (Newbury), Thomas Sharp (Merton Park), Wallace Davies (Salop), Horace W. Walker (Beeston), Arthur Shearsby (Leamington Spa), C. L. Alexander (Harrogate), H. M. Creswell Payne (St. Austell), Lily Irwin (Leamington Spa), Jim Crabbe (Breechin), A. M. Bowyer Rosmann (London, N.), M. A. Newman (Badingham), G. T. Holme (Gt. Malvern), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood), Mary Bradford Whiting (Ramsgate), Marjorie

C. Barnard (London, S.W.), M. F. Cock (Ashford), Arbel M. Aldous (Saffron Walden), H. R. King (Streatham), Edward S. D. Liveing (Warwick), Margaret Painter (Wimbledon), Agnes E. M. Baker (West Hampstead), Kate Bedford (Brighouse), Thomas H. Green (Eastbourne), C. Evan Jones (Brookenhurst), H. M. Waithman (Chudleigh), Aaron Isenberg (Liverpool), Percy Merriman (Highgate), Ellen B. Watts (Penistone), Norman Davidge Gullick (Bristol), Rose E. Sharland (Bristol), Edmund Howard (Putney), A. H. Scales (Paddington), Dorothea Anderson (Dumfries), Herbert Hodder (Kingston-on-Thames), Eveline Emily Ife (Plumstead Common), Nigel O. Parry (Ruabon), Miss E. A. Pearson (Fleet, Hants), Albert E. Barnes (Beaconsfield), E. Frederic Seymour (Kilburn), Edith Jotham (Port St. Mary), Doris Dean, Isaac Rosinberg (Hampstead), Martin Kinder (Norwich), Marcia Knight (Rushdene), Annie M. Luke (Plumstead), Edith M. Hills (Boxmoor), Annie Kate Hickson (Leicester), William Nettleton (Huddersfield), Dorothy Margaret Stuart (Eastbourne), P. Selver (Fulham), Albert Fuller (Cardiff)

II THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Mr. Stewart L. Blakely, of 14, King's Road, Bicester, Oxon, for the following:

RECOLLECTIONS OF A GREAT LADY.

Edited by M. CHARLES NICOLLAND (Heinemann)

Alas, I was so broad of girth,
I could not be embraced.
TENNYSON—The Talking Oak

We also select for printing:

A LOST IDENTITY. BY DAVID HENNESSEY

"Domestic bliss has proved my bane,
A harder case you never heard
My wife (in other matters sane)
Pretends that I'm a Dickey-bird!"
Ballads by Sir W. S. GILBERT—"Bab."
(Miss E. A. Pearson, Fleet, Hants)

INITIALS ONLY. BY ANNA KATHARINE GREEN.
(Eveleigh Nash.)

"O breathe not his name."
TOM MOORE'S Songs.

(Rev. Edwin C. Lansdown, The Manse, Derby Road, South Woodford, N.E.)

"HOW 'T WAS." BY STEPHEN REYNOLDS. (Macmillan.)

"No doubt the Editor of 'Notes and Queries'
Or 'Things not generally known' could tell."
C. S. CALVERLEY—To Mrs. Goodchild.

(Miss M. K. Perkins, at Heathfield Lodge, Ilkley, Yorks.)

"THE LADY NEXT DOOR." BY HAROLD BEGBIE.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

"What'er the theme, the maiden sang
As if her song could have no ending."
WORDSWORTH—The Solitary Reaper.

(A. Ernest Smith, 119, Whipps Cross Road, Leytonstone, N.E.)

"THE LADY NEXT DOOR." BY HAROLD BEGBIE.

"I look'd at her and look'd again
And did not wish her mine."
WORDSWORTH—The Two April Mornings.

(Thomas Sharp, 8, Broadwater Terrace, Cannon Hill Lane, Merton Park, S.W.)

"ONE OF US." BY GILBERT FRANKAU.
(Chatto & Windus.)

"The delicate question, which
Of us two goes to the kettle, arose,
And we argued it out as such."

W. S. GILBERT—The Lay of the Nancy Bell. Bab Ballads.
(Claude L. Penrose, G.C., R.M. Academy, Woolwich.)

THE LEE SHORE. BY R. MACAULAY (winner of the first prize in the Hodder and Stoughton £1,000 Prize Novel Competition).

"I bear away my recompense"

WORDSWORTH—To the Highland Girl of Inversneyde

(Miss H. M. Ingle, 67, Bournemouth Road, Merton Park, S.W.)

III. —We have received a very large number of quotations suitable for placing on the Memorial to the late Sir W. S. Gilbert, but much the best of these is one that has been submitted by fifteen different Competitors. We therefore divide the Prize between the two whose answers were sent in first, and are forwarding Two NEW BOOKS to Mrs. B. M. Renton, of Claremont Crescent, Sheffield, and Two NEW BOOKS to Mr. T. H. Raymond, of the Mill House, Ashurst, Kent, for the following:

"A fellow of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy"

HAMLET.

IV. —A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. W. F. Spalding, of 22, Lightcliffe Road, Palmer's Green, N., for the following:

THE CONFESSIONS OF A FOOL. BY AUGUST STRINDBERG
(Swift, Stephen & Co.)

August Strindberg's life was undoubtedly a strange one, but the unhappiness of his marriage, however appalling, hardly justified his writing these revelations. The theme, drawn from a critical observance of his wife's character, is distinguished by a peculiar rhetorical force, and for cynicism, satire and invective, the confessions he has attributed to this "fool" surpass anything penned by Rousseau. The bitterness revealed is unpleasantly like the product of a disordered mind, and one wonders with what feelings the prudish critics of "Jude the Obscure" or the "New Machiavelli" will view the appearance of this remarkably outspoken contribution to European literature.

Among the rest of the other reviews received are:

"THE RED HAND OF ULSTER." BY GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM
(Smith Elder & Co.)

This delightful book should be read by every politician at the earliest possible instant, for its theme is the attitude of Ulster towards Home Rule, to-day, to-morrow, and the day after—or rather in the middle of next week. The narrator of these serio-comic happenings, Lord Kilmore, is wholly unbiassed, and satirises everybody's politics, with equal impartiality and wit. There is sparkling humour on every page, yet a grim earnestness in places which the most superficial reader cannot fail to apprehend. Indeed, one wonders at times whether tragedy will rule the final scene, but happily Burlesque prevails.

(Arnold S. Walton, 81, Park Road, Newcastle-on-Tyne.)

THE GREEK GENIUS, AND ITS MEANING TO US.
BY R. W. LIVINGSTONE. (Clarendon Press.)

A spirited defence of the teaching of classics as opposed to the idea of substituting modern languages. The author compares products of the Greek genius, such as Sappho or Homer, with representative moderns like the Brownings and Oscar Wilde. He lays especial stress on the fact that the great attention paid by the Greeks to the care and development of the body was never allowed to interfere with the cultivation of their intellectual powers. Hence, he argues that the Greek genius is not only a living force, but one that is singularly applicable to the conditions of modern life.

(D. Lefchure, Burnham, St. Aubyn's, Jersey.)

We specially commend the reviews sent in by E. Kathleen White (London, W.), James A. Richards (Tenby), R. G. Wyatt (Wimbledon), Miss Lewin Lane (Wolverhampton), Mary Kingdom (Mallaig), D. E. Grant (Smethwick), William F. Robinson (Cambridge), M. A. Newman (Badingham), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood), Lottie Hoskins (Moseley), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Annie Elack Higgins (Hoylake), Irene Pollock Lalonde (Bath), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn), Miss L. Mugford (Kent), C. Glasgow (Westbury), J. F. Hams (Cambridge), Miss E. Rippon (Hull), Miss J. Lewthwaite (Birkenhead), Miss Richey (Belfast), W. R. Dodds Fairbairn (Edinburgh), Maurice Frank (London, S.W.), V.—The PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Mr. Edward Ward, 112, Chichester Road, South Shields.

ANDREW LANG.

SOME PERSONAL IMPRESSIONS.

BY EDMUND GOSSE, C.B.

I NVITED to note down some of my recollections of Andrew Lang, I find myself suspended between the sudden blow of his death and the slow development of memory, now extending in unbroken friendship over thirty-five years. The magnitude and multitude of Lang's performances, public and private, during that considerable length of time almost paralyse expression; it is difficult to know where to begin or where to stop. Just as his written works are so extremely numerous as to make a pathway through them a formidable task in bibliography, no one book standing out predominant, so his character, intellectual and moral, was full of so many apparent inconsistencies, so many pitfalls for rash assertion, so many queer caprices of impulse, that in a whole volume of analysis, which would be tedious, one could scarcely do justice to them all. I will venture to put down, almost at haphazard, what I remember that seems to me to have been overlooked, or inexact, stated, by those who wrote, often very sympathetically, at the moment of his death, always premising that I speak rather of a Lang of from 1877 to 1890, when I saw him very frequently, than of a Lang whom younger people met chiefly in Scotland.

When he died, all the newspapers were loud in proclaiming his "versatility." But I am not sure that he was not the very opposite of versatile. I take "versatile" to mean changeable, fickle, constantly ready to alter direction with the weathercock. The great instance of versatility in literature is Ruskin, who adopted diametrically different views of the same subject at different times of his life, and defended them with equal ardour. To be versatile seems to be unsteady, variable. But Lang was through his long career singularly unaltered; he never changed his point of view; what he liked and admired as a youth he liked and admired as an elderly man. It is true that his interests and knowledge were vividly drawn along a surprisingly large number of channels, but while there was abundance there does not seem to me to have been versatility. If a huge body of water boils up from a crater, it may pour down a dozen paths outside, but these will always be the same; unless there is an earthquake, new cascades will not form nor old rivulets run dry. In some authors earthquakes do take place—as in Tolstoi, for instance, and in S. T. Coleridge—but nothing of this kind was ever manifest in Lang, who was extraordinarily multiform, yet in his varieties strictly consistent from Oxford to the grave. As this is not generally perceived, I will take the liberty of expanding my view of his intellectual development.

To a superficial observer in late life the genius of Andrew Lang had the characteristics which we are in the habit of identifying with precocity. Yet he had not been, as a writer, precocious in his youth. One slender volume of verses represents all that he published in book form before his thirty-fifth year. No doubt we shall learn in good time what he was doing before he flashed upon the world of journalism in all his panoply of graces, in 1876, at the close of his Merton fellowship. He was then, at all events, the finest finished product of his age, with the bright armour of Oxford burnished on his body to such a brilliance that humdrum eyes could hardly bear the radiance of it. Of the terms behind, of the fifteen years then dividing him from St.

Andrews, we know as yet but little; they were years of insatiable acquirement, incessant reading, and talking, and observing—gay preparation for a life to be devoted, as no other life in our time has been, to the stimulation of other people's observation and talk and reading. There was no cloistered virtue about the bright and petulant Merton don. He was already flouting and jesting, laughing with Ariosto in the sunshine, performing with a snap of his fingers tasks which might break the back of a pedant, and concealing under an affectation of carelessness a literary ambition which knew no definite bounds.

In those days, and when he appeared for the first time in London, the poet was paramount in him. Jowett is said to have predicted that he would be greatly famous in this line, but I know not what evidence Jowett had before him. Unless I am much mistaken, it was not until Lang left Balliol that his peculiar bent became obvious. Up to that time he had been a promiscuous browser upon books, much occupied, moreover, in the struggle with ancient Greek, and immersed in Aristotle and Homer. But in the early days of his settlement at Merton he began to concentrate his powers, and I think there were certain influences which were instant and far-reaching. Among them one was pre-eminent. When Andrew Lang came up from St. Andrews he had found Matthew Arnold occupying the ancient chair of Poetry at Oxford. He was a listener at some at least of the famous lectures which, in 1865, were collected as "Essays in Criticism"; while one of his latest experiences as a Balliol undergraduate was hearing Matthew Arnold lecture on the study of Celtic literature. His conscience was profoundly stirred by "Culture and Anarchy" (1869); his sense of prose-form largely determined by "Friendship's Garland" (1871). I have no hesitation in saying that the teaching and example of Matthew Arnold prevailed over all other Oxford influences upon the intellectual nature of Lang, while, although I think that his personal acquaintance with Arnold was very slight, yet in his social manner there was, in early days, not a little imitation of Arnold's aloofness and superfine delicacy of address. It was unconscious, of course, and nothing would have enraged Lang more than to have been accused of "imitating Uncle Matt."

Photo by Elbolt & Fry.

Mr. Andrew Lang.

The structure which his own individuality now began to build on the basis supplied by the learning of Oxford, and in particular by the study of the Greeks, and "dressed" by courses of Matthew Arnold, was from the first eclectic. Lang eschewed as completely what was not sympathetic to him as he assimilated what was attractive to him. Those who speak of his "versatility" should recollect what large tracts of the literature of the world, and even of England, existed outside the dimmest apprehension of Andrew Lang. It is, however, more useful to consider what he did apprehend; and there were two English books, published in his Oxford days, which permanently impressed him: one of these was "The Earthly Paradise," the other D. G. Rossetti's "Poems." In after years he tried to divest himself of the traces of these volumes, but he had fed upon their honey-dew and it had permeated his veins.

Not less important an element in the garnishing of a mind already prepared for it by academic and æsthetic studies was the absorption of the romantic part of French literature. Andrew Lang in this, as in everything else, was selective. He dipped into the wonderful lucky-bag of France wherever he saw the glitter of romance. Hence his approach, in the early seventies, was threefold: towards the mediæval lais and chansons, towards the sixteenth-century Pléiade, and towards the school of which Victor Hugo was the leader in the nineteenth century. For a long time Ronsard was Lang's poet of intensest predilection; and I think that his definite ambition was to be the Ronsard of modern England, introducing a new poetical dexterity founded on a revival of pure humanism. He had in those days—what he lost, or at least dispersed, in the weariness and growing melancholia of later years—a splendid belief in poetry as a part of the renown of England, as a heritage to be received in reverence from our fathers, and to be passed on, if possible, in a brighter flame. This honest and beautiful ambition to shine as one of the permanent benefactors to national verse, in the attitude so nobly sustained four hundred years ago by Du Bellay and Ronsard, was unquestionably felt by Andrew Lang through his bright intellectual April, and supported him from Oxford times until 1882, when he published "Helen of Troy." The cool reception of that epic by the principal judges of poetry caused him acute disappointment, and from that time forth he became less eager and less serious as a poet, more and more petulantly expending his wonderful gifts on fugitive subjects. And here again, when one comes to think of it, the old history repeated itself, since in "Helen of Troy" Lang simply suffered as Ronsard had done in the "Franciade." But the fact that 1882 was his year of crisis, and the tomb of his brightest ambition, must be recognised by everyone who closely followed his fortunes at that time.

Lang's habit of picking out of literature and of life the plums of romance, and these alone, comes to be, to the dazzled observer of his extraordinarily vivid intellectual career, the principal guiding line. This determination to dwell, to the exclusion of all other sides of any question, on its romantic side is alone enough to rebut the charge of versatility. Lang was in a sense encyclopædic; but the vast dictionary of his knowledge had blank pages, or pages pasted down, on which he would not, or could not, read what experience had printed. Absurd as it sounds, there was always something maidenly about his mind, and he glossed over ugly matters, sordid and dull conditions, so that they made no impression whatever upon him. He had a trick, which often exasperated his acquaintances, of declaring that he had "never heard" of things that everybody else was very well aware of. He had "never heard the name" of people he disliked, of books that he thought tiresome, of events that bored him; but, more than this, he used the formula for things and persons whom he did not wish to discuss. I remember meeting in the street a famous professor, who advanced with uplifted hands and greeted me with "What do you think Lang says now? That he has never heard of Pascal!" This merely signified that Lang, not interested (at all events for the moment) in Pascal, nor in the professor, thus closed at once all possibility of discussion.

It must not be forgotten that we have lived to see him, always wonderful indeed, and always passionately devoted to perfection and purity, but worn, tired, harassed by the unceasing struggle, the life-long slinging of sentences from that inexhaustible ink-pot. In one of the most perfect of his poems, "Natural Theology," Lang speaks of Cagn, the great hunter, who once was kind and good, but who was spoiled by fighting many things. Lang was never "spoiled," but he was injured; the surface of the radiant coin was rubbed by the vast and interminable handling of journalism. He was jaded by the toil of writing many things. Hence it is not possible but that those who knew him intimately in his later youth and early middle age should prefer to look back at those years when he was the freshest, the most exhilarating figure in living literature, when a star seemed to dance upon the crest of his already silvering hair. Baudelaire exclaimed of Théophile Gautier:

"Homme heureux ! homme digne d'envie ! il n'a jamais aimé que le Beau !" and of Andrew Lang in those brilliant days the same might have been said. As long as he had confidence in beauty he was safe and strong ; and much that, with all affection and all respect, one cannot deny was rasping and disappointing in his attitude to literature in his latest years, seems to have been due to a decreasing sense of confidence, of certitude, in the intellectual sources of beauty. It is dangerous, in the end it must be fatal, to sustain the entire structure of life and thought on the illusions of romance. But that was what Lang did ; he built his house upon the rainbow.

The charm of Andrew Lang's person and company was founded upon a certain lightness, an essential gentleness and elegance, which were relieved by a sharp touch ; just as a very dainty fruit may be preserved from mawkishness by something delicately acid in the rind of it. His nature was slightly inhuman : it was unwise to count upon its sympathy beyond a point which was very easily reached in social intercourse. If any single soul showed an inclination, in eighteenth-century phrase, to "repose on the bosom" of Lang, that support was immediately withdrawn, and the confiding one fell among thorns. Lang was like an Angora cat, whose gentleness, and soft fur, and general aspect of pure amenity, invite to caresses which are suddenly met by the outspread paw with claws awake. This uncertain and freakish humour was the embarrassment of his friends, who, however, were preserved from despair by the fact that no malice was meant and that the weapons were instantly sheathed again in velvet. Only, the instinct to give a sudden slap, half in play, half in fretful caprice, was incorrigible. No one among Lang's intimate friends but has suffered from this feline impulse, which did not spare even the serenity of Robert Louis Stevenson. But, tiresome as it sometimes was, this irritable humour seldom cost Lang a friend who was worth preserving.

His own swift spirit never brooded upon an offence, and could not conceive that anyone else should mind what he himself minded so little and forgot so soon. Impressions swept over him very rapidly, and injuries passed completely out of his memory. Indeed, all his emotions were too fleeting, and in this there was something fairy-like ; quick and keen and blithe as he was, he did not seem altogether like an ordinary mortal, nor could the appeal to gross human experience be made to him with much chance of success. This, doubtless, is why almost all imaginative literature which is founded upon the darker parts of life, all squalid and painful tragedy, all stories that "don't end well," all religious experiences, all that is not superficial and romantic, was irksome to him. He tried sometimes to reconcile his mind to the consideration of real life ; he concentrated his matchless powers on it ; but he always disliked it. He could persuade himself to be partly just to Ibsen or Hardy or Dostoevsky, but what he really enjoyed was Dumas pere, because that fertile romance-writer rose serene above the phenomena of actual human experience. We have seen more of this type in English literature than the Continental nations have in theirs, but we have seen no instance of its strength and weakness so eminent as Andrew Lang. He was the fairy in our midst, the wonder-working, incorporeal and tricky fay of letters, who paid for all his wonderful gifts and charms by being not quite a man of like passions with the rest of us. In some verses which he scribbled to R.L.S. and threw away, twenty years ago, he acknowledged this unearthly character, and, speaking of the depredations of his kin, he said :

"Faith, they might steal me, wi' ma will,
And, ken'd I ony Fairy hill,
I'd lay me down there, snod and still,
Their land to win ;
For, man, I've maistly had my fill
O' this world's din."

His wit had something disconcerting in its impishness. Its rapidity and sparkle were dazzling, but it was not quite human ; that is to say, it conceded too little to the exigencies of flesh and blood. If we can conceive a seraph being funny, it would be in the manner of Andrew Lang. Moreover, his wit usually danced over the surface of things, and rarely penetrated them. In verbal parry, in ironic misunderstanding, in breathless agility of topsyturvey movement, Lang was like one of Milton's "yellow-skirted fays," sporting with the helpless, moon-bewildered traveller. His wit often had a depressing, a humiliating effect, against which one's mind presently revolted. I recollect an instance which may be thought to be apposite : I was passing through a phase of enthusiasm for Emerson, whom Lang very characteristically detested, and I was so ill-advised as to show him the famous epigram called "Brahma." Lang read it with a snort of derision (it appeared to be new to him), and immediately he improvised this parody :

"If the wild bowler thinks he bowls,
Or if the batsman thinks he's bowled,
They know not, poor misguided souls,
They, too, shall perish unconsolated.
I am the batsman and the bat,
I am the bowler and the ball,
The umpire, the pavilion cat,
The roller, pitch, and stumps, and all."

This would make a pavilion cat laugh, and I felt that Emerson was done for. But when Lang had left me, and I was once more master of my mind, I reflected that the parody was but a parody, wonderful for its neatness and quickness, and for its seizure of what was awkward in the roll of Emerson's diction, but essentially superficial. However, what would wit be if it were profound ? I must leave it there, feeling that I have not explained why Lang's extraordinary drollery in conversation so often left on the memory a certain sensation of distress.

But this was not the characteristic of his humour at its best, as it was displayed throughout the happiest period of his written work. If, as seems possible, it is as an essayist that he will ultimately take his place in English literature, this element will continue to delight fresh generations of enchanted readers. I cannot imagine that the preface to his translation of "Theocritus," "Letters to Dead Authors," "In the Wrong Paradise," "Old Friends," and "Essays in Little," will ever lose their charm ; but future admirers will have to pick their way to them through a tangle of history and anthropology and mythology, where there may be left no perfume and no sweetness. I am impatient to see this vast mass of writing reduced to the limits of its author's delicate, true, but somewhat evasive and ephemeral genius. However, as far as the circumstances of his temperament permitted, Andrew Lang has left with us the memory of one of our most surprising contemporaries, a man of letters who laboured without cessation from boyhood to the grave, who pursued his ideal with indomitable activity and perseverance, and who was never betrayed except by the loftiness of his own endeavour. Lang's only misfortune was not to be completely in contact with life, and his work will survive exactly where he was most faithful to his innermost illusions.

New Books.

ANATOLE FRANCE.*

In this, the latest volume of Mr. Lane's edition of Anatole France's works, we are carried back to France of the latter years of Louis XIV., and we are introduced to two of the author's most celebrated characters, Elme Laurent Jacques Ménétrier, otherwise Jacques Tournebroche, and the Abbé Jérôme Coignard. Jacques is a youth who turns the spit in his father's cook-shop in the Rue Saint Jacques at the sign of the Reine Pédaque, and the Abbé is a learned but dissolute priest, who wanders in there one day for something to eat and gets himself installed as his tutor. Then comes Monsieur d'Astarac, the rich and mad astrologer, who carries them off to his house outside Paris, in order that they may work in his library. There are the usual adventures with pretty girls, and finally there is a flight from Paris, a pursuit, the violent death of poor Coignard, and the return to Paris of Jacques Tournebroche, who ends up as a bookseller at the Sign of the Image de Sainte Catherine.

Of course, this is hardly the merest epitome of the novel, but then there is nothing to be gained by trying to epitomise novels of Anatole France. For the story, as such, is relatively unimportant, and the whole charm and exquisite flavour of his books is in their atmosphere, their delicate perception of character, and their general air of irony and culture. At the Sign of the Reine Pédaque is no exception to this. The story, though it is certainly full of amusing and even exciting incidents, is, as it were, something almost apart from the characters. They seem to fall into it, and it has no real influence upon them except in so much as it gives them new ideas for conversation. They are not really influenced by their surroundings, as the figures in a Russian novel are, let us say, but they appear to be already formed and to be taking life as a matter of course. No doubt this is rather an exaggeration, but, in the main, it is the impression one gathers from reading a book such as At the Sign of the Reine Pédaque. It is the picturesque method developed intellectually. Probably, much of this arises from Anatole France's habit (as Mr. Locke mentions in his preface), of representing his own views in the guise of one of his characters. One can easily see how that would be apt to focus the interest of the book, and not only the interest but the reality, on the opinions its figures express, rather than on the adventures they encounter.

The Anatole France of this novel, if one may use the phrase, is most assuredly the Abbé Coignard. He it is whose ripe learning, wisdom, and geniality, spread a warm glow from cover to cover. He is also, by the way, a cheat, thief, and a licentious-minded drinker, but he carries everything off with such good grace that one does not seem to object at all. His love of learning is a genuine passion, and his work in the library of Monsieur d'Astarac deserved a better fate than that fire which consumed his manuscript at the same time as it consumed the unfortunate astrologer himself. This Monsieur d'Astarac is a very extraordinary creation. Although quite mad in his pursuit of salamanders, he is not without a certain astuteness that gives one an uneasy feeling that perhaps, he realized more of what was going on around him than he cared to acknowledge.

* "At the Sign of the Reine Pédaque." By Anatole France. Translated by Mrs. Wilfrid Jackson. With an Introduction by William J. Locke. 6s. (John Lane.)

For his conversation is almost entirely that sort of fatago of learned nonsense that used to pass muster amongst the old astrologers. He is of course, great on transmuting metals, reading the starry heavens, and crystal-gazing, and, like all madmen, he is made only more certain in his madness by each disappointment and failure. Perhaps the most thrilling moment in the book is, when his house is being burned down, the alchemist is seen running round the parapet, calling aloud, "I rise on the wings of the flame into the abode of divine life" before falling back into the blazing mass. Then there is Tournebroche, the ardent and unscrupulous lover, the eager scholar, the adventurous youth on the threshold of life; and there is Brother Ange, the "unworthy Capuchin," full of failings and very human; and there is the frail and beautiful Catherine, and the equally frail and still more beautiful Jael, and there is the uncertain and fiery-tempered Monsieur d'Anquetil, whose money wins Jael from Tournebroche; and there are others too numerous and too unimportant to mention particularly.

But anyone who knows anything about Anatole France, knows that it is in the dialogues his characters indulge in that you get the concentrated essence of the author. Into these he pours all his ironical and clear philosophy, his exposure of human folly, his wisdom and his wide familiarity with the classics and the Middle Ages. The best that a reviewer can do is to send the reader straight to the book.

All the same there is something that disappoints one about this novel. It seems to lack depth and it does not move one. There is little sign of "tragic conflict" in the hearts of the various characters, for indeed, it is obvious that they are incapable of much suffering. They are real in a sense, but their reality is on the surface. Like everything Anatole France writes the book is complete and brilliant but even so it is not difficult to realize its limitations. For true genius it cannot hold a candle to "Thais."

As regards the translation, this certainly appears to be a competent piece of work, though of course, one cannot help losing by having to read the book in English. It is impossible to convey the finish and beauty of Anatole France's style; and, without that, the bloom is gone. And the practice of putting explanatory notes at the foot of the text is one that should be avoided. One does not wish the book to lose its character of fiction. If a reader wants to know who all these obscure people are that are alluded to he should be left to find out for himself. After all, this is a novel and not a work of history.

RICHARD CURLE.

THE FOURTH GENERATION.*

What a full and interesting life has been Mrs. Ross's! And on what an overflowing treasury of memories has she not drawn to fill, again to overflowing, the four hundred pages of "The Fourth Generation"! A glance at the index whets the most jaded appetite; for, tumbling over each other, leap the names of Kinglake, Richard Doyle, Tom Taylor, Tennyson, Layard, George Meredith, Grote, Buckle, de Lesseps, Watts, Barthélemy St. Hilaire,

* "The Fourth Generation: Reminiscences by Janet Ross." (Author of "Three Generations of English Women," to which "The Fourth Generation" is the sequel) 12s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

Janet Ross.

By Lord Leighton.

From "The Fourth Generation," by Janet Ross (Constable).

Guizot, Mark Twain, Carlyle, John Addington Symonds—in a word, everybody of note in the Victorian era. In England, in Egypt, in Italy, she met all the people who were doing great things; all the people who were worth knowing, in the worlds of politics, of affairs, of letters, and of art; and she made them her friends (one dare hazard the compliment) by the charm and gaiety which still live here, in the record she has written at the hour of eventide.

To review "The Fourth Generation" is to review a lifetime—and that is impossible within reasonable limits. One can but say, by way of direction to readers avid of human talk, "Here is much pleasant matter! Read, and be refreshed!" And if that be not sufficient recommendation, one can but pick certain plums and offer them as samples of this delightful garden's fruit.

Who has not read "Evan Harrington?" Well—

"'Evan Harrington' (which was first called 'He Would be a Gentleman') was my novel, because Rose Jocelyn was myself. (Sir Frank and Lady Jocelyn were my father and mother, and Miss Current was Miss Louisa Courtenay, a very old friend of my parents, who often stayed with us at Esher). With the magnificent impertinence of sixteen I would interrupt Meredith, exclaiming: 'No, I should never have said it like that,' or 'I should not have done so.' A young Irish retriever, Peter, which I was breaking in and afterwards gave to little Arthur [Meredith's son], was immortalised in the pages of the novel at my request."

And that wonderful fairy-tale in "The Shaving of Shagpat:"

"He [Meredith] was at our house one day when M. de Haxthausen came, who impressed me deeply. Not because he was an interesting man who knew more about Russia and the East than most people, but because he had fought with the Queen of the Serpents, whose crown he wore in a little red silk bag that hung round his neck from a gold chain. With flashing eyes and vehement gestures he described how he fought with the Queen. . . . By dint of much persuasion M. de Haxthausen was induced to show his treasure, which was inside a small gold box in the red silk bag. It looked like a miniature crown fashioned out of dark amber, and a doctor who was present said, after careful examination, that it undoubtedly was a bony excrescence from a reptile, and probably from the head. . . . Meredith never took his eyes off M. de Haxthausen while he told his weird tale, and when next he brought me home he told me a marvellous story about the Queen of the Serpents, which he afterwards developed into Bhanavar the Beautiful."

To Mrs. Ross, as a young girl, Carlyle did not appear in a quite favourable light, for one day as they were riding in Rotten Row, "his wideawake blew off; a civil working-man picked it up and ran after us. Instead of giving him sixpence, or even twopence, Carlyle said: 'Thank ye, my man; ye can just say ye've picked up the hat of Thomas Carlyle.'" One imagines that the meanness was forgiven, but that the vanity is not yet pardoned. Nor is Tennyson's rudeness yet forgotten: "Janet, tie my shoe," he told her imperiously, and was reproved with "Tie your own shoe; Papa says men should wait on women, not women on men." Yet, woman-like, she did stoop and tie the muddy lace! The Poet did not appreciate the blunt reproof, for he afterwards told Sir Alexander Grant Duff that his daughter was a clever girl, but extremely badly brought up!

Mrs. Ross "got on" better with de Lesseps, with whom she visited the works of the Suez Canal. She notes the great engineer's marvellous faculty of sleeping at will. "Mon enfant, je vais dormir pendant dix minutes," and for ten minutes he would sleep, snoring loudly, to awake a giant refreshed. She rode races with Arab sheiks, she fraternised with fellahs, she penetrated into harems, she plucked the heart out of Egypt as much as any Westerner may, and—crowning glory!—she acted as Times correspondent. And then, Italy claimed her; and all who know anything of the literature on Italy that has appeared during the past twenty years know the honourable part she has played in familiarising home-dwellers with the glories of that debatable land.

Excellent in all its parts, "The Fourth Generation" is excellent as a whole. Coming from a quill that has been running for nigh on sixty years, it has as much brightness and gaiety, vividness and vivacity as one might demand from the freeliest flowing fountain-pen, fresh from the maker.

W. A. MACKENZIE.

WELSH POETRY.*

To English readers, at least to the generality, Welsh literature is rather an unknown quantity. Most of us know something of the "Mabinogion" in Lady Charlotte Guest's translation, but our knowledge of Welsh poetry is derived from such casual sources as Borrow's "Wild Wales" and Peacock's "Misfortunes of Elphin." The names of Aneurin, Taliessin, Dafydd ab Gwilym, Ceirop, Huw Morus, Pantycelyn and a few others are familiar; but our acquaintance with their works is of the scantiest. Yet a race so vocal as the Welsh must obviously have a lyric literature; and that there are poets among the Cymri is amply proven by such Welsh writers of English as Vaughan and Herbert. Mr. Graves, himself, a well-known poet, has essayed to remove this deficiency in our education.

Taking his selection as adequate and representative, as it apparently is, we get the impression that there have always been lyric poets of ability and charm among the Welsh, but that they have never produced a writer of transcendent genius. One great difference between them and their Irish kinsmen is observable. In Ireland the Catholic faith succeeded the pagan; saints and fairies took kindly to one another; with the result that we get both mystery and romance in Irish poetry. The Protestantism of the Welsh was less accommodating. After the pagan era, paganism disappears from their verse, and there is little of mysticism in Nonconformist hymnology.

The predominant characteristic of this poetry is its feeling for nature. Dafydd ab Gwilym, the famous fourteenth century poet, has been compared with Tennyson in this respect, and that the comparison is justified the lines entitled "My Burial" show:

* "Welsh Poetry, Old and New, in English Verse." By Alfred Perceval Graves. 2s. 6d. (Longmans.)

"When I die, oh, bury me
Within the free young wild wood;
Little birches, o'er me bent,
Lamenting as my child would!
Let my surplice-shroud be spun
Of sparkling summer clover;
While the great and stately trees
Their rich rood-screen hang over!
For my bier-cloth blossomed may Outlay on eight green willows!
Sea gulls white to bear my pall
Take flight from all the billows.
Summer's cloister be my church
Of soft leaf-searching whispers,
From whose mossed bench the nightingale
To all the vale chants vespers!
Mellow toned, the brake amid,
My organ hid be cuckoo!
Paters, seemly hours and psalm
Bird voices calm re-echo!
Mystic masses, sweet addresses,
Blackbird, be thou offering;
Till God his bard to Paradise
Uplift from sighs and suffering."

A close examination of these lines will suggest the difficulties with which Mr. Graves had to contend. Not only does Welsh poetry depend largely on alliteration for its effect, but it is as full of internal and double rhymes as Provençal. To reproduce its elaborate structure faithfully in English would be impossible, but Mr. Graves has a moderate and judicious use of these peculiarities has contrived to convey a very fair idea of the effect of the original. His book contains a study of metrical forms as well as some biographical notes and a very interesting introduction. No one, therefore, who desires some knowledge of Welsh literature, could do better than consult this volume.

Those who regard literature less for its own sake than as a symptom of national health, will naturally turn to the section concerned with contemporary writers. It is by no means the least interesting section. Here, the chief note is patriotism, and there must be plenty of life in a country which has such poets as Elvet Lewis and John Morris Jones to sing its praises. Of the latter, we quote the following lines, both for their own sake and as a good example of the translator's skill:

"With such delight my garden gleams
As only haunt a poet's dreams;
Not Eden's bowers could bosom
Such blossom, such sunny beams.

"There lilies, each a lance of light,
Guard my roses blush and white;
And strawberries in rich order
Round its border invite.

"Two wells it hath of halcyon hue,
Whose lovely glances look me through,
And set my spirit upwinging
And singing in the blue.

"Believest thou I cannot show
This garden that I treasure so?
Then gaze into thy mirror;
Am I in error or no?"

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

THE ANGLO-INDIANS.*

Nowadays, when so many women writers strangely keep to the points of view that the masculine genius has fixed over the field of literature, it is refreshing to come across an entirely feminine way of looking at life. Mrs. Perrin is delightfully and refreshingly feminine in her outlook. It is her especial charm. In her tales of modern India she opens up vistas unrevealed by the women novelists who follow rather too faithfully down the road through the jungle that Mr. Rudyard Kipling made for his own purpose. It is like hearing, after the Anglo-Indians have chatted over their adventures, the quiet, intimate, searching views of the cleverest of their wives. All that the men have done and are doing is thrown into a new perspective. They lose somewhat as individuals, but in return the real fabric of Anglo-Indian society—the home life of the race that governs a tropical continent it cannot colonise or permanently settle in—is shown in a clear and memorable manner.

* The Anglo-Indians. By Alice Perrin. 6s (Methuen & Co.)

A simple and pleasant love story constitutes the action of Mrs. Perrin's novel of "The Anglo-Indians." But the heroine is drawn in so lifelike and intimate a way that we followed the incidents of her courtship and marriage with a lively personal interest. Indeed, we did what readers of many novels now written by women are never given a chance of doing—we fell in love with her. Just a sweet, Miranda-like incarnation of girlish charm, touched with the romance of her exotic surroundings, she brings a note of poetry into a soberly vivid study of the homely side of Anglo-Indian society.

For Mrs. Perrin is a writer who keeps very close to the ordinary facts of life. Her novel turns on a matter of housekeeping. Fleetwood, the heroine's father, is an Anglo-Indian official of high rank able, hard-working, and delighting in the power he uses so well. He lives in a large, open-handed way, spending all his salary on a fine establishment, encouraged by his wife, who is also fond of entertaining. Of course, they have to keep house in a rather lordly way, for their position is lordly. But the same Oriental passion for display, that leads the poor Hindu native to mortgage his property in order to give a princely wedding feast, is working in the Anglo-Indians. So, when Fleetwood is pensioned off to England with no savings to buy a little country estate, the change from his noble way of life to a humble, little suburban villa "in the land of the semi-detached" is abrupt and tragical. In fact, Fleetwood pines and dies very quietly, like a dis-crowned, brooding and heart-broken king. And his daughter, who once moved like a fairy princess through the bright, thronged and spacious dominion over which her father ruled, enters a London typewriting office, trying to dull by work the remembrance of happy, far-off things.

It appears a simple, everyday theme, and Mrs. Perrin treats it simply, quietly and naturally. Yet so true and vivid is her way of portraying her characters, that the story is uncommonly striking and dramatic. And its interest is heightened by some brilliant passages of description, and some fine studies of native life and customs.

NAPOLEON III.*

The principal contention of Baron d'Ambès is that Napoleon III. was the son, not of Louis Bonaparte and Hortense, King and Queen of Holland, but of Hortense and Napoleon I. This is a rather dreadful hypothesis, and after going over all the Baron's evidence the reader will find that it is based upon nothing but gossip, scandal and the merest surmise. He adduces absolutely nothing of any weight till he has almost completed his case; then he says, in conclusion:

"I have read in the pages of La France Impériale in 1873 or 1874 the following letter which M. Sorlin stated he had copied from the Vatican Archives. It belongs to the epoch of the Italian insurrection, in which Hortense's two sons took part, and in which the elder met with his death."

This is the letter:

"HOLY FATHER,—My soul is overborne with grief, and I burned with indignation when I heard of the criminal attempt made by my son against your Holiness's authority. . . . The unhappy boy is dead; God have pity on him! . . . As for the other, who usurps my name, you are aware, Holy Father, that he, God be thanked, is nothing to me. I have the misfortune to have as wife a Messalina who, etc. . . ."

Are we permitted to question the genuineness of this document? Does the Baron quote it from memory? He does not even clearly remember the year in which he

* "Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III.: Personal Reminiscences of the Man and the Emperor." By the late Baron d'Ambès. Edited and translated by A. R. Allinson, M.A. Illustrated. Two Vols. 24s. net. (Stanley Paul.)

read it. Who is the M. Sorlin who is simply reported as having stated that he copied it from the Vatican archives? A letter of this nature should have been printed in facsimile, and vouched for in writing by a representative of the Pope. But were its authenticity positively established, this piece of evidence would bring us no nearer to the complicity of Napoleon in the affair. The Baron's whole contention, so far as the Emperor is concerned, rests as we have said entirely upon surmise. It contains nothing whatever of positive testimony. The case against Napoleon, therefore, fails through lack of all true evidence. It is always a pleasure to commend a translation by Mr. A. R. Allinson. He is one of our best French scholars, and perfectly at home in the idiom of his own language. He makes an English rendering read like an English book.

FLEEMING JENKIN.*

The "Memoir of Fleeming Jenkin," just published by Messrs. Longmans for the first time in separate form, is a book which, work of piety though it may be, testifying eloquently to the enduring influence which the Professor exercised over one of the most distinguished of his pupils, can scarcely be described as a literary achievement which adds anything considerable to the reputation of Robert Louis Stevenson. Written with all its author's consummate charm of style, it sets forth its subject with that blend of charity, honesty and humour which, as readers of Stevenson's "Letters" know, is to be found in all Robert Louis's judgments of character. Moreover the essential fair-mindedness of the biographer is revealed by a characteristic peculiarly un-Scottish, in a gallant yet patient exploration of character and of motive, done as it were currente calamo, before the reader's eyes. And yet the construction of the book is so naively faulty and unworkmanlike that one puts it down in dismay, surprised that a finished craftsman, writing the memoir of another craftsman equally scrupulous, should have succeeded in producing a work so invertebrate, so clumsily put together. More than a quarter of the volume is devoted to extracts from a series of letters which Jenkin sent to his wife between 1858 and 1873, when he was engaged on the business of helping to lay submarine electric cables, letters which in the main are quite uninteresting save to those who happen to have a technical knowledge of the subject dealt with. These letters constitute Chapter V., Chapter VI.—necessarily the most interesting portion of the memoir—is given up to Stevenson's account of his own personal knowledge and estimate of Jenkin the man. While of the sixteen pages in which the last ten years of Jenkin's life are dismissed the greater portion of the space is allotted to an account of the fatal illnesses and deaths of various members of the engineer's family. We wonder what Fleeming Jenkin would have said of his biographer's notion of biography! "Whatever a man can do or know," says Stevenson of his friend and tutor, "Fleeming longed to know and do also. . . . Nor was his the case of the mere literary smatterer, content if he but learn the names of things. In him, to do and to do well was even a dearer ambition than to know. Anything done well, any craft, dispatch, or finish, delighted and inspired him. . . . A nail ill-driven, a joint ill-fitted, a tracing clumsily done, anything to which a man had set his hand and not set it aptly, moved him to shame and anger." A man of myriad interests, fiercely energetic, ardently enthusiastic, disputatious to the point of acrimony, abounding, that is to say, over much in himself, though giving and taking blows manfully, tactless, highly serious, yet gifted with a certain sense of humour, a sense so Puritanical that it could not abide Voltaire and would most assuredly have spued out Anatole France, Fleeming Jenkin on his social side stands very fully revealed in the pages of the memoir, a likeable enough person when once you get to know him, though scarcely a clubbable man or a man of the world. Which makes it all the more regrettable that Stevenson, having made such a brilliant sketch of the lineaments of Jenkin's character, should have scamped so inexcusably the narration of the events and energies of his life, or should not have moulded the whole memoir in the form of one of the "Familiar Studies."

* "Memoir of Fleeming Jenkin." By R. L. Stevenson. (Longmans.)

THE DAUGHTERS OF LOUIS XV.*

Out of an important subject M. Casimir Strylenski has made a competent and readable book, which Mr. Metcalfe has well translated. How many English readers at this day are interested in Mesdames de France, the daughters of that sovereign who is chiefly remembered as the sultan of the Parc aux Cerfs? The ladies are principally known to us by Carlyle's versions of the nicknames bestowed on them—whether contemptuously or affectionately—by their father: "Rag," "Pig," "Snip," "Dud," etc. "Since the year 1875," remarks the author in his preface, "no comprehensive work has been published dealing with the daughters of Louis XV."—from which one might surmise that, even in France, their memory has passed into oblivion. M. Strylenski, however, has very diligently striven to revive it, and he really succeeds in a very passable degree. There were six of these daughters of Louis XV. and Marie Leszczyńska. The eldest, Louise-Elizabeth, who left Versailles at the age of twelve, and became Duchess of Parma, was scarcely known to her French contemporaries. We take it from M. Strylenski that she was the most intellectual of the family. Mme. Henriette died at twenty-five, "the incarnation of gentleness and self-sacrifice." Mme. Adelaide was celebrated for her pugnacious attitude towards Marie Antoinette in the days when the young Dauphine had a rather hard time of it to keep her footing at Court. There would be little of a kindly sort to say about Mme. Adelaide did one not remember the troublous closing years of her exile at Trieste. Mme. Victoire, whose fate was the same, cultivated friendship and gastronomy with equal

* "The Daughters of Louis XV." Translated from the French of Casimir Strylenski by Cranstoun Metcalfe. Portraits. 10s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

Fleeming Jenkin, F.R.S., LL.D.

[From a photo kindly lent by Mrs. Dew Smith.
From "Memoir of Fleeming Jenkin," by R. L. Stevenson (Longmans.)

By Fernand Gobbi

Madame Louise Elizabeth and Madame Henriette.

From "The Daughters of Louis XV." (Chapman & Hall.)

ardour, M. Stryński insists that she ought not to be remembered solely for her prowess as a trencher-woman. To Mme. Sophie it is manifestly impossible to pay decent tribute. "Insignificant she was born, and insignificant she remains to her dying day." Mme. Louise, the youngest of these Princesses, settled down as a nun at Saint-Denis. Carmelite hagiographers have devoted a whole literature to her memory, but their point of view is not precisely M. Casimir Stryński's.

THINGS IN GENERAL.*

Between them our three essayists discourse on a vast number of topics, new and old, and do it gracefully, and without tinge of bitterness.

What is so pleasant about Mr. Holbrook Jackson's work is its genial and illuminated commonsense. No bewildering paradox comes banging at the readers' intelligence when Mr. Jackson is holding forth on men and books. No pulpit style is affected, and there is no journalistic solemnity to make us ask, "Who the dickens, then, is this fellow that he should teach mankind its business?" Mr. Jackson doesn't mind in the least risking a truisim, or even a platitude if nothing else is handy. (Not that his writing is shipshod or his mind stagnant. The writing is singularly clear and straightforward, and the intellect plays freely.) But the really remarkable thing is that he discourses quite boldly and cheerfully on such folk as Walt Whitman, Thoreau, Richard Jefferies, William Morris, and George Meredith, and finds something fresh to say about them! And does it without any apparent effort! No doubt after reading Mr. Holbrook Jackson's essays what he says seems simple and obvious enough, and we wonder why it was not said before. But there it is, somehow it had not been said for all its obviousness. Leaving these particular folk, and John M. Synge, Max Beerbohm, Edgar Allan Poe, Edward Carpenter, Jo Davidson, the sculptor, and H. M. Hyndman,

* "All Manner of Folk: Interpretations and Studies." By Holbrook Jackson. 3s. 6d. net. (Grant Richards.)

"Life's Great Adventure." By Francis Stopford. 5s. net. (Duckworth.)

"Also and Perhaps." By Sir Francis Swettenham. 6s (John Lane.)

who go to make up the rest of Mr. Jackson's company of choice spirits, we are beguiled by talk about personality, and vagabonds, and the consideration of the self-sufficient. Our attention is called to the "exalted futility" of Edward Lear's nonsense poems, and we are bidden to stand and look at Whistler's "Arrangement in Grey and Black," and see in it "the epic portrait of a mother," and "the twilight of motherhood, with all its tragic sense of lonely accomplishment." Then we dive into Brownlow Street, off Holborn, and find the rare and notable Martin Brothers, and loiter in admiration of their pottery, and their joy in craftsmanship. Finally "Superman" comes in, and we are told something (and told quite sanely and wisely) of the Nietzschean ideal. Surely Mr. Holbrook Jackson has given us good measure, and enough matter for many a long summer day or winter night. To add to the value of the book there are portraits of Whistler, Synge, and Walt Whitman, by Mr. Joseph Simpson, R.B.A., Mr. J. B. Yeats, R.H.A., and Mr. Gordon Craig respectively; a caricature of Max Beerbohm, by Mr. Lovat Fraser, and a study for a Russian Dancer, by Mr. Jo Davidson.

We pass from the light-hearted ease of Mr. Jackson's manner, to a weightier style. For Mr. Francis Stopford writes with becoming gravity on "Life's Great Adventure," and now pudically and now pontifically has much to say on matters of importance. And he says it very well, too:

"Add five to the Psalmist's allotted span of life, divide the three score and fifteen into three periods of five and twenty years—and, broadly speaking, for the first period a man should live for himself and through himself, for the second, he must live partly through himself and partly through others, and for the last period he will live through others."

Thus Mr. Stopford. It isn't however, quite such an uncomplicated affair as all that, as Mr. Stopford goes on to explain. But he is loyal to the spirit of rebellion, finding in it, unexpectedly doubtless to many persons, a great mainstay of the British Empire:

"Every honest man is, and always has been, at heart a rebel. Though each generation does its best to crush this spirit out of youth, it is as well for the British Empire that success so far has been very partial. Rebellion has conquered the earth, enriched history with romance, given a stern pathos to many a landscape, and is daily painting in vivid colours human lives that would otherwise be of a grey sameness."

To this exhilarating doctrine Mr. Stopford himself, ventriloquist that he is, makes answer through the mouth of his lay figure, Epicurus:

"You may laud rebellion as you will, and depict its romance in the brightest colours, but the lamentable truth will not be hid that man has a genius for slavery. Strike off one set of fetters, and of his own accord he rivets on others. He delights in manacles, and glories if his own particular irons be of a newer pattern than his neighbours or give forth when shaken a clink in a different key. Slaves! We have always been slaves."

So the argument goes on, other topics—including death, gold, and the Thames are treated with due seriousness, and often with real literary charm.

If Sir Francis Swettenham does not give us so much philosophy he makes up for it by tales of far off life in Mauritius and Réunion, and in the Malay States. In a particularly interesting chapter on "Disbelief in the Unseen" there is an account from an Indian newspaper of the performances of a native juggler—an amazing exhibition, which included "the rope trick," and other horrors. Sir Francis tells us frankly that he has never seen this trick done "and never seen anyone else who had seen it," but still people go on asking about it, and so here it is all written down in black and white. "It is difficult to see what more the most sceptical can want, unless it were the name of the place where the deed was done." Sir Francis flavours his sketches with many reflections on life, and one of his "pieces of wisdom," may well be quoted:

"If you ever think of saying something, but before doing so ask yourself whether you should say it or not, never say it. If, however, your doubt is whether or not you should do something, always do it."

Occasionally the vintage is a little thin, but there is plenty of good stuff all the same in this eminently readable book.

JOSEPH CLAYTON.

BETWEEN TWO EXTREMES.*

"Between Two Thieves" is a book of wide horizons, of a wide outlook on history, and life and nations. The wars of the nineteenth century pass before our eyes; the habits of thought of Frenchmen are painted cleverly, knowingly, boldly, on a broad canvas; the early Victorian age in England is reproduced with much insight. A far-reaching acquaintance with the more picturesque sides of existence makes rich the colour of the prose; such expressions as "quench one's thirst at such bitter desert wells" are common. The author intensely appreciates nobility of character, saintliness of character, and carries the reader with her; the opening scene in particular is almost like a page from the "Dream of Gerontius."

And yet we question if "Richard Dehan"—if we must keep to the pseudonym—has kept up to the high level of the "Dop Doctor." She is too discursive, partly it may be from a real desire to right the wrongs of soldiers—in fact, there is no doubt as to the genuine ring of her pleading—partly, as it seems to us, from imitation, conscious or unconscious, of Victor Hugo's great epic novels. Occasionally we are reminded, by the long disquisitions on different topics put into the mouths of long-suffering characters and their still longer-suffering auditors, that tremendous encyclopædic novel "Cyril." And sometimes long narratives pour out of the mouths of schoolboys—French schoolboys, we admit—which would do credit to a Wagnerian opera.

Occasionally characters and situations remind us uncomfortably of great authors. We seem to hear echoes of the high-souled Marius's defiance of his dissipated grandfather in Victor Hugo's masterpiece. Thompson Jowitt, the iniquitous army contractor, with his bloated face and heavy tread, is Dickensian in life and death; especially in death. In one chapter Mrs. Weller and Stiggins revisit our memory; in another Moggy Geoghegan, the corporal's wife, recalls a very similar and equally delightful person who enlivens the Waterloo chapters of "Vanity Fair." In one important instance the appeal of our author to the past is unmistakably intentional; Ada Merling, with her home for governesses and her visits to the Institutions of Lutheran Deaconesses and the Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul, is a fairly close copy of Florence Nightingale. Observe the names. This is bad technique. The heroine inevitably loses much of her personality in the shade of her great exemplar. To do the author justice, she exhibits in one place a thorough knowledge of technique—when the sordid blusterings of the contractor who grabs at gold, no matter how got, are followed by the lofty and impassioned appeal of the young officer refusing to touch tainted gold even when it might relieve the necessities of a dear friend.

There is here and there a regrettable coarse touch, strikingly at variance with the exquisite beginning and end—the pure and sublime description of the old age and hate of the hero. The author's views on middle-aged love, her want of reticence in dealing with Josh's love affairs, and much of the Henriette episode, are only too redolent of the French stage.

W. A. F.

A NEW MORRIS.†

Mr. Drinkwater is a poet; and in this book he has created a new heavenly Morris and a new Earthly Paradise for the healthy discomfiture of commoner minds. Briefly, his conception of Morris—much the clearest-cut and most commanding yet presented—may be said to run like this: The "poetic upholsterer" was one of those lonely geniuses (Mr. Drinkwater ranks him equal with Æschylus, Michael Angelo, Milton and Dante) who are born with a piercing knowledge of the essentials of life and with the power of seeing this enduring framework, unerringly, beneath the veils and litter of temporary affairs. All his poetry is

* "Between Two Thieves." By Richard Dehan. 6s. (Heinemann.)

† "William Morris: A Critical Study." By John Drinkwater. 7s. 6d. net. (Martin Secker.)

a record of this vision, a "continuous manifestation of his reading of life," marked by a constantly increasing clarity and precision. All his parallel activities, his dyeing, his weaving, his craftsmanship generally, are so many marginal illustrations, the rule-of-thumb calculations he made, as he went on, in order to check and corroborate his vision and prove its practical validity. "His work was to show his age its errors on the one hand and on the other to announce its possibilities." "His message is one of the profoundest and most inspiring that it has been given to man to deliver. . . . None has ever announced so clearly the hope of life here upon earth" and none more clearly proved, "in the work of his own life," that "it was realisable on earth without any revolutionary excesses." The first statement of this vision is The Defence of Guenevere. If it differ from the statements which were to follow, it is mainly because of a slight vagueness and hesitancy, "an indistinctness of outline": otherwise its people are real people, its world is our own, it is a picture of the same impregnable framework of irreducible realities. In The Life and Death of Jason this first vagueness is overcome, the statement has "an increased poignancy" and "intensity of perception,"—"the shadows of Guenevere have become vibrant men and women." In The Earthly Paradise and Sigurd (one of "the masterpieces of which countless millions of men have created but a score or so between them") the record is set down yet more ringingly. The prose romances which followed are the saunterings he could permit his pen once he had got this world well and truly laid, with all its landscapes tested and explored. And, lastly, that ultimate outburst of socialism which seemed so strange to his friends was the perfectly logical conclusion, a last demonstration—simply an attempt to brush back the debris that concealed them and show us those very landscapes and that comely life actually innate all about us, merely waiting to be loved and lived.

That, I think, is as fair as such a summary can hope to be—and here, it is plain, we have at any rate a picture that is both royal and well-reasoned, that moves and mounts up, with a splendid cumulation, setting the onlooker desirably aglow. So fine is it indeed, and so fastidious, so salutary are its enthusiasms, and so warily have all its details been adjusted, that one feels a very real disinclination to tamper with it in any way at all. Never did we stand in such need as we do now of a really bold and wise defence of Morris. The limp ecstasies of some of his followers have been a little too much for us, have put us all vaguely out of temper with his name; and we need, above everything, someone to challenge and smash, once for all, the superstition that still represents him as a kind of soulful paper-hanger, a decorative dreamer of dreams. And Mr. Drinkwater is finely bent on doing just that: his insistence upon his man's immense muscularity, upon the hammering energy of "Sir Peter Harpdon's End," for instance, and the tremendous surge and crash of Sigurd, are noble battle-cries in an excellent good cause. But—there are dangers. Kindled by this new conception, readers may fling themselves upon their Jason, eager to enjoy the poignancy and "breathless swiftness" for which Mr. Drinkwater repeatedly praises it. And of course they will search for them in vain. They will try to find evidence of that "profoundest insight into the essential nature of humanity" and that "depth of understanding of the individual" which Mr. Drinkwater declares would have placed Morris among "the best of Fielding's successors" had he only cared to become a novelist; and of course they will be foiled again. They will strive to agree that "no poet ever had a more infallible instinct as to what was and what was not of the nature of poetry," and once more they will give up in despair. And their revulsion may be terrible to see.

So that perhaps it may not be such a bad thing, after all, to point out that although the new formula is a fine one it is not yet the quite perfect fit, and to suggest how it might be adapted before being put into use. The real root of the trouble, I feel, is simply the fact that Mr. Drinkwater approaches his subject as a writer of poetry rather than a reader. I know of course that "it is dangerous to differ in religion from the saints, in poetry from the poets"—but only when they let their revelations fall with a divine abandon. Mr. Drinkwater comes to Morris weighted with a larger loyalty. He is briefed for a new Defence of Poesie, and he makes Morris his chief witness against her old accusers. He knows that a great poet is the most practical of all men, his songs far stricter than any prose, and in the work of the man whom he calls "one of the greatest poets of any age" his mind is therefore dedicated in advance to discover a rigorously advancing purpose and the great sweep of an implacable design. He will find wisdom everywhere, and the marks of deliberate policy. The absence of high speculation is due to "a steady elimination of all that might confuse his presentation." The monotony of the metre is a sacrifice consciously made "in order to emphasise his singleness of aim." If Jason lacks jewelled lines it is because such trappings would have impeded "its swift movement"; and any complaints that it is languid are only confessions of our inability "to keep pace with its glorious and inexhaustible" zest. And finally, above all—pledged to prove that the books run successively, each a sequel sustaining and surpassing the last—he is bound to maintain that Guenivere is vaguer than Jason, that Jason is more piercing and intense, with passages of "unutterable poignancy and an intensity at once fierce and restrained."

Whereas the cold bare fact, as every reader knows too well, is almost exactly the reverse. Morris's books do not display a steady advance of power. On the contrary their scheme includes one of the most amazing right-angles in literature. Guenivere is one of the vividdest books in the language: its details stand out with the uncanny emphasis of fever: "intricate and delirious as scarlet lilies" was Pater's phrase for it. Jason, on the other hand, is as mild as a summer afternoon. It is just a delicious drowse of a book. It is probably the longest lullaby ever written. Guenivere shrills and pierces like this:

"Her voice was low at first, being full of tears,
But as it cleared it grew full, loud and shrill,
Growing a windy shriek in all men's ears,

"A ringing in their startled brains until
She said that Gauwane led, then her voice sunk,
And her great eyes began again to fill . . ."

with a merciless minuteness that stings the sight, drastic as a Beardsley grotesque. Jason, at a moment of crisis, in a passage chosen by Mr. Drinkwater himself, jogs along gently thus:

"Moreover, when with toil and pain at last
Unto the torrent's head they now had passed,
They sent forth swift Aetalides to see
What farther up the river there might be.
Who, going twenty leagues, another fall
Found with great cliffs on each side like a wall;
But 'twixt the two, another unbarred stream
Joined the main river; therefore did they deem,
When this they heard, that they perforce must try
This smoother branch; so somewhat heavily
Argo they launched again, and got them forth
Still onward toward the winter and the north."

They are as different as moonlight and daylight. It is a change of kind, not of degree. It is the most dramatic alteration in modern letters. One may enjoy Jason immensely—for its tempered daylight, for its placid flow of figures, the easeful lapping of its verse. But never for its "breathless speed." Beside the books that followed it, Guenivere is a sudden orchid in a garden of roses. It differs from the work which it precedes almost exactly as the piercing pictures of young Millais differed from the flattened stuff he gave us afterwards.

But though it looks so queer and disquieting at first, this recoil or transformation, if you examine it without prejudice, reveals a thoroughly human and not unexhilarating cause. When Morris wrote the first book his nerves were all on edge. He was young, he was in love, he was distracted by questions of duty: he had given up the Church to become an architect; had given up architecture to become a painter; suspected himself of a dark instability; was suffering superbly, in short, from the divine malady of youth; and the poetry he crushed out at this heat, writing always at close range, screwed up to top pitch, set as solid as jewels on the paper, like bits of enamel, and with enamel's fierce brilliance of colour. But when he wrote Jason (nine years later) all this tension had died down. His horizon had expanded, he was basking in the sun. He had married, become a tax-payer, settled down to his life-work and acquired a comfortable creed; he had built himself "the most beautiful house in England" plump in the middle of an orchard, and he was filling it with laughter and comeliness (You can prove the practicability of a good many theories on a private income of £600 a year.) He revelled and dyed and hammered and fished and worked looms and ran "the Firm" quite regardless; he laughed and grew plump. The energy that had been compressed into spurting poems before now spread abroad in a tide, and the very lassitude of Jason, its lowered pulse and alleged limpness, are thus really the direct result of his own lustiness. He loved the open air and the solid satisfactions of life too much to allow himself to be racked by nifty problems. Sitting in the midst of his guests he would write away happily, hundreds of lines at a stretch, filling in the odds and ends of the day, when nothing sturdier was doing. He never revised, he dropped his pen, often as not, in the middle of a line: like Scott (whom he probably resembled a good deal more closely than Æschylus) he "didn't care a curse for what he wrote." Mr. Drinkwater deals very sternly with certain abandoned creatures who have ventured to repeat the legend that Morris once denounced poetry as "mostly tommy-rot you know." But it has to be admitted that the tale was true and that it does supply us with a touch of character. Morris revered poetry of course, and loved it immensely; but he regarded its production as a splendid game—and he did not propose to take his pleasures gloomily. It is to be feared that the suggestion that he was performing a solemn social duty might have had discreditable consequences. He had the temper of a stormy child.

And that brings us to the other point, to the question of his "profound insight into the essential nature of humanity." Mr. Drinkwater surely forgot, when he spoke about him following Fielding, that Morris once did attempt a novel, and that the result was pretty much what might have been foreseen: "merely landscape and sentiment" was the opinion passed upon it by an excellent judge—Morris himself. For, actually, all theory apart, Morris's mind on these matters was always as simple as a child's: he was no psychologist, he was no philosopher, he was no profound remedial thinker—and the formula that best fits him, perhaps, is that of a gigantic child, a glorious infant, sitting on the nursery floor of the world, making wonderful designs with bright toys, with Kelmscotts and missals and coloured windows—and then suddenly storming at the keepers of the nursery because all the other children hadn't toys too; and his conception of life, at any rate, of its possibilities and needs and perfections, was certainly derived (and this is crucial) not from any study or knowledge of life in the rough, but out of other men's art. Walled about by his father's fortune, shut up with romances and missals and old tales, the mental kingdom he constructed in his exuberantly avid youth was a mosaic of scenes from Malory and faces from Memling and landscapes from Coleridge and Keats. This is not to deny its feasibility: made out of accumulated images, the massed essence of the visions of the world's dreamers, this view of life may very well correspond to some deep permanent ideal of the race. But it was not a personal vision, it was not the work of a seer, it was tested by no intimate knowledge or understanding of human nature; and Morris's ability to make his own life a copy of it is no test of its mortal efficacy. (Remember his nine hundred a year.) But as a living copy of old pictures, as a realisation of romance, as a projection of the colours of poetry upon the outer fabric of life if not as a revelation of its underlying framework, what a royal and majestic life that was! The sunlight that poured into Morris's life always passed first through the stained windows of eternal art, not his own ; but it turned all that it touched into a pageant, a blithe furnace of colours and great gestures, a shining spectacle that exalts the heart like a play. If Morris had made Jason really poignant and impassioned, that spectacle would have been weaker and paler. Is his choice to be regretted ? Who shall say ? Only, let us realise that he made it ; that he made Poetry serve him instead of serving Poetry ; for it is only when we do realise it that we can use with richest meaning the excellent words with which Mr. Drinkwater ends. "He added generously to the joy that we have in praising great men."

DIXON SCOTT.

SIMPLE SEVENTEEN.*

It is sweet in girls, simple in boys, this age at which keen hopes and sensibilities have a charming humour for some elders ; and, seeing that girls are then the wiser sex admittedly, I can imagine a delightful book like that of Mr. Phillpotts giving the same kind of ingenuous picture of a girl rather younger than Corkey major. It should be written by some such woman as the Aunt Augusta of this autobiography, who has found that "life from the angle of seventeen is so dreadfully funny seen from the angle of thirty-eight." The author must be able to laugh at herself kindly.

But this is such a wise and happy study of boyhood learning values so free of any self-consciousness, but expressing itself with candour so perfectly sincere, that one despairs of seeing the match of it either to-morrow or the day after. I am glad of the opportunity to say how much I admire it for my own part. Consider the snares about an author's feet when he sets out to gather and make up such a nosegay of humour for the market. There is the temptation to be, above all things, funny—the lure of farce. Funny books about boys are popular ; and why should not seventeen be as funny as eight, or ten, or twelve ? A little invention would make it so and please everybody. If that temptation be resisted, there is the subtle difficulty of making the boy's confession humorous unconsciously—keeping it entirely free of evident introspection—quite naïve. I do not know a more difficult art. He is to tell much more of the world than he seems to know of it ; the world is to be seen as it is through his unpractised eyes ; and the way he looks at it must show his character firmly. In this case we see what a boy learned of life, and how he adjusted himself in one year ; the wisdom is, of course, the authors' yet it appears to be no more than the boy would have acquired, and might have shown when the year was out ; and one knows him about as well as his brick of an aunt must have done. What is the value of such writing ? It is that of very acute and true observation at the age treated ; clear memories of people, and the just artistry that has supplied incident and expression for those memories. These are rare merits.

Mr. Corkey is a delightful young person, and quite normal—the sort of ardent, bright, good-natured and ambitious youngster who does very well at school, but has no precocious and belittling sense of proportion when he leaves it. For that matter, the Head at Merivale could have taught him none ; and I may say, in passing, that the picture of this prosy old schoolmaster is one of the most suggestive things in the book. Mr. Corkey was his best boy ; but, after twelve months in which to find his feet, Mr. Corkey's admiration of Dr. Dunston is qualified strangely. He feels "an overpowering wish not to see him again," as too many of us have felt about our school masters. Yet in the world of the Apollo Fire Office, the London Athletic Club, Mr. Montgomery Merridew's dramatic class, and the office of "Thespis," there are few antipathetic figures. It does not bore him. It interests him hugely, and he takes things as he finds them, being himself too full of life to be fretted. No doubt life is more surprising and intractable to such a boy than to some who would never have found favour with the Doctor ; but this only means that Mr. Corkey will go further than such others. He is the young hopeful. The book inspires us with a very friendly interest in his fortunes, so that we shall expect to be told whether he went on the stage or took to the pursuit of literature ; for it is simply incredible—though it may, alas, be true—that he became a sedate and worldly-wise head clerk in the office of the Apollo Fire Company.

The nice insight of Mr. Phillpotts' work is not more evident in the book's manner than in its many character sketches. They are not drawn sharply, for the boy has no idea that he was born to write, but they are very true and good-humoured. This is always a humane and excellent piece of craftsmanship, while lightly purposed.

KEIGHLEY SNOWDEN.

A CHILD'S VISIONS.*

It is difficult to speak of this book to any who have not seen it without seeming to use the language of exaggeration. Here are some fifty paintings and drawings done by a child who is still under thirteen, and they have rare qualities of mysticism, fancy, imagination, and in many of them there is an easy grace and beauty of execution that in one so young are nothing short of amazing. Most of her pictures handle sacred themes ; some may be reminiscent of famous paintings she has seen, but even these have a freshness, a careless, spontaneous, individual touch that make them her own. Glance at "The Laying Down from the Cross." There is an arched border from which a score of lightly, exquisitely sketched cherubs look down, and in the foreground lies the figure of the Christ, with St. Joseph and the three kneeling women grouped about it ; the sky and the landscape are touched in with a few delicate strokes that give the effect of distance and atmosphere perfectly. The scheme, the composition are quite masterly ; the attitudes are easy and natural ; the face of one of the women is curiously beautiful, and the whole thing is done with the most absolute simplicity and economy of line. Note how completely childlike in look and bearing are the children in "Suffer Little Children to Come Unto Me ;" the sweetness of expression, the feminine grace and charm of the Mother in "Holy Childhood" ; the sense of life and the free, large sweep of the wings in "Angels Adoring the Infant Christ" ; the utter abandonment of grief that is expressed in the lonely figure on the steep hillside in "The Remorse of Eve ;" the softness and clearness of colour effects and sensitive grace of form in "The First Easter Dawn."

"I have been careful to avoid the word 'genius,' in regard to her work," writes Mr. Lewis Hind, in his Introduction, "but no one can look at the range of illustrations in this book without a feeling of astonishment that they should have been produced by a child. . . . They show no sign of effort, because they were all done in joy without self-consciousness."

As Mr. Hind puts it : "Other children play seriously with dolls ; Daphne plays seriously with art. Before she was twelve she had made thousands of drawings. Why so much of her work should deal with sacred themes I cannot explain. That is her secret."

Children are naturally given to dreaming, and delight as keenly in the pleasures of the imagination as in any real toys, but Art has no record of a child of Daphne Allen's years who ever had so fine a gift for realising her dreams with the brush and pencil, and making them and their elusive spiritual significance so beautifully visible.

* "From the Angle of Seventeen." By Eden Phillpotts. 3s. 6d. net. (John Murray.)

* A Child's Visions. By Daphne Allen. 6s. net. (George Allen & Co.)

The Virgin and Child, and Angels adoring.

From "A Child's Visions," by Daphne Allen. (Geo. Allen & Co.)

Novel Notes.

'PAN'S GARDEN.' By Algernon Blackwood. 6s. (Macmillan & Co.)

To Mr. Algernon Blackwood Nature is a very living thing, and "Unanimate Nature" a phrase abhorrent. Every nook of a wood, every stretch of sea-shore or Alpine snow, every playground of the winds, is to him a temple of vital forces, unrecognised by the average plodding human, where mystery is wrought slowly, fatefully, and sometimes horribly. In "Pan's Garden" he describes, with a fine and compelling pen, the strange commerce of Hidden Powers and Man, their blindfolded and not always submissive toy for what were they but toys. Bittacy when the Trees called him, Errison when the Sea summoned him, Lady Statham when the Desert lured her, Hibbert when the Snow beckoned him to the peaks?—just as we all are toys of the Hidden Fear when we look behind us on a long empty road, peer into the hedge of a dark lane, or squint below the bed before retiring! Our instinct, last link with primal days, is, with us common folk, nearly always fearful; Mr. Blackwood, with finer trained perceptions, twists instinct into curiosity, understanding, or welcome comradeship. Medical sciences would give the name of monomaniac to most of the characters in this strange book, and we, living and having to live in a sophisticated world, well away from forest-haunts, lonely heights, and eerie places, must agree with the alienist. But that is no bar to our enjoyment of these remarkable stories considered as mere stories. Some of them are fine literature, as "The Sea-Fit" and "The Glamour of the Snow"; some, moving and poignant things, full of tenderness and unbidden tears, as "Clairvoyance" and "The Attic"; some, sheer poetry, as "The South Wind" and "The Golden Fly." What one may call the cataclysmic story of this arresting sequence of nature-mysteries is "The Destruction of Smith." Smith struck oil; about the well he made a town, to which he gave not only his name but his soul, the affection and devotion of a primitive nature—he lived for Smithville, he was Smithville. After many years he went journeying into the lone lands of the West, and there his town, his creature, came seeking him in its hour of peril; came in whirlwind and lurid cloud, to scream in scarlet flame upon the black disaster of night its bitter need. Smithville was burning. And Smith and Smith's companions saw the leaping horror against the dark, and heard the wild cries of the trapped citizens. Smith, being helpless, died with the dying fires of his town, the creator with his creature. An impossible story, yet so plausibly told, and with such subtle art, that we hold our breath and believe. But, indeed, all of Mr. Blackwood's stories are consummately plausible. He never forces the note, his language is restrained, where it had been so easy to rant, he never forgets the respect due to his art. To sum up in a word, "Pan's Garden" is a remarkable book, alike for its matter and for its almost unapproachable form.

THE DAUGHTER OF BRAMA. By J. A. R. Wylie. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

Miss Wylie certainly knows how to tell a good story, and, if only from this point of view, "The Daughter of Brama" is a notable piece of work. The main idea of the plot—that of the gradual vindication of a physically weak and presumably cowardly hero—may not, at first blush, impress the reader by its originality, but the author contrives so many minor entanglements, so much incident of an exciting nature, that one cannot but be impressed by her efforts to please. Yes, Miss Wylie's book has many dramatic moments. We would that the author possessed also the power adequately to realise her characters and her English atmosphere (though when writing of India she is uniformly effective), but with the former indubitably she misses fire, and of the latter—as exemplified by her treatment of a political election—she appears to possess only the most superficial of knowledge. Still, "The Daughter of Brama" is good, readable stuff, and never for a moment is it dull or in any way lacking in interest, while the figure of the heroine is pleasing and pathetic even when it is most incomprehensible.

PRIDE OF WAR. By Gustaf Janson. 6s. (Sidgwick and Jackson.)

War stories—for most of us the term conjures up a vision of gallant deeds and noble emotions, and writers in this field of literature have done their best to paint the battle field as a medium for fine feeling and praiseworthy action. Not so Herr Janson. In this strikingly clever series of stories dealing with the Turko-Italian War in Tripoli he dives home with biting irony the stark inhumanity and brute-beastliness that are the actualities of war. The author conveys in an amazingly vivid manner the sensations physical and mental of the individual soldier on the battle-field, and the whole book mirrors with startling brilliancy the methods and the madness of a shameful war, providing at the same time some very humane and sympathetic studies of Italians and Arabs alike. In the concluding sketch, "A Vision of the Future," Herr Janson outlines the devastating potentiality of the aeroplane in war, and dwells on the pride and satisfaction with which military officials view this new weapon of destruction. "Gentlemen," the general declares to his officers, after a survey of the death-dealing possibilities of a fleet of three hundred aeroplanes, "Gentlemen, I bare my head before the marvellous and unceasing progress of mankind." No one who has read this powerful book can talk lightly of war between civilised nations, or think of it as other than a barbarous monstrosity.

PRINCE AND PRIEST. By Beryl Symons. 6s. (Stanley Paul & Co.)

"Ha, ha, for the clash of the weapons, for the clang of the armour, for the thunder of horses' feet, the shout of a brave man's cry, the whirl of a sword, the rush, the meeting, the shock, the rip of steel six inches deep into a man's throat! oh, to fight and fight and again to fight!" So chants Count Bertrand of Crein, who, doughty knight that he is, has been commissioned by his friend, the lord of Gervaudan, to bring his bride, the fair Lady Rosamunde de Tracey, in safety to Toulouse—a task fraught with grave perils in the troublous France of the thirteenth century. The story is a vivid panorama of brave adventures, of fierce loves and hatreds, of primitive passions and savage times. The author has a gallant vocabulary, a poetic temperament, and a forceful style, well-fitted to her theme, and the book besides containing an excellent story teeming with action presents an illuminating study of the condition of the people of France and of their pastors and masters in those dark days when the monks exploited the superstitions of an ignorant age.

THE STORM-DOG. A ROMANCE OF CORNWALL. By Lilian Arnold. 6s. (John Long.)

In this story Mrs. Arnold presents two heroines, destined to encounter considerably more of the tragic than of the sweeter, and perhaps more normal, things of life. The first of the two, Nancy Denzel, full of glorious youth and loving the scent of the gorse and heather of the moors, allows Parson Rosvean to advance money on Lindel Cottage—the home of the Denzels—to liquidate the debts of her cousin Dick. When Dick presently goes away with his bride, Nancy realises that her heart is gone with the bride's husband. But Rosvean, one of the most repulsive parsons we have met in fiction, wants someone to "re-foot his half-hose," declares to the girl that no one but his wife shall undertake the task, and Nancy, unfortunately, does the "sensible thing," accepts him, and enters on a life of martyrdom. For seven years she endures the "smug respectable nastiness," the "eternal washing-day level" of the parson, and then one day (half way through the story) she resolves with Dick to bring an end to her life of misery and torture. The story is written with ability; it is a drama of real life set in a fitting and interesting environment.

AN ENGLISHMAN. By Mary L. Pendered. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

It is a commonplace lament of reviewers that in the rush and hurry of modern book-production so many good novels are swept away into the "remainder" market before they have had more than a momentary chance of recognition. Messrs. Mills & Boon have attempted the somewhat daring expedient of re-issuing at the original price, what they consider to be one of these neglected masterpieces. New writers may well consider that they are threatened by still another menace; and from the reader's point of view, we certainly hold that the reprint should be differentiated from the new book in point of price. At the same time we hasten to add that we gratefully acknowledge that we owe to this unusual business expedient our first acquaintance with a very delightful novel. Rather than be a poor relation of a family of high position, Maria Lovell went to Market Grazen as governess to Nancy Rolfe, the sister of the village grocer. But the village grocer was a tremendous fellow, in every sense of the word deserving the proud title of an Englishman. Amid all his petty surroundings he stands out as a man among men, and it is no wonder that Maria's ideas of social values undergo a violent transformation. The end of this story is, naturally, never in doubt, but Miss Pendered varies it and embroiders it with a skill that maintains the interest to the last. She is too good an artist to exaggerate the idyllic side of village life, the pettiness and scandalmongering of which are described with fine observation and humour. This is a novel we can recommend without reservation. It is patriotic; it is more than that, it is full of a genial optimism and humanity.

THE SWEETNESS OF LIFE. By Marcelle Tinayre. 6s. (Eveleigh Nash.)

"The typical adventure of Princess and tzigany, of Georges Sand and Pagello!" Thus one of the characters in "The Sweetness of Life" summarises, not inaptly, the story on which Madame Marcelle Tinayre has lavished wealth of psychological detail, and much of that keen sympathy which she possesses in common with most French women writers of to-day. Marie Aubespain is separated from an unfaithful husband, but, being a devout Catholic, puts aside all thought of divorce, and when love passes her way, denies him entrance to her heart. Isabelle van Coppenolle, a fuller-blooded nature, has a husband whom she does not love—and, when Love passes her way, she does not deny him: she takes the "Sweetness of Life" with both hands. Madame Tinayre does not ask which was right, which was wrong; she contents herself with telling the story and, being a writer of subtlety and charm, she tells it with that vigour and art which make even a moderately good French novel so much better than what are so often hailed as chefs d'œuvre on this side of the Channel. For all the attractiveness of its title, this story is not an altogether pleasant one; indeed, to the English palate, it is over-flavoured, and the after-taste suggests the bitterness rather than the sweetness of life. It is, however, a volume that ought not to be neglected by students of contemporary French literature.

BROKEN LADDERS. By Andrew Soutar. 6s. (Cassell.)

In "Broken Ladders," Mr. Andrew Soutar tells an unlikely story rather well. His heroine—a deity before whom the rest of the characters pale into comparative insignificance—is the daughter of a great railway magnate. But she has Socialistic leanings. So, when a strike brings the brilliant Malcolm Brasse to the front, Anna finds little difficulty in falling in love with him, and in marrying him against her parents' wishes. It is not twelve months ere she is disillusioned. To tell the truth, Brasse (how could he help it with such a name?) is none too honest. When large sums of money pass through his hands, a considerable percentage of them is in the habit of sticking to his fingers, and with this he speculates and loses. Anna does her best to save him, and even raises £3,000 on the delivery of the manuscript of her first play. But when her husband takes to drink, things rapidly come to a head—which is where we shall leave them. Mr. Soutar tells his story—which has the advantage of being fairly topical—in a capable manner, but it bears upon it several signs of haste. A little revision would have improved it very considerably. Still, even as it stands, it is interesting and thoroughly readable.

KNICKERBOCKER DAYS. By Harris Tweed. 3s. 6d. net. (John Ouseley.)

This is a story of the "pre-trouser days" of three small boys, but the experiences of "Jake, and Eric and myself," will awaken many memories of their own childhood and youth in the minds of most of us of the male gender. "I" am a very small person whose parents in India have abandoned me at a very early age to the care of a Scottish uncle and aunt; and the other two youngsters, both older than myself, are my cousins. And though it may not have been a happy thing to be going through all the incidents and events that happened to them, it is a happy and delightfully amusing thing to be reading about them. The uncle and aunt, he fussy, fidgety, self-important, she shrewd and homely, and with a notable tact in getting her own way, are cleverly pictured living persons that you like and laugh at, and the boys, with their miscellany of pets, their objection to lessons, to doing anything they do not want to do, and their aptitude for getting into all manner of mischief, are precisely what the average healthy boy always has been and always will be. "Knickerbocker Days" is just a little book of quaint humour and drollery, and for this and its sympathetic and joyous understanding of the boy-mind it deserves a place in the library of every child-lover not far from Kenneth Graham's "Golden Age."

Ready September 12th.

DOG LOVERS will revel in

THE Bow Wow Book

2s. 6d. net.

BY

COULSON KERNAHAN

With seven full page illustrations by

LAWSON WOOD & RAVEN HILL.

DOG LOVE

DOG LOYALTY

DOG LIMERICKS

Ready September 12th.

A remarkable Nature Book by a new writer

ON NATURE'S TRAIL

6s. net.

BY

FRANK ST. MARS

With six illustrations by Ernest Aris, and an introduction by Lt.-Col. Patterson, D.S.O., the author of "The Man Eaters of Tsavo."

The publishers believe that no book picturing in a similar way and with equal power and fascination the wild animal life of this country under the guise of fiction has yet been published.

JAMES NISBET & Co., Ltd., 22, Berners St., W.

NOW READY

6/-

Also Published in HODDER AND STOUGHTON'S FAMOUS COLONIAL LIBRARY.

Paper and Cloth Editions.

Mrs. Ames E. J. Benson

Author of
"Dodo", "The Angel of Pain",
"The Challoners", etc.

HODDER AND STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

THE SOUL OF THE DANCER. By Theodore Flatau. 6s. (Eveleigh Nash.)

We do not know any other novel by Mr. Flatau. But this story shows that he is in no sense an amateur, his style is everywhere careful without being laboured and perfectly fits the matter. The excitement of the story and our interest in the characters keeps our attention throughout, though the whole book is pitched on rather too high a note, and the characters though always alive, are somewhat idealised. The story opens in Cairo and gives much of the Eastern glamour. Ariha, the heroine, is an uncared for and cruelly treated child, a Greek boy named Kleon shares her life, and from the beginning is utterly devoted to her; she bullies and makes use of him, but unconsciously values his love. She has a fierce passionate nature, and has never been taught self-restraint, but also an instinctive goodness which makes her see and avoid evil. She soon learns to express herself in dancing, one day by chance she dances before Gaston who recognises at once her supreme genius, and gives up his life to train her for the stage, helped throughout by his friend, Marian, a true and ever-loving woman. The story of her training and her London triumph is the exciting part of the book, but almost at once a lover comes, rich and noble in birth and character, they marry, and she is almost happy in giving up her art and living entirely for him. He demands this sacrifice. Soon, however, he gets killed in an accident; for a time she wanders through the world as one deserted both by love and by art. Half by accident and half by design she goes back to Kleon, her childhood's friend, and at last finds that she really loves him, his long devotion is amply rewarded, and we feel that in this second marriage she will find a more complete fulfilment of her nature.

THE BIG FISH. By H. B. Marriott Watson. 6s. (Methuen)

"The Big Fish" is one of those jolly, swinging tales of adventure that Mr. Marriott Watson is wont to spring upon an appreciative world. It is entirely absorbing—the ideal book for a wet summer day. For ourselves, we care little that "it has a certain basis in fact," as the publishers tell us, the important thing is that the Big Fish is treasure—the lost treasure of the Incas of Peru. The hero gets upon its track quite accidentally, lighting upon its secret in one of those harbours of Romance, a London auction room. It introduces him to a gang of ruffians, one of the most desperate that fiction has ever given to the world, we feel sure, as well as to the very attractive lady who afterwards becomes his wife. Boys will revel in "The Big Fish," but it is every whit as suitable for their elders. It is, in a word, really a fine tale—one of the most enjoyable books that even Mr. Marriott Watson has ever written.

THE OAKUM PICKERS. By L. S. Gibson. 6s. (Methuen)

This book is depressing, more actually gloomy than if it were concerned with terrible tragedy. It has no hero, but tells the story of two women, the incidents of whose lives have added to their natural similarity of character, and their friendship, and taken from it any hint of heroism, this friendship gives them the only gleams of light in their monotonous grey lives. The atmosphere is Victorian in its unquestioning sentimentalism, its conventional morality, and its refusal to face facts. The author (probably "authoress") is honest enough to say that virtue often meets with no reward. The women are persistent and consistent goodness, but they have not sufficient faith to give a touch of heroism to their conduct. Through no fault of their own, they are both unhappily married, and to neither of them is there any possibility of getting back their domestic happiness. Each of them has given their whole love and soul to a man, who in both cases takes all, and makes no return. One of the men has understanding, and even a possibility of actual nobility, but he is not strong enough to wait patiently; the other is quite worthless, unable even to see goodness in others. One man driven almost to despair, is killed in an accident, and is so saved from any fatally false step; the other after much philandering marries, and we assume, lives in placid content. At the end of the book, the two women have still a large part of their lives before them, and determine to bury the past; their looking back must always be sad, but their consciences are clear, they have done what they could in devoted friendship, and in freedom to lead their own life it may be they will find happiness. The book is well-written, but the author lacks colour and variety in her work.

Photo by M. V. C.

H. B. Marriott Watson.

The Bookman's Table.

A LIFE OF EMANUEL SWEDENBORG. By George Trobridge. 2s. 6d. net. (F. Warne & Co.)

Mr. George Trobridge published in 1907 a little sixpenny volume entitled "Swedenborg: his life, teachings and influence." In this book, he tells us, forms the basis of the new philosophy. The advent of this greatly enlarged edition is a most timely one, what Mr. Trobridge believes to be the steadily increasing influence of Swedenborg; an influence which is destined to become greater as the years go by, and which is destined to bring for the truth he offers, and must in the end come to him." So far as the world is concerned, Swedenborg destroyed all hope of universal support and sympathy when he declared himself to be the Divinely chosen herald of a new dispensation, and that, as such, he was not only admitted to the society of angels and spirits, but directly instructed by the Lord in the doctrines of the New Church. Mr. Trobridge vehemently assails the judgment of the world and says that if "we bring our reason to bear upon his life and writings, we shall

SWIFT'S COMPELLING BOOKS

COLONIAL LIBRARY.

CLOTH ONLY.

DAUGHTERS OF ISHMAEL. By REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN. With a Preface by JOHN MASFIELD. [Eighth Edition.]

IN A GERMAN PENSION. By KATHERINE MANSFIELD. [Third Edition.]

LOVE IN MANITOBA. By A. WHARTON GILL. [Third Edition.]

AN EXCELLENT MYSTERY. By COUNTESS RUSSELL.

LADY ERMYNTRUDE AND THE PLUMBER.

By PERCY FENDALL.

THE REVOKE OF JEAN RAYMOND. By MAY FORD.

SOME NEIGHBOURS. By CHARLES GRANVILLE [Second Edition.]

A SUPERMAN IN BEING. By LITCHFIELD WOODS.

THE RACE OF CIRCUMSTANCE. By H. R. CAMPBELL.

THE DARKSOME MAIDS OF BAGLEERE.

By WILLIAM H. KERSEY.

THE CONSIDINE LUCK. By H. A. HINKSON.

SHADOWS OUT OF THE CROWD. By RICHARD CURLE.

THE CONFESSION OF A FOOL. By AUGUST STRINDBERG.

FOUR ESSAYS ON RELIGION. 2s. 6d. net. By RUDOLF EUCKEN. Translated by DR. TUDOR JONES.

AN INTRODUCTION TO METAPHYSICS. 2s. 6d. net. By HENRI BERGSON. Authorised Translation J. E. HULME.

BATTLE BOOKS by Hilaire Belloc.

Fcap. 8vo., Cloth. 1s. net.

BLENHEIM.

CRÉCY.

TOURCOING.

WATERLOO.

MALLPAQUET.

POITIERS.

LAND WAR IN IRELAND. 10s. 6d. net. By WILFRED SCAWEN BLUNT.

THE BOSBURY PEOPLE. By ARTHUR RANSOM.

THE RECTOR OF ST. JACOB'S. By SINCLAIR RUSTICANUS.

MOTLEY AND TINSEL. By JOHN K. PROTHERO.

THE WOMAN WITHOUT SIN. By PHARALI SMITH.

TO BE ISSUED IN THE AUTUMN.

BROKEN PITCHERS. By REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN.

THE NAKED SOUL. By LOUISE HELLGERS.

THE CLAY'S REVENGE. By HELEN GEORGE.

THE FORTUNE OF THE NOELS. By G. MILLS WITHAM.

VICTIMS. By E. KASLECK.

AN ENGLISH SUMMER. By L. M. SCHULTHEIS.

A THING APART. By MARGARET KILROY.

THE TENOR'S MELODRAMA. By MAUD ARNOLD.

THE AMAZING MAID. By DOROTHY SENIOR.

THE EURASIAN. By HENRY BRUCE.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS (ILLUSTRATED).

FORTY WINKS. 3s. 6d. net. By HAMISH HENDRY.

FLYLAND. Verses by H. P. BEGG. Illustrated by FRANK M. BARTON.

THE LITTLEST ONE. Verses by MARION ST. JOHN ADCOCK. Illustrated by WILLIAM HAMMOND.

ABOUT TABITHA ANN. By Miss ETHEL EVERETT.

GODMOTHER'S GARDEN. By NETTA LYRETT.

FULL LIST ON APPLICATION.

Stephen Swift & Co., Ltd., 16, King Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

BOOKS BY ETHEL TURNER

Price 3/6 Each.

ALSO PUBLISHED IN HODDER AND STOUGHTON'S
FAMOUS COLONIAL LIBRARY.

Miss Ethel Turner is deservedly one of the most popular of Australian novelists, and her books have charmed readers in all parts of the world. She has been hailed as "Miss Alcott's true successor," and in her work is to be found the same delicacy of touch and keen insight into character as in those of her predecessor in art. Added to these is a humorous and sympathetic outlook upon life, while at the same time the author never neglects a legitimate opportunity for the introduction of pathos or sentiment.

THE APPLE OF HAPPINESS

By ETHEL TURNER (Mrs. H. R. Curlewis).

Illustrated in Colour.

Paper and Cloth Editions.

FAIR INES

By ETHEL TURNER (Mrs. H. R. Curlewis).

Illustrated in Colour.

Paper and Cloth Editions.

PORTS AND HAPPY HAVENS

By ETHEL TURNER (Mrs. H. R. Curlewis).

Illustrated.

Cloth Editions only.

HODDER AND STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

surely be able to decide between the ravings or drivellings of insanity and the unfoldings of the Divine." But from the Day of Pentecost up till the time of recent religious "revivals" it has been found almost impossible to differentiate between inspiration and the attitude of an unbalanced mind. Mr. Trobridge devotes his last chapter to what he calls "Testimonies." They make interesting reading. For instance we are told that Carlyle was well acquainted with Swedenborg's writings, and that "Sartor Resartus" is "saturated" with his influence. The straightforward writing, the useful footnotes and the illustrations combine to make this volume a capable and interesting guide to the life and works of the great Swedish seer. There is no index.

ROYAL ROMANCES OF TO-DAY. By Kellog Durland. 12s. 6d. net. (Werner Laurie.)

The "life-stories" of the Queen of Spain, of the Empress of Russia and of the Queen of Italy, which are contained in "Royal Romances of To-Day," originally appeared, it seems, in the pages of an American magazine; and they betray evidences of their origin. Thus, Mr. Kellog Durland, their author, tells us that "in the afternoon the King of Spain does whatever chores may come up" and speaks of "the cunning little white flannel suit" which the Prince of Asturias wears. He also informs us that the prices charged at the hotels of Madrid "are paramount to the best hotels of London and Paris," and that both the Tsaritzza and Queen Elena dress badly and fail to hit it off with their respective mothers-in-law. Nor does Mr. Durland's information and his readiness to impart it stop here. By no means: he is out to speak his mind about the effete old monarchies of Yurrupe, and speak it he does. Thanks to him we know that Queen Elena has the reputation of being the stingiest queen in Europe, that the diminutive King Victor has his seat in the Royal carriage specially raised in order to seem to be on a level with his consort, that on the very evening of the day on which 5,000 Russian peasants were crushed to death in Petersburg, both Tsar and Tsaritzza thought it seemly to attend a ball at the French Embassy, and that, were the monarchy ever to be upset in Spain, King Alfonso would stand a good chance of being elected first President of the Republic. Finally, in the unlikely case of the fit reader not yet being attracted to these "royal romances," we can assure him that they enshrine a whole heap of seemingly authentic nursery gossip. In America, Mr. Durland's book was bound to sell; and so interested in the matter it deals with is a section of our own reading public that it ought to be almost equally popular over here.

THE NORSE KING'S BRIDAL. Translations from the Danish and Old Norse; with Original Ballads. By E. M. Smith-Dampier. 3s. 6d. (Melrose.)

In her preface Miss Smith-Dampier writes: "In these translations from the Danish I have adhered strictly to the metres of the original; this, however, is not the case from the Old Norse. The original ballads are not versifications of Northern legends, but, like those in my previous volume, so far as matter goes, pure inventions of my own." The two Old Norse legends come first, and in "The Waking of Augauthew" we find little to attract us; it is a grim tale, short, strangely incomplete. "The Lay of Thrym" is a far better story, better told; but it must lose quite half its value with those readers who are unacquainted with Norse mythology. As for these eight "translations"—in conception, matter, manner, and even in some of their unfinished endings they are Danish, Danish completely. It is plain to see that Miss Smith-Dampier has brought to her task a considerable amount of talent and affection for it. We wish that some of it were of a quotable kind; but each long piece must go entire. Of the other pieces, under the sub-title "Original," "Mors Janua Vita" is undoubtedly the best as a poem; while the "Ballad of the Turning Tide" easily takes first place as a story, the versification of which is a great advance on that of the translations. This is the story of the disastrous love of a mermaid or hafmand or maremind. All-in-all Miss Smith-Dampier has caught the Scandinavian manner and much of its atmosphere to a remarkable extent; and if she will but keep her lines more terse and pithy, in translations more particularly, we shall have much reason to thank her for going to that source to expend her talents.

IN PRAISE OF CAMBRIDGE: An Anthology in prose and verse. By Sidney Waterlow. 5s. net. (Constable.)

IN PRAISE OF EDINBURGH: An Anthology in prose and verse. By Rosaline Masson. 6s. net. (Constable.)

"Edinburgh," said the late Queen Victoria, writing, in 1842, to the King of the Belgians, "is an unique town in its way"; and we fear that the lovers of that noble city, noble even in its slums, will not have been satisfied. But a legion of writers have paid their tribute, and it would be monotonous if no faint praise were included—not but that the Queen desired to praise whole-heartedly. The less than faint praise of the friend of Mendelssohn comes very well after the extract from his fellow-traveller's letter. And in the Cambridge volume the same plan has been adopted—there is a sufficiency of hostile observations. We prefer the way in which this latter book is classified, according to subject; whereas Miss Masson has generally printed her quotations in their chronological order, and the book in consequence becomes rather more of an olla podrida. It would be interesting to know whether Cambridge or Edinburgh have more votaries, and which of these two books will appeal to the larger number of people. One supposes that with books of this sort it is not so much on women that the authors have their eye; few ladies seem to care for books which have resemblance to a dictionary. "It is an interesting work," said the lady to Johnson, "but very discursive." Nor are these books to be read continuously. They will charm those who already love their Cambridge and their Edinburgh, that is to say, the worthy lovers of this island, though it has been rumoured than an educational establishment in Oxfordshire has its adherents, and that when the erudite and playful Mr. Secombe, with Mr. Spencer Scott, compiled two volumes on that subject, he was not doing a work of supererogation. Whv Cambridge, nest of the poets, should have only one

The Tsaritzza.

From "Royal Romances of To-day." (Werner Laurie.)

:::
:::A Selection of RECENT BOOKS BY COLONIAL AUTHORS::: :::TRAVEL.
F. A. TALBOTThe New Garden of Canada

By Pack-horse and Canoe through Undeveloped British Columbia. With 48 Plates. 320 pages, large crown 8vo, cloth gilt net 7s. 6d.

"The book gives a capital account of a vast area of fertile soil which still remains for the White Man to bring under his plough."—Daily Telegraph. "... The story he unfolds makes capital reading, and every page grips the attention."—Fried.

EMILY FERGUSON ("Janey Canuck.")Janey Canuck in the West

A Volume of Impressions, presenting a Vivid Picture of Life in Canada. With Illustrations by R. G. MATTHEWS. Extra crown 8vo, cloth gilt 6s.

"Original, amusing, interesting, instructive, fresh and charming, the literary style is of a high order. The author is to be congratulated on the production of a book which, we venture to hope, will be more than merely an artistic success."—Irish Times.

Open Trails

With Colour Frontispiece by E. W. HASLEHUST, and Illustrations in the text by WARWICK REYNOLDS. Extra crown 8vo, cloth gilt 6s.

"... A book about the Canadian North West that sings."—Glasgow Herald. "Her 'Janey Canuck in the West' was one of the most delightful chatty books about Western Canadian life which have appeared in this country. 'Open Trails' is quite equally good. ... I advise everyone to get a copy forthwith. It is much too enjoyable to be missed, or waited for."—Standard of Empire.

Mrs. VIRNA SHEARDThe Man at Lone Lake

With 4 Half-tone Plates by WARWICK REYNOLDS. Extra crown 8vo, cloth gilt 6s.

A romance of the Wilds. A beautiful love story, starting at the outposts of civilisation, culminating in the silent places of the mighty Canadian North-West, and closing with the promise of happiness in an English home.

Cassell's New Illustrated Catalogue sent post free on receipt of post-card

CASSELL & COMPANY, Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, LONDON, E.C., New York, Toronto, and Melbourne.POLITICS.*DOUGLAS BLACKBURN and Capt. W. WAITHMAN CADDELL*Secret Service in South Africa

Demy 8vo, cloth gilt net 10s. 6d.

"... Mr. Blackburn and Captain Caddell succeed in throwing new light on many dark and unsavoury corners of the Transvaal. The book is well written. One useful feature is a chapter on the Jameson Raid from the Boer side which contains new facts for the future historian."—Daily Graphic.

JUVENILE NATURE STUDY.EDITH HOWES*The Sun's Babies

A Study of Nature at First Hand. Fully Illustrated with 4 charming Colour Illustrations by FRANK WATKINS net 3s. 6d.

Fairy Rings

With 4 Colour Illustrations by FRANK WATKINS. Cloth gilt. Ready in September. net 3s. 6d.

Rainbow Children

With 4 Colour Illustrations. Foolscap 4to, cloth gilt net 3s. 6d.

Lovers of "The Sun's Babies" and "Fairy Rings" will welcome the publication of "Rainbow Children," a work on the lines of the first named, and not less beautiful in its appeal to the imagination of youth.

FICTION.Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED*The Body of His Desire

With Colour Frontispiece by A. C. MICHAEL. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt 6s.

"It is the highest praise of Mrs. Praed's skill to say that she has sustained the interest of this weird romance to the very end, and that she has in an admirable degree realised Coleridge's classical definition of the successful treatment of the supernatural by compelling in us a willing suspension of disbelief."—Bookman.

THE OLD NEST

5/-

Mr. Hughes has touched a tender spot in many a heart by this story of an elderly mother and father left lonely in the home nest when the world and the pursuits of ambition and happiness have called their children away. How many fathers and mothers are there in this broad land of ours who sit silently and sadly in "the old nest" and long for the days when the young birds may fly home. But new interests, in new surroundings, have tempted the younger ones to try their own wings away, and, after all, youth is selfish and self-centred and unthinking. It is not enough to send costly gifts; it is not enough to win high honours, what those who have sacrificed and toiled need most is the touch of the hand and the pressure of lips "in affectionate greeting." "The Old Nest" is a wonderful little story; it will send many thoughts back to the old birds in "The Old Nest."

ALSO ISSUED IN HODDER & STOUGHTON'S
FAMOUS COLONIAL LIBRARY

HODDER & STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

RUPERT HUGHES

volume at 5s. net and Oxford should have two, is not quite clear; and yet Cambridge gave her poets to the world—they did not sing often to their old four walls—whereas the religious and political movements which have so largely preoccupied the Oxonians may have been more cabined and confined to that small cathedral city. We remember that when a merry gentleman was apprehended in the streets of Cambridge, for he was also destitute of cap and gown, the Proctor asked him for his name and college. He replied, after some parleying, and rendered thanks to God that he was not a member of the University—he was an Oxonian. "Thank God," quoth he. "Amen," said the Proctor. And I daresay the same story is told of a Cantab in the streets of Oxford. Nobody, however, will read these books without coming across the most delightful passages, and one cannot be sure but that the old friends will be the most welcome. Miss Masson flings a very wide net; she gives us, for example, a quotation from Ptolemy's Geography, which tells us exactly where four towns of the Vacomagi are situated, these being beneath the Caledonians on the map. And she gives us enough of interest to occupy us for a journey from London to Edinburgh, that is, if Scots ever do make this journey. We should like to read Mr. Waterlow while idling on the Banks in a canoe. What fascination in the very titles of his chapters!

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.

There is no reason in the world why the general reader should fight shy of The Depths of the Ocean (28s. net), for it is clear that the book has been compiled with a view to interesting him as well as the scientific expert. The recent voyage of the Norwegian steamer Michael Sars in the North Atlantic was, as this handsome volume proves, of the utmost importance in the comparatively new science of oceanography. The authors, Sir John Murray, K.C.B., F.R.S., and Dr. Johan Hjort, have had the assistance of Professors A. Appellöf and U. H. Gran and Dr. B. Helland-Hansen, who have contributed the chapters on the Invertebrate Bottom Fauna of the Norwegian Sea and North Atlantic, Pelagic Plant Life, and Physical Oceanography, respectively. The volume is elaborately and beautifully illustrated, containing four large maps, nine colour plates (which are particularly well done), and no fewer than 575 minor illustrations in the text. Lovers of the romance of science in particular will welcome the book.

The anonymous author of a handy book of reference—An Analysis of the System of Governments throughout the British Empire (5s.)—has done either too much or too little. If the introduction, in which he examines the effectiveness of the Imperial House of Commons, is absolutely vital to the purpose of the book, then surely he should have completed the picture by some description of the effectiveness of the Lower Houses in the self-governing Dominions. If, on the other hand, the introduction is not really vital, it might, if it cannot be omitted altogether, at least have been considerably compressed, and limited practically to explaining the tables which follow it. One other criticism must be made. On page 22 the writer says that Part II. of the Education Act, 1902, authorized County and Borough Councils to levy a rate for higher education up to 2d. in the £. This normal limitation is true of County Councils, but does not apply to Borough Councils. Apart from these points, however—one of which is a matter of opinion and the other, doubtless, a slip—the book appears to us adequately to fulfil its purpose. It is clearly arranged, and the salient features of the administrative systems of the different Dominions and Colonies have been carefully chosen.

MR. T. WERNER LAURIE.

However pleasant or unpleasant an aeroplane may be to the individual person as a mode of general transit or of spending a free afternoon, undoubtedly its most serious work in the twentieth century will be as a "warship." Messrs. Grahame-White and Harry Harper, in The Aeroplane in War (12s. 6d. net), are emphatic on the subject of the necessity of having a large number of aeroplanes for the British Army if the British Army is to have any chance at all of holding its own in any future war it may be engaged in. France has most certainly determined to be very well-prepared in this matter. For several years she has been ordering, planning, building these machines and training men to manage them. One well-known maker of aeroplanes reported in December, 1910, that he had received orders for military machines at the rate of thirty-five for the French Government as against one for the British Government. And while realizing that it is always the way of a Briton of a certain style to abuse his own country and expose its weak spots to every eye, we realize also that the aeroplane is not the whim of a moment; it is a machine which must in a war be used by both sides or by neither. "The Commander-in-Chief who has no proper air-corps in the next great war will be in a hopeless position. He will have lost a battle practically before it begins." The book's theories and policy are clearly stated; it faces difficulties and records facts; and it is aided and enhanced by many illustrations.

MESSRS. T. NELSON & SONS.

We would have every Briton read Mrs. George Kerr's wise book, The Path of Social Progress (2s. net), and learn by the bitter and the sweeter lessons of the past how, though it is terribly easy to make huge mistakes in trying to better our fellow-creatures, it is possible to do them and their country good and make them prosperous. Individual work, rather than a lavish expenditure of money, seems to be the kernel of the matter. In these pages we read with something like terror the accounts of past methods of trying to grapple with the problem of poverty, so nearly did they banish moral standards among the necessitous and bring the country to ruin. Mrs. Kerr describes in most clear and interesting style the work of that genius, Dr. Chalmers, who with a negligible amount of money in time banished poverty from his parishes and raised the characters of his parishioners. The hopelessness of pouring out money to cure poverty is heart-breaking; and if Mrs. Kerr's volume induces its readers to begin, each in his own neighbourhood, to put her practical advice to the test, England will be not only richer, but better and more self-respecting.

MESSRS. MURRAY & EVENDEN.

The Vicar's Secret, by C. E. Jeffery (2s. net), is an ingenious mystery story told in a breezy vein. The vicar is a man with a past; and his past is not unknown to the nurse who, by chance, is called in to attend his wife. The disappearance of the nurse, and the subsequent discovery of her dead body in a disused copper mine, are followed by the disclosure of the vicar's secret; and a string of damning clues lead to the arrest of the unhappy vicar on a charge of murder. It remains to be said that the reader will certainly not be disappointed with the sequel. Breezy, too, but in another sense, is the telling of Marooned in the South Seas, by F. L. Langdale (2s. 6d. net). The work of a retired naval lieutenant, it will delight not only boys, but all who relish a tale that frankly revels in the joy of adventure. From the day Master Denis Tremorne sets foot on the brig Susan Mainwaring, bound on a trading venture in the South Seas, life is one long procession of thrills: pirates, hidden treasure, tropical seas and coral reefs—all play a part in this absorbing yarn, which is not without its love scenes, the Fiji Islands providing a novel setting for fighting as well as love-making.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL & CO.

Mr. R. Murray Gilchrist is, of course, the authority upon the Peak District of Derbyshire, and he turns his special knowledge to excellent account in his new novel, the local colour of which is equal to anything he has ever done. And in other respects Damosel Croft (6s.) is an attractive book. The plot may not be wonderfully exciting, but it is at least capable of holding the reader's attention, the characters are pleasant and well-drawn; and the author's style is a pure delight. The book is, in fact, yet another of those readable, well-mannered books of which Mr. Gilchrist has already given us a respectable number.

MESSRS. METHUEN & CO.

Judith Lee (6s.) is a teacher of the deaf and dumb, and is able, by merely watching the lips, to know what people are saying. In her varied career she must have been placed in many embarrassing positions, and, owing to her peculiar "knack"—to use her own term—Judith was led into many extraordinary adventures. In this volume Mr. Richard Marsh recounts some of the thrilling episodes of her life, and, though the work is not of the author's best, the reader who has a fondness for excitement will find it here on every page. At the age of twelve or thirteen Judith went through an experience which would have frightened to death any ordinary little miss; but our heroine, though she loses her hair, which reached to her knees, and was possessed of a terrible rage in consequence, had the satisfaction of helping in the capture of a gang of cosmopolitan thieves who were wanted all over the world. Judith eventually becomes a great lady detective well-known to Scotland Yard. Of all her triumphs the greatest was, perhaps, the affair of "The Restaurant Napolitan," in which Alessandro of the Mafia, sought for by all the police of Europe, was run to earth. It is truly a book of thrills.

NEW FICTION.

TO-DAY

PERCY WHITE

"The story is among the best he has written"—Observer.
"An achievement of which not half a dozen English novelists are capable."—Athenaeum.

"One of the most entertaining stories he has ever written."—Referee.
"A vivid, modern book, brimming with interest."—Health and Home.
"A brilliant novel."—Yorkshire Post.

THE NARROW ESCAPE OF LADY HARDWELL

FRANKFORT MOORE

"A master of brilliant and witty dialogue . . . a sayer of smart things . . . a cunning weaver of plots; a writer mostly in light-comedy mood . . . that is what he reveals himself to be in 'The Narrow Escape of Lady Hardwell.'"—Pall Mall Gazette.

ROSE OF THE GARDEN

KATHARINE TYNAN

"I have greatly enjoyed reading this charming story."—Punch.
"The story will be widely read."—Scotsman.

THE PANEL

FORD MADDOX HUEFFER

"A most entertaining book."—Observer. "Excellent."—Daily Express.
"Exceedingly clever, vivacious, and amusing."—Aberdeen Free Press.

LOST FARM CAMP

HENRY H. KNIBBS

"There is always room for novels like this—good, healthy, exciting fiction."—Daily News.

THE RED VINTAGE

JOSEPH SHARTS

"There are real character studies in this book, and the story goes from beginning to end with unflagging energy."—T.P.'s Weekly.
"A good yarn, admirably spun."—Saturday Review.
"A fine achievement."—Glasgow Herald.
"Brisk, vigorous, animated throughout."—Scotsman.

THE CITY OF LIGHT (5th Impression)

W. L. GEORGE

EVE (2nd Impression)

MAARTEN MAARTENS

JESSIE BAZLEY

BERNARD CAPES

A HOOSIER CHRONICLE

MEREDITH NICHOLSON

EVE'S SECOND HUSBAND

CORRA HARRIS

CONSTABLE & CO., LTD.

LONDON, W.C.

Why not own a bookcase that will accommodate all the books you possess to-day and all the books you will have in the future? Why not own one that can be built up in sections and moved from room to room or house to house in sections without disturbing the internal arrangement? Why not own one that can be adapted to suit the style of any room?—in short, why not own a

Globe-Wernicke

'Elastic' Bookcase?

This is the bookcase that is "always complete but never finished." You can read all about its many advantages over ordinary bookcases in the free booklet (No. 18B) which we send to any address on application.

PACKING FREE. Orders of 1/2 CARRIAGE PAID to any Goods Stations in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

OFFICE & LIBRARY FURNISHERS,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.; 82, Victoria St., S.W.; 98, Bishopsgate, E.C.

Chatto & Windus's New 6s. Novels

Ready and in the press.

LARKMEADOW

By MARMADUKE PICKTHALL, Author of "Said the Fisherman," etc.

CHEADLE & SON

By A. HAMILTON GIBBS, Author of "The Compleat Oxford Man."

A DAUGHTER OF THE MORNING

By HUGH DE SÉLINCOURT, Author of "A Boy's Marriage," etc.

THE OUTCASTE

By F. E. PENNY, Author of "The Rajah," etc.

FAUSTULA

By JOHN AYSCOUGH, Author of "Marotz," "Hurdcott," etc.

THREE WOMEN

By NETTA SYRETT, Author of "Drender's Daughter," etc.

PANSY MEARS

By HORACE W. C. NEWTE, Author of "Sparrows," etc.

LONDON: CHATTO & WINDUS, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

THE two parts that determine the efficiency of a Fountain Pen are the Ink Feed and the iridium-tipped Gold Nib. If the feed be wrong the Pen can never give complete satisfaction. It will be a time-waster rather than a time-saver, a trouble-maker rather than a pleasure-giver. In Waterman's Ideal you get the Spoon Feed that has made this Fountain Pen world famous—see illustration above (greatly enlarged). You get a perfect feed and a perfect pen, a feed so simple that it cannot go wrong, a pen of such high excellence that it will endure for years without renewal. That is why the busy man of affairs chooses a Waterman's Ideal. That is why the man who has had experience of Fountain Pens invariably selects Waterman's Ideals when making Pen-gifts to his best friends. And that is why the sales of Waterman's Ideal exceed a million per annum.

Waterman's
(Ideal)
Fountain Pen

Prices of Regular and Self-filling Styles, 10/6, 15/., and upwards. Of Safety and Pump-filling Styles, 12/6 and upwards. (With Clip Cap 1/- extra.) In Silver and Gold for Presentation. Of Stationers, Jewellers, &c. Booklet free from L. & C. HARDMUTH, Ltd., Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway, London.
(New York: 173, Broadway. Paris: 6, Rue de Hanovre. Brussels: 14, Rue Pont Neuf. Vienna, Milan, Dresden, Zurich.)

COLONIAL BOOK-LOVERS, READING ROOMS, INSTITUTES & CLUBS

should get their BOOKS and PERIODICALS direct from London, saving time and expense. ALFRED WILSON'S Export Book business has been steadily growing for the past 20 years and more, and is carefully organized for the exact and prompt execution of the largest—or the smallest—orders.

Postal Vans call regularly for our mail-bags.

Colonial Editions sent direct by post or in cases, immediately on publication, at specially low prices. Terms on application.

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there, thus saving postage.

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp. of Standard Literature. (Out of print till December.)
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 Titles of Publishers' Remainders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices. (Out of print till October.)
3. Colonial Librarian's Handbook for 1913, indispensable to Librarians outside Europe, with complete list of Colonial Editions, etc., etc. (Ready in October.)
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for abroad for 1500 British Periodicals, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals.

ESTABLISHED
1851.

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

18-19 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone : 7463 Central.

Bankers : London County & Westminster (Lombard Street).

WARD, LOCK & CO.'s SIX-SHILLING FICTION.

ON SALE EVERYWHERE.

THOSE OTHER DAYS. E. Phillips Oppenheim.

"Where he is handling mysteries Mr. Oppenheim is unsurpassed, and he certainly has the knack of handling the commonplace in a fresh and interesting manner."
—The Scotsman.

SELMIN OF SELMINGFOLD.

Bertram Mitford.

Quite as strenuous and exciting as anything Mr. Mitford has written. A most readable and engrossing book.

THE ROSE OF LIFE. Effie A. Rowlands.

"A pleasant sentimental story with complications that excite a lively interest in the cleverly-handled plot. A tale attractive by reason of its sympathetic delineation of female character. The book cannot but please any reader who likes a simple, healthy love story."—The Scotsman.

THE MISSING MISS RANDOLPH.

Marie C. Leighton.

"Miss Leighton has evolved a novel of much power and interest, full of absorbing episodes, which never reach the realm of impossible."—Cork Examiner.

LADY DOROTHY'S INDISCRETION.

Arthur Applin.

"Will be followed by the reader with breathless interest, for Mr. Applin is well skilled in all the arts of the sensational novelist."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE SECRET OF THE SANDS.

Fred M. White.

"The intrigues and complications narrated are evolved from a plot that may fairly be described as one of the most ingenious that Mr. White has ever presented to us."—Financial Times.

HIS LITTLE GIRL. L. G. Moberly.

"The reader's interest is never allowed to flag, and the author deserves thanks for providing us with a very charming romance."—Irish Independent.

THE SECRET MARRIAGE. A. Wilson Barrett.

Those who like good detective tales of sound, robust sort, full of enthralling interest and excitement, dramatic situations, &c., will revel in this.

MIRABEL'S ISLAND. Louis Tracy.

A delightfully fascinating and exciting romance of love and adventure—comparable to its author's famous success, "Rainbow Island."

WARD, LOCK & CO., Ltd., Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 253. VOL. XLIII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

OCTOBER, 1912.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES 1-8	Two Views of the Kaiser .. 53	NOVEL NOTES—
An Apology for Rebecca. By KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN .. 9	Paris, Old and New .. 54	Valserine—Honours Easy—
THE BOOKMAN GALLERY—	Fires 54	The Sins of the Father—
Ian Hay 10	Italian Travel Sketches .. 55	To-Day—Yonder—The Rat-
Norman Angell 12	Tripoli and her Troubles .. 56	Trap—The Bride's Breviary
THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 14	The New Country Life. By M. H. H. MACARTNEY .. 56	- Sally—Those Other Days
THE READER—	Adam Lindsay Gordon .. 57	—An American Girl at the
The Triumph of Whistler. By JOSEPH PENNELL .. 19	Shadows out of the Crowd. By EDWARD THOMAS .. 57	Durbar—A Plain Woman's
Whistler. By G. S. LAYARD 30	Two Dramatists. By DAR- RELL FIGGIS .. 58	Portrait—The House of For-
The Majority of "THE BOOK- MAN." By Sir W. ROBERT- SON NICOLL, I.L.D. ... 42	London and Londoners .. 59	tune—The Unknown Quan-
PRIZE COMPETITIONS .. 34	A Remarkable First Book. By COULSON KERNAHAN .. 60	ntity—The Story of Joan
NEW BOOKS—	Recent Poetry .. 60	Greencroft—Ohvia Mary—
Marriage. By RICHARD CURLE 44	Sidelights. By D. S. MEL- DRUM 61	The Golden Venture—One
Andrew Lang's "History of English Literature." By F. G. BETTANY .. 44	The Early Naturalists. By RICHARD CURLE .. 62	of Marlborough's Captains—
Dean Swift's Correspondence. By Y. Y. 47	Poems of Love and Earth. By FRANCIS BICKLEY .. 65	The Man at Lone Lake—
A Fine Ode. By W. A. MACKENZIE 51	Notes on the Victorians .. 65	The Adventures of Napoleon
The Red Hand of Ulster. By SHAN F. BULLOCK .. 52	Fata Morgana 66	Prince—The Irresistible Miss
	Books, Authors and Things. By A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK .. 66	Ferrers—The Girl from the
	A French Boswell .. 67	East—The Keynote—The
	A Literary Episode .. 68	Marriage of Kettle—Windy-
	Two Notable Novels .. 68	ridge 72-80
	Haphazard Literary History. By G. H. MAIR .. 69	THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—
	Autobiographiction. By WAL- TER JERROLD .. 70	Hindle Wakes—Cameos of Indian Crime—Tannhäuser —Memorials of Old Nottinghamshire—Godoy—Cæsar
		Borgia—Charles Dickens—
		The Bow-Wow Book .. 80-84
		NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 84

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the
Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK
SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The November BOOKMAN will be a special Conan Doyle Number. With the present issue THE BOOKMAN attains its majority and enters on the twenty-second year of its existence. It is an event upon which we shall be forgiven for congratulating ourselves a little, and an article by Sir William Robertson Nicoll dealing with the founding of the magazine and some of the chief of its early contributors appears on another page.

For much assistance with the Whistler illustrations in this Number, we are specially indebted to Mr. W. Heinemann, who kindly placed several of the portraits and prints in his collection at our service; to M. Paul Helleu for permitting us to reproduce his fine etching of Whistler; to M. Dornac for permission to reproduce his portrait of Whistler in his studio; to Mr. Thomas Way, Mr. John Lane, Mrs. E. R. Pennell, and others to whom due acknowledgment is made elsewhere.

"Ape's" drawing of Whistler, which we reproduce by permission on our cover, has been one of the most popular of the famous Vanity Fair cartoons, and we understand that very few copies of it now remain for disposal.

Among our illustrations is Whistler's etching of St. James's Street, which is also reproduced by permission of the proprietors of Vanity Fair. He has caught wonderfully in it "the sun and swagger of the street as it appears on a fine June afternoon." "Mr. Whistler has been installed during the last week," it was said in Vanity Fair when the plate was presented to its readers, "on the terrace of the Albemarle Hotel, looking down St. James's Street, and there has been achieved what is perhaps the most admirable plate he has ever produced, embracing the whole length of the street with the palace at the foot and a glimpse of the Surrey hills beyond."

The £5 5s. net and £2 2s. net limited editions of "The Collected Verse of Rudyard Kipling," which Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton will publish shortly, were fully subscribed a few days after the first preliminary announcement was made. The first large edition at 20s. net is also already exhausted.

Mr. John Drinkwater, whose new volume of poems we review elsewhere, is writing for Messrs. Dent a book on Swinburne, and has just completed a long introduction for the library edition of the work of St. John Hankin that is to be published by Mr. Martin Secker. He has written also an introduction for the edition of Gray that has just been added to the "Everyman's Library" series.

One of the notable books promised for the autumn is the authoritative biography of Lord Wolverhampton (better known as Sir Henry Fowler), by his daughter, the Hon. Mrs. Hamilton, which is to be published by Messrs. Hutchinson.

A novel based on the notorious Venetian trial of Marie Tarnowska is at present appearing serially in France and Italy, and is arousing something of a sensation in both countries. It is written by that polyglot writer Annie Vivanti, who writes all her novels in three languages and is now preparing an English version of the story which is to be published by Mr. Heinemann.

Mr. Joseph Shaylor has been prominently concerned with the selling of books for over fifty years past, and he has written and compiled several that have an honoured place on the shelves of the book-lover. He has lately completed another, "The Fascination of Books," that Messrs. Simpkin, Marshall have just published. It appeals both to the bookseller and to the general reader who is interested in things literary, and contains essays on "The Use and Abuse of Titles," "The Evolution of the Bookseller," "Book Distributing," and incidentally forms an interesting and permanent record of the Book-selling trade.

We congratulate Mr. G. H. Putnam, the head of Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, on the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters that has been conferred upon him by the Columbia University of New York.

Photo by W. E. Gray, Baywater.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Pennell.

Authors of The Life of Whistler (Heinemann).

Some reviewers in praising "George Wendern Gave a Party," that was recently published by Messrs. Blackwood, said the story was fascinating but highly improbable. It seems, however, that the tale was suggested to the author by an actual party of the same sort that was given long ago by a certain American banker now well known in England. The book is already in its second edition over here, and is having an extraordinary success in America.

Messrs. David Nutt have in the press a volume by Mr. Reginald R. Buckley entitled "St. Francis: A Troubadour of the Spirit." It contains an essay on the Franciscan ideal and a poem portraying St. Francis as the Zarathustra of the Christian world. Mr. Buckley, who is the son of a Manchester cotton spinner and manufacturer, began his career as a bank clerk, and in due course became an Associate of the Institute of Bankers. Later, however, he came to London as secretary of the publishing house of Messrs. J. M. Dent & Son. For the last two years he has been on the staff of T.P.'s Weekly, and has done a good deal of writing

Richard Dehan
(Miss Clo Graves),

whose new novel, "Between Two Thieves" (Hennemann), was reviewed in last month's Bookman.

on music, the drama and social topics for many of the newspapers and magazines.

Mr. Robert Halifax, who has made steady progress into popular favour as a novelist of lower London, has a new novel ready which Messrs. Constable will publish under the title of "A Slice of Life."

The latest addition to Messrs. Cassell's series of Little Books on Great Writers is an admirable study of the personality of Thackeray by Mr. Sidney Dark.

Yet another new publishing firm is the Happy Publishing Company. The members of which are all women, no male being eligible for admission, since the declared object of the firm is to deal with only books that are "written, printed and published by women." Their first venture is a series of stories by Mrs. M. M. Lee, called "Love's Victories."

On the whole, you may take it that the long-haired, lackadaisical poet is a creation of the comic papers and has no real existence outside them. More typical of the present day poet, at all events, is Mr. John Gurdon, whose book of verse, "Enchantments," is to be issued by Mr. Erskine MacDonald. Mr. Gurdon, who has published two other volumes of poems that have won golden opinions from the Spectator and other of the principal literary journals, is chairman of one of the oldest and most prosperous rubber companies.

Kate Douglas Wiggin (Mrs. Riggs) has written in "A Child's Journey with Dickens" (Hodder & Stoughton) a very charming reminiscence of how she met Dickens when she was a small girl, and of the conversation that passed between them about his books, of which she was already an enthusiastic admirer. Incidentally Mrs. Riggs gives a glimpse of her home life and of the library that stood open to her in those early years; but the compelling interest of the book lies in its vivid picture of Dickens as he seemed in the eyes of a child.

"Countess Daphne," one of the most popular of Rita's many novels, made its first appearance some years ago, and has long been out of print. Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co. have now issued a new and cheap edition of it that has been thoroughly revised by the author.

Mrs. Alice Hegan Rice, the author of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," has written a new book - "The Romance of Billy Goat Hill," which Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton are publishing immediately.

Anna Sewell's classic life-story of a horse, "Black Beauty," has gone through numerous editions, and is to be published by Messrs. Jarrold this autumn in a new one that will be illustrated in colour by Mr. Cecil Aldin.

In addition to the Meredith Letters, we are to have from Messrs. Constable shortly a one-volume edition of the "Poetical Works of Meredith," with notes by Mr. G. M. Trevelyan. This is as it should be: no poet is quite happy until he has rolled all his strength and all his sweetness up into one volume, and one would like to see Browning and Swinburne also arrive at that felicity.

Photo by Vandyk.

Mr. Edwin Pugh, whose new book, "The City of the World" (Nelson), is reviewed on page 59.

Mr. Heinemann is publishing next month "The Romance of Stephen Compton," a new novel by Mr. J. E. Patterson. It is a story of to-day, describing the rise and progress of a Labour Leader who alters the face of industrial England.

We made reference last month to Mr. Cole's famous Book Arcade in Melbourne, and Messrs. W. & G. Foyle call our attention to the similar Arcade that they are now establishing in London. It occupies a large building of six floors, and already contains over a million carefully classified volumes of new and second-hand books. Messrs. Foyle commenced business at Peckham about seven years ago; they have opened eight branches and warehouses in various parts of London, and are now establishing this huge central Bookstore in Charing Cross Road. It should be a useful resort for the real book-buyer, and a very Paradise for the prowling bookworm, for it will take him a year or two to travel along the twenty miles of shelves and browse on the books as he goes in his customary manner.

Photo by Dover Street Studios.

Mrs. Charlotte Cameron.

A lady journalist who represented several newspapers at the Durbar, and whose novel, "A Durbar Bride," has just been published by Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

Mr. Clive Holland, whose clever novel, "My Japanese Wife," has had a sale of over four hundred thousand copies, has collected a new book of his short stories, "A Madonna of the Poor," which Messrs. Lynwood will publish this month.

It is some little time since Mr. J. A. Steuart gave us a new novel, and his many admirers will be pleased to hear that he has one appearing this autumn. It will be published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton with the title of "The Rock of the Raven."

Miss Daphne Allen, whose book of drawings and paintings we reviewed last month, is the daughter of Mr. Hugh Allen, of the famous Ruskin publishing house. It is not surprising, especially when it is remembered that she is still under thirteen, that Miss Allen's work is attracting a great deal of attention, and during this month a special Exhibition of it is to be held at the Dudley Gallery. In addition to the originals of the pictures in "A Child's Visions," the Exhibition will include over a hundred other drawings in colour, monochrome, pencil and pen and ink, among them being sketches and paintings illustrating scenes from old Fairy Tales, Greek Mythology, the Arthurian Legends, Shakespeare, Wagner, and a number of exquisitely graceful studies of Cupids a-foot and a-wing in every imaginable attitude. We reproduce on page 7 one little group of these drawings, which have suffered somewhat, unfortunately, in being reduced to the size of our page. Despite the precocity of her talent, and the strangely thoughtful spirit of mysticism that plays so beautifully in much of her work, Miss Allen is the most natural and unspoilt of children; she draws and paints for her own amusement only, making no labour of it, giving rapid expression in colour and line to any fancy that comes to her, using no indiarubber on the sketch but leaving it unaltered in its first freshness. Two of her pictures are to be reproduced in the Christmas Number of the Graphic, and it is probable that others will appear in other of the magazines after the close of the Exhibition.

Mr. Percival Lancaster, whose new novel of adventure in New Zealand is to be published shortly by Messrs. Sampson Low & Co., is a Canadian by adoption. He was born in England, and educated at Dulwich College, and is the son of Mr. W. J. C. Lancaster, late of the British Admiralty and well known to boy readers as "Harry Collingwood." By profession Mr. Percival Lancaster is a civil engineer and surveyor as well as an author. He received his training with Messrs. Sir John Jackson, Ltd., at Keyham, but left there to travel in South Africa, where he became for a time a captain of Irregular Cavalry,

Capt. Percival Lancaster.

Taken on Georgia Bay, Canada, August, 1912.

and was engaged in a good deal of active service. Invalided home, he took to writing stories, and then wrote a book, "Captain Jack O'Hara," which had the unusual fortune of being accepted by the first publisher who saw it and met with considerable success. He has lately finished another novel, "The Serpent," which will not be published until next year. In 1909 Mr. Lancaster went to Canada, where he now follows his profession of civil engineer, and in his leisure writes many short stories for the Canadian and American magazines. Incidentally, he is a keen sportsman, and our snapshot portrait shows him just home from a day's shooting on the Georgia Bay.

The Rev. D. P. Macdonald, of Lochfyne, writes: "In common with all who know Australia and her people I could not fail to read with the greatest pleasure and satisfaction Mr. A. St. John Adcock's contribution to the September BOOKMAN. He will be hailed throughout Greater Britain as the long-looked-for champion in Great Britain. Australia has certainly suffered, as regards her literature, for want of such. Unbiased recognition and candid statement of facts are all that Australia asks; this, in itself, is the invaluable tribute; it then becomes apparent that her literary reputation is not insignificant, and is, in point of comparison, remarkable. May I suggest that among a few additions, which would serve to make the list of Australian authors more complete, the following could well be included: J. R. Houlding ('Old Boomerang'), a worthy veteran in the ranks of Australian writers of to-day, whose 'Rural and City Life,' 'Christopher Cockle,' 'The Pioneer of the Family,' etc., published a quarter of a century ago, have never been superseded in their class; Donald Macdonald, author of 'How We Kept the Flag Flying,' 'The Warrigal's Well,' etc.; James Green, author of 'The Story of the Bushmen,' 'The Selector,' 'The Lost Echo,' etc.; and Roy Bridges, who wrote 'The Barb of an Arrow,' etc." Mr. Macdonald thinks, too, that in the department of more serious literature mention should have been made of the "Studies in the English Reformation," of Dr. Clarke, Archbishop of Melbourne; Professor W. J. Woodhouse's "Tutorial History of Greece"; George Woolnough's "Kosmos"; the Autobiography of the Rev. George Browne, D.D.; the Rev. James Cowell's "History of Methodism in N.S.W."; and the Rev. J. Dickson's "History of Presbyterianism in New Zealand."

Mr. Alfred Searcy is an Australian author who should have had a place in our last Number. He has written many articles that have been highly spoken of by Mr. Louis Becke and Mr. Frank Bullen, and two books, "In Australian Tropics," and "By Flood and Field." Messrs. G. Bell & Sons published last month an English edition of the latter—a pleasantly written and immensely interesting volume which should do much to call attention to the great and varied resources of that part of the island continent which is known as the Northern Territory. Mr. Searcy is acting-clerk in the House of Assembly at Adelaide, and was formerly for fourteen years

Photo by Hammer & Co., Adelaide.

Mr. Alfred Searcy,
Author of "By Flood and Field" (G. Bell & Sons).

sub-collector of Customs at Port Darwin. He has lived a life full of adventure in the little known Northern Territory of South Australia—adventure among Malay and Chinese smugglers off and on the north coast, with treacherous aborigines, horse thieves, lawless keepers of grog-shanties, and on the great rivers, and in the jungles and mangrove swamps of the "out-beyond," and he has gathered these experiences up into his books.

Miss Edith Howes, author of "The Sun Babies," and "Rainbow Children" (Cassell), was mentioned in our last Number as a Canadian writer. Miss Howes was born in London, but since her very early years has been living in New Zealand, where she is now a school teacher, and has written a good deal for the New Zealand papers on natural history subjects and education.

Mr. William S. Walker, the Australian novelist, better known as "Coo-ee," has completed two new novels, "The Boomerang," and "Towards the Bright Dawn," which will make their appearance during the next few months. Mr. Walker is a native born Australian, and a nephew of Rolf Boldrewood's. His father was a squatter in a large way, and he himself has had an exhaustive colonial experience as squatter, digger, and general adventurer. He spent fifteen years in New Zealand, was one of the first arrivals on the South African Diamond Fields, and after a long and full life of varied experiences is now settled down quietly at home in Devonshire. Few writers know Australia more thoroughly, from the days of the gold rush down to its more decorous life of to-day, and he has made good use of his experiences in his nine novels, of which perhaps "When the Mopoke Calls," "From the Land of the Wombat," and "Native Born" have enjoyed the largest vogue. His fiction is strongly sensational, and in Australia he is as popular as Mr. Le Quex is among us.

A little known Portrait of Shelley, from an Engraving by E. W. Wyon in H. F. Chorley's "Authors of England," published in 1838.

Reproduced from a print kindly lent by Mr. F. Irving Taylor.

Another very popular Canadian novelist is Mr. Robert E. Knowles, whose books are published by Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Co. In "The Handicap," "The Web of Time," "The Undertow," and other of his stories he has drawn admirably realised pictures of life as it is in Canada to-day and as it was yesterday. He has been compared with George Macdonald for the faithfulness of his Scottish portraiture and with Hawthorne for the fine imagina-tiveness and dramatic intensity of his writing.

Mr. Edward Arnold publishes this month Professor Oliver Elton's "Survey of English Literature, 1780-1830."

Mr. Ashby Sterry has a new volume of light verse in the press. He is calling it "The River Rhymer," and it will be published by Mr. Ham-Smith.

1. Sunrise.

3. Saturn.

2. Moonrise.

4. The Moon is the Sun's Child.

Drawn by Miss Daphne Allen.

5. The Milky Way.

Mr. John Lane has been taking up the cudgels, in The Globe, in defence of the newspapers and the book trade of Canada. An article in the Cornhill has described Toronto as "a city of 350,000 inhabitants, which subsists on four book-shops of unequal merit"; and Mr. Lane neatly convicts the writer of living in a glass house and throwing stones by pointing out that Bristol, a city with a literary past, "possesses nearly 400,000 inhabitants, a university, a cathedral, a great public school, an ancient grammar school, and a baker's dozen of reputed millionaires. . . . And yet, with all these superlative advantages, Bristol has only two modern bookshops that approach the whose new novel, "Written in the Sand," is published by Mr. Ham Smith.

Madame
G. R. Duval,

standard of those of Toronto." Countering the Cornhill statement that "nobody reads in Canada," Mr. Lane remarks: "I should say, with some knowledge of the book trade in Britain, America and the Colonies, that Canada consumes more books per head than any English-speaking country in the world."

The late Mr. H. D. Lowry left among his papers an unfinished novel, a number of short Cornish stories and some poems. These have now been placed in the hands of Mr. Lowry's cousin, Mrs. C. A. Dawson Scott, who is preparing them for the Press under the direction of Mr. Nicol Dunn, and a first volume, "A Dream of Daffodils," by H. D. Lowry, with portrait and a memoir by Mr. Edgar Preston, of the Morning Post, will be published this month by Mr. Glaisher, of Notting Hill Gate.

A pleasantly gossipy, interesting booklet has been written by Mr. W. Francis Aitken on "Some Memories of The Row." Incidentally, it commemorates the removal of Messrs. S. W. Partridge & Co. from Paternoster Row to their new premises in the Old Bailey, and gives illustrations of some of the ancient pottery and other antiquities that were found below the foundations of the old house they have left; but it goes outside all this to give a full and useful history in little of the Row itself compiled for all available sources.

A book that should be of unusual interest is the "Rough Roads: Reminiscences of a Wasted Life," by Mr. Dyke Wilkinson, that Messrs. Sampson, Low & Co. are publishing this autumn. Once upon a time, Mr. Wilkinson was a very poor boy; now he is a rich man; so it is not clear on the face of it why he describes his life as a wasted one. He has gone through many hardships, met with many adventures; had exciting experiences in racing circles and in steady, everyday business, and he has written "Rough Roads" to tell of all he has seen and known on his chequered way through the world.

Mr. Dyke Wilkinson.

Author of "Rough Roads"
(Sampson, Low & Co.).

The most talked-of book at the moment is probably the "Life of David Lloyd George," which has been issued by the Caxton Publishing Company. The biographer, Mr. Herbert du Parc, has many qualifications for the work he has undertaken. He is on terms of personal friendship with Mr. Lloyd George's family, and has gained valuable information from friends of the Chancellor's youth at Llanystumdwy, and from friends of his later years. Mr. du Parc is a keen and able student of political affairs, is himself an efficient speaker, and in his undergraduate days at Oxford he was elected (in 1902) to the Presidency of the historic Oxford Union Society. He was a scholar of Exeter College, graduated with high honours in 1903, and subsequently returned to Oxford in 1905 with a post-graduate scholarship at Jesus College, which is, of course, pre-eminently the Welsh College at Oxford. Since then he has become known as a practising barrister and a speaker on Liberal platforms.

Mr. Herbert du Parc.

Author of the "Life of David Lloyd George" (Caxton Press).

AN APOLOGY FOR REBECCA.

BY KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN.

THEY say I ought to furnish a "Glossary" for my play, "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," which I thought so simple and so unpretentious a dramatic offering that it surely would explain itself as it went along. I know that the London critic commonly does not care for representations of life in a far-away New England village, that he likes neither the dialect—which I have given to only two out of my thirteen characters—nor the types portrayed in such a play. He seems to feel a temperamental aversion to any presentment of Yankee customs, manners and speech in an out-of-the-way New England hamlet, while accepting "Buntz" and "Hindle Wakes" as interesting studies in a similar field of labour. I am sorry to have been puzzling, however, and if I do issue a little glossary to be slipped into the programme like the invitation to take a cup of tea, it will illuminate the following points.

Some of our listeners marvel at the name of Rebecca's dead father, Lorenzo de Medici Randall, and her uncle Mark, otherwise Marquis de Lafayette Randall. I did not invent these high-sounding cognomens, but as they were often given to defenceless babies in the State of Maine thirty or forty years ago, I preserved them for their quaintness. It is easy to see that Lafayette's visit to America may have inspired young mothers to perpetuate his name, and I am afraid that total ignorance of titles may have led them to mistake "Marquis" for a Christian name in good and regular standing. What induced the affection in that locality for Lorenzo de Medici is more mysterious, but just as true to life for, as a child, I knew well two elderly men named Marquis de Lafayette Johnson, and Lorenzo de Medici Milliken, who wrote themselves down as respectively M. D. L. Johnson and L. D. M. Milliken.

Next in gravity is my offence in describing as a premium what is apparently known in this country as a "coupon prize." My only apology is that I never heard of a coupon prize and I have always heard the thing itself alluded to as a "premium." The poor children in little straggling villages in the New England States used to sell, and still do sell, soap, from door to door, acting as humble child-agents for enterprising firms. These children, when successful, receive as rewards a set of tea dishes, or a rickety chair, or a crudely decorated lamp. Sometimes the latter "premium" is glowingly described and pictured in the advertising circulars as a magnificent "banquet-lamp," and it is this useless appendage which the imaginative Rebecca so longs to secure for the poverty-stricken Simpson family.

I supposed that the two words: "banquet" and "lamp," being tolerably familiar to students of the dictionary, the compound word might be intelligible, but, alas! one of the critics says: "Rebecca wishes, by selling large quantities of soap, to procure for her poor friends a 'banquet-lamp'—whatever that may be." As to the sudden marriage of the Simpsons, which is about to be solemnized at the end of the third act, it is possible in America for any couple to go before a minister at any hour, and be made man and wife without previous notice or further delay. The absence of banns or license in the play seems to make some persons fear that I have imagined this informal marriage ceremony and that it does not exist.

The little local "flag-raising" which occur here and there during a Presidential campaign, and the excitements of "graduations" as the exercises attending the end of a girl's or a boy's school days are called, these functions loom large in a community such as I have tried to show in Rebecca. They give atmosphere as truly as the Morris dance in a play of Old England or "Standing at the Plate" in Scottish "Buntz," and in their own

Photo by Elliott and Fry.

Kate Douglas Wiggin
(Mrs. Riggs.)

simple way are as worthy of preservation in literature or drama.

I shall be very happy, very proud and very grateful, as indeed I might well be, if Rebecca wins a public in London. Emerson says: "What is for thee gravitates to thee," a bit of philosophy in which I firmly believe, so I shall be content with the verdict of the audiences that see the play.

I have no skill in growing orchids or rare plants or even parasites, Rebecca is simply a bit of clover blooming by a dusty New England road side. It remains to be seen whether she can be transplanted and encouraged to grow for a while beside the roses in your English garden.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

IAN HAY.

I HOLD a few literary dogmas—very few—that have withstood every test I have been able to apply to them, and one of these is that, historical fiction apart, all the best novels have been written out of personal experience, and all the characters in them that are truest and most alive have been drawn, as the good artist always works, from the model. I do not mean, of course, that the experiences are written down verbatim, nor that the characters are slavishly and photographically copied from their originals; your novelist may fashion his man or woman out of the features and idiosyncrasies of half a dozen different persons, just as a painter may use one model for the face of his figure, another for the arms, and a third for the hair; he merely goes to life for his material, then sets his imagination to work upon what he has actually seen and known. When he does not, he may catch your interest with an exciting plot, but his book is characterless, and has not enough body and blood of reality in it to keep it living long.

When I first read the novels of Ian Hay—or, to give him his full name, Mr. Ian Hay Beith—I had a comfortable feeling that he was confirming me in my faith. His people are too lifelike never to have lived; it was easy enough to gather from his books that he had been a Public School boy; that he was or had himself been a schoolmaster; that he had seen something of clerical life and of the political world from the inside; that he was a golfer, a cricketer, and in general a keen sportsman; and now that I have had an opportunity of getting at the facts about him I find that his biography is very much what his novels had led me to expect.

Born on the 17th April, 1876, Mr. Beith is the second son of the late John Alexander Beith, and grandson of the Rev. Dr. Beith, of Stirling, who is still remembered in many a Highland parish as one of the great figures of the Disruption of 1843. A man of remarkable zeal and energy, Mr. Beith's father was not contented to limit himself to the labour involved in the direction of the great shipping and export firm of Beith, Stevenson & Co., but devoted almost the whole of his leisure to public service. He was in his time President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, Government Representative on the Mersey Dock Board, a Justice of the Peace for Lancaster, and a director and supporter of almost innumerable philanthropic and religious enterprises. In politics he was an ardent follower of Mr. Gladstone, and was for some time leader of the Liberal Party in Manchester. In philanthropic work he was closely associated with men of such opposite shades of political opinion as Jacob Bright and Sir W. H. Houldsworth. Such little recreation as he allowed himself amid the stress of these varied activities was mostly taken aboard a boat, and his favourite holiday place was Oban, which had been his father's first parish. He purchased "Alt-na-Craig," Professor Blackie's eyrie overlooking the Sound of Kenèra, when the Professor indignantly vacated it on the advent of the railway, and it became the starting point of numerous yachting expeditions among the Highlands and Islands; nowadays it is still occupied by his widow.

Fettes, that home of classics and Rugby football, counts Ian Hay among its distinguished scholars; he spent his scholastic infancy there as the fag of a certain J. A. Simon, then head boy of Fettes, and now his friend Sir John Simon, K.C., M.P., Solicitor-General of England. In 1895 he proceeded to St. John's College, Cambridge, and there he was so far from slothful that he played Rugby football three days a week, and on the remaining three days laboured at the oar with such diligence that he attained ("rather flukily," he says) to the post of captain of his College Boat Club during his last year. Withal he devoted sufficient attention to his studies to obtain a Second Class in the Classical Tripos.

Thus equipped, he made it known that his services were at the disposal of the Headmasters of the nation; but as nothing happened (beyond two stop-gap engagements at Charterhouse and Fettes), he suspected that classical degrees must be a drag in the market, and returning to Cambridge spent an extremely laborious year in acquiring enough knowledge of chemistry and physics to fit him for a Senior Mastership. After four years at Durham School, first under the Rev. A. E. Hillard, now High Master at St. Paul's, and later under the Rev. Harry McKenzie, now Headmaster of Uppingham, he was invited to go back to Fettes, where he spent six happy years. Then last April, owing to a partial breakdown in health due to his having been burning the candle at both the literary and the scholastic ends, he regretfully resigned his post and turned his back for ever on a profession which, whatever its trials and disappointments, provides its adherents with a never-failing supply of the healthiest and most invigorating company in the world—that of the British schoolboy, and incidentally had supplied Ian Hay with material that he had already turned to excellent account in at least one of his novels. For "Pip" is one of the finest and most convincing of schoolboy stories, and in its later phases blends a love romance with great doings at cricket and golf in the most ingenious and glamorous manner imaginable.

As far back as 1901 Ian Hay had begun to coquet with fiction. He had worked fitfully on a school story, the hero of which was, he confesses, modelled on a certain Fettes boy of his acquaintance. He called him "Pip," and what has now become the third chapter of the novel was the first serious attempt at fiction that he ever made. The tale grew in a desultory way through several years: sometimes he did not touch it for six months at a stretch; sometimes he took it up again and interpolated a chapter into the hero's past; sometimes he grafted an episode on to his future. The school scenes were written first; then the love scenes; then the first two chapters, that deal with the somewhat neglected home life of Pip and his sister Pipette, and give an amusing record of their experiences at the local kindergarten school kept by Mr., Miss Mary, Miss Arabella, and Miss Amelia Pocklington. Among the good things in all Ian Hay's novels are his humorous or reflective asides, such as those in "Pip" on the fascination of golf; on how the schoolmaster realises early in his career that "he is not a universally popular person"; or on how Pip's father, a widower and an overworked medical man, discovers that he has not acted wisely in leaving his two children too entirely under the influence of his servants, for it has come to pass that to Pip and Pipette etiquette and deportment are "summed up in the following nursery laws, as amended by the kitchen":

"I. Girls, owing to some mysterious infirmity which is never apparent, and for which they are not responsible, must be helped first to everything.

"II. A boy must on no account punch a girl, even though she is older and bigger than himself. (For reason see I.)

"III. A girl must not scratch a boy. (Not that the boy matters, but it is unlady-like.)

"IV. Real men do not play with dolls. (However, you may pretend to be a doctor and administer medicine without loss of dignity.)

"V. Real ladies do not climb the trees in the garden in the Square. (But you can get over the difficulty by pretending to be a boy or a monkey for half an hour.)

"VI. Girls never have dirty hands - only boys. (For solution of this difficulty see note on V.)

"VII. You must never tell tales. Girls must be specially careful about this, not because they are more prone to do so, but because boys think they are.

"VIII. Real men never kiss girls, but they may sometimes permit girls to kiss them.

"IX. You must eat up your bread-and-butter before you have any cake. (This rule holds good, they found out later, all through life.)

"X. Do not blow upon your tea to cool it: this is very vulgar. Pour it into your saucer instead."

Having an uneasy suspicion, as the story progressed, that he was making Pip too much of a bread-and-butter hero, the author deprived him of all his money and sent him out to earn his living as a chauffeur; then, as a last straw, he says, he invented a mildly lurid episode which he labelled "The Principal Boy: An Interlude," and dovetailed this into the narrative immediately before Pip's final apotheosis; and by this time, as he puts it, "the original Pip had faded almost entirely from the scheme of things. It nearly always happens when one sets out to include a 'real live' person in a 'made-up' story that the exigencies of narrative make it necessary to develop this character in some unexpected direction. Hence the stolid, immovable features of my original Pip were stretched and strained to a quite unrecognisable degree. But, in spite of the liberties which I have taken with his character and (probably) history, I still have to thank my Fettes friend for supplying me with the original materials—his devotion to cricket, his entire lack of imagination, and his freakish memory—for my first story."

Early in 1907 Ian Hay looked over what he had done, and recognised that he had written a book; so he had it typed, and dispatched it on a short journey of a mile or so to the historic offices of the house of Blackwood. Six weeks later it was accepted, and in the following autumn it was duly published; as Mr. Beith was anxious not to offend the susceptibilities of his sensitive scholastic profession by associating it with anything so frivolous as fiction, he cut off the last third of his name, and "Pip" appeared with the now familiar pseudonym of "Ian Hay" on the title page. It was very favourably reviewed, and an especially appreciative notice in the Spectator gave the sales such a fillip that before long the book was in its second edition, and it has gone on growing in popularity ever since.

"Pip" is only Ian Hay's first book, however, so far as the public is concerned. Two years previously, he had issued a small, privately printed volume of University sketches. That earlier work is not to be had now for love or money, but Ian Hay owns that more than once he has employed small portions of it "to season later dishes," and he impenitently hopes, all being well, to do the same again. Nevertheless, "Pip" was his real beginning, since he wrote that first chapter of it, which is now the third, as long ago as 1901.

In the spring of 1908 Mr. William Blackwood suggested to him that he should follow up the successful "Pip" with a book to be published that autumn, and, nothing loth, though he had taken six years to evolve his first story, he set to work to write the second in six months. Possibly the fact that it was definitely commissioned work acted as a stimulant; anyhow, "The Right Stuff" was finished by July of that year, and was scoring a new success in October. The third book, "A Man's Man," appeared serially in Blackwood's before it made its appearance between covers, and I ranked it as the very best of his books until I read "A Safety Match." It had originally been called "Sole Trustee," but, happily, at the eleventh hour Ian Hay re-christened it over the telephone. The heroes of "The Right Stuff" and of "A Man's Man," unlike each other in almost every other respect, have this in common—that each is a man's man. It is a type that particularly appeals to Ian Hay, though he knows and depicts many other types with equal insight, and his gallery of women characters is a full and wonderfully varied one. No more subtly feminine, pleasantly provoking, utterly natural girls and women live in fiction than some of those that have their homes in his books. He has a very intimate understanding of children, too, and there are charming passages about them that I had marked for quotation; but my space is running out, and I give instead these two characteristic asides from "A Man's Man" concerning woman in general:

Photo by J. Moffat, Edinburgh.

Ian Hay.
(Mr. Ian Hay Beith.)

"My general experience—and it has been wider than you might think—has been that, once a woman takes a fancy to you, you may run counter to every canon of honesty, sobriety, and common decency, and she will cleave to you—probably, I fancy, because you arouse all the protective maternal instinct in her. On the other hand, once you get into her bad books—it may be because you deserve it, but as often as not it is because you have hot hands or once trod on her skirt in a waltz—nothing that you can do will prevent her shuddering at the very mention of your name."

"In her relations with her male belongings a woman does not expect much. Certainly not justice, nor reason, nor common sense. That which she chiefly desires—so those who know inform us—is admiration, and, if possible, kindness, though the latter is not essential. The one thing she cannot brook is neglect. Attention of some kind she must have. Satisfy her soul with this, and she will remain all you desire her to remain—toute femme—something for lonely mankind to thank God for."

In the eighteen months that elapsed after the publication of "A Man's Man" Ian Hay published nothing but "Bill Bailey," a short story about a second-hand motor-car; but he was busy on his fourth novel, "A Safety Match," which, after running serially in Blackwood's, came out in volume form in the autumn of 1911, and has proved the most successful of his books. Some striking dramatic episodes in this story arise out of a coal strike and a final disaster in one of the mines, and to get local colour for that scene Mr. Beith went down into a Lanarkshire coal-pit, under the guidance of an experienced friend, in order that he might study the working of a colliery at first hand. "The friend has since expressed his disappointment with the inadequate use which I have made of the opportunities thus afforded me," he remarks, "and, although I have pointed out to him that technical precision must occasionally give way to dramatic exigency, I fear he still regards me as a thoroughly unsound writer of fiction."

Mr. Beith has lately completed a new novel, which will start serially in Blackwood's about the end of the year. Its title, "Happy-Go-Lucky," is intended to indicate the disposition of the hero, who is usually addressed by his friends as "Freak"; and the tale concerns itself mainly with his love affairs, which owing to his largeness of heart and constitutional reluctance to disoblige a lady are more numerous than discreet. On its more serious side the story emphasises the truth that the most amiable butterfly, provided he has the right stuff in him, usually undergoes a complete transformation when taken in hand by the right girl. Of this mingled yarn of good and ill, human weakness and human strength, all Ian Hay's novels are woven; the quaintest, shrewdest vein of spontaneous humour sparkles through his pages; but there is a mind and a heart behind his laughter; he has the quick, exquisite sense of pathos that always goes along with the sense of humour, and his whole outlook on life is sane, and wholesome, and kindly. His success has been rapid: he has gone farther in five years than most novelists go in a lifetime, and nobody can read these four books of his without feeling that he has it in him to go very much farther yet.

X.

NORMAN ANGELL.

THERE are two ways of achieving fame; one—infinitely the easier of the two—is to sit down and write a sensational novel, and the other to write a serious and specialised book. It sounds simple in theory, but in practice it is another matter, and the story of how "The Great Illusion" came to be written illustrates strikingly the slow, painstaking methods of genius. A few years ago Mr. Norman Angell, then quite an unknown personality in the greater world of letters, set before the public in a thin octavo volume of about a hundred pages the epitome of his studies in international politics. The fate that befell "Europe's Optical Illusion"—as the book was then called—was pretty much the same that has befallen books that have been destined later to be regarded as "epoch-making" in the true sense of this much abused term. It fell absolutely flat; it was ignored both by the Press and the public alike; and now at the present moment it is being translated into seventeen languages! Mr. Norman Angell has every reason to feel grateful to whatever gods may preside over the fates of authors for the fortunate turn of events that has placed him almost at a bound as it were in the forefront of European authors.

The career of the author of "The Great Illusion" was not always passed in the study poring over the problems of peace and war. Indeed, to anyone who knows Mr. Angell personally, and the facts of his life, it is a matter for wonder that he could have found the time necessary to devote to the study even of his own particular subject and the strenuous work of putting his ideas into book form. For unlike so many beautiful and artificial creations in literature "The Great Illusion" was not the work of a night; it did not "arrive" by accident; the author did not dream it as the poets both great and small dream poems; he built it steadily bit by bit in his brain, as the builder builds a monument and the work took years of patient and laborious study.

The life of the author of "The Great Illusion" belongs more to fiction than to fact. We can only find a parallel to it in the careers of some of our novelists. Stevenson would have shaken hands with him, not for his book, which he might not have perfectly understood; nor have appreciated the simple and direct style in which it is written, being a craftsman of elaborate designs; but for having lived the wild, open life under broad heavens and rolling plains and not having made a romance out of it. Therein is matter for congratulation! Perhaps after all the exotic career of Lafcadio Hearn comes nearer to that of Mr. Angell in the matter of personal adventure.

Mr. Norman Angell, who is still well under forty, was born in England. He received most of his education in France and migrated to Western America. It was here in this last country that that large slice of adventure befell him, and where he awakened to those unique ideas on world politics that were later to stir and influence all deep-thinking men both at home and abroad.

The life of the frontiersman, which includes such a pleasant variety of occupations, as ranching, mining, "cow punching" etc., probably taught him more than all the schools; for one learns living close to nature what the man who is habituated to a hum-drum city life can never learn to the full extent; those sterling qualities of resource and decision which are as necessary in an author as in a man of affairs; and Mr. Angell is both. He was always an eager student of political and abstract questions, and in his journalistic work of this period one already traces the style and methods of the present author of "The Great Illusion." We next find him in France stemming with success that seething vortex of newspaper life in Paris; and then came the great opportunity of his life when he became connected with the business direction of one of the biggest journalistic enterprises in the French capital which brought him into immediate contact with the foremost political and commercial minds of Europe and indeed celebrities of all kinds who helped and encouraged him in his great work of political reformation. Such is the brief epitome of the twenty crowded years which resulted in "The Great Illusion."

The book itself has been subject to such a variety of misconception and misrepresentation that perhaps a few "explanations" may not be out of place in an article ostensibly dealing with the work and personality of the author. It is of course always the obvious things, the simple things, that are most subject to misinterpretation, and before a proper understanding of the thesis of "The Great Illusion" has been arrived at a few "illusions" will have to be cleared away. For example, any of the following propositions would be cheerfully accepted and have been accepted, not only by the ordinary "man in the street," but by the enlightened leaders of our thought and opinion as well, as the fundamental thesis of "The Great Illusion":

- (1) That war is impossible.
- (2) That war does more damage to the vanquisher than the vanquished.
- (3) That war would spell instant ruin to everyone concerned.
- (4) That as England would be just as well off under the Germans as under the English we might as well let the Germans come.
- (5) That Bourse panics will stop war.

(6) That bankers will stop war because they find it does not pay.

None of which resembles in the remotest degree any of the propositions which Mr. Angell has laid down in his book. The whole idea of "The Great Illusion" is simply that war is an unprofitable undertaking in the twentieth century, both to the nation and to the individual who is part of that nation owing to the delicate interdependence of trade and finance. We are blinded by traditions that have passed away; haunted by shibboleths and have never really paused to think the matter out in a clear and logical manner. Mr. Angell preaches the gospel of peace but objectively; that is to say, if he had felt that any real profit, moral or material, could arise from the art of war as it is conceived and practised at the present day there would have been no need for his book and the slow, patient years in which he devoted himself to the problems of international warfare would have been given to more profitable things; but feeling and having expounded in "The Great Illusion" the folly and fallacy of war he advocates peace: it is the only alternative. He does not say, remember that war is impossible, which is a favourite misinterpretation; it is more than possible; it is even likely; and it is because it is so probable that "The Great Illusion" has become such an important factor on all questions touching on international policy. Mr. Angell endeavours in "The Great Illusion" to put the clock right for us; we are slow by several centuries; and while we are so advanced and have made such gigantic strides in other things in the domain of international politics we are absolutely stationary and remain rooted where we were at the beginning of history when plunder was the price of war, and the rough and ready methods of the Huns and the Vandals will not work in the twentieth century. Mankind has developed materially and morally since then (whether they know it or not) and at the present moment when the nations are more than ever bound by economic interdependence and considerations of trade; when the division of labour is a tie between State and State and man and man, war and the benefits that war is supposed to bring is an individual and national "illusion." It is not war we want, but co-operation, not strife but federation. That is the real and only possible interpretation of "The Great Illusion," if read with the usual modicum of light and understanding. But one must read the book for one's self and not simply listen to what others say about it who are prejudiced in favour of war.

Photo by "Daily Mirror"

Mr. Norman Angell.

It is a matter of satisfaction to think that in spite of such misrepresentation that men like Sir Edward Grey and Mr. Winston Churchill have allowed the tenets of "The Great Illusion" to shape their thoughts and to mould their policy; and that the work has been honoured by complimentary reference in the French Chamber—an unusual experience for a book. There is even an opinion expressed in various quarters that Mr. Angell stands a very close chance of being awarded the Nobel Peace Prize; and as he is now engaged in the active work of propaganda on the lines laid down in his book, there is probably not in Europe to-day a personality who would put it to a better use than the author of "The Great Illusion."

ROBERT BIRKMYRE.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

October 1st to November 1st, 1912.

Messrs. Allen & Co.

(Incorporated with Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein & Co.)

- BEVAN, REV. J. O.—The Scientific Basis of Religion. 2s. 6d. net.
BRETT, DR. G. S.—A History of Psychology, Ancient and Satiric. Library Philosophy. 10s. 6d. net.
CHADWICK, REV. EDWARD (D.D.).—Issues of the Incarnation. 3s. 6d. net.
COOK, SIR EDWARD T.—Homes and Haunts of Ruskin. 28 Coloured and 1 Black and White Plates. 21s. net.
FREUD, PROFESSOR.—The Interpretation of Dreams. Translated by A. Brill, Ph.D. 15s. net.
HOWE, W. NORION.—Animal Life in Italian Painting. 2 Illustrations in Colour and 40 in Black and White. 12s. 6d. net.
JEYES, S. H. (concluded by HOW, T. D.).—The Life of Sir Howard Vincent. 10 traits and contemporary caricatures. 12s. 6d. net.
JONES, E. ALFRED (Editor).—Memorials of Old North Wales. (New Volume of County Memorials Series). 15s. net.
PHYTHIAN, J. E.—The Art of Josef Israels. 8 Coloured and 40 Black and White Plates. 15s. net.

Messrs. George Allen & Co., Ltd.

- ATKINSON, HENRY H.—The King's Favourite. 6s.
HANCOCK, REV. BERNARD.—Preparation for Holy Matrimony. 1s. 6d. net.
MAETERLINCK, MAURICE.—Hours of Gladness. Eight Nature Essays, including new one on "Our City Gardens." Translated by A. Teixeira de Mattos. 20 Coloured Plates by E. J. Detmold. Special Edition. 21s. net.
REICHARDT, E. NOEL (M.D. London).—The Significance of Ancient Religions. 7 full-page Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.
TCHUDI, CLARA.—Napoleon's Son. Translated by Miss Mary Cope. 1 Coloured Plate and 12 Black and White. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Appleton & Co.

- CHAMBERS, ROBERT W.—The Streets of Ascalon. 6s.
GIBBS, GEORGE.—The Maker of Opportunities. 6s.
HALL, G. STANLEY.—Founders of Modern Psychology. 10s. 6d. net.
LINCOLN, JOSEPH C.—The Postmaster. 6s.
POST, MELVILLE D.—The Nameless Thing. 6s.
WHITMAN, ROGER B.—Gas Engine Principles. 6s. net.
WRIGHT, MARY T.—The Charlofers. 6s.
YOUNG, M.—Behind the Dark Pines. 6s. net.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

- BROWNE, EDITH A.—Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture. 3s. 6d. net.
CRAIK, MRS.—John Halifax, Gentleman. Illustrated by Oswald Moser and G. F. Nicholls. 7s. 6d. net.
FINNEMORE, JOHN.—Homes of Many Lands: India. 1s. 6d. net.
FINNEMORE, JOHN.—Little Songs of Long Ago. 5s. net.
GRIERSON, ELIZABETH.—What the Other Children do. 3s. 6d. net.
GROVE, HENRY M.—Moscow. Painted by F. de Haenen. 7s. 6d. net.
HOSKIN, E. L.—Stories of Old. 2s. 6d.
HUMPHRIES, SYDNEY (Edited by).—Bacon's Essays. 6s. net.
KOEHLER, W. H.—South America. Painted by A. S. Forrest. 20s. net.
SCHWITZER, DR. ALBERT.—Paul and His Interpreters. 7s. 6d. net.
STOCK, A. B.—Ranching in the Canadian West. 1s. 6d. net.
TALBOT, FREDERICK A.—Making Good in Canada. 3s. 6d. net.
WAKELING, T. G.—Forged Egyptian Antiquities. 5s. net.

Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons.

- BOWLINE, J. SKIPPER, and GREGORY, R. R. C.—Yarns from a Captain's Log. 6s.
FETTERLASS, ARTHUR.—The Career of Kemble—Nonconformist. 6s.
GRAU, PROFESSOR GERHARD.—Jean Jacques Rousseau. 1s. 6d. net.
HASSALL, ARTHUR.—History of British Foreign Policy. 10s. 6d. net.
KNEIFF, SEBASTIAN.—My Water Cure. New Edition. 3s. 6d.
MACMURDO, MAJOR, D.S.O., R.F.S.—Pike and Carronade. 6s.
McARTHUR, M. J. F.—The Irish Revolution. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Cassell & Co., Ltd.

- ANSELL, MARY.—Happy Houses. 6s. net.
BEY, DJELAL NOURY.—Translated by ARCHIE DE BLAIR.—The Sultan. 6s.
Cassell's New Dictionary of Cookery. 7s. 6d.
CHESTERTON, G. K.—What's Wrong with the World. 1s. net.
CLAXTON, WILLIAM J.—Insect Workers. 1s.
DEEDING, WARWICK.—Sincerity. 6s.
GORDON, SETON.—The Charm of the Hills. 10s. 6d. net.
HUDSON, W. W.—Story of the Renaissance. 5s. net.
JONES, BERNARD E.—Reinforced Concrete. 15s. net.
One Hundred Famous Paintings. Vol. I. 12s. net.
SILLS, SPENCER.—Commonsense Home. 5s. net.
SWAN, ANNIE.—A Favourite of Fortune. 6s.
THOMAS, KEITH.—Personal Power. 6s.
WALLACE, SIR DONALD MACKENZIE.—Russia. 12s. 6d. net.
WALMSLEY, PROFESSOR.—Electricity in the Service of Man. Vol. II. Part I. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

- "BELLWATTLE" (Edited by).—Digressions from the Works of E. Temple Thurston. 3s. 6d. net and 5s. net.
BETHAM, EDWARDS, MISS.—In French Africa. 10s. 6d. net.
CHURCH, THE LATE COLONEL.—Aborigines of South America. 10s. 6d. net.
D'HAUTEVILLE, ERNESTI (Edited by).—The Journal of the Comte d'Esplanade. 7s. 6d. net.
HARTER, C. G.—Summer Days in Shakespeare Land. 7s. 6d. net.
HOUSEMAN, LAURENCE.—John of Fingal. 6s.
MARYON, EDWARD.—Metalwork and Enamelling. 7s. 6d. net.
QUARTER, EDWARD.—The Chalet in the Wood. 6s.
REUBEN, RICHARD.—John Forster and His Friendships. 10s. 6d. net.
REYNOLDS, MRS. FRED.—Letters to a Prison. 6s.
TOYNBEE, WILLIAM (Edited by).—The Diaries of William Charles Macready. 2 Vols. 32s. net.
WOODRUFF, C. EVELEIGH.—Memorials of Canterbury Cathedral. 16s. net.
YOUNG, TILSON.—Letters from Solitude, and Other Essays. 5s. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

- AYSCOUGH, JOHN.—Faustula: A Romance of Early Christianity. 6s.
DOBSON, AUSTIN.—At Prior Park and other Papers. 6s.
HAMILTON, COSINO.—Two Kings and other Stories. 2s. net.
HORNIMAN, ROY.—Bellamy the Magnificent. Cheaper Edition. 2s. net.
HULL, ELEANOR (Editor).—The Poem—Book of the Gael. 7s. 6d. net.
HUNT, MRS., and HUNT, VIOLET.—Thornicroft's Model. Cheaper Edition, with a Preface. 2s. net.
HYATT, A. H. (Editor), and YOSHIO MARKINO (Illustrator).—The Charm of London. A New Edition, with 12 Coloured Illustrations by Yoshio Markino. 5s. net and 7s. 6d. net.
LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE.—The Court of the Tuilleries. New Edition. 5s. net.
McCURDY, EDWARD.—Essays in Fresco. 5s. net.
NEVILLE, RALPH.—The Man of Pleasure. 12s. 6d. net.
OSBORNE, LLOYD (Editor).—The Stevenson Reader. School Edition. 1s. 6d.
FRAED, MRS. CAMPBELL (Editor).—Our Book of Memories: Letters from Justin McCarthy to Mrs. Praed. 12s. 6d. net.
TENNYSON, LORD.—Morte d'Arthur. Illuminated in Colours and Gold by ALBERTO SANGORSKI. 6s. net and 8s. 6d. net.

Messrs. T. & T. Clark.

- BROOKE, REV. ALAN E., B.D.—The Johannine Epistles. A New Volume of FRAME. A New Volume of MACKINTOSH, PROFESSOR H. R., D.Phil.—The Doctrine of the Person of Jesus Christ. A New Volume of "The International Theological Library." 10s. 6d.
McFADYEN, PROFESSOR JOHN E., D.D.—A Cry for Justice: A Study in Amos. FISHER, REV. ROBERT H., D.D.—The Beatitudes. ADAMS, REV. JOHN, B.D.—The Lenten Psalms. Being the first three volumes of a new Series "The Short Course Series," edited by Rev. John Adams, B.D. 2s. net each.
VON HUGEL, BARON FRIEDRICH.—Eternal Life: A Study of its Implications and Applications.

Mrs. Fred Reynolds, whose new novel, "Letters to a Prison," will be published shortly by Messrs. Chapman & Hall. With Mrs. Reynolds are her son and daughter, the latter known already as the author of a successful book "Red of the Rock."

Messrs. J. Clark & Co.

- BEGBIE, HAROLD—Every Child. 1s. net.
 BLUE, REV. A. WYLLIE—Facets of Faith. 1s. 6d. net.
 BURNS, REV. JAMES, M.A.—Illustrations for Art for Pulpit and Platform. 3s. 6d. net.
 ELIAS, FRANK—Heaven and the Sea. 3s. 6d. net.
 JONES, REV. J. D., M.A., D.D.—The Unlettered Word. 3s. 6d. net.
 JUDE, W. H. (Edited by)—The Christian World Album of Sacred Songs. 1s. net.
 MATHESON, GEORGE, D.D., LL.D.—Messages of Hope. Cheap Edition. 2s. 6d. net.
 MAXWELL, ANNA—Hampstead: Its Historic Houses, Its Literary and Artistic Associations. 7s. 6d. net.
 STREET, JENNIE.—The Seed of the Kingdom. 1s. net.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

- BARLOW, C. W. C., M.A., B.Sc.—Mathematical Physics. Vol. 1, Magnetism and Electricity.
 BARRACLOUGH, AUGUSTUS, M.A.—Additional Exercises in Junior Arithmetic Suitable for Candidates for the Cambridge Junior Local Examination. 1s.
 BARRACLOUGH, AUGUSTUS, M.A.—Preliminary Arithmetic Suitable for Candidates for the Preliminary Cambridge Local Examination. 1s. 6d.
 HOSKING, ALBERT—School Gardening: A Guide to Horticulture and methods of Teaching it in Schools. 4s. 6d.
 ROBERTS, G. A., M.A.—New Junior French Course. 2s. 6d.
 SHEPHERD, J. W., B.Sc.—Qualitative Determination of Organic Compounds. 6s. 6d.

Mr. A. C. Fifield.

- GATE, ETHEL M.—The Broom Faries and other Fairy Tales. 1s. 6d. net.
 JONES, HENRY FESTING (Arranged and Edited by)—The Note Books of Samuel Butler. With Photogravure Portrait, taken by Alfred Cathie in 1898, a biographical and bibliographical statement of principal dates, Butler's poems and sonnets, and an Index. 6s. net.
 MACDONALD, GREVILLE, M.D.—Trysile's Quest; or Kit, King of the Pigwidgeons. A Fairy Tale, with cover and title page design and thirty-one line illustrations by Arthur Hughes. 5s. net.
 ROSEGGGER, PETER.—The Forest Farm: (Autobiographical) Tales of the Austrian Tyrol. With a biographical sketch by Dr. Julius Fetersen, an appreciation by Maude Egerton King, a photograph of Rosegger, and a sketch of his forest home. 2s. net.
 TAYLER, J. LIONEL, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P.—The Nature of Woman. 3s. 6d. net.
 TAYLOR, MARY ARGYLE—Delfina of the Dolphins: A Story of Italy. 1s. 6d. net.
 WAITHMAN, H. M.—The Soul of a Gardener: Poems for every month of a gardener's year. 2s. net.

Messrs. Headley Bros.

- BRAITHWAITE, WILLIAM C., B.A., LL.B., and others.—Concerning Religious Education. With an Introduction by Dr. A. E. Garvie. 1s. net.
 ERDSALL, EDWARD W.—Revealed by Friendship. 1s. 6d. net.
 FIELD, MILDRED F., B.A.—Method in Religious Education. 1s. net.
 FIRM, JOHN.—The Christian Church that is to be. 2s. and 1s. net.
 GRAVESON, CAROLINE C., B.A.—The Divided Kingdoms. Part I. 1s. net.
 GRAVESON, CAROLINE C., B.A.—The United Monarchy. 1s. net.
 HALLOWES, FRANCES S.—The Patriotism of Denys Mahon. 6s.
 SMITH, L. ISABEL.—The Period of the Patriarchs. 1s. net.
 THOMSON, J. INCHES.—Voyages and Wanderings in Far-Off Seas and Lands. 3s. 6d. net.
 WARNER, S. ALLEN.—The Period of the Exodus. 1s. net.
 WRIGHT, J. C., F.R.S.L.—Life's Many Colours. 2s. 6d. net.
 WRIGHT, WALTER P.—Hardy Perennials and Herbaceous Borders. 12s. 6d. net.

Mr. W. Heinemann.

- ANTIN, MARY—The Promised Land. 7s. 6d. net.
 BEFRIOHM, MAX—A Christmas Garland. 5s. net.
 BLAKE and HOPKINS—Little Books about Old Furniture: Chippendale. 2s. 6d. net.
 DACKES-ADAMS, W.—The Book of Beggars. 5s. net.
 DUNSANY, LORD—The Book of Wonder. 6s.
 FFNELLLOSA, L. F.—Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art. 36s. net.
 GALSWORDTHY, JOHN—The Inn of Tranquility. 6s.
 HAMILTON, MARY A.—Less than the Dust. 6s.
 HIND, A. M.—Great Engravers: Marcantonio, Hollem. 2s. 6d. net.
 LODGE, G. CAROL—Poems. 10s. net.
 MAUGRAS, F.—Memoirs of M^{re} de Custum. 10s. net.
 MOORE, GEORGE—Salve. 6s.
 MOORE, N. HUDSON—The Old Clock Book. 10s. 6d. net.
 ROLLAND, ROMAIN—Michael Angelo. 6s. net.
 SHARP, WILLIAM—Literary Geography. 5s. net.
 WHITMAN, SIDNEY—German Memories. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

- AUTHOR OF "THE LADY OF THE DECORATION"—The Lady Married. 1s.
 BEACH, REX—The Net. 6s.
 BY THE MAN WHO WAS WARNED—The Day that Changed the World. 6s.
 CROCKETT, S. R.—The Moss Troopers: A Story of the Press Gang. 6s.
 DEISSMANN, PROFESSOR ADOLF, D.D.—St. Paul in the Light of Social and Religious History. 10s. 6d. net.
 DERBY, CAROLINE ABBOTT (Compiled by)—The Beauty of Life: From the Writings of Arthur Christopher Benson. 6s. net.
 DOYLE, SIR ARTHUR CONAN—The Lost World: Being an account of the recent amazing adventures of Professor George F. Challenger, Lord John Roxton, Professor Summerlee, and Mr. L. D. Malone of the Daily Gazette. With many striking illustrations. 6s. Presentation Edition with specially mounted illustrations in colour and half tone, 10s. 6d. net.
 FABRE, J. H.—The Life of the Spider. With an Introduction by Maurice Maeterlinck. 6s. net.
 FIFMING, D. HAY, LL.D.—Critical Reviews Relating Chiefly to Scotland. 12s. net.
 GARVIE, CHARLES—Two Muds and a Man. 6s.
 GOLDSMITH, OLIVER—She Stoops to Conquer. With 25 Plates in Colour and many Line Drawings by Hugh Thomson. 15s. 10s. Limited Edition de Luxe, bound in vellum, £2 2s. net.
 GORDON, REV. ALLEN, D.D., D.D.—The Poets of the Old Testament. 6s. net.
 HAYLING, G. and M.—Trynold. 6s.
 HENSON, REV. CANON HENSLEY, D.D.—The Creed of the Pulpit. 6s.
 KILMAN, REV. JOHN, D.D.—Among Famous Books. 6s.
 KNOWLES, JOSEPHINE THICHAIRN—The Upholstered Cage. 6s.
 LLMBERG, R. ERNST—Portrait Miniatures of Five Centuries. With 75 Coloured Facsimile Plates, representing selected Masterpieces of Miniature from the Eighteenth to the Twentieth Centuries. Limited Edition, £2 2s. net.
 MACAULAY, REV. A. B.—The World of the Cross. 6s.
 MACAULAY, ROSIE—The Lo Stone. 6s.
 MACDONALD, J. RAMSAY, M.P.—Margaret Lethel Macdonald (Mrs. J. Ramsay Macdonald). A Memoir. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.
 MACKAY, REV. W. MACKINTOSH, B.D.—Bible Types of Modern Women. 5s.
 MILLER, REV. J. R., D.D.—Life's Open Door. 3s. 6d.
 MORRISON, REV. G. H., M.A.—The Afterglow of God. 5s.
 NATHAN, ROSAMOND—Tamsie. 6s.
 NICOLL, SIR W. ROBERTSON, M.A., LL.D. (Edited by)—The Expositor's Treasury of Children's Sermons. With Index, complete, in one volume, 15s. net before publication, 20s. net afterwards.
 NICOLL, SIR W. ROBERTSON, M.A., LL.D.—The Problem of Edwin Drood: A Study in the Methods of Dickens. 4s. 6d. net.
 PAGET, ST. PIERRE—Another Deceit. 5s. net.
 POE, EDGAR ALLAN—The Bells and other Fictions. With 28 Plates in Colour and Line Drawings, by Edmund Dulac. 15s. net. Limited Edition de Luxe, bound in vellum, £2 2s. net.
 RICE, ALICE HIGGAN—A Romance of Billy Goat Hill. Illustrated. 4s.
 SHAKESPEARE'S TRAGEDY OF ROMEO AND JULIET. With 22 Plates in Colour and Line Drawings, by W. Heathcote, R.I. 10s. 6d. net. Limited Edition de Luxe, bound in vellum, £2 2s. net.
 SMITH, REV. PROFESSOR DAVID, M.A., D.D.—The Historic Jesus. 2s. 6d. net.
 STEUART, J. A.—The Rock of the Ravens. 6s.
 SWAN, ANNIE S.—Woven of the Wind. 4s. 6d.
 SWANSE, MARTIN—The Sporting Instinct. 6s.
 TOWNSEND, STEPHEN—The Tuppys. 6s.
 TOWER, WALTER S., M.A., LL.D., and ROBERTS, JOHN, F.G.S., M.Inst.M.E.—Petroleum: The Motive Power of the Future. Illustrated. 6s. net.

Messrs. Holden & Hardingham.

- BULLEN, FRANK T.—A Bountiful Boy. With Frontispiece. 3s. 6d.
 BYNG, HON. MRS. JULIAN—Barriers. 6s.
 CROMMELIN, MAY—The Golden Bow. 6s.
 KENYON, EDITH C.—The Weaving of Miranwy: A Welsh Love Story. 6s.
 "LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE"—Republican France, 1870-1912: Her Statements Policy, Vicissitudes and Social Life. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.
 MANSFIELD, CHARLOTTE—Love and a Woman. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
 MCCUTCHEON, GEORGE BARR—The Huskies of Fith. 3s. net.
 RHODES, KATHRYN—Fairy Gold. 6s.
 SOISSON, THE COUNT DE—My Sentimental Ancestress. 6s.
 SOISSON, THE COUNT DE—Six Great Princesses of the French Court (the Daughters of the Regent). Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.
 STUART, DOROTHY MARGARET—St. Lo: A Romance of the Fifteenth Century. 6s.
 WASTON, KATE HELEN—The Man Macdonald: An Anglo-Indian Romance. 6s.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett.

- BODKIN, JUDGE M'CONNELL—His Brother's Keeper. 6s.
 GODFREY, MRS. TOM—The Humber. 6s.
 HICKEY, WILLIAM—Memoirs of William Hickey. From an old MS. recently discovered. 12s. 6d. net.
 LEROUX, GASTON. Translated by EDGAR JEPSON.—The Man with the Black Feather. 6s.
 PAGE, GERTRUDE.—The Great Splendour. 6s.
 REUSSELAER, MRS. JOHN KING VAN—Prophetic, Educational and Playing Cards: Their Origin, History and Uses. 10s. 6d. net.
 ROBIN, E. GALLIENNE—Christine: A Guiney Girl. 6s.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADELAIDE.—The Man with the Money. 6s.
 WIDOW OF A DIPLOMAT—Intimacies of Court and Society. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

- ADAM, STANLEY, and WHITE, BERNARD (Edited by).—Parodies and Imitations, Old and New. With a foreword by Sir A. Quiller-Couch. 3s. 6d. net.
 RENSON, ROBERT HUGH.—Come Rack! Come Rope! 6s.
 LRENDON, J. A.—Twelve Great Passions. Beautifully Illustrated. 6s. net.

- CHAILTE-LONG, COLONEL (General Gordon's Chief-of-Staff).—My Life in Four Continents. In 2 Vols., well illustrated. 24s. net.
 CHAMBERS, G. F.—Astronomy. Illustrated. 5s. net.
 COOK, THEODORE A. (Edited by).—An Anthology of Humorous Verse. 3s. 6d. net.
 D'AUVERGNE, MURIEL N. (Edited by).—An Anthology of Babyhood. With Coloured Plates and Decorations. 3s. 6d. net.
 EDWARDES, TICKNER.—The Honey-Star. 6s.
 EVERETT-GREEN, EVELYN.—Miss Mallory of Mote. 6s.
 FOWLER, EDITH HENRIETTA (HON. MRS. HAMILTON).—Life of H. H. Fowler, First Viscount Wolverhampton. 1 Vol. 21s. net.
 FRASER, MRS. HUGH.—Further Reminiscences. 16s. net.
 GOETHE.—Faust. Illustrated by Willy Pogany. 6s. net.
 HUTCHINSON, WALTER (Edited by).—Part I. of "The Customs of the World." A Popular Account of the most interesting Customs of the World's Peoples. Illustrated. To be completed in about 24 Fortnightly Parts. 7d. net.
 INGPEN, ADA M. (Edited by).—Women as Letter-Writers. 3s. 6d. net.
 PAPE, FRANK.—The Book of Psalms. Illustrated by Frank Papé. 10s. 6d. net.
 PYECRAFT, W. P.—The Infancy of Animals. Illustrated. 6s. net.
 RIVERS, JOHN.—Greuze and His Models. An Art Book, superbly illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.
 SCHUMACHER, HENRY.—The Fair Enchantress: A Romance of Lady Hamilton's Early Years. Illustrated. 6s.
 SERGEANT, PHILIP W.—Little Jennings and Fighting Dick Talbot. Illustrated. 24s. net.
 STEP, EDWARD.—Messmates: A Book of Strange Companionships. Illustrated. 6s. net.
 STEP, EDWARD.—Toadstools and Mushrooms of the Countryside. Illustrated. 5s. net.

Messrs. E. C. & T. C. Jack.

- BRINTON, SELWYN, M.A.—Pergino (Masterpieces of Colour Series.) With 8 Plates in Colour and a Monograph by a writer of distinction. 1s. 6d. net.
 CORDER, PROFESSOR F., F.R.A.M.—Beethoven. (Masterpieces of Music Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
 CORDER, PROFESSOR F., F.R.A.M.—Wagner. (Masterpieces of Music Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
 COWEN, SIR FREDERIC.—Mendelssohn. (Masterpieces of Music Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
 COWEN, SIR FREDERIC.—Mozart. (Masterpieces of Music Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
 GILBERT, HENRY.—Robin Hood and the Men of the Greenwood. Sixteen Plates in Colour by Walter Crane. 7s. 6d. net.
 HAWKS, ELLISON.—Bees. ("Shown to the Children" Series.) 2s. 6d. net.
 HIRD, FRANK.—A Pageant of Lancashire Characters. Profusely Illustrated and with Presentation Plate. Fourteen parts at 7d. net per part.
 INNES, A. D.—A History of the British Nation. 400 Illustrations and Maps. 3s. 6d. net.
 JACKSON, ALICE F. (Edited by).—Dickens and Scott for Boys and Girls. "Great Expectations"; "Nicholas Nickleby"; "Waverley." Eight Drawings in Colour by the best artists. 1s. 6d. net per volume. Also in cloth as Prize Books. 2s.
 JACKSON, ALICE F. (Edited by).—Historical Romances. New Volumes: "Days of Bruce"; "Crecy and Poitiers." Eight Coloured Plates by the best artists. 1s. 6d. net per volume. Also in cloth as Prize Books. 2s.
 KONOUDY, PAUL G.—The Uffizi Gallery. With 50 Reproductions in Colour of its most famous pictures. Binding design in gold by Joseph Simpson. 21s. net.
 MACGREGOR, MARY.—The Story of Rome. Twenty Coloured Plates by Paul Woodroffe, Dudley Heath, and W. Rainey. 7s. 6d. net.
 MARSHALL, H. E.—Canada's Story; India's Story. Australasia's Story; South Africa's Story. ("Our Empire Story" Series.) Eight Plates in Colour 1s. 6d. net per volume.
 MOORAT, JOSEPH (Piano Music arranged by).—Thirty Old-Time Nursery Songs. Pictures in Colour by Paul Woodroffe. 2s. 6d. net.
 O'LOUND, JOHN.—London Stories. Illustrated from authentic sources by George Morrow (of the Punch staff), and other well-known artists. 2 Vols. 6s. net per vol. Also in Presentation binding at 15s. net the set.
 O'NEILL, MRS. E.—A Nursery History of England. 100 Coloured Pictures and many Black and White by George Morrow. 5s. net.
 RONALD, PROFESSOR LANDON.—Schumann. (Masterpieces of Music Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
 RONALD, PROFESSOR LANDON.—Tchaikowsky. (Masterpieces of Music Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
 STEEDMAN, AMY.—Our Island Saints. Eight Plates by Mrs. M. D. Spooner. 7s. 6d. net.
 STEVENSON, THOMAS.—Chrysanthemums. (Present-Day Gardening Series.) 1s. 6d. net.
 SYNGE, M. B., F.R.Hist.S.—A Book of Discovery. With Coloured and other authentic Illustrations, Maps, &c. 7s. 6d. net.
 THE PEOPLE'S BOOKS—A library of new books by writers of distinction bringing within the reach of all the results of modern knowledge. Cloth, 6d. net. Volumes for November: "Geology," by the Rev. T. G. Bonney, F.R.S.; "Weather-Science," by R. G. K. Lempert, M.A.; "Hypnotism," by ALICE HUTCHINSON, M.D.; "The Baby: A Mother's Book by a Mother," by a University Woman; "Motherhood: A Wife's Handbook," by H. S. Davidson, F.R.C.S.E.; "Navigation," by Rev. W. Hall, R.N., B.A.; "The Church of England," by Rev. Canon Masterman; "The Free Churches," by Rev. Edward Shillito, M.A.; "Co-operation," by JOSEPH CLAYTON; "The Training of the Child," by G. Spiller; "History of English Literature," by A. Compton-Rickett; "Tennyson," by AARON WATSON.
 THE CHARM SERIES.—The following new volumes: "The Charm of Gainsborough," "The Charm of Millais," "The Charm of Holman Hunt," "The Charm of Leighton," "The Charm of Whistler," "The Charm of Rembrandt." Each volume contains four masterpieces in Colour and a Monograph by Edgcumbe Staley and others. Art Covers, 6d. net; and in leather yapp, 1s. 6d. net.

Mr. John Lane.

- BAKER, JAMES, F.R.G.S.—Austria: Her People and Their Homelands. With 48 Pictures in Colour, by Donald Maxwell. 21s. net.
 COLOMA, LUIS (S. J.) Translated by LADY MORETON.—The Story of Don John of Austria. 16s. net.
 FOSTER, MYLES BIRKETT, F.R.A.M.—History of the Philharmonic Society. 10s. 6d. net.
 FRANCE, ANATOLE. Translated by ALFRED ALLINSON.—The Aspirations of Jean Servien. 6s.
 GROSSMITH, WEEDON.—From Studio to Stage. 16s.
 HEENEY, WM. BERTAL.—Pickanock. 6s.
 LUCKE, W. J.—The Joyous Adventures of Aristide Pujol. 6s.
 LOWRIE, DONALD.—My Life in Prison. 6s.
 PETRE, F. LORAIN.—Napoleon's Last Campaign in Germany. 12s. 6d. net.
 SAKI, H. H. MUNRO.—The Unbearable Bassington. 6s.
 STEWART, E.—Down the Mackenzie and Up the Yukon. 5s. net.
 STIRLING, A. M. W.—The Letter-Bag of Lady Elizabeth Spencer Stanhope. 12s. net.
 WEATIE, W. H. JAMES, with co-operation of MAURICE BROCKWELL.—The Van Eyck and their Art. Revised and Abridged Edition. 12s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

- CHISHOLM, A. STUART.—The Independence of Chile. 7s. 6d. net.
 D'AUVERGNE, E. B.—The Light Side of London. 6s. net.
 DRAKE, MAURICE.—A History of English Stained Glass. 42s. net.

- HALL, THORNTON.—Love Affairs of the Courts of Europe. 12s. 6d. net.
 LANG, ELSIE M.—Old English Towns. 6s. net.
 TRELAWNEY, GEORGE.—The Story of Harvey Sinclair. 2s. net.
 VALLOIS, G. M.—Antiques and Curios in Our Homes. 6s. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

- ABNEY, SIR WILLIAM DE WIVELESLE.—Researches in Colour Vision, and the Trichromatic Theory. With 5 Coloured Plates and Diagrams in the Text.
 ANTONY, C. M.—In St. Dominic's Country. Edited, with a Preface, by the Rev. T. M. Schwertner, O.P., S.T.L. With Illustrations.
 ARMSTRONG, E. FRANKLAND, D.Sc. Ph.D.—The Simple Carbohydrates and the Glucosides. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 5s. net.
 BATIFFOL, MGR PIERRE.—History of the Roman Breviary. Translated from the Third French Edition by the Rev. Atwell M. Y. Baylay.
 BEVERIDGE, W. H.—John and Irene: An Anthology of Thoughts on Woman.
 BODLEY, J. E. C., M.A.—Cardinal Manning and other Essays. With Frontispiece.
 BURGESS, VENERABLE ERNEST T., M.A. Archdeacon of Maritzburg.—The Deserted Lake; or, the Dragon that could not eat Fish. With Illustrations by Dorothea T. Burgess. 2s. net.
 BUSSELL, REV. F. W., D.D.—A New Government for the British Empire.
 CADBURY, EDWARD.—An Experiment in Industrial Organisation. With a Preface by W. J. Ashley, M.A.
 CARTER, REV. C. SYDNEY.—The English Church and the Reformation. 2s. net.
 COOLIDGE, W. A. B., M.A.—Alpine Studies. With 16 views of the High Alps, reproduced after photographs by Signor Vittorio Sella and the late Mr. W. F. Donkin. 8vo.
 DAKIN, H. D.—Oxidations and Reductions in the Animal Body. 4s. net.
 EDGAR, LADY.—A Colonial Governor in Maryland. Horatio Sharpe and his Times, 1751-1773. With Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.
 FITZSIMONS, F. W., Curator of the Port Elizabeth Museum.—South African Snakes and their Venom, and how to Treat Snake Bite. New Edition. Enlarged and Thoroughly Revised. With numerous Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.
 GRANT, ARTHUR J. A History of Europe.
 HALL, REV. FRANCIS J., D.D.—Dogmatic Theology. Vol. V.—Creation and Man. 6s. net.
 HENDERSON, WILLIAM J.—The Story of Music. New Edition, partly re-written. 3s. 6d. net.
 HOUSTOUN, R. A.—An Introduction to Mathematical Physics.
 LANG, ANDREW.—Shakespeare, Bacon, and The Great Unknown. With Illustrations.
 LANG, MRS. ANDREW.—Men, Women, and Mixxes. 7s. 6d. net.
 LANG, ANDREW.—Adventures among Books. With Photogravure Portrait of the Author after Sir W. B. Richmond, R.A. New and Cheaper Impression. 3s. 6d. net.
 LECKY, WILLIAM EDWARD HARTPOLE.—Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland: Flood—Grattan—O'Connell. New and Cheaper Impression. 2 vols. 5s. net.
 LOW, DAVID ALLAN.—Practical Geometry and Graphics. 7s. 6d. net.
 MASON, REV. A. J., D.D.—Memoir of W. E. Collins, D.D. Late Bishop of Gibraltar. With a Portrait. 6s. 6d. net.
 MEINERTZHAGEN, GEORGINA.—A Bremen Family. With 13 Illustrations.
 MELLOR, J. W., D.Sc.—Modern Inorganic Chemistry. With Diagrams. 8vo. 7s. 6d.
 MILLS, ERNESTINE.—The Life and Letters of Frederic Shields, A.R.W.S. 1833-1911. With 1 Photogravure and 40 other Illustrations.
 MOON, ROBERT OSWALD.—The Prognosis and Treatment of Diseases of the Heart. 3s. 6d. net.
 "PAT"—Molly and Margaret. With an Introduction by W. H. Hudson, and a Coloured Frontispiece and 8 Black and White Illustrations by Thomas Baines, Junior. 3s. 6d. net.
 PROTHERO, ROWLAND E.—English Farming Past and Present.
 RE HARTLEFF, LUCY.—Sex and Sanctity: A Sequel to "The Coming Order."
 RUSSELL, REV. MATTHEW (S. J.).—The Three Sisters of Lord Russell of Killowen. Sketches of Convent Life. With Portrait and other Illustrations. 6s. net.
 SHEEHAN, VERY REV. P. A. CANON.—Miriam Lucas: A Story of Irish Life. 6s.
 SHORT, WILFRED M. (Selected and arranged by).—Arthur James Balfour as Philosopher and Thinker. A Collection of the more important and interesting Passages in his Non political Writings, Speeches, and Addresses, 1879 to 1912. With Portrait. 7s. 6d. net.
 SOMERVILLE, E. P. (Written and Illustrated by).—The Discontented Little Elephant: A Cautionary Story. With 8 Coloured Pictures and 16 Uncoloured pages. 1s. 6d. net.
 TAWNEY, R. H.—The Agrarian Problem in the Sixteenth Century. With Reproductions of Plans (1500-1620). 9s. net.
 TERRY, RICHARD RUNCIMAN (Composed by).—Old Rhymes with New Tunes. With Illustrations by Gabriel Pippet. 2s. 6d. net.
 WAKEFORD, REV. JOHN.—The Word and the World: Pastoral Studies for the Modern Preacher. With Introduction by the Bishop of Lincoln. 3s. 6d. net.
 WARD, CYRIL, B.A.—Royal Gardens. Large Paper Edition, limited to 250 copies. 52 2s. net. Ordinary Edition. 16s. net.
 WARD, RIGHT REV. MONSIGNOR BERNARD.—The Eve of Catholic Emancipation. (3 vols.) Volume III. With Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.
 WATSON, WILLIAM.—Textile Design and Colour: Elementary Weaves and Figured Fabrics.
 WATSON, WILLIAM.—Advanced Textile Design.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

- ALCOTT, I. M.—Rose in Bloom. 1s. net.
 ASBJORNSEN.—Round the Yule Log. 1s. 6d.
 BLACKMORE, R. D.—Lorna Doone. Illustrated by C. Clark. 7s. 6d. net.
 FARNOL, JEFFERY.—The Broad Highway. Illustrated by C. E. Brock. 10s. 6d. net.
 KENNEDY, BART.—The Human Compass. 4s. 6d.
 KINGLAKE, A. W.—Eöthen; or, Traces of Travel Brought Home from the East. Illustrated by Frank Brangwyn, A.R.A. 12s. 6d. net.
 REINDORP, J.—The Toolhouse Club. 3s. 6d. net.
 STEP, EDWARD, F.L.S.—Sketches of Country Life. 3s. 6d.

Messrs. Macmillan & Co.

- AVELING, FRANCIS, Ph.D., D.Sc., D.D.—On the Consciousness of the Universal and the Individual.
 BALLS, W. LAURENCE, M.A.—The Cotton Plant in Egypt. 3s. net.
 BLACKWOOD, ALGERNON.—Jimbo: A Fantasy. 7d. net.
 BRADBURY, FREDERICK.—A History of Old Sheffield Plate. With nearly 3,000 Illustrations of Specimens, Marks, &c. 52 2s. net.
 BROUGHTON, RHODA.—Not Wisely but Too Well. 7d. net.
 BROWN, A. F.—Sylviculture in the Tropics. 8s. 6d. net.
 CRASTAIRS, R.—The Little World of an Indian District Officer.
 CRAWFORD, F. MARION.—Greifenstein. 7d. net.
 DAY, REV. LAL BEHARI.—Folk-Tales of Bengal. With 32 Illustrations in Colour by Warwick Goble. 15s. net and 42s. net.
 FITZMAURICE, LORD.—Life of William Earl of Shelburne, afterwards First Marquess of Lansdowne, with Extracts from His Papers and Correspondence. New Edition. 2 Vols.
 FORTESCUE, HON. JOHN.—Narrative of the Visit to India of their Majesties King George V. and Queen Mary and of the Coronation Durbar held at Delhi. 10s. 6d. net.
 FOX, ALICE WILSON.—A Regular Madam. 6s.
 GASKELL, MRS.—Cranford. With Preface by Lady Ritchie, and 100 Illustrations by Hugh Thomson. 3s. net.

GOLDSMITH.—The Vicar of Wakefield. With Preface by Austin Dobson, and 182 Illustrations by Hugh Thomson. 3s. net.
GRAHAM, STEPHEN.—A Triump's Sketches. 5s. net.
GREENE, HARRY PLUNKET.—Interpretation in Song.
HARDY, THOMAS.—The Wessex Edition of the Works of Thomas Hardy in Prose and Verse. 7s. 6d. net each. Vol. XIII: The Well Beloved. Vol. XIV: A Group of Noble Dames.
HARRISON, FREDERIC.—Among my Books, and other Reviews and Essays. 7s. 6d. net.
HEIBERG, NEILS.—White Ear and Peter: The Story of a Fox and a Fox Terrier. With 16 Coloured Plates by Cecil Aldin.
HEWITT, SIR FREDERIC W., M.V.O., M.A., M.D., etc.—Anæsthetics and their Administration. Fourth Edition. Prepared with the Assistance of Henry Robinson, M.A., M.D., B.C. 15s.
HOSE, CHARLES, Sc.D., and M'DOUGALL, WILLIAM, M.B., F.R.S. The Pagan Tribes of Borneo. With about 200 Full-page Illustrations and 100 in the Text. 2 Vols.
KENVON, SIR FREDERICK G., K.C.B.—Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament. Second Edition, revised.
LEAF, WALLER, Litt.D.—Troy. A Study in Homeric Geography. 12s. net.
MACKENZIE, COMPTON.—The Passionate Florentine. 7d. net.
McEWEN, JOHN R., M.A.—The Thought in Music.
MENZIES, ALLAN, D.D. The Second Epistle of the Apostle Paul to the Corinthians.
MITFORD, MARY RUSSELL.—Our Village. With Preface by Lady Ritchie, and 100 Illustrations by Hugh Thomson. 4s. net.
MURRAY, D. CHRISTIE.—Aunt Rachel. 7d. net.
NESBIT, E.—The Magic World. By F. Nesbit. 6s.
PIERSON, DR. N. G.—Principles of Economics. Translated from the Dutch by A. A. Wotzel. Vol. II.
PIGOU, A. C., M.A.—Wealth and Welfare.
ROLLESTON, HUMPHRY DAVY, M.A., M.D., F.R.C.P. Diseases of the Liver, Gall Bladder and Bile Ducts. Second Edition.
Six Lectures on the Inns of Court and of Chancery. 1s. net.
STEPHENS, JAMES. The Crock of Gold. 5s. net.
SUTHERLAND, JAMES. The Adventures of an Elephant Hunter.
TURNER, SIR WM., K.C.B., D.C.L., etc.—The Marine Mammals in the Anatomical Museum of the University of Edinburgh.
VAN MILLENGEN, ALEXANDER, M.A., D.D., and others.—Byzantine Churches in Constantinople, their History and Architecture.
WHARION, J. DILLI. The Reef. 6s.
YOUNGHUSAND, LADY. Marie Antoinette. Her Early Youth, 1770-1774.

Messrs. Mills & Boon.

ASH, DR. EDWIN.—Mental Self Help. 2s. 6d. net.
ASH, DR. EDWIN.—Nerves and the Nervous. Cheap Edition. 3s. 6d. net.
CALVERT, MRS. CHARLES.—Sixty-eight Years on the Stage. Cheap Edition. 6s.
CHAMPION DE CRÉSPIGNY, SIR CLAUDE.—Forty Years of a Sportsman's Life. Cheap Edition. 6s.
DE HORNE VAIZEY, MRS. G.—Billie Belshaw. 6s.
GRAHAM, HARRY.—Canned Classics. Pocket Edition. 4s. 6d. net.
GRAHAM, HARRY.—The Bolster Book. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.
GRIMSHAW, BEATRICE.—Guinea Gold. 6s.
LEAR, EDWARD. The Year Bird Book. (Children's).
LEBLANC, MAURICE.—Confessions of Arsène Lupin. 6s.
LINDENBAUM, J. B. Pocket Disraeli. 1s. net.
NEWIE, H. W. C.—The Socialist Countess. Cheap Edition.
SELOUS, EDMUND.—Zoo Conversation Book II. 6s.
SIMPSON, HAROLD.—Century of Ballads. 6s.

Mr. John Murray.

AMUNDSEN, CAPTAIN ROALD.—The Conquest of the South Pole. 2 Vols. Numerous Illustrations and Maps. £2 2s. net.
BONNEY, I. G., D.Sc., F.R.S.—Volcanoes. New and Revised Edition. 6s. net.
"BROWN LINNET."—The Snarer. 4s. 6d. net.
BURGOYNE, ALAN H., M.P. (Edited by).—The Navy League Annual. Demy 8vo. With Illustrations. 4s. net.
CROWE, J. A., and CAVALCASELLE, G. B.—History of Painting in North Italy. New Edition. Edited by Tancréd Borenius, Ph.D. 3 Vols. With numerous Illustrations.
ESHER, VISCOUNT. The Girlhood of Queen Victoria. Extracts from the private Diary of Her Majesty from her thirteenth year (1832), till her Marriage in 1840. Published by authority of His Majesty The King. 2 Vols. With Illustrations. 32s. net.
FRASER, EDWARD.—War Drama of the Eagles. The Story of Napoleon's Eagles.
GOMPERZ, THEODOR.—The Greek Thinkers. Vol. IV. 14s. net.
NAPIER OF MAGDALA, LADY.—Muddling Through. 6s.
OSTLER, ALAN.—The Arabs in Tripoli, with an Account of the Desert War.
PICKERING, A. D.—The Enlightenment of Sylvia. 6s.
SOANE, E. B.—Through Mesopotamia and Tukestan in Disguise.
TEMPLE, SIR R. C., BART.—Letters and Character Sketches from the House of Commons, 1886-1887. Written by the late Rt. Hon. Sir Richard Temple, Bart.
SODDY, FREDERICK.—The Interpretation of Radium. Third Edition. Revised and Enlarged. With Illustrations. 6s. net.
VACHELL, HORACE A.—Bunch Grass: A Chronicle of Life on a Cattle Ranch. 6s.
WATNEY, CHARLES, and LITTLE, JAMES A.—The Labour Unrest: Its Aims and Methods Explained.
WEIGALL, MISS RACHEL.—Correspondence of Lord Burghersh (Afterwards Earl of Westmorland), 1808-1840.
WILLMOTT, MISS ELLEN A.—The Genus Rosa, Part XXIII.
WYNDHAM, HON. MRS. HUGH.—Correspondence of Sarah, Lady Lyttelton, 1787-1870.

Messrs. Murray & Evenden.

BATES, MARY I.—Paul Flemming. 6s.
DOBSON, ELLEN M.—The Star Dream. With Preface by Bishop of Chichester. 1s. 6d. net.
MONEY, MRS. ELLIOT.—Tivvils, East and West. 1s. net and 2s. net.
NAYHARD, HUGH.—The Red Dagger. 2s. net.
TURNBULL, E. G.—The Chucklers Children. 6s.
TURPIN, FLORENCE E.—Fable. 1s. net.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

COLLINS, FRANCIS A.—The Boy's Book of Model Aeroplanes. 3s. 6d. net.
COURLANDER, ALPHONSE.—Seth of the Cross. 2s. net.
FLETCHER, J. S.—The Fine Air of Morning. 6s.
FORBES, LADY ANGELA.—The Other Woman's Shadow. 6s.
FYRIE, JOHN.—The Story of the Borgias. 15s. net.
HAGGARD, H. RIDER.—Queen Sheba's Ring. 2s. net.
HAMILTON, ANGUS.—In Abor Jungles. 18s. net.
HARDEN, MAXIMILIAN.—Monarchs and Men. 10s. 6d. net.
HARMAND, JEAN.—A Keeper of Royal Secrets. Being the Private and Political Life of Madame de Genlis. 16s. net.
HERGEGELLET, MARIANO.—England's Weak Points. 3s. 6d. net.
JUDITH, MADAME.—My Autobiography. 10s. net.
LEEDER, S. H.—Vellied Mysteries of Egypt. 10s. net.

LEGGIE, EDWARD.—King Edward in His True Colours. 16s. net.
LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—The Indiscretions of a Lady's Maid. 2s. net.
MIDDLETON, JESSIE ADELAIDE.—The Grey Ghost Book. 6s.
MILLER, ARTHUR, M.D.—The Care of Children. 2s. net.
PRUSSIA, PRINCESS LOUISE OF.—Forty-Five Years of My Life. 16s. net.
"RITA."—The House Opposite. 6s.
ROBERTS, MORLEY.—The Private Life of Henry Matland. 6s.
SINCLAIR, ARCHDEACON.—The Chapels Royal. 21s. net.
WILSON, DR. ANDREW.—Before the Doctor Comes. 2s. net.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

CONSCIENCE, HENRI. Le Gentil Homme Pauvre (French). 1s. net.
DICKENS, CHARLES. Martin Chuzzlewit. Part I. 6d. net.
HORNING, F. W.—Mr Justice Raffles. 7d. net.
KROPOTKIN, PRINCE.—Fields, Factories and Workshops. 1s. net.
MASON, A. E. W.—The Broken Road. 7d. net.
NELSON'S ENCYCLOPEDIA LIBRARY.—A Bible Concordance. 1s. net.
WENDELL, BARRATT. France d'Aujourd'hui (French). 1s. net.

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co., Ltd.

FETHERSTON, REV. SIR G. R., Bart.—Songs of Sunlight. 2s. 6d. net.
HARPER, REV. WILSON.—Christian Ethics and Social Progress. 4s. net.
PIERSON, DELAVAN L.—Dr A. T. Pierson's Life. 6s. net.
RUSSELL, E.—Matland of Lethington. (Limited to 1,000 copies.) 15s. net.
RUSSELL, LADY AGATHA.—Golden Grain. 2s. net.
RUSSELL, SIR EDWARD.—Arrested Fugitives. 6s. net.
WACE, THE VERY REV. HENRY, D.D.—Questions of the Day. 6s. net.
WATSON, REV. JOHN, D.D. (IAN MAC LARREN).—Books and Bookmen. 1s. net.
WATT, LAUGHLAN MACLEAN.—Scottish Life and Poetry. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.

DWIGHT, MARY I.—Children of Labrador. 8 Coloured Illustrations. 1s. 6d. net.
HENDERSON, REV. GORGE, M.A., B.D.—The Child in the Midst. 6d. net.
KELMAN, JOHN, D.D.—The Road: A Study of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. Vol. II. With 8 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. 3s. 6d. net and 6s. net. (Vol. I already published; Vol. III in preparation.)
MACASKILL, REV. JOHN, M.A.—The Dominant Ideas of Christianity. 1s. 6d. net.
THOMSON, J. PRINGLE, M.A.—Alexander Henderson. The Covenanter. With Foreword by Lord Balfour of Burleigh. 1s. 6d. net.
WRIGHT, REV. T. H.—Great Themes in the Bible and in Poetry. Parallel Study in Scripture and Literature. 6s. net.
WHYTE, REV. PRINCIPAL, D.D., LL.D.—Jacob Behmen. An Appreciation. 1s. net.

Messrs. John Ouseley, Ltd.

BLAILEY, EDITHA I.—Dorothy Gayle. 6s.
BUCHANAN, ALFRED. The Modern Heloise. 6s.
CURTIS, CAPTAIN HENRY.—Iduna's Lover. 6s.
FINNEMORE, JOHN.—House of the Kaid. 6s.
HILL, CHAILETTON.—Nietzsche (An Exposition and an Appreciation). 7s. 6d. net.
TAYLOR, EVELYN M.—Six Fairy Plays. 1s. 6d. net.
WARD, C. H. DUDLEY.—Boadicea. 6s.
WINSLOW, DR. L. FORBES.—The Insanity of Passion and Crime. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

Oxford University Press.

ATKINSON, C. T. (Edited by).—Memoirs of Admiral Carden, written by Himself, 1840.
COLERIDGE, E. H. (Edited by). Coleridge (Oxford Poets). 1s. 6d.
FOSTER, W.—The English Factories in India. Vol. VII. (1642-5). 12s. 6d. net.
FRANCIS, E. K. (Translated by).—Kebble's Lectures on Poetry. 2 vols.
GARROD, H. W. (Chosen and Edited by).—The Oxford Book of Latin Verse. 6s. and 7s. 6d. net.
GRIERSON, H. J. C. (Edited by).—Donne's Poetical Works. 2 vols.
JONES, H. STUART (Edited by).—Catalogue of the Sculptures in the Museo Capitolino. By Members of the British School at Rome. 2 vols., one in 8vo containing the Catalogue, the other in 4to containing colotype plates.
KER, W. P. (Collected by).—Essays and Studies by Members of the English Association. Vol. III. 5s.
KINGSLEY, CHARLES.—Hereward the Wake.
MACKENZIE, K.—A Concordance to Petrarch.
MURRAY, GILBERT.—Four Stages of Greek Religion.
QUILLER-COUCH, SIR ARTHUR (Chosen and Edited by).—The Oxford Book of Victorian Verse. 6s. and 7s. 6d. net.
RAND, E. K., and WILKINS, E. H.—A Concordance to Dante's Latin Works. 30s. net.
ROBB, F. M. (Edited by).—The Poems of Adam Lindsay Gordon. 2s. and 1s. net.
SKEAT, W. W.—The Science of Etymology. 4s. 6d.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

ALLIOT, ANNE.—The Memoirs of Mimosa. 6s.
BRAME, CHARLOTTE.—A Struggle for a Ring. 6d.
CHESTER, S. BEACH.—Diners à Deux. 5s. net.
DANBY, FRANK.—Dr. Phillips. 1s. net.
F. K.—Every-day Pudding Book. New edition. 1s. net.
JAMES, A. E.—Her Majesty the Flapper. 6s.
MILES, ALFRED H.—Diners-Out Vade Mecum. 2s. net, leather; 1s. 6d. net, cloth.
MILES, ALFRED H.—In the Lion's Mouth. 5s.
MILES, ALFRED H.—Where Duty Calls. 4s.
MILLS-MALET, VINCENT.—The Meteoric Benson. 6s.
PEARCE, CHARLES E.—A Star of the East. 6s.
ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADELAIDE.—Love of His Life. 6d.
SUTCLIFFE, HALLIWELL.—Priscilla of the Good Intent. 6d.
WORTH, MARIE.—The Every-day Savoury Book. 1s. net.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

BIGHAM, MADGE A.—Overheard in Fairyland, or Peter Pan Tales. 2s. 6d. net.
BRADLEY, J. F.—Nonconformists and the Welsh Church Bill. 1s. net.
COLLINS, A. H., M.A. (Oxon.).—Symbolism of Animals and Birds in English Church Architecture. With 120 Illustrations. 5s. net.
DAVIS, ANNIE, F. Inc S.T.—The Junior Woman Secretary. 1s. net.
DOWLER, FRANK, A.C.A., and HARRIS, F. M.—Auditing, Accounting and Banking. 5s. net.
FEASEY, J. EATON.—Narrative Poems. 10d.
FULLER, SIR J. BAMFFYLD, K.C.S.I. (formerly Lieut.-Governor of Eastern Bengal).—The Empire of India. ("All Red" Series). About 24 Illustrations and Map. 7s. 6d. net.

- HOLMAN, H. M.A.—Hand and Eye Training. Its Theoretical and Practical Principles. 3s.
 HUDSON, ROBERT.—The Romance of our Colonies. 1s. 8d.
 JONES, CHRISTOPHER.—Handbook of Advertising. 2s. 6d. net.
 LYMAN, EDNA.—Story Telling: What to Tell and How to Tell it. 2s. 6d. net.
 MASON, EDWARD, Mus. Bac.—Notes of Lessons on Music. (Staff Notation). Vol. 1. 3s. 6d. net.
 MURRAY, MISS E. R.—English Infants' Schools and Kindergartens. 2s. 6d. net.
 OKEY, THOMAS.—An Introduction to the Art of Basket-making. Profusely Illustrated. 2s. 6d. net.
 PHILLIPS, W. B., A.C.A., A.C.S.—Accounts of Executors, Administrators and Trustees. 3s. 6d. net.
 PORRITT, H. W., and NICKLIN, W., A.S.A.A.—Full Course in Book-keeping. 3s. 6d. net.
 RANKIN, H. A.—Pencil Drawing. 144 Plates. 4s. net.
 SMITH, ANNIE B.—Personal Hygiene for Girls. 1s. 3d.
 STALEY, CANON VERNON.—Considerations for Advent. Cloth, 1s. 6d. net, leather, 2s. 6d. net.
 TOVEY, P., A.C.I.S. (Editor, Assisted by Eminent Specialists)—Pitman's Dictionary of Secretarial Law and Practice. Part I. Stiff board covers. 2s. 6d. net.
 VINE, G. R., B.Sc.—Experimental Mathematics. (Stage 2). 6d. net.
 London Church Handbook, Being a Compendium of Information upon Church Affairs in the County of London. 2s. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam & Sons.

- A ROOSEVELT HOSPITAL GRADUATE NURSE and a GRATEFUL PATIENT.—A Stitch in Time. 3s. 6d. net.
 BANKS, EDGAR J., Ph.D.—Bismay, or the Lost Adab. 21s. net.
 BARCLAY, FLORENCE L.—The Following of the Stat. Illustrated Edition. 20s. 6d. net.
 CAVEN, STEWART.—Palmer's Green. 6s.
 CRAMER, JESSE GRANT.—The Letters of Ulysses S. Grant. 7s. 6d. net.
 CUMONT, FRANZ.—Astology and Religion among the Greeks and Romans. 6s. net.
 CUTTING, MARY STEWART.—The Lovers of Sanna. 2s. net.
 DE GROOT, J. J. M.—Religions of China. 6s. net.
 DRUMMOND.—The Poetical Works of William Henry Drummond. 10s. 6d. net.
 DOUGHERTY, J. HAMPDEN.—The Power of the Federal Judiciary over Legislation. 10s. 6d. net.
 FIELDE, ADELE M.—Chinese Fairy Tales: Forty Stories told by the Almond-Eyed Folk. 4s. net.
 GILMAN, CHARLOTTE PERKINS.—Women and Economics. 3s. 6d. net.
 HARPER, FRANK D.—The Conquering of the Wilderness. 2 Vols.
 HOSMER, JAMES KENDALL, LL.D.—The Last Leaf. 6s. net.
 JACKSON, SAMUEL MACAULAY.—The Latin Works and the Correspondence of Huldreich Zwingli. 7s. 6d. net per Vol.
 JAMES, MISS L.—The Chafing Dish and The Preparation of Sandwiches. 5s. net.
 KENT, ELIZABETH.—Who? 6s.
 KEY, ELLEN.—The Women Movement. 6s. net.
 LARSON, LAWRENCE M.—King Canute the Great and The Rise of Danish Imperialism. 4s. net.
 LESTER, CHARLES STANLEY.—The Historic Jesus. 10s. 6d. net.
 MACDONALD, GEORGE.—The Light Princess and Other Fairy Tales. 4s. net.
 MACLAUGHLIN, REV. ROBERT W.—Washington and Lincoln. 6s. net.
 MAGOUN, JEANNE BARTHOLOW.—The Mission of Victoria Wilhelmina. 2s. net.
 MAUREL, ANDRE.—Little Cities of Italy. (Second Series). 9s. net.
 MCKREADY, KELVIN.—A Beginner's Star Book. 9s. net.
 MORET, ALEXANDRE.—Kings and Gods of Egypt. 7s. 6d. net.
 NILES, GRACE GREYLOCK.—The Hoosac Valley. 10s. 6d. net.
 NITORE, INAZO.—The Japanese Nation. 6s. net.
 O'CONNOR, MRS. T. P.—Little Thank You. 2s. net.
 PAINE, THOMAS.—Common Sense. 4s. 6d. net.
 PERRY, FRANCES FOSTER.—Their Hearts' Desire. 2s. net.
 PHELPS, MYRON H.—Abbas Efendi: His Life and Teachings. 5s. net.
 PUTNAM, GEORGE HAVEN, Litt.D.—A Memoir of George Palmer Putnam. 21s. net.
 SAUNDERS, CHARLES FRANCIS.—The Indians of the Terraced Houses. 10s. 6d. net.
 SERVISS, GARRETT P.—Astronomy in a Nutshell. 4s. net.
 SMITH, GEORGINA CASTLE.—Mary Pilienger—Supreme Factor. 1s.
 ST. LEGER, EVELYN.—The Blackberry Pickers. 6s.
 STREET, LILIAN.—Tim and the Squire. 2s. net.
 SULLIVAN, MARY.—The Court Masques of James I. 6s. net.
 TAYLOR, BAYARD.—Boys of Other Countries. 7s. 6d. net.
 TYRRELL, HENRY.—Shenandoah. 6s.
 VAN DRESSER, JASMINE STONE.—How to Find Happyland. 5s. net.

Messrs. Fleming H. Revell Co.

- BYRUM, ENOCH E.—The Secret of Prayer. Suggestions How to Pray. Probable price, 2s. 6d. net.
 CHAPMAN, MRS. WOODALLEN.—How Shall I Tell My Child. A Little Book for Parents. 1s. net.
 FAUNCE, W. H. P., D.D.—What Does Christianity Mean. The Cole Lectures for 1912. 4s. 6d. net.
 GORDON, S. D.—Quiet Talks about our Lord's Return. 2s. 6d. net.
 GRIFFIS, WILLIAM ELLIOT, D.D.—A Modern Pioneer in Korea. The Life Story of Henry G. Appenzeller. Illustrated. 4s. net.
 HILLIS, NEWELL DWIGHT, D.D.—All the Year Round. Sermons for Church and Civic Celebrations. 3s. 6d. net.
 LYNCH, FREDERICK, D.D.—The New Opportunities of the Ministry. With an Introduction by Hugh Black. 2s. 6d. net.
 NEWTON, JOSEPH FORT.—The Eternal Christ. Studies in the Life of Vision and Service. 3s. 6d. net.
 PYRON, ANNIE JONES (Compiled by his Daughter).—Sam Jones' Revival Sermons. 3s. 6d. net.
 ROBERTS, PHILIP I.—The Dry Dock of a Thousand Wrecks. With Introduction by Dr. J. H. Jowett. 3s. 6d. net.
 ROSS, JOHNSTON G. A., M.A.—The Cross: The Report of a Mingivung. 1s. net.
 MACFARLAND, CHARLES S.—Spiritual Culture and Social Service. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

- CALTHROP, DION CLAYTON.—St. Quin. 6s.
 LATHBURY, MISS.—The Shoe Pinches. 3s. 6d. net.
 MOORE, MISS LESLIE.—The Nitch in the Stick. 6s.
 WESTRUP, WILLIAM.—The Debt. 6s.

Messrs. G. Routledge & Sons.

- BECKFORD, WILLIAM.—Vathek. With Original Illustrations in Colour. 2s. 6d. net.
 EMERSON, RALPH WALDO.—Re-issue of the "Riverside (Copyright) Edition." In 12 Vols. I.—Nature. II.—Essays: First Series. III.—Essays: Second Series. IV.—Representative Men. V.—English Traits. VI.—Conduct of Life. VII.—Society and Solitude. VIII.—Letters and Social Aims. IX.—Poems. X.—Lectures and Sketches. XI.—Natural History and Intellect. XII.—Miscellaneous. 1s. net each.

- LAN-DAVIS, CYRIL F., F.R.P.S.—Telephotography. Illustrated. 1s. net and 2s. net.
 PAYNE, CHARLES H. (Edited and Abridged by).—Tod's Annals of Rajasthan Annals of Mewar. 3s. 6d. net.
 ROGERS, REGINALD.—Lyrics, Songs and Idylls.
 ROSSETTI, CHRISTIANI.—Goblin Market. With Original Illustrations in Colour by M. Tarrant. 2s. 6d. net.
 SCORER, A. G., F.E.S.—The Entomologist's Log-Book.

Messrs. Sands & Co.

- CAPIES, H. M.—Life and Letters of A. Bertram Wilberforce. Second Edition. 10s. 6d.
 GLAZIER, FRANCESCA.—The Soliloquies of St. Augustine. (Translated.) 2s. net.
 HAULTMONT, MARIE.—Through Refining Fires. 6s.
 HOGG, H. (THE ELTRECH SHEPHARD).—Tales. In 2 vols. 5s. net, 2 vols.
 LANSLOTT, DOM. O. S. B.—Reasonable Service, or Why We Believe. 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. Robert Scott.

- EMMET, REV. CYRIL.—St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. 3s. 6d. net.
 FIELD, CLAUD (Selected and Translated).—Jewish Legends of the Middle Ages. Illustrated by May Mulliner. 2s. 6d.
 GIRDLESTONE, REV. R. B.—The Building Up of the Old Testament. 5s. net.
 KEBLE, REV. JOHN.—The Christian Year. 2s. net.
 LACEY, REV. T. A.—Marriage in Church and State. 5s. net.
 LEES, REV. C. HARRINGTON.—The Sunshine of the Good News. 3s. 6d. net.
 PLUMMER, REV. ALFRED, D.D.—The Continental Reformation. 3s. 6d. net.
 REASON, REV. WILL.—Ten-minute Talks to Boys and Girls. 2s. net.
 SHEPPARD, REV. W. J. L.—The Parochial Mission. 2s. net.
 TAIT, REV. ARTHUR J., D.D.—The Heavenly Session of Our Lord. 6s. net.
 TIDBALL, REV. W. ST. CLAIR.—Christianity and Other Faiths. 5s. net.
 YOUNG, REV. F. A. C.—Analysis of Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, Book V. 3s. net.
 YOUNG, REV. DINSDALE T.—The Unveiled Evangel. 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. Martin Secker.

- ABERCROMBIE, LASCELLES.—Hardy: A Critical Study. 7s. 6d. net.
 BENNETT, ARNOLD.—Those United States. 5s. net.
 MACKENZIE, COMPTON.—Kensington Rhymes. 5s. net.
 STRAUS, RALPH.—Carriages and Coaches. 18s. net.
 SWINNERTON, FRANK.—Gissing: A Critical Study. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson.

- GULLIVER'S VOYAGES TO LILLIPUT AND BROBDINGNAG.—New illustrated Edition for Children. 6s. net.
 STOBART, J. C.—The Grandeur that was Rome. 30s. net.
 STOTT, BEATRICE.—Rosemary and Rue. 6s.
 SZASZ, DE ELSA.—The Wild Hyacinth. A Tale of Transylvania. 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. Elliot Stock.

- ALVES, LT.-COL., M.A.—Two Stumbling Blocks; or, With Blunt Tools. 3s. 6d. net.
 CLEGG, JAMES.—The International Directory of Booksellers and Libraries, and Bibliophile's Manual. Ninth Edition. 6s. net.
 DENISON, REV. FRED. H. P., B.A.—The True Religion: A Series of Historical Sketches. 5s. net.
 DODDS, MARY L.—The Wider Gospel, or, Are there few that be Saved? 3s. 6d. net.
 "MONA." (Compiled by) —The "Character" Birthday Book and Album (The). 5s. net and 7s. 6d. net.
 SLATER, J. H.—Book Prices Current, volume 26. 7s. 6d. net.
 SIRAFFORD, COUNTESS OF (Compiled and Arranged by).—Selection of Texts from the Tauchnitz Edition of the New Testament, with Parallel Readings from the Sinaitic, Vatican, and Alexandrian Codices. Revised and Enlarged. 3s. 6d. net.
 TAYLOR, THE LATE REV. HUGH.—The Gospel Plan in Easy Texts. New Edition. 1s.
 WHATMORE, ARTHUR W.—Insula Britannica. With Four Maps. 20s. net.
 WIENER, HAROLD, M.A., LL.B.—Pentateuchal Studies. 6s. net.
 WILBERFORCE, VEN. ARCHDEACON.—Steps in Spiritual Growth. 3s. net.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

- BARTHEZ, DR. E.—The Empress Eugenie and Her Circle. 10s. 6d. net.
 BEREL, AUGUST.—My Life. 7s. 6d. net.
 DALTON, LEONARD V.—Venezuela. 10s. 6d. net.
 HACKWOOD, FREDERICK W.—William Hone: His Life and Times. 10s. 6d. net.
 MALLIK, MANMALT C.—A Study in Ideals: Great Britain and India. 10s. 6d. net.
 MILLER, H. CRICHTON.—Hypnotism and Disease. 5s. net.
 MURRAY, J. H. P.—Papua, or British New Guinea. 15s. net.
 PALMER, JOHN.—The Censor and the Theatres. 7s. 6d. net.
 PONSONBY, ARTHUR.—The Decline of Aristocracy. 7s. 6d. net.
 SHELDON, CHARLES.—The Wilderness of the North Pacific Coast Islands. 8s. 6d. net.
 SPENCER, REV. FREDERICK A. M.—The Meaning of Christianity. 7s. 6d. net.
 STRACHEY, RAY.—Frances Willard: Her Life and Work. 5s. net.
 WAUGH, ROSA.—The Life of Benjamin Waugh. 5s. net.

Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.

- ASKEW, A. and C.—Outlaw Jess. 6d.
 BOOTHBY, GUY.—The Countess Londa. 6d.
 HOWARD, KEBLE.—One of the Family. 2s. net.
 LEIGHTON, MARIE C.—Her Marriage Lines. 6s.
 LE QUEUX, WILLIAM.—A Secret Service. 1s. net.
 MITFORD, BERTRAM.—A Dual Resurrection. 6d.
 MITFORD, BERTRAM.—Seafood's Snake. 6s.
 MOBERLY, L. G.—Violet Dunstan. 6s.
 OPPENHEIM, E. PHILLIPS.—Mr. Wingrave, Millionaire. 7d. net.
 "RITA."—Two Bad Blue Eyes. 7d. net.
 ROBERTS, CHARLES G. D.—The Feet of the Futive. 6s.
 WALLACE, EDGAR.—The People of the River. 6s.
 WHITE, FRED. M.—A Front of Brass. 6d.
 WHITE, FRED. M.—A Queen of the Scags. 6d.
 WHITE, FRED. M.—The Corner House. 7d. net.

Thames Warehouses.
(Whistler.)

THE READER.

THE TRIUMPH OF WHISTLER.

BY JOSEPH PENNELL.

(Joint Author with Elizabeth Robins Pennell of the Authorised Life of Whistler.)

HE being dead yet speaketh." Never were these words better exemplified than in the case of Whistler. It is true that only nine short years have passed since his death, but in these nine years great things have happened to the memory of the artist whom Sir E. J. Poynter insulted by calling "the Idle Apprentice," after his death, at an Academy banquet; though Whistler's greatness as an artist was acknowledged before the close of his life—and he lived long enough to know that his place was among the great. His eminence among artists is now assured, as almost all his most important canvases have been secured by the most important galleries of the world. His few great pictures still in private collections would at once be acquired by other great galleries if they could be acquired. And nothing counts more for the fame of an artist than to live, hung in a great collection, with the great works of all ages and all lands.

In portraiture, in his nocturnes and marines, he is the modern master.

In etching he is the supreme artist of all time, and his supremacy is universally acknowledged.

His pastels and water colours and lithographs are among the triumphs of the art of our day.

His works thus cover nearly every phase of the graphic arts, but as he himself has said, "the man who can't paint everything, can't paint anything."

In literature—for he was no mere painter—"The Ten O'Clock" and "The Gentle Art" are classics that, founded on the rock of tradition, will endure for ever.

By his personality and his wit he will live with Dr. Johnson and Cellini. But this is not all. His theories are accepted by those who never knew he propounded them, as well as by those who have always known he was right when he uttered them.

His sayings -- and the things he never could have said -- are the stock-in-trade of the journalist, as well as the author, now they have ceased reviling him -- reviling the very things they now quote and praise.

His pictures, which for years he could not sell, are found in reproductions in every home and on the popular postcard.

His etchings and lithographs are the base of every collection -- and their possession the ambition of every collector.

Surrounding and growing amid these facts are the strangest fictions, for to the world he was a man of mystery, and from this mystery fantastic tales are being woven.

Portrait of Whistler, by Himself.

In the George M'Culloch Collection.

Major George Washington Whistler,
Father of the Artist.

From Life of Whistler (first edition), by E. R. and J. Pennell (Heinemann).

tation, contention and appreciation, in the struggle for the right, and to carry on tradition which, as he said, carries everything onwards.

The tributes to his memory in writing are endless and increase year by year. To most men a biography is the end of a life, the pigeon-holing of a personage.

Though he is no longer with us, his spirit broods over the world, and, as in his life, almost everything that happens in the world of art revolves around his work and his word, and he, as always, is the subject of controversy, quo-

Whistler has been the inspiration of a whole library of literature, and what passes for it. From the point of view of THE BOOKMAN, this literary tribute to his memory is astounding—and therefore worth discussing—and it has, save by us, scarcely been referred to. In the nine years since his death, between sixteen and twenty complete books about him have been published.

Within a short time after his death the first volume appeared—"The Art of James McNeill Whistler," by Messrs. Way and Dennis, who say their book was prepared before his death with the intention of submitting it to him. Fortunately, or unfortunately, they did not do so, for Mr. Way had broken with Whistler, and Mr.

Whistler's Mother

From Life of Whistler (first edition), by E. R. and J. Pennell (Heinemann).

Title Page of one of Whistler's School-Books.

In the possession of Thomas Childs.

From Life of Whistler (first edition), by E. R. and J. Pennell (Heinemann).

Dennis, I do not think, had ever seen him. Still another chapter of "The Gentle Art" was lost to the world because he was not consulted, but the book was interesting, especially the part about lithography, and it went through several editions.

Then came the "quick and ready" Mr. Mortimer Menpes, with "Whistler as I knew him," though no one I ever met could recognise Mr. Menpes' subject. This volume was saved by its illustrations, and it is extraordinary that it—in the large paper edition—was no success, for it contained an original etching, "The Menpes Children," by Whistler; but the text still lingers in my memory, as does much of the Menpes' family writing—a strange thing, but their own. An inundation followed. Mrs. Arthur Bell got out a volume, though I believe in this, or perhaps another form, it had been referred to Whistler shortly before his death, and he had objected to it. Then—I cannot give the order, I haven't the books by me—a volume in German by Prof. Dr. Hans W.

Singer was issued and was later done into English. The feature of this was that the author had neither seen the artist nor many of his paintings. He explains that he came to England for the purpose, and was received, he says, by the sound of whistling behind a safely locked door. But Dr. Singer's study of the etchings and lithographs is of value.

A Miss Elisabeth Luther Cary appeared in America with a very brief life, a very long appreciation, and the first attempt at a catalogue of Whistler's paintings, but as she, too, had never seen most of them, it was not strange that she made an almost incredible mess, and so proved herself most amusing without meaning to. Mr. Arthur Jerome Eddy told of many things, but the Paul Moody House, Worthen Street, Lowell, Mass. U.S.A., where Whistler was born. 1834.

From a photo supplied by Mrs. Stanton and Miss Emma Palmer.
From Life of Whistler (first edition) by E. R. and J. Pennell (Heinemann).

Venice." This book contained, in the first edition, some most extraordinary letters, and Miss Philip—Whistler's executrix—having eventually seen them, suppressed the volume. It was never issued, I think, in England. She also descended upon Mr. Haldane MacFall who, during the London Whistler Memorial Exhibition, 1905, rushed in and out with "Whistler, Butterfly, Wasp, Wit," embellished with Butterflies Caught—as he should not—and Miss Philip suppressed him too.

An amusing fact about this work was that the first editions were dedicated to Mrs. Pennell and myself, but as the Committee of the Whistler Memorial Exhibition felt sure that entanglements would be inevitable with Miss Philip, they refused to place it on sale in the show, so the author removed the dedication to us from later editions: one of the most comical performances I ever encountered.

A series of suppressions seized on Miss Philip. She stopped a circular which contained a butterfly—Whistler's butterflies being copyright; she went for the International Catalogue, which did not contain any then—though some were put in afterwards; she suppressed a Mr. Gallatin; and she tried to injunct, seize, and prevent the

The Two Brothers (Whistler and his Younger Brother, William).

From the miniature lent by Miss Emma Palmer. Formerly in the possession of Mrs. George D. Stanton and Miss Emma W. Palmer.
From Life of Whistler, by E. R. and J. Pennell (Heinemann).

publication of the "Authorised Life," dragged us into the Court of Chancery, and succeeded in proving legally that we were authorised to write the "Life of Whistler"—at considerable cost to herself. This book, which has gone through a number of editions, and is being translated, has proved a mine of information to hacks and thieves. It is incredible that the new law of copyright, in both England and America, is so imperfect that two whole volumes have been made out of our "Life" already, and the authors—or thieves—have been praised for their discoveries—discoveries they made in our volumes and printed with scarce the change of a word—and no acknowledgment.

M. Théodore Duret, an intimate friend before we knew Whistler, and an intimate friend till his death, wrote an admirable essay—"Whistler"—which is now out of print.

Limehouse.

One of Whistler's series of Thames etchings.

Mr. Way has just issued a volume of "Memories," notable for two things. His account is most complete of Whistler as a lithographer—for Way printed almost all of Whistler's lithographs, and his book is, therefore, authoritative—and for the reproduction, for the first time, of many most interesting notes and sketches.

There are several other volumes, some of which I cannot recall—many of them are in the bibliography signed "Don C. Seitz," the contents of which strangely resemble the work of a vanished Mr. Shallard, who was at work on the same subject, sent round prospectuses and specimen pages, and then disappeared.

There are also a large number of books, either more or less devoted to the artist and his work, or containing essays by writers, from Duret—whose "Critique D'Avant Garde" was the first serious study—to Wedmore who, at last, has swallowed himself in his endeavour to be on the right side. Then there are George Moore, Meier Graefe, Zola, Holman Hunt, and, last of all, the author of "Footprints of Famous Americans in Paris," whose article on Whistler when it was submitted to me was the poorest trash I ever read.

"Golly, what a crew," as Whistler would have said. There are some fifty of them, I imagine, and as for magazine and newspaper articles, I have collected more than fifty folio volumes since his death. I advised the Board of Education to do this for the South Kensington library, but they did not cut the necessary knot of red tape in time, and they could not untangle it, any more than the British Museum could continue to buy his prints. After purchasing—this was done by Sir Sidney Colvin's predecessor—more than one hundred of them, Colvin discovered that the works of living artists could not be bought, and this discovery has cost the British nation the loss of endless treasures for ever, as well as endless and unnecessary expense in the future.

Rotherhithe.

"Whistler in 1860 devoted more time to painting on the river and less to etching, though the Rotherhithe belongs to this year."—Life of Whistler, by E. R. and J. Pennell (Heinemann).

Black Lion Wharf
(Whistler).

"Thames Warehouses and Black Lion Wharf" won him recognition as 'the most admirable etcher of the present day.' "Life of Whistler, by E. R. and J. Pennell (Heinemann)

Whistler.

Etched by himself (1859).

His work, too, has been the sport of cataloguers, beginning in the early seventies with Ralph Thomas's catalogue of his etchings. Then Wedmore, "refreshed with money," as he says, blundered in and produced the worst catalogue I can conceive of—and he even had some help from the artist, he says. It went through two editions, and was exposed by "An Amateur," who corrected the most obvious blunders and filled in the most glaring omissions. It, however, is still used by people who don't know better, and still puffed and praised by its author.

Whistler in the Big Hat.

In the possession of Charles L. Freer.

*It is evident that his own portrait, Whistler in the Big Hat, was suggested by Rembrandt's Young Men in the Louvre—Life of Whistler, by E. R. and J. Pennell (Heinemann).

Mr. Howard Mansfield, after years of work, prepared a complete catalogue for the Caxton Club of Chicago, which would have been almost perfect, had he not fallen into a slough of states and proofs. Mr. E. G. Kennedy, soon after, got out a huge monument in four folio volumes for the Grolier Club, which is a most unfortunate example of misdirected energy. The plates which have been described are not described finally, or even at all, only referred to by numbers, and it requires a library—very inaccessible—of other catalogues to use it; the feature is the reproduction of nearly all the plates. Mr. Freer, the great American collector and admirer of Whistler, did everything he could—to interfere. But the worst thing is the arrangement and make up of the book which would have horrified Whistler, and it is further disfigured by an essay by an American journalist, whose name and knowledge add nothing but avoidupois to the volume. Since Whistler's death, Way has brought out a final edition of his catalogue of lithographs, though he acknowledges there are more prints to be added. The etchings have been repeatedly noticed and catalogued in the Keppel Booklets, a series which has circulated as many as 50,000 copies of some of the volumes. Mr. Keppel, too, wrote a pamphlet "One day with Whistler," which the subject I fear—had he seen it—would scarcely have delighted in—though he was delighted with Mr. Elbert Hubbard's Journey ("Little Journeys to the Homes of Eminent Artists"), roaring over it—but I believe the book and its author are taken very seriously in the United States.

Whistler.

A chalk drawing by himself.
In the possession of Thomas Way.

The fullest general catalogue of "Whistlers" was that of the Memorial Exhibition of the International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers, London, 1905. I wrote this—with Mrs. Pennell. It was badly copied by the Paris Memorial, worse by the Metropolitan Museum of New York, and comically by Mr. Canfield—without even measurements of the works being given. Not even those great and good etchers, Messrs. Brangwyn, Strang, Cameron, Haig and Bone, put together, can equal this list of catalogues—but they have each, I imagine, made more plates.

Miss Annie Haden.

Dry point etching by Whistler (1860).

From the Royal Collection, Windsor.

There is one most important side of the man's life for which the world waits: his letters. When Miss Philip brought suit against us, and endeavoured to get out an injunction to prevent our issuing the "Authorized Life" and failed, she swore that Whistler asked her to edit his letters, and that she was to take her time about it—that at any rate she has done—but even to this day, there are large collections she has never taken the trouble to look at—at least one collection, of the greatest value, has been lost or destroyed—and others are sold and scattered. I have no idea what material she has, but I know much that she has not, and without several collections which she has never seen she cannot do the work properly. Yet others are—by the law of copyright and her enforcing of it—prevented from doing that which they are only too ready and willing to do, and cannot, and she will not. A properly edited collection of Whistler's letters would be one of the most remarkable books of modern times. Miss Philip also possesses, or did possess, Whistler's attempt at autobiography—only a few chapters of which I believe were written. Had he taken the time and trouble to write it all, a new Cellini—but a Whistler—would have resulted. These chapters were written, read to Mr. Heinemann, and the scheme given up before Whistler asked us to write his life.

This triumph, however—this literary triumph—has not meant only a pæan of praise. The world-wide success of the man and the artist has awakened a new class of enemies and detractors for Whistler.

Pupils have turned into traitors, or others have endeavoured to prove them the creators, the inventors.

Some few writers have always been consistent, and it is better to hate wrongly and honestly, even if ignorantly, than to swallow yourself, simply to be on the correct, or what you think the correct, side. More writers have simply tried to be in the movement, and so praised because they thought they ought to, and usually praised the wrong thing. I, myself, have, over and Sir Henry Irving as Philip II.

By Whistler.

Sold at Christie's in 1905 for 4,800 guineas, and now in the Metropolitan Museum, New York.

La Princesse du Pays de la Porcelaine.

In the possession of Charles L. Freer.

This painting is a portrait of Miss Christine Spartali, daughter of the Greek Consul-General in London.

over, been accused of praising everything by Whistler, when, over and over, I have condemned things both in the man and his work I did not like—because I did not believe in the way he was painting or acting. But I did it to his face, never behind his back, and this is, possibly, one reason why I never had a quarrel with him, though we had endless fights. It is also said I got on with him because I was American; possibly this is true also, for we were both of that almost extinct race, American Americans, though his southern and my northern unconstructed beliefs found much to differ in. But, at any rate, I tried to be true to the man and to fight with and for him—in exhibitions—in life—in the Press—and I mean to be true to his memory. I know perfectly well I had something to do with his triumph, and I glory in that—his triumph was the triumph of art, and it was a great and noble thing to have the chance to work for that, which was working for him. A man more devoted to the highest perfection he could attain never lived.

To achieve this, he took incredible and endless pains, and he was a genius, whether taking pains makes one or no.

The world of art has acknowledged his greatness by three great Memorial Exhibitions—a tribute no other modern has received—in America, France and England, though English and American official art had nothing to do with them. The public—which he cared nothing for—has, tamely, blindly, accepted him everywhere.

Interesting also, but a reason of enmity now, is his financial success on every side. Seeing this, dealers—some of them—and critics—most of them—are doing everything possible to boom their protégés, to send up the financial value of men who have yet a national, to say nothing of an international, reputation to make. It may, in this day of best sellers and biggest prices, be worth while for a moment to recall the sums Whistler received during his lifetime for his etchings and lithographs, and compare them with the sums received for the work of budding genius—in some cases there is no sign of the bud, and never will be.

Whistler's "Douze Eaux Fortes" was sold by him for two guineas (or fifty francs) a set of twelve, thirteen with the cover. The sixteen Thames Etchings for twelve guineas.

The Venice Etchings, first set of twelve, sold for fifty guineas, about four each—and it was years before the Fine Art Society got rid of them, and they never issued another set for him, but went back to the London plates, the Thames set, which they sold for from one to two guineas each for years after. The second Venice set contained twenty-six proofs, and he could only get for these twenty-six, fifty guineas—the same price as for the twelve, and only about one-third the number of sets was printed. He never could get anyone to publish a set for him after this, though he made sets of etchings in France (two), Belgium and Holland.

For single etchings, proofs, he got from two guineas to fifteen, at the end; for his lithographs, until his death, from two to five guineas. Now people one knows nothing about, as his plates are bringing enormous prices, want the same prices people pay for his work to-day because they cannot get it otherwise. Dealers run up the other people and buy them in, in the hope of a demand made by themselves. There is a slight difference—but the world don't see it.

Glimpses of Whistler.

Four snapshots taken by Mr. W. Heinemann, with whose permission they are here reproduced.

Whistler never worked for anything but his art. He believed in that, and knew it would be appreciated—as it is. But no portrait painter ever painted so many portraits and yet had so few commissions—and this is true of all his work—but a few did believe in him, and they were enough. He knew it was fatal to be popular, and he spurned popularity—though he made the people he wished look at his things. To have believed in him always was our good fortune, and it was an opportunity which has come to no one since Boswell to be asked to write such a man's life, to be asked by him to write the life of the greatest artist of modern times and our greatest friend. We have written as strongly as we could and we have nothing to take back—we have told the truth as we know it, and we stand by it. We shall never again see a man in whom we can believe with all our mights and with all our hearts and with all our souls. We know that Whistler was the greatest artist of modern times, and the most interesting man of our time. We have made the world see this, and we have hastened his coming into his own. But without us or any writers, by his work alone he would have been acknowledged the great man he is. We have had the chance to show it—the chance of our lives—and we are proud of it. We have done the best we could. But we shall never have such a chance again, and we know his fame is too secure for any to prevail against it.

WHISTLER.*

By G. S. LAYARD.

WHISTLER was a diamond with many facets, and being also a poseur, he presented himself at different angles to different people. Already we have had him described from the optical angles of Monsieur Duret, Mr. Mortimer Menpes, Mr. Otto Bacher, Mr. and Mrs. Pennell, and a host of others. Now we have the opportunity of seeing him from the angle which he presented to Mr. T. R. Way in a little book which, though somewhat desultory, is never dull. It is chatty and has some good stories. But it is not for these that we welcome it. Rather is it for the side-lights which it throws on Whistler as lithographer and pastellist that it will be eagerly read by those who prefer to overlook the "mountebank" and pay homage to the artist.

And when we say "mountebank" it was surely rather the world that was to blame than the man. For the world gets what it deserves, and Whistler was not the only genius who has thought it necessary to descend to the cutting of ridiculous capers for the sake of getting people to listen to his serious message. The man who sings however badly standing on his head is sure of a great audience. The man who sings however well standing on his two legs may count himself fortunate if he gets any hearing at all.

Discursive though this book is, it yet leaves one definite impression, that of Whistler "as the keen, untiring student and worker, rather than the brilliant figure in society or the keen fighter." And this impression is agreeably intensified by the nature of the illustrations. These being mainly reproductions of sketches and notes for pictures, we seem to surprise the artist at his moments of creation and to hear him as Mr. Way aptly puts it "thinking aloud." What a great earnestness there was in the man to do the best possible that was in him. How punctual he was to destroy what did not come up to the high standard that he set himself. It may seem puerile to some, but it was wholly characteristic of his passion for completeness, that his care about anything to do with writing was as intense as if he were making an etching or painting a picture, and his great feeling for composition, which is really the basis of all decoration, showed itself in such details as the addressing of an envelope or postcard. "I have known him," says Mr. Way, "to go Drawn by T. R. Way.

Sketch of Whistler whilst he was Retouching a Stone.

From "Memories of James McNeill Whistler," by T. R. Way (John Lane).

* "Memories of James McNeill Whistler, the Artist." By T. R. Way. 10s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)

The Pool,
(Whistler),

to the post office himself rather than trust anyone else to fix on the stamp for him, lest it should not be exactly in its right place!"

Again and again through the book this note of intense determination that nothing but the best should go forth from his studio is sounded, and the writer of this volume is peculiarly fitted to insist upon this because of the intimate nature of the services which he rendered to the artist. Himself an adept in the process invented by Senefelder, it was lithography that was the cause of Mr. Way's first coming into touch with Whistler. And lithography is a method of reproduction, which besides offering the artist every variety of strength from black to white, and an almost unexplored field of colour suggestion, can legitimately claim to be the one positive process by which an artist can multiply his ideas. Like etching it is autographic, but unlike etching, and in this immeasurably its superior, the worker in it is able to see exactly what he is doing and, with experience, to know exactly what the print for which he is working will yield. In lithography there is no possibility of the printer "assisting" the drawing with "retro-usage," or spreading of the ink as is frequently done in etching. As a result the lithograph is the pure and undiluted work of the artist himself. True, there is a certain quality in Whistler's etchings that is wanting in his lithographs, but this is in a sense accidental, and there is a growing conviction in other minds besides Mr. Way's that for the reproductive side of his art he found in lithography the most sympathetic and perfect medium of all. Certainly Whistler himself looked upon his later lithographs, when he had become the master of that method, as having qualities equal to, though of course differing from, those of his finest etchings. I myself am the fortunate possessor of his works in both media—the lithographs cost me a penny a piece—and I always feel nearer the master, more certain that I have received his message when contemplating those wrought in the less showy medium.

If genius consists in the infinite capacity for taking pains, which I deny, then certainly Whistler had it. But he had much more than this. He had the power of accomplishing things at which no mere artificer, however industrious, however skillful, and with infinite time at his disposal, could ever have arrived. That I think is the better definition of genius. In other words, he was gifted with the eye of the seer, which could pluck out all that was essential and disregard all that was superfluous. We have all laughed at the story of Oscar Wilde, who, after a hard morning's work, professed to have removed a single comma from a set of verses and, after another strenuous morning, to have put it back again. But we forget the many vacuous mornings of our own in which not even so much as a comma has been wrestled with.

On p. 69 Mr. Way strikes a note which we who have learned through contemplation of the work of the great artists to see a new heaven and a new earth, should be instant in season and out of season in impressing upon our fellows who look upon pictures as the end and aim of pictorial art. Writing of Whistler's magnetic influence on all who came in contact with him, Mr. Way says "when-ever I had been with him in the studio, nature was always full of his pictures when I left." If only everyone would realise the great significance of that, we should not see the bored and bewildered faces which render our picture galleries such melancholy gathering places. If only people could be brought to believe that the great artist is putting down on paper or canvas for all time something of his wonderful insight, something other than a mere transcript of what anyone can see for himself, they would then go out into the world with eyes open and able, in a measure, to pierce below the surface of things and see the essential beauty that exists in the heaven that lies about them.

Whistler's Famous Portrait of His Mother.

Now in the Luxembourg.

Isn't it Clementina Wing, in Mr. Locke's clever nove of that name, who says to her sitter: "How on earth do you think I should be able to paint you if it hadn't been for Velasquez?" Now, we can't all be artists like that clever lady, but we can all learn, like her, to see nature through the spectacles of a Keats, a Velasquez, or a Whistler, if only we will humbly sit at their feet and try to understand.

This, it is clear, Mr. Way has done, and it is this that makes his beautiful little volume worth reading.

His attitude is the becoming one of the disciple rather than the critic, a refreshing attitude in these days when Jack is as good as his master—and a little better.

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS. OCTOBER, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

- I. —A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original Lyric.
- II. —A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III. —A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best Rhymed Alphabet on the books of this autumn and their authors.
- IV. —A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.
- V. —A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

- I.—The PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best Lyric is divided, and HALF A GUINEA is awarded to Mrs. S. Parker, of Fountayne Street, Goole, E. Yorks, and HALF A GUINEA to William A. Lambe, of 7, Paston Place, Brighton, for the following:

I have sailed many seas, I have heard many tongues, I have seen many lands,
In a world that is fair as Heaven, and foul as the darkest place,
I have kept through it all, as God helped me, the touch of your hands;
I have lived many days by the light I last saw on your face.

Whistler in His Study.

I have gathered me gold, I have gathered me gems, I have gathered me goods—
Riches and treasures, men call them:—I laugh,—I was rich before:

The memory of all that you said, that Spring day when we walked in the woods Makes me careless of all my new gains—makes me rich evermore.

I have seen a new grave, I have looked on their tears, I have heard them say "Death"
They say it is you who died, and have passed from our hearts away

God be praised that the soul is a living flame that dies not out with the breath—
They are wrong, for you live;
you are mine—You spoke to my spirit to-day!

MRS. S. PARKER

THE PRINCESS CHOOSES

Had I been wise, I would have passed you by,
On that fair morning when
from out the wood,

Running you came to greet me and I stood
Spell-bound to see such longing in your eye
What could I do but fold you to my breast?
I could not fight at all against the power
Of your triumphant love; it was an hour
Of perfect joy, of sorrow dispossessed.

Had I been wise I should have bid you go
Before your lips had kissed my tears away,
Shaming my doubt of you which till that day
Had robbed me of my treasure, brought me woe

Had I not seen the signal, heard the call,
The clear, sweet call which only love can make,
I had not lost a kingdom for your sake,
Had I been wise; but wisdom is not all.

* * * * *

I come to thee beloved, let me lean
Upon thy strength, support me, lift me up,
I shall not shrink to put aside the cup
Of princely favours; let me be thy Queen

WM. A. LAMBE.

We select for printing—

IN SEPARATION.

Dear, though I may not know
How you are faring, as day follows day,
Peacefully blank, monotonously grey,
This heart and soul must go

On an impassioned quest:
"We found you once—our joy and strength and home!
And, till we find again, must ever roam,
Knowing no human rest."

Dearest, your pleading hands,
That often told me what you could not say,
Seem stretched out still to draw me on the way
Through dark bewild'ring lands

Of Time and Life to You!
Still through the mist there shines for me your face!
(O God of Love, in Thine own hour and place, Make the dear Vision true!)

(Helen K. Watts, Lenton Vicarage, Nottingham.)

A BALLAD OF BURIAL.

My Lady sat in her lonely bower,
(Little hath love but the end of mirth)
Silent she sat full many an hour,
Her hair hung down in a golden shower
(And the span of life hath tears for girth!)

Her face was wan as a frozen sea;
Her lids were hot as coals might be,
Beneath, her eyes stared woefully.

My Lady heard in the court below
The fall of feet in the crackling snow,
The priests and the mourners, sad and slow.

They bore me by on draped bier,
While throbbing through me sharp and clear
My Lady's heart I seemed to hear.

Old Hungerford Bridge
(Whistler).

They set me down among the dead,
With candles twain at feet and head,
And pallid shroud upon me spread

My Lady came, unseen, unheard,
But I felt her soul like a maddened bird
Fluttering round as the flame-light stirred.

The graven tombs our bodies keep,
(Little hath love but the end of mirth)
But our souls are sunk in slumber deep
Till God shall break their tranced sleep:
(And the span of life hath tears for girth!)

(Norman Davidge Gullick, 6, Chantry Road, Clifton, Bristol.)

TOO LATE.

("O for five minutes more of her, to tell her with what love and adoration as of the beautifullest of known human souls, I did intrinsically always regard her.")

Carlyle to his dead wife.

If I had known how soon in Death's calm slumber
Your busy hands and beating heart would rest,
Could I have left the gracious word unspoken,
Disguising all the love within my breast?

Reproachful memories around me gather,
The burdens that I might have helped you bear,
The hours I might have made less long and lonely,
The joys you vainly sought with me to share.

It is too late to offer reparation,
And though my eyes be dimmed with sorrow keen,
I cannot bring them back—the years departed,
But only think of all that might have been.
In solitude my pathway now pursuing,
Without your smile, your voice's gentle tone,
I can but seek Heaven's pitying forgiveness,
And cry in penitence—"if I had known!"

O ye, whose daily pilgrimage is brightened
And blessed by some sweet presence at your side,
Remember 'tis the spoken love that feedeth,
By this alone the heart is satisfied
Keep not ensealed your fountains of affection,
No word of tenderness leave e'er unsaid,
Better strew flow'rs of kindness for the living,
Than lay them in despair upon the dead.

(Rev. Edwin C. Lansdown, The Manse, Derby Road, South Woodford, N.E.)

A SLEEPLESS SORROW.

1.

I had a sorrow that refused to sleep
Usurping still my restless couch by night,
Robbing my days of comfortable light,
Driving me forth to curse my gods and weep.

2.

I took my sorrow to the woodland wild
Where pigeons crooned and all things seemed at rest,
But still it turned to rend my anguished breast
And send me on my way unreconciled.

3
Where ling and heather crowned the purple hill
I sought to lay my sorrow in the grave,
With songs of hope and resolution brave
No tomb could hold my grief,
It claimed me still

4
I sought a sobbing channel of the sea,
That in a dark and dreadful cave made moan;
The surges warred on unrelenting stone,
And crept, and curled, and spurned my grief and me.

5
Bitter and cold uprose the sullen tide
With rolling echoes of the tortured deep,
And then, at length, my sorrow fell asleep
And I forgot, and, in forgetting, died.

(Irene Barlow, Clogher Park, Tyrone)

We specially commend also the Lyrics sent in by Alfred Barnes (Forest Gate), Rose M. Lomas (Newbury),
Florence E. Briggs (Crown Hill), Katharine Sidebottom
(Bramhall), B. R. M. Hetherington (Carlisle), Jeanne Butler (Westbury-on-Trym), Eveline Emily Ife (Plum-stead), Miss E. Moore (Liverpool), S. B. Irene Bell (London, W.C.), Martin A. Kennedy (South Shields), Kathleen Knox (Belfast), Robert Everall (Plaistow), Morris F.
Cock (Ashford), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), Ethel
Goodwin (Clapham), Helen Lanyon (London, W.),
Elizabeth P. Sholl (Yatton), E. A. Pearson (Fleet), Mervyn Davies (London, W.), Violet Pascoe Williams,
E. Irene Seaton (Boxmoor), Gwenn F. Narnham (Gillingham), Edward Howard (Putney), Mrs. A. E. M. Baker
(W. Hampstead), B. Vickery (Bradford), Maude Carter
(Redland), W. M. Lodge, Henry S. Baker, Jas.
Thompson (Aberdeen), Marjorie D. Niven (Peterhead), Grace M. Measham (Newcastle), Miss M. Swann (Great Missenden), Mary Bradford Whiting (Ramsgate), Doris

Whistler's Famous Residence. The White House, Tite Street, Chelsea.

Dean (Bromley), Ethel M. Adams (Whitchurch), Miss
G. Hennings (St. Albans), Leslie M. Priest (Norwich),
Amelia D. Light (Enfield), Edith Conquer (Liscard), Mrs.
A. A. Green (Wolverhampton), L. Port (Clapton), Walter
G. Priest (Norwich), D. C. Yarrow (Glasgow), Ursula
Roberts (Rugby), G. A. C. M. (Glasgow), Grace M.
Measham (Jesmond), Gus. Lenorme (Bingley), C. E.
Sladden (Luton), E. L. Fairweather (Leytonstone), D.
McLaren (Leith), Jas. Mitchell (Edinburgh), J. Tarry (Richmond), H. R. Smith (Newcastle), Mrs. Ring (Birmingham), Edwin Walters (Denmark Hill), Lily Irwin (Leamington), Thomas Moulton (Manchester), B. G. Brooks
(Wood Green, N.), Cyril G. Taylor (Heswall, Cheshire), Wayland Young (Sheffield), Ada Baxter (Leicester),
Florence M. Wilson (Bangor, Co. Down), Harold J.
Taylor (Ramsgate), A. M. Bowyer-Rosman (Ladbroke Grove, W.), Maude Colett (Cheltenham), A. S. Barnard (Walsall), Vernon H. Porter (Clapton, N.E.), G. G.
Jackson (Northampton), V.
Ford (Clifton), Louie Gray
(Frinton-on-Sea), Margaret Dickin (Wrexham), Albert E.
Barnes (Beaconsfield), Frank Garrett (Birmingham), Margaret Painter (Wimbledon), Mabel A. McMolyneux (St.
Albans), Ethel Painter
(Wimbledon), Edward Griffiths (Liverpool), Dorothy Poole (Godalming), Gertrude
Pitt (Belsize Park, N.W.), H.
M. Winter (Dublin), Wallace
Davies (Prees, Salop), Lilian
Hyde (Prees, Salop), Mrs. A.
H. Sale (Polesworth), S. Gertrude Ford (Bournemouth),
Eric V. Overell (Leamington),
Mrs. Lesley M. Keighley (New Brighton), Alfred Barnes
(Forest Gate, E.), Beryl M.
May (Farnham), J. G. Horne
(Blairdrummond, Perth), Jean
MacDiarmid (Largs), E. J.
Oliver (Wood Green, N.), Miss
V. A. Callander (London,
S.W.), Violet Gillespie (Forest
Hill, S.E.), G. E. Holme
(Great Malvern), P. Lynch
(Bowes Park, N.), H. Beckett

Group in Whistler's Studio.

From a photograph lent by Ralph Curtis,
From Life of Whistler (first edition), by E. R. and J. Pennell (Hainemann).

(Wolverhampton), Effie Philp (Edinburgh), Gladys Evelyn Warren (St. John's Wood, N.W.), E. Hartley (Dacre Banks, Yorks), Miss G. M. Northcott (West Kirby) Maurice Frank (Brixton, S.W.), K. Elsie Hunt (North Shields), R. W. King (Catford, S.E.), Miss G. M. Clive (Birmingham), J. Richard Ellaway (Basingstoke), Anita Lea (Liverpool), Constance Goodwin (Clapham, S.W.), F. N. Jellicoe (Stockwell, S.W.), Eric Trayler Cook (London, N.), Wilfred Morris (Bodmin), Hugh G. Griffiths (Bury), Arbel M. Aldous (Saffron Walden), Fred W. Quinton-Anderson (Edinburgh), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), J. W. James (Cardigan), M. S. Carter (Brighton), W. Hodgson Burnett (Kensington, W.), E. R. (Hull), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn, N.W.), Miss C. Ward (Bridlington), P. Selver (Fulham, S.W.), Isaac Rosenberg (Hampstead, N.W.), Lydia Dean (Wishaw), Florence Bagster (Kendal), C. Evan Jones (Brockenhurst), William Kettle (Streatham, S.W.), C. B. Lugden (Wakefield), H. Faure (London, N.W.), Frank Brebner, jun. (Aberdeen), Janet Agnes Bell (Edinburgh), Albert Fuller (Cardiff), M. Thorpe (Catford, S.E.), Ivan Adair (Dublin), Winifred Goodwin (Clapham, S.W.), John G. Fletcher (London, W.C.), Olivia Moir (Manchester), Margaret S. Ogle (Englefield Green), V. W. Ware (Southsea), Alfred C. Ward (Hackney, N.E.), Mrs. Sarah J. Cole (Nottingham), Josephine Gregory (Bradford), Alice Davis (Folkestone), Crawford Neil (Dublin), A. Kate Hickson (Leicester), Gladys King (Hornsey, N.), Ellen J. Chutterbuck (Bromley), E. A. Lawrence (Liverpool), and Phyllis Morris (Hove.)

II.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Miss K. Elsie Hurst, of 103, Park Crescent, North Shields, for the following :

SHOULD I GO TO THE BAR?

By J. J. GREGSON SIATER
(Eltham Stock)

"Drink to me only with thine eyes."
BEN JONSON —To Chloë.

We also select for printing :

THE VICAR'S SECRET. By C. E. JEFFREY. (Murray & Evenden)

"They came and stole my garments,
My stockings, all my store,
But they could not steal my sermons
For they were stolen before"

REV. H. TOWNSEND—Epigram.

(G. W. Turner, 17, Lister Street, Rotherham.)

KNICKERBOCKER DAYS

By HARRIS TWEED.

"Once more into the breach, dear friends, once more!"

SHAKESPEARE—Henry VI.

(Miss Margaret S. Ogle, Royal Holloway College, Englefield
Green, S.O., Surrey.)

LADY ERMYNTRUDE AND THE PLUMBER.

By PERCY FENDALL. (Stephen Swift.)

"But they couldn't chat together
They had not been introduced."

W. S. GILBERT—Etiquette.

(Miss F. M. Jamieson, 11, Crieff Road, Wandsworth Common,
London, S.W.)

A CHILD'S VISIONS. BY DAPHNE ALLEN.
(G. Allen & Sons)

"Of candied apple, quince, and plum, and gourd;
With jellies soother than the creamy curd
And lucent sirops, tinct with cinnamon"

JOHN KEATS—Ecce of St. Agnes

(George A. C. MacKinlay, 9, Burnbank Gardens, Glasgow.)

III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best Epitaph on the late summer in four lines of verse is awarded to L. A. Pooler, care of The Ven Archdeacon of Down, The Rectory, Downpatrick, Ireland, for the following :

EPITAPH ON THE LATE SUMMER.

Tears are for parting, thou did'st weep alway,
Now storm-begirt, now sobbing soft and low,
Thy "name is writ in water," wherefore we Dry-eyed do stand, and gladly watch thee go!

L. A. POOLER

The best of the numerous other Epitaphs received are those sent in by A. S. Barnard (Walsall), Mrs. Keighley (New Brighton), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Thos. Ingle (Sutton), Donald R. Gooding (Southwold), Miss A. M. Weir (Arbroath), Marion Burd (Llangair).

Bust of Whistler.

In the possession of the Duchess of Argyll.

From Life of Whistler (first edition), by E. R. and J. Pennell (Heinemann).

Waterloo Bridge from the Savoy
(Whistler).

M. Kennedy (South Shields), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Kathleen Knox (Belfast), Miss L. Mugford (Sutton at Hone), John Cadman (Southport), J. Swinson (Tunbridge Wells), Eric P. Freeman (Bexley Heath), Miss E. A. Pearson (Fleet), S. J. Morrison (Barrow-in-Furness), J. Gregory (Bradford), Miss M. K. Perkins (Highgate), Arthur Blundell (Southport), Doris Dean (Bromley), M. M. Whiting (W. Ealing), Miss H. M. Anden (Church Stretton), Miss Watson (Newcastle), E. G. Hogan (Nottingham), L. Port (Clapton), J. C. Buchan (Alloa), Amy Ellen Lester (Stoneby), H. J. Taylor (Ramsgate), Geraldine Tatlow (Chippenham), Horace W. Walker (Beeston), Jean Wilson (Chippenham), M. H. Linkinlater (Great Malvern), A. H. Mannington Sayers (Sheffield), B. C. Brooks (Wood Green), Wm. Fielding (Haywood), Miss M. E. Campbell (London, S.W.), Violet Gillespie (Forest Hill), A. R. Williams (Worcester), Geraldine P. Gallway (Thursk), H. M. Winter (Dublin), Mrs. Wright (Sutton), Ada E. Mann (Rhyl), V. F. J. Klammer (Glasgow), B. D. Wright (Edinburgh), M. T. L. (Milton, Hants), Margaret Dicken (Wrexham), W. F. S. Joseph (London, W.), Eva Scott (Streatham), Evelyn G. Lalmore (Bath), G. F. A. Salmon (Penzance), F. R. Thomson (Finchley), E. Russell (Ashton Manor), A. Clarke (High Wycombe), Rev. F. Hern (Rowland's Castle), Marcia Knight (Rushden), Caroline Coxham (New Malden), M. A. Newman (Badingham), H. G. Dowling (Portsmouth), Margery Finch (Portsmouth), Miss C. E. Muirhead (London, N.), Florence Bagster (Kendal), Albert E. Barnes (Beaconsfield), Lydia Dean (Wishaw), Miss E. M. Cooke (Mold), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), W. H. Burnett (Kensington), Lillie Cole (Pontrilas), H. Cabby (Fordham), Miss M. F. Aikman (Glasgow), F. W. Quirton-Anderson (Edinburgh), Miss Arbel M. Aldous (Saffron Walden), Maud McDonald (Enfield), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), J. R. Ellaway (Basingstoke), Albert Fuller (Cardiff), John Fletcher (London, W.C.), Flora Bacot (Worthing), Miss V. W. Ware (Southsea), Kate Bedford (Brighouse), Josephine Gregory (Bradford), Stanley-Hunter (Lewisham), Theodora Martin (Bristol), Florence Macqueen (Bath), Phyllis Morris (Hove), Miss V. Huish (Derby), and Maurice Frank (Brixton).

IV.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Miss Agnes M. Macaulay, of Portwood, Great Malvern, for the following :

MURPHY—A MESSAGE TO DOG-LOVERS.
BY MAJOR GAMBIER-PARRY. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

Amongst stories about dogs, "Murphy" must certainly rank as a classic. One lays down the book impressed with its double "charm"—the charm of style and the personal charm of the writer revealed throughout its pages. Major Gambier-Parry diagnoses dog-nature with the same tender, sympathetic feeling that is shown by a great physician towards a patient. The story of the Irish "Murphy," intermingled with the author's tentative moralisings, cannot fail to attract those who are genuine dog-lovers. To them this "message" will be ever-welcome.

We also select for printing :

THE DAUGHTER OF BRAHMA.
By J. A. R. WYLIE.
(Mills & Boon.)

Deep into the mystic heart of India this absorbing novel penetrates—"East is East and West is West" always its underlying motif. The tragedy of the pathetic misunderstood David, his marriage with the Brahmin Priestess, the constant fret and jar between two for-ever separated races—the fraud and fanaticism of one religion, the hypocrisy of the other—are boldly and fearlessly revealed. Strong, yet poetical, it pleads for toleration and sincerity. The vivid word-pictures, the subtle analysis of character, its sheer beauty enthral us. Read with an "open mind" it is at once a joy—and a lesson.

(Lucy Chamberlain, Plâs Brith, Llandudno, N. Wales.)

POEMS OF RICHARD MIDDLETON. (Unwin.)

Even if one did not know of the lamentable tragedy of the poet's death, these poems would tell one that they are the bitter sweet, palatable-melancholy works of a poet manque. Delicate, susceptible to the most intimate feelings of things alive and dead, Middleton always sang "with earth between his singing lips." The paganism he aimed at was impossible to one who had need so much of sympathy, generous, childlike sympathy (like Francis Thompson he turned to children for comfort in his misery); his striving after the great earthly passions were voiced only in a pallid Swinburnian failure. They are haunting, subtle melodies, of unanswerable sorrow.

(B. Dobrée, Eushots, Farnham.)

ROSE OF THE GARDEN. BY KATHARINE TYNAN.
(Constable)

Readers of Lady Sara Lennox's reminiscences, published a few years since, gladly meet them again in a novel (also in correspondence form between her and her dear gossip, "Lady Susan").

St. Ives, Cornwall
(Whistler).

Carlyle.
By Whistler.

Whistler's Grave in Chiswick Graveyard.

"A low railing like the trellis in the garden of the Rue du Bac, with flowers growing over it, marks the little unmarked plot of ground where Whistler, the greatest artist and most striking personality of the nineteenth century, lies at rest in a remote corner of the London he loved, not far from the house and nearer the grave of Hogarth, who had been to him the greatest English master from the days of his boyhood in St. Petersburg." E. R. and J. Pennell.

From Life of Whistler (first edition) by E. R. and J. Pennell (Heinemann).

Note: A monument to Whistler has only recently been erected over his grave.

"What a charming personality pretty "Sally" must have had. Loved universally from infancy, come to maturity at fifteen, and feeling middle-aged at twenty-two! Pathetic in contrition, candid in explanation, admired for "bravery" even by political enemies. Such letters are not written in telephone days, and the scent of pot-pourri is grateful to us. We are loth to say good-bye, tho' we leave her encircled by happiness.

(M. M.)

A LITTLE OF EVERYTHING. By E. V. LUCAS.

(Methuen.)

This wise, tender, ironical, and unrepresible anthologist has failed to resist an irresistible temptation. He offers us here what may be called an anthology of anthologies. For what are his essays but accretions of musing and fact about a single nucleus? And his novels but bundles of things held together by a single temperament? He can truly say: "Who touches my books touches a man; and what is man but an anthology?" Here is a shilling banquet: twenty-eight courses of the best service, lights, conversation perfect. But the book must be dipped into; one cannot taste everything at a time.

(John G. Fletcher, 18, Talbot House, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.)

MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD

By ALPHONSE COURLANDER.

(T. Fisher Unwin.)

This is a stirring story of the man in the street—in the sense in which the phrase is used by Journalists, to whom "the street" is Fleet Street, the realm of the Press. Humphrey Quain loves Lillian and abandons her, fearing that she may hinder his work; he loves Elizabeth, and because he will not leave "the street" for her sake she throws him over. The novel is an exhaustive study of Journalism, and the sway of the Press over its subjects is well emphasized in the last scene, where Humphrey, killed in the Vinegrower's Riot, to which he has been sent as Special Correspondent, says as he falls: "What a ripping story this will make for The Day."

(Mary Bradford Whiting, Ferriby Lodge, Ramsgate.)

PRIDE OF WAR. By GUSTAVE JANSON.

(Sidgwick & Jackson.)

The evils of war are here depicted with a realism so powerful that the publication of this book may substantially further the cause of peace. Every story is entertaining and instructive.

The Arab, the Turk, and the Italian are portrayed with an accuracy which is astonishing to one who has lived in the company of each. But one effort stands out prominently above the rest. Fontanara, the Italian archaeologist, is a psychological study worthy of the highest praise. The tortures this delicate mind endures make the following the only adequate description of war: O horrible! O horrible! most horrible!

(C. Harland, 12, Easby Mt., Morley Road, Bradford.)

ONE OF US.

By GILBERT FRANKAU.

(Chatto & Windus.)

One can imagine a reader of some hundred years hence studying this volume in great perplexity, for it is essential to be a member of the present generation in order to understand and appreciate the topical allusions constantly encountered. To the comprehending, however, this versified satire, chronicling the doings of a "young man about town," is exceedingly entertaining and, while possibly somewhat exaggerated, contains some very true reflections pungently expressed. In short, although some may disapprove of the poem's morality, few can deny the cleverness of its composition.

(Miss L. Mugford, Sutton-at-Hone, near Dartford, Kent.)

YONDER. By E. H. YOUNG. (Heinemann.)

This is a study of two temperaments, similar in that they possess a passionate love of nature and are destined to know something of life's bitterness. From the first sun-lit morning, when Theresa's father came to the little cottage where Alexander lived, the thread of their lives was joined, till eventually the pigmy maelstrom of their pride vanished before the irresistible force of nature. By a subtle and poetical rendering of this bond of the mountains and heather Miss Young creates the book's intrinsic value, which raises it from the level of prose narrative to a burst of spontaneous lyricism.

(Guy Tracey Watts, 25, St. John's Road, Clifton, Bristol.)

We also specially commend the reviews sent in by the Rev. T. J. Price (Keighley), Mrs. Stephen Parker (Goole), Gertrude Pitt (Belsize Park, N.W.), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Miss Blair (Stirling), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Miss L. Mugford (Sutton-at-Hone), Miss Madgwick (Wimbledon), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), Hester Marshall (London, S.W.), Miss H. N. Anden (Church Stretton), Edgar Caton (Barrow-in-Furness), Dorothea M. N. Young (Weybridge), Leo Delicati (Bristol), Gwendoline Jones (Swansea), Albert E. Barnes (Beaconsfield), Louie Gray (Frinton-on-Sea), Mary Kingdom (St. Jacut-de-la-Mer, France), Oscar L. Taylor (Bournemouth), Mrs. Charles Wright (Sutton), Miss J. E. Chesham (Cambridge), A. R. Williams (Worcester), Irene Pollock Lalonde (Bath), Ernest F. Seymour (Kilburn, N.W.), M. A. Newman (Badingham, Suffolk), Alan C. Fraser (Bridgwater), J. Swanscon (Tunbridge Wells), Miss E. Makry (Folkestone), and Augusta Hall (Hull).

V.—The PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO "THE BOOKMAN" is awarded to Mr. W. Hodgson Burnett, of 5, Edwards Square, Kensington, W.

THE MAJORITY OF "THE BOOKMAN."

BY SIR W. ROBERTSON NICOLL, LL.D.

THE BOOKMAN has now completed twenty-one years of life. It is a long life for a literary journal, and in these days it is a long period for one man's occupancy of the editorial chair. Those associated with THE BOOKMAN may be allowed to congratulate themselves modestly on the fact that the circulation is, after twenty years, at its highest point, with every sign of increase.

Eleven years ago, when THE BOOKMAN had accomplished its first ten years, I wrote a short article on the subject, and I may be permitted at this stage to resume the theme. While attempting nothing in the nature of an exhaustive survey, I may point out how the periodical has developed from its beginnings.

It was in 1886 that I first resolved to publish a monthly literary journal. At that time I was occupied with various important and difficult undertakings, and it was not till five years had passed that I was free to begin. My plan was to make the journal as popular as I could, and at the same time to maintain its literary quality. There seemed to be a place for illustrations, and I believed, even more firmly than I do now, in the value of paragraphs. It was also my purpose to pay special attention to new authors and to fresh developments of literature. Models in the strict sense I had none; but a monthly called the Register, which had a short life in the sixties, suggested some ideas. It contained paragraphs of literary gossip and short signed articles on the chief books of the month. The proprietor, a Mr. Weldon, tried to localise it among booksellers, but with small success. W. M. Rossetti, who had previously written much in the Critic and in the Spectator, was the chief contributor, and the periodical was readable. Later on Messrs. Scribner, of New York, started their Bookbuyer, now long dead. I acted for a short time as London correspondent of this magazine. The Bookbuyer had illustrations, and they were well produced. It seemed to me that a monthly combining the best features of the Register and the Bookbuyer, and somewhat more personal in its tone, might succeed.

On commencing THE BOOKMAN I set my heart on securing certain contributors. From the Critic, a literary paper long published and partly edited by Sergeant Cox, I had learned much. The chief contributor to the Critic was the late Mr. Francis Espinasse. He wrote under many pen names—Frank Grave, Herodotus Smith, Lucian Paul, etc.—and everything he wrote was worth reading. Of English literary history in the nineteenth century he had an unrivalled knowledge, and his style was bright and entertaining. With some difficulty I discovered Mr. Espinasse's place of abode, and prevailed upon him to write his recollections of the Carlyles, with whom he was very intimate, as many passages from letters testify. Mr. Espinasse died a short time ago in the Charterhouse, of which he had been a Brother for a good many years. He was a man of the most honourable and upright character, a very hard worker, and intensely conscientious. But he was difficult to deal with, suspicious and irritable. He had thrown up many situations in his time owing to slight misunderstandings, and had found the way hard. But I persuaded him to go on with his articles, and he published them in that delightful and valuable book "Literary Recollections," which stands out still as one of the very best of its kind. Mr. Espinasse was induced also to do a certain amount of reviewing, and showed himself an accomplished but severe critic. My friend Mr. J. M. Barrie took a generous interest in the establishment of THE BOOKMAN, and gave me many paragraphs, as well as an article or two. Later on he contributed his beautiful poem on the death of R. L. Stevenson. But just as THE BOOKMAN started Mr. Barrie resolved to give over journalism and devote himself wholly to fiction and the drama.

Sir W. Robertson Nicoll. Another old and valued friend who helped from the first was Professor Minto, of Aberdeen. Minto's contributions to English literary history will long preserve his name. He had much experience of journalism, having been a leader writer on the Daily News, and for some while editor of the Examiner, which was for part of the time under the proprietorship of Lord Rosebery. He did his best with the Examiner, and made it a very lively paper, but he found it impossible to revive a journal which had been shot through the head. In consequence he particularly disliked editorial work, and rejoiced in his appointment to a Chair in Aberdeen University. But he delighted in reviewing, and a fairer, more competent, and more appreciative critic could not easily be found. His literary articles in the Ninth Edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" deserve to be collected. He had a deep interest in all the younger writers, and especially in "Q." He was a contributor till the time of his lamented death.

Another Scotch critic of great accomplishments, Dr. William Wallace, lately editor of the Glasgow Herald, and one of the most popular writers in the Spectator, was with me for many years. Nor should I forget the younger men, in particular Mr. A. C. Benson, a contributor from the beginning. Most of his articles were unsigned. I had also the brilliant and versatile L. F. Austin, who is not yet forgotten in London journalistic circles, though he left no abiding memorial of his many gifts. I had also many contributions from Mr. W. B. Yeats and Mr. William Watson, both in poetry and in prose. Some of Mr. Yeats' finest lyrics first appeared in THE BOOKMAN. At that time he was a diligent critic, and was especially earnest in praising the poetry of Robert Bridges. THE BOOKMAN has always had the help of the younger men, and I am proud to think that Mr. G. K. Chesterton's earliest articles appeared in its pages. Another early helper was Mr. G. A. Simcox, who was brilliant alike in prose and poetry. Mr. T. E. Page, Professor Wilkins, Professor W. M. Ramsay, Professor C. H. Herford, Miss Jane Barlow, Dr. Hay Fleming, and Mr. Francis Hinds Groome, were also among the active and frequent contributors.

In the Academy I had read with admiration many articles by E. Purcell, and before starting THE BOOKMAN I made a special journey to Oxford in order to secure Mr. Purcell's help. As "Y. Y." he has been one of our most valued reviewers from the beginning. Later on I had the co-operation of Dr. William Barry, Mr. Frederick Greenwood, Professor David Masson, "Mark Rutherford," Mr. A. E. W. Mason, Mr. Louis Garvin, Mrs. Meynell, Mrs. Craigie, Sir Frederick Wedmore, and many others. From Mr. Swinburne and Mr. Watts-Dunton we had poetical contributions. When making my arrangements for the first number I asked an article from Mr. Walter Pater. He replied cordially that he was anxious to write on "Dorian Gray," and his article duly appeared in the second number of THE BOOKMAN, and provoked much comment. Professor Saintsbury has been for many years a much valued contributor.

When THE BOOKMAN was commenced I endeavoured to establish a journalistic department. Among the eminent journalists who helped me were Mr. J. A. Spender, now the distinguished editor of the Westminster Gazette, and Mr. H. W. Massingham, the no less eminent editor of The Nation. But after a time the claims of books prevailed, and this feature was practically dropped, much to my regret. Another feature, which was for a long time prominent, has been practically discontinued—that is the monthly reports on the Book Trade. I believe THE BOOKMAN inaugurated the lists of best-selling books, which have been largely given in English and American papers. The sale of books, however, is now a very complicated affair.

There are authors with a moderate circulation at home who have a very large Colonial sale. There are others, very popular in this country, for whose books there is no demand in the Colonies. What is true of the Colonies is true of America. One has to take the conjunct sale over the whole world before he is able to gauge with precision the popularity of an author. Again, certain authors are prominent in certain parts of the country and not so prominent in others. I was regretfully driven to the conclusion that the lists tended to mislead. There are no means of getting at the total sale, and it is by the total sale that an author would prefer his popularity to be judged. We have, however, introduced features which have been more acceptable. In particular, the illustrated articles on special authors have proved most acceptable. For some there has been a larger demand than for others, but we have scarcely had a single failure. The competitions in which readers have been invited to join have also been eminently successful.

From the first I have had the assistance of very able colleagues. Miss Anne Macdonell was my first assistant editor. Since then her name has become very widely known. Mr. J. E. Hodder Williams, now a partner in the firm of Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, became assistant editor in 1898, and was most useful in the development of the journal. I have now the valued services of Mr. A. St. John Adcock. What I said eleven years ago might be repeated to-day: "THE BOOKMAN is read by bookmen all over the British Empire. It has been a great pleasure to edit it; my relations with proprietors, contributors, authors, publishers, booksellers and readers, have been of the most agreeable kind. I do not care to say anything about the future beyond this—that we shall endeavour to develop it steadily—to make it more valuable, more interesting in every way."

Facsimile of Cover of No. 1 of "The Bookman."

One project very dear to me has been reluctantly abandoned. I hoped to establish a quarterly review wholly devoted to English literary history and criticism. Such an organ is greatly needed for the publication of texts, the re-estimation of authors, the discussion of problems, the making known of discoveries. I still believe that such a periodical could be successfully established and that it might prove of eminent service. It could never be very remunerative, but if the right contributors were secured it ought to meet its expenses. But ever-increasing work of various kinds has left me no leisure for the working out of the idea. I hope it will be taken up by stronger and less occupied hands.

New Books.

MARRIAGE.*

The main plot of Mr. Wells's new novel is extremely simple. Marjorie Pope is a clever, pretty girl of twenty, belonging to a middle-class London family. Mainly to get away from her poor and rather sordid surroundings, she engages herself to Mr. Magnet, the famous humourist with £5,000 a year. The story of this engagement, which takes place at the Surrey house the Popes have taken for the summer, may be called the prelude of the book. It constitutes about the first 150 pages. Then, one afternoon, out of the sky there crashes on to the Popes' lawn, in a wrecked monoplane, an apologetic but self-collected young man. He is Trafford, aged twenty-six, a brilliant scientist, with a great future and a small professorship. Almost immediately he and Marjorie fall head over heels in love with one another, and after some violent family scenes her engagement to Magnet is broken off, while Trafford is turned out of the house. However, they elope a few months later and settle down into a happy marriage. But presently the question of money grows urgent. Trafford has to give up some of his precious research work and deliver popular lectures. A baby is born, and then another. There is still insufficient money, and there are the usual marital bickerings. And so at length Trafford has to surrender all his energies to the one pursuit of wealth. He achieves a fortune in seven years by inventing synthetic rubber and by helping to rig the market in plantation shares. They move into a larger house, with a butler and every comfort. They have now four children and an assured position. But, far from being happier, they are vaguely discontented. Trafford suddenly decides that he must go right away for a year and "think." He fixes on Labrador as the spot, and there, in the depths of the wild, he and his wife winter amidst incredible hardships. But in the end they win, somehow or other, the knowledge of what they must do with their lives, and in winning it they win happiness. Here, on the eve of their sailing for England, the book closes.

It is decidedly a brilliant novel, one of Mr. Wells's most energetic and remarkable achievements, and it is so packed with arresting things and rare vitality that one hardly likes to criticise. And yet there are some criticisms worth making. For instance, the psychology of Trafford and his wife seems to be rather muddled every now and again. They don't always ring quite true, and when they don't they spoil the illusion of reality for us—that illusion which is the secret of a novel. Again, Trafford has that irritating habit of so many of Mr. Wells's creations—of discussing at enormous length the meaning of life and such kindred questions. These endless talks tend to bore one, and tend also to pamphletise the book. Perhaps, indeed, the most successful portion is the earlier part, in which we are introduced to the Pope family and to the ardent and middle-aged Mr. Magnet, and in which the whole tone is light

Mr. Pope, the father, is splendid; perhaps too much of a caricature, but splendid all the same. It was a thousand pities to drop him out of the book at about a third of the way through. And the Labrador expedition, though unconvincing as to the probability of such people ever undertaking it, is a very vivid and masterly piece of description. If only to his consummate ability Mr. Wells could add a really poetic command of words, he would be an impressive artist, besides being, as he is now, a stirring and romantic novelist.

RICHARD CURLE.

ANDREW LANG'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE*.

For some while past the student who desired a compendious and authoritative history of English literature, had but one sure resort—he could turn with confidence and pleasure to that marvellously compact store-house of facts and impressions in which Professor Saintsbury had garnered for him the results of a lifetime's reading and judgment. It is doing no injustice to other manuals to assert that the "Short History" held the field from the very day of its publication, if only because of the breadth of its survey, the thoroughness of its author's knowledge and the catholicity and soundness of his taste. That monument of learning which is gradually being built up by Cambridge scholars and their colleagues will accomplish in detail a task which one man's labours could only attempt in outline; but as a summary and a convenient work of reference, the little Saintsbury volume will still be consulted. On the smaller scale none of our critics has seriously challenged the professor's supremacy till the current year; now comes a rival history in miniature from Mr. Andrew Lang, and there must be general regret that its kindly and accomplished writer was not spared to see it in print. Perhaps to his death may be set down certain repetitions in the text, not to mention occasional misprints, which should not have missed the proof-reader's eye. That the name of Sir Walter Scott should turn up like a veritable King Charles's head periodically through the various chapters is a matter of idiosyncrasy, which should merely amuse; that Mr. Lang should reiterate his favourite quotations—thus Jonson's remark on Shakespeare, "sufflaminandus erat," mentioned five times at least—need not offend anybody save your pedant; but it certainly seems a pity that information already given in one place should be reproduced in another, for it argues a lack of skill in dovetailing the book's material. Indeed it is largely on account of Andrew Lang's lack of architectonic sense that I am sure his history, while it may serve as a "second string" to Mr. Saintsbury's book, can never hope to replace it, though it travels just a tiny distance further afield.

* "History of English Literature: From 'Beowulf' to 'Swinburne.'" By Andrew Lang. 6s. (Longmans.)

James McNeill Whistler.

From an etching by Paul Hellen.

(Reproduced by permission of the Artist.)

into modern times. Delightfully as he always gossiped on literary topics, full of scholarship and refreshing allusiveness as were his causeries, Mr. Lang never had the knack of making even his newspaper articles run with easy consecutiveness; his readers were expected to supply the connections of his rather rambling thoughts; form was never a strong point with him as a journalist. He was the last man therefore to be able to cover up signs of scaffolding and to effect smooth joins in a work such as a history of a nation's literature which makes severe demands on constructive ability. It is ominous that a list of authors, equipped with dates of their birth and death, precedes his text instead of being reserved for the end; his book is but too nearly a reasoned catalogue, or rather to be quite fair, it resolves itself much too often into a series of biographies and appreciations. Far too rare, save in the opening sections, is any study of tendencies, any bird's-eye view of the directions our literature was taking at particular periods. I search in vain for equivalents to Professor Saintsbury's inter-chapters, in which he analysed the progress of English prosody or the developments of style. Mr. Lang cannot be said to neglect these points, though he does not deal with them altogether adequately, but his treatment of them at best is in detail. And so from the time of Shakespeare onwards we seem jostling here with a procession of individual authors, and are scarcely ever permitted Pisgah glimpses; the sign-posts are few, and we are too infrequently carried to the hill-tops to see the lie of the land. Undoubtedly Mr. Lang's undertaking was one of difficulty, yet the arrangement he adopts cannot escape the reproach of clumsiness. Thus a consideration of Spenser's place in English poetry is tucked away in a chapter headed "Prose of the Renaissance"; Milton is grouped with Crashaw, Herbert, Herrick, Carew, Lovelace, Suckling, Cowley, Waller, Marvell and Butler, as one of a batch of "Caroline Poets," and his prosodic achievements are far too little insisted upon; Dryden, the reformer of our numbers, is dealt with under the heading of the "Restoration Theatre." I know how embarrassing is the business of mapping out so thick a jungle as is that of English letters, but I am sure it is best to let the big trees show clear above the bracken, and I am conservative enough to think this result might be more successfully effected by such chapter titles as the "Age of Spenser, the "Age of Milton," the "Age of Dryden." So, at least, the masters are not swamped in the crowd of smaller men, though it is true enough, as Mr. Lang maintains in his preface, that each of the former springs from an underwood of the thought and effort of authors less conspicuous.

It is a thankless job to traverse the ground of the Anglo-Saxon beginnings of our literature, but Andrew Lang pushes his way bravely over this stony soil; though he must have heaved a sigh, as his readers will, on coming in sight of the "matter of Arthur" and the morning-star of song, Chaucer. On the rhyme romances and on Chaucer and Piers Plowman he writes with obvious signs of relief and pleasure, and one can easily understand what a labour of love were his chapters on early Scottish literature and ballads and popular poetry. Here he is at home and at his ease, but he devotes far too small a space to the rise of the drama, and his accounts of the miracle-play, the morality and the interlude would have been all the better for amplification. His study of Spenser concludes with a pretty Homeric metaphor:

"'As Hephestus' says the prose translator of the 'Iliad' and 'Odyssey,' 'when he fashioned the arms of Achilles, melted bronze and gold and silver in his furnace, so Spenser combined the wealth of Greece, Italy, France, Rome and England in the great crucible of his genius.'"

That would be very well did not Mr. Lang proceed to amplify his metaphor and talk of the Corinthian bronze formed at the burning of Corinth from the molten gold and silver and copper of the temple vessels and images, thereby applying in another connection an historical reference he has already used à propos of the Arthurian romances. I may add that Homer is only less frequently alluded to in his pages than Sir Walter Scott. Mr. Lang makes short work of

Mr. Frank Harris's theories of "Shakespeare the Man." He brushes aside "nonsense about Shakespeare as a sensual, sycophantic snob, mad with jealousy and foiled desire," and has no patience with the idea that the poet must have been irresolute because in the cases of Hamlet, Brutus and Macbeth, he gave us heroes irresolute in a crisis. But his æsthetic criticism of Shakespeare might have been more thorough, and in reaction from Mr. Swinburne's ultra-enthusiasm he does rather less than justice to the merits of the Stratford man's play-writing contemporaries. To follow him through the labyrinth of Caroline and Georgian literature would mean only saying ditto, for the most part, to his verdicts and admiring his scholarship. I would only point to his little essays on Burton and Sir Thomas Browne, and Milton, as illustrating capitally any strictures of mine on his curiously disconnected style. There is too much narrative in his history, too much quotation without quotation marks, too much paraphrase insufficiently dissociated from the critic's own comments, which are generally as pointed as they are quaint. Incidentally I may remark that Pepys is dismissed very cavalierly, that Mr. Lang, himself an authority on Homeric translation, pays a fine compliment to Pope's version of the Iliad, that he thinks poorly of Swift's "Tale of a Tub," and of Fielding's "Jonathan Wild." With a tartness that occasionally adds piquancy to his pronouncements he declares, "If irony is to be openly and noisily unveiled on every page, then 'Jonathan Wild' may be a masterpiece of irony." On the leaders of the "romantic movement" his decisions are uniformly just; he only shows any prejudice when he approaches quite modern days. Thus he talks of a lack of "natural magic" in Browning's poetry, and repeats the old charge of obscurity. He is ferocious on Meredith's verse, especially "Modern Love," and tells us his manner is "not of the centre," he is frigid in any praise of Rossetti, his admiration of William Morris does not go much beyond the "Defence of Guenevere" volume, he is almost contemptuous of Disraeli's stories, he treats rather inadequately the Brontë sisters—especially Emily Brontë, and he writes in a bored way about the Meredith novels; nor is he very happy on Newman. On the other hand, he remains faithful to Robert Louis Stevenson, and he protests very rightly against the stupid modern practice of under-rating George Eliot; "there has been no better novelist," he asserts roundly, "than she, since the death of Dickens."

If I may seem to have spoken in not too friendly a way of Mr. Lang's "History of English Literature," I hope it will not be supposed that I am not conscious of the toil and thought that have gone to the making of this volume, nor that I fail to appreciate the wide reading or the taste which are the indispensable preliminaries of any such enterprise. Equally willing am I to recognise that in carrying his work through Andrew Lang has given of himself at every pore. The book is thoroughly individual and characteristic of him, and not merely in its constant allusions to Scott, Homer, Thackeray, Joan of Arc, Mary Queen of Scots, Charles Wogan, and psychical research. My criticisms, such as they are, are but directed to the architectural weaknesses of his scheme, the happy-go-lucky character of his style, and a petulance never revealed save in his treatment of modern topics; in fact if his history is disappointing, it is only so by comparison.

F. G. BETTANY.

DEAN SWIFT'S CORRESPONDENCE.*

The first two volumes of the Swift Correspondence reviewed in the January BOOKMAN have already been followed by a third, and at this rapid rate of production we shall not have to wait long for the sixth, with the much-longed-for Index, which one seems to miss more than ever. True, Mr. Ball has taken immense pains—he seems almost

* "The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift." Third Vol. 1718-1727. By F. Elrington Ball. 10s. 6d. net. (G. Bell and Sons.)

THE LOEB CLASSICAL LIBRARY

EDITED BY T. E. PAGE, M.A., &
W. H. D. ROUSE, Litt.D.

ADVISORY BOARD.

EDWARD CAPPS, Ph.D., LL.D., of Princeton University.
MAURICE CROISSET, Member of the Institute of France.
OTTO CRUSIUS, Ph.D., Litt.D., of the University of Munich,
Member of the Royal Bavarian Academy of Sciences
HERMANN DIELS, Ph.D., of the University of Berlin,
Secretary of the Royal Prussian Academy of Sciences.
J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt.D., of Cambridge University.
A. D. GODLEY, M.A., Public Orator of Oxford University.
WILLIAM G. HALE, LL.D., of the University of Chicago.
SALOMON REINACH, Member of the Institute of France.
SIR J. E. SANDYS, Litt.D., Public Orator of Cambridge University.
JOHN WILLIAMS WHITE, Ph.D., LL.D., Litt.D., of Harvard University.

TWENTY-FIVE CENTURIES OF GREEK AND LATIN LITERATURE.

What it is.

A SERIES of Greek and Latin texts, with translations into English on the opposite page, prepared by prominent scholars under the immediate guidance of the Editors, and with the counsel of an Advisory Board of the first scholars in Europe and America.

TWENTY VOLUMES will be published in 1912. Further volumes in active preparation.

Its claim.

THE Loeb Classical Library will be welcomed by those to whom their classics are but a pleasant reminiscence; by those to whom the classics are a sealed book; by classical scholars and by historians as an aid in research; by students as a thoroughly reliable series of the latest texts with irreproachable translations; by all men of taste and education as a reaction against the present deplorable neglect of the humanities.

Its price.

EACH Volume is foolscap 8vo, containing 400 to 600 pages, printed on featherweight paper, and bound either in strong cloth or in leather with full gilt top.

IN CLOTH 5/- NET PER VOLUME.

IN LEATHER 6/6 NET PER VOLUME.

List of the First Twenty Volumes.

IN SEPTEMBER.

THE APOSTOLIC FATHERS, translated by Kirsopp Lake, of the University of Leyden. Volume I., September; Volume II., November.

THE CONFESSIONS OF ST. AUGUSTINE, translated by W. Watts (1631).

EURIPIDES, translated by A. S. Way, D.Litt. In 4 vols. Volumes I. and II.

PHILOSTRATUS, THE LIFE OF APOLLONIUS OF TYANA, translated by F. C. Conybeare. 2 volumes.

PROPERTIUS, translated by H. E. Butler, of New College, Oxford.

TERENCE, translated by John Sargeaunt, of Westminster School. 2 volumes.

IN NOVEMBER.

APOLLONIUS RHODIUS, translated by R. C. Seaton.

APPIAN'S ROMAN HISTORY, translated by Horace White, of New York. 2 volumes.

CATULLUS, translated by F. W. Cornish, Vice-Provost of Eton College; TIBULLUS, translated by J. P. Postgate; PERVIGILUM VENERIS, translated by J. W. Mackail. 1 volume.

CICERO'S LETTERS TO ATTICUS, translated by E. O. Winstedt. 2 volumes. Volume I.

JULIAN, translated by W. C. Wright, of Bryn Mawr College. 3 volumes. Volume I.

LUCIAN, translated by A. M. Harmon, of Princeton University. Volume I.

SOPHOCLES, translated by F. Storr. 2 volumes. Volume I.

THEOCRITUS, BION AND MOSCHUS, translated by J. M. Edmonds.

FULL PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION TO THE L.C.L. DEPT.

London: WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

Mr. Heinemann's First Autumn List (1912)

ART AND BELLES LETTRES.

- ÆSOP'S FABLES. Illustrated by ARTHUR RACKHAM in Colour and Black and White. Translated by V. S. VERNON JONES, M.A. With Introduction by G. K. CHESTERTON. Library Edition Large cr 8vo, 6s. net. (Also an Edition de Luxe with Large Plates, limited to 1,000 copies for Great Britain and Ireland. 25s. net.)
- ALL THE TALES FROM SHAKESPEARE. By CHARLES and MARY LAMB and H. S. MORRIS. With 48 Plates in Colour from Paintings of Great Masters. In 2 vols., large medium 8vo, cloth extra, full gilt sides, 21s. net
- EPOCHS OF CHINESE AND JAPANESE ART. An Outline History of East Asiatic Design. By ERNEST FENOLLOSA. In 2 vols., with about 200 Plates in Colour and Monochrome. Cr. 4to. 36s. net.
- THE TECHNIQUE OF PAINTING. By C. MOREAU-VAUTHIER. Demy 8vo. With 8 Plates in Colour and Illustrations in Black and White. 10s. 6d. net.
- A CHRISTMAS GARLAND. Woven by MAX BEERBOHM. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.
- THE INN OF TRANQUILLITY. By JOHN GALSWORTHY. Crown 8vo. 6s.
- THE FOUR GARDENS. By "HANDASYDE." Illustd. by CHAS ROBINSON Large cr. 8vo. 8 Plates in Colour. 6s. net.
- MICHAEL ANGELO. By ROMAIN ROLLAND (Author of "John Christopher.") With 24 Plates. 6s. net.
- THE OLD CLOCK BOOK. By N. HUDSON MOORE. With 194 Illustrations and a full list of Clockmakers. Large crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
- THE HISTORY OF ART THROUGHOUT THE AGES (Ars Una: Species Mille Series). Each vol. 6s. net. Cr 8vo, cloth, with 600 Illustrations. New Vols: ART IN EGYPT, by M. MASPERO, ART IN ROME, by Mrs W. ARMSTRONG; ART IN SPAIN, by M. DIEULAFOY. [Previously published: Art in Great Britain and Ireland; Art in France; Art in N. Italy.]
- FRENCH ARTISTS OF OUR DAY. With 48 Plates selected from their works. Each vol 2s. 6d. net. 1, COURBET, by LÉONCE BÉNÉDITE; 2, MANET, by LOUIS HOURTICQ; 3, PUVIS DE CHAVANNES, by ANDRÉ MICHEL.

SCIENCE AND SOCIOLOGY.

- THE CHILDHOOD OF ANIMALS. By P. CHALMERS MITCHELL, M.A., LL.D., F.Z.S., F.R.S., etc. With Plates in Colour by E. Y. JONES and text Illustrations by R. B. BROOK-GREAVES. Royal 8vo. 10s. net.
- THE POSITIVE EVOLUTION OF RELIGION. By FREDERIC HARRISON, D.C.L. Demy 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.
- THE STEAMSHIP CONQUEST OF THE SEA. By F. A. TALBOT. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 6s. net.
- THE FOUNDATIONS OF INTERNATIONAL POLITY. By NORMAN ANGELL (Author of "The Great Illusion"). Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.
- THE MONTESSORI METHOD. By MARIA MONTESSORI. 3rd Edition. With Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY AND SPORT.

- IN THE SHADOW OF THE BUSH. By P. AMAURY TALBOT. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs and Drawings, Maps, Plans, &c. Large Demy 8vo, 18s. net
- WILD LIFE AND THE CAMERA. By A. RADCLYFFE DUGMORE (Author of "Camera Adventures in the African Wilds.") Crown 4to, with numerous plates from photographs specially taken by the Author. 6s. net
- RECENT EVENTS AND PRESENT POLICIES IN CHINA. By J. O. P. BLAND (Joint Author, with E. BACKHOUSE, of "China under the Empress Dowager"). Royal 8vo, Illustrated. 16s. net.

MEMOIRS AND BIOGRAPHY.

- MEMOIRS OF THE MARQUISE DE CUSTINE (Delphine de Sabrans). By E. MAUGRAS and COUNT DE CROZE-LEMERCIER. Demy 8vo, with Portrait, 10s. net.
- THE PRINCE IMPERIAL. By AUGUSTIN FILON. Royal 8vo, with Portraits and Illustrations, 15s. net.
- THE SON OF CATHERINE THE GREAT: Paul I. of Russia. By K. WALIZEWSKI (Author of "Catherine II." etc.). Royal 8vo, with Portrait, 15s. net.
- GERMAN MEMORIES. By SIDNEY WHITMAN. Demy 8vo, with many Portraits, 7s. 6d. net.
- THE PROMISED LAND. By MARY ANTIN. Crown 8vo, Illustrated, 7s. 6d. net.
- PORTRAITS AND STUDIES. By EDMUND GOSSE, C.B., LL.D. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.
- SALVE. By GEORGE MOORE. Crown 8vo, 6s. Uniform with the Author's "AVE."

NEW 6s. FICTION.

- | | |
|---|--|
| MOLYNEUX OF MAYFAIR. DUNCAN SCHWANN. | THE MARRIAGE OF KETTLE. C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNE. |
| LESS THAN THE DUST. MARY A. HAMILTON. | THE "MIND THE PAINT" GIRL. LOUIS TRACEY. |
| THE BOOK OF WONDER. LORD DUNSANY. | (Adapted from Sir A. W. PINERO'S Play.) |
| (Illustrated by S. H. SIME.) | ADNAM'S ORCHARD. SARAH GRAND. |
| BETWEEN TWO THIEVES. RICHARD DEHAN. | A DESERT ROSE. Mrs. DASKEIN. |
| A RUNAWAY RING. Mrs. H. DUDENEY. | KING ERRANT. FLORA A STEEL. |
| THE STORY OF STEPHEN COMPTON. J. E. PATTERSON. | THE DECLENSION OF HENRY D'ALBIAC. V. GOLDIE. |
| THE CAHUSAC MYSTERY. K. and H. HESKETH-PRICHARD. | GUTTER BABIES. DOROTHY SLADE. |
| | With 12 Illustrations by LADY STANLEY. |
| | WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO? ELIZABETH ROBINS. |

Illustrated Autumn Announcement List Post Free.

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

to know his whole text by heart—to help us as we go along by enriching his footnotes with references back. These supras are invaluable, but we pine for the as yet impossible infras, and it will be a luxury to gather together by help of the Index all the scattered links in so many interesting chains at present confused and confusing. In truth, even the accurate chronological order of the letters, the result of so much labour, detracts somewhat from their hold upon the attention. Often at an important juncture the thread of interest is broken by an irrelevant, trivial letter which worries us like some impertinent caller interrupting a conversation between Swift and his peers. I do not say these isolated volumes are not interesting to read through steadily. They are; but they seem more pleasant to study by instalments, to wander about in, to pick and choose from—in short to “work on.”

The ten years (1718–1727) comprised in the present volume, represent the prime of Swift's life. His powers, his fame and fortune were at their height; deterioration and decline had not even threatened. Perhaps never does he appear a great personage, a real lion, more than during his visits to England in 1726 and 1727—where among so many illustrious old friends his eminence, if not primacy, seems unquestioned. And that probably because he was so essentially an original, a strongly marked character—as we say now-a-days, a personality. So, too, was Sterne in his way—a way so like and unlike. Their faults were to them assets. Many stray lights from this volume confirm the guesses one has made as to the secret of Swift's hold upon his contemporaries and upon us. It is a kind of tyranny. Saving the few intimates who knew the best of him, his world disliked, distrusted, feared him, refused to gratify his ambitions, but, friends and foes alike, admired and wondered, never doubted his superiority. And we—who of us dares to question his prerogative? who does not bow before the despot? what Englishman is not proud of this king of English originals? But why? Others there have been with minds as powerful and clear and pregnant, and with redeeming faults as many and more attractive. Let us choose two, as typical as Swift of the Eighteenth century blindness to the Beautiful and the Romantic, which to us mean so much. For Gibbon idolatrous admiration; for Johnson respect as profound as affectionate; for Swift unwilling yet absolute submission. As we remember the repulsive things he did, and said, and wrote and meant, we want to hate and despise and forget the low, sordid brute, and are vexed because we cannot. What more repulsively cynical than his two letters of June, 1725, to Tom Sheridan, giving his boon companion advice for his first flying visit to his new living. He is implored to keep sober and be active in ferreting out all about tithes and profits. To Swift's mind the loaves and fishes were everything. But Tom is also told how best to flatter and dupe the good Bishop (Swift's old friend Browne), he is to “make a great appearance of temperance when you are abroad” (i.e., except in privacy)—“not to drink, or pledge any healths in the Bishop's company, for you know his weak side in that matter.” He is warned “not to wet his commission with any of his old crew.” Again, “I would have you carry down three or four sermons and preach every Sunday at your church, and be very devout”—“observe all grave forms.” Most Machiavelian of all—“wherever you lie within twenty miles of your living” (i.e., within the radius of gossip) “be sure call the family that evening to prayers.” How nasty it is—and yet we must swallow it. For somehow we stand more from Swift than from anyone else. He seems to say—“I loved the clever, tippling, dissolute fellow and wanted to serve him. Writing in a hurry, I had no time to clothe my advice with a veil of prudish verbiage, which would have been thrown away upon him. And upon you, too, Sir, unless you be a fool or a hypocrite.” And we are silenced. We own that, artfully paraphrased, and perfumed with pious sighs and gracious euphemisms, his brutal advice would have flowed with unction and edification from the pen of Pusey or Wilberforce. So, too, with much else. His time-serving and flattery of the great—well, no one then blushed for that. He must needs try his hand, and found that he excelled in a dignified mock sincerity. His double dealing with Harley and Bolingbroke, his contemptuous detraction, so frequent in this volume, of his old patron and idol, Oxford—we almost grant that they deserved it. So with his perversity, his inconsistency, his erratic politics, his brutal coarseness, his scheming, his arrogance, his treatment of women, his contempt for all that is sweet, beautiful and reposeful. Swift somehow coerces us into admitting him as a law unto himself. The secret of his power seems to be the union of powerful intellect, penetrating vision and that independent unsocial instinct which we call eccentricity. In his day, as now, he gave the impression of one who could do almost anything he chose, but did just what he chose and nothing else. And what he would do next, no man ever knew, and many feared. There was, and is, in him, as in Rabelais, a certain imposing irresponsibility, which we respect because we cannot quite understand. The things he did and said, who would not detest in others and blush for in himself? Yet the world only says it was a sad pity, but we cannot make him out, so we must put up with it. By his baffling mixture of frankness and mystification, by his callous contempt for conventional morals and manners, by his cool arrogance—or, if you like, impudence—Swift, like Rabelais and Napoleon, has forced us to accept him as a genius set far above, or rather far apart from us and beyond our jurisdiction. All of us, at least, whose tendency is to respect instead of despising what we cannot understand.

Were Swift's mental and moral aberrations incipient lunacy? Many think so. I cannot. For his superb force and clarity of thought and diction appear not at lucid intervals, but just whenever he chose to display them. Until mental disease had taken firm hold his powers were under perfect control. We were taught at school that Gulliver's Travels was a shocking example of Divine retribution, and that when Swift got to the Yahoos he had gone raving mad with spite, malice and misanthropy. Pure nonsense. The Yahoos are the inevitable climax to which the whole book works up. I doubt if he had the least taint of congenital lunacy. His madness was a senile disease that came on like gout or blindness. He was no visionary, no dreamer, like Poe or Coleridge. Of imagination, he was absolutely destitute. Invention, if you like, marvellously fertile and ingenious and original, but of imagination with its pains and pleasures not a trace. Nor of poetic fire one single spark. A flash now and then perhaps—but it is only a reflection, or a rhetorical accident. In all his writings I can recall no single magic touch which appeals successfully to the softer passions or the sense of beauty. So able a craftsman was he that perhaps, had he tried hard, he could almost have deluded us—almost have charmed—almost have made us cry. Almost—not quite. Alas, that fatal “almost.” There is no “almost” in the “Elegy on Levett.” Pedantic in its strictly classical diction, the thought is as vigorous and lucid as Swift's, and under its majestic simplicity burns the lambent flame of “celestial fire” which irradiates a work of perfect beauty. Mind meets mind in brilliant verse, but so it does in the “Principia” and “Novum Organum.” In true poetry heart calls to heart.

Poor Swift! for after all our awe and admiration it comes to that in the end. He was a failure, and he knew it. What were his real thoughts he has not revealed, but be sure they were great, profound and bitter. Like others, he blamed or deplored not only fate, but himself. Perhaps we get nearest in that finely-written letter of December 19th, 1719, to Bolingbroke, which deserves ample quotation. He flatters and comforts his friend, and no doubt himself too, by the reflection that the great prizes fall to steady mediocrity, not to great genius. In political life “all great geniuses if they had not been so great would have been less unfortunate.” Then this apt metaphor. “Did you never observe one of your clerks cutting his paper with a blunt ivory knife? Did you ever know the knife fail to go the right way? Whereas if he had used a razor, or a penknife, he had odds against him of spoiling a whole sheet.” It is but the old laudatur et alget, only Juvenal did not give the true reason. Swift means, and rightly, that genius is sadly square, and all the best holes so very round. The flashing crystal is all facets and angles; such was Swift. Then in a sally of charming and with him unusual Shandean humour, he goes on to paint himself lapsing into old fogeyism. He has gone through "all his old stories three or four times with the younger people." "I give hints how significant a person I have been, and nobody believes me. I pretend to pity them, but am inwardly angry." In vain he "lays traps for people to ask to see what he has written," and "wreaks his spite by condemning their taste." "If I can prevail on anyone to personate a hearer and admirer, you would wonder what a favourite he grows. He is sure to have the first glass out of the bottle, and the best bits I can carve." "The worst of it is that lying is of no use; for the people here will not believe one half of what is true." I only wish I might quote the whole passage. Now is this épanchement de cœur sincere? Carefully elaborated and revised no doubt, but I do think it is founded on profound and bitter self analysis. The mournful dominant note under this whimsical gaiety is—to this have I come already: what is to be the end? He felt, he knew himself a brilliant failure.

A photo by Miss Irene Kathleen Falkner.

Vanessa's House at Celbridge.

From "The Correspondence of Jonathan Swift" (Geo. Bell & Sons).

If reflections suggested by the volume as a whole have engrossed my page, it is not that other matter is lacking. The admirable notes not less than the text teem with novel and curious points on which one would gladly descant. Without going carefully through the book and examining each letter, and compiling a list, it was hopeless to disintegrate the new matter, which might have been asterisked in the Contents—so I will only note the inferiority of the Chetwode correspondence. With regard to Vanessa, Mr. Ball hazards a novel suggestion which to me seems more than probable. Delamy says in the gallant euphemism of the day that "she certainly gave herself up as Ariadne did, to Bacchus from the day that she was deserted." The habit, Mr. Ball hints, may have been of long standing, and explain much of the Dean's conduct. If one examined the letters carefully with that view—I have not yet done so—I suspect that drink might account for her occasional incoherence, and furious solicitations, and that in Swift's letters some obscure passages might point to a secret vice from which he was weaning her, but which, as is often the case, he could not mention openly without enraging her.

One more point. In 1720 Swift's championship of Irish interests starts with his "Proposal for the Universal Use of Irish Manufacture," on which the editor hints that the Dean's economics were really politics, and his politics only anti-English party spirit. In truth, his crusade was neither patriotic nor Irish. He only wanted to enjoy the fun of mischief-making and to annoy the Government. And he knew or cared nothing about the Irish. By Irish he meant the Anglo-Irish within and without the Pale; of the true Irish you learn less from his whole writings than from one page of Pocock, or Edgeworth, or Carleton. The one he despised as a low grade of English; the other were to him mere autochthonous Troglodites, so it never occurred to him to study them. Which was his loss—and is ours.

Y. Y.

A FINE ODE.*

Originality and purity of form, rare dignity of diction, passionate and lilting rhythm—these are the outward characteristics of Mr. Ronald Campbell Macfie's new poem, "The Titanic (An Ode of Immortality)." Through this splendid veil one perceives the austere lineaments of the informing spirit—brave belief in the goodness and rightness of the Plan, in the wisdom of the Master Will. No blind Fate for Mr. Macfie, no club-foot Destiny stumbling down the eternities, no drunken Berserk amok among the spheres; Omniscience, Purpose, Will for him, God, and the Will of God, and the Love of God that passeth understanding:

" . . . the Soul in whom all beings are Discerns so deep, foresees so far,
He plans the meadows of a star
Aeons before the star is made,
And in the fire
He moulds to His desire
The tiny blossom and the tender blade.
The deeper meaning of these woes
No mortal knows,
Yet in one web the universe is spun,
Out of the Infinite the finite grows,
And shade and sun
Are woven in one,
And every star is needful for a rose."

Is he not sadly out of time with the age? But is he not greatly in time with the ages? . . . Prophet, prophesying "Courage leaning on the Love of God," and hope—nay, surety—of ultimate knowledge, he is also, unforgettably, artist, giving no high music; and who may dissent from his reading of the dreadful dream that was the world-moving cataclysm of 1912, cannot but applaud what one must call, for lack of a better, and also because it is the only fitting, phrase, the maestra, the virtuosite, of his execution. For his thirteen swift strophes, he creates as many necessary modes: one would instance Strophe I., where the massy line suggests the leviathan, the sheer bulk; Strophe IV., where the pointed staccato words stab; and Strophe XIII., where one hears the hurried rush of breaking bubbles over the submerged Titan, and then—in the last line—the long, smooth swell of silence:

"Now is the carnate soul
Conscious of body and face,
Conscious of joy or disgrace;
Then shall its wider senses embrace
The rest and the riot,
The song and the quiet,
The hearing and seeing,
The infinite being.
The light and the music of measureless Space!"

Music is behind every line of this Ode; and behind the music, the essential substance and spirit of poetry.

Judge it as one will, "The Titanic" is a great performance, conceived greatly and greatly wrought.

W. A. MACKENZIE.

GODS.†

The two latest volumes of the new edition of "The Golden Bough" tell the story of man's deification of his food supply, especially of his corn supply. So universal

* "The Titanic. (An Ode of Immortality.)" By Ronald Campbell Macfie. 1s. net. (Erskine Macdonald.)

† "The Golden Bough." Third Edition. Part V.: "Spirits of the Corn and of the Wild." Two Vols. By J. G. Frazer. 2os. net. (Macmillan.)

are the attentions paid to the corn-spirit, indeed so world-wide is the tale of sacraments and sacrifices connected with it, that Dr. Frazer has felt it necessary to warn the reader in a preface against "the impression, natural but erroneous, that man has created most of his gods out of his belly." There is practically no inhabited place on the globe where rituals to secure the corn-spirit have not survived till the present day. Demeter and Persephone are not dead: they linger on, feeble and disguised, even in the harvest fields of Scotland, where the last sheaf of corn to be cut is known now as the "Old Wife" and now as the "Maiden," being supposed to contain the spirit of the corn. And in Germany, Russia, Bulgaria, Austria, England, Peru, Borneo, Java, Burma, and a hundred other lands, we find the same personifications of the corn-spirit and the same sort of rituals.

In some places the corn-spirit takes the form, not of the lost sheep, but of a human being or an animal. Sometimes the human being is the man or woman who cuts, binds or threshes the last corn; sometimes he is a passing stranger. "All over Germany it is customary for the reapers or threshers to lay hold of passing strangers and bind them with a rope made of corn-stalks till they pay a forfeit." This is a relic of an old ceremony for securing the corn-spirit. In primitive times, however, the corn-spirit in its human representative was not secured so playfully, but was slain and cut in small pieces, and the seed of the next year's corn either sprinkled with his blood or mingled with his flesh. Thus, among the khands of Bengal, when similar human sacrifices were made for the crops, each head of a house was given a piece of the flesh, which he buried in his favourite field in order to ensure fertile crops. Dr. Frazer suggests that the story that the fragments of Osiris's body were scattered up and down the land may perpetuate the memory of a similar method of fertilizing the fields in Egypt, for he holds that Osiris was a corn-spirit, or at least a god who began as a corn-spirit, and that the lamentations of the harvest reapers in the Egyptian fields over the annual death of the corn-spirit were the rustic originals of the tale of the sufferings and death of Osiris.

It is a suggestive coincidence, which Dr. Frazer recalls, that until recently similar lamentations for the annual death of the corn-spirit survived in Devonshire and other parts of England. The custom was known as "cutting the neck." The neck, which was a bunch of corn—generally the last corn left standing in the field—is apparently a far-away survival of the human or animal representative of the corn-spirit which used to be sacrificed in English fields. In South Pembrokeshire, where it was the last corn left standing, with the ears tied together, the labourers tried to cut the neck by throwing hatchets at it. In Devonshire they gathered in a ring round the neck after it had been cut, took off their hats, and stooped and held them with both hands towards the ground. Then they raised themselves, lifting their arms and their hats above their heads, and cried: "The neck!" in a long, harmonious cry. Having done this three times, they changed their cry to: "Way, yen!"—"Way, yen!"—which is said to have had a most wonderful effect at a distance, "far finer than that of the Turkish muezzin." Thus, in an echo of the sacrifice of the corn-spirit and the lamentations for its death, rustic England is linked with ancient Egypt, as ancient Egypt is linked with Greece of Demeter and Persephone and the Eleusinian mysteries.

That the victim was not necessarily human is shown by the fact that the neck used to be known as "the gander's neck" in Shropshire; a fact which suggests that the corn-spirit may have been represented there by a gander, as it has been represented by a wolf in France, and cock in Austria, a hare in Galway, a tom-cat in Silesia, a goat in Prussia, a cow in Switzerland, a horse in Baden, a quail in Transylvania, a fox in Westphalia, a sow in Swabia, and a blue bird among the Toredjas of Central Celebes.

It would be impossible to overpraise Dr. Frazer for the laborious genius with which he has here and in the other parts of "The Golden Bough" brought together and classified and interpreted the mundane elements in the world's religions. Nor is it possible in a short review to touch on more than one of the dozen inter-related subjects which he treats so fully and with such illumination in the present volumes. Perhaps he is almost too easily led into digression, as in the chapter on "Woman's Part in Primitive Agriculture." But if he is unwilling to leave even the side issues of his subject unadorned with knowledge, it is a noble fault.

ROBERT LYND.

THE RED HAND OF ULSTER.*

Most novels want a view-point: this novel demands it. To get the view-point exactly, you must read it at least twice, and if you happen to be one in whom the effect of political usage is a certain deadening of the humoristic sense, then three readings or even four may be necessary and worth while. The first will bewilder you, a second will make you see, a third will set you thinking, at the fourth (if you are not a Broadbent, a Sir Samuel Clithering, or a Babberly) you will discover the joke—and then mayhap you will read it a fifth time for the pure refreshment of a good laugh.

It is unfair to call the book, as some are calling it, a political skit. It is skittish here and there, and its general trend is in Mr. Birmingham's later manner: the manner, shall we say, developed so successfully since the happy discovery of "J. J." In it Ireland and its affairs are treated in a way quite other than the way of "The Seething Pot," "The Northern Iron," "The Bad Times," "Hyacinth Halvey," and the rest of Mr. Birmingham's incisive studies of Irish problems and manifestations. In those books he was pleasantly sober-minded; in this he laughs, spits this point and that with his rapier and holding it up jests at it, even makes of the whole grim problem of present-day Ulster a laughing matter. The title of the book itself is a jest; for Ulster's hand in it is anything but red. Everything is topsy-turvy, paradoxical, full of whim. And yet for all of us save the Broadbents and Babberlys, no book about Ireland has been written lately of saner and more illuminative kind. Should the portent of Ulster vanish soon, as happily it may, Mr. Birmingham's credit for that mercy will not, one thinks, be small.

It is all about another Irish rebellion, not actual but imagined, a rebellion in the air, an emeute as the sublime Clithering calls it, engineered and financed by an Irish-American named Conroy, carried through by ostensible loyalists, and resulting in the achievement of Home Rule, absolute and final, by none other than the Orangemen of Ulster. Its narrator is a mild-mannered and retiring Irish peer, Lord Kilmore, with a taste for literature and a moderate amount of benevolence towards those who do not annoy him, one who eventually comes to dislike being called a man of moderation as much as he disliked being called a Liberal. Kilmore has a nephew called Godfrey, whom he loathes as a dependent and a nuisance, and a daughter called Marion whom Godfrey would wed, but may not, and who, amongst other delightful ministrations, gives help to her father in his task of gathering material for a history of all the Irish rebellions there have ever been.

As fortune would have it, Kilmore's literary endeavours are interrupted by the amazing career of this other rebellion, into the maze of which he is drawn willy-nilly by the machinations of Lady Moyne and other "hired mercenaries of the Capitalist classes," and of which he becomes the unwilling, if interested, chronicler. Conroy does it all. He, son of an ex-Fenian and with hatred of the Saxon black in his heart, conceives the glorious scheme of relieving what he might call the "ongwee" of life by bucking against the British Lion and twisting the brute's tail. He will have a rebellion of his own, and realizing with Bob Power "the absurdity of supposing that the Irish Parliamentary party . . . had in them the makings of rebels," he proposes "to chip in

* "The Red Hand of Ulster." By George A. Birmingham. 6s. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

Painted by J. McNeill Whistler

From an etching by William Hole, R.S.A.

Whistler

Photo by Russell & Sons

Mr. George A. Birmingham.

with his millions" to the effect of giving Orange Ulster its chance to show England and the world that its threat of resisting Home Rule to death in the last ditch is no parade of bluster.

So we have elaborate preparations of the most mysterious kind, with Conroy smoking his ruminative cigar amidst them, and for abettors in rebellion the absurdest satellites—a Tory peer and his lady, a Fellow of Trinity, a Dean who is honorary Grand Chaplain to an Orange order, a retired Army Colonel who has a mania for big guns, a manager of the Kilmore Co-operative stores named Crossan and himself an Orange Grand Master, a dour Ulster Protestant manufacturer, another Ulster devotee who burns to achieve the destruction of the British fleet by means of the machine-gun in which he has invested all his means, and many more. Conroy's yacht, the Finola, goes and comes circumvently, now conveying on apparent holiday the Prime Minister, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, generals, bishops, notabilities, publicists; now keeping a midnight appointment with a tramp steamer in the North Sea, now slipping in to land illicit cargo right under Kilmore's study windows. Then there is stealthy going of laden carts uphill from the bay; and in the Kilmore Co-operative stores is harboured now more dangerous goods than creamery butter; and the egregious Godfrey smells a rat; and Lady Moyne is divinely mysterious; and we hear the tramp of armed men on the roads as they come back from drilling on the hills; and Ulster sings its War hymn; and Clithering gets nervous; and Babberly goes about declaring that never, no, never, will the great heart of England desert its Ulster children; and Conroy sits smoking imperturbably, and Colonel Malcolmson unpacks his artillery from the butter boxes, and McConkey fondles his machine-gun that "shoots so bonny."

Then at last, of a sudden, whilst Clithering clithers and Babberly babbles, a crisis! In Belfast are two armies, the British Army, and the army of the Orange revolutionaries, with the Royal Irish between them. But, strange to say, all is peace in Belfast, the factories still at work, and in the streets Tommy Atkins and John Irwin commingling without show of malice. Ah, but stay. Next Monday all Belfast is going to a meeting of protest against Home Rule, and the Government has proclaimed that meeting, and so on Monday Ulster will show her red hand. It is for Monday Tommy and John are waiting, Malcolmson with his artillery and McConkey with his Maxim. It comes. Of a sudden War, men marching, cavalry charging, shots, a woman and her baby killed right under Clithering's horrified eyes; then wild, mad fusillade, which from the revolutionaries fills half a street with lead, and from the soldiers peppers the roofs. For behold, the revolutionaries cannot shoot straight, and the soldiers will not, and McConkey's Maxim demolishes no more than two tram-cars: and on both sides is deep whole-hearted disgust. "Fight, cowards," shout the loyal Orange revolutionaries. "Let us prove ourselves. We would die. Fight, cowards!" Then from the fleet in the bay comes a shell demolishing the statue of Queen Victoria before the City Hall; and at that dread happening Ulster's loyalty crumbles into the dust. "To glory with England," cry the people with one voice, "clear out bag and baggage—all of you—everyone except your figure-head of a Lord-Lieutenant, whose salary Conroy will pay—and let us ourselves manage the affairs you have muddled these hundred years and more." And England, through her Prime Minister, answers, "It is well, and if within three weeks I know that in Ireland are only trouser buttons left to show that it once was inhabited I shall incontinently rejoice."

SHAN F. BULLOCK.

TWO VIEWS OF THE KAISER.*

It is twenty years since Renan said he would like to live in order to see how the Emperor William would turn out. According to Herr Fried, he has turned out to be the great peacemaker or peacekeeper in Europe. This author's book is really written as an appeal to the Kaiser himself to found a great peace alliance, organizing the nations for international enterprises of commerce and social welfare. Let him hold an international congress, which should discuss trade problems, colonising principles, etc., at stated intervals. "No State should be obliged to bow to the measures decided on by such a congress, but all should participate in the discussions. At the beginning the congress would have no other object than to exist. Its effects would soon be felt." One of them would be the creation of a sense of solidarity between civilized nations, and gradually, the author thinks, the spread of an international rapprochement, leading to peace alliances. "The Emperor, if only he took the initiative, might live to be hailed as the saviour of Europe, the universal sovereign, and the Great Pacificist." The book certainly makes out a good case for the Emperor's excellent intentions, but it hardly allows enough for the mailed fist attitude or for the war-party of the Junkers. The Kaiser, powerful as he is, is not the only force in determining the policy of Germany.

Mr. or Herr Schwan takes a less optimistic view of the Kaiser. He is not a prejudiced sceptic, but he doubts the unity of the Kaiser's personality. "It is extremely doubtful whether his mind is strong enough to withstand the clash of his own paradoxes. What path will he tread when he will have to choose between the Socialists and the disillusioned followers of the Iron Fist? A man who boisterously denounces the Yellow Peril and then seizes Kiao Tchou, unmindful of the ensuing scramble for Chinese territory, may be a clever promoter for the House of Krupp, but he certainly lacks the clear vision commonly associated with statesmanship." This is perhaps a less roseate view than Herr Fried's, but it will sound to most people more real. Mr. Schwan also wants the passion for armaments checked, but he proposes not a movement led by the Kaiser, but a maritime League of Peace between England, France, and America, which would mean that "the British fleet would be thrown against any Power, great or small, which undertook naval operations in the Atlantic, that the American fleet would fulfil the same rôle in the Pacific, and the French fleet would be used in like manner in the Mediterranean." To make it clear to other European nations that the league is not aggressive, Britain must abandon the Japanese and the French alliances.

* "The German Emperor and the Peace of the World." By Alfred H. Fried (The Nobel Peace Prize). With a Preface by Norman Angell. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"The Great Solution." By August Schwan. 1s. (Stephen Swift & Co.)

Such are the webs of policy spun by these authors. Their intentions are more admirable than their methods, on the whole. Mr. Schwan, for example, wants individual liberty, and for this ideal he is prepared to take all the money of the Church, to use it for education and similar purposes. His hatred of militarism springs from the sense of its waste and folly; but, unlike Herr Fried, he has a doctrinaire theory of the sort of peace which Britain in particular ought to seek. Both books expose with unsparing logic the anomaly of our present foreign policy, and the cost which it involves. Germany's partial responsibility for it is frankly admitted by Herr Schwan; but after all, as both authors show, something can yet be done by Britain and Germany to mend the situation. If books like these, for all their one-sidedness, help to form public opinion, it will be to the good of the world.

J. M.

PARIS OLD AND NEW.*

These two volumes, published at the same time, may be regarded as complementary each to the other. Mr. Henry C. Shelley invites his readers to "an exploration in the spirit" of the Paris of the past, while Mr. Rowland Strong takes us about the Paris of to-day, and is less concerned with historical associations than with the psychology—if we may use so clumsy a word where the treatment is so light—of the Parisians of the present.

"Paris was ever attractive," said a visitor in the year 1814, and the statement is no less true now when the gay city is a century older, and when a writer dealing with "Old Paris" has so much the more material from which to select. Indeed, Mr. Shelley sets out with the sentence, "'Old Paris' is a protean term" (which it may be hinted is not precisely what he meant), and goes on to point out that it may mean the Paris of Hugh Capet or of the third Napoleon, and in his successive chapters to identify it with the Paris of the past, whether of a few decades or a few centuries ago. The result is a book full of quaint and interesting matter, well arranged and pleasantly presented. In it the author takes us along the two banks of the Seine, pausing at the successive cafés, inns and taverns associated with notable men and incidents of the distant and nearer past; he takes us to the "clubs"—an institution borrowed from England as social, but which rapidly changed to political centres; to the salons, so essentially French; to the theatres, fairs, fêtes and other gathering places. The volume is illustrated with a large number of reproductions of old prints and portraits, many of them quaint, and all of them serving to make more real to the reader that "Old Paris" about which Mr. Shelley has gathered such various lore.

Having learned from Mr. Shelley something of the varied and crowded life of the Paris of the past, the reader who turns to Mr. Rowland Strong's volume will find it a lively and attractive presentation of the Paris of the present, by one who evidently knows the French capital from long and loving study of its characteristics, who knows it in something of the intimate life of its people as well as in those more superficial features which strike the hurried visitor. Mr. Shelley has something to say of "Tortoni's," and Mr. Strong begins his book with a description of the last night before that historic café shut its doors for ever, and thus starts by suggesting the atmosphere of the boulevards. He touches upon many aspects of Parisian life, and is never better than when describing things generally by means of particular examples, as in the narratives of "A Parisian Holiday-Making" and "A Parisian Marriage." The title of his book is evidently intended to convey that in it will be found something of the sensations that come, not to the hasty tourists who see superficially, but to those sojourners in Paris who feel as well as see, those who in a sense become part of that which is summed up as "All Paris." Mr. Rowland Strong evidently knows his Paris intimately—and he writes about it well.

FIRES.*

The consciousness of social questions, which has so affected all branches of contemporary thought, could not be without its influence on the

* "Old Paris: Its Social, Historical and Literary Associations." By Henry C. Shelley. 12s. 6d. net. (Andrew Melrose.)

"Sensations of Paris." By Rowland Strong. 10s. 6d. net (John Long.)

† "Fires." Books II. and III. By Wilfrid Wilson Gibson. 1s. net each. (Elkin Mathews.)

The Boulevard by Night.

From "Sensations of Paris," by Rowland Strong (John Long).

arts, or at any rate on literature, the most intellectual of the arts. The merits of this influence in itself are bound up with the meaning of that consciousness, and form far too big a question for discussion in a short review. It must be accepted that such influence exists, and that, essential merits apart, it is seen at its worst in sundry insignificant propagandist plays performed by ineffectual dramatic clubs in aid of unimportant sociological or suffrage societies, and at its best in the novels of Wells and Galsworthy, some of the plays of Shaw, Galsworthy, and Barker, and in Masefield's recent poems. These writers, while keeping clear of propagandism and parti pris, have taken advantage of the enlarged opportunities afforded by the new interest in a vast segment of society which culture has hitherto ignored or treated, at the utmost, with little understanding.

To the same category, if to a somewhat lower plane than the writers named, belongs Mr. Wilfrid Wilson Gibson. At one time finding poetry only in the recognised poetic materials, he has latterly been resolutely and successfully seeking it in the crude facts of the lives of humble folk. But though he has become a realist, he has not become a photographer. If the function of art is to reduce things to their essence and recreate them as types, Mr. Gibson fulfils his function. He has found the quintessence of poverty in certain elemental passions and stark situations, and has solidified it into a series of little narratives which are so simple and so freed of accident or ornament that they indeed seem typical and universal. All of them, moreover, are artistic in proportion and development, working duly to a climax; nor does Mr. Gibson scorn coincidence or poetic justice. He has realised, like a skilled potter, that only the finest form can dispense with ornament. Further, while some of his tales trust to their stark simplicity and sincerity for their poetry, in others there is an element of the supernatural. This, however, is not an addition from outside, but the result of a quickened apprehension of the essence of the matter; it is like the aura, which, after long looking, will blur the bleakest outline. Lastly, while many of these stories are tragic, others are of happy ending.

Thus, Mr. Gibson is no slave of a social creed; neither a revolutionary nor a pessimist. But he has realised that the dramas of life, love and death as played by poor folk are matters for poetry as fine if not finer, and certainly fresher, than the great tragedies of the Gueneveres and Deirdres. At all events they have gripped and kindled his imagination to some purpose, and by adopting themes not conventionally poetic he has proved himself a true poet.

Technically, Mr. Gibson has an extraordinary facility, especially considering how little use he makes of the epithets of the Gradus. There is a rightness about his adjectives, an inevitability about his rhymes, which is almost excessive. One takes, almost at random, an example of his manner:

"And then, I heard a sound of tears;
But dared not speak, or let her know
I'd caught a single whisper, though
I wondered long what she had done
That she should fear the pattering feet.
And when those queer words in the night
Had fretted me half-dead with fright,
And set my throbbing head abeat . . .
Out of the darkness, suddenly,
The crane's long arm swung over me,
Among the stars, high overhead . . .
And then it dipped, and clutched my bed:
And I had not a breath to cry,
Before it swung me through the sky,
Above the sleeping city high,
Where blinding stars went blazing by . . ."

Such facility might be dangerous; but seeing that Mr. Gibson has proved himself of so restrained an imagination, there is little need to fear that he will allow himself to be beguiled by his mastery of words.

F. B.

Scala in Subiaco.

From "Italian Travel Sketches" by James Sully (Constable)

ITALIAN TRAVEL SKETCHES.*

Under the title of "Italian Travel Sketches," Professor Sully has collected some thirteen vivid papers contributed, for the most part, to the Quarterly Review, The Edinburgh Review, Blackwood's Magazine, and The Independent Review. Although originally destined to periodical publication, there is nothing fugitive about these scholarly essays; they are informative, in the best sense of the word, for Professor Sully is too practised "a hand" to pelt us with unpolished chunks of fact; they are illuminating, in that they reveal to us the spirit of Italy, so often unperceived by the average recorder of impressions; and so they well deserve the consecration of boards. To the desultory reader the two most interesting chapters will be, in all likelihood, those dealing with the History of Travel in Italy. Here we have the cream of Professor Sully's wide reading (the "List of Books consulted" is in itself a handy guide to the literature on Italy) and we encounter, for a brief moment, everybody of note who visited this storied land and wrote of it, from John Free who described the aquatic pageant of the Bucintaur at Venice, when the Doge wedded the Adriatic, to Herbert Spencer, who carried his habit of mind with him, and "whose remarks on the quaint optics of Guido Reni's Aurora are a quaint example of the forcing of scientific principles upon art." We meet W. Wey, unconscious precursor of Baedeker; and W. Thomas, the author of what is perhaps the first guide-book, The Historie of Italie, a boke excedyng profitable to redde; and Sir Philip Sidney who knew Tintoretto and Veronese; Joachim du Bellay, the poet, and Montaigne; Fynes Moryson, who gave us the first complete account of an Italian tour by an English gentleman, and Sir Henry Wotton, and "Mr. Milton"; Tom Coryat, James I.'s "privileged buffoon" and the first lightning traveller—he "did" France, North Italy, Switzerland and Germany in five months!—and Thomas Hobbes, who met Galileo at Florence; John Evelyn, and John Ray, the naturalist; and so on, down the years, to Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Addison, Smollet, Gibbon, Mrs. Thrall Beckford, Gray, Wordsworth, Byron, and the great figures of the nineteenth century. To the reader whose "mind's eye" demands refreshment, one may recommend the chapters entitled "Terracina," "Palermo," "From a Roman Window," "A Ticinese Village," and "Baveno in Autumn." Here, recorded in a charmingly easy style, and with fitting freedom from all feeling of rush, one finds quiet impressions, acute observations, and clean-cut sketches of peasantry, scenery, and all the coloured change and movement of country life. The superannuated traveller will delight in recapturing, in Professor Sully's pages, the bright yet mellow atmosphere of old wanderings; and the arm-chair voyager will, of a certainty, pluck from them courage to forsake his saddlebag and "go see." Professor Sully has added one more bead, and not the least, to the chapelet strung in honour of Italia.

* "Italian Travel Sketches." With 22 illustrations. By James Sully, LL.D. 7s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

TRIPOLI AND HER TROUBLES.*

The descent of an Italian expedition upon Tripoli last autumn brought that little known and lightly regarded corner of North Africa into a fierce and controversial limelight, and many volumes were hastily prepared and issued to meet the sudden demand on the part of the reading public for information with regard to the country. Among these publications that became possible through circumstance Mrs. Mabel Loomis Todd's "Tripoli, the Mysterious" must be assigned its place, for, pleasantly written though it is, it contains so little material and shows so scanty an understanding of the place or the people. The authoress seems to have gone with her husband to Tripoli on two expeditions for observing a solar eclipse, and her book is merely a bye product. She very truly says in her first paragraph: "Properly to write the wonderful story of Tripoli, daughter of sea and desert, one must be not only an accomplished historian, a cultivated archæologist, and an expert in ethnology, but profoundly versed in Arabic, and in the fundamental beliefs and general practices of Mohammedanism, as well as the local customs of that great religion, coloured as it is by differing environment; he must be a thorough student of political economy, too, with a world outlook on cause and effect in government."

But she has little light to throw on these things, and her book of less than forty thousand words is somewhat disappointing.

Mr. Francis McCullagh went to Tripoli as a war correspondent. At first he was wholly pro-Italian, but the progress of the fighting and the barbarities he witnessed daily brought about a complete change in his sentimental attitude, and he became as frankly Arab in his sympathies as he had originally been Italian. That the war is a horrible one everyone admits, many hold that it was wantonly aggressive—that it was undertaken on behalf of a commercial institution, and that the resistance of the Arabs makes it highly probable that Italy has embarked on an extremely difficult and dangerous task. But while holding all these views, and more, Mr. McCullagh goes far to weaken the effect of his own accusations of the Italian aggression and brutality by the manifest prejudice displayed throughout his book. In fact, one is not sure that he would not almost regard with high satisfaction a severe Italian defeat with heavy losses. That he saw dreadful things is certain. That mistakes were made by the Italians is certainly true. But a virulent attack on the Italian troops, on the officers, on everything Italian, can only be regarded as regrettable and lacking in balance and in real weight. The book is in reality a powerful, a terrible appeal to all civilized people against war and militarism, and ought to be read carefully and studied carefully by everyone who wants to discover something of what it means when nation attacks nation—not the noise of the captains and the shoutings, but the blood, the agony, the mutilations, the changed psychology of the men, the terror, the awful tragic, uncalled-for waste. Surely for a few millions Italy might have procured from Turkey concessions in Tripoli that would have satisfied every legitimate need she can allege as driving her to war.

F. M. A.

THE NEW COUNTRY LIFE.*

Anybody who wishes to find out what is being done in the different parts of the British Isles to put the land to a better and more profitable use than it has, in many cases, been put in the past cannot do better than take Mr. Green for his guide and instructor. It so happens that I know intimately many of the districts which Mr. Green describes, and I can say, without qualification, that, having a good cause, he has made the most of it. Occasionally, perhaps, he is inclined to be somewhat too partisan and sweeping in his statements, but for the most part he is eminently fair and impartial, and he sets out his facts with a charm that robs them of any inherent dullness.

One striking example of the wanton mismanagement and neglect against which his whole book is a protest occurs early in these pages. Not far from Bulford Mr. Green saw a rood of land on which various vegetables were being grown, and he says that from this plot of land the boy cultivator was making a profit which worked out at the rate of £56 to the acre. "On the same field," Mr. Green proceeds, "or the field adjoining, I saw a crop of thistles, among which a mangold plant could only be seen here and there. And this belonged to a farm of over 2,000 acres, rented by the War Office at 2s. 6d. an acre." One can only join in Mr. Green's astonishment that in a district like this, where a splendid market is provided by the military camp, intensive culture should be neglected, or rather repressed; for a number of applications, duly backed by the County Council and the Board of Agriculture inspector, were made, only for the scheme to be held up, somehow or other, in Whitehall.

I cannot hope to give any adequately comprehensive account here even of the comparatively few experiments which Mr. Green has described. The growth of market-gardening round Evesham is, of course, included in his survey. Mr. Green sums up very clearly the contributory causes which have led to the prosperity of Evesham, and, very properly, he lays stress upon the "Evesham custom," whereby the new in-going tenant pays the out-going tenant, and not the landlord, for the agricultural improvements which he has effected.

The most interesting experiment, perhaps, of all is that of "Wayford Tenants, Limited," not far from Norwich. The scheme illustrates the principle of tenant co-partnership as applied to an agricultural colony, with the addition of various distinctive features of its own. Each small holder is tenant and landlord combined. He has to take up shares to the value of his holding, but the whole amount need not be paid at once. Should he wish to leave, his only anxiety is to transfer his shares to somebody else. As Mr. Green rightly says, it is the peculiar economic basis of this undertaking which "marks it out as a unique settlement of small holders, and its further development becomes a matter of national interest." Of the other chapters there is, unfortunately, no room to speak, but a word of special praise should be given to his accounts of market-gardening and stock-farming in the Channel Islands, and of what is being done in Ireland, especially at Glasnevin College.

Nor is it merely with description that Mr. Green's book is filled. He has many constructive suggestions to offer, and he shows clearly his opinion that, great as the awakening in this country has already been, very much still remains to be done. We are still a long way off perfection, while the spirit of individualism is still so strong in a place such as Evesham. We are certainly very far from perfection so long as farms can be bought over the heads of the County Council by a near relative of the Small Holdings Committee. It is not satisfactory to know of a case in which the chairman of the County Council and member of the Small Holdings Committee publicly bade for a farm after the reserve price which the Council were prepared to pay had been passed by a clear £1,000. There is a great deal to be said for Mr. Green's plea that members of the educated classes should help to revive rural life in the same way in which young men join University Settlements in slum areas. Of such suggestions, implicit or implied, Mr. Green's book is full. I can only add that in my judgment there is not one which does not appear to be both desirable and practicable.

* "The Awakening of England." By F. E. Green. 2s. net. (Nelson.)

* "Tripoli the Mysterious." By Mabel Loomis Todd. 10s. 6d. net. (Grant Richards.)

"Italy's War for a Desert." By Francis McCullagh. 7s. 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

M. H. H. MACARTNEY.

ADAM LINDSAY GORDON.*

To most Englishmen in the old country the name of Adam Lindsay Gordon is far better known than his works, but in Australia, especially among the generation that was contemporary or nearly contemporary with Gordon, he is unquestionably given pride of place as the national poet, and his poems are read with enthusiastic admiration. But even there the younger generation are beginning to grow critical of him; they have not come under the spell of his strong and romantic personality as their fathers did, and there can now be no doubt that his reputation rests more on his personality than on his poetry. It is with him as with Chatterton: if his life had been less picturesque and his end less tragic his fame would have taken a homelier flight. Australia has had other poets, and has some now living, whose work in all the essentials of poetry is finer stuff than anything Gordon ever accomplished, but the glamour of his past is still a potent force and his reputation towers above them in the light of it.

A reader knowing nothing of Gordon, and so blind to that glamour, would be disappointed with the two poems on which, as Mr. Sladen says in his Introduction here, the fame of Gordon chiefly rests: "The Sick Stockrider," and "How We Beat the Favourite." They are, to be frank, very good ballads in the vein that nowadays we consider characteristic of Mr. George R. Sims. They need dramatic recital to get their full effectiveness out of them. But Gordon was not a man of the study, and did not write for students; he wrote for that larger world of men who were living the life he wrote about—the life he was living himself, and they took him to their hearts because they understood him. He was the poet of his people because he was literally one of themselves, picturing their lives, giving vigorous and haunting utterance to their ideals and philosophy; they found their own thoughts, feelings, sentiment—the simple, big-hearted sentiment of the backwoods and the rough mining town—and their own broad, breezy humour vividly speaking to them and for them in his stirring and manful verses. An academic touch would have made these worthless to them, and so worthless to us. As it is, Gordon is the very voice of his age; you read his work not because it is fine poetry, but because it is true poetry; if his Sick Stockrider had spoken with the beauty of phrase and imagery that is natural to Tennyson's Tithonus the whole thing would have been false and of no more value as art than a waxwork image is. Gordon lives and will go on living largely because he has no affectations: he is fully himself in all his poetry—the gallant, headlong, brilliant, hard-riding, hard-living man, drawing authentic inspiration from his crude surroundings, pouring his heart, his soul, his whole stormy, eager, lovable individuality into everything he wrote. The Australia of Gordon's day had no use for a Tennyson; it gave legitimate birth to its own poet, for he was born there in spirit if not in fact, and he is secure of immortality because his poetry is as perfect as it could be if it was to remain true to the genius of the place and time it strove to represent.

* "The Poems of Adam Lindsay Gordon." Edited by Douglas Sladen. 2s. 6d. net. (Constable).

It is Gordon's great merit that he pleases you and interests you. The dash and sweep and go and dramatic descriptive force of his racing ballads make them some of the best as well as the most popular of his poems, he was cunning in the handling of metre and rhyme, especially when he was writing under the influence of Swinburne, but always spontaneous. You would say he wrote his verses at a heat, carelessly jotted down some passing thought, gave the reins to some mood of the hour, told in easy and taking rhymes some story he had heard or imagined and was at little pains in the matter of revision. Mr. Sladen has done his work admirably in this, the first edition of Gordon's poems to be issued in England. The contents are well arranged, and include two delightfully humorous poems that have hitherto remained unpublished. The Introduction is divided into a sympathetic biographical sketch, and a well-considered estimate of Gordon as a poet. There is an excellent portrait, and the other illustrations include three sketches of Gordon drawn by himself.

S. J.

Adam Lindsay Gordon at the age of 30.

A daguerreotype sent by him, at the time of his marriage, to his uncle, Miss Gordon's father. Given by permission of Miss Frances Gordon.

From the Poems of Adam Lindsay Gordon. Edited by Douglas Sladen (Constable).

SHADOWS OUT OF THE CROWD.

Uncommon observation, uncommon intensity of emotion, and uncommon skill in words, make "Shadows out of the Crowd" a good book. It consists of twelve stories or scenes of various length, the shorter being on the whole the better. Twice Mr. Curle uses with most pleasant effect the simple form of a grown man remembering his country boyhood. The pure hearty sweetness of country things and people is intensified without being sickened by retrospection. The resemblance between the two suggests a considerable autobiographical foundation. We are a little surprised that the two should have been given a place in this one book, the author's first, as we believe, with the exception of a quite individual study of Meredith. Fondness alone explains it, for it is not due to failure at more difficult tasks. "Whispers," for example, is a beautiful and vivid picture of tropical scenery, and of a young man's passionate love of life and equally passionate hate of convention and middle age, on one evening amidst that scenery. Mr. Curle has avoided the temptation to let too much depend on the scene-painting, which he does so well. The chapter has the "purple light of love" in it. "The Life Illusion" describes a similar mood of the same temperament, but in unfavourable circumstances. Here, too, the young man is in the tropics, and disgusted by people saying, "There are only three varieties of humming-birds in Jamaica," and so on. Everyone seems to him to have made "a ghastly failure"; he is perilously anxious to avoid doing the same. He wants "the real people," wants to be alone. He is furious at hearing that he will "find out." The tropic night is almost satisfying him in solitude, and he is asking, "Is this it?" when a girl, who has long been haunting him, offers herself to him. He can but

* "Shadows out of the Crowd." By Richard Curle. 5s. (Stephen Swift)

call her a "traitress," and make an end of himself to avoid accepting one of the things that fade. The suicide may be a solution, but it is not a satisfactory end to the story. Two others end in the same way, one after a broken love and a night of too-eager thinking, one in a disordered state of mind following on overwork at an office. These are interesting, and, especially "Appearance and Reality," full of the writer's good qualities; but his grasp varies in them from time to time, and the result is imperfect harmony and reality. One cannot help pointing out that in neither story does the character whom the writer impersonates or sympathises with most deeply dominate, as he does in "Whispers" or any of the others mentioned. That is to say, Mr. Curle's emotional intensity and observation are at present best displayed when he speaks more or less directly for himself. Apart from his egoistic central figures, he is best at subsidiary characters, a silent woman who understands, a negro servant, a cluster of gossipers. His style, too, is richest where he is speaking for himself or for a solitary young man into whom he can fling himself, though even here he occasionally gets into a slightly inappropriate lyricism. But he has gusto and precision, two good rare qualities which we heartily welcome in combination.

EDWARD THOMAS.

TWO DRAMATISTS.*

It is always difficult to estimate literary values; but when these are weaved in with other values that we call dramatic, the difficulty becomes many times more perplexed. Yet that literary values and dramatic values are in some way identical can scarcely be disputed. Indeed, the word identical expresses it exactly. It is not that drama is not great drama until it is polished into literary excellence, but that great drama has its natural expression in speech that is lofty and memorable. How well Synge illustrates this needs no saying; and in the case of Ibsen, his contention with perpetuity would not be half the doubtful issue it is could he only rely on those plays of his in which the literary value is clear, such as "Brand," "Peer Gynt" or "The Master Builder." It is such plays as "The League of Youth" and "A Doll's House" that give him the appearance of one who wears, none too well, the usage of time.

In laying stress, therefore, on Ibsen as the poet, Mr. Roberts shows a very wise instinct. Concerned as he is with the permanent value in Ibsen, he wisely lays stress on that element in any work that always makes for permanence. Ibsen himself wrote once: "I have been more poet and less social philosopher than people generally seem inclined to believe." And if the intended symbolism of "The Master Builder" means anything, it is clear that he had more than one or two thoughts of regret that he had discarded the wine of "Peer Gynt" for the beer of "The League of Youth."

Mr. Roberts does not make it quite clear as to what his thoughts are on this unhappy contention in Ibsen's work. He has unwisely so planned his book that it does not deal with those things that lie at the back of Ibsen's work; but has contented himself with commenting on the plays as they pass in chronological array before him. It is the easier way of writing a book; indeed, one may say it is not much of a task to write a book on those lines. Only in his last chapter, "Conclusions," does he deal with problems such as these; and he does it so well there that one wonders why he should have elected to take the way of passing comment. Comments on the plays we have elsewhere; many of them; and one more or less does not greatly matter. But such matters as he deals with in his "Conclusions" urgently require such sane, wise treatment as he gives them.

For example, he has some excellent things to say about the "fourth wall" idea of drama. All the comments in criticism of the plays do not enable us to understand Ibsen a whit so well as when Mr. Roberts says: "There is, of course, a fourth wall, but it is not between the audience and the stage; it is behind the audience." A remark such as this throws an extraordinary illumination on the intensity of the third act of "Ghosts." For to say of that final terrible scene that we are harrowed as lookers-on might be is only to realise half of its power. We become identified with the action. But this leads to a further question, that Mr. Roberts does not deal with, but which, nevertheless, supports his statement. It is the curious fact that, even in a picture-frame stage, drama always realises its need, spiritual if not constructional, of an extended proscenium.

One of the most interesting things in the book is Mr. Roberts' examination of Ibsen's perpetual faith in the sufficiency of love to atone for wrong-doing and error. He places, it seems to me, too much stress on this, for Ibsen, in his two years' invariable travail over a play, was always careful to eliminate from it all traces of definiteness—which accounts for the lack of spontaneity that rules

Racquet Court, Fleet Street.

Drawn by Hanslip Fletcher.

From "Fleet Street in Seven Centuries," by W. G. Bell. (Pitman.)

* "Henrik Ibsen: A Critical Study." By R. Ellis Roberts. 7s. 6d. net. (Martin Secker.)

"J. M. Synge: A Critical Study." By P. P. Howe. 7s. 6d. net. (Martin Secker.)

throughout his work. Yet Mr. Roberts makes it pretty clear that this was a definite philosophy with Ibsen; and he shows in play after play how implicit this idea always was in Ibsen's thinking.

In his study of Synge Mr. Howe had not the same temptation to confine his attention mainly to comments on the plays as he passed them before him. Synge's output was so small that to have attempted this would have been to court disaster. Consequently he makes his book a more varied one. But he would have been wise had he exercised the same balance of judgment that characterises Mr. Roberts' book. I will yield to none in my admiration of Synge. But I cannot believe that it is any service to Synge to praise him indiscriminately. For example, to mention at the outset a few of the book's mistakes, does he really mean what he says in the following sentence? He is speaking of "The Well of the Saints," and adds: "When Mary Doull says, 'And what good'll our grey hairs be itself, if we have our sight, the way we'll see them falling each day, and turning dirty in the rain?' you may think, if you choose, of the superiority of the imaginative life over that of the reason, and find in the remark all that is to be found in the prophetic books of Blake." Similarly he says: "Synge, with an originality more absolute than Wordsworth's, insisted that his readers should regain their poetic feeling for ordinary life," which is not only exaggeration, but unsound criticism, inasmuch as it proceeds on the assumption that Wordsworth's and Synge's approach towards "ordinary life" were the same in nature, whereas they were diametrically opposed. Wordsworth found "ordinary life" the best approach to the realization of transcendental Being: Synge found it its own, and somewhat brutal, self-sufficiency. Or, to give a final example: Mr. Howe declares that "Peggen Mike is one of the most beautiful and living figures in all drama." Now, with her all undoubted excellencies, one could scarcely call Peggen beautiful. It would be a shrewish kind of beauty. Besides, the statement, as a whole, is a tall demand.

To conclude mention of the faults of the book, it certainly was scarcely a happy device to write the book in a kind of paraphrase of Synge's own peculiar style. There is hardly a page of the book that is not reminiscent of that familiar cadence and construction; and this seems a subduing of Mr. Howe's personality rather more humble than wise. It gives the result an air of affectation that is unfortunate.

Yet it is churlish to point only to faults; and it certainly required some courage to write a book on Synge so soon after his death, when his wave of popularity is at its height. The facts about Synge's life are not easy to arrive at, and Mr. Howe disclaims all intention of giving a biography. Nor does there seem much to be said on the plays. On them his best comments are those that deal with "Riders to the Sea," and the deeply interesting contrast he draws between this play and "In the Shadow of the Glen." It is when he comes to "The Note-books" and "The Prefaces" that Mr. Howe is at his best; and the reason partly is that what he has to say about them breaks new soil all the time. It is only a small side of Synge, truly enough. It only deals with Synge's comments by the way. Yet it is important as showing Synge's approach to his art. The poems he wisely regards as part of the note-books; and he might have followed this up by showing the contrast between the few relics from Parisian days, a little stuffy as they are, and the soft fresh breeze that blows through everything of a later date.

Both these books belong to the excellent series that Mr. Secker is doing of recent men of letters. It is a wise scheme, for which there is room; and both these books fill an obvious place in it. Mr. Roberts' is the robust of the two, as Mr. Howe's is the more various and complete. But they are both books that anyone interested in recent literature that is dramatic, and drama that is literary, would be well advised to read.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

Cloth Fair, Smithfield.

Drawn by Gabriel Gifford.

From "The City of the World," by Edwin Pugh (Nelson).

LONDON AND LONDONERS.*

There are people who will tell you that London, like most women, has "no character at all." But they are wrong, as Pope was. London and most women have too much character; so much of it, that we can never understand them or get tired of trying to. It is only when a city or a personality is so various that we cannot describe it in a phrase and classify it with a single label that we escape out of the difficulty by saying it is characterless. Mr. Edwin Pugh knows his London far too well to say that of it. He knows it as an old, old magic place with a glamorous past, to which Mr. Walter George Bell has just devoted a portly and fascinating volume of over six hundred pages; a place rich in romantic memories, crammed with every colour of ancient story; and he knows it as a brand new, busy city, apt to forget the splendour and squalor, the sin and glory, and all the wonder of its yesterdays. It is rich, poor, old, young, beautiful, ugly, industrious, idle, sinful, godly, a haunt of misery, a home of happiness; it is the whole of human life and character epitomised, a multitude of small towns and cities and villages decanted into one.

"To say London," as Mr. Bell has it, "is to say the world." He limits himself almost entirely to the record of its past. Onwards from his third chapter on "The Medieval Suburb," his story grows naturally in fulness and in interest; every quarter of the city and every aspect of its multifarious life is sketched in faithfully and with knowledge. You may call it a book for the student, because it is so carefully done; but Mr. Bell's picturesque and attractive style makes it also a book that will keep the general reader sitting up of nights to go on reading it. There are excellent dissertations on the old playhouses and the old booksellers; and others that are equally good on Literary Landmarks, on the Age of Johnson, on the old taverns and coffee-houses; and some of us will think there is nothing better in it than the two chapters at the end on "When the Newspapers Came" and "Newspapers of To-day." There have been many books on London's past, but none that is more satisfactory or more entertaining than this.

* "The City of the World." By Edwin Pugh. 2s. net. (Nelson.)

"Fleet Street in Seven Centuries." By Walter George Bell. 15s. net. (Pitman.)

Mr. Pugh opens with a study of a quaint map of London and Westminster as they were in 1563, and passes to a contrast of the city of our day with the city of four centuries ago. But it is with modern London, and particularly with the motley people of modern London, that he is most concerned. He sets forth on "the quest of the Cockney," and comes rightly to the conclusion that the typical Cockney does not exist. He says some shrewd things in explanation of why the average Londoner has no local patriotism; there are delightful chapters on the children of London, the "Woman at Home," the "Cockney at Play," and a thoughtful and deeply-interesting consideration of the crime and criminals of London, and of its social problems, especially its problems of poverty. He studies the suburbs with insight and the broadest sympathy, and for London at large:

"It is consistent only in its inconsistencies. It is the world's clearing house, the world's spring-board, the home of lost causes, the death-chamber of the past, and the birthplace of the future. . . . Here all the rejected royalties and discredited rulers of the earth resume the torn and tattered insignia of their pristine power and glory, readjust their crowns upon their heads, and wear them as they wear their rue, with such a little difference that only they themselves are sensible of their downfall. London is so big and fine that it can afford not to laugh at departed greatness. It has room in its mighty heart for everything except self-consciousness, and a mind so broad and a brain so vast that it can absorb all the wisdom of humanity, and all the folly, and all the goodness, and all the badness thereof, without remembering very clearly or exactly where they are, or which is which."

Mr. Pugh handles facts here, but he handles them imaginatively, with the keenness of vision, that sense of the tragedy and comedy in human things, that put "Tony Drum" and other of his books among the truest and most living stories about London that have ever been written. He was the right man to undertake such a survey as this, for he knows London intimately, and loves it too well to want to conceal or distort either its faults or its virtues. You may dissent from some of his views and opinions, but they are always acute and suggestive; he has the great gift, too, of being interesting, and in "The City of the World" has added a book of real value to the enormous library of London literature.

A.

A REMARKABLE FIRST BOOK.*

"Vividness and not style is now my line," wrote R.L.S. to Mrs. Sitwell. "Style is all very well, but vividness is the real line of country." Remembering these words, one wonders what Stevenson, were he alive, would make of Mr. F. St. Mars, whose writing is scarcely less "vivid" than the Durbar pictures in colour, recently to be seen at a theatre.

Mr. St. Mars seems, in fact, to have an invisible lantern-operator at work with him, as if for a lecture. A picture is cast on the screen of the reader's mind, and while he or she is yet gaping, open-mouthed, at the amazing realistic effect, the lecturer snaps his finger, as if to signal to his invisible operator to change the slide, and, hey presto! another picture, equally vivid in colour, and equally strong in "high lights" is staring us in the face.

Possibly Stevenson would say of such performance—could he witness it—as he said of one of our few living writers of genius: "But he alarms me. . . . I look on, I admire, I rejoice, for myself; but in a kind of ambition we all have for our tongue and literature, I am wounded." Be that as it may, every page of "On Nature's Trail" proves the writer to be a man possessed and obsessed by a passionate love of Nature, and, in the matter of observation and deduction, a very Sherlock Holmes of the animal world.

* "On Nature's Trail." By F. St. Mars. With an Introduction by Lieut.-Col. J. H. Patterson, D.S.O. Illustrated by Ernest Aris. 6s. net. (Jas. Nisbet & Co.)

His style? Well, his style is himself. It stands, as I have already indicated, in much the same relation to literature that the cinema stands to art. Idealisation, there is none—only nude, vivid and sometimes cruel reality. Nor is beauty to be found in his pages. Gaunt, grim grandeur of a sort—the grandeur of great spaces, the aboriginal grandeur of Nature and Nature's wild creatures, in all their greed, fierceness, and savagery, there often is. But his style is too personal to himself, too pungent in flavour (reminding one often of the poet Smart's words of a certain fruit, "The sharp, peculiar quince"), and occasionally too American and too slangy to commend itself to every fastidious student of the literary craft.

Certain it is, however, that no more remarkable first book has appeared for years, nor one which is likely to be more animatedly discussed. Mr. St. Mars will have his admirers and his detractors. By some he will be likened to Mr. Kipling. By others he will be accounted a new Kiralfy of the animal world; but whatever view one takes, none will deny the sincerity of his intense and passionate love of Nature, and many will hold (myself among them) that he has something uncommonly like a genius for observing, understanding, and describing the life of the Wild. For thousands in this and other countries he will open up, and for the first time, a new and fascinating Wonderland.

The book comes to us with the best of backing. Of "The Man-Eaters of Tsavo," by Colonel J. H. Patterson, D.S.O., Ex-President Roosevelt, himself a notable big game hunter and naturalist, wrote that it was "The most remarkable account of which we have any record," and Mr. F. C. Selous assured us that "No lion story I have ever read or heard equals in its long-sustained and dramatic interest the story of the Tsavo Man-Eaters, as told by Colonel Patterson." When, therefore, Colonel Patterson comes forward to write an introduction to "On Nature's Trail," and to bear witness to the power, the fascination, and the knowledge of Mr. St. Mars' work, he speaks with an authority which none can dispute. Let me close this notice with the following extract from the great lion-hunter's introduction:

"Whether Mr. St. Mars be describing the demoniacal doings of a South American puma in a Scotch deer forest, the lively antics of an Indian mongoose, revelling in an English coppice, the havoc wrought by the winged bandits of the air, or the fearless leadership of 'Magnificent of the Steeps,' away among the khuds and crags of Tibet, he shows himself equally at home with his furred and feathered heroes, and their surroundings. His creatures throb with joy of life, and his artistic touch in depicting local colour is to my mind imitable."

COULSON KERNAHAN.

RECENT POETRY.*

One of the most marked tendencies of modern criticism is that which seeks to label each new phase of poetry as it appears and to adjudicate on it according to the prevalent standards of literary taste. This negative attitude, if so one may call it, is due to the protean state into which poetry has been cast by recent innovators and experimenters in forms, metres and rhythms. Mr. Ezra Pound,* who is among the ablest and most brilliant of this new school, appends some interesting theories on rhythm to his translations from Guido Cavalcanti:

"I believe in an ultimate and absolute rhythm . . . The perception of the intellect is given in the word, that of the emotions in the cadence. It is only, then, in perfect rhythm joined to the perfect word that the twofold vision can be recorded. . . . The rhythm of any poetic line corresponds to a particular emotion. It is the poet's business that the correspondence be exact, i.e. that it be the emotion which surrounds the word expressed."

This is the basic principle of Mr. Pound's poetry as it is also that of his translation. It arises not merely out of an attempt at originality but from the necessity of adapting poetry to the expression of present circumstances. It is scarcely possible to assume that we can judge the practical result of these theories by the usual standards of criticism, based as they are on conditions at least five hundred years old. Nor is it possible, for instance, to compare Mr. Pound's translation with the fragmentary translations left by Rossetti. In both cases there is absolute divergence of method and aim. In the latter we have a strict reproduction both in word and form of the extrinsic characteristics of Guido's poetry; in the former an attempt to render not only the word and the spirit, but also "the accompaniment, that is, that the modern audience must in some measure be made aware of the mental content of the older audience, and of what these others drew from certain fashions of thought and speech," . . . "to embody in the whole of the English" some trace of that power which implies the man.

* "Sonnets and Ballate of Guido Cavalcanti." Translated by Ezra Pound. 3s. 6d. net. (Stephen Swift.)

Mr. Pound does not always succeed in carrying out or in justifying his theories. This is partly due to lack of accuracy and thoroughness. He is so keen and intent on reaching the core and spirit of what he is studying, that he often forgets to guard against many small errors which creep in and would, perhaps, seriously damage his reputation, if many of his readers did not already understand his idiosyncrasies. Apart from such defects, of a mostly extrinsic nature, Mr. Pound's rendering of the soft, yet virile, musicalness of the original, though not entirely free from harshness and obscurity, is nevertheless vigorous and full of colour. He has been especially fortunate in discriminating between the harmonious and expressive clarity characteristic of the dolce stil novo and the monotonous intricacies of the scuola provenzaleggiante. The book will doubtless prove of use to students of Italian thirteenth century love-poetry, besides rescuing from comparative oblivion the work of one of the most interesting poets of that time.

This is ever an age of contradictions. It is difficult, for instance, to reconcile the disparity of aim, thought, spirit, form, and technique existing between the work of Mr. Pound and that of Mr. Isidore G. Ascher,* Mr. Gwynne Evans,† Mr. Norman Gale.‡ The latter still draw the greater part of their inspiration from the religious and mythological orthodoxy of the nineteenth century. They seem to be attempting, through a new revival of Nature poetry, to neutralise, or at least to oppose, the recent sporadic growth of violently realistic modern poetry, emanating from the great cities. The soul-wearing problems of modern life, either intentionally or otherwise, have only superficially affected them with a vague feeling of sadness and unrest. The perennial charm and mystery of remoteness is the secret of their poetry, which, though somewhat uneventful, is nevertheless pleasant and melodious, contains often pretty imagery, and shows a distinct ability in the welding of thought and expression.

Like his confrères of the "Rhymers' Club," Dr. G. A. Greene§ is above all an artist and a craftsman. In the "Song of the Songsmiths," dedicated to them, he gives us the master key to the poetic revival of the "'nineties," and its poetry of despair and disillusion:

'Tis in us no crime,
Here in this misty land,
To seek for the fire that was fanned
By the kings of the kingly rhyme.

Ours be the task to prolong
The joy and the sorrow of song
In the midst of the years that beguime;
In the clinging mist of the years,
With reverent toil and with tears,
To hammer the golden rhyme,
Hammer the ringing rhyme,
Till the mad world hears.

* "One Hundred and Five Sonnets." By Isidore G. Ascher. (Oxford: B. H. Blackwell.)

† "In Mantle Blue." By F. Gwynne Evans. 3s. 6d. net. (Elkin Mathews.)

‡ "Song in September." By Norman Gale. 5s. net. (Constable.)

§ "Songs of the Open Air." By G. A. Greene. 2s. 6d. net. (Elkin Mathews.)

Apart from the author's association with the "Rhymers' Club," the "Songs of the Open Air" have an artistic value of their own. They generally adhere to the canons of poetic art, yet are never, on this account, either thin or commonplace in thought. We should wish, however, that Dr. Greene might oftener forget the "weariness, the fever, and the fret" of this begrimed world, and cast away the ever-present consciousness of his own personality. His songs would, we think, gain in freedom and lightness, and perhaps even attain the ecstasy of lyrical rapture.

SIDELIGHTS.*

It would be difficult to imagine two books more different in matter and tone than these. The first tells how the author missed his way in his youth. Incidentally it throws much light upon the general aspects of that way, how others also lost it and how some kept it; but mainly the book is intimately autobiographical, almost pathetically so. Mr. Kebbel, looking back upon a long life, can describe it as a pleasant if not a prosperous one. The record of earlier volumes on his title page recalls much agreeable and informing work from his pen in politics and sport and rural economy. But that work has been done in fields lying aside from the regulation highway stretching out, via Oxford, before him when he started forth in life from the Merchant Taylors', and that he should have been forced into these side-tracks is evidently a keen regret to him still. Perhaps the author proposes to follow the present with a more cheerful retrospect. In this one, at any rate, the backward survey is largely taken up with a transition from a career at the Bar to that of political journalism made to the accompaniment of Fortune's very hard knocks. Its tone is the somewhat lugubrious one of its title, "The Battle of Life." Lord Rossmore, on the other hand, is in one sense not autobiographical at all. His recollections are

* "The Battle of Life." By T. E. Kebbel. 10s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

"Things I Can Tell." By Lord Rossmore. 10s. 6d. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

Photo by The Dover Street Studio, London, W.

Lord Rossmore.

chiefly interesting and intimate things about his friends, he himself, so he says, having never done anything important. Whether he is writing of himself or of others, the occasion is always a good story. Fortune having assured him of his niche, he speaks with regret neither of it nor of his manner of filling it. There is not even a momentary note of reproach or doubt in his pages. They assume the author to have been born into the best of all possible worlds, and to have jolly well made the very best of it.

Yet different though they are, the two books have also much in common, and even by contrast they help out the value of both, which is simply that of illuminating the period to which their authors belong. Lord Rossmore exhibits the Irish temperament, of the possession of which he is keenly conscious. Mr. Kebbel, though probably he is quite unaware of it, as obviously reveals the Saxon. The first glories in eccentricity, and the second, as has been said, laments a failure to succeed along conventional lines. The Westenras it seems, have retained nothing brought over by their Batavian ancestor in Charles the Second's days except a stammer, which more than once has proved an impediment to them in public life. They married out of Irish families, and fairly early established a banshee. Lord Rossmore "doesn't care a straw" for the family spook, but would not willingly part with it. Mr. Kebbel's father was vicar of Kilby, in Leicestershire, where the taste for sport is as ingrained as in Monaghan, and Rossmore is not more beloved in the castle than was Kilby by the family in the vicarage. The son's heart remained in the country, though his battle of life was fought in town, and incidentally he has done much to enlighten us about the economy of rural England in the middle of the last century, and has considered deeply, or at any rate much, the changes occurring in it since then. Lord Rossmore's book is not intended to reveal him considering anything much or deeply. The stories that compose it have already given excellent "copy" to the newspapers, the more discreet of which, we observed, refrained from printing the pinkest, and not least amusing. The author's acceptance of things as they are is not less illuminating than Mr. Kebbel's account of how they once were. The gay Irishman has no qualms. The Englishman, on the other hand, seems much troubled to find that the world has been wagging. He notes, amid his admiration for what Miss Austen has revealed of the society of her day, that she has not a word for the condition of the peasantry, though she lived where the facts of it must have been particularly flagrant. The reference to Miss Austen is characteristic. We have always a feeling, when reading Mr. Kebbel, as if we must just have broken away from Georgian times. We expect him to draw his illustrations in politics from Mr. Canning, say, and to accept mid or even early Victorian as a standard of considerable modernity. The social organism seems still to be regarded as constituted out of the fine old elements, sufficiently labelled as "The Clergy," "The Landed Gentry," and so on. Any one of them—"The Peasantry" for instance—may go wrong through mismanagement, just as the partridges have into which has actually had to be introduced an alien strain of red legs. Mr. Kebbel looks back seventy years from yesterday with amazement at the changes in manners and material conditions that have occurred in them, and these changes his memories help us to realise. But of the significance of the deeper and more subtle mutations between yesterday and to-day he gives no hint of understanding. And, indeed, Lord Rossmore's book shows that there is a class—to whom the author does more than justice by his geniality, but less by the relish with which he exposes their follies—where morals and manners do not change, but alike remain vulgar and primitive.

It is in their remoteness from the present moment, and from all that is really vital at the present moment, that these two books come together and cast a kind of dark light upon the world we are living in. There is no reason to believe that those who are bred of the new forces and make themselves their mouthpieces are less careless than one of our authors about the existence of conditions other than their own, or more alive than the other to their significance. Two sets of powerful opposing actualities are meeting in the dark, and neither, one suspects, has more than the vaguest notion of the strength and disposition of the other. That, at any rate, is the moral we draw by the aid of these two volumes of sidelights.

D. S. MELDRUM.

THE EARLY NATURALISTS.*

This is an extremely able and interesting survey of the work of the early botanists and naturalists. It needed a man of Mr. Miall's expert knowledge to explain in what degree there was real truth and critical observation in the vast productions of these pioneer writers. And now that we see them in the light of modern research we are struck, not merely at their blunders and at their childish acceptance of the grossest theories, but also at the extraordinary ingenuity and accuracy of many of their deductions and at the wide range of their labour. As Mr. Miall truly remarks, the modern interest in all such subjects arose from the idea that botanical knowledge was essential to a doctor. The revival of botany preceded that of zoology by some twenty years, and almost all the early botanists, such as Brunfels, Bock, Fuchs, Gesner and L'Obel, practised medicine. Then, again, it is interesting to note that all these German and Swiss botanists were Protestants, although several had been brought up in the Catholic faith. There can be little doubt that the emancipation in the Reformed Church affected not only the spiritual but the whole mental outlook of its converts. Of the early naturalists the most remarkable are Belon, who wrote, amongst other things, a history of birds; Rondelet, an ichthyologist, and Gesner, who, besides being a botanist, was the most learned of sixteenth century naturalists. His Historia Animalium (1551-87) alone extends to 4,500 folio pages. The first natural history of the New World was published in 1535, under the title of Historia general y natural de las Indias. This was the work of Oviedo. It is curious that Englishmen seem to have taken little part in the revival of botany or zoology. Mr. Miall considers that the reason for this lies in their immense industry in other lines and not in a natural apathy. Such herbalists as Turner, Gerard, and John Caius were far behind their contemporaries on the Continent, and it is not till we come to Ray and Willoughby in the middle of the 17th century that we have really distinguished workers in these fields. This brings us to a period in which the science of botany and zoology was assuming a more advanced form. With Robert Hooke (1635-1703) the microscope begins to play an important part. There follow such famous names as Malpighi, Grew, Swammerdam, and Leeuwenhoek, who was the first man to discover bacteria (1683). In that same year the great Réaumur was born, the first volume of whose celebrated Histoire des Insectes was published in 1734. Another landmark is the year 1745, in which Bonnet's curious research into the aphides was made public. We can only just mention Lyonnet, whose Traité Anatomique is, according to Mr. Miall, "perhaps the most laborious and beautiful example of minute anatomy which has ever been executed." The book ends with chapters on Linnæus, whose Systema Naturæ is still a valuable work, and who is, of course, one of the most celebrated of all botanical writers, and Buffon, whose enormous Histoire Naturelle, générale et particulière, avec la description du Cabinet du Roi, is contained in no less than 44 volumes.

Even in this short glimpse it will be seen that Mr. Miall has produced a work of great importance and erudition. We shall be surprised if it does not make a considerable stir in the right circles.

RICHARD CURLE.

* "The Early Naturalists: Their Lives and Work (1530-1789)." By L. C. Miall, D.Sc., F.R.S. 10s. 6d. net. (Macmillan & Co., Ltd.)

St. James's Street, June, 1878
By J. A. McNeill Whistler.

POEMS OF LOVE AND EARTH.*

It may seem a little churlish to dispraise a man for his accomplishment, but one is tempted to complain that Mr. Drinkwater has learned his craft too well. As with so much modern verse one is constantly worried by the question, "Where have I read that before?" This is a pity, for the reminiscence is largely a matter of phraseology, and falls very far short of plagiarism. But a somewhat stereotyped diction tends to discount the real freshness of much of Mr. Drinkwater's poetry. For at its best it has the freshness of earth when the sun is shining after rain. "The Feckenham Men," perhaps the best of the shorter poems, is really a valuable addition to the hymnology of Mab, the earth-goddess of the English. There is a divine folly in it which will surely please her.

"These jolly men of Feckenham,
One day when summer strode in power,
Went down, it seems, among their lands
And saw their bean fields all in flower.
'Wheat ricks,' they said, 'be good to see,
What would a rick of blossoms be?'"

"So straight they brought the sickles out,
And worked all day till day was done,
And builded them a good square rick
Of scented bloom beneath the sun.
And was not this I tell to you
A fiery-hearted thing to do?"

It was. "The Crowning of Dreaming John" and "Earth Love" are also admirable in the same order, while "Pierrot" has a dainty charm of another sort. But the most important of Mr. Drinkwater's poems is also the longest. "The Fires of God," whether personal or fictitious, is a striking record of psychological growth. And, though it states a special case, it deals with an experience common to many men. The poet looks back on his life and sees

"Poor barren years that brooded over-much
On your own burden, pale and stricken years."

At first he had stood proudly aloof, scorning companionship, intent on his own destiny, which he dreamed to be higher than that of other men.

"So I forgot my God, and I forgot
The holy, sweet communion of men,
And moved in desolate places, where are not Meek hands held out with patient healing when
The hours are heavy with uncharitable pain;
No company but vain
And arrogant thoughts were with me at my side.
And ever to myself I lied,
Saying: 'Apart from all men thus I go
To know the things that they may never know.'"

To this mood followed reaction, pessimism, despair, and "that most venomous despair, self-pity." His trouble was not

"... the large heroic trouble known
By proud, adventurous men who would atone
With their own passionate pity for the sting
And anguish of a world of peril and snares.
It was the trouble of a soul in thrall
To mean despairs."

His pride is broken. Then his eyes are opened and he discovers Nature. His ears are opened to "... the choice song

Of exultant, strong
Earth-passionate men with souls of fire."

He learns of heroism and humanity, and girds himself joyously

"To greet the men who lived triumphant days,
And stormed the secret beauty of the world."

"The Fires of God" is a fine poem both in conception and in execution. Its author is a poet to be considered.

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

* "Poems of Love and Earth." By John Drinkwater. (Nutt.)

NOTES ON THE VICTORIANS.*

As a critic, William Sharp was for the most part a conscientious and accurate analyst. He was not of those who, by insight and deft expression, can recreate a work of art in a manner to make the new interpretation almost rival the original; nor had he any definite philosophy of art, or of the inter-relation of art and life, by which to weigh and appraise. But he had much skill in separating and labelling the components of an artist's achievement, and was an admirable introducer of classics to the unread. Thus considered, he is at his best in the papers on Arnold and Browning which stand first and second in this volume—the third in the series of selections which Mrs. Sharp is making of her husband's writings over his own name. In the articles on Burne-Jones and Walter Pater, moreover, he is something more than this, and displays an imaginative sympathy which, if it does not entitle him to rank in the little company of creative critics, at any rate justifies his assumption of the rôle of exponent of other men's work.

It is, however, the reminiscent rather than the critical aspect of these papers which gives them their particular value. Sharp was a young man when most of the great Victorians were at the height of their fame. He was fortunate in obtaining a wide acquaintance among a group of men who, taken as a whole, were probably as well worth knowing as any literary generation. The earlier poets of the century may have been more romantic and exciting. Not even Rossetti was the peer of Shelley and Byron in the traditional waywardness of genius. But there were about the Victorians, whatever their branch of intellectual or artistic activity, a certain dignity and magnanimity which it is difficult to parallel. In an age given more and more to materialism and vulgarity, they kept lofty ideals unclouded, and unfalteringly opposed to what was ignoble work of the noblest. Reconsider the annals of English literature: you will find here a More, there a Milton, but nowhere so concerted a phalanx of bright arms against the hosts of darkness as in the mercantile reign of Victoria. Or go to the National Portrait Gallery and view with pride and sorrow the memorial which Watts raised to his contemporaries and peers: pride that such men lived so near our own day, sorrow that they are dead.

To record the quality of these men William Sharp was peculiarly fitted. He displayed towards them the sympathetic respect of the clever man humble enough to recognise his betters. It is no wonder that they took him into their confidence, and that even Rossetti, in his lamentable latter days, accepted him for a friend. Of Rossetti he has some interesting personal notes; and he re-creates the exquisite charm of that sister who, though she was less vivid and compelling a personality than Gabriel, will one day perhaps be deemed the greater poet. Burne-Jones is another whose attraction we are made to feel, and it says much for Sharp's power of sympathetic portrayal that he catches just the note of one of the most beautiful of all biographies, before the publication of which, moreover, his article was written. Christina Rossetti and Sir Edward Burne-Jones, in fact, stand out from these pages as heroes worthy of especial worship—that is, if we count personality as more than achievement. There are also admirable portraits of Walter Pater and of two lesser, but very interesting men, Philip Bourke Marston and Eugene Lee-Hamilton.

The editing of this volume deserves a word of censure. Misprints are far too frequent. Further, it would have been no disservice to Sharp to have subjected his essays to some measure of revision, something far less than what he would himself no doubt have given them had he lived to prepare such a collection. A certain clumsiness of construction is characteristic and ineradicable; but here and there are sentences which, in the haste of composition, have been cheated of grammatical perfection. These might well have been revised. Nor should Sharp have been allowed to say that the scene of Swinburne's "Queen Mother" was "in Paris at the period of the Massacre of the Innocents."

* "Papers Critical and Reminiscent." By William Sharp. 5s. net. (Heinemann.)

FATA MORGANA.*

There seems to be something in the air of Northern Europe which provokes men, ay and women too, to pessimism. Look at Minna Canth, the cobbler's wife, of Knopio, in Finland, writing her pessimistic dramas in the back room of her little haberdashery shop. It is not only the highly-educated librarian of Stockholm who is subject to this influence of the atmosphere, of the climate, or the race, but the poor little half-educated shopkeeper.

In "The Confessions of a Fool" August Strindberg, who died a few weeks ago, gives an account of his first marriage and its terrible failure. The reader can see from the outset that his marriage with anyone whatever would have been a failure. Before ever he met his Fata Morgana he was, as he candidly confesses, "a fool." He was an avowed Atheist. He belonged to a society for the promotion of free love. He belonged to a club where "the centre of the room was occupied by a table dressed like an altar, in the middle of which stood a skull and a large bottle of cyanide of potassium. An open Bible, stained with punch spots, lay beside the skull." The club indulged in the wildest orgies. As a natural result of the self-disgust engendered, he embraced "Pessimism, the apotheosis of Atheism." Nor had Eugenics watched over his birth. He was "a delicate, nervous sickly youth," haunted by his own spectre, one who climbed up to the top of a pine tree and made a speech to the branches, "endeavouring to drown their voices."

Bring this wholly ill-balanced personality into the presence of a congenial feminine soul and the natural result happens. A stronger man than Strindberg would either have given the Serbonian bog a wide berth or have hammered the "idle one" thrown in his path into "shape and use." For there seems to have been some good metal in the ore. By his own confession the woman was capable of "pure, disinterested, angelic tenderness," although baser feelings predominated. She was not a normal average woman, just as he was not an average man. This it is that robs the story of any psychological value. The striking candour, the remarkable power of analysis, both of his own feelings and of hers, are thrown away. Talents are hidden in a foul napkin.

That the man had talents is shewn more particularly by his fine perception of natural phenomena; a perception more acute than that of many a professional naturalist. He can scent "a breeze laden with the scent of the rising sap of his poplars." He notices that the broad green leaves of his aristolochia "throw death-like hues on a pale face;" that blood-red apples seem in the moonlight but a yellow spot, while greyish apples turn green. Over his head "the purple blossoms of Scotch firs exhale a perfume like that of the wild strawberry." This is all at the beginning of his tragedy: as scene follows scene we sink lower-into the mire, where the only scent is that of corruption and decay.

BOOKS, AUTHORS AND THINGS †

I can forgive much to a book that pleases me, and in the main "The Poet's Chantry" has pleased me greatly, though there is a certain narrowness in Miss Katherine Brégy's outlook that is now and then a little irritating. She has set herself to trace the Catholic note in English poetry, and to this end has written essays on nine Roman Catholic poets. It is rather an arbitrary scheme, for in the best sense nearly all great poetry is religious but not sectarian; when it is, the sectarian bias counts for nothing at all so long as the poetry is fine. Even Paganism has its devotional poetry and some of it is touched with spiritual

* "The Confessions of a Fool." By August Strindberg. 6s. (Stephen Swift.)

† "The Poet's Chantry." By Katherine Brégy. 3s. 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel).—"Peradventure." By Archibald T. Strong. 5s. net. (Simpkin, Marshall).—"Leaves of Prose." By Annie Matheson. 5s. net. (Stephen Swift).—"From a Pedagogue's Sketch Book." By F. R. G. Duckworth. 5s. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

ecstasy, but Miss Brégy more than once claims that religious ecstasy in poetry is the exclusive property of such poems as have been written by Roman Catholics. "It is not for the fervour and intensity of their religious emotion," she says, "that the world remembers Milton, or Cowley, or even Herbert." It was needless to say this of Cowley, but she should have gone on to tell us for what else the world does remember Herbert. Again: "One can scarcely conjure up a less promising soil for things Catholic than England of the late sixteenth and middle seventeenth centuries; yet it is a sober fact that the most intensely religious poets of both these eras were of the Old Faith." Surely Henry Vaughan was an intensely religious poet; so too were Herbert and Traherne; and each one of these has his moments of ecstasy that do not leave Crashaw on the lonely eminence in this respect to which Miss Brégy somewhat intolerantly assigns him. "For full two hundred years after Crashaw there was no English poet at all comparable to him in this rapturous beauty of religious singing. Even now, the tale of his successors is quickly told—Dante Rossetti in exquisite moments, Patmore in odes, Lionel Johnson in a few wistful pages, and, finally, Francis Thompson." Well, I have named three poets who should have been added to Miss Brégy's list, and I am not sure that one or two of Donne's religious poems do not entitle him to a place in it, and Christina Rossetti should not be excluded.

But that is the worst of all partisanship, it blinds one to the claims of the other side. It would be a very bigoted Puritan, however, who could not share Miss Brégy's admiration for the nine poets she has written of in these essays with so much charm and such sympathetic insight. One is glad of her thoughtful and beautifully appreciative chapter on that saintly spirit and little known poet, Gerard Hopkins; of her illuminating criticism of Coventry Patmore, and of the considered and just tribute she pays in her concluding essay to the poetry of Mrs. Meynell. There is an interesting paper too on Aubrey de Vere, but Miss Brégy is always interesting, even when she is most provocative, and, after all, since her prejudices serve to give more colour and life to her style we may even be glad that she has them.

Another good book of essays in literary criticism is Mr. Archibald Strong's "Peradventure." He lives up to the motto on his fly-leaf: "The good critic is he who narrates the adventures of his soul among masterpieces;" and writes about what he has read very much as a traveller writes of what he has seen.

"The best criticism," he observes in his Preface, "must always be an intense expression of personality—personality purged of prejudice, and strengthened through self-surrender to the best. The pedant relies on fresh matter for freshness of outlook, and even so may hardly compass it; the true critic is independent of this. He will, indeed, at times turn his back on the huge and populous and opulent continents of literature, and seek out its remote and scattered isles of loveliness; but he knows well that it is not given to every explorer to cry: 'We were the first that ever burst into that silent sea'; and he will be often content to hunt old trails by land or ocean with fresh eyes."

This Mr. Strong has done. He has nothing very new to say perhaps concerning "The Longer Poems of Keats," "Rudyard Kipling," "Swinburne and the Sea," "Charles Lamb and the Stage," "The Faith of Shelley," nor of "Poe and Baudelaire," nor of "Nietzsche," but he is not out to make new discoveries. He is a scholar with the rare gift of gossiping agreeably of the books he knows; he is an evident lover of poetry with a nice appreciation for what is great in literature. The young student will find him a competent, entertaining guide, and the old one will be grateful to him as to a companion who talks intelligently and discriminatingly on familiar but perennially interesting topics. He has the art of apt quotation; his style is fluent and unaffected, and the personal note that sounds through all his pages gives a breezy, invigorating freshness to whatever he has to say.

Miss Annie Matheson's "Leaves of Prose" has an even stronger personal tone and greater variety of subject. It is a collection of critical and social essays, nature studies, sketches and musings and, despite its title, poems. It is a miscellany of good things. A strain of religious earnestness runs through all Miss Matheson's writings; a passionate sympathy with the poor and the helpless, a lyrical joy in all the beauty of the world and the simple pleasures of common life. Some of her little sketches, such as "London in Spring," "Thyrsis in a London Square," "The Gleam," "In Mid-May's Glory," are veritable prose poems, vivid word-pictures that catch with a delicate cunning the atmosphere and elusive light of the places and seasons they describe. You gather from a thoughtful essay "In Praise of Adam Bede," and a "Note on Silas Marner," that Miss Matheson remains unaffected by the general depreciation of "George Eliot," and from her longer and capable paper on "The Lady of the Lake," that, unlike so many of us who nowadays go astray after strange gods, her enthusiasm for the gallant poetry of Scott remains undiminished. There is no order in the book any more than there is in the most enjoyable conversation. You pass from reflections on "Philosophy, Poetry, and the Labour Party," to a spirited sonnet on "The Election of the London County Council," thence to "The Soul of the People," which is a strong protest against the continuing strife of creeds, and so on. It is just a quiet little book about the everyday affairs that concern everybody, reflecting much of the author's reading and giving frank and simple utterance to her own thoughts on what she has read and seen and experienced. At the end of it are two admirable studies by Miss May Sinclair: one, "A Servant of the Earth," a delicately outlined, pathetic little story of country life, of a certain farm-labourer "fallen in his old age on evil days and the parish," the other a brilliant critical appreciation of Meredith as novelist and poet.

There is something almost forbiddingly portentous about such a title as "From a Pedagogue's Sketch Book," but happily you find when you have opened it that Mr. Duckworth is that rare bird a pedagogue with a keen and racy sense of humour. He may have published his book with a serious purpose; he indicates at the outset that he has done so; but he does not attempt to teach the public by preaching at it seriously; he knows too much for that. He has a profound acquaintance with the human boy, and with the parents of him, and his amusingly satirical presentations of those specimens have a large significance for all who are interested in educational affairs. They tickle you to heartiest laughter, but they leave you thinking. He covertly owns that his aim has been to "enlist the sympathy of the public, and of parents in particular, with the ideals of our public schools, great and small—ideals that are not always appreciated—and with the life of the devoted men who are commonly supposed to live in affluence and leisure, but who really spend laborious days, with no eight hours' limit, for a pittance—especially in the smaller schools—that a miner would scorn as a 'minimum wage,' and without the prospect of an old-age pension when thrown on the shelf." Though surely, by the way, the old age pension is a boon from which none in need is debarred. There is truth as well as humour in "For Value Received," and "Shopkeepers," the first slyly hitting at our public school methods and the treatment of the masters; the second baring the absurdities practised in the appointment of County Education Committees; but perhaps the wittiest chapters are those which deal with the crass stupidity of parents, who, with little or no study of the subject, assume they know better than the schoolmaster how the young idea should be taught to shoot. There is a clever little sketch, "The Ear Specialist," in which a fashionable physician sending his son to school dogmatically interferes in his training:

"It was about half-way through his son's first term that he sent me a terrific long screed all on the subject of how he wanted his son brought up. He detailed all his son's little foibles as well as his strong points. Asked me if I had noticed the boy was absent-minded but chock-full of intellectual interests. Hinted that what the boy required most was a severe intellectual discipline, and suggested how this was to be effected—by extra Latin prose, in which particular care should be paid to minute points of grammar and syntax; by setting him down to a piano and making him name and strike single notes; by giving him coloured blocks of wood, and making him arrange the colours in different orders, in each case naming the colours before proceeding to arrange the blocks. There was a lot more of this sort of thing flung at my head without reserve or apology or any trace of consideration for any professional pride I might have. When a letter makes me really angry I always postpone answering it at least till the following day. If I can manage to do so, I never answer it at all. I've found that an excellent rule, and it was excellent in this case, as you will see."

For next day the school doctor reported that the ear specialist's son was deaf in one ear, and a tactful reply gently informing the specialist of this fact served to knock the self-assertion out of him and shame him into feeling he would have been wiser employed in minding his own business. If there were space one would like to quote some of the series of letters between parents and the master on this same topic of the management of children. They are irresistibly ludicrous, but wear such an air of reality that you feel they are only slightly burlesqued versions of letters that have actually been written. They twinkle with wry humour, are so seemingly unconsciously funny in their fussy, petty pomposity; and yet you realise how they must have worried and humiliated and exasperated the pedagogue who received and had to reply to them. You cannot get grapes from thorns, but Mr. Duckworth is to be congratulated in having extracted a good deal of genuinely funny farcical comedy from a way of life that is commonly looked upon as monotonously dull.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

A FRENCH BOSWELL*

When Guy de Maupassant took François into his service he provided himself unwittingly with a Boswell, and a Boswell who could appreciate his master's talent. It may be urged that his master's powerful mind left its impress on the valet's. No influence of that kind would be sufficient to transform an ordinary individual into an impassioned admirer of an ivory carving, the coronation of King Cloris by St. Remy in the Cathedral of Reims, the disappearance of which caused the good valet such genuine heartache.

François was in full sympathy with his master's bent of mind. This makes his biography valuable. He tells us the essential things, specially interesting to students of heredity is the emphasis thrown on his debt to his mother, his polyglot mother, with her worship of the romantic landscapes of Corsica and her literary style of speaking, "reminding me very much of Flaubert's style," says the gifted valet. The priceless François earns our gratitude by letting us have a good view of his master's turn of mind. The novelist had an extraordinarily precise and painstaking intellect. He would count the number of times a cock crowed on first awaking and compare it with his second bout. The closest attention was given for many hours to the details of the olive-harvest at Cap d'Antibes. Turner himself could not have studied an Algerian sunset more closely. "He finished by the enumeration of the different hues floating above the vineyards. These varying tints depend on whether the vines are still green or have taken on their reddish winter dress." This constant observation of nature and life became so much a matter of habit with De Maupassant, that often he felt it a positive burden and old man o' the sea. "I sometimes struggle hard not to think."

François is an artist, quite competent to depict the three very different sides of his master's nature: the boyish side delighting in practical jokes, "Laughter holding both his sides"; the poetic side, derived from his mother; and the practical side of a man who delighted to order his little estate at Etretat and furnish his various flats to the best advantage. François is an artist, too, in words. His description of the Princess's tea-party could not be improved upon: its prodigious light-heartedness, and drastic but unavailing attempts at self-restraint are pictured with a masterly hand. There is also an inimitable and most touchingly told dog story. We become very fond of François.

* "Recollections of Guy de Maupassant." By his Valet François. 10s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)

A LITERARY EPISODE.*

The publication of this handsome volume is a literary episode which should prove of interest to all who have at any time fallen under the spell of that extraordinary tour de force by which the name of William Beckford mainly lives, the glamorous Oriental romance of "Vathek." Here are three "Episodes," three separate stories which, in the manner of the "Arabian Nights," the author intended to be incorporated with his well-known book; episodes which had lain perdu for many years until Mr. Lewis Melville happened upon them in the course of his researches when preparing his "Life and Letters of William Beckford." It is true that when a popular edition of "Vathek" was in preparation, some years before Beckford's death, there was talk of including the "Episodes," but as the publisher refused to "think in thousands" when it came to a matter of terms negotiations fell through, and the manuscript was forgotten for sixty-five years.

The three stories of which the volume consists were written by Beckford—as was "Vathek" itself—originally in French, and the translation of them into English was the last literary work of the late Sir Frank Marzials. In this volume they are given both in the original and in translation. They are wonderful tales, full of a kind of sinister splendour in the presentation of the records of the way in which certain princes and princesses qualified for admission to the Hall of Eblis. The vivid imagination, the grandiose descriptive style, the impressive rendering of the weirdly supernatural, which have made "Vathek" continue to be read, are to be found in these supplementary Episodes. Here is all the opulence of description and imaginative power such as had won Byron's commendation of the tale itself. We feel as the poet felt, that the Happy Valley of Johnson's "Rasselas" will not bear comparison with the Hall of Eblis of Beckford's story or Episodes. And we may read the stories without seeking to see in them that moral which the author declared was discoverable—the moral "that those who, like the Calif Vathek and his unhappy companions, abandon themselves to criminal passions and deeds of infamy will, by a terrible but just retribution, have their abode for ever in the regions of eternal vengeance."

The Episodes will presumably duly take their place as part of the work for which they were designed, but they are sufficiently complete in themselves, and if their publication is not likely to lead to any great Beckford revival, it should at least be welcomed by those who have felt the spell of a remarkable Oriental tale. Sir Frank Marzials' translation is delightfully easy and tasteful, while Mr. Melville in his introduction tells the story of the writing of the Episodes, and throws further light on the strange personality of their author.

TWO NOTABLE NOVELS.†

There is no reason for bracketing Mr. A. E. W. Mason and Mr. E. F. Benson together except that the newest book of each happens to come from the same publishers, and that they are two of the best novels the new season has produced so far. Mr. Benson has written "Mrs. Ames" in something of the light, satirical spirit of "Dodo," but with an added depth of feeling and knowledge of humanity that carry us far beyond "Dodo"; and in "The Turnstile" Mr. Mason makes something of a fresh departure. He has travelled a long way since he wrote that gallant romance, "The Courtship of Morrice Buckler," and in "The Turnstile," as in the last three or four of his novels, turns his back on the glamour of the past and quarries his tale out of the complex elements of modern life. We

* "The Episodes of Vathek." By William Beckford. Translated by Sir Frank T. Marzials. With an Introduction by Lewis Melville. 21s. net. (Stephen Swift.)

† "Mrs. Ames." By E. F. Benson. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
 † "The Turnstile." By A. E. W. Mason. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

could count the good political novels on the fingers of one hand, and we do not hesitate to appropriate one of the earliest fingers to "The Turnstile." Without exaggeration and without bitterness Mr. Mason pictures the political world of the present day; some of his personalities may possibly be identified with living politicians; but he did not spend some years in the House of Commons himself without getting to know the game and the players, and he has used his knowledge here to excellent account.

Apart from its political atmosphere, "The Turnstile" is a subtle revelation of feminine character—a powerful and poignant story of the love that grows strong enough to conquer self and bring its personal hopes, ideals and happiness to the sacrifice. Captain Rames was too big and robust a spirit to be finally satisfied with the insincerities, the petty shifts and schemes, and the doubtfully won triumphs of the political arena; he began with other, simpler, perhaps more healthful, ambitions, and he goes back to these just when Cynthia, who had married without love, has come to give her whole heart to him, has subdued herself to his somewhat cynical outlook, has insensibly conquered her shrinking from the unavoidable clucanery of political methods, and is keen to see him grasp the success that seems almost in his hand. Rames had frankly married her because her wealth would help him to achieve his ends in Parliament, but he has learned to love her with a strength that moves him to hide the fact that his earlier passion for Arctic exploration has re-asserted itself, and that politics have become a weariness to him now when all her desires for him are centred in them. There comes a time when she discovers his secret, and that either his happiness must be sacrificed for hers or hers for his, and, though she hesitates over the decision, she is fine enough and very woman enough to make the one that is against herself. The study in these two characters is alone enough to make this a remarkable book, but there are other characters in it that are almost as good, and a story that is as absorbing and as admirably written as any that Mr. Mason has ever done.

The "small affairs" of the market-town of Riseborough—or rather of that select portion of Riseborough which

Photo by Elliott & Fry.

Mr. E. F. Benson.

Photo by Gustav Mullins, Rye.

Mr. A. E. W. Mason.

calls itself "society"—come under Mr. E. F. Benson's microscope in this exceptionally brilliant novel of his. And how searching and powerful a microscope it is, how illuminating and relentless, revealing with unerring insight and humour the arid emptiness, the infinitesimal littleness, of Riseborough's conception of life. For society at Riseborough is made up for the most part of retired professional men, whose days are filled by golf, gossip, and the morning paper, and of their wives, to whom a choice piece of scandal is as the very breath of life, and whose ambition does not reach beyond the giving of a successful dinner. Two such women are Mrs. Ames and Mrs. Evans; the former the wife of Major Ames and the leader of Riseborough society, the latter the wife of a doctor. Ten years older than her husband—she is fifty-five years of age—short in stature, with a face that may justly be described as toad-like, Mrs. Ames suffers by comparison with the fascinating Mrs. Evans, a woman of unimaginative temperament, a wife and mother whose emotions have hitherto remained unstirred, dormant. "Neither wifehood nor motherhood had awakened her womanhood. Yet, in that she was a woman, she was that most dangerous of all created or manufactured things, an unexploded shell, liable to blow to bits both itself and any who handled her. The shell was alive still, its case uncorroded, and its contents still potentially violent. . . ." The man who lights the fuse is Major Ames. In vain does Mrs. Ames attempt to recapture her husband's affection; all her pathetic expedients fail, and slowly but surely Mrs. Evans draws the Major into her net. But before the final and irretraceable step can be taken a different Mrs. Ames is born, a product of the fine spirit of the woman's movement, a healthier, larger-minded Mrs. Ames, who proves herself quite capable of tackling the Major and Mrs. Evans and saving the infatuated couple from themselves. The book sparkles throughout with Mr. Benson's best qualities; its people are wonderfully alive; and because you have met them, and secretly laughed at them, in real life you can appreciate all the more Mr. Benson's masterly description of the hum and buzz with which they proclaim the waste spaces of their cramped and undeveloped souls.

HAPHAZARD LITERARY HISTORY.*

"Mr. J. M. Kennedy," so runs the announcement on the wrapper of his book, "has written the first history of the dynamic movement in English literature between 1880 and 1905. The work begins with a sketch of romanticism and classicism, and continues with chapters on Walter Pater and Oscar Wilde, who in their different ways exercised so great an influence on various poets and essayists of the time, all of whom are dealt with." Amongst those who are not dealt with are Meredith, Stevenson, Mr. Hardy, Mr. Conrad, Mr. Henry James, Mr. William Watson, and J. M. Synge. The names of all but the last of these, indeed, do not as much as appear in the book; in the case of Mr. Kipling, who has less than a page, the author excuses himself for his brevity on the irrelevant ground that Kipling will be remembered as a short story writer rather than as a poet. Evidently it is the "dynamic movement" that has dictated these exclusions, though what in the name of logic as language the "dynamic movement" in contemporary literature is Mr. Kennedy has not succeeded in making clear to his readers. They must content themselves with the knowledge that if it is exclusive in some directions it is copious in others, Pater, Wilde, Beardsley, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Wells, Mr. Yeats, and Mr. Moore, all have their place; so has Mr. Arthur Waugh, an old essay by whom, published in the Yellow Book, furnished Mr. Kennedy with five pages liberally dressed with quotation, there are five, too, about Mr. W. L. Courtney, thus, it is to be feared, depriving Mr. Kennedy of a review by a writer whose chief fault is stated to be the admirable one of generosity, for (according to Mr. Kennedy) when "criticising the productions of modern hack writers and pseudo-creative artists he too rarely dips his pen in vinegar." And in the chapter entitled "Beardsley and others," Whistler is one of the others.

* "English Literature: 1880-1905." By J. M. Kennedy. (Martin Secker.)

Of course a book so glaring in its omissions, so casual and hap-hazard in its election of the men and movements of the period which it aims at describing, cannot be called literary history. To omit the names we have mentioned—and many others too—is to fall so far short of what ordinary people would expect, and have a right to expect, from a book called "English Literature, 1880-1905," as to make criticism from the obvious point of view frankly impossible. It is wiser to ask instead how Mr. Kennedy has succeeded as to the authors who have been sufficiently "dynamic" to attract his attention. Not, it is to be feared, very happily. Literary critics are human, and, though history has nothing to do with a man's private prejudices, one does not grudge if a hint of them slips now and again into the pages of the critic turned historian. But Mr. Kennedy has nothing else. Stripped of its pretentiousness, of its sham-philosophic jargon about "matters of psychological notoriety" and the like, his "sketch" of romanticism and classicism amounts to nothing more than that everything that Mr. Kennedy likes is classic and everything (the most diverse things, too) that excites his irritability or loathing is romantic. This air of off-hand loftiness with his betters hardly improves matters. "From an artistic point of view we cannot award Mr. Shaw any very high praise." Pater "never cleared his brain sufficiently to be able to make up his mind" between art and metaphysics. "The traditions of all these periodicals (i.e., the Yellow Book, the National Observer, the Pageant, and the Dome) may be said to be merged to a great extent in the present New Age." These are some of the opinions of Mr. Kennedy. He is not even altogether consistent in his handling of them. The greatest target of his scorn is the middle classes. Mr. Wells, he says, has unfortunately never quite shaken off the influence of his middle-class upbringing; "he belongs emphatically to the intellectual bourgeoisie," and the importance he attributes to sex is a feature of the middle-class intellect. If that be so, Mr. Kennedy's intellect is middle-class too. The close of his study of Pater is evidence enough of that. Some of his comments and remarks are amusing enough. "Mr. Chesterton is quite right when he intimates that we cannot stop worshipping God to worship a life-force instead, as if, to use his expression, anyone could worship a hyphen. Shaw, as a matter of fact, writes his phrase without a hyphen; but Mr. Chesterton's objection is none the less apposite." Again, he quotes Wilde's saying that there was "nothing that either Plato or Christ had said that could not be transferred immediately into the sphere of art, and there find its complete fulfilment," and adds "it is true that what Plato and Christ said may be adequately represented in art, and has, indeed, been so represented by the Italian painters of the Renaissance, as well as by several English painters of modern times But it does not seem to occur to Wilde that such art is utterly inferior." We have permitted ourselves italics, but stupidities of this kind cannot be commented on, they give the reader the same vicarious sense of shame as he would feel in the presence of fatuity in conversation There are more of them in the book

But it is, perhaps, unfair to judge Mr Kennedy in sentences. As a sample, here is the way he deals with the Yellow Book —

"Among various miscellaneous articles and stories contributed to The Yellow Book must be mentioned Harland's Rosemary for Remembrance in No 5 The pathetic story of the little Italian girl is told almost without an artistic flaw In No 4 there is an excellent article on Stendhal by Norman Hopgood The Foolish Virgin in No 8, is a very fair specimen of Gissing, and there are several contributions, of course by Ella d Arcy It may seem not a little amusing to us at the present day to think that Austin Dobson Dolf Wyllarde and Vernon Lee appeared between the same covers as Max Beerbohm Henry Harland, and Ernest Dowson In the artistic section there was much work good bad and indifferent by various artists well known and otherwise—Walter Crane Muirhead Bone C J Sullivan, Walter Sickert and Patten Wilson to take a few names at a venture"

Or take the following from a luminous account of the influence on English authors of other European literatures

"Another French poet whose work influenced writers of this period to some extent was Baudelaire, but a still more profound influence was Verlaine, who was so enthusiastically studied by Mr Arthur Symonds One has only to read over such a piece as 'Mon Dieu m'a dit' to realise how Verlaine would appeal to the English romanticists And of course, there were Guy de Maupassant Flaubert, and Zola Russia made the influence of her melancholy realism felt through Tourgenieff and Dostoevski and Shaw, too was the means of introducing many new Continental ideas into England

These passages show Mr Kennedy at his average, not at his worst, as in the execrable passage about Pater already referred to and not far off his best So he marks time industriously page after page, working hard without going forward, stirring up the dust, and thus with liberal quotation and large type and fine printing do a series of very highly opinionated, hap-hazard reviews become the first history of the "dynamic movement" in contemporary literature.

G H MAIR.

AUTOBIOGRAPHICTION *

George Borrow says Mr Thomas Seccombe, interpreted autobiography as autobiographiction and, ugly as the portmanteau word is, it is perhaps the happiest single word in which Borrow's contribution to literature can be summed up His works are likely long to attract readers for their inherent interest and fascination but it is no doubt owing to the fact that autobiography and invention fact and fiction, are so skilfully woven together in them that the personality of the author sooner or later fascinates the reader who has once fallen under the spell of Borrow Some months ago three studies of Thomas Love Peacock were published in rapid succession, showing that as many enthusiasts had at the same time been moved to express their enthusiasm in book form, and the same triplication bids fair to be repeated in the case of Borrow It is but a few months since Mr Herbert Jenkins published a biography of Lavengro, as his gipsy friends dubbed him, now we have here a handsome monograph by Mr Edward Thomas, and there are rumours of a third work of which he is the inspiring figure being in preparation, a sufficiently remarkable thing when we are reminded that 'Lavengro' in 1851 and 'The Romany Rye' in 1857 failed to impress the critics or the public† The interest in Borrow's personality, on the part of those who made something of a Borrow cult, led, before the close of the nineteenth century, to a revival of interest in his work, and the consequent reprinting of his chief books in cheap forms appears to have reacted again and so led to the wider interest connoted by this multiplication of books about him—to lead perhaps, in turn, to a still further widening of the circle of his readers As it is always preferable to read an author's own books rather than books about those books a work such as this of Mr Edward Thomas is to be welcomed as a means to that end—in that it may lead others to read Borrow for themselves Those who are already good Borrowians will wish to read it as a fresh estimate of a man who appears at once strangely enough to have been fascinating and repellent We feel his fascination when following the adventures and self revelations of one who—if it be true as one biographer has it could not invent—had a veritable genius for embroidering the fancy work of what might have been on the stuff of what was

* "George Borrow: The Man and His Books" By Edward Thomas 10s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall)

Mr Thomas tells the story of Borrow's life as it has been ascertained and as it may be pieced together from the passages of autobiography—fact glorified as it were by fiction—to be found throughout his writings and with the story of his life has woven appreciation and criticism of his work has indeed never lost sight of his purpose, that of presenting both the man and his books It is true that in the books we have not only much of the author's individuality expressed, for Borrow's work may be taken as an illustration of the old finding that the style is the man,

† In connection with 'Lavengro' a bibliographical item ignored by Mr Thomas may be noted In Allibone's "Dictionary of English Literature" after mention of 'Lavengro' in three volumes comes the following 'Autobiography London 1 vol 12mo 1851' In the bibliography appended to Knapp's bulky biography of Borrow there is no mention of any edition between the first of 1851 in three volumes and the third in one volume of 1872, beyond the note 'No 2nd edition is known to the publisher' Can it be—despite Mr Thomas's statement that Borrow never called the published book his autobiography—that the second edition was issued in 1851 entitled 'Autobiography'?

Horncastle Horse Fair.

From an old print.

From "George Borrow," by Edward Thomas (Chapman & Hall).

A Selection from Stanley Paul's New List

Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III. BARON D'AMBES. Two vols., 24s. net the set.
The Royal Miracle (Charles II.). A. M. BROADLEY. Fully Illustrated. Crown 4to, 16s. net.
Our Future Existence. FRED. G. SHAW, F.G.S. Crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net.
The First Signs of Insanity: Their Prevention and Treatment. BERNARD HOLLANDER, M.D. 10s. 6d. net.
The Physiology of Faith and Fear. WILLIAM S. SADLER, M.D. Large crown 8vo, 580 pp., 44 Full-page Illustrations, 6s. net.
The Insanity of Genius. J. F. NISBET. With an Introduction by Dr. BERNARD HOLLANDER. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
Woman Adrift: The Menace of Suffragism. HAROLD OWEN. Cloth gilt, 6s.
Ancient, Curious and Famous Wills. VIRGIL M. HARRIS. 10s. 6d. net.
The History of Gravesend and its Surroundings. ALEX. J. PHILIP. Four vols., 12s. 6d. net each.
A Tour through South America. A. S. FORREST. Demy 8vo., Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.
The Ridge of the White Waters. WILLIAM CHARLES SCULLY. 6s. net.
In the Footsteps of Richard Cœur de Lion. Demy 8vo., Illustrated, 16s. net.
Godoy, the Queen's Favourite. EDMUND B. D'AUVERGNE. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 16s. net.
The Romance of Sandro Botticelli. A. J. ANDERSON. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.
Duchess Derelict (Wife of Cesare Borgia). E. L. MIRON. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 16s. net.
The Life of Cesare Borgia. Third Edition. RAFAEL SABATINI. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 16s. net.
Rodrigo Borgia: The Life and Times of Pope Alexander VI. The Most Rev. ARNOLD H. MATHEW, D.D. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.
In Jesuit Land. W. H. KOEBEL. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 12s. 6d. net.
Cameos of Indian Crime. H. J. A. HERVEY. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 12s. 6d. net.
Guerilla Leaders of the World. PERCY CROSS STANDING. Crown 8vo, Illustrated, 6s. net.
The White Slave Market. Mrs. ARCHIBALD MACKIRDY (Olive Christian Malvery) and W. N. WILLIS. 5s. net. Eighth Edition.
August Strindberg: The Spirit of Revolt. L. LIND-AF-HAGEBY. Crown 8vo, Illustrated, 6s. net.
The European in India. H. J. A. HERVEY. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
What Germany Wants. W. N. WILLIS. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.
A Garland of Verse for Young People. Edited by ALFRED H. MILES. 2s. 6d. net.
Samphire. LADY SYBIL GRANT. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.
Nineteenth Century English Ceramic Art. J. F. BLACKER. Demy 8vo, 1,200 Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.
The Motor. JOHN ARMSTRONG. Demy 8vo, 160 Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.
Paul's Simplicode. (A practical and efficient Telegraphic Code for Tourists, etc.) Crown 8vo, 1s. net.
Fourteen Years of Diplomatic Life in Japan. Second Edition. Baroness ALBERT D'ANETHAN. 18s. net.
David Garrick and his French Friends. Dr F. A. HEDGCOCK. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 7s. 6d. net.
A Winter Holiday in Portugal. Captain GRANVILLE BAKER. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 12s. 6d. net.
The Beloved Princess (Princess Charlotte of Wales). CHARLES E. PEARCE. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 16s. net.
A Great Russian Realist (Dostoeffsky). J. A. T. LLOYD. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
The Diners-Out Vade Mecum: A Pocket What's What. ALFRED H. MILES. F'cap 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.
Diners a Deux. S. BEACH CHESTER. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
Cakes and Ales. EDWARD SPENCER (Nathaniel Gubbins). Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
The Everyday Pudding Book: A Tasty Recipe for Every Day in the Year. Crown 8vo, 1s. net.
The Everyday Savoury Book: A Tasty Recipe for Every Day in the Year. Crown 8vo, 1s. net.
Cole's Fun Doctor. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.
The Business of Bookbinding. ALEX. J. PHILIP. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

ALFRED H. MILES' NEW SERIES

For Boys and Girls. In large Crown 8vo. Handsome cloth gilt, burnished edges and fully gilt. With coloured plates, 5s. each.

IN THE LION'S MOUTH.

Fierce Fights with Wild Men, Wild Animals and Wild Nature. CLIVE FENN, THEODORE ROOSEVELT, etc.

WHERE DUTY CALLS:

Or Danger Records of Courage and Adventure for Girls. EVERETT GREEN, GRACE STEBBING, etc.

Twixt Life and Death on Sea and Shore.

A Book of Brave Boys.

In the Teeth of Adventure.

Heroines of the Home.

A Book of Brave Girls.

THE SWEEP OF THE SWORD.

Being a complete Battle Book from Marathon to Mafeking. 6s. Superb gift book for Boys.

READ

Countess Daphne. RITA. 2s. net.

Dr. Phillips. FRANK DANBY. 1s. net.

Priscilla of the Good Intent. HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE. 6d.

STANLEY PAUL'S SIX SHILLING NOVELS

The Career of Beauty Darling. DOLF WYLLARDE
Captain Hawks. OSWALD KENDAL.
The Irresistible Mrs. Ferrers. ARABELLA KENEALY.
The Three Anarchists. MAUDE STEPNEY RAWSON
The Three Destinies. J. A. T. LLOYD.
The King's Master. OLIVE LETHBRIDGE and JOHN DE STOURTON.
Maggie of Margate. GABRIELLE WODNIL.
Paul Burdon. SIR WILLIAM MAGNAY.
The Thread of Proof. HEADON HILL.
A Robin Hood of France. MICHAEL W. KAYE.
Neighbours of Mine. R. ANDOM.
The Ban. LESTER LURGAN.
Bright Shame. KEIGHLEY SNOWDEN.
A Star of the East. CHARLES E. PEARCE.
Susan and the Duke. KATE HORN.
Lonesome Land. B. M. BOWER.
The Confessions of Perpetua. ALICE M. DIEHL.
A Modern Ahab. THEODORA WILSON WILSON.
Dagobert's Children. L. J. BEESTON.
Her Majesty the Flapper. A. E. JAMES.
Chaff and the Wind. G. VILLIERS STUART.
The Marble Aphrodite. ANTHONY KIRBY GILL.
The Romance of Bayard. LT.-COL. ANDREW C. P. HAGGARD.
A Durbar Bride. CHARLOTTE CAMERON.
The Consort. Mrs. EVERARD COTES (Sara Jeannette Duncan).
The Villa Mystery. HERBERT FLOWERDEW.
Prince and Priest. BERYL SYMONS.
The Celebrity's Daughter. VIOLET HUNT.
Devil's Brew. MICHAEL W. KAYE.
A Babe in Bohemia. FRANK DANBY.
The Meteoric Benson. VINCENT MILLS-MALET.
Brass Faces. CHARLES McEVROY.
The Memoirs of Mimosa. ANNE ELLIOT.
The Return of Pierre. DONAL HAMILTON HAINES.
The Incongruous Dukane. GEORGE C. SHEDD.
Love's Cross Roads. L. T. MEADE.
The Swelling of Jordan. CORALIE STANTON and HFATH HOSKEN.
Galbraith of Wynnyates. E. EVERETT-GREEN
Francesca. CECIL ADAIR.
Between Two Stools. RHODA BROUGHTON.
The Justice of the Duke. RAFAEL SABATINI.
Exotic Maritina. DOROTHEA GERARD.
The Unholy Estate. DOUGLAS SLADEN.
The Woman-Hunter. ARABELLA KENEALY.
The Second Woman. NORMA LORIMER.
Damocel Croft. R. MURRAY GILCHRIST.

THE A B C SERIES

Each in large crown 8vo. Very fully Illustrated. 5s. net.

The A B C of Japanese Art. J. F. BLACKER.
The A B C about Collecting. SIR JAMES YOXALL, M.P.

The A B C of Collecting Old English China. J. F. BLACKER.

The A B C of Collecting Old English Pottery. J. F. BLACKER.

The A B C Guide to Mythology. HELEN A. CLARKE.

The A B C Guide to Music. DANIEL G. MASON.

The A B C Guide to Pictures. CHARLES H. CAFFIN.

The A B C of Artistic Photography. A. J. ANDERSON.

The A B C Guide to American History. H. W. ELSON.

Descriptive Catalogue gratis on application to the Publishers:

STANLEY PAUL & CO., 31, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

but also much of the story of his life, seen through the somewhat distorting glasses of self-conscious egotism. A Pepys reveals his egotism un-self-consciously and is therefore the more readily understood, while the very self-consciousness of a writer such as Borrow makes him exaggerate in a way that makes it difficult to recognise where the cold outlines of fact have been tinted with the colours of fancy. "Borrow could not avoid making himself impressive and mysterious. He was impressive and mysterious without an effort; the individual or the public was impressed, and he was naturally tempted to be more impressive." Thus it may be taken, generally speaking, that where he describes his experiences and doings it is not that he has invented his adventures but merely, to use a colloquialism, that they have not lost in the telling.

It is a curious coincidence that another great literary egotist, but one of most diverse character was, as Mr. Thomas points out, not without influence on Borrow. That other writer was William Cobbett, who, however, imported less of the art of the fictionist into the passages of autobiography which he scattered about his voluminous writings. It is in the fictionising of fact that much of the literary charm of Borrow's work lies, and the seeking to establish the dividing line as one writer puts it "will always be a fascinating task for literary conjecture." Mr. Thomas has drawn largely on Borrow's autobiographical passages and has succeeded in presenting what one feels is a satisfactory portrait of a strange wayward personality, a man who was possessed at once of curious powers of fascination, and a gloomy moroseness which made him sometimes a difficult companion. Those who know Borrow and delight in his books will find much to admire in this fresh presentation of his story, it is an able piece of work though marked by some small irritating affectations, such as the half-page Chapter VI., the single-page Chapter VII., both of which properly belong to Chapter V. Possibly the work would have gained by greater compression, but in this respect it is far superior to Dr. Knapp's inchoate accumulation of biographical materials.

WALTER JERROLD.

Novel Notes.

VALSERINE. * By Marguerite Audoux. 6s. (Chapman and Hall.)

Mr. Raphael has taken his courage in both hands, and printed not only a translation but the original French of these thirteen short stories and sketches by the authoress of "Marie Claire." The story which gives the title to the volume is the longest, but it is not the most successful. It describes the fortunes of a smuggler's daughter, after her father's death. To be effective, it would require to be worked out more elaborately, and it seems a pity that the authoress did not work it up, as she intended, into a longer novel. The prettiest sketch is "La Fiancée." Mademoiselle Audoux has touched here some of the chords which made "Marie Claire" so fresh and naïve. In one or two of the others, she has been drawing evidently upon her imagination rather than her observation of life, and the result is much less interesting. It will be curious to find whether she is to be the authoress of one book, like Olive Schreiner, or whether she possesses wider powers. The present volume has some pretty pages, but it does not afford materials for any judgment upon the ability of the authoress to go further than she went in "Marie Claire."

HONOURS EASY. By Mrs. J. O. Arrol. 6s. (Methuen.)

This is an entertaining story, which shows how the lives of several people are tangled by the will of a Professor Clifford, and how love eventually unknots and straightens out the threads. The will leaves £20,000 to any scientific man who shall, within three years, finish the Professor's life work; if no one succeeds the money is to revert to the Professor's step-daughter, Margaret Napier, the attractive heroine of the story. Humphrey Wyatt undertakes the task, and meets and falls in love with Margaret, not knowing she is the step-daughter who will lose the £20,000 if he succeeds in his work. Warren Clifford, a nephew of the Professor, who has been left only £100 and is eager to gain a larger share, comes between Margaret and Wyatt and plays a cautious, skilful part so that whichever side gains the money he himself will not lose. Of course, he succeeds in complicating matters considerably, until Wyatt at length discovers Margaret's identity. It is a neatly constructed plot and the interest is well sustained.

THE SINS OF THE FATHER. By Thomas Dixon. With sixteen illustrations by John Cassel. 6s. (Appleton.)

The colour question is of less vital interest in this country than in the United States, so that it is doubtful whether the purpose of "The Sins of the Father" will serve to attract many readers on the eastern side of the Atlantic. This is rather a pity, for the work is a good, strong melodrama, possessed of considerably more power and thought than the average novel of its type. We say "melodrama" advisedly, for a certain quality of exaggeration—even hysteria—is, unfortunately, apparent in Mr. Dixon's work. In justice to the author we must admit that the more delicate scenes, of which by reason of its subject the novel necessarily contains several, are treated with commendable restraint. Mr. Dixon may also be congratulated upon the earnestness and sincerity with which he treats a difficult subject, and readers of "The Sins of the Father" will not have cause to regret wasted time. Mr. John Cassel's illustrations are unequal, but effective on the whole.

TO-DAY. By Percy White. 6s. (Constable.)

Novelties in heroes are the fashion just now, and Mr. Percy White is determined to swim with the tide. His hero, if so we may call the person who forms the centre of this story, is compounded in equal parts of Mr. Micawber, the Mollusc and Little Billie. He is perfectly candid about himself, only not candid in supposing that he is an essential go-between, a scheming slave from a play of Terence, while in reality his role in life is that of the buffer state, punched impartially by contending powers. The contention in this lively amusing mock-heroic Iliad is between a suffragist and her relatives. The suffragist, fascinated by the promise "of new liberties above the howling senses' ebb and flow," reckons not that she drags into the dust the name of a great family which has just made its money from "Ellice's Embrocation." This beautiful being, who emerges with uncommon rapidity from a stage of very slangy girlhood, scorns her matter-of-fact lovers. The pessimistic poet, the militant editor, the thoroughly good-hearted society man ready to turn suffragist or anything for her sake; these and Little Billie himself are merely so many earthenware jars bumping horribly against each other as they are carried down the stream after the fair nymph. She meanwhile steels herself to bear the shocks of doom and Holloway, beats the record for fasting, is forcibly fed. The mollusc takes this calmly: "Didn't the Home Secretary submit to be forcibly fed himself to prove that the operation wasn't nearly as bad as the women pretend?" But the other earthenware jars rage furiously together. Their hopes "that the beautiful Bacchanal will return from the hills to peace and domesticity, clothed and in her right mind" are rudely shattered when she acts upon her theories as to the divorce laws and imitates Grant Allen's "Woman who did." With the exception of the mollusc, who has got about as much originality as a Greek chorus, the different characters stand out unmistakably vivid and vital, and the whole of the action is carried on in that delightful debatable land between laughter and tears.

YONDER. By E. H. Young. 6s. (Heinemann.)

In "Yonder" we have a striking and very unconventional story, which is marred only by an excessive straining at super-subtlety. There are two groups of characters in the book. On the one hand there is the Rutherford family, a dipsomaniac father, an heroic mother,

MR. JOHN LANE'S FIRST AUTUMN LIST

Art Books

By CHARLES
TURRELLMINIATURES: a Series in Colour and in Photogravure of Ninety-two Miniatures of Distinguished Personages including the Queen, Queen Alexandra, the Queen of Norway, the Princess Royal and the Princess Victoria. Painted by CHARLES TURRELL.

With an Introduction by GEORGE WILLIAMSON, Litt. D. Limited to 125 numbered and signed copies. 15 guineas net.

GEORGE LELAND
HUNTERTAPESTRIES: their Origin, History and Renaissance

By GEORGE LELAND HUNTER. With four full-page plates in Colour and 128 Half tone Engravings. Square 8vo. 16s. net.

W. H.
JAMES WEALE
and M. H.
BROCKWELLTHE VAN EYCKS AND THEIR ART

By W. H. JAMES WEALE with the co-operation of M. H. BROCKWELL. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

VERNON
HILLBALLADS WEIRD AND WONDERFUL

With 25 Drawings by VERNON HILL. Demy 4to. 21s. net.

AUSTRIA: Her People and their Homelands

By JAMES BAKER, F.R.G.S. With 48 Pictures in Colours by DONALD MAXWELL. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

GATES OF THE DOLOMITES

By L. MARION DAVIDSON. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

THE OLD GARDENS OF ITALY AND HOW TO VISIT THEM

By Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND. With 100 Illustrations from her own Photographs. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

DOWN THE MACKENZIE AND UP THE YUKON

By F. STEWART. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Books of Travel, Topography, &c.By JAMES BAKER and DONALD MAXWELLL. MARION
DAVIDSONMRS. AUBREY
LE BLOND

E. STEWART

Memoirs,
Biographies, &c.By LEWIS
MELVILLETHE LIFE AND LETTERS OF WILLIAM COBBETT IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA

By LEWIS MELVILLE. With 2 Photogravures and numerous other Illustrations. 2 Vols. Demy 8vo. 32s. net.

A. M. W.
STIRLINGTHE LETTER-BAG OF LADY ELIZABETH SPENCER STANHOPE

By A. M. W. STIRLING, Author of "Coke of Norfolk," "Annals of a Yorkshire Home," etc. With a Colour Plate, 2 Photogravures, and numerous other Illustrations. 2 Vols. Demy 8vo. 32s. net.

CONSTANCE
HILLFANNY BURNEY AT THE COURT OF QUEEN CHARLOTTE

By CONSTANCE HILL. Author of "Juniper Hall," etc. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

LUIS COLOMA LADY
MORETONTHE STORY OF DON JOHN OF AUSTRIA By LUIS COLOMA. Translated by LADY MORETON. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.MRS. ALEC
TWEEDIETHIRTEEN YEARS OF A BUSY WOMAN'S LIFE

By Mrs. ALEC TWEEDIE. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

WEEDON
GROSSMITHFROM STUDIO TO STAGE

By WEEDON GROSSMITH. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

CHARLES
BASTIDETHE ENGLISH AND FRENCH IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

By CHARLES BASTIDE. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

F. LORING
PETRENAPOLEON'S LAST CAMPAIGN IN GERMANY

By F. LORING PETRE. With 17 Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

MYLES BIRKET
FOSTERHISTORY OF THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY: A Record of a Hundred Years' work in the cause of Music

Compiled by MYLES BIRKET FOSTER, F.R.A.M. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Memoirs,
Biographies, &c.A. M. W.
STIRLINGJOSEPH
TURQUANHUGH
CHILDERSDONALD
LOWRIE

Essays, &c.

By VERNON LEELORD
REDESDALEWILFRID S.
JACKSON"A RIFLEMAN"

Poetry and Drama

By LOUIS N.
PARKERROSAMUND
MARRIOTT
WATSONFRANCIS
COUTTSLUCY CABLE
BIKLE

FICTION

By WILLIAM J. LOCKE

- The Joyous Adventures of Aristide Pujol
Illustrated by ALEC BALL

By A. NEIL LYONS

- Clara—Some Scattered Chapters in the Life of a Hussy 6s.

By GERARD BENDALL

- The Illusions of Mr. and Mrs. Bressingham 6s.

By STEPHEN LEACOCK

- Sunshine Sketches of a Little Town 3s. 6d. net.

By SIDNEY DARK

- The Man who would not be King 6s.

By SHELLAND BRADLEY

- An American Girl at the Durbar 6s.

By H. H. MUNRO

- The Unbearable Bassington 6s.

By DANIEL CHAUCER

- The New Humpty Dumpty 6s.

By MARGARET WESTRUP

- Elizabeth in Retreat 6s.

By KARIN MICHAELIS

- Elsie Lindtner 3s. 6d. net.

By MARION FOX

- The Bountiful Hour 6s.

By HERMANN SUDERMANN

- The Song of Songs 6s.

By Sir FRANK SWETTENHAM

- Also and Perhaps 6s.

By WILLIAM CAINE

- Hoffman's Chance 6s.

By H. PREVOST BATTERSBY

- The Last Resort 6s.

By GEORGE VANE

- The Chimera 6s.

By F. E. MILLS YOUNG

- Grit Lawless 6s.

By BERTAL HEENEY

- Pickanock 6s.

WORKS OF ANATOLE
FRANCEUniform English Edition. Demy 8vo.
6s. each Volume. In Addition to the 13 Volumes already published the following will be ready during the Autumn Season.

MY FRIEND'S BOOK

A Translation by J. LEWIS MAY

JOCASTA AND THE FAMISHED CAT

(Now Ready.) A Translation by Mrs FARLEY

AT THE SIGN OF THE REINE PEDAUQUE

(Now Ready.) A Translation by Mrs. WILFRID JACKSON

THE OPINIONS OF JEROME COIGNARD

A Translation by Mrs. WILFRID JACKSON

THE ASPIRATIONS OF JEAN SERVIEN

A Translation by ALFRED ALLINSON

Full details of the English Edition of Anatole France's Works on application.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, LONDON, W.

and a somewhat boorish son with a streak of genius. To this strange household in the wild North, accident one day brings Edward Webb, a draper's commercial traveller, with the soul of a poet. Too poor to give his romantic-minded daughter, Theresa, the adventures she craves for, poor Webb devotes his scanty hours of leisure to seeking little wayside adventures which Theresa may enjoy in the recital. The bringing together of the self-willed young Rutherford and the high-spirited Theresa is the subject of this original love-story, which the author has not succeeded in working out with much plausibility. Mr. Young is much happier in his interludes, especially in the chapters that describe Theresa's temporary engagement to the extremely conventional Basil Morton, and her amusing encounters with his Early-Victorian mother. We could have wished this portion indefinitely expanded, so infinitely better is Mr. Young in describing the quite ordinary happenings of the commercial traveller's household than in his effort to give a Brontë-like picture of the family in the North. To make the way smooth for the lovers Mr. Young has invoked the melodramatic agency of murder and suicide. The novel is one of power and distinction, and the delineator of the Webb family is a writer of whom we expect to hear again.

THE RAT-TRAP. By Daniel Woodroffe. 6s. (Laurie.)

The fault of "The Rat-Trap" is that it is either too serious or not serious enough. Daniel Woodroffe's purpose is, obviously, to attack the conventional idea of the sanctity of the marriage tie, so she starts by presenting a hard case—so hard that it cannot by any stretch of the imagination be considered typical, though we are altogether willing to admit its occasional possibility. She ties her hero to a homicidal maniac, she introduces him to his affinity, and she puts divorce out of the question. The author does all this in a very efficient, not to say attractive, manner. The characters are all well realised, and the hero and heroine are very likeable. The reader scents a problem. What will the hero do? It is disappointing to find that he does nothing in particular. The author just bundles all the important characters except the wife, who by this time is safely in Hanwell, into a ship bound for the West Indies. She kills off the heroine's mother, who is the only person who has any influence over the girl, she wrecks the ship, and casts the principal characters on to a lonely island, inhabited only by a number of sinister black slaves, and a more sinister Brazilian half-breed, who is their owner. There they play out a pretty little drama of violence and sudden death, and the hero and heroine end matters by quietly wandering off together. This sort of thing is no use for "the man in the street"; he cannot afford to spend his life sailing round the West Indies with his affinity, and the author has burked her own problem. Nevertheless, "The Rat-Trap," is an excellent book to read, and that is the main thing. The less the reader bothers about its purpose the better.

THE BRIDE'S BRIEVIARY. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The anonymous author of "The Bride's Breviary" has given us a book that has an attractive title with an attractive cover to arrest the eye of the passer-by; and should he pick it up and dip into it he will at once find himself caught by the fascinating, gay, artless style of Sandra Phayre—by whom the story is supposed to be told—and his curiosity will be rewarded by the finding of an exceedingly attractive novel. Sandra becomes a real personality to us long before the middle of the book is reached. She is a young American girl, an heiress, who comes to England on a holiday and records her thoughts and doings in a Self-Book—her only outlet, as her mother is dead, and the relatives with whom she is travelling are uncongenial company and do not understand her. Her adventures, and the story of her strange marriage and what happens after it keep the reader intensely interested to the finish. The plot is very well constructed.

SALLY. By Dorothea Conyers. 6s. (Methuen.)

The supreme self-confidence of Miss Conyers' heroine makes her rather an awkward young person wholly to sympathise with, and it says much for the art of the author that we never can really dislike Sally, much though we may desire sometimes that she may be taken down a peg. But—ourselves aggravated and resistant victims—we are compelled to admit her charm and her freshness. The scene of the book is laid in Ireland, in a country where fox-hunting is impossible, and where, accordingly, they do hunt, seeming to have a very much better time than they would have had in the English Midlands. Miss Conyers, as everybody knows, is a skilled exponent of the humours of the Irish character, and in this respect "Sally" is quite up to her average. In fact, we have enjoyed it. It is a thoroughly jolly and readable book—just the very thing to keep you awake and amused after a long day in the open air.

THOSE OTHER DAYS. By E. Phillips Oppenheim. 6s. (Ward, Lock & Co.)

In these days our conception of the bulk which a story should possess to qualify as "a long complete novel" has become a very elastic one. It ranges from a volume—or even two—by William de Morgan to the now well-established feature of the monthly magazines. To this last category, doubtless, belongs the story entitled "Those Other Days"; as regards the other tales in this same cover—some eighteen in number—they are short stories properly so-called. Mr. Oppenheim excels in the art of opening up a story. He hints with tantalising restraint of some ghastly secret or tragic mystery; he arouses interest by a veiled suggestion of a haunting sorrow, of a great unhappiness, of things supernatural. "Those Other Days" tells of a young artist, full of enthusiasm for his profession, who is robbed of "the fairest gift of life" by a serious illness. "For, after weeks of half-unconscious pain and suspense, there came upon me in the night a sudden darkness, which the light of day could not dissipate, and there crept upon me a horrible suspicion that I was blind. . . . I besought them, with my voice choked with sobs, to tell me that it was not true, but I heard no encouraging voices bid me hope, only the sound of a woman sobbing quietly by my bedside, and answering my piteous appeals with evasive tenderness." Accompanied by his sister, the blind man goes to Cromer, there to add to his hopeless misery by falling in love—first with a woman's voice, then with the woman herself. The story relates how the artist's sight was restored and at what terrible cost; in this, however, as in most of the stories in this characteristic volume, Mr. Oppenheim sees to it that love smiles triumphant when the curtain falls.

AN AMERICAN GIRL AT THE DURBAR. By Shelland Bradley. 6s. (John Lane.)

When the daily papers were daily chronicling the great and stately doings in India last December, hundreds of loyal English men and women faithfully read several columns of description each morning between breakfast and luncheon. But there were many hundreds of, perhaps, equally loyal Englishmen and women whose spirits sank a little before the task of eye-climbing down those hundreds of closely-printed lines; who contented themselves with a visit to the cinematograph, or left the whole thing alone. For each and all of these, and for those who were fortunate enough to be actually present at the Durbar, Mrs. Bradley's new book will be a lively pleasure. It is not seriously great in style; it is neither literature nor history; but it is a light, vivid account of a great historical event, and it threads two or three simple love matters in and out of the pages, to add personal interest and verisimilitude to the whole. Mrs. Bradley wrote an earlier volume, "An American Girl in India," and showed herself then to be a charming unmarried girl. In the present volume as a married woman, a countess, and a wife, little anxious as to the reality of her husband's love, she

From Stephen Swift's Striking Autumn List

PHILOSOPHY AND HISTORY

AN INTRODUCTION TO METAPHYSICS

By HENRI BERGSON. Authorised Translation by T. E. HULME. 2s. 6d. net.

FOUR ESSAYS ON RELIGION

By RUDOLF EUCKEN. Translated by Dr. TUDOR JONES. 2s. 6d. net.

PSYCHOLOGY: a New System

By ARTHUR L. LYNCH. 2 volumes, 21s. net.

REFLECTIONS ON VIOLENCE

By GEORGES SOREL. Translated by T. E. HULME. With an Introductory Note by GRAHAM WALLAS.

BRITISH BATTLE BOOKS:

Blenheim, Waterloo, Malplaquet, Turcoing

By HILAIRE BELLOC. 1s. net each.

PATHWAYS TO RELIGION

By Dr. TUDOR JONES. 7s. 6d. net.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE GROTESQUE

By ARTHUR RANSOME. 7s. 6d. net.

BELLES LETTRES

THE EPISODES OF VATHEK

By WILLIAM BECKFORD. Translated by the late Sir FRANK T. MARZIALS. With an Introduction by LEWIS MELVILLE, and containing the original French, and Photogravure of the Author. 21s. net.

ENGLISH LITERATURE, 1880-1905:

Pater, Wilde, and After

By J. M. KENNEDY. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

EDGAR ALLAN POE

By ARTHUR RANSOME. 7s. 6d. net.

PORTRAITS AND SPECULATIONS

By ARTHUR RANSOME. 7s. 6d. net.

THE NEW ERA

By FRANCIS GRIERSON. 3s. 6d. net.

THE HIGHER DRAMA AND OTHER PARODIES

By JACK COLLINGS SQUIRE, Author of "Imaginary Speeches." 3s. 6d. net.

LATEST 6/- FICTION

THE CONFESSION OF A FOOL

By AUGUST STRINDBERG. Translated by ELLIE SCHLEUSSNER. 6s.

"The 'Kreutzer Sonata' itself is not more unaffected in its implacable simplicity. There is, indeed, in the whole range of literature probably no parallel to these tormented confidences." Pall Mall Gazette.

THE NAKED SOUL

By LOUISE HEILGERS. 6s.

LATEST 6/- FICTION

BROKEN PITCHERS

By REGINALD WRIGHT KAUFFMAN.

BROOM. By J. MILLS WHITHAM.

By the Author of "Daughters of Ishmael."

SHADOWS OUT OF THE CROWD

By RICHARD CURLE. 6s.

"Evidently a man to be reckoned with and judged by the highest standard."—Daily News and Leader.

STEPHEN SWIFT & CO., LTD., BEG TO ANNOUNCE THAT THEIR AUTUMN CATALOGUE IS NOW READY, AND MAY BE OBTAINED GRATIS ON APPLICATION TO STEPHEN SWIFT & CO., LTD., 16, KING STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

Ready shortly.

The Problem of Edwin Drood

A Study in the Methods of Dickens

By SIR W. ROBERTSON
NICOLL, LL.D.

Price 3/6 net.

HODDER AND STOUGHTON,
PUBLISHERS, LONDON.

leaves home in reply to the invitation of her cousin, Berengaria, and, with a young and pretty girl in her chaperonage, goes to India to attend the Durbar. The whole book is as natural as a woman's diary should be. It is amiably discursive at the beginning; it is pleasantly intimate throughout. When India is reached, however, discursiveness is no longer discursiveness; it is all salient; for each detail then becomes information, information as brightly and attractively given as if the whole thing were carefully-constructed fiction. The gay but slight love interests are prettily natural, but such descriptions as the following (mere scraps we pick at random) are valuable as first-hand impressions. "It was a fascinating journey through the camps, our first view of the city of tents, lit by the early morning sun" (just after their arrival). "Even then it all struck one as colossal, those miles and miles of canvas and waving flags. The new-made roads and trim gardens all sprung to life out of the bare plain at the bidding of another race, to do honour to the greatest King who had ever trodden even the historic city of Delhi." And again: "Beyond it rose up a fitting setting, the enormous amphitheatre, with its thousands of coloured turbans, flowing like huge banks of flowers, the lofty white pavilion, with its golden dome, and rank on rank of soldiery. Slowly the Royal procession ascended the steps, and we could just see the King and Queen standing facing the people as the roars of cheering came to us like one mighty sea of sound." The author also tells of the amazement felt when the King read out his startling announcement of the changes to be made in India. The book is truly an amusing narrative, happily told, and with a happy ending.

A PLAIN WOMAN'S PORTRAIT. By Sophie Cole. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

The portrait of Joanna Jephson is painted in with firm, deft touches. First as a child, impressionable, slow of speech, then as a young girl, and lastly as a woman we see her, when she suddenly discovers that she possesses a gift. She writes a book, and by and by gains success—only to find that there is something still greater and more to be desired. The author has a delightfully finished style, and it is a pleasure—after one has finished the story—to pick up the book and open it at random and read here and there, just for the sake of the style. The characters throughout are skilfully drawn; Adrian Carsellis—who "collects" interesting people—is a particularly good study. The ending is a little disappointing: one expects a much cleverer finish to the tale. However, the rest of the book makes excellent reading. The author evidently takes the advice of one of her characters, who says to Joanna, "and if you start writing, write of things as you see them, not as you imagine other people see them."

THE HOUSE OF FORTUNE. By Max Pemberton. 2s. net (Nash.)

Mr. Max Pemberton's new novel belongs to that traditional but rarely-encountered order, the books that cannot be put down until they are finished. In this case it is fortunate perhaps—though we regretted it ourselves—that the book is not very long, and so the reader need not consume much time in getting through it, time which might be more profitably employed. For that is one of the charms of Mr. Pemberton's work; it is not "improving" and it is not concerned with problems. "The House of Fortune" takes us to Morocco at its stormiest, where El Haygari, an outlaw and a scourge, has taken a dashing French officer prisoner and brought him to his own mysterious house. That is how Chenier first met Dolores the dancer, to whom he lost his heart very rapidly and completely. The story goes with all the swing and dash of Mr. Pemberton at his best, and the author's large public cannot fail to appreciate it.

THE UNKNOWN QUANTITY. By Charles Inge. 6s. (Eveleigh Nash.)

The relation of its title to the story is somewhat enigmatical, and is symptomatic of what is the chief defect in this book—a certain over-labouredness and unreality. There is good writing in the novel, easy and natural dialogue, and undoubted power of characterisation; but with all this the author has failed to make his people really vital. The book, in fact, appeals to the intellect only, and leaves us a little cold. Stripped of its accessories, the essential story is conventional enough. Robin Peverell is but a sorry hero. Leaving the army, he devotes his leisure to dabbling in eugenics, and undoubtedly the best things in the book are the satirical descriptions of the meetings of the pseudo-scientists. Mr. Inge has succeeded best with his most unpleasant character, a middle-aged siren whose interest in eugenics might be called by a harsher name than "scientific." Her capture of the impressionable Peverell is an incident in itself very credible, but it is not justified by Mr. Inge's plot. We have no further interest in Peverell when we find that his disappointment at being refused by the blind girl whom he loves drives him for consolation to the entirely hateful Miss Charlotte Blagden. And the least pleasing feature of the plot is Peverell's jaunty forgetfulness of this "incident," and his return to win from Beatrice Lavener the happiness which there is nothing in the book to suggest that he deserves.

THE STORY OF JOAN GREENCROFT. By Arthur N. Bax. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

The meagre outline of a life now dim in the closing shadows of the past, a picture, and three or four letters, on which the tears and ink dried more than a century ago—such, the author tells us, were the materials that inspired this story. And in reading "The Story of Joan Greencroft," one is overwhelmingly impressed with a sense of its faithfulness to life, so intimate and thoroughly human are the glimpses it affords of the people who comprise Joan's little world. Joan is the younger of the two daughters of a well-to-do Durham coal-owner, and in his fine old hall the girls spend their childhood under the care of a tender, refined mother, the daughter of a bishop renowned at Court in the time of the early Georges. The death of the mother is the first great sorrow that falls on the family at the Hall; and though Squire Greencroft undoubtedly feels his loss keenly, and erects a very handsome monument to his wife's memory, his second marriage is foreshadowed by old Abe, the Hall gardener, who when asked his opinion of the elaborate marble memorial delivers himself of this cryptic verdict: "The cow that bellows loudest after her calf is soonest comforted." The advent of a jealous, petty-minded, albeit pretty, step-mother brings into the Hall a foreign atmosphere of bitterness and tyranny, which leads to many an explosion on the part of the high-spirited girls; and both Joan and her sister welcome the respective opportunities which take them to India. Here, Joan tastes life's supreme joy before a swift tragedy ends the idyll. These pages of family history form a strangely moving story which rivets the reader's sympathy from first to last.

OLIVIA MARY. By E. Maria Albanesi. 6s. (Methuen.)

Madame Albanesi's "Olivia Mary" is an essentially human story. She has taken a handful of extremely natural characters, and, with a plot of the simplest, has woven them into a strong, stirring romance. The heroine is a frail, timid, tender-hearted little widow with an intense love for her only son, which, though he is devoted to his mother, he is unable to understand or appreciate. He is under the impression she is weak and delicate, incapable of deep feeling and needing constant care and attention, whilst all the time she is yearning inwardly for her freedom and wearies of the fetters his masterful affection places upon her. But when at last the secret of her life is disclosed by her malicious nephew, and her beloved son denounces her, she realises that there is no other happiness on earth for her but to be near him always. Throughout she is a pathetic, lovable little figure with a sweet personality that endears her to all those who move within the circle of her sheltered life. A touch of humour, mingled with pathos, is introduced through the optimistic American, Helen

From CONSTABLE'S LIST.

FRÉDÉRIC LOLIÉE'S NEW BOOK.

THE ROMANCE OF A FAVOURITE. Translated from the French of FRÉDÉRIC LOLIÉE by W. MORTON FULLERTON. Demy 8vo. With Photogravure Plates. 10s. 6d. net.

This is the romantic story of the Comtesse de Castiglione, the famous beauty, by the Author of "Le Duc de Morny," "Women of the Second Empire," etc.

"The translation by Mr. W. MORTON FULLERTON, who has succeeded—where so many English translators fail—in giving a faithful rendering of the French text without losing its indefinable literary grace"—Manchester Courier.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

MRS. JANET ROSS'S NEW BOOK.

THE FOURTH GENERATION. Author of "Three Generations of English Women" 12s. 6d. net.

"This exceedingly delightful book"—Daily News and Leader. "There is no end to the delightful things in this book."—Athenæum. "Worth reading . . . will have a permanent interest."—The Times. "From first to last alive with amusing anecdotes."—Standard. "An exceptionally notable and distinguished book."—Bookseller.

MR. A. G. BRADLEY'S NEW BOOK.

THE GATEWAY OF SCOTLAND: or East Lothian, Lammermoor, and the Merse. Illustrated with 8 Coloured Plates and numerous Line Drawings by A. L. COLLINS. 10s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Bradley's excellent book."—Glasgow Evening News. "A beautiful and interesting book."—Publishers' Circular. "Mr. Bradley enlivens his pages with many delightful anecdotes."—Spectator. "Deserves every praise."—Bookseller.

PROF. JAMES SULLY'S NEW BOOK.

ITALIAN TRAVEL SKETCHES. Illustrated by P. NOEL BOXER. 7s. 6d. net.

"These agreeable pen-pictures of Italian life, scenery, history and archæology are superior. The illustrations are good and the style is distinguished."—Athenæum. "Delightful personal impressions of Palermo, Baveno, Terracina, Viterbo, Viareggio. . . . The book is written throughout with knowledge and vision, and its interest is enhanced by an admirable bibliography of works, Italian, German, French, and English, which throw light on the places described in Prof. Sully's wanderings."—Standard.

THE POEMS OF ADAM LINDSAY GORDON.

The only complete Edition of Gordon's Poems yet published, including several poems never before printed. Arranged by DOUGLAS SLADEN, with three sketches of Gordon drawn by himself, and other illustrations. 2s. 6d. net.

A NEW NOVEL BY ROBERT HALIFAX.

Author of "A Whistling Woman," "Low Society," "The Borderland," etc., entitled

"A SLICE OF LIFE."

Crown 8vo. 6s.

Illustrated 6/-

SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE'S

EXTRAORDINARY NOVEL

The Lost World

By Sir Arthur Conan Doyle.

Presentation edition with special illustrations. 10/6 net.

HODDER AND STOUGHTON,
PUBLISHERS, LONDON.

Ambrose, whose one ambition is to gain the confidence of her indolent step-children; and if she does not altogether succeed in the attempt, it cannot be said that her efforts in that direction are entirely futile. With the help of Olivia Mary circumstances are brought to a satisfactory climax, and we are left with a pang of regret that Olivia Mary's own romance cannot end quite so happily.

THE GOLDEN VENTURE. By J. S. Fletcher. 3s. 6d. net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

The paper wrapper of this novel shows a brilliantly coloured airship in flight, with a girl behind the aeronaut. This excites hopes of an elopement through the air, as a modern version of young Lochinvar; the aeroplane is bound to enter sensational fiction, sooner or later, as the motor has already done. But Mr. Fletcher keeps his characters on terra firma. There are villains, but they belong to a commercial syndicate of engineers who are interested in stealing the secret of a new motive-power from a young inventor who has discovered how to construct an airship of unrivalled excellence. How they use the beautiful ward of one of them, how she manages to break away from their control, and how another girl helps to defeat the plot, is Mr. Fletcher's secret, and he has used it to write an exciting story. Probably some of his readers will object that the hero marries the wrong girl. Perhaps some of them will be disappointed that the "Golden Venture" is not more in the air. But, otherwise, the tale is brisk and full of thrills.

ONE OF MARLBOROUGH'S CAPTAINS. By Morice Gerard. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. Morice Gerard has been taken with the fascination that belongs to the personality of the great Duke of Marlborough, and not for the first time in his new story, "One of Marlborough's Captains," does he bring his readers under the same potent spell. Anthony Marston, a gallant gentleman adventurer sets out, keen to see the great Duke and take service under him. "He wanted life, activity, movement, fighting, and to be in the van of it," and it is not long before he is gratifying his wish to the full. Chance brings him to the right place at the right time to save Marlborough and Prince Eugene from the hands of assassins, and from this point on the narrative goes with a swing and gusto that carries the reader with it irresistibly. Marston is dispatched by Marlborough as captain of a small expedition that is to rescue a young and beautiful Baroness from a remote German castle in which she is kept a close prisoner and brutally ill-treated, and in carrying out this dashing enterprise he loses his heart, and love comes into his story to give him trouble and anxieties enough for a time, but happiness at last. It is a stirring, picturesque romance that will delight Mr. Gerard's large circle of admirers and will certainly send new readers to the other books of so vivid and imaginative a writer.

THE MAN AT LONE LAKE. By Virna Sheard. 6s (Cassell.)

"The Man at Lone Lake" is the story of life and love in the wonderful silent land that lies South of Hudson Bay. It is an unconventional romance coloured by the wild beauty stretching around Lone Lake, where Dick Wynn, a young student self-exiled from the world of men, has come to drown and forget his misery in tranquil solitude. He has lost all his youthful dreams and apparently all his chances of happiness. But out in the silent North, on the brink of civilization, he meets a young girl, the daughter of a neighbouring trapper, and there follows an ordinary love affair made extraordinary by unusual circumstances and surroundings; a love affair that is touched with the spirit of adventure, shadowed by dangers, and keeps the reader on tenter-hooks to the end. Not the least charm of the book lies in the author's deep sympathy with those poor dumb creatures that suffer so unnecessarily at the hand of the trapper, and her concise, picturesque style gives an atmosphere to the story which is delightfully fresh and fascinating.

THE ADVENTURES OF NAPOLEON PRINCE. By May Edgington. 6s. (Cassell.)

If you have not already made the acquaintance of Napoleon Prince in the columns of a popular magazine, you will be well advised to do so without delay—and if you have met him already the more permanent form which is now given to his adventures is sure to be attractive to you. For he is a scoundrel of the kind that, to tell the truth, it is almost dangerous to write about, resourceful, generous, and winning. He really does justify his Christian name. With this caveat as to the morality of the book we can recommend it almost unreservedly, though we could wish that the author had taken the very slight trouble to remove some glaring indications of the fact that the adventures originally appeared as a magazine series. It is a little trying to be so frequently reminded, for instance, that the hero's sister always wore high-waisted frocks and dressed her hair à la Josephine. But we have no wish to discourage prospective readers of one of the most vivacious and ingenious collection of stories of high-toned villainy that has ever come our way. Like her hero, Miss Edgington is never at a loss.

THE IRRESISTIBLE MRS. FERRERS. By Arabella Kenealy. 6s (Stanley Paul.)

Lord Lygon has reason to suppose that his wife's love for him has cooled. He is a careless, sporting man of a fairly good type, but he has never taken any trouble with his wife, and, within limits which he is not willing to set himself, he allows her to go her own way. Meanwhile he has fallen under the spell of Mrs. Ferrers, a professional beauty of the kind that is more dangerous in real life than attractive in novels, for she is shallow, none too equably-tempered, and, except in matters of love, rather stupid. These are the three protagonists of a book which contains many carefully-drawn characters. A bare recital of the plot might make it appear that "The Irresistible Mrs. Ferrers" is no more than the average society novel with a more decorous ending than usual. But this is hardly the case. The subject—rather a delicate one—is well and sympathetically treated, while the characterisation, as we have already said, is very good indeed, and carries the novel high above the average level. In some respects it is an unequal novel, and some really illuminating passages must be set against others which show an odd crudity and carelessness; but on the whole the good far outbalances the bad. Miss Arabella Kenealy may be congratulated upon a work of considerable power and distinction.

THE GIRL FROM THE EAST. By David Whitelaw. 6s. (Greening.)

Mr. David Whitelaw is one of those authors who may be relied on to hold the interest of his readers from the first chapter of his books to the last, and "The Girl from the East" is no exception from his rule. In no sense of the word is it great literature—and, in justice to the author, we are sure that he does not imagine that it is—but it is intriguing, wholesome, and entertaining. To get its best effect you should read it at a sitting. It does not call for deep analysis, nor, indeed, for the exercise of much thought of any description, but if you are willing to give way to it you can hardly fail to enjoy it. Sir Christopher Madgwick is an immensely wealthy Anglo-Indian. His past has been shady, but no fault can be found with his devotion for his first wife, for whose sake he has incurred the lasting enmity of an Indian "nationalist." In his own particular way Sani is just as forceful as Sir Christopher, and he is successful in kidnapping the latter's daughter just after her birth. He brings up the girl carefully, and gets her married to an Englishman; but she dies soon after the birth of a daughter. Sani intensifies his revenge by sending this girl to Sir Christopher. The latter promptly alters his will in favour of the granddaughter, who is suspected—with much apparent reason—of having caused his mysterious death. Then—but we are not going to give away any more of Mr. Whitelaw's excellent plot.

WERNER LAURIE'S NEW BOOKS.THE CATHEDRALS OF ROME AND SOUTHERN ITALY.

By T. FRANCIS BUMPUS. With many plates in colour and half-tone. 9 by 6½. Cloth gilt, 16s. net.

This volume completes the set of Italian volumes in the Cathedral Series. The other two (uniform with the above) are "The Cathedrals of Central Italy" and "The Cathedrals of Northern Italy."

WITH GUN AND GUIDE, SPORT AND TRAVEL IN THE WILDS OF NEW BRUNSWICK AND NORTH BRITISH COLUMBIA.

By THOMAS MARTINDALE. Fully Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

THE INDEPENDENCE OF CHILE.

By A. STUART CHISHOLM. Demy 8vo. Fully Illustrated and with Map. 7s. 6d. net.

OSCAR WILDE. Some Reminiscences.

By LEONARD CRESSWELL INGLEBY. With Illustrations and including a picture of Oscar Wilde's Tomb, by JACOB EPSTEIN. Foolscap 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

ANTIQUES AND CURIOS IN OUR HOMES.

By G. M. VALLOIS. With 61 illustrations. 6s. net.

HANDICRAFT FOR HANDY BOYS.

Practical Plans for Work and Play with Many Ideas for Earning Money.

By A. NEELY HALL. With nearly 600 Illustrations and Working-drawings by the Author and Norman P. Hall. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

THE STORY OF HARVEY SINCLAIR.

By GEORGE TRELAWNEY. Author of "In a Cottage Hospital." Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net, picture wrapper.

WERNER LAURIE, LTD., CLIFFORDS INN, LONDON.

FROM HOLDEN AND HARDINGHAM'S LISTBy LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE

Author of "The Court of the Tuileries"

REPUBLICAN FRANCE: 1870—1912

Her Presidents, Statesmen, Policy, Vicissitudes and Social Life

Over 500 pages In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 12s 6d net

With Nine Portraits on art paper, and a photograph frontispiece.

This work, which has been in preparation for some years, is the most elaborate and important that the author has attempted. His long residence in France and his relations with many distinguished Frenchmen enables him to give here a greater amount of information than will be found in any similar book. It will appeal both to readers of lighter literature and to students of history, for on one hand it contains a great variety of amusing anecdotes, and on the other it embodies a full record of French statesmanship and policy.

GEORGE BARR McCUTCHEON'S New NovelTHE HUSBANDS OF EDITH

Cr. 8vo, cloth, with artistic coloured wrapper, 3/- net

By the Author of "Brewster's Millions."

A FINE BOOK FOR BOYSA BOUNTY BOY

By FRANK T. BULLEN

In cloth bevelled boards and gilt edges, with Frontispiece 3/6

CRUIKSHANK REFLECTIONS

With 85 full-page plates by Geo. Cruikshank.

"Most interesting."—Glasgow Evening Times.

"Letterpress as entertaining as the great humorist's sketches."—Scotsman.

"First-rate entertainment."—Dundee Advertiser.

"Fun and wisdom."—Nottingham Daily Express.

In cloth gilt, 2/- net. Coloured picture wrapper, 1/- net.

A NEW FULL-LENGTH NOVEL

By KATHLYN RHODES

FAIRY GOLD

By the Author of "Flower of Grass," "Desert Dreamers," etc. 6/-

Admirers of the late Allen Raine's works will appreciate this Novel

THE WOOING OF MIFANWY A Welsh Love Story

By EDITH C. KENYON

Author of "The Hand of His Brother," etc. 6/-

MAY CROMMELIN'S New NovelTHE GOLDEN BOW

By the Author of "Lovers on the Green," etc. 6/-

By THE HON. MRS. JULIAN BYNG BARRIERS

A Powerful and Moving Story of Anglo-Indian Life

By KATE HELEN WESTON

Author of "The Partners."

THE MAN MACDONALDPIERRE COSTELLO'S Great Novel TAINTED LIVES

By DOROTHY MARGARET STUART
ST. LÔ: A Romance of the Fifteenth Century 6/-

A Novel of the type of Jane Austen

OLD FRIENDS AND NEW FACES

An imaginary sequel to the novels of Jane Austen

By SYBIL BRINTON 6/-

This fine novel is believed to be a most successful attempt at picturing incidents in the after-lives of some of the characters of Jane Austen's novels. Many of the personages named will be recognized as "old friends" from the famous authoress's works.

By THE COUNT DE SOISSONSMY SENTIMENTAL ANCESTRESS

In this romance, which is full of striking incidents, the author compares the state of France during the early phases of the Great Revolution with that of this country at the present day. Whilst telling an interesting story, he holds that Revolution may ensue here, even as it did in France, from lack of firm statesmanship. This book is more than a novel: it is also a lesson and a warning for the times in which we live.

AN OUTSTANDING SUCCESS

By MISS CLOTILDE GRAVES

("RICHARD DEHAN")

With 16 full-page Illustrations by Maurice Greiffenhagen.

MAIDS IN A MARKET GARDEN

In crown 8vo, handsome cloth gilt, 3/6 net.

This charming novel has proved to be one of the author's most successful. Many large editions have been sold besides the special editions for the United States of America and for Canada.

The World says: "It is refreshing in its fun, and most enjoyable. Its living pictures are gems of humour."

The Athenaeum says: "Exceedingly beautiful illustrations."

HOLDEN AND HARDINGHAM, ADELPHI.

READERS OUT OF REACH

of a good local bookseller, or who live abroad, are asked to write direct to London for their books, which will be sent by return of post, at lowest cash prices, on receipt of remittance with order.

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there, thus saving postage.

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications.

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp. of Standard Literature.
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 Titles of Publishers' Remainders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices.
3. Colonial Librarian's Handbook, indispensable to Librarians outside Europe, with complete list of Colonial Editions, etc., etc.
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals.

ESTABLISHED
1851

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

18-19 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone: 7463 Central.

Bankers: London County & Westminster (Lombard Street).

THE KEYNOTE. By Alphonse de Chateaubriant. Translated by Lady Theodora Davidson. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The charm of this book lies in its utter simplicity—its entire lack of affectation; there is no "pandering to the elemental passions," no obvious striving after effect, yet it gains an irresistible effect from its simple naturalness. Under the title of "Monsieur des Lourdines" it has already enjoyed a brilliant success in France and won for its author the Prix Goncourt. Love, Lady Theodora Davidson explains in her preface, is the keynote of the book and is accountable for the title. Yet it is by no means a conventional love story, being just the tale of a simple-hearted man's intense love for his only son, which cannot be destroyed even when that son brings down ruin upon his father's head and causes his mother's untimely death. The deep emotions which subdue the two men before the final reconciliation is made Monsieur Alphonse de Chateaubriant describes with profound sympathy, and he shows a deep knowledge of human nature in the subtle power with which he has presented his characters. There is not much doubt that "The Keynote," with its quiet beauty, its pathos and poetry, will appeal to readers over here as forcibly as it has done already to those in the land of its origin.

THE MARRIAGE OF KETTLE. By C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne. 6s. (Heinemann.)

The only quarrel we have with Mr. Hyne is that the gentle captain is not married. The book closes with McTodd teasing Kettle and Miss Dubbs. "Three o'clock in the morning, and the skipper courting his girl. 'Oh, silver moon and Afric's stars, you've much to answer for!' G. R. Tennyson wrote that, and I've aye thought it one of his finest poems. Man, but flirting like this is a terrible example to some of the ship's company. Me, for instance." It is only fair to say that Kettle is not in the amorous mood throughout the book. It is war rather than love which stirs the irascible little gentleman, and Mr. Hyne is not prepared to worship probabilities if he can give the captain a good time, even among the Berbers, whom he outwits practically single handed. The Italians in Tripoli would be the better of Kettle. So would any ship afflicted with insubordinate or lazy crews. At the same time, the captain does not always come off victor, and indeed it is his defeat by two rascals at Liverpool which is the means of throwing him into the society of the afore-said Miss Dubbs. The great McTodd is on the scene, of course, as a foil and coadjutor. But it is Kettle himself who makes the book, and his admirers may be assured he has not lost the use of tongue or limbs, not even in the shadow of matrimony.

WINDYRIDGE. By W. Riley. 6s. (Herbert Jenkins.)

"Windyridge" is a new book by a new author from a new publisher, and it hardly seems possible that any novel could be newer than that. But it has a certain freshness of subject and treatment, too, to make its newness something more than a superficial gloss. Although the publisher's note on the wrapper speaks of "Mr." Riley, one suspects from internal evidence that the author is of the other sex; the men in the book are a woman's men; the gentle sentiment of the story and its whole outlook upon humanity are essentially feminine. Grace Holden, alone in the world, wearied of the city, hears "the call of the heather," and answering it goes away into Yorkshire, lights on a delightfully quaint little village, finds an ideal cottage to let in it, takes the cottage for a year and settles down to carry on business there as a photographer. The sketches of village life and character are very good, and if the old farmers, the kindly old squire, the quaint, motherly, old soul who is Grace's neighbour, the pathetic man who is her first customer, the finely honourable barrister whom Grace dubs "the Cynic," and most of the other people of the tale are a more idyllic community than one generally encounters on this sinful earth they are admirably in keeping with the sweetness and quiet charm of the whole story. For the story has an atmosphere and a curious charm of its own that are not easy to define; there is a sort of dream-magic about it; a delicate, lavender-like fragrance; and the love romance that finds Grace and stays with her at last wears the same sober, pretty colours, breathes the same subdued, pleasant music. The people in the novel, the pathos and joy of their simple experiences, the little bits of homely philosophy—these are the things that make the book not only readable but enjoyable, so that it lingers in your mind when you have done like the gracious memory of a midsummer night's dream of idyllic men and women you have never met and never hope to meet, but would be glad to.

The Bookman's Table.

FINDLE WAKES: A Play in Four Acts. By Stanley Houghton. (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

This is the fourth play that Mr. Stanley Houghton, who is still a young man, has published. It is his most serious effort, and a distinct advance on his earlier work. So far, all his work has been done for the Manchester Repertory Theatre, for which he has depicted the every day life of ordinary Manchester people. He makes no attempt to elaborate a plot, nor are any of the incidents in his plays at all exciting. But his characters are all living persons, no mere puppets, and because of that he is a real dramatist. He endeavours to see things as they are, he is not afraid of the truth, but does not probe very deep, he sees no poetry in life, but on the other hand, he does not find it altogether tragic or merely sordid and ugly. One feels always in reading his work that a younger man would find more poetry in life, and that an older would perceive brighter lights and deeper shadows. His rich men, who have made their money do not know how to spend it, and still less how to bring up their sons, the sons who fancy themselves broad-minded, lack strength of character, which can only be developed by some self-imposed discipline. The moral of this story, which is very simple and direct, will commend itself to the modern orthodox man, though he will absolutely and unhesitatingly condemn the action and point of view of the heroine. The father tries to do the right thing by his friend, and the son is forced to yield and prepared to pay the price; and though actual payment is not demanded, the son has been taught a lesson which he will not forget. This play deserves a place on the stage, and so is worth preservation, but it cannot be considered as a work of literature.

CAMEOS OF INDIAN CRIME. By B. H. Hervey. 12s. 6d. net. (Stanley Paul & Co.)

Paget, M.P., will not like such a book as "Cameos of Indian Crime": it will be far too outspoken for him. Moreover it happens to be written by a man who ought to know what he is talking about, since he has spent thirty-five years in India, mainly as a Civil Servant. Mr. Hervey, indeed, has a way of stating his opinions and of citing his experiences, which seems to suggest that he, unlike a certain great political thinker, would feel no hesitation at all about drawing up an indictment against a whole nation. Take the crime of lying, and the author delivers himself to the following effect: "Not one Hindoo in a thousand has any conception of or respect for the truth." In speaking of a certain offence against sexual ethics, he is quite as sweeping in his charges. Poisoning again, according to Mr. Hervey, "is a very common crime in India: all classes resort to it when revenge has to be satiated, a score to be paid off, or anyone obnoxious to be got out of the way." Thus prepared, we are not surprised to learn that "intoxication prevails to a great extent among Hindoos," that every Indian domestic servant is a thief, that "the crime of extortion is very rife among the natives of India," or that "India is par excellence the land of bribery"; and when, as a kind of counterblast

FROM DENTS' LIST

40 NEW VOLUMES ADDED TO

EVERYMAN'S LIBRARY

SEND FOR ANNOTATED CATALOGUE POST FREE.

'TWIXT LAND AND SEA

By JOSEPH CONRAD. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE CHILDREN OF LIGHT

By FLORENCE CONVERSE, author of the "House of Prayer." Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE ADVENTURES OF MISS GREGORY

PERCEVAL GIBBON. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RUSKIN

By ANDRE CHEVRILLON. Translated by ANDREW BOYLE. Large Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

CHAUCEER

By EMILE LEGOUIS. Translated by L. LAILAVOIX. Small Demy 8vo. 5s. net.

The LAST LEGITIMATE KING OF FRANCE

By PHŒBE ALLEN. With Illustrations. Medium 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

THE MASTERS OF PAST TIME

By EUGENE FROMENTIN. Translated by ANDREW BOYLE. With several coloured and half-tone illustrations. Medium 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

DANTE AND THE MYSTICS

By E. G. GARDNER, M.A. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

ASPECTS OF ALGERIA:

Historical—Pictorial—Colonial

By ROY DEVEREUX. With Illustrations. Square Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

STUDIES AND APPRECIATIONS:

A Volume of Essays

By DARRELL FIGGIS. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

TRIANGULAR CRICKET

By E. H. D. SEWELL. With Illustrations. 5s. net.

Send for Illustrated Catalogue. Also Special Prospectus for Children's New Books.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd., 28, Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

SOME GOOD NOVELS

THE STREETS OF ASCALON

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS, author of "The Common Law." Illustrated by Charles Dana Gibson. 441 pages. 6s.

A new full length society novel.

THE PRICE SHE PAID: The Story of a Woman's Struggle

By DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS, author of "The Husband's Story."

In a powerful and dramatic story the author tells how the heroine "paid the price" of a marriage for money.

THE SINS OF THE FATHER

By THOMAS DIXON, author of "The Clanman." With 16 full-page Illustrations

A romance of the South dealing in vivid fashion with a complicated sex question. The Scotsman says "The Sins of the Father" is sure to be widely read."

THE DEPARTMENT STORE

By MARGARET BOHME

A novel of to-day. A powerful and vivid picture of life in the great department shop.

THE FAVOUR OF KINGS

By M. H. BRADLEY

The romantic story of Anne Boleyn and Henry VIII.

APPLETONS

LONDON

NEW BOOKS OF INTEREST.

THE TRAVELS OF ELLEN CORNISH.

Being the Memoir of a Pilgrim of Science.

By VAUGHAN CORNISH, B.Sc., F.R.G.S.

Fcap. 4to. With plates, maps and plans. 12/6 net.

A record of visits to Japan—The Niagara Falls—The Panama Canal Works—and Jamaica during the great Earthquake. The illustrations are from photographs by Dr. Cornish.

WEST INDIAN FAIRY TALES.

By GERTRUDE SHAW.

Illustrated by H. J. Stock, R.I. 16mo. 3/6 net.

The native characteristics and local scenery of British Guiana from the background of these New Fairy Tales, which are written with a simplicity and reality which will appeal to the mind of the child.

A CONVERSATIONAL TOUR IN AMERICA.

By E. H. LACON WATSON.

Impl. 16mo. 5/- net.

There is a fund of amusement in the author's experiences and impressions in this interesting record of a trip through the States and in Canada.

ALGIERS, THE SAHARA AND THE NILE.

By RACHEL HUMPHREYS.

Impl. 16mo. Illustrated. 5/- net.

The lighter side of the many things to be noted by the traveller in North Africa are recorded by the author. The book is full of bright and amusing comments on places and people, and is well illustrated from original photographs.

REMINISCENCES OF A BLACKWALL MIDSHIPMAN.

By W. I. DOWNIE.

Crown 8vo. With frontispiece. 3/6 net.

"It is a genuine piece of good work, and in its breeziness and straight good fellowship, we can understand something of those light-hearted, careless, irresponsible days."—Naval and Military Record.

THE RIVER RHYMER.

By J. ASHBY-STERRY.

Fcap. 8vo. 3/6 net.

A new volume of verse by Mr. Ashby-Sterry, which treats exclusively of the Thames. It comprises sketches in song of the places, people and life from the source in Trewsbury Mead to the Buoy at the Nore.

NOTABLE NEW NOVELS.

WRITTEN IN THE SAND.

6/-

By J. R. DUVAL.

"Rich with light, life, and Southern Colour, and a new love story. Truth."

"The romance of the Sahara."—N. Y. Herald, Paris.

WINDFRINT VIRGIN.

6/-

By WILKINSON SHERREN.

THE GIRDLE OF KAF.

6/-

By CORA MINNETT.

THE BRENTONS.

6/-

By ANNA CHAPIN RAY.

DETAINED BY THE KING.

6/-

By ARTHUR MALTBY.

SUNSET.

6/-

By MRS. DONALD SHAW.

MANAGEMENT.

6/-

By MARIA S. STEUART.

MAGGIE PEPPER.

6/-

By CHARLES KLEIN.

GURTH.

6/-

By CAPTAIN J. W. GAMBEIR.

LONDON:

W. J. HAM-SMITH, 6 JOHN STREET, ADELPHI

to this rather comprehensive attack on our fellow subjects in India, we are told that the drunkenness, violence, and incontinence of Anglo-Indians, civil and military, are largely responsible for the decline of respect for the white man, which of recent years has been so observable among the natives, we can only assume that in this matter, too, Mr. Hervey speaks with authority. In any case, his stories, grim and humorous alike, are as admirable as they are numerous, and his book ought to save the young Oxford or Cambridge man going out to India many and many a rupee.

TANNHÄUSER AND THE MASTER SINGERS OF NUREMBERG. By A. L. Cleather and Basil Crump. 2s. 6d. (Methuen & Co.)

This is the fourth volume of the series of handbooks in which these authors set out not merely to tell the story of Wagner's operas themselves, but to cull, in amplification, from the composer's voluminous writings whatever will assist towards their full appreciation. We are probably still too near to him in point of time to form a just estimate of the debt under which Wagner has laid the whole art of music, but it is certain that the stone which he threw into the pool, upwards of fifty years ago, is still sending out ever-widening circles of influence. Some knowledge of how he came to throw it, and of how he foresaw the ripples it would create cannot fail therefore to be interesting to those whom they have reached. However it may be with the elect few, the percentage of patrons listening from their seats at Covent Garden (or elsewhere for that matter) to "Tannhäuser" and "The Master-Singers," who know that the second was written as a sort of jovial pendant to the first is probably small. For them, this handbook should redouble their interest. The parallel between the two works is drawn from Wagner's own letters. The reader is gently led to a realization of the fact that each is a different expression of the same mental state: that the main themes of both are in many respects concurrent. Here is food for speculation for the student and the dilettante alike. It is impossible in a short notice to do more than thus indicate the lines of comparative analysis followed with success by the writers. For the rest one must be content with the bare record that each opera is treated in two sections, labelled respectively "Introduction" and "the Drama," and that the easy-running style in which the studies are written and the clarity with which leitmotifs are isolated make their assimilation a matter of pleasure even for the general reader.

MEMORIALS OF OLD NOTTINGHAMSHIRE. Edited by Everard L. Guilford, M.A. 15s. net. (George Allen & Co., Ltd.)

"Memorials of Old Nottinghamshire" is an addition to a well-known and most useful series, which is singularly complete in its survey, and in all essential respects most admirable. The general editor, Mr. Everard L. Guilford, writes with authority on historical Nottinghamshire and on the connection of the county with the Civil War. Mr. Harry Gill devotes himself in the most interesting fashion to the spires and to the low side windows of Nottinghamshire, which latter he explains as originally constructed for the purpose of timing the ringing of the sacring bell. Mr. A. Hamilton Thompson discourses learnedly on Mediæval Church Architecture, leaving the Rev. J. Charles Cox to take for his themes Newstead Priory and other religious houses, and the Forest of Sherwood. Mr. John Russell tackles Nottinghamshire poets in a pleasant chapter, that deals with bards of such varying merit and style as Byron, Kirke White, Philip James Bailey, and Henry Constable. Mr. Aymer Vallance has some most interesting things to say about the roads, screens, and lofts of the county, while to Mr. Frank E. Burton is allotted the evidently congenial task of describing the coinage of the old Nottingham the

GODOY: THE QUEEN'S FAVOURITE. By Edmund B. d'Auvergne. Illustrated. 16s. net. (Stanley Paul & Co.)

So much of romance entered into the career of Manuel Godoy that any capably written history of the man and his times must have a popular interest that would carry it into the hands of the general reader; and Mr. d'Auvergne's "Godoy: The Queen's Favourite," is written very capably indeed. Godoy first appeared in Madrid as an impecunious officer in the Spanish army; he won the favour of the Princess who was presently to become Queen, and of her husband, and he rose rapidly in eminence and power until he held the highest office under the Crown, and in the stirring days of the great Napoleon played a large part in directing the destinies of his country. As Mr. d'Auvergne says, he "obtained his power ignobly, but he used it well." He was a patriotic and far-seeing statesman; but as a Court favourite he had few friends and many enemies. If he looked after his own interests, he never neglected Spain's, and his downfall was more of a catastrophe for his nation than it was for himself, though probably none of his contemporaries recognised this. Mr. d'Auvergne has done good service in getting together a certain amount of new material concerning the career of Godoy, and in clearly vindicating the name of a notable Spaniard, whose public life was worthy, though his private life had often to be talked about in whispers. It is a book worth reading, for it is none the less good history for being good romance.

CÆSAR BORGIA. A Study of the Renaissance. By John Leslie Garner. 12s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

We are glad to say that Mr. Garner's book is a real contribution to our knowledge of the Italian Renaissance era. It will not minister to those diseased minds which batten upon unedifying tittle-tattle, but the general reader as well as the student will find it in every way an illuminating volume. Mr. Garner's wide knowledge of history is seen to advantage in an introduction of forty pages which he devotes to a rapid review of the Italian Renaissance wherein he points out that it was something more than a revival in literature and the graphic arts. He also surveys the prominent characteristics of the Latin race, and emphasises the importance of understanding the conditions in the peninsula before and during the Renaissance. Failing this, it is quite impossible to comprehend how such monsters as Sixtus IV. and Alexander VI. could have been elected to the chair of St. Peter. It would be unfair to the author to say that he has sat down to whitewash Cæsar Borgia. He has merely demonstrated the futility of judging him by our modern standard of ethics. Machiavelli, it will be remembered, held Cæsar up as a pattern, in all but his ill-fortune, to him who would attempt to form a united kingdom of Italy. Clever and versatile, in diplomacy and warfare well skilled, he had in a high degree the quality of "virtu"—the combination of force and intellect—which was so dear to the Italian heart, to Machiavelli, Communes, and to other writers of the day. In Macaulay's essay on Machiavelli he devotes to Cæsar Borgia a characteristic paragraph which concludes by saying that he fell at last "amidst the mingled curses and regrets of a people of whom his genius had been the wonder, and might have been the salvation." Such, we think, is the attitude Mr. Garner has adopted in his excellent monograph.

CHARLES DICKENS. By W. H. Helm. 2s. 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

This is the latest addition to the admirable "Regent Library," and must be the stoutest volume in the series. It runs to nearly five hundred and fifty pages, and for its artistic get-up and the value of its contents, is certainly a miracle of cheapness. All the books of Dickens have been laid under contribution, and Mr. Helm has extracted from them a delightful miscellany of readings, each of which, with the concise note that precedes it, makes a story complete in itself. Four of Dickens's poems are included; there is a useful calendar of the principal events in his life, a collection of Appreciations by famous authors, a bibliography, and an index. The latter is not so full as

READY SHORTLYTHE BEST OFA. C. BENSONIN ONE VOLUME

THE BEAUTY OF LIFE

From the Writings of
ARTHUR C. BENSON

Compiled by CAROLINE ABBOTT DERBY

"The Beauty of Life" is an anthology compiled from Mr. Benson's famous and ever popular books, arranged in the form of daily readings. It combines with his exquisite descriptions of nature, arranged according to their appropriate seasons of the year, his wide outlook on life in general; and it is felt that it will be a book eagerly welcomed by those who already care for his writings, and will lead others who are not yet intimate with them to a knowledge of his delightful books.

Price 6s. net

Hodder & Stoughton, Publishers, London, E.C.

Note the pull-out writing bed

Another important feature about this desk is that it can be used as a table when closed.

Globe-Wernicke Roll Top Desks

When you want a high-roll top desk, or a low-roll top desk, or any other kind of desk, you should visit the Globe-Wernicke Showrooms or send for the special catalogue devoted to desks (No. 18 D). We have over fifty styles of desks to offer—two of which are illustrated on this page. Style No. 1633, shown above, is very popular with those who prefer a low desk. It gives one a clear view of the room and the pull-out writing bed is useful when one wants to examine plans, maps, drawings and large papers, etc. Altogether this is a very compact little desk; it is well finished and can be had in either quartered oak or mahogany as desired.

Style No. 1643, shown at foot, is a high-roll top desk suitable for those who like to have plenty of pigeon holes and filing boxes. It is fully described in the catalogue—No. 18 D—a copy of which will be sent to any address on application.

Packing Free.—Orders of £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,

44, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.
82, VICTORIA STREET, S.W. 98, BISHOPSGATE, E.C.

The world's best Pencil.

The man who is in the habit of paying his penny or two-pence for a pencil is apt to regard the "Koh-i-noor" at fourpence as an extravagance—until he tries a "Koh-i-noor." After that nothing but a "Koh-i-noor" will do.

The "Koh-i-noor" is the world's best pencil. It writes better than other pencils, contains no grit, does not snap in use, and out-lasts six of the common kind. Try one to-day.

4d. each or 3s. 6d. per dozen.
In 17 degrees (and copying).
Of Stationers, &c. List free.
L. & C. HARDMUTH, Ltd.,

Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway,
London (Paris, Brussels, Dresden, Zurich, Milan, Vienna, Barcelona, New York).

Maria Luisa.

From "Godoy: The Queen's Favourite," by Edmund B. d'Auvergne (Stanley Paul).

it might be, but it refers to all the best known portraits. Mr. Helm has done his work carefully and well. He is an enthusiast, but not a blind one as his discriminating introduction sufficiently indicates. He touches on Dickens's sins of exaggeration, and mentions certain characters as "not merely improbable, but impossible," and counts Micawber, Jingle and the Marchioness among these. Here we think he errs, for the present writer has known these people in the flesh, Micawber in particular. Dickens's characters are seldom normal, but most of them have their counterparts in real life, and hardly any of them are really caricatures, though they may seem so to such of us as have never met their like. Otherwise, Mr. Helm's Introduction is an adequate and sound piece of work, and his selections from Dickens make up a representative and thoroughly entertaining volume.

THE BOW-WOW BOOK. By Coulson Kernahan. With Illustrations by Lawson Wood and L. Raven Hill. 2s 6d. net. (Nisbet.)

To those who only know Mr. Coulson Kernahan on his serious side "The Bow-Wow Book" will come as a surprise. It is one of the most irresponsible of humorous miscellanies—a book of nonsense, rhymes and farcical stories, quips, and whims and oddities, and whimsical dissertations on dogs and their ways, and the ways of those who associate with them. There are some delightfully amusing testimonials to the merits or demerits of the book, supposed to have been received from Mr. Clement Shorter, Mr. Bottomley, Mr. Silas K. Hocking, Sims, Shaw, and other celebrities, in which the author cleverly and quaintly parodies the style of the reputed writers of them, hitting off their little weaknesses of thought and style without malice, but with a nicety and gentle satire that are almost sinful. None but a dog-lover could so fully enter into the humour of his subject; and none but a dog-lover could have so fine and keen a sympathy with it, too. In "Only a Dog," and "A Dog in the Pulpit," Mr. Kernahan turns aside from jesting to write a poem and an essay, in which all the pathos of those dumb lives is very understandingly and beautifully unveiled. These two things should have a place in every Dog Anthology; they are little masterpieces in their kind. But the keynote of the book is laughter, and it is hardly necessary to say that the illustrations of Mr. Lawson Wood catch the whole spirit of it. Look at his dejected poodle arrested on a charge of resembling Mr. Hall Caine; or his drawing of Mr. Lloyd George robbing a hen-roost—the portrait of the Chancellor is perfect, and the smile on his face is a pure joy. This is one of the most amusing and should prove one of the most popular of Christmas books.

Notes on New Books.

MR. J. W. ARROWSMITH.

Mr. Arrowsmith knows what the public likes, as witness his great success with "Three Men and a Boat," "Called Back," etc. In My Dog and I (1s), written and illustrated by Gerald Sidney, he caters for the public which laughed so heartily over "We Three and Troddles." Mr. Sidney's book strikes us as in its way, even more funny than Mr. Androm's. As in "We Three and Troddles," the fun is sometimes forced and occasionally hoisterous, but Mr. Sidney has a genuine sense of humour, as is shown by his shrewd "asides." "My Dog and I" bubbles over with high spirits, and for those who love fun of the "knock-about" order the book will have many attractions.

MESSRS. MURRAY & EVENDEN.

Rather more than a century ago the English novel was in a somewhat parlous case. To its brilliant beginnings by Fielding and Richardson succeeded that strange epoch of tales of terror and wonder from which by a curious fate developed both the Waverley Novels and the "penny dreadful." It is to the second branch of this family tree that we must trace Cairn Lodge, by Antoine Le Burovski, which may be fairly described as a "two-shilling dreadful." From this description the reader will not be surprised to learn that "Cairn Lodge" is "an old grey house far away from cities and the busy haunts of men, enshrouded by a wind-swept colony of sycamores." This unprepossessing mansion was inhabited by Mr. Flanders and his daughter Kate. Then, to use the characteristic language of the author, "a guest had arrived at Cairn Lodge, in the person of Leonora Redmayne," for the purpose, apparently, of mitigating the horrors of her old schoolfellow's existence. Mr. Flanders may be described briefly as an aged inebriate and satyr, who had killed his wife and made his daughter's life an inferno. In a moment of uncontrolled and justifiable anger Kate Flanders all but vindicates, by homicide, the insult to her friend. But poetic justice is done. The satyr is certified to have died of alcoholic excess, and the burning of Cairn Lodge at once precludes the defilement of the injured mother's grave and destroys the will that would have robbed the daughter of her inheritance. Only one adjective can do justice to the book—it is lurid.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL & CO.

Lovers of the sensational will find full measure of their favourite literary fare in Mrs. Charlotte Cameron's A Durbar Bride (6s.), a thoroughly readable piece of fiction, which contains a good deal more "human interest" than is at once apparent from its title. When all is said, however, the book is noteworthy chiefly on account of its trimmings—the Durbar, of which the author gives an effective account, high society in England and India, the delights of a voyage on a P. & O. liner. The book goes with a swing, and it contains some very well-drawn characters.

Mrs. Maule M. Holbach is an ardent worshipper at the shrine of King Richard; she very nearly idolises him, of which In the Footsteps of Richard Cœur de Lion (16s. net) bears witness. The first part of the volume—the story of King Richard's life—shows that the author has a complete, if somewhat rose-coloured, understanding of the character of her hero, and, moreover, that she has made a careful study of the leading authorities upon the events of his reign, of which she presents the reader with a clear and concise account. The second part is devoted to a description of the more important Continental towns connected with the name of Richard as they are at the present day, and embodies notes upon many attractive, but unfrequented, towns in France, Austria, and Germany, in addition to chapters upon Cyprus and Palestine. A number of excellent illustrations add to the attractions of a worthy and painstaking piece of work.

Messrs. Methuen's New Books

- BUBBLES OF THE FOAM. By F W BAIN, Author of 'The Dignity of the Moon' Fcap 8vo 3s 6d net
- A MISCELLANY OF MEN. By G K CHESTERTON, Fcap 8vo, Gilt top 5s
- THIS AND THAT. By HILAIRE BELLOC Fcap. 8vo, Gilt top 5s
- THE ARMOURER AND HIS CRAFT. By CHARLES FFOULKES With numerous Diagrams and 32 Plates Royal 4to, Gilt top 42s net
- FINE BOOKS. By ALFRED W POLLARD With 2 Photo gravures and 38 Plates in Collotype Wide Royal 8vo Gilt top 25s net
- MY OWN TIMES. By LADY DOROTHY NEVILL Edited by her Son. With a Frontispiece in Colour and other Illustrations Demy 8vo 15s net
- SIXTY YEARS OF A SOLDIER'S LIFE. By Major General SIR ALFRED L TURNER KCB With 2 Illustrations Demy 8vo 12s 6d net
- LETTERES DE MADAME DU DEFFAND À HORACE WALPOLE. Edited from the originals with Introduction Notes and Index, by Mrs PAGET TOWNELL In 3 Volumes. Demy 8vo 63s. net
- BYRON. By ETHEL COLBURN MAYNE With 18 Illustrations In 2 Volumes Demy 8vo 21s net
- THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF THE CONDÉS (1530-1740) By H NOLL WILLIAMS Author of 'The Fascinating Duc de Richelieu' With a Frontispiece in Photogravure and 16 other Illustrations Demy 8vo 15s net
- WILLIAM THE SILENT. By JACK COLLINGS SQUIRE, B.A. With 12 Illustrations Demy 8vo 10s 6d net
- A BOOK OF FAMOUS WITS. By WALTER JEKROLD With 12 Illustrations Demy 8vo 7s 6d net
- THE BRAVEST OF THE BRAVE: Michael Ney, Marshal of France. By A HILLIARD AITRIDGE With 8 Illustrations and 8 Maps Demy 8vo 10s 6d net
- THE ENTHUSIASTS OF PORT ROYAL. By LILIAN RIA With 12 Illustrations Demy 8vo 10s 6d net
- SAPPHO AND THE ISLAND OF LESBOS. By MARY MILLS FAIRICK Ph.D. Author of 'Sappho Empress and Great Sappho' With many Illustrations Fcap 8vo 3s 6d net
- UNITED ITALY. By F M UNDERWOOD With 20 Illustrations Demy 8vo 10s 6d net
- THE LASCARIDS OF NICAËA: The Story of an Empire in Exile. By ALICE GARDNER Lecturer and formerly Fellow of Newnham College Cambridge With 6 Illustrations and a Map Crown 8vo 7s 6d net
- THE MALTHUSIAN LIMIT. A Theory of a Possible Static Condition for the Human Race. By EDWARD ISAACSON Crown 8vo 3s 6d net
- PERFECT HEALTH FOR WOMEN AND CHILDREN. By ELIZABETH SLOAN CHISSER M.D. Ch.B. Crown 8vo 3s 6d net
- HOW TO PLAY GOLF. By HARRY VARDON With 48 Illustrations Crown 8vo 5s net
- A WANDERER IN FLORENCE. By I V LUCAS, Author of 'A Wanderer in London' With 16 Illustrations in Colour by HARRY MORLEY 38 other Illustrations and a Map Crown 8vo 6s
- SIBERIA. By M HILLIERS PRICE With Map Demy 8vo 7s 6d net
- THE CITIES OF LOMBARDY. By EDWARD HUTTON, Author of 'The Cities of Umbria' With 12 Illustrations in Colour by MAXWELL ARMFIELD 12 other Illustrations and a Map Crown 8vo 6s
- PROVENCE AND LANGUEDOC By CHIL HEADLAM, M.A. With 16 Illustrations and a Map Demy 8vo 10s 6d net
- THE INDIAN SCENE. By J A SLANDER Crown 8vo 3s 6d net.
- MODERN PROBLEMS. By SIR OLIVER LODGE F.R.S. Crown 8vo 5s net
- WERWOLVES. By LILLIOTT O'DONNELL Author of 'Some Haunted Houses of England and Wales' Crown 8vo 5s net
- MANY CARGOES. By W W JACOBS With 16 Illustrations in Colour by MAURICE GREIFENHAGEN Wide Demy 8vo 7s. 6d net.

SIX FINE NOVELS.

Crown 8vo 6s. each

- LONDON LAVENDER (3) E. V. Lucas
- THE HEATHER MOON (3) C. N. and A. M. Williamson
- THE ANGLO INDIANS (4) Alice Perrin
- LAMORNA (2) Mrs. A. Sidgwick
- THE STREET CALLED STRAIGHT (3) Author of "The Wild Olive"
- SALLY (3) Dorothea Conyers

N.B.—The figure in brackets denotes the number of the edition

METHUEN & Co., Ltd., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S Six-Shilling Fiction.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

THE LOVERS

EDEN PHILLPOTTS

"Mr Phillpotts has a famous style, rich and generous and his moor draws the best out of him. His pictures of nature are singularly vivid and delectable"—Athenæum

THE TRUSTEE

HAROLD BINDLOSS

"The author's description of climate scenery, conditions manners and characters have, however, the impress of reality. They form a vigorous and truthful picture of a section of Canada in the Making."—Scotsman.

VIOLET DUNSTAN

L. G. MOBERLY

"Every page of Miss L G Moberly's latest novel is pervaded with the brisk business-like air of the author of experience the plot moves merrily and the interest never flags."—Daily Telegraph

SEAFORD'S SNAKE

BERTRAM MITFORD

"Quite as strenuous and exciting as anything Mr. Mitford has written. A most readable and engrossing book"

HER MARRIAGE LINES

MARIE C. LEIGHTON

"Miss Leighton's inventive faculties seem a most inexhaustible and again provide the reader with an exciting and absorbing narrative."—Financial Times

MIRABEL'S ISLAND

LOUIS TRACY

"It is in truth a brilliant tale the plot most cleverly developed in Mr Tracy's happiest vein and the reader will be loth to lay it down until the end is reached."—Court Journal

The PEOPLE of the RIVER

EDGAR WALLACE

"Mr Wallace brings out with a remarkably realistic touch the grim humour the pathos and the tragedy of uncivilised Africa."

THE OPEN DOOR

FRED M. WHITE

"To those who relish an engrossing tale for its own sake its liveliness of incident and sweeping rush of action 'The Open Door' will come as a real treat."—Sussex Daily News.

THOSE OTHER DAYS

E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM

"Where he is handling mysteries Mr Oppenheim is unsurpassed and he certainly has the knack of handling the commonplace in a fresh and interesting manner."—Scotsman.

New Nature Book

By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS

The FEET of the FURTIVE

"Under the guidance of Mr. Roberts we have often adventured among the wild beasts of the land and sea; and we hope to do so many times in the future. It is an education not to be missed by those who have the chance. Mr. Roberts loves his wild nature, and his readers, both old and young, should love it with him."—The Athenæum

WARD, LOCK & CO., LTD., LONDON.

NOW READY.

A New Volume of Verse by

E. PAULINE JOHNSON
(Tekahionwake), the great Canadian Poetess.

6/- nett.

FLINT AND FEATHER.

AUTHOR'S FOREWORD

THIS collection of verse I have named Flint and Feather because of the association of ideas. Flint suggests the Redman's weapons of war, it is the arrow tip, the heart quality of mine own people, let it therefore apply to those poems that touch upon Indian life and love. The lyrical verse herein is as a

'Skyward floating feather,
Sailing on summer air'

And yet that feather may be the eagle plume that crests the head of a warrior chief, so both flint and feather bear the hall mark of my Mohawk blood

E. P. J.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,

Mansion House Chambers, 11, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C. Head Office: Toronto, Canada.

AN EXCELLENT WORK ON A CRITICAL PERIOD IN CANADIAN HISTORY,

ANNEXATION, PREFERENTIAL TRADE AND RECIPROCITY.

By CEPHAS D. ALLIN, M.A., LL.B., Assistant Professor of Political Science in the University of Minnesota, and GEORGE M.
JONES, B.A., English and History Master in Humbuside Collegiate Institute, Toronto.

Works of an historical nature are rare in Canada, and, such is the condition of scholarship in the country, that only occasionally does a volume come from the Press that possesses outstanding merit. Of this book it may be said that it is one of the few really important historical treatises that have ever appeared in Canada. It deals exhaustively with the period during the late forties of the nineteenth century, when annexation was generally regarded as the only solution of Canada's commercial difficulties. The two authors have examined all the authorities of the period with the utmost discrimination and have compiled a bulky volume—that is the last word on the subject. The book has considerable significance at the present time, as Canada has recently passed through an experience of somewhat similar import. To those who take an interest in Canada's fiscal problems, the work will be found of rare interest.

"A masterly presentation of the Canadian Annexation Movement of 1849-59."—Winnipeg Telegram.

"The object in view has been accomplished in a most satisfactory manner."—The Weekly Sun.

"The authors have done their work well. They set forth the somewhat complicated story of a critical time in Canadian history with lucidity and good judgment."—Saturday Night.

"Until the publication of this admirably-executed book, it has been extremely difficult, indeed practically impossible, for the student of Canadian history to form any clear idea of the origin, progress and significance of the annexation movement of 1849."—Toronto Globe.

Cloth, 10s. 6d.

THE MUSSON BOOK COMPANY, LIMITED,

MANSTON HOUSE CHAMBERS, 11, QUEEN VICTORIA ST., LONDON, E.C. Head Office—TORONTO, CANADA.

A SELECTION FROM

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.'s

NEW BOOKS

"A 'LIFE' THAT LIVES"

THE LIFE OF
HENRY HARTLEY FOWLER

First Viscount Wolverhampton, G.C.S.I.

By his daughter, EDITH HENRIETTA FOWLER
(Hon. Mrs. Robert Hamilton)With 3 Photogravure Plates and other Illustrations. In one large volume, 700 pages, cloth gilt and gilt top, 21s. net."It is full of solid worth—there is a deep and true interest in the book, since it has character in every page. The Life is to be placed on the same shelf with Goschen and Devonshire." *Times, PostTWO ABSORBING BOOKS OF MEMOIRSBy General Gordon's Chief of the Staff in the SoudanMy Life in Four Continents

By COLONEL CHAILLÉ-LONG

With 2 Photogravure Plates and numerous Illustrations. In two vols. cloth gilt and gilt top, 24s. net.By the Author of "A Diplomatist's Wife in many Lands"Further Reminiscences of a Diplomatist's Wife

By Mrs. HUGH FRASER

With Four in Photogravure
In demy 8vo. cloth gilt and gilt top, 16s. net.FOR CHRISTMAS GIFTS

TWO SUPERB ART BOOKS

The Book of Psalms

With 24 Illustrations in Colour

By FRANK PAPÉ

In crown 4to. cloth gilt and gilt top, 6s.
net.

A NEW AND CHEAP EDITION

Goethe's FaustWith 33 Coloured Plates after original Water colour Drawings

By WILLY POGANY

In crown 4to. cloth gilt and gilt top, 6s. net.

Greuze and His Models

By JOHN RIVERS

In fcp. 4to. cloth gilt and gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.
With 53 Full Page Gravure Plates and the Illustrations with Text.The Fair Enchantress:A Romance of Lady Hamilton's
Early Years

By HENRY SCHUMACHER

With 110 engravings in colour and 4 Illustrations.
In large cr. 8vo. handsomely bound in cloth gilt
6s.HUTCHINSON'S NATURE BOOKS*The Infancy of Animals

By W. P. PYCRAFT, A.L.S., F.Z.S.

With numerous illustrations on art paper in large crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 6s. net.In this book the whole history of what may be called the childhood of animals is reviewed, embracing a host of facts of the utmost importance to the scientist and of entrancing interest to the lover of natural history, who will have in this volume an array of facts such as has never before been brought together.Astronomy

By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S.

With 8 Coloured Plates and over 200 other Illustrations, richly gilt, rounded corners,
6s. net.This book is scientifically correct in every particular, and is written in a popular style which any one can understand. Although small in size, it is packed with all necessary information for the amateur astronomer and is illustrated profusely with coloured plates and other illustrations.TWO NEW ANTHOLOGIES*An Anthology of Babyhood

By MURIEL N. D'AUVERGNE

With Coloured Plates and Decorations. In fcp.
8vo. cloth, richly gilt and gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.Parodies & Imitations:
Old and NewEdited by J. A. STANLEY ADAM and BERNARD C. WHITE.With a Foreword by SIR ARTHUR QUILLER-ROUCH.
In fcp. 8vo. cloth gilt and gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.HUTCHINSON'S New, 6s. Novels*GENERAL MALLOCK'S SHADOW*COME RACK! COME ROPE!*MEADOWSWEET*THE VELDT DWELLERS*FROM THE VALLEY OF THE MISSING*MISS MALLORY OF MOTE*VARICK'S LEGACY*W. B. Maxwell*Robert Hugh Benson*Baroness Orczy*F. Bancroft*Grace Miller White*Evelyn Everett-Green*G. B. Burgin

London: HUTCHINSON & CO., Paternoster Row, E.C.

FROM

HURST & BLACKETT'S

NEW LIST

*The Great World from WithinINTIMACIES OF COURT AND SOCIETY

An Unconventional Narrative of Unofficial Days

By the WIDOW of a DIPLOMAT

In demy 8vo. cloth gilt and gilt top, with Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.The Author deals with five European Capitals, with Government House, Canada and with Washington, U.S.A. She has concealed her identity but her work reveals a remarkable power of observation and literary skill of the highest order. She has shown unusual discernment in selection, and the book will be found of fascinating interest.

An Important Literary Discovery

Memoirs of William Hickey

In 1 vol. demy 8vo. cloth gilt and gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

These Memoirs cover a period from 1749 to 1775, and are given in the Author's own words. They form the first portion of a narrative of his life, which he wrote in his retirement after an eventful career. The MS.
has been rescued from oblivion after once at least having had a narrow escape from destruction and the Publisher considers it a great find.Prophetical, Educational and Playing Cards:

Their Origin, History and Uses

By

Mrs. JOHN KING VAN RENSSELAER

Author of "The Devil's Picture Books," &c., &c.
Demy 8vo. cloth, stamped in full gilt, gilt top,
12s. 6d. net.

"A book of really absorbing interest"

Cities Seen in East and West

By Mrs. WALTER TIBBITS

Author of "The Voice of the Orient." In cloth gilt and gilt top, with 34 Illustrations, 16s. net.NEW 6s. NOVELS*The Great Splendour

GERTRUDE PAGE

Christine: A Guernsey Girl

E. GALLIENNE ROBIN

The Humbug

MRS. TOM GODFREY

Let Justice Be Done

MARK ALLERTON

The Golden Road

JUSTIN HUNTLY MCCARTHY

His Brother's Keeper

JUDGE McDONNELL BODKIN

The Man with the Black

Feather With Illustrations

GASTON LEROUX

Translated by EDGAR JLPSON

The Maker of Secrets

WM. LE QUEUX

London:

HURST & BLACKETT, Ltd.

Paternoster House, E.C.

BLACKIE'S LIST.

A New Colour Book by FLORENCE HARRISON.
ELFIN SONG.

Written and illustrated by FLORENCE HARRISON 12 plates in full colour and 12 black-and-white plates with numerous decorative headings and tail pieces Small 4to, gilt top, 6s. net

A New Colour Book by CHARLES ROBINSON.
THE BIG BOOK OF FABLES.

Illustrated by CHARLES ROBINSON with 12 full page pictures in full colour and 16 in two colour together with numerous illustrations in black and white Large 4to, cloth elegant, gilt edges 7s. 6d net Also Special Edition de Luxe, bound in white vellum cloth, price 15s net

PIONEERS OF EMPIRE SERIES.

In this notable series of handsome books, prepared under the editorship of Sir HARRY JOHNSTON G.C.M.G., K.C.H., there will be found an accurate and extremely fascinating record of the adventures of those pioneers who helped to lay the foundations of the British Empire. The following volumes, all from the pen of Sir HARRY JOHNSTON, and illustrated with pictures in colour and in black and white, are now issued —

PIONEERS IN INDIA.

PIONEERS IN CANADA.

PIONEERS IN AUSTRALASIA.

PIONEERS IN WEST AFRICA.

Price Six Shillings each Other volumes will follow

By CAPTAIN F. S. BRERETON.

Kidnapped by Moors: A Story of Morocco Illustrated by EDWARD S. HODGSON Large crown 8vo, cloth extra, olive edges, 6s

A Boy of the Dominion: A Tale of Canadian Immigration Illustrated by WILLIAM RAINEY R.I. Large crown 8vo cloth extra, olive edges, 6s

By Fleet Surgeon T. T. JEANS, R.N.

John Graham, Sub-Lieutenant, R.N. A Tale of the Atlantic Fleet. Illustrated by C. M. PADDAV Large crown 8vo cloth extra, olive edges, 6s.

By HARRY COLLINGWOOD.

Two Gallant Sons of Devon: A Tale of the Days of Queen Bess Illustrated by EDWARD S. HODGSON Large crown 8vo cloth extra, olive edges, 6s

A Strange Cruise: A Tale of Piracy on the High Seas Illustrated by ARCH WFRB Crown 8vo, cloth extra olive edges 3s 6d.

TRIUMPHS OF ENTERPRISE.

A new series of books which recount the fascinating story of the wonderful achievements of human enterprise, and set forth attractively the marvels of Science and of Nature. This year's volumes written by CYRIL HALL, and profusely illustrated are —

CONQUESTS OF ENGINEERING.

WOOD AND WHAT WE MAKE OF IT.

Price Three Shillings and Sixpence each.
Other volumes in preparation

BOOKS FOR GIRLS.

By ROSA MULHOLLAND (Lady Gilbert).

Twin Sisters: An Irish Story Illustrated by FRANK WILES Large crown 8vo cloth extra gilt top, 6s.

By BESSIE MARCHANT.

The Youngest Sister: A Tale of Manitoba. Illustrated by WILLIAM RAINEY R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth extra, olive edges, 6s.

A Princess of Servia: A Story of To-day Illustrated by WILLIAM RAINEY, R.I. Crown 8vo cloth extra, olive edges, 3s 6d.

BLACKIE'S CHILDREN'S ANNUAL.

Ninth Year of Issue

Cloth, gilt edges, 5s., picture boards, 3s 6d.

Each year's issue of this favourite among children has marked an improvement upon its immediate predecessor, and this ninth year's volume is no exception. Stories and pictures by the foremost authors and artists of the day ensure a wider popularity than ever for Blackie's Children's Annual.

Blackie & Son, Ltd., will be pleased to send, gratis and post free, their Catalogues of General Literature and Christmas Gift-Books on receipt of a post-card.

BLACKIE & SON, LTD., 50, Old Bailey, London, E.C.

FROM CHATTO & WINDUS'S LIST

THE OUTCASTE By F. E. PENNY

FAUSTULA By JOHN AYSCOUGH

THREE WOMEN By NETTA SYRETT

PANSY MEARES

(and Impression) By HORACE W. C. NEWTE
LARKMEADOW

By MARMADUKE PICKTHALL
CHEADLE & SON

By A. HAMILTON GIBBS
A DAUGHTER OF THE MORNING By HUGH DE SÉLINCOURT

OUR BOOK OF MEMORIES: 1884-1912

Letters from JUSTIN MCCARTHY to Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED. With Portraits and Views Demy 8vo, cloth 12s. 6d. net. Vivid Pictures of the Political, Social and Literary Life of the time. The great figure of Parnell in all his moods emerges distinctly, and the book contains Personal Memories of Gladstone, Lord Morley, and distinguished Members of the Irish Party of which Mr McCarthy was leader in succession to Parnell.

AT PRIOR PARK, and other Papers

By AUSTIN DOBSON. With 6 Illustrations Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

ESSAYS IN FRESCO

By EDWARD McCURDY, Editor of 'The Note Books of Leonardo da Vinci' With 6 Illustrations Crown 8vo buckram gilt top 5s. net. A Collection of Papers dealing with Conradin, Richard Cœur de Lion, Enzo, James I. of Scotland, and other figures in the great Pageant of Mediævalism. [Shortly]

MOZART'S OPERAS. A Critical Study.

By EDWARD J. DENT, Author of "Alessandro Scarlatti, His Life and Works" With Portraits and Musical Illustrations Demy 8vo cloth gilt 12s. 6d. net. [Shortly]

THE MAN OF PLEASURE

By RALPH NEVILL, Author of "London Clubs their History and Treasures" With 28 Plates in Colour and Black and White Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net. [Shortly]

THE FAVOURITES OF LOUIS XIV.

By LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE, Author of "The Court of the Tuilleries" With 4 Portraits Demy 8vo cloth gilt top 7s. 6d. net.

THE CHARM OF LONDON

Passages Selected and Edited by ALFRED H. HYATT. A New Edition with 12 Illustrations in Colour by YOSHIO MARKINO. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net velvet calf, 7s. 6d. net

MORTE D'ARTHUR

By ALFRED LORD TENNYSON. Each page Illuminated in Colours and Gold in Missal style by ALBERTO SANGORSKI, and the whole reproduced in facsimile upon ivory surface paper Uniform with the Illuminated Editions of "Stevenson's Prayers" and "The Sermon on the Mount" In quarto size, Jap vellum gilt, 6s. net, parchment full gilt, with silk ties, 8s. 6d. net

THE POCKET GEORGE BORROW

Passages chosen by EDWARD THOMAS from the Works of Borrow Cloth, 2s. net, leather, 3s. net

MARK TWAIN'S (S. L. Clemens) WORKS

Crown 8vo, Cloth, mostly Illustrated, 3s. 6d. each.

Choice Works

Library of Humour

Roughing It

The American Claimant

Tom Sawyer

Tom Sawyer Abroad

Tom Sawyer, Detective, &c.

A Tramp Abroad

More Tramps Abroad

The Innocents Abroad

The Gilded Age

The Prince and the Pauper

Life on the Mississippi

Huckleberry Finn

A Yankee at the Court of King Arthur

Pudd'nhead Wilson

The Stolen White Elephant

The £1,000,000 Bank

Note

A Double-barrelled Detective Story

Personal Recollections of

Joan of Arc

The Man that Corrupted

Hadleyburg

London: Chatto & Windus, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Mr. HEINEMANN'S NEW ILLUSTRATED AND ART BOOKS

From Aesop's Fables

ARTHUR RACKHAM'S NEW PICTURES.

AESOP'S FABLES.

Illustrated by ARTHUR RACKHAM in Colour and Black and White Translated by V S VERNON JONES, M A
With Introduction by G K CHESTERTON Large crown 8vo 6s. net

ALL THE TALES FROM SHAKESPEARE.

By CHARIFS and MARY LAMB and H S MORRIS With 46 Plates in Colour from Paintings of the Great Masters In 2 vols large medium 8vo cloth extra full gilt sides 21s. net

IN THE SHADOW OF THE BUSH.

By P AMAURY TALBOT With numerous Illustrations from Photographs and Drawings Maps Plans etc
Large demy 8vo 18s. net

THE CHILDHOOD OF ANIMALS.

By P CHALMERS MITCHELL FRS With Plates in Colour by F Y JONES, and Illustrations by R B BROOK GREAVES Royal 8vo 10s. net

WILD LIFE AND THE CAMERA. By A RADCLYFFE DUGMORI (Author of Camera Adventures in the African Wilds) Crown 4to with numerous plates 6s. net

THE FOUR GARDENS. Illustrated in Colour by CHARLES ROBINSON 6s. net

A CHRISTMAS GARLAND. Woven by MAX BEERBOHM Crown 8vo 5s. net

PICTURES OF THE PANAMA CANAL. By JOSEPH PLINNI Crown 4to 5s. net

THE BOOK OF BEGGARS. By W DACRES ADAMS Crown 4to With Plates in Colour 3s 6d. net

THE STEAMSHIP CONQUEST OF THE SEA. By F A TALBOT With many Illustrations Demy 8vo 6s. net

Art Throughout the Ages. (Ars Una Species Mille Series) Crown 8vo cloth with 600 Illustrations Each vol 6s. net New vols
ART IN EGYPT by M MASPERO ART IN ROME by Mrs W ARMSTRONG ART IN SPAIN by M DIEULAFOY [Previously published Art in Great Britain and Ireland; Art in France; Art in N. Italy.]

French Artists of Our Day. With 48 Plates selected from their works 3s. 6d. net Puvis de Chavannes, by ANDRI MICHEL Manet, by LOUIS HOURTIQ Courbet, by LEONCE BENEDITE

The Great Engravers. Edited by ARTHUR M HIND Each volume with 64 pages of Illustrations 2s 6d. net New Volumes (1) MARCANTONIO; (2) HOEFNIN; (3) REMBRANDT; (4) BARTOLOZZI; (5) GRAGONARD; (6) HOGARTH

Little Books About Old Furniture
CHIPPENDALE AND HIS SCHOOL. By J P BLAKI Illustrated Crown 8vo 2s 6d. net
THE SHERATON PERIOD. By A E RIVLIRS HOPKINS Illustrated Crown 8vo 2s. 6d net

From The Childhood of Animals

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

DELIGHTFUL NOVELS

MR. LOCKE'S MASTERPIECE

The Joyous Adventures of Aristide Pujol

By WILLIAM T. LOCKE

Price net, 6/-

A STUDY OF STAGELAND

Hoffmann's Chance

By WILLIAM CAINE

6/-

"The most considerable piece of work Mr Caine has yet provided 'Hoffmann's Chance' would have been worth writing merely for the presentation of Orde the ass and Psyche, the cat—especially the latter, whose portraiture is one of the most vivid and effective presentations of cattness that has ever come our way —Morning Post"

A COMEDY OF MANNERS

The Illusions of Mr. & Mrs. Bressingham

By GERARD BENDALL

6/-

"A delightful, farcical comedy of modern life natural, spirited dialogue lively entertainment" —Daily Telegraph

AN EIGHTEENTH CENTURY ROMANCE

The Bountiful Hour

By MARION FOX

6/-

"There is a distinction about the writings of Miss Fox in her new novel we have the same pathos with interludes of joyousness, and over both moods a spirituality reigning supreme" —Morning Post

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, W.

Messrs. Longmans & Co.'s New List.

THE RIGHT HON. A. J. BALFOUR

ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR

As a Philosopher and Thinker

A Collection of the more important and interesting passages in his Non-political Writings, Speeches, and Addresses, 1879 to 1912. Selected and arranged by WILFRID M. SHORT. With Portrait. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

ROWLAND E. PROTHERO. Agent in Chief to the Duke of Bedford

ENGLISH FARMING, Past and Present.

8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

R. H. TAWNEY

THE AGRARIAN PROBLEM IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

With 6 Maps of Manors (1500-1620). 8vo. 9s. net.

EDWARD CADBURY

EXPERIMENTS IN INDUSTRIAL ORGANISATION.

With a Preface by W. J. ASHLEY, M.A., Professor of Commerce in the University of Birmingham. Crown 8vo. 5s. net. [In November]

J. E. C. BODLEY, M.A., Corresponding Member of the Institute of France

CARDINAL MANNING and Other Essays

8vo. [In November]

FREDERICK SHIELDS

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF FREDERIC SHIELDS, A.R.W.S. 1833-1911. Edited by ERNEST MILLS. With 1 Photogravure and 40 other Illustrations. 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [In October]

Frederic Shields, as well known as a painter of religious subjects, and especially so in connection with the Chapel of the Ascension at Baywater. The story of his early struggles and subsequent life is told by his diaries, family letters, and later by the letters of his friends.

FATHER CUTHBERT, O.S.F.C.

LIFE OF ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI.

With 13 Illustrations. 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

"We would end as we have begun, with the clear sound of praise, warmly commending, to all lovers of St. Francis a work which thoroughly deserves a catholic welcome in the most literal sense of the word."
—The Times

GEORGINA MEINERTZHAGEN.

A BREMEN FAMILY.

With 15 Illustrations. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

A Short Memoir of the Meinertzhagen family who settled in England in 1526, including their pedigree, and Cologne and Bremen in which towns six of the family were senators in the 17th and 18th centuries.

W. H. BEVERIDGE

JOHN AND IRENE: An Anthology of Thoughts on Woman.

Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net. [In November]

A modern love story is told in the first edition of the book which, however, is mainly a selection on a well-planned plan of sayings from many times and countries concerning women in all her aspects and activities: her life, love, education, character, and work; her praise and her dispraise. The quotations are arranged by subjects and are further arranged so as to illustrate the story.

WILLIAM CECIL DAMPIER WHETHAM, M.A., F.R.S., and

CATHERINE DURNING WHETHAM, his wife

SCIENCE AND THE HUMAN MIND: A Critical and Historical Account of the Development of Natural Knowledge.

Crown 8vo. 5s. net. [In November]

W. A. B. COOLIDGE, M.A.

ALPINE STUDIES.

With 16 views of the High Alps, reproduced after Photographs by Signor VITTORIO SELLA and the late Mr. W. F. DONKIN. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

VERY REV. P. A. CANON SHEEHAN

MIRIAM LUCAS: a Story of Irish Life.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

NEW FICTION.

F. D. HOYT.

CATHERINE SIDNEY.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

Gay social life in New York is depicted in this story of the love affair of a cultured English girl. The lady is a Roman Catholic, and religious differences form an obstacle to the marriage, and the working out of this problem is the main theme of the book.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39 Paternoster Row, LONDON, E.C.

BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW BOOK BY DR. J. HOLLAND ROSE.

Reader in Modern History, University of Cambridge

The Personality of Napoleon.

Being the Lowell Lectures delivered at Boston Feb. March 1911. With Maps and Plans. 5s. net.

RECENT BOOKS BY DR. ROSE.

The Life of William Pitt.

With Photogravure Plates. 4 vols. 16s. net each.

Pitt and Napoleon.

Essays and Letters Supplementary to the Life of William Pitt. 10s. 6d. net.

Whitman's Print Collector's Handbook.

A NEW and COMPLETE EDITION, THOROUGHLY REVISED and ENLARGED with ADDITIONAL CHAPTERS. By MALCOLM C. SALAMAN. Fully Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

"The value of the book for collectors has been enormously enhanced by Mr. Salaman's exhaustive addition, and it may well claim an equal co-partnership with the original author of the work."
—Globe

Altogether Mr. Salaman's edition of the Whitman Handbook is excellent and will be invaluable not only to the beginner but to the collector.
—Morning Post

Favourite Savoy Operas.

By the late Sir W. S. GILBERT. Each containing the full libretto, with 8 Colour Plates by W. R. S. FLETCHER, and Decorative Covers. 5s. 6d. net per volume.

Now 11 volumes just published.

THE YEOMEN OF THE GUARD.
THE GONDOLIERS.
PRINCESS IDA.
RUDDIGORE.

11 volumes previously published.

The Mikado, Iolanthe, The Pirates of Penzance, and Patience.

The artist's cell or grows rich and harmonious in his artistic position as unerring his figures move and more bravely, he has produced a most admirable set of designs.
—Illustration

The Poems of Gaius Valerius Catullus

With Text and Translation on opposite pages, a Short Sketch of the Times of Catullus, and very full Notes.

By CHARLES STUTTAFOORD. Bound in Buckram. 6s. net.

"Both Messrs. Bell and Mr. Stuttaford have achieved considerable success. Mr. Stuttaford's translation is commendably clear and accurate while he has added to the value of the book by his lucid notes."
—Globe

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.
NEW VOLUMES.

The Letters of Thomas Gray.

Including the Correspondence of Gray and Mason.

Edited by the Rev. D. C. TOVEY, M.A. Vol. III. with Index, just published. Vols. I and II. also ready. 3s. 6d. per volume.

"Furnishes a better text than had ever been printed before, and in the way of notes contains everything that the most exacting reader can expect."
—Nation

Varro on Farming.

M. Terenti Varronis Rerum Rusticarum Libri Tres.

Translated with Introduction, Commentary and Excursus by LLOYD STORR BEST, M.A. 5s.

London: G. BELL & SONS, Ltd., York House, Portugal Street, Kingway, W.C.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s List

Large post 8vo 6s net

Thy Rod and Thy Staff

By ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON Author of "From a College Window" "The Silent Isle" &c

With Illustrations Demy 8vo 10s net

The Church in Madras Vol. II.

Being the History of the Ecclesiastical and Missionary Action of the East India Company in the Presidency of Madras from 1805—1835 By the REV FRANK PENNY LL.M

With 15 Illustrations Small demy 8vo 10s 6d net

Arabic-Spain : Sidelights on her History and Art

By BERNHARD and LILIAN M. WHISHAW

Large post 8vo 7s 6d net

What the Judge Saw: Being 25 years in Manchester, by One who has done it

By His Honour Judge EDWARD ABBOTT PARRY Author of Judgments in Vacation &c
Full Mail Gazette — A rlicking book A tick full of frolic and fun This is the best book of legal recollections we have since the days of Montagu William and we know no higher praise

Large Post 8vo 6s net

Allegories of the Land

By Major GAMBIER PARRY, Author of The Pageant of my Day Murphy A Message to Dog-lovers &c

With 8 Illustrations Large post 8vo 7s 6d net

Eton in the Seventies

By the Hon GILBERT COLLIDGIF, Author of An Instinctive Criminal Jan Van Isele &c

With a Portrait Large post 8vo 6s net

A Home Help in Canada

By ELIA C. SYKES Author of Through Persia on a Side Saddle Persia and its People

With a Portrait Large post 8vo 7s 6d net

Boswell, the Biographer

By GEORGE MALORY

With a Portrait Large post 8vo 7s 6d net

Scenes and Memories

By WILBURGA LADY PAGET

With a Frontispiece Small demy 8vo 10s 6d net

Sixty Years in the Wilderness: More Passages by the Way.

By Sir HENRY W. LUCY (Loby M.P., of 'Punch') Author of 'Sixty Years in the Wilderness,' &c

With Coloured and other Illustrations Crown 8vo 5s net

Dogs and their Masters

By MARION CHAPPELL

* * * An anthology which draws on prose as well as poetry on reality as well as invention for the delight of all who love dogs

With a Map Small demy 8vo 6s net

The Conquest of New Granada

By Sir CLIFFORD R. MARKHAM K.C.B. &c, Author of 'The Incas of Peru' 'The Story of Majorca and Minorca' &c

With Illustrations from Photographs by the Author and a Map Small royal 8vo 9s net

The Land that is Desolate:

An Account of a Tour in Palestine

By Sir FREDERICK TREVES Bart G.C.V.O., &c, Serjeant-Surgeon to H.M. the King Author of 'The Cradle of the Deep,' 'Uganda for a Holiday,' &c

With 40 pages of Illustrations and a Map Small royal 8vo 10s 6d net

Dawn in Darkest Africa

By the Rev JOHN H. HARRIS, Organizing Secretary of the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society With an Introduction by the Rt Hon The EARL OF CROMER, O.M., P.C., G.C.B. &c

LONDON:
SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

Sir A. Conan Doyle's Works

New Illustrated 3s 6d. Edition Crown 8vo.

In Uniform Red Cloth Binding.

The Tragedy of the "Korosko"

With 40 Illustrations

Uncle Bernac: A Memory of the Empire Third Edition With 12 Illustrations

Rodney Stone

With 8 Illustrations Fourth Impression.

The White Company

Thirty first Edition Revised With 8 Illustrations.

The Green Flag, and Other Stories of War and Sport With 1 Frontispiece

The Adventures of Gerard

With 16 Illustrations by W. B. WOLLIN

The Return of Sherlock Holmes

Illustrated by SIDNEY PAGET

The Hound of the Baskervilles

With Illustrations by SIDNEY PAGET

The Adventures of Sherlock

Holmes With 25 Illustrations by SIDNEY PAGET

The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard

With 24 Illustrations by W. B. WOLLIN

The Sign of Four

Illustrated

The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes

With Illustrations by SIDNEY PAGET

Sir Nigel

With Illustrations by ARTHUR TWIDLE

A Duet: with an Occasional

Chorus Tenth Edition Revised

Round the Fire Stories

With Frontispiece by ANDRÉ CASTAIGNE.

Micah Clarke

With 9 Illustrations

The Captain of the Pole Star

With a Frontispiece

The Refugees

With 25 Illustrations

The Stark Munro Letters

With a Frontispiece

The Last Galley: Impressions and

Tales With Illustrations by N. C. WYETH

Through the Magic Door

With 16 Illustrations

Pocket Edition With Frontispieces.

Fcap 8vo. 1s. net.

The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes

The Adventures of Sherlock

Holmes

LONDON:
SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

RUDYARD KIPLING

Collected Verse of Rudyard Kipling

£5 5s. net Edition, limited to 100 copies.
ALL SOLD.

£2 2s. net Edition, limited to 500 copies.
ALL SOLD.

20s. net Edition. Second edition already heavily subscribed.

HODDER AND STOUGHTON,
PUBLISHERS, LONDON

AMONG FAMOUS BOOKS

A Study of the Struggle between Paganism and Spiritual Idealism

By JOHN KELMAN, D.D.

Author of "The Faith of Robert Louis Stevenson," etc

Price 6/-

HODDER AND STOUGHTON,
PUBLISHERS, LONDON

THE BEST OF
A. C. BENSON
IN ONE VOLUME

THE BEAUTY OF LIFE

From the Writings of
ARTHUR C. BENSON

Compiled by CAROLINE ABBOTT DERBY

Price 6/ net

HODDER AND STOUGHTON
PUBLISHERS LONDON

Just Published

The Problem of Edwin Drood

A Study in the Methods of Dickens

By SIR W. ROBERTSON
NICOLL, LL.D.

Price 3/6 net

HODDER AND STOUGHTON,
PUBLISHERS, LONDON.

GAY & HANCOCK'S LIST.

By
ELLA WHEELER
WILCOX.

N.B.—One of the most beautiful books published this season.

AN EDITION DE LUXE OF

POEMS OF PASSION POEMS OF PLEASURE

Title, End Papers, and Binding Design by J. T. Overnell Size, 11½ in by 9 in, 300 pages, cloth gilt and boxed, 15s net
Hand made Paper Edition, signed by Author and Artist, TWO GUINEAS net

20 beautiful Illustrations in Colour by
DUDLEY TENNANT.

A New Wilcox Volume. First Edition 10,000.
Uniform with the other Volumes Limp Cloth, 1s. net Lambskin 2s 6d net Velvet Calf, boxed, 3s. 6d. net
THE ENGLISHMAN, and other Poems.

WILCOX CALENDAR 1913

1/- net.
in artistic envelope

Size 11½ inches by 7½ inches
12 Art Boards fastened at top with Silk.
Lepure Verse for each Month

Special Holiday Edition of THE BIRDS' CHRISTMAS CAROL.

By Kate Douglas Wiggin

With Illustrations and Decorations in Colour Size 8½ by 6½ in, cloth gilt,
3s 6d net

Over 50,000 of this (the Author's first story) have been sold This volume contains the popular 'Ruggles Family' story and for this special edition Mrs Wiggin has written a new Preface.

New Popular Edition of THE BIRDS' CHRISTMAS CAROL.

By Kate Douglas Wiggin

With four Coloured Pictures by Francis E. Hiley. Cloth Size, 6½ ins by 5 ins Picture wrapper 1s 6d. net

THE GREEN DOOR.

By Mary E Wilkins

With four Coloured Pictures by Francis E Hiley 1s 6d net Uniform with The Birds Christmas Carol

SOME OLD FLEMISH TOWNS.

Written and Illustrated by George Wharton Edwards
Size, 10 ins by 6½ ins Pp 36 with 5 Coloured and 30 Half Tone Full-Page Plates cloth gilt top boxed 18s net

A Beautiful Colour Book A FLOWER ANTHOLOGY.

Selected and Illustrated by Alfred Rawlings
Size 7 in by 5½ in, with 12 Three Colour Illustrations Limp cloth, 2s 6d net Velvet Persian 6s net

A Unique Volume of Travel THE LOG OF THE EASY WAY.

By John L Matthews

Demy 8vo, pp 280 with 24 Full Page Illustrations from Photographs by the Author of the gilt 6s net
Mr Matthews and his bride built a small 'House boat, and going on board the day of their marriage, at Chicago drifted down the Mississippi to New Orleans living a life of idyllic charm for 10 or 15 months

LONDON: GAY & HANCOCK, LTD., 12 & 13, HENRIETTA ST, COVENT GARDEN

EDINBURGH: 34, NORTH BRIDGE.

READERS OUT OF REACH

of a good local bookseller, or who live abroad, are asked to write direct to London for their books, which will be sent by return of post, at lowest cash prices, on receipt of remittance with order

German or French Books (if not obtainable in London) are posted to customers direct from Leipzig or Paris by my agents there, thus saving postage

LONDON AGENT FOR LIBRARIES ABROAD

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications.

List of 1600 Subscription Rates free on application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp of Standard Literature
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1000 Titles of Publishers' Reminders, in good condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices
3. Colonial Librarian's Handbook, indispensable to Librarians outside Europe, with complete list of Colonial Editions, etc., etc
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals.

ESTABLISHED
1851

ALFRED WILSON

Export and Retail Bookseller

18-19 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON, E.C.

Telephone: 7463 Central.

Bankers: London County & Westminster (Lombard Street).

MR. FIFIELD'S FIRST LIST.

THE NOTE-BOOKS OF SAMUEL BUTLER.

Author of 'Erewhon' Edited by Henry Festing Jones. With photographic portrait, a biographical tale and Butler's poems and index

By
SAMUEL BUTLER
6s. net
Postage 4d

The 'Note-Books' is a most interesting man who Mr Butler's life is the greatest English writer of the latter half of the 19th century. It is compiled from his private notes and is a most interesting and amusing account of the life of a most important book published for 40 years and still in demand.

THE NATURE OF WOMAN A Biological and Sociological Study.

A fresh and intense interest work on a subject of increasing importance. The author believes the book will be discussed in every quarter and will be a permanent contribution.

By
DR. LIONEL TAYLER.
3s. 6d. net
Postage 1d

TRYSTIE'S QUEST. Or, Kit King of the Pigwidgeons

A Fairy Tale With Cover Design, Title Page and Thirty and Illustrations by Arthur Hughes

By
GREVILLE MACDONALD,
M.D.
5s. net
Postage 4d

THE FOREST FARM (Autobiographical) Tales of the Austrian Tyrol.

With appreciation by M. E. King and Biographical Introduction by Dr Julius Petersen. Large (13x5) cloth with Portrait

By
PETER ROSEGER.
2s. net
Postage 3d

DELFINA OF THE DOLPHINS.

Delfina is a charming girl born in Rome, and this is the story of her life there. A child girl and woman artist. It is an intimate picture of Rome as seen by the people rather than by the tourist.

By
M. A. TAYLOR
1s. 6d. net
Postage 2d

THE BROOM FAIRIES, and other Stories.

Mr Fifield has very much pleasure in introducing this new young writer to the book-loving public. He believes that she has a most unusual and delightful touch and that children will be fascinated by the stories.

By ETHEL GAIE.
1s. 6d. net
Postage 2d

THE SOUL OF A GARDENER. A book of Poems for every month of a Gardener's Year

This is a volume that will appeal to all garden lovers. Every month of the gardener's year is embodied in a cluster of delightful poems. An ideal Christmas gift.

By
H. M. WAITHMAN.
2s. net
Postage 2d

FATUOUS FABLES, and other Verses.

A charmingly produced volume of humorous poems from the author's contributions to Punch, Outlook, and other prominent journals.

By DENIS TURNER.
2s. 6d. net
Postage 2d

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 13, CLIFFORD'S INN, E.C.

FROM HODDER AND STOUGHTON'S
AUTUMN LIST.

FROM MY HUNTING DAY-BOOK

By His Imperial and Royal Highness
the CROWN PRINCE OF THE GERMAN EMPIRE AND OF PRUSSIA.

Illustrated. Price 6/- net.

CRITICAL REVIEWS RELATING CHIEFLY TO SCOTLAND

By D. HAY FLEMING, LL.D.

Author of "Mary, Queen of Scots," "The Reformation in Scotland," etc.

Price 12/- net.

THE LIFE OF THE SPIDER

By J. H. FABRE ("The Insect's Homer")

With an Introduction by MAURICE MAETERLINCK

Price 6/- net.

ANOTHER DEVICE

A Volume of Essays.

By STEPHEN PAGET

Author of "Confessio Medici," etc.

Price 5/- net.

FRANCE FROM WITHIN

By CLAIRE DE PRATZ

Illustrated. Price 10/6 net.

QUEEN ANNE

By HERBERT PAUL

Author of "The Life of Froude," "A History of Modern England," etc.

Price 7/6 net.

THE MESSAGE OF ROBERT BROWNING

By A. AUSTIN FOSTER, M.A.

Price 5/- net.

HODDER AND STOUGHTON, PUBLISHERS, LONDON, E.C.

Refrereader

A Folding Portable Book Rest

for reading with Ease and Comfort.

Can be used with any Chair, at the Table or when reclining on a Couch or in Bed. Also as a Music Stand or Sketching Easel. It supports itself, holds any book, and leaves the hands quite free.

Folds up by one operation and only weighs 27 oz.

AT ONCE ADJUSTABLE TO ANY ANGLE OR POSITION.

Many unsolicited testimonials received from purchasers who are delighted with it, and have ordered others for their friends.

In Polished Figured
Oak with Brass Fittings

10/6

In Polished Mahogany with Nickel Fittings

15/-

Postage extra—British Isles, 6d.; Abroad, 1s.

FREE TRIAL GIVEN: WRITE FOR PARTICULARS.

PARTRIDGE & COOPER, Ltd.,

191-192, Fleet Street, LONDON, E.C.

Young Writers who desire SUCCESS should apply for free particulars of the Literary Instruction
Correspondence Courses of THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY. The most practical and helpful literary courses on the market.
Prepared by a Working Author. The Surrey Literary Agency also obtain the best offers for original MSS. Booklet Prospectus free. "Locksley," Presburg Road, New Malden, Surrey.

TYPE WRITING.—MSS., Plays, Legal Work, etc., 1/- 1,000 words; Technical Work, 1/6.
Correct and competent work; prompt return.—
Miss d'Etlinger, Post Office, Lingfield, Surrey.

TO AUTHORS.

Expert assistance in placing literary and dramatic work. Advice on and revision of MSS. undertaken. Full particulars on application to the WIENER LITERARY AGENCY, Ltd., 64, Strand, London (next to Tivoli Music Hall). Telephone 369 Central.

NEW CATALOGUE OF CURRENT LITERATURE.

This Catalogue gives at a glance complete lists of the best of the various series of handy reprints now being issued.
General Literature, Art, Science, Nature Study,
Books of Reference and Fiction generally.
All lovers of Books should at once write for a copy, Gratis and Post Free.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., Booksellers,
265, High Holborn, LONDON, W.C.

GEORGE ALLEN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

HOMES AND HAUNTS OF RUSKIN

By SIR EDWARD T. COOK.

With 28 Full-page Illustrations in Colour, and 16 in Black and White by EMILY M. B. WARREN. Demy 4to. Cloth. 21/- net. [Nearly Ready.]

THE ART OF JOZEF ISRAELS

By J. E. PHYTHIAN.

With 40 Reproductions of the Artist's Works, including 8 Full-page Illustrations in Colour. Crown 4to. Cloth. 15/- net. [Just out.]

ANIMAL LIFE IN ITALIAN PAINTING

By W. NORTON HOWE.

With 2 Full-page Illustrations in Colour and 48 in Black and White. Foolsap 4to. 12/6 net. [Nearly Ready.]

NAPOLEON'S SON

By CLARA TSCHUDI.

Translated by E. M. COPE. With 12 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7/6 net. [Just out.]

A HISTORY OF PSYCHOLOGY: ANCIENT AND PATRISTIC

By Dr. G. S. BRETT.

Demy 8vo. 10/6 net. (Library of Philosophy.) [Just out.]

AN INTRODUCTION TO PSYCHOLOGY

By WILHELM WUNDT.

Translated by RUDOLF PINTNER, M.A. (Edin.), Ph.D. (Leipsic). Crown 8vo. cloth. 3/6.

"It is a book which no student can afford to neglect."—Westminster Gazette.

EXPERIMENTAL PSYCHOLOGY AND PEDAGOGY

By Dr. R. SCHULTZE.

Translated by RUDOLF PINTNER. With about 300 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. cloth. 15/- net. [Nearly ready.]

ELEMENTS OF CHILD PROTECTION

By Dr. SIGMUND ENGEL.

Translated by Dr. EDEN PAUL. 15/- net. An investigation into all the problems involved by child protection from the standpoints of modern Social Science. [Just out.]

THE SIGNIFICANCE of ANCIENT RELIGIONS: In Relation to Human Evolution and Brain Development.

By E. NOEL REICHARDT, M.D. (Lond.)

With 7 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Cloth. 12/6 net. [Just out.]

THE KING'S FAVOURITE

By H. H. ATKINSON.

A Romance of the time of Louis XI. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 6/-. [Just out.]

HOURS OF GLADNESS

By M. MAETERLINCK.

Eight Nature Essays, including a New Essay on OUR CITY GARDENS.

Translated by A. TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS. With 20 Full-page Illustrations in Colour; Cover and Title page by EDWARD J. DETMOLD. Special Edition on Arnold paper. Demy 4to. 21/- net. [Just out.]

LONDON: GEORGE ALLEN & CO., LTD., 44-45, RATHBONE PLACE.

A SELECTION FROM JOHN LONG'S NEW LIST

SECOND EDITION AT PRESS

SENSATIONS OF PARIS

By ROWLAND STRONG. With upwards of 60 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

Daily Telegraph says: "Mr. Strong presents us with pictures and impressions of Paris which will prove interesting to those who know not the French capital, to those who know it but slightly, and to those who know it well."

DO NOT FAIL TO READ THIS FASCINATING WORK.

THE VICEROYS OF IRELAND

By CHARLES O'MAHONY. With Photogravure and numerous other Portraits and Illustrations. 16s. net.

THE FIRST COMPLETE HISTORY OF THE VICEROYS.

The Times says: "Compiled in a judicious and attractive manner."

THROUGH DANTE'S LAND:

Impressions in Tuscany By Mrs COLQUHOUN GRANT, Author of "Brittany to Whitehall," &c. Photogravure and 32 Illustrations from Photographs. 12s. 6d. net.

The Times says: "A pleasant mixture of the quiet social intercourse and the all pervading spell of the Tuscan landscape."

LORDS AND LADIES OF THE ITALIAN LAKES. By EDGUMBE STALEY. With coloured Frontispiece and numerous Portraits and Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

The Times says: "A chronicle, given with much spirit and gusto, of the romantic scenes and events which history has associated with this fascinating country, its villas, and its castles."

HOME EXERCISE & HEALTH

Five Minutes Care to the Nerves. By PERCIVAL G. MASTERS. With 32 Illustrations. A system of Exercises devised to promote health and not muscle development only. It particularly aims at building up nervous system. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

JOHN LONG'S POPULAR NOVELS

Six Shillings Each

QUEER LITTLE JANE

CURTIS YORKE

(Just out)

A YEAR WITHOUT A CHAPERONE

ELSIE M. CAWTHORNE

(Just out)

THE VILLAGE INFIDEL

C. E. HEANLEY

(Just out. 3/6)

THINGS AS THEY ARE

MRS. E. K. WILLIAMSON

Sheffield Telegraph says: "So interestingly told that one reads it with true delight."

THE BAD LORD LOCKINGTON

FLORENCE WARDEN

Author of "The Matheson Money."

Westminster Gazette says: "An ingenious and sustained story, and just the right length."

THE TWO RIVERS

ERNEST E. BRIGGS

Westminster Gazette says: "For the greater part the book merits high praise. It is a careful and earnest novel that ought not to lack an appreciative audience, and promises much for the future."

LEFT IN CHARGE

VICTOR L. WHITECHURCH

Author of "The Canon in Residence."

Daily Mail says: "Humour, philosophy and sympathy are well blended in this shrewd and pleasant tale of country life."

THE SLEEPING VILLAGE

JULIA NEVILLE

The Times says: "A meritorious story of the domestic and social life of a quiet Russian village."

THE NOVEL OF THE SEASON

THE GATE OPENERS

K. L. MONTGOMERY

Author of "The Cardinal's Pawn."

Globe says: "Contains a real, carefully thought out plot. An agreeable novelty is in the incorporation of a number of old Welsh customs, legends, and folk lore. The book should find favour with cultivated readers; it is out of the run, with an historical element not often used in fiction."

LONDON: JOHN LONG, LTD., 12, 13, 14, Norris Street, Haymarket

Macmillan's New Books.

Marie Antoinette: Her Early Youth: 1770-1774. By LADY YOUNGHUSBAND
Illustrated 8vo 15s net

The Adventures of an Elephant Hunter.
By JAMES SUTHERLAND Illustrated 8vo
7s 6d net

 The book records the experiences of a hunter who holds the world's record in this branch of sport

NEW COLOUR BOOKS.

Folk-Tales of Bengal. By the Rev LAL BEHARI DAY With 32 Illustrations in Colour by WARWICK GOBLE Crown 4to 15s net

Also Edition de Luxe, limited to 150 copies printed on hand-made paper and bound in vellum Demy 4to 42s net

White-Ear and Peter: the Story of a Fox and a Fox-Terrier. By NEILS HEIBERG With 16 Coloured Plates by CECIL ALDIN Pott 4to 6s net

OXFORD THEOLOGICAL ESSAYS.

Foundations. An Attempt to state the Essentials of Christianity in the Terms of Contemporary Thought By Various Members of the University of Oxford Edited by Rev H B STREETER Fellow of Queen's College Oxford 8vo 10s 6d net

The Contributors are the Rev Wm Temple Rev N S Talbot Rev R Brook Rev R G Larson Rev I J Rawlinson Mr W H Malerly and the Editor

Second and Cheaper Edition

Handbook to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament. By SIR FREDERIC G KENYON KCB Director and Principal Librarian of the British Museum With Sixteen Facsimiles Second Edition thoroughly revised Extra crown 8vo 5s net

The Second Epistle of the Apostle Paul to the Corinthians. Introduction, Text, English Translation and Notes.

By ALLAN MENZIES DD Professor of Divinity and Biblical Criticism St Mary's College, University of St Andrews 8vo 6s net

NEW FICTION.

Marriage. By H G WELLS 6s

Mrs. Lancelot. By MAURICE HEWLETT 6s

The Crock of Gold By JAMES STEPHENS
AUTHOR OF 'THE CHARV MAN'S DAUGHTER' 5s net

The Standard — There is not another book like this Crock of Gold in English literature. There are many books like pieces of it but the humour and the style these things are Mr Stephens's own peculiar gift. 'The Crock of Gold' must make Mr Stephens's position even more assured. It must also make his readers impatiently curious as to his next work.

The Heroine in Bronze. By JAMES LANE ALLEN. 6s [Shortly]

Folk-Tales of Breffny. By MISS B HUNT Crown 8vo [Immediately.]

Edward Fairlie Frankfort, or, Politics among the People By Sir HENRY WRIXON K.C. 6s [Immediately]

A Regular Madam. By ALICE WILSON FOX, Author of "Hearts and Coronets," etc 6s

The Reef. By EDITH WHARTON, Author of "The House of Mirth," etc. 6s. [Immediately.]

The subject of Mrs Wharton's new novel is a sentimental drama between four Americans living in France

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

FROM MR. HEINEMANN'S AUTUMN LIST

EPOCHS OF CHINESE AND JAPANESE ART. An Outline History of East Asiatic Design By ERNEST FENOLLOSA With 230 Plates in Colour and Monochrome In 2 volumes Crown 4to 36s. net

RECENT EVENTS & PRESENT POLICIES IN CHINA.

By J O P BLAND (Joint author with E BACKHOUSE, of China Under the Empress Dowager) Royal 8vo, illustrated 16s. net

THE SON OF CATHERINE THE GREAT: PAUL I OF RUSSIA.

By K WALISZEWSKI (author of 'Catherine II' etc) Royal 8vo with portrait 15s. net

THE TECHNIQUE OF PAINTING.

By C MORLAU VAUTHIER Demy 8vo with 5 Plates in Colour and Illustrations in Black and White 10s. 6d. net

REVIEWS AND APPRECIATIONS OF SOME OLD ITALIAN MASTERS.

By HILBERT COOK M.A. F.S.A. Small cr 4to illustrated 10s. net

PORTRAITS AND SKETCHES.

By EDMUND GOSSLE C.B. 11 D Crown 8vo 6s. net

THE INN OF TRANQUILLITY.

By JOHN GAI SWORTHY Crown 8vo 6s.

MEMOIRS OF THE MARQUISE DE CUSTINE. A vivid Personal Recollection of the French Revolution By L MAUGRAS and COUNTESS DE CROZELLE M.F. 8vo with Portrait 10s. net

GERMAN MEMORIES

By SIDNEY WHITMAN Demy 8vo with 5 Portraits 7s. 6d. net

WOMAN AND WOMANHOOD.

By C W SAILLBY M.D. Demy 8vo 10s. net

SALVE!

By GEORGE MOORE (Uniform with the Author's 'Avant') Crown 8vo 6s.

MICHAEL ANGELO.

By ROMAIN ROILLAND (Author of 'John Christopher') With 24 Plates in Monochrome 6s net

THE OLD CLOCK BOOK.

By N HUDSON MOORE With 104 Illustrations and a full list of Clockmakers Large crown 4to 10s. 6d. net

THE PROMISED LAND:

The Autobiography of a Russian Immigrant By MARY ANTIN 7s. 6d. net

THE BIRD OF TIME.

By SARAJINI NAIDU With an Introduction by EDMUND GOSSLE C.B. Fcap 8vo 5s. net

A LEGEND OF OLD PERSIA AND OTHER VERSES. By A B S TENNYSON Demy 8vo 5s. net

New 6s. Novels.

ADNAM'S ORCHARD Sarah Grand

THE "MIND THE PAINT" GIRL (Adapted from Sir A W Pinero's Play) Louis Tracy

THE CAHUSAC MYSTERY K. and H. Hesketh Prichard

A DESERT ROSE Mrs Daskein

GUTT'R BABIES Dorothea Slade

KING ERRANT Flora A Steel

MOLYNEUX OF MAYFAIR Duncan Schwann

LESS THAN THE DUST Mary A. Hamilton

THE BOOK OF WONDER Lord Dunsany

BETWEEN TWO THIEVES (2nd Imp) Richard Dehan

YONDER (2nd Imp) E. H. Young

THE MARRIAGE OF KETTLE C J. Cutcliffe Hype

WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21 BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

The Bookman.

"I am a Bookman."—James Russell Lowell.

No. 254. VOL. XLIII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

NOVEMBER, 1912.

PRICE SIXPENCE.
Published Monthly.

CONTENTS.

NEWS NOTES 85-91

THE BOOKSELLERS' DIARY 92

THE READER—

Sir A. Conan Doyle. By A.

ST. JOHN ADCOCK 95

Jean Jacques Rousseau. By

T. E. PAGE 111

The Mystery of Edwin Drood.

By THOMAS SECCOMBE .. 113

PRIZE COMPETITIONS .. 107

NEW BOOKS—

The Swanston Stevenson. By

NEIL MCNRO 114

An Absorbing Picture .. 115

The Indian Police 116

Sudermann in English. By

RICHARD CURLE 116

The Sporting Instinct .. 117

The Public School Boy. By

GEORGE SAMPSON 118

Court Gossip. By CLARE

JERROLD 118

Slices of Life. By EDWIN

PUGH 119

English Prose Rhythm .. 120

Views and Reviews 120

A Book of Wonder 121

Afloat and Ashore. By J. E.

PATTERSON 121

Childhood in a New Light.

By M. P. WILLCOCKS .. 122

A Keeper of the Royal Robes.

By LEWIS MELVILLE .. 123

Mrs. Marriott Watson's Poems.

By KATHARINE TYNAN .. 124

Australia's National Poet .. 124

Aspects of Existence 125

NOVEL NOTES—

The Happy Family—Tamsie—

Elizabeth, Betsy and Bess—

The Debt—Mrs. Lancelot—

The Lovers—Dr. Tuppy—

The Virgin Fortress—Letters to a Prison—Rusted

Hinges—London Lavender

126-130

THE BOOKMAN'S TABLE—

John Jonathan and Company

—The Cumberland Letters

—Rough Roads—The Shadow Show—Japan as I saw it 130-132

NOTES ON NEW BOOKS .. 132

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

The December BOOKMAN will be a Christmas Double Number—or we name it such from force of habit. It will, in fact, be at least a Quadruple Number. The Christmas BOOKMAN last year was, by common consent, the best as well as the largest Christmas Number we had ever published, but we venture to think that this year's will surpass it in both respects. The pictorial contents will include a Presentation Plate Portrait of Mr. Rudyard Kipling, specially taken for this issue of THE BOOKMAN; a portfolio of beautiful colour pictures, and numerous full-page colour plates by well-known artists. The Number will be very fully illustrated throughout, and among the literary contents will be articles on "Rudyard Kipling," by Dixon Scott; "Meredith's Letters," by Dr. William Barry; "Meredith's Poems," by Mrs. Alice Meynell; "Loeb's Library," by Professor Postgate, Litt. D.; "Among my Books," by W. E. A. Axon; "Rodin," by Holbrook Jackson; "William Morris's collected Works," by Edward Thomas; "A Stepchild of the Czar," by George Sampson; "Fountains in the Sand," by Richard Curle; "Mrs. Gaskell's Birthplace," by Mrs. Ellis Chadwick, "Literature in Little," by W. H. Hudson; "Gissing," by Edwin Pugh, etc. There will be also a long article reviewing the new colour books; and, in addition to all our usual features, two large and lavishly illustrated Supplements dealing with the gift books and other new books of the season.

The price of the Christmas Number this year will be 2s. net. We would remind our readers of the advisability of placing their orders for it at once as, though we are printing an extra quantity, we anticipate that it will be out of print even earlier than usual.

Sir A. Conan Doyle.
An original silhouette by E. O. Hoppé.

For much assistance with the illustrations to our article on Sir A. Conan Doyle we are greatly indebted to the courtesy of Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., and Mr. Greenhough Smith, the Editor of the Strand Magazine.

Photo by Rita Martin.

Lady Sybil Grant,

whose remarkable book of stories, "The Chequer Board," has just been published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

Mr. F. E. Green, whose striking book "The Awakening of England" (Nelson) we reviewed last month, has written a further study of English rural conditions, "The Tyranny of the Countryside," which Mr. Fisher Unwin is publishing.

The Pall Mall Magazine is changing hands. It has been taken over by Messrs. Iliffe, of London and Coventry, and will appear under their proprietorship from January next. The new editor is Mr. Louis Vincent, who was formerly editor of the London Magazine.

Mr. Foulis is publishing this month a book by Mr. Edwin Pugh on "The Charles Dickens Originals." It is not so literal as its title seems to indicate, but aims at getting away from the literalness of most Dickens commentators and presenting a study of the man and his work, as well as a review of his characters and their prototypes.

Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. are publishing "Chronicles of Avonlea," by Miss L. M. Montgomery, in which the delightful "Anne Shirley" of "Anne of Green Gables" and "Anne of Avonlea" plays some part. When she wrote "Anne of Green Gables" Miss Montgomery was a school teacher at Cavendish, in Prince Edward Island. Last year she was married to the Rev. Ewan Macdonald, and after a wedding trip to Alloa, in Scotland, they are settled down at the Manse, Leaksdale, in Ontario.

With the publication of "The Dop Doctor" Richard Dehan became at once a popular novelist; and the appearance of "Between Two Thieves" a few weeks ago proved to the satisfaction of critics and public that the writer of that remarkable South African story was not going to be a one-book author. But she had proved that already of course, for every one knows now that Richard Dehan is Miss Clo Graves, who has a long list of plays and novels to her name in the indispensable "Who's Who." She was born forty odd years ago in Ireland, where her father, Major W. H. Graves, of the 18th Royal Irish, held the post of Staff Officer of Pensioners. When she was nine years old her family emigrated to England. She had seen a good deal of barrack life, and at Southsea, where they went to live, she acquired a large knowledge of both services in the circle of naval and military friends they made there, and this knowledge is turned to account in "Between Two Thieves." In 1884, Miss Graves became an whose new novel, "Elizabeth, Betsy and Bess," published by Messrs. Duckworth, is reviewed on page 127.

Mrs. Schofield,

Miss Clo Graves
at the age of 4.

Miss Clo Graves
at the age of 21.

Photo by Ellis & Walery

Miss Clo Graves
("Richard Dehan")
at the age of 34.

Art student and worked at the British Museum Galleries and the Royal Female School of Art, helping to support herself by journalism of the lesser kind, amongst other things drawing little pen and ink grotesques for the comic papers, Judy and Fun, that were owned and edited by her friends the Messrs. Gilbert and Charles Dalziel. She had begun to write for the same publications some years previously. By-and-by she resolved to take to dramatic writing, and being too poor, she says, to manage in any other way, abandoned Art and took an engagement in a travelling theatrical company, and in 1888 came her first chance as a dramatist. She was back in London, working vigorously at journalism, writing verse and articles for the Illustrated London News, and the Lady's Pictorial, when Augustus Harris needed somebody to write extra lyrics for a pantomime then in preparation, and Mr. Alfred Gibbons, editor of the Lady's Pictorial, sent her to him with a note of recommendation. It ended in Miss Clo Graves writing the pantomime of "Puss in Boots," the death of Blanchard having left the theatre at a loss for an author. Later, she was indebted to the generosity of Sir Augustus Harris for the production at a Drury Lane matinee of her first play, an eerie tragedy called "Nitooris," the scenes of which were placed, says Miss Graves, "like the allegory of Mrs. Malaprop, on the banks of the Nile." One of her plays, "The Mother of Three," brought Miss Graves not only high compliments but a sufficiency of coin, and lately, under the name of Richard Dehan, she has done work of larger scope and finer quality than ever before, for "after twenty years of trying," as she puts it, "I am beginning to know how to write."

Messrs. E. C. & T. C. Jack have just published "A History of the British Nation," by Mr. A. D. Innes. It is a large book of a thousand pages, so written that it appeals "not to the school-master or the schoolboy primarily, but to everyone who understands or wishes to understand and enjoy our nation's story," and its amazingly cheap price brings it within the reach of all. It contains four hundred illustrations and maps, drawn almost exclusively from contemporary sources, which derive an additional value from a descriptive appendix by Mr. S. G. Stubbs, who has been entirely responsible for their selection and arrangement.

Mr. Robert Halifax, whose new novel, "A Slice of Life" (Constable), is reviewed on page 119.

"Early Christian
Visions of the Other

Miss Rosamond Napier, whose new novel, "Tamsie," is reviewed on page 127

World" is the title of a new book by Canon MacCulloch, D.D., author of "The Religion of the Ancient Celts." It will be published by the St Giles's Printing Co., of Edinburgh

Mr. J. M. Kennedy's "English Literature 1880-1905" is published by Messrs Stephen Swift & Co. We are sorry that our reviewer last month erroneously named Mr. Martin Secker as the publisher.

Mr. John Murray announces a complete collection of the poetical work of Mr. Henry Newbolt.

In common with many other reviewers, we spoke of the author of "Windyridge," Mr. W. Riley, as a woman. We hear from Mr Herbert Jenkins the publisher, that when his readers reported on the novel they were under the same illusion, that he himself in accepting the work addressed the author as "Miss," and he admits that even now when he looks over the story, he is puzzled to understand how it can have been written by a man. Nevertheless, the author is of the sterner sex. He was born in 1866, and is the son of Mr. Joseph Riley, a Bradford stuff manufacturer and merchant. On leaving Bradford Grammar School he joined his father and elder brother in their business, but a little later developed a Slide publishing business, which was finally turned into a limited company, the shares in which are all held by members of his family. He is a Wesleyan Methodist; a local preacher; but has long made a sort of hobby of literature, and some while back contributed articles and short stories to various papers. He began to write "Windyridge" solely for the amusement of certain of his friends, and allowed the heroine, Grace Holden, to tell her own story, he had no plot and no idea at the outset of what was going to happen from one chapter to another. He started Grace at the writing of her memoirs, and the tale grew naturally as she went on. The book has been compared to "Cranford" and has not only justified itself with the critics, but has caught on with the public, and is already in a third edition whose new novel, "The Blackberry Pickers," is published by Messrs Putnam & Sons.

Miss St. Leger,

Two months too late, unfortunately, for our special Colonial Number, we have received an interesting letter from Mr Everard Browne, the son of "Rolf Boldrewood," who kindly encloses some notes of his father's career. "I found my father had your letter some time before he mentioned it to me, otherwise I would have replied sooner," writes Mr. Browne. "He is still, I am glad to say (at the age of eighty-six), in good health and wonderful spirits; in spite of not being able to walk about much nowadays. He reads his own books now with great interest and amusement, and his diaries and sketches of years gone by. Luckily his eyesight has kept good, and he enjoys reading as much as ever, and is well able to amuse himself. His many old friends look him up when they are in town and give him a pleasant

Mr. W. Riley
Author of "Windyridge." (Herbert Jenkins.)

Rolf Boldrewood, in 1909.

Mrs. H. H. Penrose, whose novel, "Charles the Great" was published last month by Messrs. Methuen.

hour or two." As a novelist, Rolf Boldrewood is still a comparatively young author, for he dates his literary career from the publication of his first and most successful novel, "Robbery Under Arms," which he did not write until he was sixty-two. He had written only a few occasional sketches before that, and Mrs. Browne tells us this was how he happened to become an author: "My husband went to inspect a station which he thought of purchasing. After inspecting it, he went in quest of his horse, which he had turned loose, and it kicked him. He was laid up for a time, unable to walk, and devoted his enforced holiday to the writing of a sketch called 'A Kangaroo Drive,' which appeared in the Cornhill." Questioned about his own works, Rolf Boldrewood thinks their popularity is largely due to the fact that they are based on a long and intimate acquaintance with the country life of Australia, "which is, of course, its distinctive life."

He has been a pastoralist, both in Victoria and New South Wales, and had been Police Magistrate in the Gold

Rolf Boldrewood
(1862).

Fields and Commissioner before he wrote his first novel, and "the daring rogues who figured prominently in 'Robbery Under Arms,' were the sons of an employee of his. This man, transported for some early offence, possessed exceptional ability. He built the house which for a time we lived in, in the country, and he could do well whatever he took in hand. All his lads were daring. Fortunately for himself, one of them enlisted, served in South Africa, distinguished himself, won the Victoria Cross and, going home, married a lady of family."

Miss Rose Boldrewood, the author of "Complications at Collaroi," thinks that where the painting of Australian life is concerned her father may prove a too formidable rival to her, and on this point Rolf Boldrewood remarks, "There is room for pictures of Australian life from many standpoints. The tendency of Australian books, taken haphazard, is to give rather a false view of our country. So very many of them deal with the very undeveloped section of the community far back, and this section is, after all, a comparatively small one." That first sketch of Rolf Boldrewood's appeared in the Cornhill as far back as 1865, and "Robbery Under Arms" ran serially in the Sydney Mail in 1888. Almost as popular in Australia has been his "Old Melbourne Memories," which appeals especially to many veterans who "have lost their taste for lollies and novels." Son of the late Captain Sylvestre Browne, of the East India Company's service, Rolf Boldrewood was born in England on the 6th August, 1826, but "he is to all intents and purposes an Australian, for he came out to New South Wales in 1830. He was educated at the school of a Mr. Cape, in Sydney, and with Mr. Cape proceeded to Sydney College, of which that educationalist was head master. His schooldays were not unduly drawn out. At the age of seventeen he took a herd of cattle to the Port Fairy district of the then almost unknown Colony of Victoria, and from that time on the world has been his book and experience his teacher." In 1862, he married Miss Riley, daughter of William Edward Riley, of Raby, New South Wales; he has had five daughters, one of whom inherits much of his gift as a novelist, and four sons,

Mr. Charles O'Mahony.

Author of "The Viceroys of Ireland" (John Long).

two of whom are still living—Mr. Everard Browne, of Melbourne, and Mr. Gerald Browne, who is partner in a firm of mining engineers in London.

Photo by J. P. Bamber, blackpool.

Mr. Joseph Whittaker.

Author of "Far Off Fields."

It was in the Michaelmas week of 1812 that the publishing firm of Murray entered into occupation of their present premises at 50, Albemarle Street, thereafter to become one of the literary shrines of London. We congratulate Mr. John Murray, the fourth of his line, on this happy birthday of his House. What a change in literary times and manners those hundred years have seen! In 1812 the Peninsular War was in progress; Lord Liverpool became Prime Minister; and America declared war upon us. Earlier in the same year—in March, in fact—the first two cantos of "Childe Harold" had suddenly brought Byron's name into prominence. He had awoke and found himself famous. Since then Albemarle Street has been an intellectual centre of interest. In the drawing-room, which in those days was over the shop, for the present business premises at 50A were opened subsequently, such men as Byron, Scott, Tom Moore gathered; and among other great names connected with this House during its century are Gladstone, Disraeli, Borrow, Coleridge, Stanley, Livingstone, Milman, Darwin, and Dufferin. The House of Murray has a glorious history: founded in 1768, it is one of the oldest London publishing houses, and is still as vigorously alive and full of enterprise as the youngest.

Mr. Stewart Caven, whose first novel, "Palmer's Green," Messrs Putnam are publishing.

of twenty-eight, he is married and withdrawn into the country to devote himself entirely to literature. "The Viceroy of Ireland" is his first book; he is at present engaged upon a novel of Anglo-Irish life.

Mr. Joseph Whittaker, who has just issued a new book of poems, "Far Off Fields," is the author of four other books of verse and an admirable volume of short stories, "Tales of Tumblefold." He was born in 1871, and his "Tumblefold" stories are largely drawn from the life of Townwell Fold in Wolverhampton, where his early years were passed. He began life at the age of twelve as a pawnbroker's assistant, in the East End of Wolverhampton; and later whilst he was working as a warehouse clerk wrote much in verse for various papers, and in 1892 published his first volume by subscription. In 1897 he became a journalist on a Blackpool newspaper, and later was engaged for four years on the Gazette News of that town, and for nearly six on the Blackpool Herald. For the last five years he has been reporter in charge of the Dartford Express. In the interval he suffered much from ill health and the usual ups and downs that await the journalist, but continued the writing of stories and verse, and the publication of his books brought him many friends. In his pawnbroking days he wrote a sonnet on Faed's picture, "Milton's Dream," and subsequently Faed wrote to him warmly commending one of his volumes of poems; last year the late Sir Gilzean Reid, attracted by his journalistic work, took a special interest in his books, expressing himself "surprised to see how wonderfully fertile your mind has been and how rarely varied your literary gifts are." He went on to say that in the "Tales of Tumblefold," and in the poems he

Mr. Charles O'Mahoney, whose book on "The Viceroy of Ireland" is published by Mr. John Long, has been engaged in London journalism since 1904 when he acted as dramatic critic for the Daily Mirror. He has since occupied a similar position on Vanity Fair and the Sportsman. Nowadays, at the age found "true poetic feeling, fine pathos, and a literary faculty which ought to get a better chance of being known more widely." He also wondered as others may be inclined to, "Why are the books produced in Blackpool and not on the housetops by a well-known London publisher? My experience is not favourable to local publishing of books."

Mr. Rex Beach, whose new romance, "The Net," has just been published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, has led the breezy, open-air, adventurous life that readers of "The Spoilers" "The Barrier," and others of his stirring, vigorous stories would naturally credit him with. He was born in Michigan, and later went to school at Florida, where his father was engaged in the business of growing oranges. In due course, he was sent to Chicago to study law, but preferred playing at football, assisted his team in winning whose new novel, "The Net," has just been published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

Mr. Rex Beach,

the championship, and did great things as a record swimmer. He never took to the law; it bored him, and he was so little of a speaker that he says the only eloquence he developed was when he drove a dog team. Getting tired of his clients, he went gold-seeking into Alaska; then after trying various other enterprises, he embarked in the building line, and proceeded to erect chimneys, furnaces and power plants. He gave this up when he met a friend who was making a lot of money by writing fiction, and following his good example was soon a popular contributor to the American magazines and presently growing rich as the author of "The Spoilers," and other novels, and as a very successful playwright. He says he still feels that he ought to be digging somewhere or carrying something, and goes big game hunting from time to time in order to get rid of his superfluous energy.

The Booksellers' Diary.

LIST OF FORTHCOMING BOOKS.

November 1st to December 1st, 1912.

Messrs. Allen & Co.

(Incorporated with Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.)

- ADDY, S. O.—Church and Manor. With 40 Plans and Illustrations. 15s. net.
 BRODIE, R. H.—Who Pays: The Real Incidence of Taxation. 1s. and 2s. 6d. net.
 DUNKLEY, REV. PREBENDARY (Editor).—The Official Report of the Church Congress, 1912. 10s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSON, REV. THEODORE (Editor).—Clergyman's Ready Reference Diary for 1913. All bindings with round corners. Pocket size: Cloth, limp, 3s. 6d.; roan, gilt edges, 5s.; roan, gilt edges, with pocket and tuck or flap and elastic band, 6s.
 LOVEMAN, LEONORA.—The Snow Queen. (From Hans Andersen) 6d. and 1s. net.
 RUDD, EMILY A. (with Music by BRIDGE, SIR FREDERICK).—Christiana and Her Children. From "Christian's Progress" ("Standard Play" Series.) 6d. and 1s. net.
 SCHULTZE, PROFESSOR RUDOLPH.—Experimental Psychology and Pedagogy. Translated by Rudolf Pitner, M.A. (Edin.), Ph.D. (Leipzig) With over 300 Illustrations. 15s. net.
 STEEL, GRIZELLE S.—With Lute and Lyre. 10 full-page Illustrations and 6 in text. 3s. 6d. net.
 STILLER, PROFESSOR.—Germanic Philology. Translated by Professor J. D. Jones. 4s. 6d. net.

Mr. Edward Arnold.

- AMERY, L. S.—Union and Strength. 12s. 6d. net.
 COLLIE, SIR JOHN, M.D.—Malingering. 7s. 6d. net.
 SEDGWICK, ANNE DOUGLAS.—The Nest and other Stories. 6s.
 STEWART, H. L., D.Ph.—Questions of the Day in Philosophy and Psychology. 10s. 6d. net.
 WARE, FABIAN.—The Worker and His Country. 5s. net.

Mr. B. T. Batsford.

- BATES, E. L., and CHARLESWORTH, F.—Practical Mathematics. 330 Illustrations.
 BATES, E. L., and CHARLESWORTH, F.—Practical Geometry and Graphics. 600 Illustrations.
 BOND, FRANCIS.—The Cathedrals of England and Wales. Being a Fourth Edition of "English Cathedrals Illustrated." Remodelled and largely rewritten. With over 200 new Illustrations.
 MITCHELL, CHARLES F. (Assisted by MITCHELL, GEORGE A.).—Building Construction. With over 800 Illustrations. Seventh Edition, thoroughly Revised and Enlarged.
 OLIVER, BASIL.—Old Houses and Village Buildings in East Anglia—Norfolk, Suffolk and Essex. Illustrated in a series of 127 Examples on 85 Collotype Plates, reproduced from Photographs specially taken by Horace Dan, Sydney Driver, and others.
 SHUFFREY, L. A.—The English Fireplace. Illustrated by 130 full-page Plates.
 STATHAM, H. H.—A Short Critical History of Architecture. 700 Illustrations. The Historic Styles of Ornament, containing 1,500 Examples from all Countries and Periods, Exhibited on 100 Plates (size 12½ in. by 9¼ in.), mostly printed in Gold and Colours. With Historical and Descriptive Text. Translated from the German of H. Dolmetsch. Second English Edition. Revised and Enlarged.
 VALLANCE, AYMER.—The Old Colleges of Oxford. With a full Bibliography. Illustrated by 50 Collotype Plates from Photographs by A. E. Walsham, and from Original Paintings and Engravings by J. M. W. Turner, F. Mackenzie, David Loggan, W. Williams and M. Burgheers. With 232 Illustrations in the text.
 WALDRAN, PERCY J.—The Principles of Structural Mechanics. Over 200 Illustrations.

Messrs. A. & C. Black.

- BARRATT, THOMAS J., D.L.—The Annals of Hampstead. 4s. 5s. net.
 DUHM, PROFESSOR BERNHARD.—Bibliothèque Rouge en Couleurs. Les Contes de ma Grand-mère, 2s. 6d. net; Eric, 2s. 6d. net.
 DUHM, PROFESSOR BERNHARD.—Les Beaux Voyages. Indo-Chine, 2s. net; Tunisie, 2s. net.
 DUHM, PROFESSOR BERNHARD.—The Twelve Prophets. Translated by Dr. Archibald Duff. 3s. 6d. net.
 HEADLAM, CECIL, M.A.—France. ("The Making of the Nations" Series) 7s. 6d. net.
 McLEAN, ANGUS, B.Sc.—Practical Physics. Vol. I. 7s. 6d. net.
 MUSSON, S. C.—La Côte d'Emeraude. Painted by J. Hardwicke Lewis. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. William Blackwood & Sons.

- MACPHERSON, HECTOR.—Scotland's Debt to Protestantism. With Portrait of the Author. 1s. net.
 MERZ, J. THEODORE, Ph.D., D.C.L., LL.D.—A History of European Thought in the Nineteenth Century. Vol. III. 15s. net.
 QUILLER-COUCH, SIR A. T. ("Q")—Hocken and Hunken. A Tale of Tröy. 6s.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall, Ltd.

- ASKEW, ALICE and CLAUDE.—The King's Signature. 6s.
 CROUCH, WALTER.—Charles Dickens and Social Reform. 5s. net.
 MARYON, HERBERT.—Metalwork and Enamelling. 7s. 6d. net.
 MILNE, JAMES. John Jonathan and Company. 5s. net.
 RENTON, RICHARD.—John Forster and his Friendships. 10s. 6d. net.
 THURSTON, E. TEMPLE.—The Greatest Wish in the World. 2s. net.
 TOYNBEE, WILLIAM (Edited by).—The Diaries of William Charles Macready. 2 Vols. 32s. net.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

- DENT, EDWARD J.—Mozart's Operas: A Critical Study. 12s. 6d. net.
 LANG, JOHN (Editor).—Fry's Royal Guide to the London Charities. 1s. 6d.
 NEVILL, RALPH.—The Man of Pleasure. Illustrated by George Cruikshank and others. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. J. Clarke & Co.

- BEGBIE, HAROLD.—Everychild. Cover in Colours and Coloured Frontispiece. 1s. net.
 STREET, JENNIE.—The Seed of the Kingdom. Devotional Readings from the Letters of Isaac Penington. 1s. net.

Messrs. T. & T. Clark.

- HASTINGS, REV. JAMES, M.A., D.D.—St. John (completion) and James to Jude. 2 Vols. ("Great Texts of the Bible" Series.) 10s. each, or Subscription price 6s. net each.
 McLAREN, PROFESSOR WM. D., M.A.—Our Growing Creed.
 VON HUGEL, BARON FRIEDRICH.—Eternal Life: A Study of its Implications and Applications.

Messrs. W. B. Clive & Sons.

- CHAYTOR, H. J., M.A., and HARTY, W. G., M.A.—Metric French Essays. 1s. 6d.
 HOSKING, A.—School Gardening, with a Guide to Horticulture. 3s. 6d.
 ROBERTS, G., M.A.—New Junior French Course. 2s. 6d.

Messrs. Digby, Long & Co.

- BAKER, MRS. ALICE L.—A Maid of Mettle. 6s.
 CANNING, ETHEL.—The Day must Break. 6s.
 DIGBY, MAJOR H. M.—Sir Kenelm Digby and George Digby, Earl of Bristol. With Portraits. 7s. 6d. net.
 HOPE, MARGARET.—Nina and Her Cousins. 3s. 6d.
 SPEIGHT, T. W.—On the Fringe. 6s.
 TIBBITS, ANNIE O.—At What Sacrifice. 6s.
 TITSON, MARIE.—The Three Sisters. 6s.
 WARDEN, FLORENCE.—The Fight for a Soul. 6s.

Mr. A. C. Fifield.

- BUTLER, SAMUEL (The Note Books of).—Selected, Arranged and Edited by Henry Festing Jones. With Photogravure Portrait from a Photograph taken in 1894 by Alfred Cathie; a Biographical Statement, Butler's Poems, and an Index. 6s. net.
 TAYLOR, DR. J. LIONEL.—The Nature of Woman: A Biological and Sociological Study. 3s. 6d. net.
 TURNER, DENIS ("X.Y.X.").—Fatuus Fables, and other Verses. 2s. 6d. net.

Mr. Henry Frowde.

- BRIDGES, R.—Poems. 2s. to 5s.
 CAIRNS, W. B.—A History of American Literature.
 CARDEN, ADMIRAL.—Memoirs. Edited by C. T. Atkinson.
 HALL, H. M.—Idylls of Fishermen. 6s. 6d. net.
 LEONARD, R. N.—The Pageant of English Prose. 2s.
 MARRIS, W. S.—Order of Horace. 2s. 6d. net.
 MURRAY, R. H.—Journal of John Stevens (War in Ireland, 1689-97).
 SCHOFIELD, W. H.—Chivalry in English Literature (Harvard).
 TENNYSON.—Poems. Verbatim Reprint of 1842 Edition. 2s. 6d. net.
 TENNYSON.—Tennyson's Poems. 91 Illustrations. 4s. 6d. net.
 THOMPSON, SIR E. MANDO.—Introduction to Greek and Latin Palaeography.
 VINOGRADOFF, P.—Oxford Studies in Social and Legal History: Part V. St. André of Bordeaux, E. C. Lodge; Part VI. 100 Years of Poor Law Administration in a Warwickshire Village, A. W. Ashley. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Headley Bros.

- "ANON"—The Year 1912. Illustrated Souvenir Volume of the World's Great Events. 2s. 6d. net.
 BRAITHWAITE, WM. C., B.A., LL.B.—Concerning Religious Education. 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.
 FIELD, MILDRED F., B.A.—Method in Religious Education. 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.
 GRAVESON, CAROLINE C., B.A.—The United Monarchy. 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.
 SMITH, I. ISABEL.—The Period of the Patriarchy. 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.
 WARNER, S. ALLEN.—The Period of the Exodus. 1s. 6d. net and 1s. net.
 * First Volumes of Teachers and Taught Text Books.

Mr. Wm. Heinemann.

- ANGELL, NORMAN.—International Finance and International Polity. 3s. 6d. net.
 AUTHOR OF "HE WHO PASSED"—The Life Mask. 6s.
 BENEDITE, LEONCE.—Courbet. ("French Artists of our Day") 2s. 6d. net.
 BLAND, J. O. P.—Recent Events and Present Policies in China. 16s. net.
 CUNNINGHAM-GRAHAM, R. B.—Hernando de Soto. 5s. net.
 DASKEIN, MRS.—A Desert Rose. 6s.
 DIEULAFOY, M.—Spam. With 600 Illustrations. 6s. net.
 DUGMORE, A. RADCLIFFE.—Wild Life and the Camera. Illustrated. 6s. net.
 FILON, A.—The Prince Imperial. With numerous Portraits and Illustrations. 15s. net.
 "FOEMINA"—The Soul of the English. 6s. net.
 GOLDIE, V.—The Declension of Henry d'Albanc. 6s.
 GOSSE, EDMUND, C.B., LL.D.—Father and Son. Booklover's Edition, with new Portraits. 6s. net.
 GOSSE, EDMUND, C.B., LL.D.—Portraits and Studies. 6s. net.
 HARRISON, FREDERIC.—The Positive Evolution of Religion. 8s. 6d. net.
 HAYWARD, RACHEL.—The Hippodrome. 6s.
 HIND, ARTHUR.—Hogarth, Fragonard. ("Great Engravers" Series.) 64 pages of Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net each.
 MARGUERITE, VICTOR.—The Frontiers of the Heart. 6s.
 MASPERO, M.—Egypt. With 600 Illustrations. 6s. net.
 MAYREDER, ROSA.—A Survey of Woman's Problem. 5s. net.
 MITCHELL, P. CHALMERS.—The Childhood of Animals. Illustrated. 10s. net.
 MOORE, N. HUDSON.—The Old Clock Book. 104 Illustrations and full List of Clockmakers. 10s. 6d. net.
 PATTERSON, J. E.—The Romance of Stephen Compton. 6s.
 ROBINS, ELIZABETH.—Where are you going to? 6s.
 SANDEMAN, GEORGE.—Real Social Principles. 6s. net.
 SLADE, DOROTHEA.—Gutter Babies. Illustrated by Lady Stanley. 6s.
 STEEL, FLORA.—King Errant. 6s.
 STRONG, MRS.—Rome. With 600 Illustrations. 6s. net.
 TALBOT, P. AMAURY.—In the Shadow of the Bush. 18s. net.
 TALBOT, F. A.—Lightships and Lighthouses. 6s. net.
 TALBOT, F. A.—Steamship Conquest of the Sea. 6s. net.
 VON HERDER, ALEXANDRA.—Jesus of Nazareth. A Poetical Drama. 5s. net.
 WALIZEWSKA, K.—The Son of Catherine the Great: Paul I of Russia. With Portrait. 15s. net.
 WHITNEY, CASPAR.—The Flowing Road. 24 Illustrations and Maps. 12s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Herbert & Daniel.

- BAILEY, T. A.—Verses. 3s. 6d. net.
 BUNSTON, ANNA.—Songs of God and Man. 3s. 6d. net.
 CANTON, WILLIAM.—The Story of St. Elizabeth of Hungary. With 8 Coloured Illustrations by Eleanor Fortescue Breckdale. 6s. net. Also an Edition de Luxe.
 COLUM, PADRAIC.—Oliver Goldsmith (Regent Library). 2s. 6d. net.
 EVANS, A. W. (Translated by).—Lacordaire. From the French of the Comte d'Haussonville. 3s. 6d. net.
 GALES, REV. R. L.—A Poet of Folk Songs. 3s. 6d. net.
 GASQUET, RT. REV. ABBOT, and DOM NORBERT BIRT, O.S.B.—A Handbook of Religious Orders. 7s. 6d. net.
 HOPKINS, TIGHE.—Wards of the State. 10s. 6d. net.
 MEYNELL, VIOLA.—George Eliot (Regent Library). 2s. 6d. net.
 MEYNELL, WILFRID.—Verses and Reverses. 1s. net Popular Edition; 2s. 6d. net cloth.
 SACKVILLE, LADY MARGARET.—Jane Austen (Regent Library). 2s. 6d. net.
 SACKVILLE, LADY MARGARET.—Lyrics. 3s. 6d. net.
 WILLIAMS, CHARLES.—The Silver Stair. 3s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

- BALFOUR, LADY FRANCES.—The Life of Dr. James MacGregor.
 BLACK, REV. PROFESSOR HUGH.—Three Dreams.
 CONNOR, RALPH.—Corporal Cameron.
 DEISSMANN, PROFESSOR ADOLF.—St. Paul in the Light of Social and Religious History.

FABRE, J. H.—The Life of the Spider.
 FLEMING, D. HAY, LL.D.—Critical Reviews Relating Chiefly to Scotland.
 FORSYTH, REV. PRINCIPAL P. T.—The Principle of Authority.
 GORDON, THE HON. AND REV. A., M.A.—The Life of Professor Charteris.
 HOCKING, JOSEPH.—Rosaleen O'Hara.
 HUTTON, REV. J. A.—The Weapons of our Warfare.
 KELMAN, REV. J., D.D.—Among Famous Books.
 KIPLING, RUDYARD.—Collected Verse.
 KNIGHT, REV. G. H.—Abiding Help for Changing Days.
 KNOWLES, JOSEPHINE.—The Upholstered Cage.
 MACAULAY, REV. A. B.—The Word of the Cross.
 MACDONALD, J. RAMSAY.—Margaret Ethel Macdonald.
 MILLER, REV. J. R., D.D.—The Secret of Love.
 MORGAN, REV. G. CAMPBELL.—The Teaching of Christ.
 NICOLL, SIR W. ROBERTSON, M.A., LL.D.—The Expositor's Treasury of Children's Sermons.
 PAGET, STEPHEN.—Another Device.
 PATERSON, REV. W. P.—The Rule of Faith.
 SCLATER, REV. J. R. P.—The River of Content.
 SILHERRAD, UNA L.—The Real Presence.
 SIMPSON, PROFESSOR J. Y.—The Spiritual Interpretation of Nature.
 SIMPSON, REV. J. G., D.D.—Ideas in Action.
 SMITH, PROFESSOR DAVID.—The Historic Jesus.
 STREATFIELD, REV. CANON G. S.—Words of Witness.
 TAIT, REV. THOS. M.A.—How to Train the Speaking Voice.
 THORNE, GUY.—The Great Acceptance.
 TOWER, WALTER S., and ROBERTS, JOHN.—Petroleum.

Messrs. Hurst & Blackett.

LEROUX, GASTON (Translated by JEPON, EDGAR).—The Man with the Black Feather. 6s.
 PAGE, GERTRUDE.—The Great Splendour. 6s.
 VAN RENSSLAER (AKS JOHN KING).—Prophetic, Educational, and Playing Cards: Their Origin, History, and Uses. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

ADAM, J. A. STANLEY, and WHITE, BERNARD C.—Parodies and Imitations, Old and New. "The Cream of Parody." Foreword by Sir A. Quiller Couch. 7s. 6d. net.
 BRENDON, J. A.—Twelve Great Passions. Famous Love Stories. Illustrated. 6s. net.
 PAPE, FRANK (Illustrated by).—The Book of Psalms. 24 Illustrations in Colour. 10s. 6d. net.
 RIVERS, JOHN.—Greuze and His Models. With 39 full page Gravure Plates and other Illustrations with text. 10s. 6d. net.

Messrs. E. C. & T. C. Jack.

THE PEOPLE'S BOOKS.

A UNIVERSITY WOMAN.—The Baby A Mother's Book. By a Mother. 6d. net.
 BONNEY, PROFESSOR T. G.—The Structure of the Earth. 6d. net.
 CLAYTON, JOSEPH.—Co-operation. 6d. net.
 COMPTON-RICKETT, A. M.A., LL.D.—A History of English Literature. 6d. net.
 DAVIDSON, H. S., M.B., F.R.C.S.E.—Marriage and Motherhood. A Wife's Handbook. 6d. net.
 HALL, WILLIAM, R.N., B.A.—Navigation. 6d. net.
 HUTCHINSON, A. M., M.D.—Hypnotism and Self Education. 6d. net.
 LEMPFE, R. G. K.—Weather Science. 6d. net.
 MASTERMAN, REV. CANON.—The Church of England. 6d. net.
 SHILLITO, REV. EDWARD, M.A.—Hope and Mission of the Free Churches. 6d. net.
 SPILLER, G.—The Training of the Child. A Parent's Manual. 6d. net.
 WATSON, AARON.—Tennyson. 6d. net.

MASTERSPIECES OF MUSIC.

CLUTSAM, GEORGE H. Schubert. 1s. 6d. net.
 COWEN, SIR FREDERIC.—Haydn. 1s. 6d. net.
 COWEN, SIR FREDERIC.—Rossini. 1s. 6d. net.
 STANFORD, SIR CHARLES V.—Brahms. 1s. 6d. net.

Mr. Herbert Jenkins.

CONGREVE, MISTRESS A. E.—The One Maid Book of Cookery. 2s. 6d. net.
 CULL, A. TULLOCH.—Poems to Pavlova. With 8 Illustrations of Mme Pavlova in her most Famous Dances. 3s. 6d. net.
 TURQUAN, JOSEPH.—A Great Coquette. Madame Récamier and Her Salon. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 16 other Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.
 WILKINSON, M. E.—Embroidery Stitches. With 200 Illustrations. 5s. net.

Mr. John Lane.

"A RIFLEMAN."—The Struggle for Bread. 5s. net.
 CHILDERS, HUGH.—Romantic Trials of Three Centuries. With numerous Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.
 HEENEY, WILLIAM BERTAL.—Pickanock: A Tale of Settlement Day in Older Canada. 6s.
 JACKSON, WILFRID.—Cross Views. 5s. net.
 PETRE, F. LORRAINE.—Napoleon's Last Campaign in Germany. With 17 Maps and Plans. 12s. 6d. net.
 STIRLING, A. M. W.—The Letter-Bag of Lady Elizabeth Spencer Stanhope. With a Colour Plate, two Photogravures, and numerous other Illustrations. 2 Vols. 32s. net.
 VANE, GEORGE.—The Love Dream. 6s.
 WEALE, W. H. JAMES (with the co-operation of BROCKWELL, M. H.).—The Van Eycks and their Art. With numerous Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

D'AUVERGNE, E. B.—The Light Side of London. 6s. net.
 CROSS, VICTORIA.—The Night of Temptation. 6s.
 DRAKE, MAURICE.—The History of English Stained Glass. 42s. net.
 FIELD, EUGENE.—Christmas Tales and Christmas Verse. With Coloured Illustrations. 6s. net.
 HALL, THORNTON.—Love Affairs of the Courts of Europe. 12s. 6d. net.
 LANG, ELSIE M.—Old English Towns. 6s. net.

Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co.

ABNEY, SIR WILLIAM DE WIVELSLIE.—Researches in Colour Vision and the Trichromatic Theory. With 4 Coloured Plates and Diagrams in the text.
 BODLEY, J. E. C.—Cardinal Manning and other Essays. With Frontispiece.
 HOUSTOUN, R. A.—An Introduction to Mathematical Physics.
 LANG, ANDREW.—Shakespeare, Bacon, and the Great Unknown. With Illustrations.
 PERCIVAL, ARCHIBALD STANLEY.—Geometrical Optics. With Diagrams.
 SHEPPARD, S. E., D.Sc.—Photochemistry.
 THORPE, SIR EDWARD (Assisted by Eminent Contributors).—A Dictionary of Applied Chemistry. Revised and Enlarged Edition. In 5 Volumes. With numerous Illustrations. Vol. III. Gr-Oils. 45s. net.
 WHETHAM, WILLIAM CECIL DAMPIER, M.A., F.R.S., and CATHERINE DURNING WHETHAM, his wife.—Science and the Human Mind. 5s. net.
 HOYT, F. D.—Catherine Sidney. 6s.

Messrs. Lynwood & Co.

ANDREWS, M. HENNIKER.—An Indian Mystery. 6s.
 ARMSTRONG, MARTIN D.—Poems. 1s. 6d. net.

BOSTOCK, SUSAN.—Spring Notes and other Poems. 2s. 6d. net.
 BUNGEY, EDGAR NEWTON.—Corn in Egypt. 6s.
 COOPER, MARJORIE.—Aileen. 6s.
 CRANSTON, DOUGLAS.—The Adventures of Lester Grayling, K.C. 6s.
 DUNNING, MAYNARD.—Nerissa. 6s.
 FOY, SLIEVE.—Stories of Irish Life: Past and Present. 1s. net.
 HALE, ADA M. M.—Leshe. 6s.
 HOLLAND, CLIVE.—A Madonna of the Poor and other Stories. 6s.
 HOLLAND, CLIVE.—My Japanese Wife.—Marcelle of the Latin Quarter.—An Egyptian Coquette. New Editions. 1s. net each.
 HOPE, F.—Rosamond. 6s.
 HOPKINS, R. THURSTON.—Oscar Wilde: A Study. With Portrait. 2s. 6d. net.
 KING, RACHEL.—The Common Problem. 6s.
 LEEDS, MRS. LEWIS.—Mr. Massiter. 6s.
 LEITH, MRS. DISNEY.—A Black Martinmas. 6s.
 PEERLESS, A.—The Searchlight on the Throne. Reminiscences of an Ex-Ambassador. 6s.
 ROWE, JOSEPHINE V.—Poems. 2s. 6d. net.
 STOCK, RALPH.—The Recipe for Rubber. A Fijian Romance. With Illustrations by Norman Lindsay. 6s.
 YOLLAND, E.—The Struggle for the Crown. A Romance of the Seventeenth Century. 6s.

Messrs. Maclehoose & Sons.

PRIMROSE, REV. JAMES.—Medieval Glasgow. 7s. 6d. net.

Mr. Elkin Mathews.

BARDSWELL, FRANCES A.—Twelve Moons. With Frontispiece in Colour by Isabelle Forrest. 2s. 6d. net.
 BLAKEMORE, TREVOR.—Poems and Ballads. 3s. 6d. net.
 BOTTOMLEY, GORDON.—Chambers of Imagery. Second Series. 1s. net.
 CHAMBERLIN, I. CHAMBERLIN.—Songs from the Forests of Tane. With a Photogravure. 2s. 6d. net.
 DILLON, ARTHUR.—Pelops: A Tetralogy—the Charioteer, Chrysippus, The Victors at Olympia—and Tantalus, a Satyr Play. 3s. 6d. and 1s. 6d. net.
 DOWSON, ERNEST.—Dilemmas: Short Stories. New and Cheaper Edition. 2s. 6d. net.
 FORESTER, GEORGE.—Poems. 1s. 6d. net.
 GLAZIER, LOUISE M.—The Field Flowers' Lore. A Collection of Legends. Illustrated with Woodcuts. 2s. 6d. net.
 JOHNSON, LIONEL.—Collected Poems. 6s. net.
 JOYING ROWE, LOUISE.—Poems. With a Portrait in Photogravure after J. E. Millais, R.A.
 KNIGHT, PROFESSOR, LL.D.—Coleridge and Wordsworth in the West Country: Their Early Friendships and Surroundings. With numerous Drawings by E. H. New.
 "LUCILLA"—Songs.
 LYON, W.—Hyperourania. 1s. net.
 NOGUCHI, YONE.—The American Diary of a Japanese Girl. With Frontispiece in Colour printed from 25 Wood Blocks. 7s. 6d. net.
 PHILLIPS, STEPHEN.—Lyrical Poems.
 RICHARD, MADAME MURIEL.—Essays in Song. 1s. net.
 SHANNON, MORROGH.—The Howling Ships of Tar-shish and other Poems. 3s. net.
 VISIAK, E. H., and HAWKINS, C. V.—The War of the Schools. 2s. 6d. net.
 WALROND, F. ERNLEY.—The Gods of Africa and other Poems.

Messrs. Methuen & Co.

GLOVER, J. M.—Jimmy Glover, his Book. New Edition. 1s. net.
 GLOVER, T. R.—Virgil. 7s. 6d. net.
 MOORMAN, F. W. (Edited by).—Winter's Tale (Arden Shakespeare). 2s. 6d. net.
 OXENHAM, J.—Long Road. New Edition. 1s. net.

Mr. John Murray.

AMUNDSEN, CAPTAIN ROALD.—The South Pole. Full Account of an Expedition to the Antarctic Regions in 1911-12. With an Introduction by Dr. Fridtjof Nansen. 2 Vols. With numerous Illustrations. £2 2s. net.
 ANSON, CAPTAIN W. V., R.N.—Life of John Jervis, Earl St Vincent, Admiral of the Fleet. With Illustrations.
 ARTHUR, FREDERICK.—The Mysterious Monsieur Dumont. 6s.
 EDGE, K. M. (MRS C. T. CAULFIELD).—The Cloudy Porch. 6s.
 ESH, R., VISCOUNT (Edited by).—The Girlhood of Queen Victoria. Extracts from the Privy to Diary of Her Majesty. 2 Vols. With Illustrations. 36s. net.
 FOX, SELIAN FITZHERBERT, M.D.—A Chain of Prayer across the Ages. Forty Centuries of Prayer 2000 B.C.—A.D. 1912. 5s. net.
 FRASER, EDWARD.—The War Drama of the Eagles. The Story of Napoleon's Standards on the Battlefield from Austerlitz to Waterloo. With Maps and Illustrations.
 LOMBARDINI, MDLLE.—Versailles' Rival Court. A Waiting Woman's Court Chronicles in the Eighteenth Century. With Illustrations.
 MACDONALD, RONALD.—Raymond Lanchester. 6s.
 MONYPENNY, W. F.—Life of Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield. Vol. II. With Portraits and Illustrations. 12s. net.
 OSTLER, ALAN.—The Arabs in Tripoli. With an Account of the Desert War. With Illustrations.
 TREGARTHEN, J. C.—The Life Story of a Hare. With Illustrations.
 WILLMOTT, MISS ELLEN A.—The Genus Rosa. Part XXIV.

Messrs. T. Nelson & Sons.

A Dictionary of Dates.—Vol. 3. Nelson's Encyclopædic Library. 1s. net.
 CHESTERTON, ALICE.—Miss Netherby's Niece. 3s. 6d. net.
 COX, Sir G. W.—Tales of the Gods and Heroes. 6s. net.
 DICKENS, CHARLES.—Martin Chuzzlewit. Vol. 2. Nelson's Classics. 6d. net.
 GRIER, SYDNEY C.—The Warden of the Marches. Nelson's Library. 7d. net.
 JACOB, VIOLET.—The Inverloper. Nelson's Library. 7d. net.
 KIPLING, RUDYARD.—Simplex Contes des Collines. Collection Nelson (French). 1s. net.
 LEMAITRE.—Les Rois. Collection Nelson (French). 1s. net.
 MARRYAT, CAPTAIN.—Masterman Ready. 3s. 6d. net.
 MINTOSH, JEAN.—The Girls' Budget. 6s. net.
 SMITH, H. BOSWORTH.—The Life of Lord Lawrence. (Nelson's 1s. Library). 1s. net.
 UNDERDOWN, EMILY.—The Gateway to Chaucer. 5s. net.
 WESTELL, W. P.—The Circling Year. 6s. net.
 WILSON, RICHARD.—Camp Fire Tales. 6s. net.

Messrs. J. Ouseley, Ltd.

"ANON."—By Order. 6d. net.
 BLAILEY, EDITHA L.—Dorothy Gayle. 6s.
 BUCHANAN, ALFRED.—The Modern Heloise. 6s.
 CHATTERTON-HILL, DR.—The Philosophy of Nietzsche. 7s. 6d. net.
 FINNEMORE, JOHN.—The House of the Kaid. 6s.
 MATTLAND, HARRY, and LETTIE, ALFRED.—Dash for the Winter Sports. 1s. net.
 TAYLOR, EVELYN M.—Six Fairy Plays (Adults). 1s. 6d. net.
 WINSLOW, DR. FORBES.—Insanity of Passion and Crime. 10s. 6d. net.

Mr. Frank Palmer.

ADAMS, SAMUEL H.—Average Jones. A new kind of Detective Story. 6s.
 BARTLETT, F. ORIN.—The Prodigal Pro Tem. 6s.
 BOLAM, GEORGE.—Wild Life in Wales. 10s. 6d. net.
 CARTER, HUNTLY.—The New Spirit in Drama and Art. 12s. 6d. net.
 FAVELL, FRANK, and PALMER, FRANK.—Censorship in England: Its History from the Sixteenth Century. 7s. 6d. net.

GILLMORE, IVERY H.—Maida's Little Shop. A Story for Boys and Girls. 6s.
 HUGHES, RUPERT.—Excuse Me. 6s.
 MCCONAUGHY, J. W., and SHELTON, EDWARD.—The Boss. 6s.
 SARVER, CHARLES, and SELWYN, EDGAR.—The Country Boy. 6s.
 STRINDBERG, AUGUST.—Married. 6s.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.

DANBY, FRANK—A Babe in Bohemia. 6s.
 GRANT, SYBIL.—Sunshine. 3s. 6d. net.
 HORN, KATE.—Susan and the Duke. 6s.
 KAYE, MICHAEL W.—The Devil's Brew. 6s.
 LLOYD, J. A. T.—The Three Destinies. 6s.
 NISBET, J. F.—The Insanity of Genius. 6s. net.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADELAIDE.—Wooing of Roses. 6d.
 ROWLANDS, EFFIE ADELAIDE.—The Love of His Love. 6d.
 SADLER, WILLIAM S., M.D.—The Physiology of Faith and Fear. 6s. net.
 STANDING, PERCY CROSS.—Guerrilla Leaders of the World. 6d. net.
 WYLLARDE, DOLF.—The Career of Beauty Darling. 6s.

Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.

DUFF, J. GRANT.—History of the Mahrattas. A Verbatim Report. Reproductions of the Original Plates. 3 Vols. About 7s. 6d. net.
 FRANK, S. J. KARL.—The Theory of Evolution in the Light of Facts. With a Chapter on Ant-Guests and Termites. G. S. T. Rev. P. E. Wassmann. Translated from the German by Charles T. Drury, F.L.S. With 48 Illustrations.
 GOLTZ, COLMAR, BARON VON DER (Royal Prussian General Field-Marshal).—Jena to Eylau. A Study in German Military History. Translated by Captain C. F. Atkinson, 1st London Regiment. With a Preface by Colonel F. N. Maude, C.B., late R.E. With Maps. 6s. net.
 KITCHIN, GEORGE, M.A. (Edm.). B. Litt. (Oxon).—Sir Roger L'Estrange. A Contribution to the History of the Press in the Seventeenth Century.
 PASTOR, DR. LUDWIG.—The History of the Popes from the Close of the Middle Ages. Edited as to Vols. I-VI by the late Frederick Ignatius Antrobus, and as to Vols. VII-XII by Francis Ralph Keir, of the London Oratory. In 14 volumes. 12s. net each. Vols. XI and XII—1534-49—in November.
 SPEARING, H. G., M.A.—The Childhood of Art. With 16 Coloured Plates and nearly 500 Illustrations. About 21s. net.

Sir Isaac Pitman & Son.

BALDENSPERGER, PHILIP, and LEES, FREDERIC.—The Immoveable East. Studies of the Customs and Peoples of Palestine. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.
 COLLINS, ARTHUR H., M.A.—Symbolism of Animals and Birds in English Church Architecture. With 120 Illustrations. 5s. net.
 DAY, E. HERMITAGE, D.D.—In Our Lady's Praise. Photogravure Frontispiece. Cloth, 2s. net; Leather, 3s. net.
 DAVIS, ANNIE, F. Inc. ST.—The Junior Woman Secretary. 1s. net.
 FULLER, SIR J. BAMPFYLDE, K.C.S.I.—The Empire of India (Pitman's "All Red" Series). With 20 full-page Illustrations and Map. 7s. 6d. net.
 PHILLIPS, WILLIAM B., A.C.I.S., A.C.A. (Jons).—The Accounts of Executors, Administrators and Trustees. 3s. 6d. net.
 RANKIN, H. A.—Pencil Drawing. 144 Plates. 4s. net.
 TOVEY, PHILIP, A.C.I.S. (Assisted by over thirty Eminent Authorities on Company Law and Secretarial Practice).—Pitman's Dictionary of Secretarial Law and Practice. (In Six Fortnightly Parts.) With Facsimile Forms, etc. Each 2s. 6d. net.
 WILSON, F. H.—Coal. Its Origin, Method of Working and Preparation for the Market ("Common Commodities of Commerce" Series). Illustrated. 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

"BRENDA"—Mary Pillemer—Supernatural Factor. 1s. net.
 CAVEN, STEWART.—Palmer's Green. 6s.
 CRATGE, ANNA F.—The Dramatic Festival. 5s. net.
 CRAMER, JESSE GRANT.—The Letters of Ulysses S. Grant. 7s. 6d. net.
 CURTIS, EDMUND.—Roger the Great of Sicily, and the Normans in Lower Italy. 5s. net.
 CUTTING, MARY STEWART.—The Lovers of Sanna. 2s. net.
 DE GROOT, J. J. M., Ph.D., LL.D.—Religions of China. 6s. net.
 DOCK, LAVINIA L., R.N.—A History of Nursing. 5s. net.
 GILMAN, CHARLOTTE P. RKINS.—Women and Economics. 3s. 6d. net.
 HAMILTON, LOUISI NYSTROM.—Ellen Key: Her Life and Her Work. 6s. net.
 HARPER, FRANK D.—The Conquering of the Wilderness. 2 Vols.
 HOSMER, JAMES KENDALL, LL.D.—The Last Leaf. 6s. net.
 KEY, ELLEN.—The Woman Movement. 6s. net.
 LARSON, LAWRENCE M.—King Canute the Great, and the Rise of Danish Imperialism. 5s. net.
 LIVERMORE, WILLIAM ROSCOE, COLONEL. U.S.A.—The Story of the Civil War. In Two Parts. 6s. net each part.
 MACDONALD, GEORGE.—The Light Princess and Other Fairy Tales. 5s. net.
 MAUREL, ANDRE.—Little Cakes of Italy. 6s. net.
 MORITZEN, JULIUS.—The Labor Movement. 12s. 6d. net.
 NITBOE, INAZO.—The Japanese Nation. 6s. net.
 PUTNAM, GEORGE HAVEN, Litt.D.—A Memoir of George Palmer Putnam. 10s. 6d. net.
 SAUNDERS, CHARLES FRANCIS.—The Indians of the Terraced House. 10s. 6d. net.
 STREET, LILIAN.—Tam and the Squire. 2s. net.
 TYRRELL, HENRY.—Sheandoah. 6s.
 VAN DRESSER, JASMIN. STONE.—How to Find Happiness. 5s. net.

The Fleming H. Revell Co.

ADAM, JOHN DOUGLAS, D.D.—Religion and the Growing Mind. 4s. 6d. net.
 BARTON, JAMES L., D.D.—Human Progress through Missions. 1s. 6d. net.
 CONWELL, RUSSELL H.—How to Live the Christ Life. 7s. 6d. net.
 M'CORMACK, WILLIAM.—The Boy and His Clubs. 2s. net.
 M'LEOD, MALCOLM JAMES.—Fragrance of Christian Ideals. 1s. 6d. net.
 PECK, GEORGE CLARKE, D.D.—The Method of the Master. 3s. 6d. net.
 SPEER, ROBERT E., D.D.—Men Who Were Found Faithful. 3s. 6d. net.
 TALLING, MARSHALL P., Ph.D.—The Science of Spiritual Life. 6s. net.
 VOLLMER, PHILIP, D.D.—The Modern Student's Life of Christ. 4s. net.

Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

CALTHROP, DION CLAYTON.—St. Quin. 6s.
 HUTCHINSON, A. S. M.—The Happy Warrior. 6s.

Messrs. G. Routledge & Sons.

ABRAM, A. D.Sc. (London), F.R.Hist.S.—English Life and Manners in the Later Middle Ages. Illustrated. 6s.
 BECKFORD, WILLIAM.—Vathek. With Original Illustrations in Colour. 2s. 6d. net.
 FRIEDLANDER, LUDWIG.—Roman Life and Manners under the Early Empire. Vol. IV. Appendices and Notes. Translated by Dr. A. B. Gough (Library of Scholarship and Letters).
 HALFORD, FREDERIC M.—The Dry-Fly Man's Handbook: A Complete Manual, including The Fisherman's Entomology; The Making and Management of a Fishery. With 40 Photogravure Plates and many Text-Cuts and Diagrams. Edition de Luxe, strictly limited to 100 signed and numbered copies, half-bound, Whatman's hand-made paper, £3 3s. net (to Subscribers only). Ordinary Edition, 21s. net.
 HOFFMAN, MAJOR WILLIAM (U.S. Army).—Draw-Poker: A Practical Guide to Advanced Poker.

Messrs. Sands & Co.

BARRETT, REV. M.—Our Lady in the Liturgy. 1s. 6d.
 CAPES, H. M.—Life and Letters of Rev. Bertram Wilberforce. Second Edition, with Frontispiece. 10s. 6d. net.
 FRANCESCA, GLAZIER (Translated by).—Soliloquies of St. Augustine. 2s. net.
 St. Gertrude, Life of. Illustrated. (In the "Notre Dame Series of Lives of the Saints.") 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. Robert Scott.

EMMET, REV. CYRIL.—St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. 4s. 6d. net.
 FIELD, C.—Jewish Legends of the Middle Ages. 2s. 6d.
 GIRDLESTONE, REV. CANON R.B.—The Building Up of the Old Testament. 5s. net.
 HICKS, REV. EDWARD.—Our Life Here. 2s. net.
 KEBLE, REV. JOHN.—The Christian Year. 2s. net.
 LACEY, REV. I. A.—Marriage in Church and State. 5s. net.
 LEES, REV. HARRINGTON C.—The Sunshine of the Good News. 3s. 6d. net.
 LOWRY, REV. S. C.—The Problems and Practice of Prayer. 1s. 6d. net.
 PLUMMER, REV. DR. ALFRED.—The Continental Reformation. 3s. 6d. net.
 STEPPARD, REV. W. J. L.—The Parochial Mission. 2s. net.
 TAIT, REV. ARTHUR J.—The Heavenly Session of Our Lord. 6s. net.
 TISDALL, REV. W. ST. CLAIR.—Christianity and other Faiths. 5s. net.
 WALFOLLE, REV. G. H. S.—The People's Prayer Book. 2s. 6d. net.
 WALFOLLE, REV. G. H. S.—The People's Prayer Book, with Hymns Ancient and Modern. 3s. net.

The Walter Scott Publishing Co., Ltd.

DUTTON, THOMAS, M.D., M.R.C.P.—Digestion and Diet. 2s. net.
 FORDE, ASHWORTH.—Paul Austruther. A Novel. 3s. 6d.
 LARDNER, CAPTAIN E. G. D.—Soldiering and Sport in Uganda. 10s. net.
 LORD, CAPTAIN WM. R.—Real Life at Sea. Being the Reminiscences of a Sailor. 1s. 6d.
 MALHAM-DEMBLEBY, J.—Original Tales and Ballads in the Yorkshire Dialect. 4s. 6d. net.

Mr. Martin Secker.

SCORER, A. G.—The Entomologist's Log-Book.
 HANKIN, ST. JOHN.—Dramatic Works. 3 vols. 21s. net.
 PELISSIER, H. G.—Potted Plassier. 2s. net.
 ROBERTS, R. ELLIS.—Pecunia A New Translation. 5s. net.
 THOMAS, EDWARD.—Swimburne. A Critical Study. 7s. 6d. net.

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson.

CAPES, BERNARD.—Historical Vignettes. 22 Thumbnailed Sketches of Historical Characters. 2s. 6d. net.
 FOUQUE, BARON DE LA MOTTE.—Undine. Translated, with a Critical Introduction by Edmund Gosse, C.B. Photogravure Frontispiece by W. E. F. Britten. 2s. 6d. net.
 HOUSMAN, LAWRENCE.—The New Child's Guide to Knowledge. Reprint. 1s. net.
 MANNIX, J. BERNARD.—Mines and Their Story. Gold, Silver, Diamond, Coal and Iron. With Coloured Frontispiece and over 100 Illustrations in the text. 16s. net.

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

BOWEN, MARJORIE.—God's Playthings. 7s. 6d. net.
 BRADBY, G. F.—When Every Tree was Green. 3s. 6d.
 BUDGLES, ROBERT.—Poems. 6s.
 CHAPPELL, MARION.—Dogs and their Masters. 5s. net.
 FAWKES, REV. ALFRED.—A History of Modernism. 7s. 6d. net.
 FINEFATHER, MISS JANE.—Seven Scots Stories. 6s.
 GASKELL, LADY CATHERINE MILES.—In a Shropshire Abbey. 9s. net.
 HARRIS, RALPH H.—Dawn in Darkest Africa. 10s. 6d. net.
 MALLORY, GEORGE.—James Boswell, the Biographer. 7s. 6d. net.
 MARKHAM, SIR CLEMENTS.—Conquest of New Granada. 6s. net.
 PAGET, LADY WALBURGA.—Scenes and Memories. 7s. 6d.

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

BARTHEZ, DR. E.—The Empress Eugénie and her Circle. 10s. 6d. net.
 BEBEL, AUGUST.—My Life. 7s. 6d. net.
 CLARK, ROBERT STIRLING, and SOWERBY, ARTHUR DE C.—Through Shen-Kan. 25s. net.
 EGAN, MAURICE F.—Everybody's St. Francis. 8s. 6d. net.
 MARTIN, PERCY F.—Greece of the Twentieth Century. 15s. net.
 MILES, CLEMENT A.—Christmas in Ritual and Tradition, Christian and Pagan. 10s. 6d. net.
 MURRAY, J. H. P.—Papua, or British New Guinea. 15s. net.
 ROGET, F. F.—Ski Runs in the High Alps. 10s. 6d. net.
 STRACHEY, RAY.—Frances Willard. Her Life and Work. 5s. net.
 VAUGH, ROSA.—The Life of Benjamin Waugh. 5s. net.

Messrs. Williams & Norgate.

ANDREWS, PROFESSOR CHARLES M'LEAN.—The Colonial Period. 2s. 6d. net.
 AVEBURY, R. HON. LORD.—Pre-Historic Times as Illustrated by Ancient Remains and the Manners and Customs of Modern Savages. Cheap Re-issue. 7s. 6d. net.
 BAYLEY, HAROLD.—The Lost League of Symbolism. With upwards of 1,400 Facsimiles. In 2 Vols. 25s. net.
 BRAUNS, DR. REINHARD.—The Mineral Kingdom. With 91 full-page Illustrations in Colours. £2 10s.
 FAGUET, EMILE (of the French Academy).—Initiation into Philosophy. Translated by Sir Home Gordon, Bart. 2s. 6d. net.
 FARQUHARSON, R. HON. ROBERT.—The House of Commons from Within and other Memoirs, with a Sketch of the Author by John S. Sargent, R.A. 7s. 6d. net.
 GOULD, F. J.—Noble Pages from German History. With Illustrations. 2s. net.
 HARNACK, DR. ADOLF.—Bible Reading in the Early Church, being New Testament Studies. Vol. 5. 5s. net.
 HAWORTH, PROFESSOR PAUL LELAND.—Reconstruction and Union, 1865-1912. 2s. 6d. net.
 HEATH, FRANCIS GEORGE.—The Nervation of Plants. With many Illustrations. 3s. 6d. net.
 HIBBERT JOURNAL.—Index to First Ten Volumes.
 JONES, REV. W. TUDOR.—An Interpretation of Rudolf Eucken's Philosophy. 5s. net.
 KAUFFMAN, RUTH and R. W.—The Latter Day Saints. 10s. 6d. net.
 PARKER, PERCY L.—Character and Life. A Symposium by Dr. Alfred Russe Wallace, John A. Hobson, Harold Begbie, Walter Crane and Dr. Emil Reich. 3s. 6d. net.
 RUFFINI, PROFESSOR FRANCESCO.—Religious Liberty. Translated by J. Parker Heyes. With an Introduction by Professor J. B. Bury. 12s. 6d. net.
 TROELTSCH, PROFESSOR ERNST OF HEIDELBERG.—Protestantism and Progress. Translated by W. Montgomery, B.D. 3s. 6d. net.
 YOUNGHUSBAND, SIR FRANCIS E.—Within, Thoughts during Convalescence. 3s. 6d. net.

THE READER.

SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE.

By A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

I.

IF Sir Arthur Conan Doyle had been more of a conventional man of letters—if he had been just “a book in breeches,” as Sidney Smith said Macaulay was—it would not be so difficult to know where to make a beginning when one sits down to write of him. But no author could be farther from being “all author” than he is; he is much too keenly interested in life to do nothing but write about it, and would, I am convinced, more than half agree with Byron in his scorn of “the mighty stir made about scribbling and scribes,” and in his preference of doers to writers. He has read much, but he has lived more, as a novelist ought to, and has found the world a good and wholesome place because he has gone far enough out into it and has given so freely of his time and thought and sympathy to lives outside his own. Morbidity, cynicism, pessimism—these fretful little moods have no place in his books because they have none in his life; he is essentially a big man and writes always like himself, with a complete freedom from affectation, a naturalness, a vigour and breadth of outlook that cannot be developed within the four walls of any study.

“One of the singular characteristics of the present age,” he remarked to me recently, “is a wave of artistic and intellectual insanity breaking out in various forms in various places. If it stops where it is it will be merely a curious phenomenon. If it is a spreading movement it may be the beginning of vast human changes. It attracted Max Nordau’s attention twenty years ago, when he wrote ‘Degeneration.’ But look at the strides it has taken since then! It is the difference between queerness and madness, between Pre-Raphaelites and Post-Impressionists, between Wagner’s operas and Elektra, between the French Symbolists and the Italian Futurists. One should put one’s shoulder to the door to keep out insanity, for it threatens to submerge us. It is something akin to the grotesque Byzantine art which pushed out the splendid Classical styles, but it is more insane than anything Byzantine. Perhaps in Art as in History a sort of French Revolution is due from time to time, odious in itself, and yet inaugurating a new and better era formed rather as a reaction against it than as a direct consequence of it. There is no need for this extravagance, for surely there is plenty of scope for originality without going over the borders of reason. That is why Tennyson seems to me so great. His head was among the stars, but his feet were always firm planted on the ground.”

This is the masculine, courageous, healthful spirit which breathes through all that Conan Doyle has written. He does not shrink from facing the darker facts of existence, but he has known them too nearly to take them at their surface value, and he has none of the fussy, self-important, warped views or little eccentricities and posturings of the little literary man who is merely literary. Very characteristic of him is this reflection in “The Tragedy of the Korosko”—“When you see the veil of cruelty which nature wears, try and peer through it, and you will sometimes catch a glimpse of a very homely, kindly face behind”; and equally so are the words put into the mouth of Lord Roxton, in “The Lost World”—“There are times, young fellah, when every one of us must make a stand for human right and justice, or you never feel clean again.”

Such a time came to himself, you may depend,

Photo by E. O. Hoppé.

Sir A. Conan Doyle.

A corner of the billiard room at Windlesham, Crowborough.
Specially taken for The Bookman.

Sir A. Conan Doyle
At the age of 4.

Field Hospital, and wrote that striking pamphlet which was distributed in hundreds of thousands all over the world in defence of the British cause; it came again when his passionate hatred of tyranny and wrong moved him to champion the martyred natives of the Congo; and now again when he has taken up the case of Oscar Slater and is pleading for a re-trial of the man who is serving a life-sentence for a murder that Sir Arthur demonstrates by a masterly review of the evidence was never brought home to him.

There is no need to say more at this time of his patriotic services in South Africa that were to some extent recognised by the accolade; nor of his strenuous fights in the interests of justice at home; these things are within the knowledge of nearly all of us; but I doubt if many of us realize yet what humanity owes him for the noble, disinterested work he has done in the Congo. My view counts, of course, for nothing on such a subject, so I have gone to one who is better qualified to speak of it than almost anyone living, and Mr. E. D. Morel has been kind enough to send me this authoritative note:

"In the spring of 1909," says Mr. Morel, "the Congo reform movement found itself confronted with considerable difficulties. It had succeeded after eight years' efforts in wiping the 'Congo Free State' from the map of Africa, and when, convinced that George Edalji had been unjustly convicted, he published the results of his own inquiry into his case and would not rest or be silenced until it was re-opened and Mr. Edalji proved innocent and set at liberty, it came again when he threw everything else aside and went out to the Boer War as Honorary Senior Physician of the Langman in suppressing the more odious of the abuses inflicted for so long upon the unhappy Congolese. But the British Government, with all the trumps in its hand, had committed the grave mistake of permitting the Belgian annexation to go through on terms which ensured the perpetuation, under the Belgian flag, of the same evil system of administration which had flourished under King Leopold's personal rule. The policy which laid an embargo upon the soil's products and compelled the natives to pass their lives in collecting those products—chiefly rubber—for the benefit of the administration, or of financial groups allied with it, remained. Moreover, the British Government, which, three months after annexation took place, had seemed to recognise its error and had indited an admirable despatch to Belgium demanding 'immediate' changes, had suddenly and unaccountably weakened. Its demand had been treated with something like open derision by the Belgian Government, and thus, far from having a stiffening effect, had apparently resulted in producing vacillation and timidity. For months, appeals to the Foreign Office from all quarters had fallen on deaf ears, and when an irritated House of Commons had interpreted the views of an astonished and irritated public, the Foreign Secretary had delivered an alarmist speech plainly intended to damp down the movement. Thus the Congo Reform Association had not the least intention of permitting, if it could help it and it set to work to remove the fears which Sir Edward Grey's speech had created. But some people had become frightened, others whose views were superficial were inclined to quiet themselves with the illusion that everything was bound to come right now that the Belgian Parliament had replaced King Leopold as arbiter of the fate of the Congo peoples, while hostile elements were proportionately gratified. It was at this critical juncture that one day the post brought me a warm letter from Conan Doyle. We met for the first time shortly afterwards in the smoking-room of a London hotel. I talked. He listened—mostly. Before we parted he had

Sir A. Conan Doyle
At the age of 14.

Sir A. Conan Doyle and his father, the late Charles Doyle.

From a photo taken in May, 1865.

Photo by L. O. Hoppé.

Windlesham. Front view of Sir A. Conan Doyle's house at Crowborough, Sussex.

offered to write a short popular booklet summarising once more the most piteous tragedy of modern times, to hand any profits he might make out of its sale to the Association, and to respond to my call, when I made it, to address a number of large meetings we were organising for the autumn. I came away deeply stirred by the magnetism of his personality, touched and grateful. Here was a friend, indeed! And right well did he prove it in the days that were to come. I pitched all my voluminous scribblings at his head and he set himself to master every detail of a most complicated and protracted struggle. For a couple of weeks, hardly a day passed without a letter from him. Then, when he had probed the whole thing to the bottom, he shut himself up in his study and worked like a demon, hardly giving himself time to shave, as he put it. He wrote the book right off in a week. 'I finished my book to-day' 45,000 words in eight days, one of which I spent in London. I think it is about a record.' 'The Crime of the Congo' he called it. I shall always be proud to think he dedicated it to me. It was just what was wanted, had a tremendous sale, was widely reviewed, and was translated into German and French. The closing words of the Introduction breathed the spirit of the man: 'If all Europe frowned upon our enterprise, we should not be worthy to be the sons of our fathers if we did not go forward on the plain path of national duty.' The book came out in September. On the 7th November we faced together an audience of 3,000 people in the Town Hall at Newcastle. On the 18th we spoke at Plymouth at the Guildhall, which was packed, hundreds being shut out. On the 19th we attended the wonderful demonstration at the Albert Hall, over which the Archbishop of Canterbury presided. On the 23rd we were speaking in the Artillery Hall at Hull, on the 24th at the Sun Hall in Liverpool, on the 25th in the Synod Hall at Edinburgh—where Doyle received an ovation—and on the 26th in the Town Hall at Manchester. A week crowded with glorious life. I can feel the thrill of it now. In every case the audience was very large, going up to 5,000 in Liverpool. Doyle's intervention at that time exercised a decisive influence on the course of events. It provided the best antidote possible to the reactionary influences at work against us. It effectually prevented that most fatal of all diseases to a movement of this sort, public lassitude. Yet it was not his book—excellent as it was, nor his manly eloquence on the platform, nor the influence he wielded in rallying influential men to our cause, which helped us most. It was just the fact that he was—Doyle; and that he was with us. I do not think any other man but Doyle could have done for the cause just what Doyle did at that time. His whole personality appeals to some of the finest and most robust qualities in the race. And the mere fact that he had flung himself so whole-heartedly into this great human cause was in itself a tremendous uplift for that cause, an immeasurable asset. From that day to this his interest has never flagged. Whenever he has felt that he could put in a useful word he has done so effectively, going to the root of the particular situation which required elucidating with his simple straightforward diction. Now that we are nearing the end of a long fight, he shares in our satisfaction and makes light of his own efforts in those critical years, 1909-10. Of his generous friendship to myself, I can only say that the memory of it will never fade."

Photo by F. O. Hoppé.

Windlesham, Crowborough.
From the garden at the back of the house.

These and other such activities may seem outside a consideration of Sir Arthur Doyle's work in literature, but they are not, any more than his enthusiastic love of sport is, for you find their bracing influence everywhere in his books: in the details of some of his stories, the vigour and directness of his style, his healthful, broad outlook and his genial, charitable, sane philosophy of life. He is a man of action, a lover of the open air, and the qualities that keep a writer's blood sound prevent his ink from getting muddy and slow. Sir Arthur plays as strenuously as he works: he has tasted the delights of battle with his peers at football, cricket, golf; he has made a balloon journey and an aeroplane ascent, introduced ski-ing into the Grisons division of Switzerland, did excellent work in the opening up of miniature rifle ranges when that idea was still young in this country, he can hold his own with the foils, and is a formidable boxer; he is a fisherman in the largest sense, for he has been whaling in the Arctic Seas, he used not long ago to ride to hounds, and is a good shot, but he denies that horse racing is sport, and says in "Some Recollections of Sport," that he contributed to the Strand Magazine, "I cannot persuade myself that we are justified in taking life as a pleasure. To shoot for the pot must be right, since man must feed, and to kill creatures which live upon others (the hunting of foxes, for example) must be right, since to slay one is to save many; but the rearing of birds in order to kill them, and the shooting for amusement of such sensitive and inoffensive animals as hares and deer cannot, I think, be justified." Boxing he ranks as the finest single-man sport, and Rugby football as the best collective one. He regards the old prize-ring as "an excellent thing from a national point of view, exactly as glove fighting is now. Better that our sports should be a little too rough, than that we should run a risk of effeminacy." And it is certainly to his personal experience of boxing and his large acquaintance with the history and in another, again in spontaneous recognition of his national services in South Africa, is the silver bowl subscribed for by Sir Arthur's neighbours (and the grooms and gardeners of his neighbours), when he was living at Hindhead, here hangs a blood-smeared bandolier taken from a soldier who was killed in battle on the veldt; there, a haversack containing a set of cheap chess-men. This too is a relic of the Boer War. As Sir Arthur was riding with a small party across country, they were stopped by a native who told them a dead or dying Englishman lay some little distance aside, and they found a soldier, dead of his wounds, with one of the of the prize-ring that we owe his novel of "Rodney Stone," and his play of "The House of Temperley."

Photo by Laithe Charles.

Lady Conan Doyle.

Just as you find Sir Arthur's 'everyday' doings reflected in his books, so you find them reflected in and about his pleasant house at Crowborough. In the hall hangs the mud-encrusted cricket-bat, with which he made a century, on a wet wicket, in the very first match he played at Lords; in one room is a beautiful silver statuette of Lord Roberts, presented to him by the members of the Langman Hospital staff in recognition of the work he did during the Boer War;

and in another, again in spontaneous recognition of his national services in South Africa, is the silver bowl subscribed for by Sir Arthur's neighbours (and the grooms and gardeners of his neighbours), when he was living at Hindhead, here hangs a blood-smeared bandolier taken from a soldier who was killed in battle on the veldt; there, a haversack containing a set of cheap chess-men. This too is a relic of the Boer War. As Sir Arthur was riding with a small party across country, they were stopped by a native who told them a dead or dying Englishman lay some little distance aside, and they found a soldier, dead of his wounds, with one of the pawns out of this haversack of his clasped between a finger and thumb. Trophies of sport are on many of the walls, and pictures of famous prize-fighters and prize-fighting; in one of the windows is a large bust of Sherlock Holmes, modelled in clay and sent to the author by an unknown admirer from Manchester; and, to say nothing of many other similar mementoes, on the floor of the billiard room stand two huge fossil-feet of the prehistoric Iguanodon, and on the table above them is the flint head of an arrow that has survived from the Stone Age. It was the discovery of these relics on the downs that stretch for miles before his own door that set Sir Arthur's imagination at work on the period to which they belong and resulted in the creation of the astonishing Professor.

Photo by London Stereoscopic Co.

Sir A. Conan Doyle.

The Drowning Seaman's Vision.

From a water-colour painting by Charles Doyle.

Charles Doyle (Sir A. Conan Doyle's father) was the brother of Richard Doyle (the Punch artist), and son of John Doyle ("H.B.") the caricaturist.

Sir A. Conan Doyle's two younger sons, Denis and Adrian.

Challenger, the sending of him and his search-party to that almost inaccessible plateau in the wilds of South America which they find still inhabited by men and animals of the prehistoric type, and, in a word, in the writing of "The Lost World," which is at once one of the most realistic and one of the most romantic of his books—its wildest imaginings wearing an air of sheer reality from the Defoe-like, matter-of-fact manner of their narration.

II.

Born at Edinburgh, in 1859, Conan Doyle had commenced writing stories of adventure by the time he was six, and it was natural that he should illustrate these productions with pen and ink drawings of his own; for he was born into a very atmosphere and world of art. His grandfather, John Doyle, was the well-known political caricaturist who for over thirty years concealed his identity from the public under the initials "H.B."; his father, Charles Doyle, and three of his uncles were artists, one of them being that Richard Doyle whose name is inseparably associated with the early years of Punch. But anyone who has seen the remarkable water-colour paintings of Charles Doyle will wonder that he should have remained so little known to the world at large; they have a fantasy and grace that at times remind one of the work of Richard Doyle, but they have at times, too, an imaginative grimness, a sense of the eerie and the terrible that lift them beyond anything Richard Doyle ever attempted; and you find this same imaginative force, this same bizarre sense of the weird and terrible in certain of Sir Arthur Doyle's stories—in "The Hound of the Baskervilles," in some of the shorter Sherlock Holmes tales, in many of the "Round the Fire Stories," and some of those in "Round the Red Lamp."

Sir A. Conan Doyle and his youngest son.

From a snapshot taken at Bournemouth.

In 1881, after five years of medical studentship at Edinburgh University, Conan Doyle secured his diploma, and a year later, after a voyage to West Africa, he started as a medical practitioner at Southsea. But all through his student days he was giving his leisure to literary work, and in one of the professors at Edinburgh, Dr. Joseph Bell, a man of astonishing analytical and deductive powers, he found the original from whom, in due course, Sherlock Holmes was to be largely drawn. His first published story, a romance based on an old Kaffir superstition, appeared in Chambers's Journal in 1878 and brought him three guineas; but it was not until nine years later when "A Study in Scarlet" came out in Becton's Christmas Annual for 1887, that Sherlock Holmes and Dr. Watson made their first appearance in print. During ten years of hard work as medical student and practitioner Conan Doyle had been going through the usual experience of the beginner in literature; he had suffered innumerable rejections, had contributed short stories to the Cornhill, Temple Bar, Belgravia, and other of the magazines, and never in any year had his literary earnings exceeded fifty pounds. His first long novel, that great romance of the Monmouth rebellion, "Micah Clarke," after being rejected on all hands, was sent to Messrs. Longmans and accepted for them by Andrew Lang, whom Sir Arthur looks upon as one of his literary godfathers, James Payn being the other. "I used to send all my short stories to Payn," he says, "but not more than one in six found favour. As his writing was absolutely illegible, each answer of his gave rise to a long period of horrible anxiety, trying to discover if it was acceptance or rejection. In one letter I could only make out three words, which were 'infringement of copyright,' and to this day I do not know what that particular letter was about."

"Micah Clarke" appeared in 1889, and was followed in the same year by another Sherlock Holmes story, "The Sign of Four." In 1890 Messrs. Chatto & Windus published "The Firm of Girdlestone," and "The White

"The dying gladiator listened with intent interest."
From "Through the Magic Door." (Smith, Elder.)

"I saw the figure of a man upon the tor."
From "The Hound of the Baskervilles." (Smith, Elder.)

"I looked back and waved the blood-stained sabre in the air."
From "The Adventures of Gerard." (Smith, Elder.)

"They shouted and stamped and raved in their delight."
From "Rodney Stone." (Smith, Elder.)

Scenes from four of Sir A. Conan Doyle's books.

Company" began its serial appearance in the Cornhill. Shortly afterwards, taking his courage in both hands, Sir Arthur resigned his practice at Southsea and came to London. Presently after practising for a while as an eye specialist the success in their widely differing kinds of "The White Company" and "Sherlock Holmes," decided him to abandon medicine and devote himself wholly to literature. He had endured the usual weary and unlucrative writing of the youthful specialist and often declared in after days that he had not deserted his profession until it had deserted him.

There can be no question that the Sherlock Holmes stories were largely responsible for the early popularity of the Strand; the ordinary rates of the magazine were paid for them at first, but it was not long before Sir Arthur was receiving very substantial sums for the serial use of each story. I am not attempting any detailed criticism here, but shall content myself with a summary of the work Sir Arthur Doyle has accomplished in the twenty-five years since he wrote his first book and an indication of the wide scope and variety of that work by ranging it in the separate series into which it naturally falls as thus:

Sir A. Conan Doyle at the wicket—bowled by A. P. Lucas.

Reprinted from the Strand Magazine by permission.

Police or sensational romances—A Study in Scarlet, "The Sign of Four," The Hound of the Baskervilles, The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes, The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes, The Return of Sherlock Holmes, "The Firm of Girdlestone."

Historical novels—"Sir Nigel" and its sequel (though it was written first), The White Company—these two covering the period between 1340 and 1360, Micah Clarke (1679), The Refugees (1670), Rodney Stone (1804). Then come four novels fashioned round the glamorous figure of Napoleon—The Great Shadow, Uncle Bernac, The Adventures of Brigadier Gerard, The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard, and a romance of modern Egypt, The Tragedy of the Korosko.

Then there are short novels of modern life and books of short stories such as "The Doings of Raffles Haw" and "The Parasite."

A Duet and an Occasional Chorus dealing with the domestic humours and emotions of average lives—"The Green Flag", "Round the Fire Stories", "The Lost Galley", the collection of medical stories in "Round the Red Lamp", "The Stark Munro Letters" again reminiscent of their author's medical experiences and vividly and realistically revealing the thoughts and opinions of a young man on life and the world in which he is living, one book of literary criticisms, "The Magic Door", two of poetry, "Songs of Action" and "Songs of the Road", and one notable volume of history, "The Great Boer War". Also, besides the books and pamphlets on "The Crime of the Congo," the Edalji and Slater cases, and the Boer War, there are the plays "Halves", "A Story of Waterloo," in which Irving made one of his great successes as Corporal Brewster; "The Fires of Fate" (a dramatic version of

Photo by L. O. Hoyle.

Sir A. Conan Doyle in his Study.

Specially taken for The Bookman.

"The Tragedy of the Korosko"); "The House of Temperley," "The Speckled Band" (a Sherlock Holmes adventure), and "Sherlock Holmes," which was dramatised by Mr. William Gillette, who himself played the title rôle.

When Mr. Gillette was constructing his drama he had thoughts of introducing a love element into it, and cabled over to Sir Arthur asking: "May I marry Sherlock Holmes?" and though the notion must have come as something of a shock to Holmes's creator, he promptly cabled back, "You may marry him, or murder him, or do what you like with him." So far from sharing Dickens's horror of seeing his stories on the stage, Sir Arthur confesses that when he saw Sherlock Holmes before the footlights he was interested and delighted with what Mr. Gillette made of him.

But then his Sherlock Holmes stories are not those that are nearest to their author's heart; his own preference is for "Sir Nigel," and "The White Company"—these, in his regard, are "the least unsatisfactory" of his books; and many of us share his preference, and some of us do not hesitate to place these two beside the great English historical romances, not far, indeed, from "The Cloister and the Hearth," which Sir Arthur names as the greatest historical romance in the language.

Howbeit, there is no getting away from Sherlock Holmes; he has won the suffrages of the million, and in point of popularity at least leads all the rest. He has had scores of imitators—but where are they now? Not since Pickwick was born has any character in fiction taken such a hold on the popular imagination and so impressed the world in general with a sense of his reality. He is commonly spoken of as if he were a living person; there are tales of how actual detectives have made a study of his methods; and when in 1904, it was announced that he was about to retire into private life and devote himself to bee-keeping, letters poured in, some addressed to Sir Arthur Doyle, but most of them directed to "Sherlock Holmes, Esq.," care of the author, at Hindhead, expressing regret at this decision, and several applying for employment in his service. One of those to Sir Arthur ran:

"Will Mr. Sherlock Holmes require a house-keeper for his country cottage at Xmas? I know some one who loves a quiet country life, and bees especially—an old-fashioned, quiet woman.

"Yours faithfully, etc."

And here are two of those, evidently written in all seriousness, to "Sherlock Holmes, Esq.," himself:

"DEAR SIR,—I trust I am not trespassing too much on your time and kindness by asking for the favour of your Sherlock Holmes and twelve scenes from his career.

The sketches in this composite picture, except for one by Simpson and one by Twiddle, were drawn by Sidney Paget, and are reproduced by permission of the Strand Magazine.

autograph to add to my collection. I have derived much pleasure from reading your Memoirs, and should very highly value your famous signature. Trusting you will see your way to thus honour me, and venturing to thank you very much in anticipation, I am, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,
etc.

"P.S.—Not being aware of your present address, I am taking the liberty of sending this letter to Sir A. Conan Doyle, asking him to be good enough to forward it to you."

The other is from a professional lecturer and apiarian specialist:

"DEAR SIR,—I see by some of the morning papers that you are about to retire and take up bee-keeping. I know not if this be correct or otherwise, but if correct I shall be pleased to render you service by giving any advice you may require. I make this offer in return for the pleasure your writings gave me as a youngster, they enabled me to spend many and many a happy hour, therefore I trust you will read this letter in the same spirit that it is written."

There is something curiously charming in that letter; its sincere, spontaneous gratitude is an infinitely better thing than the most laudatory criticisms written by

Statuette of Professor Challenger, the hero of Sir A. Conan Doyle's new novel, "The Lost World."

those who sit in the judgment seats. I forgot to ask Sir Arthur whether in replying to this and others he made it clear that Sherlock Holmes could not oblige them because, in the words of Mrs. Gamp, "there ain't no sich person"; but I hope he did not. The story is told of a number of French schoolboys who were brought over to London upon a sight-seeing expedition. On being asked what they would like to see first—Westminster Abbey or the Tower—they unanimously declared that they would prefer to go to Baker Street and see the rooms of Mr. Sherlock Holmes.

III.

"Through the Magic Door" gives you glimpses of the days when Conan Doyle was a struggling beginner in literature. Discussing the books on his library shelves, he picks out certain of them, each one of which, bought in student days when he was not affluent, it had cost him a lunch to buy, and he selects Macaulay's "Essays" as the one that had given him "most pleasure and most profit." Next to this, among books that have influenced his life, he puts the work of Poe, "the world's supreme short story writer"—"the inventor of the detective story." He was fascinated too by Marbot's "Memoirs," and later, has found hints in him and them towards the character and dashing, dare-devil exploits of his own Brigadier Gerard. He has a fine enthusiasm for the "glorious brotherhood of Scott's novels," and delights alike in the "Border Ballads," and Macaulay's "Lays," because of their swing and dash, their strength and simplicity, their love of all that is manly and noble and martial. These and a good story are the qualities

E. D. Malone
(Daily Gazette)

Professor Summerlee,
F.R.S.

Professor G. E. Challenger,
F.R.S., F.R.G.S.

Lord John Roxton.

The members of the Exploring Party.

From a photograph by William Ransford, Hampstead.
From "The Lost World," by Sir A. Conan Doyle. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Photo by Foulsham & Banfield

The Fight at Crawley Down.

Captain Temperley, Mr. Charles Maude, Gloster Dick, Mr. Reginald Davis.

A scene from Sir A. Conan Doyle's drama, "The House of Temperley."

that appeal to him, especially in a work of fiction. He will never write a problem novel. If he is roused to denounce some injustice, to attempt the righting of some wrong, he takes the most direct and downright way of doing it, attacks it in the straightest possible fashion, and will not wait to build fictions about it and undermine it with a tale. As a novelist, he is a novelist pure and simple, and no preacher or political or social reformer. "I have always envied the men who had definite views on art and messages for their age, and that sort of thing," he said the other day; "it must make for a tidy mind and a clean-cut life. I fear I never had any particular views or mission. I have had the one humble idea to have a story to tell, to tell it as clearly as I could, never to be redundant or to wander from the line, and to interest others by trying so far as possible, to write about the things which interest myself. It is a simple rule of life, and I have had no other. I have been an omnivorous and rapid reader all my life, with a fairly retentive memory for general facts, though not a very good one for accurate detail. This has given me a fair sized quarry out of which to get my stones. Some authors have the enviable power of making the solid things in life the subjects of their novels without spoiling the novel. I have no such power. I only wish I had. It is true that in 'The Stark Munro Letters' I drew the solid side of a modern young man's mind. But that is an exception. I should only bore people if I wrote fiction about the things to which I have devoted most thought and work, the reform of the divorce laws, the Congo question, criminal reform, and the like. That was one of Charles Reade's great gifts—to make the actual interesting."

I recalled whilst he was speaking that preface to the collected edition of his works published a few years ago, in which Sir Arthur frankly sets forth his own conception of the art of fiction, and some extracts from it are a better commentary than any I could make on the whole of his work as a novelist, for he has all along carried his theory into practice. His conception of the art of fiction, then, is that "our treatment may be as wide as the heavens and as broad as the earth, if it does but attain the essential end of interest. All methods and schools, romance and realism, symbolism

Photo by Foulsham & Banfield.

Colonel Egerton attempts to save Sadie Adams.

COLONEL E. (Mr. Lewis Waller): "My God! I can't stand this!" (rushes on the Arab Chief, who strikes him down).-

"Curse you, you brute! You brute!"

SADIE (Miss Evelyn D'Alroy). "Oh, auntie, auntie! They have killed him!"

A scene from Sir A. Conan Doyle's play, "The Fires of Fate," which was founded on his novel, "The Tragedy of the Korosko."

and naturalism, have the one object in view—to interest. They are all good so far as they attain that, and all useless when they cease to do so. . . . Within the bounds of morality all methods are legitimate. . . . You are right to make your book adventurous, you are right to make it theological, you are right to make it informative or controversial or idyllic, or humorous, or grave, or what you will, but you must make it interesting. That is essential—all the rest is detail. . . . But there comes the obvious retort, 'You say interesting—interesting to whom?' The difficulty is not a really great one. The higher and more permanent work has always been interesting to all. The work which is the cult of a clique, too precious for general use, must be wanting in some quality. . . . Take the most honoured names in our literature, Scott, Thackeray, Dickens, Reade, Poe, they do not interest one or other social stratum, but they appeal equally to all educated readers. If you were to make a list of the works of fiction which have proved their greatness by their permanence, and by the common consensus of mankind, you would find that no narrow formula would cover them. . . . the only point which they have in common is that each of them holds the attention of the reader. . . . The life of a writer of fiction has its own troubles, the weary waiting for ideas, the blank reaction when they have been used, worst of all the despair when the thought which had seemed so bright and new goes dull and dark in the telling. But surely he has in return some claim

Photo by Foulsham & Banfield.

Sir A. Conan Doyle.

The scene, in which Sir Arthur is seated, is the doctor's consulting room in his play, "The Fires of Fate." The photo was taken on the stage during rehearsals.

to hope that if he can but interest his readers he fulfils the chief end of man in leaving others a little happier than he found them."

Just now Sir Arthur confesses that he is passing through one of those periods of "weary waiting for ideas." He cannot work on a system; he has not Trollope's gift for sitting at his desk and turning out a regulation number of words for two or three hours a day, week in and week out, all round the year. Like Herrick, he finds that when the good spirit goes from him there is nothing for it but to wait.

"the fancy cools, till when

That brave spirit comes again;"

but when it comes and the idea takes him he works every day at high pressure till the book is ended. Which is not to say that in the interval he is idle. At present, he is busy enough with the Slater Case, and the Divorce Reform Commission, but he has no settled plans for the future yet, except that he is quite resolved never again to stand for Parliament (I could have foretold that myself; for it is simply impossible to imagine such a man cramped in the strait jacket of the party politician), and, unless he is somehow moved to alter his mind, he will not relate any more of the memoirs of Sherlock Holmes. The character of Professor Challenger has greatly tickled his own fancy, and acting upon the rule which he has laid down above he is tempted to trace some further adventures which befell that formidable scientist after his return from the Lost World.

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

NOVEMBER, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original Lyric.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best original Fairy Tale with a moral touching on some prominent topic of the day.
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.
- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR OCTOBER.

- I.—More Lyrics than ever have been sent in this month, but the general quality of them has not been so good as usual. We should divide the prize and award half of it to Miss Dorothy Poole but for the small technical flaws in her first, second and fourth verses. As it is, we award the PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA to Mr. G. J. Holme, of Enderley, Malvern, for the following:

Richard Doyle, of Punch.
Uncle of Sir A. Conan Doyle.

LOVE IN AUTUMN.

The first faint waft of the breath of the Lady of Spring came over
The slopes of the hills and the valleys, and made the meadow ways burn
With the gleam of the buttercups' gold, and honey-sweet brought to the clover,
And touched the may into flower, and kindled the heart of the fern
And the flute of the cuckoo was heard from the heart of the leafy places,
And the jubilant Spirit of Spring ran riot in herbage and tree,
Made sweeter the song of the birds, and quickened the barren spaces,
And brought fresh hope to the earth, and love to you and me.
But now the Autumn is here, and wind thro' the woodland is sighing,
And sear are the leaves, and sear and vain is the love that we knew
Ah me! in the light of a Spring where the flowers of life are undying, Shall we find our blossom of love grown perfect of flower, and true?

G. J. HOLME.

We select for printing:

HAY-MAKING

Sweet-scented grass falling over my scythe,
Sad though you may be to die to-day,
One thought I give you to make you blithe
Someone is coming this way;
Blessed by the feet of her
Scent the air sweet for her,
My little love in her pink sun-bonnet
Tossing and turning the hay.
Butterflies bright flitting over the grass
Gay though you look in the sun to-day,
There is a beauty that yours will surpass,
For someone is coming this way;
Make the world bright for her,
Paid by the sight of her,
My little love in her pink sun-bonnet
Tossing and turning the hay.
Blow from the river you cool summer breeze,
Toilers have need of your breath to-day;
Waft all the fragrance of blossoming trees,
For someone who's coming this way;
Kiss the sweet face of her,
Note well the grace of her,
My little love in her pink sun-bonnet
Tossing and turning the hay.
The pink clouds have faded, 'tis not long to wait,
Soon work will be done in the fields to-day,
Then I with my scythe will keep watch by the gate
For someone who's coming this way;
God bless the heart of her,
Let me ne'er part from her,
My little love in her pink sun-bonnet
Tossing and turning the hay

(Dorothy Poole, South Lawn, Godalming.)

PRAYERS.

I pray my child that you may ever keep
The gift of dreams Here, where you gently sleep
I watch, and know by that sweet baby smile,
That you in dreamland dwell a little while.
I pray that when the years their sorrows bring,
Dreaming, you then may hear the same lips sing,
That softly sang to you, years, years ago,
And feel the love of one who loved you so.
I pray, my dear, no dreamless sleep for you,
But a dream-world for you to wander through,
And wandering, my darling, oh I pray,
That you may sometimes meet me by the way.

(Leslie M. Priest, 5, Greyfriars Road, Norwich.)

NEMESIS.

I have been happy once, for one brief while
The light of Heav'n was found beneath your smile.
It seemed the gates were wide, and voices sweet
Rang forth and made that happiness complete.
One moment, and the ecstasy had passed,
To come no more—it was the first—the last.
Yet dear, I fain would live it all again
And pay the forfeit with long years of pain.

I have been happy once, for one short space
My world was lived at sight of your dear face,
It seemed mine eyes were blind to all things fair,
Ears deaf to every sound when you were there.
One moment, and the happiness had flown,
Leaving no trace behind, and me—alone
Yet dear, if I might live it all again
The balance should be weighed by years of pain

I have been happy once, the world is wide,
And we who love shall walk not side by side,
For life holds something harder, dear—and cold,
Our story was begun—but never told
And yet to live again that moment's bliss
And find my Heaven in your passion's kiss
I fain would pay the forfeit with my tears
Of anguish, through Eternity's long years.

(Ada E. Mann (Lorna Fane). 30, East Parade, Rhyll.)

THE FAITHFUL FAILURE

"There, out of the glorious sun-coloured earth, out of the day and the dust and the ecstasy—there goes another Faithful Failure."

Lord, I have failed in all my way,
Broken the prayers I tried to pray,
Faded, the splendour of my day.

All my fair wine of life is spilt,
Shattered the castles that I built,
Broken, my good sword at the hilt

Lost are the souls I tried to aid,
Vanished the music that I made,
Naught now but wreckage is displayed.

Naught is there here that Thou canst praise,
Finished the story of my days
Me from the dust Thou wilt not raise

Lord, can it be that, looking down,
Instead of spurning with Thy frown,
Thou wilt a faithful failure crown?

So be it, Lord, I come to Thee.
Only Thy Faithful Failure see

(D. K. Boileau, Monkton Combe Junior School, Combe Down, Bath.)

LOVE ASLEEP

Little white wings quietly folded,
Tired limbs in sweet repose,
Dimpled fingers clasping lightly
Summer's latest rose,

Golden ringlets flecked with sunshine,
Golden arrows laid aside:
Stepping softly, come and see him,
Love at eventide

Wake him not for he is weary
With the labours of the day;
See, a tear upon his lashes
For one arrow went astray!

(Alice W. Linford, 47, Langham Road, S. Tottenham, London, N.)

We specially commend the Lyrics sent in by Mrs. G. R. Glasgow (Westbury), E. V. Tempest (Bradford), Guenn F. Newnham (Gillingham), C. Carey Lacey (Bayswater), Mona Garrod Turner (Southwold), A. R. Williams (Worcester), Mary Hughes (Banbury), B. Vickery (Bradford), M. S. Carter (Brighton), Miss A. D. Hill (Walton-on-Thames), Mrs. Darton (Maidstone), R. N. Watson (Southport), R. W. King (Lewisham), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), M. T. L. (New Milton), Will Londen (Dunfermline), Edith Jotham (Isle of Man), Helen Lanyon (London, W.), D. McLaren (Leith), Ethel M. Adams (Whitchurch), Diana Royds (Bournemouth), W. Sutherland (Sunderland), M. M. O'Connor (Highbury), M. D.

Banes (Teignmouth), J. R. Ellaway (Basingstoke), Annie G. Patrick (Birmingham), Edwin Waters (Denmark Hill), Joan Brock (Monifieth), M. D. Niven (Peterhead), D. Lefebvre (Jersey), Mrs. Mathieson (Dollar), Alice Binks (South Shields), Louie Grav (Frinton-on-Sea), Miss G. D. Hill (Sunderland), J. Tarry (Richmond), Miss E. F. Parr (Clifton), Cyril G. Taylor (Heswall), W. J. Campbell (Edinburgh), Helen K. Watts (Nottingham), E. Howard (Putney), K. Elsie Hunt (North Shields), Ethel Goodwin (Clapham), Joyce M. Bradwell (Nottingham), E. T. Sandford (Salisbury), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), G. G. Jackson (Northampton), Violet Gillespie (Forest Hill), Miss E. Shore (Worthing), N. D. Gullick (Clifton), G. H. Cobb (Oxford), Eva Scott (Streatham), Gertrude Chambers (Brighton), Anita Lea (Liverpool), Bertram N. Parker (Bath), Anette Heard (Swanage), "Spes" (Weston-super-Mare), A. J. Caird (Edinburgh), A. H. Green (Wolverhampton), Robert Everall (Plaistow), G. M. Hennings (St. Albans), E. D. Bestall (Bath), A. Marshall (Langley-on-Tyne), Florence Bagster (Kendal), G. Lenorme (Bingley), J. H. Langlois (Leeds), Mrs. Stephen Parker (Goole), Margaret Dickin (Wrexham), Elizabeth K. Packard (West Ealing), P. J. Frawley (Manchester), J. D. C. Monfries (Putney), Thomas Sharp (Merton Park), Florence M. Wilson (Bangor), J. W. James (Cardigan), Angus B. Mitchell (Shipley), A. W. St. C. Tisdale (Cambridge), Annie Newton (Carnarvon), L. Hodgson (Clapham), F. N. Jellicoe (Stockwell), Max Plowman (Enfield), Percy

Licensed to kill

A rough sketch of himself made by Sir A. Conan Doyle in 1881, on learning that he had obtained his diploma as a Bachelor of Medicine.

The Running Wolf.

Sir A. Conan Doyle testing a Norwegian snow apparatus in the Engadine.

Reproduced from the Strand Magazine, by permission.

Thomas (Hornsey), Mollie Barrow (Loudwater), Amelia D. Light (Enfield Wash), E. G. Moore (East Grinstead), Mrs. A. T. Ashwell (Canterbury), N. T. Wright (Clapton), A. M. Berry (Luton), Dolly Seward (Cambridge), Vera Wainwright (Peaslake), C. Emra (Richmond), W. G. Hanson (West Bromwich), Sinah Helen West (Gloucester), Marjorie Ogle (Colne), E. G. D. Liveing (Warwick), Miss G. M. Northcott (West Kirby), James F. R. Lyell (Edinburgh), M. F. Aikman (Glasgow), Ethel Tudge (Cricklewood), Malcom Murray (Aberdeen), Albert E. Barnes (Beaconsfield), Margaret K. McEvoy (Cricklewood), Marjorie N. How (Crouch End), D. K. Boileau (Bath), Constance M. Curtis (Ludlow), H. F. Lovell Cocks (Uxbridge), O. Pope (Notting Hill), Gladys E. Warren (St. John's Wood), Eveline Swanson (East Finchley), Rev. Edwin C. Lansdowne (S. Woodford), Neville Noller (Lincoln), R. B. Boswell (Southampton), C. Stanley Johnson (Seascale), Mrs. Cole (Nottingham), Charles Kingston (Esher), Mrs. G. Keen (Java), Ivor Murray (Bishop's Park), James Mitchell (Edinburgh), H. Evans (New Brighton), W. G. Priest (Norwich), D. Yarrow (Glasgow), K. E. Royds (West Hampstead), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), Beryl M. May (Farnham), Miss M. Swann (Great Missenden), Edward Griffiths (Liverpool), Agnes Baker (West Hampstead), J. E. Jones (Cardiff), Christabel Ward (Bridlington), Arthur Waghorn (Addiscombe), Wilfrid M. Appleby (Southend), Annie MacDonald (Bridge of Allan), Monica Barnes (Fleet), E. Irene Seaton (Dresden), Kathleen Knox (Belfast), Mary G. Allan (Kilbarchan), Marvyn Davies (London, W.), F. Tait (Gateshead), Ivan Adair (Dublin), P. Selver (Redhill), Grace M. Measham (Newcastle-on-Tyne), W. M. Lodge (Upper Norwood), David McCormack (Glasgow), E. R. (Hull), Maude Carter (Bristol), A. Safroni-Middleton (West Norwood), Albert E. Barnes (Beaconsfield), S. A. Doody (Boscombe), Mrs. Rose B. Stevens (Finchley), E. W. Higgs (Clapton), Doris Dean (Burnley), William Kettle (Streatham), Mrs. C. Stanley Stevenson (Middleton St. George), and Furnley Maurice (Victoria, Australia).

II.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Mr. Charles Powell, of 290, Oxford Road, Manchester, for the following:

BEFORE THE DOCTOR COMES BY DR. ANDREW WILSON. (Nash)
"I've hope to live"
Measure for Measure, III 1 2

We also select for printing:

BILL BAILEY. BY IAN HAY.

"Be it ever so humble, there's no place like home."
PAYNE.

(Mrs. M. E. Hopkins, 3, Convent Terrace, Swansea.)

PREPARATION FOR HOLY MATRIMONY. BY REV. BERNARD HANCOCK. (Messrs George Allen & Co)

"Large dowries doth the raptured eye
To the young spirit present"

TENNYSON—Ode to Memory

(Miss G. Mary Robinson, 46, Oxford Street, Cardiff.)

THE IRRESISTIBLE MRS. FERRERS. BY

ARABELLA KENEALY. (Stanley Paul.)

"Take, O take those lips away."

SHAKESPEARE—Frustrated.

(Miss A. E. Richardson, 15, Buckenham Square, New Kent Road, London, S.E.)

"I burst with a shriek into my own life."

From "Round the Fire Stories," by Sir A. Conan Doyle. (Smith, Elder.)

QUEEN ANNE. BY HERBERT PAUL. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"She's dead"

SHAKESPEARE—The Winter's Tale.

(Miss L. Mugford, Sutton-at-Hone, near Dartford, Kent.)

MORFE D'ARTHUR TENNYSON (Messrs Chatto & Windus)

"Our orthodox coroner doubtless will find it a velo-de-se."

TENNYSON—Despair.

(Juliette Samson, Floretta, 108, Sutherland Avenue, Maida Vale, W.)

THINGS I CAN TELL BY LORD ROSSMORE (Nash.)

"It really might be quite as well

Hushed up among one's friends"

O W HOLMES—To the Portrait of a Lady.

(Margery Finch, 54, Sheffield Road, Fratton, Portsmouth.)

THE TURNSTILE BY A. E. W. MASON.
(Hodder & Stoughton)

"... Pay, pay, pay"

KIPLING—Absent-Minded Beggar.

(Ernest S. Heron, 13, Grange Road, Chester.)

III.—We have received many Rhymed Alphabets on the authors and books of this autumn, but on the whole they are disappointing. The best is from Miss L. Mugford, of Sutton-at-Hone, near Dartford, Kent, to whom we have awarded the PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the following:

A is for Autumn, Ayscough and Avon,
B is for Benson, the one that is shaven.
C is for Chambers, who writes of the "Streets,"
D's Diners a Deux, gastronomical treats.
E stands for Ellis with "King's Riband Blue,"
F is for Fowler and "Faustula" too.

G is for Graham, whose "Classics" are "Canned,"
 H is for Hewlett, whose language is grand.
 I stands for "Idylls of East and of West,"
 J is for James and the "Flapper's" young zest.
 K is "King's Favourite," a post hard to hold,
 L's "Lady Married," so beautifully told.
 M is for "Moscow" with memories tragic,
 N is for Nesbit with "World" full of magic.
 O stands for "Outcaste" unlike "One of Us,"
 P's "Pride of War," that's created a fuss.
 Q is the Author and "Queer Little Jane,"
 R is for "Russia" revised once again.
 S for "St. Lo" and a story of France,
 T for "The Turnstile," a stirring romance.
 U is "Unbearable Bassington's" sign,
 V is for Vachell and story of kine.
 W's "White Ear" and although I've looked well
 X has no novel or author to spell
 Y is for Mills Young with "Grit Lawless" true,
 Z stands for "Zoo's Conversation Book II"

IV.—The PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best Review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. Eric V. Overell, of 56, Holly Walk, Leamington Spa, for the following:

MARRIAGE. BY H. G. WELLS. (Macmillan)

"Marriage" is not a great novel, but it is a brilliant book. Like "The New Machiavelli," it is the latest bulletin of its problem-haunted author's state of mind. Those who find this—the most complex age of history—a fascinating study, those who do not "swallow the universe like a pill," must read Mr. Wells. Though the novelist is sunk in the pamphleteer, the story is well done, and genius guided the pen which drew Mr. Pope. The plot is only a peg? Well, here it is the garments hanging therefrom which challenge attention. A book to buy and keep.

We also select for printing:

THE LOVERS. BY EDEN PHILLPOTTS. (Ward, Lock & Co.)

We welcome Eden Phillpotts' latest Dartmoor story, although the glamour of the Moor is overshadowed by the frowning and gloomy War Prison. The two lovers are American seamen, bold and resourceful; their sweethearts Devon to the core. The quarrel between Sir Archer Godolphin, adamant-conservative, and his impetuous, broader-minded son Felix, is dramatic; the son's subsequent association with the notorious Toby-men Workman and Blackadder, and his remarkable escape from the gallows most thrilling. The minor characters live, and the sacrifice of Richard Bolt strikes a high note of tragedy. To its author's renown "The Lovers" adds yet further lustre.

(J. Richard Ellaway, Lynmoor, Basingstoke.)

A HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION IN PALESTINE.

BY R. A. S. MACALISTER. (Cambridge University Press.)

One of the University Manuals, this little book forms a very welcome addition to the series. It is an epitome of Palestine's history. Professor Macalister leads us by delightful steps from the Palæolithic age, right up to yesterday, when the Young Turkish upheaval threw Palestine into ferment. The successive occupations of the country are briefly, yet succinctly, reviewed. A chapter on "Religion in Israel" and a number of good illustrations give to the whole that completeness which makes it, not only a useful book for the student, but also an instructive one for the general reader.

(Keltie D. Dixon, 22, Bonnevill Road, Clapham, S.W.)

LONDON LAVENDER. BY E. V. LUCAS. (Methuen.)

Mr. Lucas gives us his thoughts upon a variety of subjects in this pot-pourri from London. He touches upon such diverse themes as folk songs, country almshouses, Derby Day, the ape-house at the Zoo, and many others. It is written in his own whimsical style, though here and there flashes out in a few ironical words his contempt for some social weakness. Mrs. Wiles, the charwoman, and her philosophical husband, who inherits a fortune are very amusing. We are grateful for this cheery book in these days when morbid literature somewhat predominates.

(Lottie Hoskins, 65, Chantry Road, Moseley, Birmingham.)

MIGHTIER THAN THE SWORD. BY ALPHONSE COURLANDER (T. Fisher Unwin.)

This well-written novel takes the reader into the journalistic theatre by way of the stage door, and shows him Fleet Street as it really is. The busy scenes of activity inside the offices of The Day, a famous, halfpenny newspaper, are graphically depicted. Word by word, nay, almost letter by letter, we see our morning paper "built" for us before our eyes. It is a perfect example of pen architecture, and the love affairs of Humphrey Quain, reporter, leave us somewhat cold by comparison. The book is full of excellent little character studies, and the end is thoroughly artistic.

(Cyril G. Taylor, Farr Hall, Heswall, Cheshire.)

We specially commend the Reviews sent in by Lucy G. Chamberlaine (Llandudno), Mary Cleland (Ellesmere), E. Smallwood (Highbury), D. E. Grant (Smethwick), Mrs. F. M. Linklater (St. Leonards), Geo. Stanton (Leicester), Miss E. M. Northcott (West Kirby), W. M. Lodge (Norwood), Margaret Rey (Bournemouth), J. Swinscow (Tunbridge Wells), Phyllis Wall (Sydenham), Mrs. Kathleen Lefevre (Longford), H. Caby (Fordham), Bertha C. Priestley (London, W.C.), Dorothy Pratt (Chatteris), Mrs. Stephen Parker (Goole), A. R. Williams (Worcester), Miss Van der Pant (Highgate), A. W. St. C. Tisdale (Cambridge), Ellis M. Brown (Glasgow), Miss B. O. Anderson (Scarborough), Marjorie C. Barnard (London, S.W.), Winifred Crone (Liverpool), Florence Karn (Gloucester), A. H. M. Sayers (Sheffield), M. A. Newman (Badingham), Alan C. Fraser (Bridgwater), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), Margaret J. Laird (Belfast), Gwendoline Jones (Swansea), Bessie Eades (Hampstead), M. E. Bradshaw Asherwood (Colchester), Mrs. Agnes Ward Strong (Monkseaton), Miss E. Moore (Oxford), Leo Delicati (Bristol), Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), and Miss A. E. Gowers (Haverhill).

V.—The PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE BOOKMAN is awarded to Mr. Alfred Victor Waller, of 2, Leamington Street, Sunderland.

Sir A. Conan Doyle, with the Officers of the Langman Hospital in South Africa.

JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU.*

By T. E. PAGE.

THE writings of Rousseau are to-day practically unknown, and the twenty-seven volumes which contain them rest for the most part undisturbed amid the dust of libraries. Yet 150 years ago they moved the world and changed the destiny of nations. Their historical importance is of the highest; as models of style they might be envied even by Voltaire; and yet they are forgotten. But of Rousseau himself there can be no forgetfulness. His thoughts and ideas, so far as they were real and true, have been absorbed into the common mass of knowledge, and what he wrote on education, "The Social Contract" or "inequality" has now chiefly an antiquarian importance, while his theories as to the happiness and virtue of primitive man appear to modern students only the fantastic dreams of imaginative ignorance. But while any interest in humanity survives, Rousseau is a figure that must always command attention. For assuredly never did a stranger being walk this common earth in the guise of man. At one moment his head seems to touch the stars, at the next he sinks below the level of the brute, and whenever you seem to have laid hold of him by a sudden transformation he eludes the grasp. Read St. Augustine's "Confessions" and you know St. Augustine; read Cicero's "Letters" and it is the same; or turn to Montaigne and you see him, as he desired, "stark-naked"; but the "Confessions" of Rousseau leave the man an enigma and our judgment undetermined. Here come revelations that appal, and then passages of supreme and tender beauty. His pen flows with undisturbed ease from an apostrophe to virtue to a description of how he "decided very cheerfully (gaillardement) and without any scruple" to send his offspring to the Foundling. Nil fuit unquam sic impar sibi; his inconsistencies are profound; and yet in everything he is wholly satisfied with himself. Que la trompette du jugement dernier sonne quand elle voudra, je viendrai ce livre à la main devant le souverain juge—that is how he writes on the first page of his book, and he challenges anyone of "the innumerable throng" that stands before the throne to say sincerely, "I was better than you man." The words almost stagger us, and indeed to read the "Confessions" is to cease to wonder that men have derided Rousseau as a Pharisee and a hypocrite, have spoken of him as a sort of Satyr who could at need assume "The Mask of Cato," or as one who "under the pretence of making himself a Nature-creature" sought shelter in a cottage only that, like Diogenes in his tub, he might draw more attention to his cynic snarls. And yet beyond question he was sincere. Vain he was, no doubt, neurotic, self-deceiving and incapable of judging his own acts in the clear light of truth, and yet both as a writer and a man he was at bottom honest. Think only of his life. For thirty years he had been penniless, a vagabond, a lackey; one at best whom a great lady might invite to her house but then sent "to dine in the kitchen." With an ardent ambition and an invincible belief in his own superiority he had drunk deeply of the bitter waters of social scorn. And then on a sudden he found himself famous. The Academy of Dijon offered as the subject for a prize essay the question "whether the progress of the sciences and the arts has helped to corrupt or to elevate morals," and, walking one day to Vincennes, he read the notice in a newspaper. Then and there Rousseau, as by some miracle, became a new man.

Jean Jacques Rousseau.
A portrait by Ramsay.

From "Jean Jacques Rousseau," by Gerhard Gran. (Blackwood.)

* Jean Jacques Rousseau, by Gerhard Gran, Prof. of Literature in the University of Christiania. Authorised Translation by Marcia Hargis Janson. 12s. 6d. net. (William Blackwood and Son.)

"He could no longer breathe," he writes, "the violent beating of his heart alarmed him," he felt "illuminated," "intoxicated," "inspired," with the result that he quickly composed the famous "Discourse"—the first of his writings—and at once all Paris was at his feet. He hurled invectives at its dearest idols. He poured contempt upon its culture, its intellect, its graces, and the modern Babylon went into raptures over the new prophet. He might have been the darling of the salons and the pet philosopher of titled beauties. He might have had pensions and places and all that his heart had long yearned for. But instead for thirty years he went out into the wilderness. He sold his fine wig, his sword, and his watch, though he would have kept his linen shirts—forty-two of them—had they not been stolen, and turned his back on society for ever. "He became," says the present writer, "the world's most famous man . . . he could have acquired riches, glory and titles . . . he could have helped himself to everything the world prizes," and "yet he did not do so," but "continued to the end of his life to support himself miserably by copying work." It was thus that St. Pierre, the author of "Paul and Virginia" found him in 1771 (see the beautiful passage in Morley, II., 317 seq.) "in an overcoat with a white cap copying music," with "two little beds of blue and white striped calico, a table and a few chairs for his stock of furniture," while "his wife mended linen" and "the sparrows came for crumbs on the sills of the windows." And yet there are critics who maintain that the man who deliberately chose such a life was at heart a charlatan. Those, however, who know "the signs of a prophet" will possibly form a more charitable judgment.

But indeed there were, as he himself said, "two Rousseaus," the one "a man capricious, singular, fantastic," the other "obliged to work for his living," and content, genius though he was, to do so. Or rather, perhaps, the position was still more complex. For there was in him not only that war between "the flesh" and "the spirit," of which St. Paul speaks, and which, fierce as it is in ordinary men, may, where the brain is active and the body frail, excitable and nervous, become a very struggle to the death; but the spirit also of Rousseau was divided against itself. "The thorn in the flesh" was only one of the evil agencies that "buffeted" him; for, to say nothing of other things, the pride of Rousseau was as the pride of Lucifer. His self-conceit was beyond words. Whatever befell, he never doubted that he was not as other men. He wallowed in the mire, but is assured that he is without stain. He relates acts which discredit human nature, and then asks who can say Je fus meilleur que cet homme-là. And yet the words, "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Son of the morning!" do not wholly apply to him. Spite of all his failings, there still lingers round him something of a Divine radiance. And who are we that we should judge a life so marred by sin and sorrow, but yet so illuminated by genius and aspiration? Let us rather try to understand him; and for those who would do so no volume could be better than the present one. It does not discuss his writings or his philosophy—indeed, it ends with the publication of his first work—but is a "psychological" study of the man himself during his first forty years, and, as such, has all the fascination of a novel. Or rather it has more. For in this moving story, strange as any in fiction, every touch is real, and the author writes not only with sympathy and insight, but also with vivacity and force, while he shows dramatic skill in setting Rousseau's life in its proper scenery and surroundings. The opening chapter, for instance, on Geneva, that ville triste ou tout le monde est de mauvaise humeur, as Voltaire said, and where you must even have a Biblical name, so that Rousseau, son of Isaac, had to be called "after two apostles," is a masterpiece of historic presentation. And the same may be said of the description of "Paris under Louis XV.," where they "called God M. de l'Être," where "un bon mot fait fortune" and to be in love with everyone's wife but your own was a point of etiquette. Nor are these descriptions mere embellishments, for if you understand Rousseau's Paris and Rousseau's Geneva, the history of "His Family," of his "Vagabondage," and of "Maman" (M. de Warens), you begin to understand how Rousseau became what he was. At least you understand the origin of his faults, for the source of his genius remains incomprehensible. There was no reason why he should not have degenerated into an erotic imbecile. Indeed, it would have been almost natural if he had. But, instead, on the road to Vincennes there came a great "awakening," and from that hour Rousseau was one of the leaders of mankind. It is in vain that Professor Gerhard Gran—who here only is professorial—introduces the word "subliminal," and talks of "the psychic stuff that, gained through inheritance, race and early experience, lay settled in his subconsciousness," suddenly finding "a road of communication" to the upper "threshold." For, indeed, such words explain nothing. The poorest of us know something of the "subconscious" activities of the brain, but how Rousseau the derelict became Rousseau the prophet is hidden from all but Him "to whom all secrets are known." If, however, on this point the author may perhaps arouse criticism, everywhere else he is wholly admirable. He has written a book which, once taken up, no one who either loves letters or understands the words homo sum can possibly lay down.

For the rest, the translation is, as far as a stranger to the original can surmise, a very excellent one, and it is noteworthy that neither author nor translator uses a single word of "Introduction." Nor have they need to do so, for their work explains and recommends itself.

THE MYSTERY OF EDWIN DROOD.*

BY THOMAS SECCOMBE.

SIR WILLIAM ROBERTSON NICOLL has broken out in a new place in the volume that he has just published on "The Problem of Edwin Drood." The first sentiment of many, perhaps the majority, of those who scan the title will be surely this subject might be allowed to take a long-earned rest. Its place is in the mausoleum of literary curiosities along with speculations as to the dedication of Shakespeare's Sonnets, the authorship of the "Eikon Basilike," or the identity of Junius. A large number of keen, detective minds have exercised themselves upon the problem as upon a sharpening strop. Most of them have written books or pamphlets on the subject, and their lucubrations would fill a fair-sized dwarf bookcase. A few fanatical Dickensians may welcome any pretext for poring over the moiety of "Edwin Drood" once more. But the reader who does not take an active part in the Dickensian fellowship may well regard with some coldness the appeal of a book which makes the re-perusal of a fairly long and difficult, though unfinished, work a prior condition of complete understanding. If the general reader is dissuaded by these prima facie considerations from the discussion of Sir William Nicoll's latest work, let us say at once that he will incur the risk of missing not only one of its author's most interesting productions, but also one of the most considerable critical performances of recent years. The book's great achievement, indeed, is that it does not depend for its interest by any means exclusively upon the discovery of x in the matter of the specific solution of the Edwin Drood mystery. The present deponent, at any rate, found an interest of no secondary kind in its pages as an investigation of the testimony as to all the circumstances attending the production of Dickens's latest work. It abounds in documentary evidence, it reveals with singular suggestiveness the evolution of Dickens's latest manner, it brings us nearer "Dickens—the last phase" than any book we can remember to have read. With Mr. Lehmann's admirable book on "Dickens as an Editor" it goes far to vindicate the reality of national gratitude to the great novelist, now in his hundredth year. Battered by life, and worn by the many leagues of print which he had traversed, Dickens had indeed journeyed far from "pou sto" of "Nicholas Nickleby" and "Oliver Twist." One may not be able to agree with the writer that "Edwin Drood" is one of the best of his works. An analogy is employed between some elements in "Drood" and in "Hunted Down." The parallel is rather damning to the unfinished work of 1870! A more melodramatic, theatrical and unsatisfactory short story than "Hunted Down" would be hard to discover among the works of the reprinted. The bloom and the flush of Dickens's wonderful morning had evaporated long before the day of "Edwin Drood." His style had lost every scrap of that wonderful simplicity and eighteenth century rotundity so remarkable in his first great successes. The marvel is that it should have acquired so many new qualities of distinction.

* "The Problem of Edwin Drood: A Study in the Methods of Dickens." By Sir W. Robertson Nicoll. 3s. 6d. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The opening passage in the second chapter of "Edwin Drood," for instance, is a far more elaborate piece of prose than Dickens could have possibly imagined in his impressionable youth. Yet how bright that wonderful eye still is, how little undimmed that marvellous vision, and that amazingly vivid power of portrayal. For sheer writing power, in mere force of description, how many authors are there of any age who can stand up against it?

If a descriptive critic of to-day wants a new subject, a terra incognita, let him write about the early and undiscovered plots of Dickens. Nobody marks them at the time of reading. À propos of his inquiries here our author makes a few remarkable discoveries about them. The plots of most of the novels indeed, from "Barnaby Rudge" to "Our Mutual Friend," are fearful and wonderful things. A monograph might be written (we cannot asseverate that it would be read) about each one of them. But the plot of "Edwin Drood" stands apart, it seems, from most, if not all of them. It is a thoroughly lurid and melodramatic plot; but it does possess a certain interest of its own, and it does reflect a considerable amount of interest upon the characters. For Dickens this is a novelty with a vengeance! In most of his books the plot appears like some malignant parasite draining the life blood of the parent stem of character. In "Drood" the plot has an independent life of its own. Faith in Wilkie Collins, which had germinated a dozen years ago, had now borne ripe fruit.

Without professing in the least to be an expert on this thorny question, I must say that Sir William's solution seems to me eminently sane and satisfying. In the first place, it is extremely tentative and unaggressive. In the second, it is based broadly and unmistakably upon the irrefragable testimony of Forster. Forster, with all his faults, remained to the very end Dickens's chosen biographer and confidante. The suggestion that the great man deliberately misled Forster as to the general tendency of the tale is inadmissible. Forster's hints, therefore, must form the nucleus of any really judicial summing-up of the matter. The first object of the Bench is to cut away the tangled and luxuriant overgrowth of baseless theory. When this is done and a few careful qualifications cautiously made, it seems to me that we have a solution approximate enough for the purposes of any reasonable curiosity. The testimony of the illustrator, Sir Luke Fildes, so far as it goes, is absolutely corroborative of the biographer. Everything points to the conclusion that the villain, Jasper, tried to murder his nephew, Edwin, by strangling him with a black scarf. That Dickens intended that the wicked uncle should have succeeded in his intention seems to me equally certain Jasper had premeditated and rehearsed the murder in the opium den. The motive was the fierce and wolfish passion for Edwin's betrothed. This passion, revealed finely in one of the original illustrations, was cloaked by a most revolting duplicity. Jasper, says our author, was "an unredeemed villain; he was anything but a fool. He drugged Drood; he strangled him; he put his body in quicklime; he had time to rob the victim of his jewellery [but for one unknown, recently acquired ring which was ultimately to prove the pièce de conviction]; he maintained a threatening and defiant attitude. He had done his business." We are to imagine him working with a Hyde-like malevolence, suggested by his ebullitions against the urchin Deputy, in a night of the wildest tempest. He is a new type of villain rather for Dickens, and a far more successful one than the typically Dickensian, wholly incredible, Carker. His passion, too, is a new element, revealing a considerable change as it seems to us in Dickens's moral perspective. The gradual determination to criminal motives, which set in only after the first efflorescence of his genius seems to arrive at its climax in the lurid plot of "Edwin Drood." The theory that Edwin, after all, was not dead and was to appear in the eleventh or twelfth part redivivus, seems to me untenable. There is no iota of evidence to support it, and the only two pleas in its favour are first, that it was rather contrary to Dickens's method to destroy a "title"; secondly, the suggestion conveyed by the design at the foot of the original green wrapper. Our author is not at his happiest, I think, in his description and elucidation of these designs. But he makes the essential point, namely, that they are not to be taken too closely or literally. They are rude hieroglyphics, and like Zadkiel's, are to be interpreted with the eye of faith. After taking immense pains to construct and conceal an elaborate mystery, it was hardly likely that Dickens was going to give it away on the cover. As to the mode of death, there seems to me no evading the express statement made by Dickens to his illustrator that he must have a long black scarf for Edwin to be strangled with. As regards Jasper's ejaculations in the opium den—"Look down, look down"—too much importance need not be attached to them. Miss Stoddart's suggestion on this point seems quite adequate. The idea of flinging Edwin from the tower may have occurred to Jasper and been abandoned. Highly probable, too, is her speculation that the Sapsea monument was to be the destination of the murdered man's remains. Jasper may have conveyed some quicklime into that spacious receptacle before depositing the body there. There was ample opportunity for such operations in the midnight solitude of the precincts. These outlines seem fairly meritable, but the precise manner in which the discovery was to be worked out must remain Dickens's secret. The ring, the opium woman, Princess Puffer, Durdles, Datchery and the Deputy, and finally the suspicions of Mr. Grewgious were evidently to be the main instruments of conviction. Grewgious, whose first appearance is so impossibly grotesque, but who improves so steadily upon acquaintance, was in my opinion, to play a most conspicuous part. Tartar, of course, marries Rosa, and Crisparkle, Helena. Neville, it seems, was to be spirited away, probably killed in the act of bringing the "wicked man" to justice. All this part of his thesis Sir William appears to prove to our complete satisfaction. Far more than any of his predecessors he has gone into the question of manuscripts, interlineations and erasures. As he recapitulates these we cannot help repeating: What is he going to make of all this? Nothing, however, could be more satisfactory than the way in which every ounce of this evidence is made to fit into its place, and to tell upon the volume and weight of the converging mass of proof. This part of the book is an admirable illustration of the judicial method.

When it comes to the question of "Who is Datchery?" the case is altered. Dickens left no clues here of an external kind. Everything depends upon the ingenuity of the commentators and much, if not most, of this ingenuity seems to us hopelessly misplaced. Nor can we wholly exempt Sir William from this indictment. His theory that Datchery is Helena is certainly one of the best and the best sustained. It is far more plausible, for instance, than the incredible proposition that Datchery is Drood himself. Both suppositions seem to me to impugn the sanity of Dickens as an artist. Our interpreter uses the erasures and interlineations here with an almost uncanny cleverness. Yet, after all his exertions, the case seems to us less than "not proven." That an artist of Dickens's calibre should be reduced to such a pitiable artifice as a male-impersonator is, to us, a thing too painful to contemplate. The explanation of Datchery saying (to himself be it remembered): "I like the old tavern way of keeping scores" is a marvel of literary gymnastic, but, after all, "it will not do." I am inclined to think that Datchery was a new character and an emissary of Grewgious, probably some sort of relation, and no more. He is a melodramatic figure at best. That is enough, without representing him as a young and beautiful woman masquerading as an amateur detective, and consuming brown sherry and mutton chops! Our author himself, I'm inclined to think, has a slight revulsion of feeling from the strain of such a conjecture. At any rate, he refers to it not at all in his concluding chapter, which is a most admirable drawing together of the various lines of evidence, conjecture and parallel, in what will prove, we are convinced, to the multitude of readers one of the most repaying books on the subject of Charles Dickens that the century of his fame has yet produced.

New Books.

THE "SWANSTON" STEVENSON.*

In the latest instalment of this admirable edition of the Works of Robert Louis Stevenson are the books to be regarded as his contribution to the science, art, or sport—

* "Records of a Family of Engineers; Additional Memories and Portraits; Later Essays; Lay Morals; Prayers Written for Family Use at Vailima; A Footnote to History; Island Nights' Entertainments; In the South Seas; Letters from Samoa; The Ebb Tide; Weir of Hermiston; St. Ives." Vols. XVI. to XX. (Swanston Edition.) 6s. net each. (Chatto & Windus.)

whichever it may be—of Politics. He was apparently a philosophic Tory; in practice governed by the most democratic ideals, but withal, when it came to stated principles, a contemner of the "G.O.M.," Home Rule, and Mr. Hyndman. In the happy sanctuary of Samoa, a little king in exile, experiencing the joys of a sort of feudal lord, it seemed to him that Britain, shedding every rag of feudalism as fast as it could, was drifting to perdition. There is an essay on "The Day after To-morrow," in the sixteenth of these volumes which shows his apprehension of an overwhelming socialism wherein the official inspector should be over-riding all, and our condition something far more like the ant-heap than any previous human polity. In his writings, however, are few such warm deliverances on the problems of his native land; he was out of the fight before the bricks were really seriously flying, and we count it fortunate that his political excursions in the main confined themselves to the isles of his adoption, where the issues were less complicated, and the party protagonists a little more romantic than they are with us at home. "A Footnote to History" and "Letters from Samoa" may have seemed to some readers an unfortunate divagation from the proper business of his life, but these diversions are traditional in the best of imaginative writers, and they serve to prove some human touch with things in actual life. When Stevenson settled in Samoa he found the island with a native nominal king and a half, and German influence obnoxiously pre-eminent; the white officials appointed by the Berlin Convention quite unequal to their task. The "Footnote" and these Samoan letters to The Times and the Pall Mall Gazette may have as little influence on his future reputation as the "Defensio Secunda" has on the repute of Milton, and they only partly served their purpose, for, though the two obnoxious officials were withdrawn mainly on his intervention, his friend the dethroned Mattaafa gained nothing by it.

Nor were his other divagations into the history, life, and manners of these ultimate isles quite to the taste of eager Stevensonians. When he began the series of travel papers now known as "In the Seven Seas" it was auspiciously; the Odyssean glamour was about his opening, where we share his wonder and delight in that first landfall. But "The Isles of Vivian," which made him bond-slave for the rest of his life, when seen too long and intimately, refused to sustain the emotional ardour, the subjective beauty of their first conception, and the task he had embarked on with elation speedily began to chafe. We have here, as in the Edinburgh Edition, but a selection from the South Sea articles contributed in 1891 to Black and White and the New York Sun; with the addition of a half section omitted from the Edinburgh Edition describing a visit to the Kona coast of Hawaii and the lepers' port of embarkation for Molokai. That part of the work which best pleased Stevenson himself was the section treating of the Gilbert Islands, and it derives additional interest as describing a state of manners and of government now past away.

The magic air of the Nukahiva landfall is repeated in "The Beach of Falesa," the best tale of "The Island Nights' Entertainments," where the narrator sees his island first at dawn as Conrad's sailor sees the East in "Youth," mysterious and odorous. The very best criticism of it came from the author himself in a letter to Sidney Colvin:—"It is the first realistic South Sea story; I mean with real South Sea character and details of life. Everybody else who has tried, that I have seen, got carried away by the romance, and ended in a kind of sugar-candy sham epic, and the whole effect was lost—there was no etching, no human grip, consequently no conviction. Now I have got the smell and look of the thing a good deal. You will know more about the South Seas after you have read my little tale than if you had read a library. As to whether anyone else will read it I have no guess. I am in an off time, but there is just the possibility it might make a hit; for the yarn is good and melodramatic, and there is quite a love-affair—for me." It is to be noticed that "The Beach of Falesa," in 1892 was regarded as immoral in the absence of a marriage certificate: "It is a poisoned bad world for the romancer, this Anglo-Saxon world," said the indignant author.

"The Ebb Tide, or Stevenson's Blooming Error—about as grim a tale as ever was written, and as grimy and as hateful," was the author's final judgment on a tale which gave him a great deal of trouble, and emerged from his hands at last seriously curtailed in its proportions as intended. In his correspondence, curiously, there is little or no indication of the share that his step-son Mr. Lloyd Osbourne had in its design and preparation, and when it first appeared, all the good parts in it—as the opening chapters—were ascribed to Stevenson, and all the bad to his collaborateur. A note by Mr. Osbourne to the present edition shows some natural resentment of so unflattering a conclusion, and he explains that the early parts of both "The Wrecker" and "The Ebb Tide," were entirely his as well as the whole inception of Huish's scheme. The collaboration produced a work of considerable popularity; of its kind the tale is excellent, but its dialogue and its narrative style are on different planes, and it lacks the artistic unity of that fine fragment "Weir of Hermiston," or even "St Ives," as completed by Quiller-Couch.

NEIL MUNRO.

AN ABSORBING PICTURE.*

Henry Fowler was essentially a politician, and a politician on a grand scale. So broad was his mind, so well stored with history, that a spirit of most judicial fairness characterised his views. No party man in the meaner sense of the word, his views were treated with the greatest respect both by friend and foe. By the former he was looked up to almost as a Court of Appeal. And this great personality moved amid great events, vital in the history of the nation. His own immediate contribution to that history was in the highest degree worthy of the man.

(Of no common interest then should be his biography. We may say at once that it realises all our expectations, and we rise from reading it with a far higher admiration for the man as a politician than we ever held before. With the exception that some of the letters and speeches might easily have been curtailed without detracting from the interest, the political part of the biography is thoroughly well done.

And yet most readers will agree that the chief value of Mrs. Hamilton's book lies in her portrayal of an extraordinarily interesting personality: a personality full of contrasts, at first sight almost irreconcilable contrasts. As we read on, however, we realise that the very greatness of the man lay in his power of combining apparent opposites into one workable whole. Seldom has a character been so cleverly dissected. Seldom have readers been presented with such absorbing psychological problems.

Henry Fowler was a latter-day Puritan, such a thorough-going Puritan as is rarely to be seen. His principles were inflexible, his ideals lofty from the beginning to the end of his life. "Life is real, life is earnest," was his motto. Yet this same man in his political connections was always ready to compromise. Strongly as he held that his views were the best, he was prepared if needs be to accept the second best. On the other hand, while his sound sense forbade any indulgence in exaggerated language at St. Stephens, in his home at Woodthorne the exaggeration of his language was almost a byword among the servants. These contradictions, seeming or real, would fill a page. Never was there a more devoted Methodist, yet seldom has the Church of England had a more genuine admirer. With a mind utterly closed to the beauties of scenery and the gentle influences of art and music, he could nevertheless demand such a noble and beautiful service in Methodist churches as "shall boldly avow in the teeth of a miserable utilitarianism, an obedience to Him Who required that the sockets of His tabernacle should be of silver and the snuff-dishes of pure gold," such a service of song as should be "the noble expression of the melody of Christian devotion by the melody of earthly music." The high-priest of æstheticism, John Ruskin, might have written this.

A mind such as his, moving in the lofty empyrean of thought, could with difficulty descend to lower realms. He could manage men, but not boys. He feasted on facts plain and unclouded: facts seen through a mist of fiction were abhorrent to him. A determined Liberal, he was nevertheless pessimistic as to new ventures. A dour man, he rejoiced in jokes against himself. But it is impossible to give the faintest conception of the scintillating wit and sympathetic humour with which this absorbing picture is painted by his gifted daughter. Her more serious chapters, too, such as the one on Methodism, are illuminating to the last degree.

* "The Life of Henry Hailley Fowler." By Edith Henrietta Fowler (Hon. Mrs. Hamilton). 21s. net. (Hutchinson.)

Illuminating too is the sketch of the household which quite naturally gave rise to "Isabel Carnaby." "We were trained to talk to him and amuse him all our lives." He was constantly "plucking them up by the roots to see how they were growing," and his delight was unbounded when one of his children showed she had grown up by producing a novel that embodied the two things dearest to his heart, politics and Methodism.

THE INDIAN POLICE.*

Mr. Gouldsbury's frankness, simplicity and humour lend such charm to his account of the numerous exciting adventures which fell to his lot while he was on duty as a police official, or hunting big game in the tangled jungles of India, that, though his book comes, as it does, on the heels of more than one volume of a similar character, he need entertain little fear that it will lack readers. His is a hunting as well as a police record, and it is a thousand pities that the commonplace title, "Life in the Indian Police," should give no clue to what unquestionably is the larger and more enjoyable portion of the work. The chief impression that this book leaves is the fact of the Englishman's ability to succeed in a difficult position in a far-off land without any previous preparation for his task. The author, while at school, gave his attention to play rather than to "the less interesting subjects necessary for examinations"; but through the good offices of an uncle, "an official of some influence in Calcutta," he was able to exchange his "dingy rooms in Bayswater" and an annual income of "less than £40," derived from a connection with a firm which did not consider his services "absolutely indispensable," for a post in the Indian police, which not only brought him a comfortable salary, but also gave him considerable authority over a large and populous district. At the time of his departure from England he knew absolutely nothing about money matters or business methods. Before he knew much of the language of the people amongst whom he was placed, and after the briefest probation, he was appointed to the responsible post of "assistant superintendent of police," from which, in the course of a few years, he was promoted to still higher posts. Mr. Gouldsbury does not hesitate to confess some of the awkward situations that arose during his early years of officialdom; but on the whole he seems to have done well. Probably the most interesting observation he makes regarding police matters is his reference to the utter untrustworthiness of native officials, and their inclination to harass those over whom they are placed, their methods of extorting confessions, of which the author gives some examples (pp. 281-2), that are ingenious though positively barbaric. Like so many others of his profession, he maintains that education is driving Hindostan to the "dogs," and takes delight in caricaturing the educated Indians, or "the Babus" as he calls them. But in spite of this, he is not a thorough-going native-hater. He is very generous in his tribute to the detective genius of the Indian police officials, and his stories of the exploits of one, Kali Dass—a native sleuth—make delightful reading.

S.N.S.

SUDERMANN IN ENGLISH.†

It is curious how little interest is taken in England in current German literature. The eyes of our critics are

* "Life in the Indian Police." By C. E. Gouldsbury. With 24 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

† "Morituri: Three One-Act Plays." By Hermann Sudermann. Translated by Archibald Alexander.

"Roses: Four One-Act Plays." By Hermann Sudermann. Translated by Grace Frank. 2s. net each vol. (Duckworth.)

fixed chiefly on France and Russia, and even those few German names that are known to us, the names of Sudermann and Hauptmann for instance, are indeed little more than names. One welcomes, therefore, all the more warmly these two small volumes of translations of seven of Sudermann's plays. Under the collective title of "Morituri" are gathered "Teja," "Fritzchen," and "The Eternal Masculine," and under "Roses"—"Streaks of Light," "The Last Visit," "Margot," and "The Far-Away Princess."

These two volumes are not only of importance in themselves, but they are intensely interesting, as showing the influence of Ibsen on an imaginative and original mind. They certainly have, as a whole, that curious and foreboding atmosphere that Ibsen manages to convey in so remarkable a fashion. They deal with strange problems of the soul with that air as of secret depths below the normal surface of life, of which Ibsen was such a master. And yet they have a delicate personality of their own, which makes them individual and finished works of art.

Of the seven, "Teja" is undoubtedly the weakest. It is a story of the Gothic camp overlooking Vesuvius. The Goths have taken up an impregnable position, but they are dying from hunger, and await daily the fleet of ships bringing them food. It is the marriage day of Teja, the king of the Goths. His marriage is purely diplomatic, and he hardly even notices his bride for some time. The play consists largely of a dialogue between the two, in which her simple nobility gradually wins him to her. He knows, but keeps secret from her, that his fleet has been captured, and that at dawn he, at the head of his men, is going to make a hopeless onslaught on the vast army before him. When she learns the truth she behaves with heroic submission, and the curtain falls at the moment of parting.

There is not much to be said for this play beyond the fact that it shows the rather odd psychological workings of Teja's brain. It is decidedly uninteresting.

The same cannot be said of "Fritzchen," the next in order in the book. It is the story of how Lieutenant von Drosse arrives home to his parents with the knowledge that within twenty-four hours he will be no more. He has created a disgraceful scandal with another officer's wife, an officer who is a dead shot, and the Court of Honour of the regiment are now sitting in judgment upon him. But the agony of his mind is not whether he will have to fight, but whether he will be allowed to fight. The injured officer has horsewhipped him, and it is doubtful whether he will be given the opportunity of a duel. When he reaches home neither mother nor father know that anything is amiss. But it is not long before the father guesses, and, when he is alone with his son, he finds out all. He is at first furious at his son's disgrace, but when the lieutenant points out to him that he had never led such a life till his father had practically suggested he should, he is overwhelmed. This volte face is, indeed, too drastic, and adds a touch of melodrama to a powerful situation. He is now as tortured as his son lest the Court will not sanction the duel, but, to his immense and mournful relief, the news arrives that they have sanctioned it. The play closes with the lieutenant taking leave of his parents—the mother still unwitting that he is going straight to death.

The last play of this volume is of quite a different genre. It has the airy unreality of a fairy tale, and yet it is touched with a very caustic irony. Its atmosphere is unique—rather as though Hans Andersen, Shaw, and Anatole France had collaborated to make the reader charmed and uncomfortable at one and the same moment. There is a queen, a painter, a marshal, a marquis in blue, a marquis in pink, a deaf maid of honour, a sleepy maid of honour, and so on. The painter falls in love with the queen, and is plotted against by the marquises. The marshal is ordered to seize him, and, after threatening summary death, ends by becoming his bosom friend. It is an exquisite phantasy touched with a breath of bitterness.

The first play in "Roses" is "Streaks of Light." This and the one that follows next, "Margot," show, perhaps, Ibsen's influence more precisely than any of the others. There are only three actors in "Streaks of Light"—the husband, Wittich, his wife, Julia, and his wife's so-called lover, Pierre. Julia is of the order of Hedda Gabler—a thoroughly neurotic woman utterly tired of her home. She has become Pierre's mistress, and is hidden by him in the pavilion in the garden of his mother's house. Pierre is a wretched youth of twenty, terrified lest his liaison may be discovered, and already weary to death of his Julia. In his querulous selfishness he reminds one exactly of the married son in "Rutherford and Son." It is evening, and Pierre has just slipped over to the pavilion to see Julia and inform her that her husband has been to call on his mother that afternoon, and that he believes that he suspects him—Pierre. As they sit there talking there is suddenly a knocking without, and Wittich enters slowly. He is a big man, and Pierre and Julia are filled with terror. But, instead of behaving in the obvious manner, he is all weak and sobbing. They begin to pluck up heart, and presently are talking to him in a grand manner. All at once Wittich, under some impulse of rage, leaps up and stabs Julia dead. Pierre rushes wildly into the darkness. The curtain falls.

It is what one might call a morbid play, but it is very impressive. The characters of Julia and Pierre are conceived with rare insight into a certain type of disordered personality.

"Margot," as was mentioned before, is another play modelled, apparently, on Ibsen. Its subject is unpleasant, but its treatment highly arresting. It is just this—the psychology of a girl who has been seduced at an early age. The mother has kept the fact from the father, and the only other person who knows about it is the middle-aged family lawyer. These two together have, after three years of scheming, made the man promise to marry Margot. She has consented to their plans until he has actually proposed—when she declines him. This is when the play opens. The mother, who has an idea that this marriage alone will re-habilitate her daughter in her own eyes, brings her to call on the lawyer, and while she is sent out of the room tells him everything. He then sees Margot alone, and their conversation practically constitutes the play. Her character, as shown to us little by little, is, perhaps, the most interesting thing in either of these two volumes. She is compounded of those contradictions that so delight the psychologists of to-day; and, it need hardly be added, she is utterly different from what her mother supposes. Then gradually it comes out that the man she is really in love with is the lawyer, who, fortunately, is really in love with her. The play ends on a note of hope.

"The Last Visit," again, shows signs of Ibsen in its unexpectedness, but it shows them less markedly. A captain has been shot dead in a duel, and the body is lying in the next room awaiting removal. The young girl, whose father and mother used to look after the captain, and who herself used often to take in his meals, is sitting there, when a veiled lady enters bearing a wreath. She was the late captain's beloved, but as she is already married she has to be cautious. The young girl is very quiet and respectful, and retires from sight, leaving the veiled lady (a countess) to talk alone with Lieutenant von Wolters, a friend of the deceased. There is mention of some compromising letters, and she induces the lieutenant to open the desk and search for them. They cannot be found, and the veiled lady, in exasperation, says some harsh things about the captain. Thereupon the young girl enters, hands her a bundle of letters, and begs her to take away her wreath, after what she has heard her say:

THE LADY: What do you say to that, Herr von Wolters? This person acts as if she were the mistress of the house!

DAISY (proudly): I am.

THE LADY (stares at her through her lorgnette and smiles): Oh, really!

DAISY (her bearing pure and proud): The night before he died I became his wife.

That is somewhat in the Ibsen manner, is it not?

The last of these seven plays is "The Far-Away Princess." It is a very light comedy, not without a touch of symbolism. It relates how a princess came to an inn, and was mistaken by a young tutor for a girl of the same class as himself. He tells her how he has fallen in love with the princess, although he has never even seen her, and he explains how wonderful his princess is, how far above them in every way. The princess, who is an unhappy, ailing girl, listens with secret pleasure, and when he discovers who she is she offers him a rose out of her hat, "because the unreal must always dwell in the imagination." It is a pretty comedy, but its substance is very slight.

So of the plays we have discussed one may say that "Fritzchen," "Streaks of Light," and "Margot," are the most remarkable, "The Eternal Masculine" the most recherché, while "Teja" is the least interesting, or rather the only truly uninteresting one.

RICHARD CURLE

THE SPORTING INSTINCT.*

Martin Swayne delighted a host of readers by that book of amazing wit and cleverness, "Lord Richard in the Pantry." He is a young novelist who moves on wholly unconventional lines, and who might take as his motto the ancient saying: "Nullius addictus sum jurare in verba magistri." In his new book he is thinking of the proverb "When poverty comes in at the door, love flies out of the window." He recognises that one of the greatest tragedies of human life is the sudden sweeping away of the material resources on which our earthly happiness depends. Such a loss makes a deeper impression, specially on the middle-aged, than the sharpest bereavement. It may be compared to the physician's overwhelming verdict that death must come ere long by a lingering and torturing disease. Yet that sentence has often called forth unsuspected heroism. The patient rises above sordid and mean concerns, for he sees a way of escape beyond the trial. For the misery of a loss of fortune there are few compensations, if the loser has been accustomed from childhood to a self-indulgent existence. Martin Swayne's heroine, Mrs. Ellershawe, a beautiful woman on the sunny side of forty, is the wife of a country gentleman with a fortune of £3,000 a year, and has a personal income of £400. When the novel opens she is mistress of Branscombe Lodge, a leader of local society, who refuses to invite to her Christmas party the wealthy Fritton family, because their fortune has been made out of a hair-wash. She persists in her refusal although her good-natured husband remonstrates, "Hair is one of the few things that are really worth restoring." Mrs. Ellershawe loves spending money. While the message of doom lies in the house unopened, she plans a visit to the stores in London for new fish-knives, dining-room carpet, and a twenty-guinea electric plate-warmer for the sideboard. When the crash comes she finds herself bound for life to an inferior man, a selfish, greedy child-husband, who settles down apathetically to live on her small means in a villa on the Sussex coast. Martin Swayne's astonishing genius is best displayed in the portraiture of Phil Ellershawe. Here is a vigorous, self-satisfied man in the prime of life, with an enormous appetite, and a taste for out-door amusements. He shouts and bangs tables and utters "inarticulate roars that typify the jungle." "If I was poor," he exclaims, "I would work for my bread and butter and not complain." And again, "If I had had to work, I believe I would have got on. . . . I don't pretend to be a genius. But compared with most men—"

"Fifteen years ago, at his marriage, he had spoken in a very loud voice. Since then, the experiences of life had done nothing to soften it." The loud voice, the roaring joviality, the school-boy brag, tolerable enough to his wife and his neighbours in the wealthy squire, become odious in the tenant of a little seaside villa, whose days are spent on the golf-links, who eats and drinks more than is good for him, and bullies his wife for an occasional five-pound note. She says at last with bitter contempt: "Why, don't you do something to earn a decent livelihood?"

* "The Sporting Instinct." By Martin Swayne. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The beautiful, popular woman comes to hate this lazy loafer, and the situation is saved only by the patient chivalry of Major Singleton, a friend with all the innate nobility of Colonel Newcome. We have never read a book which described with such masterly analysis the torments of the pleasure-lover who has suddenly lost riches and social prestige. Without a large income, Mrs. Ellershawe confesses: "I might as well not have lived; just as a flower might as well not have lived if its roots wither just as it begins to bloom." In mediæval torture-chambers, we are shown to-day the narrow space behind a grating from which the judge once listened to the confessions of the sufferers, with the desk at which he wrote, and the lantern which shed its flickering light upon his paper. Martin Swayne has a keen ear for life's tragic undertones, and a lantern that searches to the depths of souls. He has produced a novel of extraordinary merit, daring and original in conception and full of vivacity in detail. The fabric is encrusted with dazzling gems. We can scarcely turn a page without lighting on an epigram, yet there is nothing forced or centrifugal in the talk of any of the characters. We take a few examples at random:

"Without character one is as useless as a railway without rails."

"A woman with so many jewels must have had an interesting past."

"The literature of satisfaction, of the millions of people who have attained pleasure, is unwritten. It is easy to write about sad things, Sir George, but no one can write about pleasure. You cannot write with white ink on white paper."

"A great deal of bread is crumbled by wives in villas because so many situations occur in which it is the only thing to do."

"Since motors were introduced a great impetus has been given to the manufacture of falsehoods in the home, as well as on the rubber market."

"London is full of husbands who never recover from their wives. They marry, and one hears nothing more about them. Occasionally you meet them in the street, wandering along with their eyes on the pavement, in a state of helpless contentment."

"Genealogical trees cast deep shadows."

"Happiness is an act of courage," she said at length. "No one can be happy without the courage to be happy."

"You can't expect a person, after being swept away by an avalanche, to sit up and pick out the edelweiss that has been carried down with it."

Mrs. Ellershawe has been swept away by an avalanche and for a while she is dazed and stupefied. When the story ends she has regained her foothold, and is searching for the white flower of happiness among the rocks above the glacier's edge. Martin Swayne's new novel places him in the front rank of our younger fiction-writers. No book of the season deserves a wider popularity.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOL BOY.*

The source of half the present social confusion is to be found in our habit of taking words for things. We discuss words; we agitate about words; we legislate for words, and then we wonder why the more things change the more they remain the same. In philosophy this pother about words does not matter. Empiricism, pragmatism, nominalism, realism,—no one gets into a passion over these, nor do they trouble humanity at large. They are merely tools; they are aids to clear thinking. But the social terms are another story. Socialism and individualism, the rich and the poor, the upper classes, the middle classes and the lower classes, tariff reform and free trade, capital and labour—these, so far from being tools of thought or aids to clear thinking, are actually the chief means of confusing issues and obscuring thought. There are no things to correspond with these words. The same writer or speaker may use them in a dozen different senses in as many lines; and you may be sure that, when he is hard pressed for something to say, he will cover his ignorance by some abstraction to which he cannot attach any clear meaning. If every person who made argumentative use of such words could be sentenced to something lingering with boiling oil in it we should be really on the road to better things.

* "The Decline of Aristocracy" By Arthur Ponsonby 7s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin)

"Aristocracy" and "democracy" are a bad pair of offenders. Someone enthusiastically defends the principle of aristocracy—that is, government by the best—a proposition so obvious and so vague that assent is easy; but then you discover presently that by "aristocracy" he means the House of Lords or the people who live in Grosvenor Square. Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, the author of this searching and suggestive volume, leaves us in no doubt about his meaning. By the aristocracy he means those who have been educated at the more expensive public schools, and his book is really an indictment of the public school system.

We are hearing a good deal just now about the public school man. He is being rather significantly boomed in newspapers of a certain class. It is the public school man, we are told, who has made England what she is; to which the obvious retort is that it is time another kind of person came along to make England what she isn't. Mr. Ponsonby's criticism is most valuable. Some of it is open to question, and some of it is undeniably true; but the whole issue is one that everybody ought to face. It is this: What kind of person is it, really, who forms the bulk of our legislators, our permanent officials, our ministers of state? Are we satisfied, or shall we change our masters—in all senses of the term? Everybody with a vote and everybody who hopes to get a vote ought to read this book.

GEORGE SAMPSON.

COURT GOSSIP.*

For years the historians of royal personages have been entertaining the public with anecdotes about monarchs and

* "Correspondence of Sarah Spencer, Lady Lyttelton, 1787-1870." Edited by her Great-Granddaughter, the Hon. Mrs. Hugh Wyndham. With Portraits 15s. net. (Murray.)

Sarah, Lady Lyttelton, in 1850.

From a drawing by J. Swinton.

From "Correspondence of Sarah, Lady Lyttelton," edited by the Hon. Mrs. Hugh Wyndham (John Murray)

princes, and particularly about Queen Victoria, culled from the letters of Lady Sarah Lyttelton; and now that these letters appear publicly in volume form they are likely to be eagerly sought after by the many who prefer the whole to the part. They have been arranged, annotated and connected, where necessary, with explanatory paragraphs in a thoroughly pleasant manner by Mrs. Hugh Wyndham, who also contributes an introduction.

Sarah Spencer was born in 1787, and in 1813 was married to Mr., afterwards Lord, Lyttelton, who, dying in 1837, left his lonely wife free to take office at Court, as a Lady of the Bedchamber. Later on her sterling qualities caused her to be appointed governess to the Royal children. The letters begin in 1801 and continue for about sixty years, thus providing not only a biographical account of the family, but a profusion of anecdotes and good stories about illustrious people, with descriptions of travel in Sweden, Russia and Italy.

We feel sympathy with the Maids of Honour whose every going out and coming in was marked, and who would come to beg Lady Lyttelton to allow them "to walk on the terrace" for a little, "or to stroll just for once alone on the slope" at Windsor; we are amused at the spectacle of Lord Melbourne trying daily to revolutionize his stomach with "consommés, truffles, pears, ices and anchovies," and at the Duchess of Kent who, dissolved into tears because the Queen of Portugal was ill, called Lady Lyttelton to come and see her cry and to comfort her, or again with the same royal lady who, when at a review, fell into "a sad worry" for fear the Queen should catch cold, or Lady Barrington be knocked up (she was the only lady on horseback) or at least that the riflemen should wet their feet. We see Prince Albert indulging in floods of tears over the death of his father, so affecting his secretary that he had to retire with an acute nervous headache; and then again we see him with tender fatherly care fitting a tiresome glove on his little son's fingers. Another amusing incident is that of the old Duke of Cambridge who was in the habit of thinking aloud, and who, being at Chatsworth, while on his knees at family prayer, exclaimed, "A d—d good habit this." Here and there we get a happy phrase or a touch of wit, such as that which someone utters, concerning a rainy season, "the winter is come to spend the summer here," most applicable to our past summer.

The pictures of our Royal family are very discreet, so much so that justice seems scarcely to be done to Queen Victoria, who is impressed upon us as a blushing, smiling ingenue, her face always betraying a vivid or complaisant happiness. This however would be caused by the royal command for secrecy about Palace events and is not the fault of Lady Lyttelton, who would, however, be at liberty to say all the pretty things she wished.

Not the least pleasing feature of this book is the delightful impression it gives of Lady Lyttelton herself, with her kindly outlook upon men and things. It contains some interesting portraits and some amusing caricatures from the pencil of Lavinia, Countess Spencer, Lady Lyttelton's mother, who was a woman of very marked personality.

CLARE JERROLD.

SLICES OF LIFE.*

One would imagine, to read some current criticism, that the only real things in this world were just those things that the world would be better without. Authors are dubbed realistic because they confine the exercise of their talents within the narrowest bounds and attach an exaggerated importance to the most artificial and least well-known aspects of the human comedy; whereas true realism consists in giving a picture of life in which the light and shade are in their due proportions.

No writer is a true realist who, by his incessant harping upon such details as soil the vision, hurt the soul, and antagonise the mind, raises a spirit of revolt in his reader and offends his susceptibilities. For though we none of us see eye to eye with even those who are most in sympathy with us, there is an approximate common standpoint from which the sane judgment contemplates life in the large; and this is the standpoint that the would-be realist must seek to attain.

For, after all, we do assuredly know that laughter is rather more common than tears, health than sickness, fun than wretchedness, humour than pathos, happiness than unhappiness. We do know that, despite the Psalmist, we are not all desperately wicked and irretrievably cynical or stupid or base, that goodness plays a very much larger part in the affairs of every day than evil, that there is more light than darkness, and that even the darkest night is not so absolutely black as the day is bright, because of the moon and stars which, though their radiance be veiled in cloud, still do something to temper the gloom.

Knowing this, then, it is strange that we should have exalted to the high place which true realism ought to occupy, that false realism which, though exact and accurate in detail as an auctioneer's catalogue ought to be, is often in its total effect as misleading. It is strange that we should seem to prefer to believe in the reality of those things that shock and disgust and depress us rather than in those things that are pleasant and beautiful and holy. Because our hearts do realise that there is, all said and done, more idealism than materialism upon earth, and more nobleness than depravity in man; or the destiny of the human race would not so surely if slowly trend upward, and our gaze would not be so resolutely set upon the sky.

These reflections have been suggested by three books, lying before me as I write, each after its own fashion an essay in realism. And it is proof of the variability of realistic methods that these three books are utterly unlike one another.

First, there is Mr. Pett Ridge, with another of his inimitable studies of London character. Hetty—"Devoted"—Sparkes is a domestic servant; and it has been reserved for Mr. Pett Ridge to discover that domestic servants have other functions in life than that of providing comic relief in second-rate farces and melodrama. He daringly depicts "slaveys" as creatures with weaknesses and passions, longings and aspirations, very similar to those which animate the ordinary human being. And that is the queer thing about Mr. Pett Ridge. He deals so faithfully with the facts of human nature and so fantastically with the facts of life. His people are all quite probable, and yet the wildest improbabilities happen to them. In one place his heroine, Hetty, is reminded that "the world was not a play at the Marlborough, where one always felt sure that a happy solution of difficulties would be found just before eleven o'clock." And yet that is precisely what Mr. Pett Ridge himself makes the world out to be. In another place Hetty and her father encounter an acquaintance "by one of those coincidences so frequent that they cease to surprise, at the moment when her name was on their lips." And truly, however much such coincidences may affect us in everyday existence, they have long since ceased to surprise us in books by this author, where the most casual acquaintances are bound to meet again, so that all may stand before the curtain in a row in the last chapter to make their final bow to the audience.

Of the other two books Mr. Robert Halfax's novel, specifically described as "A Slice of Life," is the greater surprise to me. It is a very creditable study of a rather new phase of London life. It tells of the infatuation of a young clergyman for a wild sort of girl, who is half a Cockney and half Greek or Italian. For this girl's sake the clergyman gives up his sacred vocation, and behaves generally in a way that is not only unworthy but unlikely. It would be too much to say that the incidents described are impossible, but certainly they are most unusual, and so the book fails of authenticity. And this is a pity, because the girl's uncle, Mr. Donno, her cousin Bill, the professional pugilist, and most of the minor characters are freshly and convincingly drawn. Moreover, this book is written with both force and humour. The dialogue is especially admirable, and there are some passages of real beauty. Mr. Halifax should astonish us all some day, for certainly he has the root of the matter in him.

* "Devoted Sparkes." By W. Pett Ridge. 6s. (Methuen.)

"A Slice of Life." By Robert Halfax. 6s. (Constable.)

"Clara: Some Chapters in the Life of a Hussy." By A. Neil Lyons. 6s. (Lane.)

And then there is Mr. Neil Lyons. I have exhausted my superlatives on Mr. Neil Lyons, long ago. He is, I think, without question or cavil, the supreme English humorist, if he is nothing more. One does not like to use fine words recklessly; but if he has not some glimmerings of genius I am no better than a soused gurnet. In "Clara" he has given us a book of short stories and sketches, linked together by the most slender of threads, in which there are chapters—such chapters as "Kettles to Mend"—that seem to take you by the throat, as it were, and choke both sobs and laughter out of you. There is an elusive, distinctive quality that no other living author possesses in the wistful beauty of Mr. Neil Lyons' pathos, the rich, full-bodied flavour of his humour that tingles on the palate like good wine, his gracious gift of sympathy, his clear-eyed philosophy—implied rather than expressed—and the delicate power with which he handles the most tragic issues. His people are not merely life-like; they are alive. He does not so much describe a thing as show it to you. His work reminds us not that the stars of Heaven are made of dust, but that it is the dust which makes the stars to light the world.

EDWIN PUGH.

ENGLISH PROSE RHYTHM.*

"Acquit me," says Professor Saintsbury, "of the impudence or the folly of thinking that I could say even an interim last word on the secrets of rhythmical charm. . . . You can never get at the final entelechy which differentiates Shelley and Shakespeare from the average versifier, Cluvenius and myself from Pater or from Browne." But "you can attend to the feature composition of the beautiful face, and so you can dignify and intensify your appreciation of them," and "this is best done in prose, as in verse, by the application of the foot system." "When that partition is mastered, to go over it will, to the right ears and fingers, give a similar pleasure to that given by playing and hearing a piece of music which you have not made for yourself, and which you could not make for yourself." In brief, a pianola. Into this invention, it is claimed, we will be able to slip the great prose-records and otherwise draw out their dumb music.

Well, however ingenious the system and analysis may be, there is a certain ructulness on some of these pages, only half whimsical, when Professor Saintsbury contemplates results. For, as results go, they are meagre: "the Law of English prose-rhythm is variety"—"what apparently makes the charm of English prose is not uniformity but variety"—"Variety is the moon that governs the waves of prose, Order the sun that directs the orbits of verse"—this is almost the only general law he can deduce; and what does it amount to, after all, but a confession that the law is there is no law, the principle of prose is lack of it?

But it is not in Mr. Saintsbury to be barren, and the joy of this book is its rebelliousness. Once committed to its enterprise, it held indomitably on, but it only manages to sustain it by continually breaking bounds—making unofficial sorties, private raids, blandly disobeying its own orders even while it utters them; and these mutinies are its salvation. He had pledged himself to explain the charm of a sunset, leaving out the elements of light and colour, and of course it couldn't be done; and in a little while, without a word being said, we find him following in the scarlet and the gold. Superbly responsive to beauty of every kind, with every sense alive and sure, Mr. Saintsbury leaps delightedly towards all the other elements that make prose prose colour, content, glimmering association, mirrored image, even (though more reluctantly) the picture-making power of printed letters, the capacity of prose, no longer read aloud, to play a subtler tune for the eye. His relish is amazing, quite unequalled: the glee with which his periods pounce upon a happy phrase and carry it off shoulder-high, singing songs of admiration as they go—the catholicity of his homage, as devout before Carlyle as Pater, as grateful for Malory as Meredith,—and the niceness with which this gusto is discriminated, microscopically graduated for all its giant length—make the book, in spite of much that is wanton, turbulent, otiose, a royal guide to the finer pleasures of our tongue. Running through it all is the golden sense of adventure: in spite of its elaborate inter-chapters, annotations, glossaries, appendices and tables, it still refuses to be thought of as anything but a prolonged improvisation, a happy-go-lucky plunge into the unknown; and the excitement spreads to the reader. There is not a dead, stale, dingy or automatic sentence in the book, and very few that are tedious; and even when he is deepest among his amphibrachs and epitrites Mr. Saintsbury's imagination warms and quickens them with colour, he handles them with much the joy John Davidson took in the terminology he cribbed from chemistry, and often, so great is the crash and revel of the ranging terms meeting and parting in a drama, that even the sceptic is intoxicated and begins to think of pianolas less aloofly. But though that, of course, is an illusion, all the other enlivening properties hold good. The book's main theory will not help us much, but it has made a perfect platform for many utterances that will.

*English Prose Rhythm. By Professor George Saintsbury. 14s. net. (Macmillan.)

D. S.

VIEWS AND REVIEWS.*

One of the surest tests of a writer's skill and power to interest is employed when he produces a volume of essays. The biographer, the historian, the novelist have each their story to tell; they have, one may say, fixed lines on which to weave their work, and they may weave it well or ill. But the essayist weaves each bit from threads which he himself must first spin, and the brilliance and beauty of his work as a whole depends upon his own capability.

Mrs. Andrew Lang is eminently an essayist; the present volume proves it. She is not what we understand by the term "a stylist," but her writing is distinctive by reason of its admirable lucidity of expression, its humour devoid of flippancy, its aptness, and its fine literary sense. In her dozen and a half of essays we have biographical sketches, pictures of social life in past centuries, comments upon ordinary matters, criticisms of literary subjects; and each and all are illuminated by the genial light thrown upon them by the broad-minded and talented writer.

The first essay in the volume is "A Poscuse of the Eighteenth Century." The "poscuse" is Madame de Genlis, and we get what one might call a silver-point-cinematograph portrait of the lady who as a child ran "about the country dressed as Cupid (wings omitted for Church)"; who inspired a violent passion of love at the age of eleven; who was married in her teens; became, at twenty-four, lady-in-waiting to the Duchess de Chartres; and who, later, was selected as "governor" to the sons and daughters of Philippe Egalité. Mrs. Lang gives all the light and shade necessary to the picture of Paris and the "poscuse," with the result that this lady of a past century, with her talents, her loves, her spites, her ideas, re-lives in this little book-of-life of less than a score of pages in length.

Two other essays, short and delightful essays of comment, are "Trials of the Wife of a Literary Man" and "Art in Country Inns and Lodging Houses." These show us the essayist, not as a student of books, but as an observer of human nature. In all probability the truths in the former essay will not deter one single bride from matrimony with a literary bridegroom, nor will the latter description give one landlady pause as she ties the ribbon bow over the picture in her parlour, or places the plush-framed photograph upon her "what-not"; but they will give entertainment to scores of understanding readers.

* "Men, Women and Minxes." By Mrs. Andrew Lang. 7s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

Of the critical essays, the reviews, one may say that Mrs. Lang possesses that valuable knack, the knack of sending readers to the original book. She creams her subject delightfully, skilfully. With genuine excitement we have turned again to that egregious, yet seemingly immortal book, "The Fairchild Family." Mrs. Lang asks what it is "that makes the incidents in the daily life of these intolerable children, and their yet more intolerable parents, stick in our minds." Answering from personal memory, we venture the answer that it is because the children did fall from grace continually, because they were so humanly wicked at times, were such sinners in spite of the self-righteous atmosphere in which they lived, that we read with a fascinated satisfaction of their ever-recurring evil deeds. It is a book which appeals to one's sporting instinct in childhood, and one's sense of humour in later years. We have not space to refer to all the essays in the volume, the reminiscences, the memoirs of old families, the pictures of earlier modes and manners. But to bookmen we may remark that in "Morals and Manners in Richardson," they will find one of the most attractive items in a wholly attractive book. It is a piece of sane, clever, vivacious criticism, in which we detect that on the subject of Richardson versus Fielding Mrs. Lang is quite sound.

Our grumble comes last. Frankly, we do not like the book's title. Again, there are awkwardnesses of expression which are regrettable in such good work, and should have been set right in "proof." For instance:—"They cultivate surface-emotions as part of their stock-in-trade, on the same principle as the hardest-hearted people are most easily moved by a play" (p. 42); and "There is only one member of society whose testimony is absolutely trustworthy and unbiassed, and that of a younger brother" (p. 48). Then surely Mrs. Lang is confusing Eliza Haywood's novel "Betsy Thoughtless" with Sarah Fielding's "David Simple" (p. 115); and Mrs. Sinclair's cook-maid sat up to read the simple History of Dorastus and Faunia, not Dorastius. We like to see good books free from blemishes of this avoidable nature; but, our small grumble over, we thank the writer for a very charming volume.

THE BOOK OF WONDER.*

"Come with me, ladies and gentlemen who are in any wise weary of London: come with me: and those that tire at all of the world we know: for we have new worlds here." Those who accept Lord Dunsany's invitation will not be disappointed, for here are new worlds indeed: worlds of improbable adventure, inhabited by Gnoles and Gibbelins and other strange beings; Dubious Lands and Cities of Never. Perhaps Lord Dunsany harps a little too often on one theme: the impossible quest, which in ordinary fairy tales is successfully achieved, but here terminates disastrously for the adventurer. It is, however, a theme well suited alike to his power of describing the uncanny and the magnificent and to his ironical humour. "The Probable Adventure of the Three Literary Men" and "The Quest of the Queen's Tears" are gems in this kind. But Lord Dunsany is capable of a higher art than the grotesque. He writes prose of great beauty, with inner rhythm as well as external decoration, and his imagination is of a fine quality. "The Bride of the Man-Horse" is unsurpassable as a piece of rhythmical prose. One hears the beat of the centaur's hoofs as he rushes across the world. "How One came, as was foretold to the City of Never," gives wings to one's thoughts and sends them soaring in the wake of the hippogriff. Best of all, perhaps, is "The Magic Window," with its exquisite picture, clear-cut yet remote, of the "medieval city set with towers. Brown roofs and cobbled streets, and then white walls and buttresses, and beyond them bright green fields and tiny streams. . . ." It is the very spirit of Dürer or of Malory. But even more exquisite and more imaginative than Lord Dunsany's stories are the drawings of Mr. Sime. Beauty of line, grace and rhythm of movement, mystery of atmosphere, all characterize them. As illustrations they are entirely satisfactory, blending humour and beauty in Lord Dunsany's own proportions. But as works of art they are self-sufficient; they do not need the text to explain or justify them. In any collection of modern black-and-white, "Zeetazoola," "He Felt as a Morsel," and (above all) "The City of Never" would be notable.

* "The Book of Wonder." By Lord Dunsany. Illustrated by S. H. Sime. 6s. net. (Heinemann.)

The edge of the World.

From "The Book of Wonder," by Lord Dunsany. (Heinemann.)

AFLOAT AND ASHORE.

Johnson said: "When men come to like the sea they are not fit to live on land;" he also adumbrated the opinion that "a ship is a prison, with the chance of being drowned," and that "a ship is worse than a jail," etc., of the same kind and very much Johnsonian-thundered dogmatism, with all the mighty, sword-edged-like breadth of the insular Englishman at his terrible worst. We have known women who thought as Johnson did of these things, but not men. Apropos, however, what would the great one have said of such men as the late Captain Joshua Slocum, who, single-handed, with "no dorg nor no cat" even, sailed a sloop around the world; of other men who did similar things during the past century, and now of Captain du Baty?

* "Fifteen Thousand Miles in a Ketch." By Captain Raymond Rallier du Baty. Illustrated. 2s. net. (Nelson & Co.)

It appears that the last-named, with his brother as mate, a cook, and a "for'ard crowd" of three hands, sailed the J. B. Charcot (named after Dr. Charcot, the Antarctic explorer), a Boulogne fishing ketch of 45 tons, from that port to Melbourne—distance, 15,000 miles. They left the Channel in September 1907, and arrived at their destination, July, 1908, after touching at such places as Tristan da Cunha, Kerguelen and the like. No wonder that Prince Roland Bonaparte, President of the French Geographical Society, said to the two brothers: "You are sixteenth century adventurers, who have been lost in the twentieth." And the reason of it all?—apparently no more than that which prompts men to try to reach the Poles, cross deserts when ninety-nine per cent. of persons would just go round, essay to swim the Channel, and other ventures of the same sort: i.e., a desire to do the thing. And it will be a bad day for the human race when none of its members are actuated by such "fooleries." But the du Batys did more than merely cover the 15,000 miles of ocean in a craft that somewhat reminds one of Drake's Golden Hind. Says the narrator:

"We explored a good many unknown islands and mapped many uncharted coasts and hidden reefs, and made a great number of soundings in narrow straits strewn with rocks, by which my fellow-sailors of all nations will benefit when they pass that way. We also brought back a good many specimens, geological, botanical and entomological, new to the museums; so that in a scientific way the results of the little trip were interesting."

Still, he adds, this is "The story of my adventures, rather than of my discoveries. People are still interested in the romance of the sea. I remember with what excitement I have read all such stories from 'Robinson Crusoe' downwards. My narrative may be read in the same spirit."

And in that same spirit the story is told—a simple record of fact, where one's appreciation of things done is not divided by the claims of the manner of their telling.

As in Captain du Baty we have a good example of the true and hardy adventurer, so in Mr. Chatterton* we find an equally fair instance of the summer wanderer on comparatively smooth waters—the coastwise adventurer in flannels or white "ducks," with the smell of the land always at his nostrils, and those store-houses and amenities of civilisation by which trade and inventors have so considerably helped us on the road to "soft jobs," spring mattresses, cigarettes, divan chairs, and a general desire to do nothing. But all things are needed to make a composite whole; and all things have their uses. So while the Slocums, the du Batys, etc., give us the meats and the strong seasonings which our jaded appetites demand in the repast, Mr. Chatterton and his kind furnish us, summer after summer, with the lighter courses—and, yes, at times with the liqueur, the coffee and the cigarette; we cannot say cigar, and still less, a pipe. Yet Mr. Chatterton has in him a sense of the whole meal. Mark:

"There are two ways of taking a cruise. The first is to sail from one port to another for the sheer delight in reaching a definite place. The joy of seamanship, navigation, and life on board is in itself complete."

Just so. Why, cutting out the real dangers, the bitter cold, gales, walrus hunting, etc., what but this was the 15,000 miles passage of the ketch? Mr. Chatterton might almost have doubled both the Horn and the Cape—as he did in miniature along our side of the Channel in the Vivette a year or two ago.

"The other plan, however, is to sacrifice none of the pleasures of sailing, but to add to these all the interest which can be derived from the people and the places visited."

So he took his four-tonner to Holland, had dangers and mishaps by the way, traversed some of the level streams, noted the windmills and the peculiar green of the grass and—who shall say?—perhaps the no less peculiar taste of Schiedam before it is "prepared" for market (as we once did), conned the ever-smoking men of baggy breeches and sabots, and generally appears to have enjoyed himself—as anyone else may do at second-hand by reading his entertaining narrative of the trip. Indeed, as a log full of interest the book is a considerable advance on "Down Channel in the Vivette." There is more in this than the former log contained, and not altogether because the change of scene gave more to record. The style has improved greatly; it has become more terse and literary withal. Besides, Mr. Chatterton did not go to the land of dykes merely for pleasure and to produce a literary rendering of his amusement. He went there with a knowledge of the country's former higher place in the scale of nations, and with the well-kept intention of seeing more than the humorous side of superficial matters. As witness:

* "Through Holland in the Vivette: The Cruise of a Four-Tonner from the Solent to the Zuyder Zee, through the Dutch Waterways." By E. Koble Chatterton. With over 60 Illustrations, Harbour Plans and Charts. 6s. net. (Seeley, Service & Co.)

"The enthusiast who visits Holland only with the intention of studying its paintings is like a person who glues his eyes to one buttress of a Gothic cathedral. He has no idea of perspective; no sense of proportion. He cannot see a cathedral for stones."

Still there is plenty of humour in the book, and with it all the sailing directions that any reader may need in order to follow in Mr. Chatterton's wake. Also the illustrations are to be highly commended, as are the paper and the general get-up of the volume.

In the third book* we have an excellent collection of twenty-five re-told true stories for juveniles. Here Mr. Stead has shown praiseworthy taste and discrimination in compiling a book that should be in considerable demand as a gift to schoolboys, to whose understanding his plain, capital English will offer no obstacles, while the deeds of real heroism, perseverance and fortitude will be fine examples to youthful minds.

J. E. PATTERSON.

CHILDHOOD IN A NEW LIGHT.†

"It may well be," says George Gissing, "that what we call the unknowable will be for ever the unknown." He was thinking at the moment of such great questions as those of the future of the race, but his words are equally applicable to the problems of consciousness in children, in animals, and even in plant life. For gradually as we, the adult, self-expressing humans, become more sensitive, we open out in imaginative sympathy towards other more silent existences; we are always striving to push back the frontiers of the unknowable. This reflection suggests the scope and aim of "Tryfield," for this book, the joint work of two new authors, is a picture of childhood from within. It is as significant in the child world as Algernon Blackwood's work in the kingdom of the elemental.

Literature is full of delightful children: the gamin, the imaginative baby, the rotous schoolgirl or boy, all these move through the pages of Evelyn Sharp, Desmond Coke, and Rudyard Kipling. But it is on the child as jester that the attention of these writers is concentrated. From Peter Pan downwards it is with the child in his lighter moments that we are invited to sympathize. Comparing these delicate studies with one's own childhood, however veiled in the magic of distance that must now be, we have to confess that none of these stories does more than give us childhood before the footlights with accompaniment of slow music. Other things we find in our memories: strange warnings within the nature, passionate resistance to the power of circumstance, then especially typified in the rôle of older people, the sordid fears and deceptions of weakness in the midst of a tyrannical world. It is with such emotions as these that "Tryfield" deals in the person of a remarkably well-realized boy. "Al" Wainwright is the offspring of an unhappy marriage. His mother, a widow at the opening of the tale, makes a second marriage with a distinguished doctor, one Sir James Maine, likewise a widower with one son. All his brief life Al Wainwright has regarded himself as the centre of his little world, the protector of his mother, the patron of the two younger children, Muriel and baby Stephen. Now he devotes all the powers of his nature, first to resist his mother's marriage and then, when that is no longer possible, to spite the supplanter, to show him that he, the boy owner of Tryfield, is no helpless nonentity. It is an extremely simple theme, yet in the sure hands of the creators of Al we watch the struggle of the jealous, embittered child with keen pity, even with a half-sympathy. For the fight is so unequal, that of a beetle against a man. Sir James Maine is an admirable person, never failing in patience or tact towards either his own son Chris, or his adopted family. Yet we cannot help feeling, for all that, a certain smug piety in his intense forbearance. For he is so powerful before the tiny might of a small child. He does everything with the best intentions. Yet he seems cruel when once we accept the child's point of view.

* "Adventures in Southern Seas: Stirring Stories of Adventure among Savages, Wild Beasts and the Forces of Nature." By Richard Stead, B.A., F.R.Hist.S. With 17 Illustrations 5s. (Seeley, Service & Co.)

† "Tryfield." By G. and M. Hayling. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

And that is the new note we hear in "Tryfield." There is in it no condescension towards the child soul, for we are made to feel its point of view. Al is an ill-conditioned little wretch, ungracious, deceitful and egotistic, but we pardon him exactly as we pardon ourselves when we have acted badly—and recognize it. In Al's case we feel, indeed, as an omniscient judge might feel, because every fibre of the child's jangled nature is in our grasp. Compared with other writers on children, the authors of "Tryfield" are like Russian realists. The extremes of wretchedness are not foreign to their comprehension. The gulf between the boy Al and the more kindly and commonplace children makes his case more vivid. Chris Maine is a gracious, kindly lad, who receives new-comers into his life with ever-ready welcome; Stephen is an engaging creature, who uses his tears as a weapon against the aggressive grown-ups. For "Tryfield" is all through a story of fathers and sons.

The adults occupy a curious place in the tale, a place not altogether consonant with the facts of life. Mrs. Wainwright and Sir James, we are given to understand, marry mainly to further the interests of their respective families, for they are both very good, very firmly devoted to duty. Apparently of personal aims they are as free as the lilies of the field. This attitude is perhaps natural in a person so dependent on children's whims as a somewhat helpless governess, but it is simply incredible in a man of the world. The grown-ups in "Tryfield" are irritatingly unco' guid and pious. And that is where the book fails, even in its point of view, for the authors' opinions clash with those of the child. Yet this attitude is, after all, quite characteristic of the age which is beginning to study children as never before. In this novel the central sun is the child about whom the adults revolve like planets in their orbits. A change, indeed, since the nips and bobs and pinches of Elizabethan authority!

Infinitely minute in detail, "Tryfield" is a psychological study of value, since it directly tends to drive back the frontiers of dull ignorance and stupidity in relation to children. Many boys and girls suffer as Al did, children with a kink in their natures, children ill-born in one sense, yet often with remarkable futures before them. For of how many a great man may it not be said that his boyhood was a martyrdom? We are deeply grateful to the authors of "Tryfield" for opening, not only our eyes, but our hearts.

M. P. WOLLCOCKS.

A KEEPER OF THE ROYAL ROBES.*

Miss Constance Hill adds something to our amusement in this, her latest book on Fanny Burney, and her pleasantly written narrative of the novelist at the Court of Queen Charlotte will doubtless find many readers. This work, however, interesting as it is, is for the general public. It will make little or no appeal to the student of history or to those versed in the annals of literature, because it does not add to the information which they already possess. To them the autobiography of Mrs. Pappendiek, the letters of Horace Walpole, the famous Burney Diaries, and the other sources of which Miss Hill avails herself, are familiar. It is true, however, that Miss Hill has had the advantage, as we learn from her preface, of studying carefully the seven volumes of the "Diary and Letters" in the original manuscript, which were prepared for publication by the writer, when she had attained to the patriarchal age of four-score years, with the assistance of Mrs. Barrett, her niece. "The only change made in the manuscript was to leave out the first and last words of letters, so that the whole might be read in the form of a diary," Miss Hill tells us:

* "Fanny Burney at the Court of Queen Charlotte." By Constance Hill. With numerous illustrations by Ellen G. Hill, and reproductions of contemporary artists. 16s. net. (John Lane.)

"As regards the erased passages, they are treated in two ways—some being completely obliterated, others, on the contrary, merely marked for omission by two strokes of the pen. Among these latter there are some amusing scenes, which probably their writer considered too light and trivial to place before the world, but which have now become interesting as giving further pictures of her daily surroundings at Court, and which, therefore, are introduced into the present volume."

We are glad to have these hitherto unpublished passages, for everything that concerns Miss Burney is of considerable interest. The value of the book, it may at once be said, is much enhanced by the well-selected portraits, and by the delightful drawings, scattered throughout the volume, by Miss Ellen Hill.

Comedy is the keynote of the short period which Fanny Burney spent at the Court of Queen Charlotte, and though some writers affect to find the story tragic, the author of the "Diary," as all are aware, found in the situation much material for rich humour, that is, when she was not tired or bored, or out of spirits, as was sometimes the case. The post at Court offered to Miss Burney was that of Second Keeper of the Queen's Robes. The First Keeper was Mademoiselle Schwollenberg, a lady who has been handed down to posterity by her colleague and others in no very amiable light. A martinet she was, to be sure, and a very strong believer in the divine right of Queens. She placed her royal mistress on a very high pedestal, and prostrated herself, and expected others to do likewise. Above all, she was a loyal, if not always a discreet, servant, not seeking, in spite of her detractors, self-aggrandisement, albeit she had a keen sense of her own importance, an opinion unalloyed by any sense of humour. What Miss Burney wrote of her, and to her detriment, is too well known to be repeated. As a contrast to the novelist's account—and it must be remembered the pen of a novelist is a little inclined to embroidery—it is pleasant to find John Watkins, a biographer of Queen Charlotte, describing her as: "A well educated and highly-accomplished woman, extremely courteous in her manner, much respected by all the domestics of the royal household, and devotedly attached to the illustrious family with whom she lived, who, in their turn, entertained for her the sincerest affection."

"With great respect I here assure you, Ma'am,
Your name our common people loudly damn;
Genteel folk attack with silent curses."

Thus "Peter Pindar," most wanton of lampooners, when "the Schwollenberg" left England in 1789 on a visit to Germany. The unpopularity with the English of a German woman at the Court was a matter of course. The truth probably lies somewhere between the eulogy of Watkins and the depreciation by Fanny Burney.

If some space has been here devoted to Mademoiselle Schwollenberg, it is because she has ever been regarded as the principal objection which Miss Burney had to living at Court. Had the First Keeper really been so unpleasant, nay, so cruel, as the diarist insisted, is it conceivable that this lady would never have been provoked to retort upon her, or to treat her to some exercise of that considerable fund of humour of which she was possessed? It is inconceivable. There were other objections, and probably more serious ones, to the enjoyment of the post in the royal household. Their Majesties were pleasant enough, but, as Macaulay put it:

"They fancied that to be noticed by them, to serve them, was in itself a kind of happiness; and that Frances Burney ought to be full of gratitude for being permitted to purchase, by the surrender of health, wealth, freedom, domestic affections and literary fame, the privilege of standing behind a royal chair and holding a pair of royal gloves."

An essay might be written about the vanity of princes, and another essay on the excuses to be made for them. The point at issue is, however, that Miss Burney voluntarily surrendered "health, wealth, freedom, domestic affections and literary fame"—not literary fame, for did she not at Court write much of the "Diary and Letters"? There was no necessity for her to do this. She was not in any state of destitution, she had many and valuable friends. She yielded to the opinions of those who thought that such a post was suitable, nay, a boon, for her. When later another body of her friends decided that such a post was not suitable for her, she resigned it. It is surely a little difficult to find much sympathy for one who left, or seems to have left, a decision of such moment to be decided for her by others, for, be it remembered, she was not a child when she went to the Queen's House, but a woman of four-and-thirty. She suffered there, most certainly, being deprived of the company of her friends; but, though she knew it not, she suffered for the benefit of posterity and to the great ultimate enhancement of her fame, for is there anything in her writings so good as that part of her "Diary and Letters," in which she describes her life at Court?

LEWIS MELVILLE.

MRS. MARRIOTT WATSON'S POEMS.*

Mrs. Marriott Watson belongs to a little school of poets wistful and dreamy, of the 'eighties and 'nineties, which had reached the last perfection in what, for want of a better word, one must call exquisiteness. Mr. Arthur Symonds at his best, Dowson, who had a greater gift than either, were her only rivals. She was an essential poet.

Her husband's pious task of putting her poems together has been undertaken, perhaps, in a somewhat too inclusive spirit. I say perhaps, because while the mass of poetry, including the Juvenilia, takes from the perfection, by which she must stand, those Juvenilia and all the rest have their interest for the poetry-lover. In themselves the Juvenilia are remarkable. If her art later on attained to the exquisite, I do not think there is anything in the earlier poems that is negligible.

She had the true ballad spirit, and she had the Celtic temperament that is afraid of the dark. "The Blind Ghost," in the volume by which she came to be known, "The Bird Bride," is full of the feeling for the dark, for shadows, for ghosts. The fear rustles in the hair of the reader. But when all is said and done, hers was a very modern spirit. She was full of regrets and wistfulness. The solid earth was unstable beneath her feet. There was nothing of the stoic in her. She was in love with life and passionately afraid of death—so afraid that it makes the book sad reading. One feels the desire to comfort this poor frightened child, to tell her that out in the dark there is only freshness and dew and the stars—and the Infinite Mercy over all. She is modern in her phrases. Personally, I do not like in poetry words such as "crepuscle" and "nimbus": they are too deliberate. But having woven them into a web of many colours where they shine like strange jewels, she ends up on a magical

* "The Poems of Rosamond Marriott Watson." 5s. net. (John Lane.)

note, clear as a bird's, although one hopes no bird was ever so sad:

"When I lie hid from the light
Stark, with the turf overhead;
Still on a rainy Spring night
I will come back from the dead."

She dreaded the darkness and yet she loved it. Few could render the rain on the boughs, the darkness of trees, as she could: yet it is characteristic of her muse that there was a lamp in her tree rather than a star; perhaps because she was afraid of the dark and the loneliness of the country, she was an urban poet. She knew the truth which the Londoner of imagination knows, that never, never, can the country put forth anything quite so exquisite as the first green on the black London trees, that never is a song in the depths of the country half so heartbreakingly beautiful as the song of the thrush or the blackbird sung from a tree whose feet are held in stones. She loved the country as only the Londoner loves it, with a passion that can never become staled. Oh, a wet spring night in London, and the west wind wandering in, bringing the quiet dark country in his breath! She is sensitive to the call and the magic:

"The air is dark and sweet,
This wet Spring night.
Spring, of the wandering feet,
The soundless flight,
Calls through the slow, soft rain,
O voice of gold!
Calls to me once again
As oft of old.

"The darkness sighs and stirs,
Blind, blind and slow;
Night-wandering loiterers,
The veiled airs go,
Mutes of the viewless spell,
The hidden power,
These, but my heart knows well
Its magic hour.

"My heart's one festival,
O far or near,
The Spring could never call
And I not hear.
Deep under graveyard grass,
It could not be—
The Spring could never pass
And I not see.

"My heart, my heart would break,
Could it be so;
To think that Spring should pass
And I not know."

She has the sense of vision with any poet one knows, and the gift of making lovers of her poetry see as she sees, feel as she feels. But one is oppressed with the desire that one might have given her hope. A veiled figure terribly loth to go, she passes out to a darkness she dreaded. But in this very note of hers lies her distinctiveness. In a sense her passion of revolt held within it a seed of hope and faith. She could not be indifferent. Life had given her good things besides the infinite beauty of the world. If the darkness did not hold something for her she would not have been so rebellious. There is nothing here of the cheerless cheerfulness of negation.

Perhaps some day there may be a small volume of selections—one does not quarrel with the collection—and may there be the right person to do it, someone in sympathy with her delights and her pangs.

KATHARINE TYNAN.

AUSTRALIA'S NATIONAL POET.*

As a complement of his new edition of the poems of Adam Lindsay Gordon, Mr. Douglas Sladen has written in collaboration with Miss Edith Humphris the amplest and most satisfactory biography of Gordon that has yet been published. Moreover, he has laid various surviving friends of the poet under contribution for personal recollections and opinions, and devotes one particularly interesting chapter to a talk with Gordon's widow, by Mr. C. R. Wilton.

* "Adam Lindsay Gordon and His Friends in England and Australia." By Edith Humphris and Douglas Sladen. With sixteen sketches by Gordon and numerous other illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

The arrangement of the book is rather in the nature of patchwork. The first chapter contains an admirable account of Gordon's career, written by Mr. Sladen himself. This is followed by a collection of the epigrams and proverbial philosophy from Gordon's poems; by the talk with his widow; records gathered from friends of how he rode in Australia; his cousin's reminiscences of him; a table of his descent; a chapter about his father; other chapters about his boxing and racing experiences; a critical chapter, again by Mr. Sladen, on Gordon's poetry; then a key to the principal allusions in the poems; some poems not included in the collected edition, and a few bush songs attributed to Gordon. Here endeth the first part. The second part starts with "The Romance of Adam Lindsay Gordon," by Mr. Sladen, and is a pleasant story of his first love affair; this is succeeded by four chapters by Mr. J. M. Bulloch dealing with Gordon's ancestry; then come two of the most delightful chapters in the book containing Gordon's letters to Charley Walker, and others of his friends, with Mr. C. D. Mackellar's notes on the Gordon country in South Australia, and those reminiscences of various persons who knew Gordon to close the volume.

It is not perhaps an ideal arrangement, this giving some seventy odd pages at the outset to an outline of biography, and then amplifying and adding to it through nearly four hundred pages of appendices—for that is what the succeeding chapters actually are. But apart from its scheme the book fulfils its purpose very thoroughly. Its final merit is that it does leave you with a definite, vividly intimate picture of Gordon as he was known to men and women who were his contemporaries. You see him a mischievous schoolboy; as the most fearless of horsemen; as a member of Parliament, who "instead of thinking seriously of public affairs," was "as usual scribbling poetry most of the time. He used to throw one leg over the saddle while he was riding, in order to rest his paper upon it, and while he was engaged in composition it was no good speaking to him. He would give no reply. At the best of times he was uncommunicative, but under such circumstances he was deaf to outside affairs." His widow says also, "He was always too good to others, and he never thought enough of himself. Yes, if he had a fault, it was that he was too good, too open-handed, and too generous." Sir Frank Madden says he "rated horses above men," but Mr. George Riddoch says he "was not fond of talking horse; the only thing he cared to talk about much was poetry"; and so from one and another you get a composite portrait of a large-hearted, impulsive, recklessly courageous, curiously attractive and essentially masculine personality, and it is this same personality that you find living and moving through all his poetry.

"Beyond dispute," writes Mr. Sladen, "Gordon is the national poet of Australia. In Victoria and South Australia nearly every family owns Gordon's poems, and they are better known than any English poet's are known in England. And rightly, because Gordon is the voice of Australia. But for him Australian literature would be less loyal than it is to the Old Country. For all Australians respect a man who was so much after their own heart, who would stand up to anybody with his fists, or put a horse at anything; who loved the bush like a home and extorted the admiration of all bushmen; who founded Australia's school of grim fatalism; who voiced Australia's code of honour."

Whether we share Mr. Sladen's high opinion of his poems or not, there can be no question that Gordon was the authentic voice of the Australia of his generation, and that his influence on Australian life and thought has been and still is considerable. His wayward, fascinating character and romantic career make him a far more attractive, picturesque subject for biography than poets usually are, and it is not too much to say that in this handsomely produced, and well-illustrated volume, Mr. Sladen and Miss Humphris have profited by their opportunity and written one of the best and most interesting of recent literary biographies.

ASPECTS OF EXISTENCE.*

With the drama in the doldrums, thanks to the public preference for music-halls and picture-palaces, the Novel has become the prime means of expression of the national sense of art; and it is somewhat discouraging to realize how far from truly-excellent its average is. But we need not despair! The output of the novelists is enormous, portentous, even preposterous. The world groans under the weight of printed fiction, but the quality is not so bad as it might be. Here and there, popular favourites achieve successes which their works do not justify, for evidently that jade, Fortune, pours out royalties, as she does kisses, more according to favour than to desert; but we are not down-hearted. The earnest endeavour shown in the large majority of the novels published gives continuous cause for hope. They may be inadequate, but are generally wrought with conscience, and although there is no promise of genius that way, there is still good scope for entertainment. Every one of the books mentioned below is carefully written; indeed, one or two would have been better for a little, let us say, semi-divine carelessness. But we may as well be appreciative of their honesty of intention, and "to their faults a little blind."

It is a sordid world to which Mr. Grant Richards introduces us. Good food, rich wines, well-dressed women,

* "Caviare." By Grant Richards. 6s. (Richards.)—"Molyneux of Mayfair." By Duncan Schwann. 6s. (Heinemann.)—"The Illusions of Mr. and Mrs. Bressingham." By Gerard Bendall. 6s. (Lane.)—"The Wind Among the Barley." By M. P. Willcocks. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)—"Larkmeadow: A Novel of the Country Districts." By Marmaduke Pickthall. 6s. (Chatto & Windus.)—"The Five of Spades." By Mrs. Philip Champion de Crespigny. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)—"Iamorna." By Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick. 6s. (Methuen.)—"A Bottle in the Smoke: A Tale of Anglo-Indian Life." By Mrs. Milne Rae. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)—"General Mallock's Shadow." By W. B. Maxwell. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

The Mecca of Australian Literature.
Gordon's Monument in the Brighton Cemetery, near Melbourne.

From a photo given by the late S. Milbourn, jun., to Mr. Sladen for reproduction.
From "Adam Lindsay Gordon and his Friends in England and Australia," by Douglas Sladen and E. Humphris. (Constable.)

waltz-music, glitter, rush, and gambling: a common enough experience, doubtless, to not a few; but still a strange world, the demi-monde, just heartless, selfish, and insincere. The Amiable Charles, is a younger son, troubled with enough means to be idle. He knows European restaurants too well: head-waiters beam on him everywhere, and enough dishes are referred to—how Mr. Richards loves talking menu!—to give an ordinary gourmet indigestion. Then he meets Alison, the daughter of an American financier who is sowing elderly wild-oats in Paris; and loves, loves so decidedly that he induces Poppa to let him be her suitor, provided that within a year he "makes good,"—we cannot help using Mr. Richards' Americanisms. How the Amiable Charles accomplishes this, and wins his wishes, is almost miraculous. He makes a million on the New York Stock Exchange within a couple of days; and, otherwise, proves able to do more than merely wear a monocle. "Caviare" is unusually interesting. There is no question of its cleverness; but it will, indeed, be Caviare to such of the general public as do not care particularly for the technicalities of the gaming tables or the false lights and glitter of the half-world.

Two other novels which, also, in different ways, treat of the half-world which the comfortably-off may indulge in, are Mr. Duncan Schwann's "Molyneux of Mayfair," and "The Illusions of Mr. and Mrs. Bressingham," which Mr. Gerard Bendall, with his effective and flippant pen, makes play with. Mr. Schwann's Molyneux is a complete bachelor of forty, possibly a distant cousin of the aforesaid Amiable Charles. He is cynical and selfish; his aspect of life is largely concerned with froth and with trills. His passages and experiences are amusing. It is so unflaggingly bright that at times its very brightness tends to cloy. Mr. Bendall gives us more of a "plotty" story. His dear friends, the Bressinghams, are well-off and attractive. She is lovely; he distinguished-looking; but, in their retirement, for they are wealthy and have passed the bridge of forty—forty is growing fashionable to the heroes of modern fiction—they find the world apt to stale. He, thereupon, spends a good deal of time with his niece, Stella Harrington, a light-comedy fluffy actress who loves Offenbach; while his wife admires the beaux yeux of a young artist, Orlando; but their philandering is all very harmless. Both are at loose ends when the Fate that looks after the wedded, carries them to Paris, and there, in rather a French manner—this book would go better in French—Bressingham sees his wife with new eyes, and falls in love again.

The next two books treat of life in English villages, Larkbeare and Larkmeadow, and, spite the similarity of names, there is great difference in the nature of their inhabitants. Miss Willcocks' folk are generally genial; and have retained some of the old-world illusions. She writes with insight, and sympathy; and thoroughly well entertains. The book suffers through its necessary disconnectedness; but there is full measure of entertainment to be won from "The Wind Among the Barley." Mr. Pickthall's novel is not so confident and happy. He has no illusions about village life, and presents us with rather an unpleasant series of people. The story has mainly to do with a retired solicitor who would be a landed gentleman, and brings himself into conflict with some detestable yokels over a question of common rights. The subject needs deft characterization; and that is what in this case it particularly lacks. Mr. Pickthall has done better work than "Larkmeadow."

Mrs. Philip de Crespigny is the only author in this group of nine who approaches the shocker. In the best part, the beginning, of "The Five of Spades" she promises us lurid excitements, better written than usual; but too soon—at the tossing of a coin—we guess who is the hidden culprit; and thenceforward the interest lapses and the style becomes looser, until we cease to care anything about hero, heroine—another Alison—or anyone else. Simon Armytage had been accused of cheating at cards. He had brought an action for defamation of character, obtained a farthing damages; and that had damned him. Much more might have been made of the tale; and, truly, we are surprised that such a nice couple, as Simon and Alison are meant to be, should have cared even twopence for the sort of society they seemed eager not to lose, and whose rudenesses they suffered from. A colony of empty brainpans!

Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick's "Lamorna" is a capable and clever work; but she has over-drawn her characters, making Lamorna too good and quite unnecessarily clever, for a heroine, and Wigan the villain, villainous indeed. He wants to marry her: she loves another—an artistic person; and she is artistic too. Wigan, therefore, says, "Very well, I shall expose Pansy"; and Pansy, Lamorna's flighty cousin, could not afford to be so exposed, because she had behaved very indiscreetly with Colonel Auray, and was herself engaged to be married. So, you see, there was a pretty kettle of fish for somebody's frying! Fortunately Lamorna would not budge; and we have happy endings. Quite a good story of the sentimental sort; and one that is worth reading.

Of the earnestness of Mrs. Milne Rae there can be no question. "A Bottle in the Smoke" is one more attempt to deal with that more-than-difficult question of the relations of the whites with the half-caste or coloured folk. Doubtless, this is a question of complexity, and Mrs. Milne Rae deserves great credit for her courage in tackling a not over-worked subject and for the conscientious earnestness of her endeavour. The dialogue is a little too copperplate; but that is a fault on the right side. It means over-care, which is better than under-care. The many who appreciate serious fiction will be interested in this novel, and will, probably, amply approve the humane endeavours of Mark Cheveril and pretty Hester.

Last comes Mr. W. B. Maxwell, with "General Mallock's Shadow"—a fine and moving story, written with sincerity, force and success. It is a sad telling, no doubt, but the ending is happy and completely redeeming. Once on a time General Maxwell had surrendered Andalkund. He had maintained the defence under great odds, and had then only given up on the specific condition that the women and children in his charge should be spared. The pledge was given; and then was broken. The women and children were slaughtered; and General Mallock had to bear a heavy burden of responsibilities for the lapse. The Shadow gathered about him. He was asked by the War Office to resign. His friends gradually dropped him. People kind to his children would not be kind to him; he was slighted, injured, wronged. Death would have been a happier fate; but, true man, he held by his ideals, though isolation soon seared him with some of its effects; until, fifteen years afterwards, the opportunity came, and he recovered honour and standing. There was a strike. The miners had the idea that Gilchrist, a tyrannous superintendent, was hiding in the General's house. They tried to secure him by violence. General Maxwell resisted, stood the siege, organised his men-servants; and so not only won back his reputation, but recovered himself. The hour of crisis had brought out the man; even the War Office for once redeemed itself. This is a stirring, admirable book. Its every character lives and is real.

B.B.B.

Novel Notes.

THE HAPPY FAMILY. By Frank Swinnerton. 6s. (Methuen.)

Mr. Swinnerton has placed the scenes of his new novel for the most part in the drab, shabby-genteel neighbourhood of Kentish Town, and he tells a very natural, very human story of everyday people with a sympathetic understanding of them, and with real power. In the Amerson family he has drawn a group of characters, such as may be found in many a lower middle class London street, and has drawn them so minutely, with such subtle analytical touches that long before the book ends one knows them as intimately as if one had lived under the same roof with them. Their story, with all its little ambitions, hopes, loves and weaknesses, is just the natural, unsensational sort of story that makes up the lives of average humanity, but it holds our interest unerringly because of the interest we grow to feel in each one of the Amersons, especially in Mary and her love for Roger Bennett. A more original character, and perhaps even more interesting, is the brighter, more perverse, less staid and gentle Viola Bright—she is a veritable creation, and Mr. Swinnerton not only describes her charm, he makes us susceptible to it. The story has humour; it moves in its somewhat grey atmosphere with a lightness and buoyancy that make very attractive reading, and it is written with a deftness and ripe ability that give Mr. Swinnerton's work claims to be considered as literature. In a word, this is a novel of much more than ordinary interest and capacity, and will add appreciably to its author's steadily growing reputation.

TAMSIÉ. By Rosamond Napier 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"Tamsie" is a powerful novel, written in a strong vivacious style and exhibiting a keen insight into human nature and an abundant acquaintance with the wild, gypsy life of the last century. Tamsie is the ward of a clever Egyptologist, who is astonished at finding himself suddenly in love with her. Because of his age and poverty he decides he cannot marry her, and returns to Egypt alone. David Guest has known Tamsie's guardian in Egypt, and has adequate reasons for disliking him, and for wishing to cut himself off from his own people. Therefore he joins a band of Romanes and wanders with them from place to place. By a strange chance he and Tamsie come together and their mutual unhappiness forms a bond between them which gradually ripens into a deeper feeling. The lives of the gypsies and the "Gorgios," or gentiles, mingle together delightfully, though it is from the gypsy portion that the book derives its glorious atmosphere of freedom—an atmosphere that is sufficiently tinged with sordidness, to convey a sharp impression of reality. The character studies are admirable. Miss Napier has a vivid, virile, picturesque English, which can scarcely be too highly praised.

ELIZABETH, BETSY AND BESS. By Lily Schofield 6s. (Duckworth.)

"I considered Elizabeth to be very good, Betsy middling and stupid, and Bess very naughty and exciting; yet they were the same person, and that person was myself." So says the heroine of Mrs. Lily Schofield's new book, a heroine rather difficult to understand and sympathise with, but, nevertheless, an interesting character study. The story is appropriately divided into four parts. "Betsy," "Bess," "Elizabeth," and "Which?" From these divisions one can gather the lines on which it runs. Betsy is introduced to us first: a little wild Irish girl, living in a big house on the borders of a bogland; her mother is dead and her father hardly ever notices her, until one day he sees how tall she is growing and decides to send her off to a boarding school in England. She hates the idea of boarding school and prefers her free, lonely life; so she goes to the school rebelliously and turns into Bess. Her many adventures, her weird visit to a convent, her friendship with Aveline Urquhart (a fine character), and the love story of Drake Marsden, are told in an easy, light style that makes the book very entertaining reading.

THE DEBT. By William Westrup. 6s. (Alston Rivers.)

Mr. Westrup's new book is in our opinion one of the most remarkable, and certainly one of the most readable, South African novels we have ever come across. The story is concerned with the development of the character of Harry Ryan, who saves the life of a young "city man" in the person of Frank Lensford. In return the latter—a sympathetic and exceedingly well-drawn character—introduces young Ryan to life in Johannesburg, where the latter eventually gets into bad company, arouses the jealousy of Feinbaum, the villain of the story, and by him is involved in a very serious difficulty. It is hardly fair to give away the manner in which Lensford repays the debt he owes to Ryan; it must suffice to say that the scheme of the book is ingeniously worked out to its inevitable conclusion. Mr. Westrup's writing is full of picturesque vigour, and his sincerity is obvious. "The Debt" is really a fine novel, and a close and accurate study of character.

MRS. LANCELOT. By Maurice Hewlett 6s. (Macmillan.)

The Meredithian manner weats off as this novel proceeds; or rather it remains a manner, and never develops into the genuinely Meredithian spirit, even when the author is handling a situation in which Georgiana stands not far off Diana or Aminta. "A comedy of assumptions," he calls it. That is, the girl, a grey, shy, slim creature, is married to an ambitious young politician, without either being stirred to the realities of love and passion. Charles Lancelot assumed he was desirable, Georgiana assumed she was desired. Then came her friendship with the Duke, whom it is not difficult to identify. It was not his doing that their friendship was only platonic, and the strongest scene in the whole novel, apart from the last, is Georgiana's refusal to be his mistress. In these scenes, and especially in the description of the young poet's rapturous pursuit of the woman, Mr. Hewlett allows the reader to feel that there is red blood in the veins of his characters. "Two men love you," says this bold lover, "but you love neither. How can a woman avail unless she love?" It is her whole nature. It is her function. Without it she is a phantom, an empty vase. Lovely you are, but you are empty. Love." So Georgiana loves, and the two men who love her, her husband and the Duke, magnanimously let the poet have her. Why he fascinates her is not obvious. Why she fascinates the Duke is still less clear. It is not intellectually, for Georgiana was neither an Aspasia nor an Egeria, and at first at any rate it was not sentimentally. Neither does the figure of the Duke become real against the background of the opposition to the Reform Bill. These are points where Mr. Hewlett's exceeding cleverness has made him so pre-occupied with his puppets and their wires that he has forgotten to mix reality with their ingenious comedy, forgotten to realize that such assumptions as he sets in motion create a situation in which people must be hot and direct sometimes. But it is a subtle novel, when all is said and done, subtly conceived and subtly—too subtly—written.

THE LOVERS. By Eden Phillpotts 6s. (Ward, Lock.)

Mr. Phillpotts has cast back to the period and scene of the "American Prisoner," and written another romance of love and adventure in his best style. The tors are here, but they are not too much in evidence. Now and then the reader is reminded of them in the background, but it is mainly in descriptive passages. "Little larks rose and fluttered before the pedestrians, sometimes a lizard scrambled off a mossy stone, sometimes a grass snake uncurled and streamed away at their approach. The rolling hills spread and faded into the mist of the horizon. Sheep and cattle clothed the undulations, and other signs of life there were none save where, still far away upon the immense bosom of the Moor, there spread a grey circle of granite, dwarfed by distance to a mere fairy-ring cast here in midmost desolation of the tors." Once the tors are at this distance, Mr. Phillpotts is free to look at life rather more generally than usual on Dartmoor, and though this book has its own touch of tragedy, there is no lowering cloud of destiny over the characters. A book with such a title could hardly be anything else than a "romance," and escapes of prisoners from the Dartmoor prison naturally form the staple of the plot. But the girls outside, aristocratic and rustic, and their Tory fathers, are drawn with the author's skill in portraiture, and he has thrown in some gay highwaymen. The contrivance by which Felix escapes the gallows is not quite new. Still, it is worked out with every detail of ghastly excitement. Probabilities had to be strained a little to round off the book with four happy lovers, and we had much rather Mr. Phillpotts took some liberties in this direction than in the service of a fatalistic theory which reduces men and women to the level of lizards and cattle. He has forgotten to be philosophic. But, even in describing adventures, he has not forgotten that style and characterization are essential to a fine romance—and "The Lovers" is a fine romance from start to finish.

DR. TUPPY. By Stephen Townesend. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The very name of the hero suggests something unheroic and even disrespectful. It was when Mr. Jingle called Mr. Tupman "Tuppy," that the mild Mr. Pickwick was moved to fling an inkstand at the audacious creature who ventured to insult his friend by abbreviating his name. But Dr. Tuppy was not originally Dr. Tupman. He was a medical student of that name in London, a foolish-looking, short-sighted, shy, little man, the butt of his colleagues and the byword of the wards for clumsiness. Humorous books of a medical cast are apt to be full of horseplay or of technical phrasology, which makes them unattractive to the outside public. Mr. Townesend has avoided these errors, and put some clever characterization into his story. It is a whimsical piece of work, which traces the adventures of the hero in love and medicine, till the "fool" comes out with all the honours. There are some delightful scenes of social comedy, not only in the hospital but in the house of the eccentric Canon, who is Tuppy's father, and the novel is a decided success in its own rather fresh and difficult line. The love-affair of Nurse Jessop and the anti-vivisectionist enterprise of Lady Milner make delightful reading. Dr. Tuppy was closely bound up with both, and he proves himself a chivalrous little lover and a loyal nephew, who is rewarded richly at the end. There is a vein of good fun in the book, which deserves to win a circle of grateful readers, they will be relieved perhaps, as the present reviewer was, to find that an up-to-date medical novel has escaped any reference to the Insurance Act.

THE VIRGIN FORTRESS. By Max Pemberton 6s (Cassell)

The stories of Mr. Max Pemberton never lack colour, and it is generally the glowing colour of romance and high adventure. With the impregnable city of Metz, the Virgin Fortress, for the setting, and the time of the Franco-Prussian war for the period of his new novel, Mr. Pemberton has a splendid opportunity for a series of breathless doings, and he makes excellent use of it. The story is mainly concerned with the daring escapades of a small band of German spies who pass in and out of Metz during the siege. Attached to this band is an Englishman, a Captain Gerald, who has entered the German army because he believes it to be the finest in the world. "He had been born a soldier, with a soldier's brains. Life stood to him for an adventure, with one woman (or more) at the back of it." The reader will find that one woman, and more indeed, connected with the gallant captain's feats of espionage in the Virgin Fortress, and that Mr. Pemberton has contrived a number of thrilling incidents, which by reason of their sheer effrontery capture and hold in thrall the imagination.

LETTERS TO A PRISON. By Mrs. Fred Reynolds. 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)

These letters, written by a young wife to her husband in prison, are full of tenderness and poetic fancy. Innocent, though silent in his innocence for the sake of another, the man is sentenced to a year's imprisonment, and his wife goes alone to the little Welsh village where they met twelve months before, to write to him the sympathetic, interesting letters gathered into this book. She tries to give him as much of the outside world as pen and paper can convey; paints him word pictures of the things and people around her; there is a pretty romance of the Welsh girl, Nesta and blind David, her lover, which threads its way through the letters, but the chief charm of the book lies in its fresh, bracing, open-air atmosphere, the fulness of life and colour introduced into its pages, its impressionistic word pictures, its kindly philosophy; there is a gentle background of pathos which gives a pensive tone to its thoughts without making them altogether sad.

Photo by Searle Bros.

Mr. St. Clair Harnett.

Author of "Rusted Hinges." (Andrew Melrose.)

RUSTED HINGES. By St. Clair Harnett 6s (Andrew Melrose)

Mr. St. Clair Harnett is a bold man. It is not every newcomer into literary life that would dare to signalize his arrival by a prompt acceptance of the challenge of any well-known literary weekly to produce "a novel on a new plan." We can add without any mental reservation, however, that we admire Mr. Harnett's new form of novel equally with his courage. He has not, it seemed, troubled to invent a heroine of surpassing loveliness or a hero of uncommon dexterity and bravery, but he has essayed to make the actual reader of "Rusted Hinges" in turn his hero and heroine, and has conducted them through a series of adventures from Malplaquet to an isle near Crete, from Fontainebleau to a romance laid in Tintagel, and has moved at ease from the spacious days of Henry IV. of France to the bitter faction fights in the old Italian town of Lucca. In all these varied and widely separated scenes he has found love, laughter, material for thought, and oftentimes deeds that provoke tears. Some of the events are woven wholly of "the stuff that dreams are made of"; other characters come stalking down to us from the great legends of chivalry or those blood-stained records of bygone times when brave men died, and died for love. Mr. Harnett calls himself "the old dream merchant," and this series of dissolving pictures that he has invented has many of the haunting and elusive qualities of the visions that deck our lives in the still hours of the night. In fact, he contends that each of us is naturally born into this dream world "a king or queen, the lord of a boundless territory, a golden land where always summer reigns, a refuge in which boredom cannot enter, nor sameness pall." True, we throw it away with ease, but he contends that we so abandon unwittingly the means of "letting-in upon our drab prosaic lives a flood of beauty and romance"; hence the "Rusted Hinges" of the title.

LONDON LAVENDER. By E. V. Lucas. 6s. (Methuen.)

It is said that Mr. E. V. Lucas prefers to call his stories "Entertainments" rather than novels; it is a wise preference—for the word novel may denote anything from, say, "Richard Feverel" to "Dr. Nikola," whereas an entertainment honestly named must be entertaining. That "London Lavender" may be thus honestly described will

CONSTABLE'S NEW BOOKS

WHEN I WAS A CHILD

Written and Illustrated by YOSHIO MARKINO

Author of "My Idealized John Bullesses," &c. 6/- net

"The charm of this book—a charm that brings its earliest chapters especially into the small category of books that are lovable—is not due only to the little tricks and oddities of a foreigner's English. In certain chapters he explains at the same time much of the Japanese mind and the Japanese education which may yet be dark even to students of Japanese life. These like the chapters on Japanese and Europe in art are well worth reading for their matter, though they have not the alluring charm of the chapters on childhood. It is almost needless to say that the charm of this peculiarly appealing book is enhanced by a number of drawings."—The Times

ADAM LINDSAY GORDON

and His Friends in England and Australia

Illustrated 12/6 net

By DOUGLAS SLADEN & EDITH HUMPHRIS

"The authors are to be congratulated on having compiled such a sumptuous volume on one of the most interesting figures in modern English poetry."—Dundee Advertiser

"It is to be hoped that Mr. Sladen's edition of Lindsay Gordon's poems which we reviewed in our last issue will have brought public interest in this strange and lovable Australian poet to a pitch sufficient to assure the success of this excellent book. The authors are to be congratulated on this book."—South African

A MODERN PILGRIM IN MECCA

With a Map, Portrait, and other Illustrations 10/6 net

A. J. B. WAVELL, F.R.G.S.

"Mr. Wavell's story of his pilgrimage to Mecca and his siege in Sanaa belong without doubt to the class of authentic books of travel. Mr. Wavell's description of his experiences in Mecca are admirably told. He possesses a genuine sense of humour and power of observation combined with a rare in-depth all makes excellent reading. We have nothing but praise for his account of his adventures at Sanaa which is in its way as excellent as that of Mecca. He has the happy gift of painting the various officers with whom he meets as individual personalities. Mr. Wavell's book is a genuine book of adventure."—Manchester Gazette

The Task of Social Hygiene

Large crown 8vo. 8/6 net

Havelock Ellis

This timely and important book deals in most instructive and authoritative fashion with some of the most pressing and momentous questions of the day. Mr. Ellis considers the changing status of woman, the new aspect of the woman movement, the emancipation of woman in relation to romantic love, the significance of the falling birth rate, the theory of eugenics, religion and the child, and other aspects of the great world-wide movement for a wholesomer and happier humanity fit in full knowledge and with convincing acumen. Among the numerous books in this field now being produced Mr. Ellis's work should stand out as the one indispensable one for both the scientific specialist and for the general reader.

Outlines of Evolutionary Biology

Arthur Dendy, D.Sc., F.R.S.

Professor of Zoology in the University of London. Medium 8vo. Fully Illustrated 12/6 net

It may be doubted whether in the present state of our knowledge a much better book for its purpose could be written to cover the same field. No volume can tell everything, in a large subject, and Professor Dendy writes with a good grasp of his subject and excellent sense of proportion. He is more over lucid and easy to follow, while the illustrations are well chosen to help the reader over difficult places without being so numerous as to obstruct his path."—The Times

The Letters of George Meredith

21 - net

Collected and Edited by His Son

(Second Edition now in the Press)

The Poems of George Meredith

7/6 net

Complete in One Volume

Selected Passages from the Works of Bernard Shaw

5 - net

Mrs. George Bernard Shaw

The Fourth Generation

12/6 net Illustrated (3rd Impression)

Janet Ross

The Romance of a Favourite

10/6 net Illustrated

Frédéric Loliée

The Gateway of Scotland

10/6 net Illustrated

A. G. Bradley

Through the Heart of Africa

12/6 net Illustrated

Frank H. Melland, F.R.G.S., F.Z.S., and Edward H. Cholmeley, F.R.I.A.

In South Central Africa

10/6 net Illustrated

J. M. Moubray, F.R.G.S.

Italian Travel Sketches

7/6 net Illustrated

Prof. James Sully, LL.D.

Belgium, The Land of Art

5/- net Illustrated

W. B. Griffiths

The Guadalquivir

7/6 net Illustrated

Paul Gwynne

The Spell of the Rockies

6/- net Illustrated

E. A. Mills

CONSTABLE'S FICTION

HERO OF HERAT

MAUD DIVER

Author of "Captain Desmond, V.C."

A SLICE OF LIFE

ROBERT HALIFAX

"A fine story."—Punch

"A book of singular power and insight."—British Weekly

"Vigorous, well-balanced, certainly a book one must not forget."—Daily News

BROAD WALK

BARONESS LEONIE AMINOFF

"This is a real artistic achievement."—Manchester Guardian

"It will make the oldest reader feel young again."—London Times

"One of the novels of the season; extraordinary clever."—Dundee Advertiser

MY LOVE AND I

A WELL-KNOWN WRITER

"A work of distinction and value."—Westminster Gazette

"Vivid and vital, magnificently written."—Daily Mail

"Wholly delightful."—Athenaeum

THE BLUE WALL

R. W. CHILD

ROSE OF THE GARDEN

(2nd Impression)

KATHERINE TYNAN

EVE

(4th Impression)

MAARTEN MAARTENS

PRISCILLA

MRS. GEORGE WEMYSS

TO-DAY

PERCY WHITE

be obvious to the reader of the first chapter, and will become only more patently so as he passes on from episode to episode until he reaches—all too soon—the brevity of the last one, and closes the book reluctantly, and lingeringly recalls the pleasant company of people to whom the author has introduced or re-introduced him. Re-introduced, because Mr. Lucas allows characters from the trio of earlier entertainments—"Over Bemerton's," "Listener's Lure," and "Mr. Ingleside"—to "break in" to the new story. What is that story? It were as helpful to describe the sight and scent of a plump well-established floriferous lavender bush in August as to summarise this book in a paragraph that should attempt to indicate the story. And after all, it is not the story, in the conventional sense, it is the naturalness, the varied but never unpleasant humanity, the lightness of humour, the urbane satire, the "atmosphere" by which Mr. Lucas first charms us and then holds us spell bound. There is something of delicate comedy—the comedy which is more antipodal to fate than is tragedy itself—in this delicate presentation of, and comment on modern London life which the supposititious Mr. Falconer gives in the story of his life in rooms in the Regent's Park district. Mr. Lucas has most happily utilised the gifts of an essayist in the field of fiction, and has given us as it were something of a new genre, in which clever characterisation of people, descriptions, incidents, and musings are blent into a most engaging whole.

The Bookman's Table.

JOHN JONATHAN AND COMPANY. By James Milne. 5s. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

The title page goes on: "Being a full, true and particular record with observations, reflections and confessions of a bachelor honeymoon over the Atlantic, through America and Canada, and home again to England, all duly set down in a proper manner, with a frontispiece by Charles Pears." Which very concisely and intelligibly describes the scope and nature of Mr. James Milne's delightfully gossipy chronicle. He, or the imaginary writer, is engaged and near marriage, and the lady of his heart gets fearful that there may be "the possibility of a doubt in my man's heart about you," so she sends him away on a holiday tour that he may, in absence, make quite sure she is the woman of his life, "the undoubted one," and also that she may, in the same interval, test herself. This book is the outcome of that experiment, and in it the traveller not only keeps a pleasant shrewdly observant record of his journey, places he visits and people he meets, but he sows it thickly with his reflections on life and the great problems of existence, as what he sees and hears by the way give rise to them. It is all done in the form of letters to the girl who has been left behind, and some of the musings and bits of philosophy are suggested by his recollections of their past talks together, as "You were right; the small talk of the heart is more in marriage than worldly prosperity, although that smooths the path greatly, and is not to be sneered at." On the voyage he describes and discusses his fellow passengers. There is a finely realised picture of New York and some suggestive probing after the soul of that sleepless city; clever studies of American women, and comparisons of them with the women of the old country. One of the best chapters deals with the American maid and man, and concludes that the system of making the girl a sort of comrade and general sister, though it has advantages, has even more disadvantages. "The perfume of mystery which fills the air between the sexes in the Old World carries with it a want of comradeship, the easy, delightful American communion between the sexes which is platonic and beautiful, But does it not breathe romance, sentiment, that something spiritual, that poetry of the soul which you miss in America?" America is sentimental, says Mr. Milne, but lacks sentiment, and he illustrates his meaning with some admirable instances. From America the traveller proceeds to Canada, and every Canadian ought to read the good and the true things Mr. Milne has to say of the great Dominion. Incidentally he relates some excellent anecdotes about the present Governor-General, the Duke of Connaught, and pays a warm tribute to him as "the Prince of Democrats." "He has many graces," a well-known Canadian said to me, "but no airs." This is a charmingly written and altogether interesting book. Whether you are married, or going to be married, or resolved never to marry at all, you will read it with profit and with keen enjoyment.

THE CUMBERLAND LETTERS: Being the Correspondence of Richard Denison Cumberland and George Cumberland between the Years 1771 and 1784. Edited by Clementina Black and now printed for the first time 16s net (Martin Secker.)

All readers with a liking for good familiar gossipy letters will feel warmly grateful to Miss Clementina Black for having rescued these documents from the limbo of the Manuscript Department of the British Museum, and as they reach the close of the volume will gladly recall that line in the preface which announces a further selection from the Cumberland Letters as now in preparation. The brothers whose correspondence is now put before us were second cousins of the dramatist, men who made no stir in the world but who now enjoy a literary resurrection which should give them a comfortable niche among the delightful company of familiar letter-writers. The elder brother went to Cambridge and became a country clergyman, the younger early entered an insurance office—soon to be irked by the "desk's dead wood" as was Charles Lamb a little later at the East India House—and they kept up

Richard Denison Cumberland, aged 21.

From "The Cumberland Letters." (Secker.)

from their different centres a pleasant correspondence, telling of their own doings, of family affairs, and occasionally of notable public events. On the day before the "Royal George" sank Richard Cumberland had been all over the vessel with a cousin, and wrote a description of the tragedy from Portsmouth, adding "Don't send any extracts from this to the Morning Post, as it is wrote in a hurry and I cannot be certain as to the numbers lost, etc." This indicates that, besides his many other activities, George contributed occasionally to the papers. He was a very busy person, with many interests of his own and ever depended upon to be doing services for others; yet he found time to write admirable letters, and stands out in this volume as a very engaging personality. The correspondence affords fresh light on the middle-class social life of the latter part of the eighteenth century, and is one of the most welcome works of the kind that we have had for some time.

ROUGH ROADS. By Dyke Wilkinson. 2s. 6d. net. (Sampson Low.)

"Rough Roads" is Mr. Wilkinson's second book. His first was "A Wasted Life," which he published ten years

Some advantages of the Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcases.

Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcases combine the useful with the beautiful. Being built of "Units" which are interlocked by a patent device, one can easily move them about from room to room or house to house, and re-arrange them in new and harmonious groupings—an advantage not possessed by the solid or fixed-style bookcases.

Another important advantage is that one can have an individual library. That is, one or more sections may be placed in different rooms so that favourite authors are within instant reach at any hour.

And a third advantage is this: There is no limit to the capacity of a Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase. As fast as your book possessions increase you can add more "Units" to accommodate them. You never have to sell a Globe-Wernicke "Elastic" Bookcase in order to obtain a larger one.

For other advantages, illustrations, and full particulars see Catalogue No. 18B which we will send to any address on application.

Packing Free. Orders for £2 Carriage Paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,

44, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

82, Victoria Street, S.W.

98, Bishopsgate, E.C.

Waterman's (Ideal) Fountain Pen

Read this interesting testimony from a Canadian Methodist Minister

"You will be interested to know that the Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen purchased from you in 1894 has been in constant, unimpaired service ever since. To-day it writes as well as on the first day of use, 18 years ago. It does not leak, scratch or fail to mark on the first contact with paper, as is often the case with other makes.

"I could write an interesting story of how I lost it, once in the busy streets of London, twice in Quebec snow storms, once again in a huge wood-pile of a saw mill, always to find it again; but I must desist. I am happy to give you this unsolicited testimonial to the continued value of your fountain pen. It may become an heirloom.

"Yours sincerely,

"JOHN H. WRIGHT, Methodist Minister."

The Gift for friends across the seas

Why not send a Waterman's Ideal? It will be appreciated perhaps more than anything else. Post now for abroad. Every Pen Guaranteed. Nib changed through any Stationer if unsatisfactory.

Made in four styles and in numerous chased patterns in Silver and Gold for Presentation. Prices of Regular and Self-filling Styles, 10/6, 15/- and upwards. of Safety and Pump-filling Styles, 12/6 and upwards, with Clip-cap 1/- extra. Of Stationers, Jewellers, etc. Booklet free from L. & C. HARDTMUTH LTD., Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway, London. (New York 173 Broadway. Paris 6 Rue de Hanovre. Brussels 14 Rue Pont Neuf. Vienna, Barcelona, Milan, Dresden, Zurich.)

ago, and of which he speaks in his preface in a manner that can only be described as blatant. This preface, in fact, is a mistake, and we very strongly recommend prospective readers not to look at it. It is utterly unlike the rest of the book and might easily give the reader an entirely wrong impression. Aside from the preface, the first thing that strikes you is the author's remarkable frankness. He assumes that everything he tells you is going to interest you, and—probably for this very reason—it does. As he is possessed of none of the literary graces, this is exactly the right attitude to adopt. Mr. Wilkinson is resolved to tell the exact truth about himself, and his sincerity—sometimes almost shameless—makes his book absolutely enthralling. His experiences have been varied. He started as an apprentice to a rule-maker in Birmingham, disliked his job, ran away, and eventually got two months in gaol for breaking his articles. He was then an inventor and had thoughts of becoming a parson. However, he fell in love, wrote poetry, ran away, and became an actor for a few months. Later he was a manufacturing jeweller, journalist, newspaper proprietor and editor. He took up an "infallible" betting system and lost all his money at it, and this experience really determined the greater part of his life. "I would not admit defeat, that which had broken me should mend me again." And so eventually he became a bookmaker. We should never have suspected that members of "old firms" could be so interesting, and indeed there is little room for doubt that Mr. Wilkinson is an exceptional case. However, the point is that he has written a book which must appeal to everybody, not only the betting man. It is a truly extraordinary autobiography.

THE SHADOW SHOW. By J. H. Curle ss. (Methuen.)

In place of the stanza from Omar, which gives the book its name, Mr. Curle, who has a taste for familiar quotation, might have set on his title page the well-known lines from Tennyson's "Ulysses." For he has certainly seen "cities and men." Few can have travelled more widely. His profession of mining engineer would of itself take him about the world, but Mr. Curle has the wander-thirst highly developed. He was in South Africa when Jameson made his raid, and was one of the chosen "revolutionaries." He knows China and Persia and India, South America and all Europe. He has not only seen but reflected and compared. His reflections are often to the point. When he writes of the abstract, he is not amazingly original. On politics, however, he has some words of wisdom. Typically British, compact of common sense and sentiment, he believes in sound finance as the chief essential of sound government, and can write of Ireland and South Africa with sympathy and imagination. It is not for his ideas, however, but for his power of description that he should be read. The first (and best) part of "The Shadow Show" might be the work of an exceptionally good special correspondent, vividly retelling things seen. His chapters on South Africa and the East are worthy to rank with the work of G. W. Steevens, and may be compared with "From Sea to Sea" without too great disparagement. If Mr. Curle had been a journalist, he would probably have made a big name. He has a really remarkable power of catching and conveying an impression. What he describes, he makes one see. He has had many unusual experiences: as, on a small scale, when he conducted an operation to the tune of the "Mikado's Song," or, on a larger scale, when he shared in the excitement of the Raid. He is one of the people to whom things are always happening. Even when he visited Stevenson's grave in Samoa, he was struck by the sun and lay on that famous tomb in a most entertaining delirium. There seems no reason why Mr. Curle should not write another such book. We hope he will. But if he do so, we would humbly advise him to reflect that there are dozens of writers who can opine much better than he, but very few who can describe nearly so well or have a tithe of the experiences worth describing.

JAPAN AS I SAW IT. By A. H. Exner. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net. (Jarrold & Sons.)

Without any useless prefatory apology or any of the claims which so monotonously appear as forewords to the literary efforts of tourists, the author of "Japan as I Saw It" proceeds straightway to tell the reader what he has learned of the history of Nippon from standard books, and what impressions he has gathered of the Mikado's subjects during his sojourn in the Sunrise Empire; and to such good purpose has he studied existing literature and used his eyes and ears, that when allowance has been made for the fact that he has nothing new to tell, and that his investigations were necessarily perfunctory, the volume is eminently readable and useful, and those who wish to gain luminous impressions of the land and people of Nippon without going there cannot do better than obtain it. The résumé of Japanese history with which Mr. Exner begins, while omitting nothing of great importance, has the merit of being short, plainly written, and accurate. His running comments are unprejudiced. Here and there, however, he loses the thread of historical sequence. To mention a single instance, he first describes (on p. 78) the participation of the Japanese troops in the suppression of the Boxer troubles of 1900-1, and then (on p. 79) retraces his steps and mentions the China-Japan war of 1894-5, in doing so using the phrase "a couple of years before" to denote the interim between 1894-5 and 1900-1. He does not attempt much word-painting, but he is observant and his descriptions of scenery, temples, and bazaars, though they make no pretence to literary brilliance, do quite vividly reveal real Japan to the reader. He escapes many errors into which the tourist is usually betrayed. The value of the volume is greatly enhanced by numerous collotype illustrations and half-tone reproductions of artistic prints and drawings.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. MILLS & BOON.

The latest addition to Messrs. Mills & Boon's series of travel impressions is something more than a readable volume. It is possessed of real importance. Miss E. S. Stevens has already made a reputation as a writer upon Oriental subjects, and she is quite at her best in My Sudan Year (10s. 6d. net), a clever study of the peoples of the Sudan and their rulers. The book affords a critical but sympathetic study of the English Government and officials, who have done much during the last ten years to advance the progress of one of the most backward of countries. The volume contains forty very effective illustrations.

MR. W. J. HAM-SMITH

In Written in the Sand (6s.) Mr. G. R. Duval tells the story of a man's love for a woman who realized his worth too late. The main incidents are enacted on the yellow sands of Sahara, where Eric Lagarde, a young French officer, is stationed at the Arab village of Douz. Lagarde had overcome the monotony of the desert, he enjoyed to the full its wonderful beauty, and revelled in the freedom of the life. Then came to him one day Lady Rosalind Karth, with a letter from his General requesting that every attention should be offered to her on her travels. Rosalind, who was tired of "Society," and was attempting to throw convention to the winds and lead a more or less Bohemian existence, came upon Lagarde as a beautiful vision. She sets out with him on an expedition which was not without danger, but the prospect of being with her and seeing her all day long decided him. And this was the first act in a tragedy which is told with considerable power and with sustained interest.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL & CO.

Her Majesty the Flapper, by A. E. James (6s.), is a light series of episodes in the life of a school-girl. The Flapper and her cousin Bobbie take turn about in writing the stories. We are told, amongst other things, how the—we were going to say "young lady," but that appellation hardly fits her, so let it be "Flapper"—being desirous of joining her parents at Southampton en route for a sea trip, tries to induce Bobbie to aid her in running away from school; when he fails to do so an unknown gallant obligingly drives her in his car. And so the narratives pursue their way through the length of twelve chapters. At the age of seventeen the Flapper has to submit to the authority of a chaperone, and her comments on this functionary, though hardly edifying, are certainly amusing. We cannot but feel some sympathy with Bobbie in his attempts to help her in sundry difficult scrapes, but the inevitable ending compels us to leave them to aid each other.

THE BOOKMAN

Christmas Double Number

WITH WHICH IS PRESENTED

A PORTFOLIO OF DRAWINGS IN COLOUR

By EDMUND DULAC

Illustrating Scenes from Edgar Allan Poe's Poems.

Frontispiece Portrait of RUDYARD KIPLING from a Photograph specially taken for "The Bookman," and full-page Colour Plates by

FRANK BRANGWYN
HUGH THOMSON
E. J. DETMOLD
C. E. BROCK

ARTHUR RACKHAM
W. TYNDALE
E. H. WAITE
W. HATHERELL

and other well-known Artists

PRINCIPAL LITERARY CONTENTS :

Rudyard Kipling	By DIXON SCOTT.	The Universality of Art	By G. S. LAYARD.
The Revelation of George Meredith	By DR. WILLIAM BARRY	Three French Novels	By THOMAS SECCOMBE.
The Poetry of George Meredith	By MRS. ALICE MEYNELL.	The Real Gissing	By FRANK SWINNERTON.
Mrs. Gaskell's Birthplace	By MRS. ELLIS H. CHADWICK	A Step-Child of the Czar	By GEORGE SAMPSON.
The Loeb Library	By PROFESSOR J. P. POSTGATE, D.Lit	Thomas Hardy	By DARRELL FIGGIS.
Byron	By SIR GEORGE DOUGLAS, BART.	The Habit of Letters	By FRANCIS BICKLEY.
Frederic Harrison among his Books	By W. E. A. AXON.	France—Mediæval and Modern	By A. W. EVANS.
Life in the Desert	By RICHARD CURLE.	Learning in Little	By W. H. HUDSON.
A Letter Bag	By LEWIS MELVILLE.	Macready's Diaries	By F. G. BETLANY.
Rodin on Art	By HOLBROOK JACKSON.	The Mind of Mr. Balfour	By JAMES MOFFATT, D.D. ; D.Lit.
William Morris	By EDWARD THOMAS.	Girls and Fairies	By KATHARINE TYNAN.
An Inverted Idealist	By EDWIN FUGH.	The Christmas Bookshelf, etc., etc.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY : JOHN BUCHAN

ILLUSTRATED SUPPLEMENTS.

HODDER & STOUGHTON

ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

The Christmas Number of The Bookman.

"I AM A BOOKMAN."—JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

No. 255. VOL. XLIII.
Subscription rate 11s. per annum post free.

DECEMBER, 1912.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS.
Published Monthly.

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

News Notes.

We are still old-fashioned enough, in sentiment, to find a pleasure in beginning this Number by wishing a very Happy Christmas to all our readers, and to all who would have been our readers had it been possible. It will be sufficiently obvious at a glance that the production of this enormous Number has involved a great amount of heavy and continuous work for some weeks past, and we are glad to say the success of it has already been more than gratifying. We printed a considerably larger issue than of any previous Christmas Number; nevertheless, before going to press the whole of that edition was sold out, and we are left with orders for between five and six thousand more that, unfortunately, we are unable to fulfil. A larger sale was anticipated, but not such a much larger one as this; all arrangements for our many colour plates were concluded long since, and to print further supplies was impracticable.

We mention this as an explanation due to those who have failed to obtain copies of the Number, and beg they will accept this expression of our regret that we too modestly under-estimated our own popularity.

The January BOOKMAN will be a Lord Morley Number and will contain a special article on "Lord Morley as a Man of Letters" by A. Mackintosh.

We regret to find that there is a reference to Mr. Haldane Macfall in Mr. Joseph Pennell's article on Whistler, in our October Number, that is open to misconstruction. Mr. Pennell mentioned Mr. Macfall's "Whistler: Butterfly, Wit, Enigma," and said it had been suppressed. The facts appear to be that Whistler's executrix took legal proceedings to restrain the publication of the book solely because the butterflies used as decorations on the cover and in the margins were Whistler's copyright. The Court deciding that this was so, the book was published without the offending butterflies, and in this form the work has not and could not be suppressed—on the contrary, it has sold in thousands, and is still selling.

Messrs. Maunsell are issuing a pocket edition of the works of J. M. Synge. Four volumes, containing his plays, have already appeared, and four new volumes containing "Poems and Translations," "The Aran Islands," "In Wicklow" and "In West Kerry," are just ready. The books are well printed and tastefully bound in half-parchment; the set of eight volumes is to be issued in a box, when complete.

Two of the ablest of our younger novelists are away among the War Correspondents with the Balkan Allies—Mr. Perceval Gibbon representing the Daily News, and Mr. Alphonse Courlander the Express.

Mrs. Belloc-Lowndes has collected another volume of her short stories, and it will be published by Messrs. Methuen early next year.

Photo by Herman Lea.

Mr. Thomas Hardy. A new portrait.

Messrs. Macmillan are issuing a new edition (The Wessex Edition) of Mr. Thomas Hardy's works in prose and verse. Each volume has a frontispiece in photogravure and a Map of the Wessex of the Novels and Poems.

Margaret Westrup (Mrs. Margaret Stacey) has written a new novel, entitled "Tide Marks," which Messrs. Methuen are publishing immediately. Mrs. Stacey made her first success with her first book, "Elizabeth's Children." It was published by Mr. John Lane—anonymously, at her request, and she says nobody could have been more surprised than herself when it proceeded promptly to run through six editions in England, to say nothing of meeting with a remarkably favourable reception in America. Since then she has given us five other books: "Helen

Margaret Westrup
(Mrs. Margaret Stacey.)

From a portrait painted by her husband, Mr. W. Sydney Stacey, and photographed by Messrs Russell and Sons.

Alliston," "The Coming of Billy," "The Young O'Briens," "The Greater Mischief," and what is perhaps the most delightful of her novels "Elizabeth in Retreat," a sort of sequel to "Elizabeth's Children." The scenes of her new book, "Tide Marks," are laid largely in London, but part of the story takes place in Cornwall, near her own home. Mrs. Stacey has lived in Cornwall since her marriage two years ago. "I do a good deal of sailing in the summer," she says, "and am fond of riding and walking—with plenty of dogs. When the weather whose new volume of poems, "The Bird of Time," is reviewed on page 171.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu

lets me I like to write in the garden; at other times I write in my husband's studio whilst he paints."

The success of Mr. Charles Murray's "Hamewith" should go some way towards re-inspiring publishers

Photo by Hoppi.

Mrs. Alice Meynell

whose new book, "Mary, the Mother of Jesus" (Lee Wagner), is reviewed on page 176.

Photo by W. S. Stuart, Richmond.

Mr. Charles Murray

Author of "Hamewith" (Constable).

with a belief in poetry as a paying concern. The book was issued by Messrs. Constable in the Autumn of 1909, and has since sold 5,000 copies at five shillings, and a new edition is now almost ready for

Mr. W. L. George

*The book on the Feminist movement, "The Woman of To-Morrow," has been published by Mr. Herbert Jenkins.
Number and Morley as a N

publication. The fact that the poems are all in dialect has not prevented the book from achieving something of a record sale among recent poetry. Mr. Murray was born in the village of Alford in the wild romantic district "at the back of Bennochie," and not very far from the town of Huntly that gave us George MacDonald. He spent so many years of his life in South Africa that when "Hamewith" first appeared he was commonly spoken of as a South African poet, but if he wrote many of his poems in South Africa his heart was never there; it was the memory of "Scotland, oor Mither" that moved him to sing them:

'Scotland, oor mither,—we've bairnes ye've never seen—Wee things that turn them northward when they kneel doon at e'en;
They plead in childish whispers the Lord on high will be
A comfort to the auld wife—their granny owre the sea."

Many native Indians have written poetry in English, but very little of it has been very good.

The most notable exception is, perhaps, the Brahmin poetess, Sarojini Naidu, whose remarkable book of poems, "The Bird of Time," has just been published by Mr. Heinemann. Mrs. Sarojini

Mr. H. M. Tomlinson

whose new book, "The Sea and the Jungle," Messrs. Duckworth are publishing

Naidu came to England some eleven years ago for study and experience, and went to Cambridge. She showed an extraordinary gift for writing verse, and while in her teens published, with Mr. Heinemann, a volume called "The Golden Threshold," which won the admiration of Mr. Edmund Gosse, who has always shown great interest in her work, and has written a preface to her new book. She is now married and living in India, and this second volume represents a comparatively small selection of what she considers her best work.

Mrs. T. P. O'Connor has written a novel which Messrs. Putnam are publishing under the charming title of "Little I Thank You."

Mr. A. S. M. Hutchinson whose clever new novel, "The Happy Warrior" (Alston Rivers), is outvalving in popularity his successful first book, "Once Aboard the Lugger."

With "The Happy Warrior" (Alston Rivers) Mr. A. S. M. Hutchinson has scored his second big success as a novelist, and it is a success that he has worked hard for, though he ascribes it all to "luck." He began writing about eight years ago, when he was a medical student; but his ambitions lay in another direction and he did not drift into journalism—he deliberately walked into it. "I always intended to earn my living with my pen," he says, "and took the plunge when I had about one short story, two articles (for Punch) and some verses (for Scraps) accepted. I did not know a soul who had the remotest connection with literary work, but I was—and have been—frightfully lucky." He wrote all manner of things all day long for three months or so; some of them attracted the notice of Messrs. C. Arthur Pearson, and he presently obtained a place on their magazine staff. For a while he was assistant editor of the Royal Magazine, then co-editor of the Rapid Review. Then he "made another plunge;" he cut himself adrift from editing with a good practical knowledge of what the magazines require, "thanks to the pains that had been taken with me," he remarks, "by Mr. P. W. Everett, Pearson's magazine editor." He cut himself adrift simply because he wanted to make headway in other fields, and hearing that the Daily Graphic wanted a leader-note writer, he sent in some specimens and secured that appointment. During this period he wrote "Once Aboard the Lugger"; as soon as it was finished he found a publisher for it without difficulty, and it was immediately and widely successful. In the same year (1908) he was appointed night-editor of the Daily Graphic, of which he has recently been made editor.

Miss M. Edith Durham whose book "The Burden of the Balkans" Messrs Nelson are publishing.

Miss Durham, the first Woman War-Correspondent, is representing the Daily Chronicle with the Montenegrin Army.

From a drawing made by Edith Calvert (Mrs. Elkin Mathews) when she and Miss Durham—then known as "Dick Durham"—were students together at the Royal Academy Schools.

Reproduced by kind permission of the Artist.

Mr. Hutchinson devoted four years to the writing of "The Happy Warrior;" partly because he had very little leisure, chiefly because he took the most laborious pains with it. He could have published it two years ago, but it did not satisfy him, so he set to and re-wrote it from start to finish. "It was a dreadful task," he sighs. "Some of the scenes in it have been written a horrifying number of times, but I found, when the thing was done, that so far from tiring of it I had grown uncommonly fond of Percival and the rest of the characters." He confesses that "The Happy Warrior" is a kind of expression of his feeling that novels might very well go back to what they used to be, and become stories again. Nowadays, they seem to be mostly profound analyses of psychological or sex problems, and in attending too closely to this part of the business he thinks the author loses sight of his story. They leave him with an impression that there is no gayer, stronger or better sort of life than is pictured in their pages, but he has an idea that there is, and in his two novels he has shown that happier and more wholesome life as he has known it.

Mr. J. O. P. Bland.

Author of "Recent Events and Present Policies in China" (Heinemann).

John Ayscough's new idealist romance, "Faustula" is attracting a good deal of attention, one prominent critic ranking it higher than Kingsley's "Hypatia." It is an open secret that "John Ayscough," is the pen-name of the Right Reverend Monsignor Bickerstaffe-Drew, Protonotary Apostolic, and Prelate of the Papal Household.

Mr. J. O. P. Bland, whose "Recent Events and Present Policies in China" is published by Mr. Heinemann, is the son of Major-General E. L. Bland of Whiteabbey, County Antrim, and holds civil rank as a Chinese Official under an Imperial Decree that also conferred upon him the Order of the Double Dragon. Mr. Bland became known to English readers by the remarkable book, "China Under the Empress Dowager," which he wrote in collaboration with Mr. E. Backhouse, the eminent Oriental scholar. It was published by Mr. Heinemann in 1910. Recommended to the notice of Sir Robert Hart by "Chinese" Gordon and Sir Richard Wallace, Mr. Bland was appointed to the Imperial Maritime Customs in 1883, and served for thirteen years. Amongst other appointments, he acted for two years as Private Secretary to Sir Robert Hart and Assistant Chinese Secretary at the Inspectorate General. Resigning from the Customs in 1896, he became Secretary and chief official of the Municipality of Shanghai, which post he occupied for ten years. Later, from 1906 to 1909, he represented British financiers at Peking and negotiated several railway loans with the Chinese Government. He was also The Times correspondent at Shanghai, and afterwards at Peking, from 1907 till 1909, in which year he retired, and his wide and exceptional experience of Chinese affairs has borne fruit in these two books and many notable articles that have appeared in our leading reviews.

Photo by Whitfield, Cosser & Co., Bath.

John Ayscough.

Author of "Faustula" (Chatto & Windus).

Early in December the Year Book Press will issue Mr. Patrick MacGill's new collection of poems, "The Dead End." Mr. MacGill's previous volumes, "Gleanings from a Navvy's Scrap-Book," and "Songs of a Navvy," are said to have had quite an enormous sale for a book of verse, and the best poems

Photo by Lambert Weston & Son.

Winifred Graham
(Mrs. Theodore Cory)

whose new novel, "The Gods of the Dead," Messrs Wm. Rider are publishing from those two volumes, in addition to many new poems, have been gathered into "The Dead End."

Mr. John Ouseley asks us to announce that his personal connection with the publishing firm that bears his name has come to an end. The business will in future be conducted by the present directors, whilst the retiring founder and organiser of the firm is at present pursuing a special engagement with a well-known publishing firm in the West End.

Mr. Gerald Christy has extended the scope of his well-known Lecture Agency by instituting a Literary Agency Department which will be under the sole management of Mr. Leonard P. Moore.

Photo by Gilman, Oxford.

Mr. Stephen McKenna

whose brilliant first novel, "The Reluctant Lover," is published by Mr. Herbert Jenkins, is a nephew of the present Home Secretary.

We have received from Mr. Edward Baker, of Birmingham, his latest catalogues of secondhand books. There are many interesting book-bargains in them, and readers who have a taste for first editions, as well as those who are contented with any good edition of a good book so long as the price is

Photo by H. Walter Barnett.

Mr. Dion Clayton Calthrop whose new novel "St. Quin," has just been published by Messrs. Alston Rivers.

"Poets' Corner" in Vigo Street, shortly to be vacated by Mr. Elkin Mathews. The business was founded here by him in 1887.

Mr. Elkin Mathews's new premises in Cork Street, W.

moderate, will find it worth their while to apply to Mr. Baker for copies of his new lists.

Mr. Elkin Mathews is leaving the well-known haunt for lovers of belles lettres that he founded in the little inlet on the north side of Vigo Street in 1887. For seven years before that date the premises had been in the occupation of Mr. Dunthorne who called it "The Cabinet of Fine Arts," and it was this that gave Mr. Mathews the idea of naming his famous series of original poetry "The Vigo Cabinet" series, which has in little more than a dozen years extended to over a hundred volumes. In association with Mr. John Lane he published The Yellow Book, Oxford Characters, a new series of The Hobby Horse, and the early volumes of Francis Thompson, John Davidson, Oscar Wilde, John Addington Symonds, Lord de Tabley, Arthur Symonds, and many other distinguished authors. The autumn of 1894 witnessed "Parnassus divided into two peaks," as the Athenæum put it; Mr. Lane left the firm to found a publishing house of his own, and Mr. Mathews remained in the old quarters, whence he has since issued, amongst other important books, volumes of short stories by Sir Frederick Wedmore and Ernest Dowson, and of poetry by W. B. Yeats, Lionel Johnson, Laurence Binyon, Stephen Phillips, R. D. Blackmore, Selwyn Image, Maurice Hewlett, Henry Newbolt, etc. Recently the Royal Geographical Society, Mr. Mathew's landlords, have sold their Vigo Street property, and the new owners requiring the premises for their own occupation, Mr. Mathews has found it necessary to look for new ones, and has secured a more commodious and more convenient house in the neighbouring Cork Street, to which at the beginning of the New Year he will transfer his "garden of the Muses."

Cork Street, by the way, has an interesting history and something of a literary atmosphere of its own. It was named after Richard Boyle, third Earl of Burlington and fourth Earl of Cork (1659-1753); and among its famous residents have been Field-Marshal Wade, of whose house here there is a view in the "Vitruvius Britannicus;" Erasmus Lewis, secretary of Lord Dartmouth, an intimate friend of Swift and his circle; and later we read of Gibbon, the great historian, coming round from his lodgings in Bond Street to pass an occasional evening and drink a pint of claret at the Cork Street Tavern with his friend Peter Elmsley the bookseller, who helped to form the club of booksellers which published Johnson's "Lives of the Poets." To-day Cork Street is largely given over to ladies' clubs, hotels and fashionable tailors, and it is good that Mr. Elkin Mathews should establish his new "Poet's Corner" there to minister to that inner man who is not provided for by tailors or hotels.

The portrait of Mr. Rudyard Kipling on our cover is from a camera portrait by E. O. Hoppé.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

JOHN BUCHAN.

AMONG those who have set the seal of their individuality on modern letters none stands out in a more distinctive light and deserves more honourable mention than Mr. John Buchan. He has breathed a new life into the moribund art of the novel; he has made the short story what a cameo might be when it is cut by the hand of a master, and he has even contrived to make the light essay and occasional article an entertaining and scholarly production. Mr. Buchan has "played the sedulous ape" to one great master with success—R. L. Stevenson—and with the brilliant exception of Sir A. T. Quiller-Couch he has inherited more of the Stevensonian spirit and tradition than any other modern writer, although with more classical restraint. Stevenson would not only have found in him a literary disciple ; we feel sure that the spirit of the elder Scot would have responded gaily to the author of " Scholar Gipsies " and " Grey Weather " and found in him a boon companion ; Borrow would have loved him ; and we know that Mr. Hilaire Belloc who has roamed a continent throwing conventions to the wind in his mode of progression finds in him a congenial spirit on many a ramble among the Sussex Downs. For the author of " Scholar Gipsies " loves the sun and the wind ; the purple moorland lying under grey skies attracts him as the Dartmoor landscape attracts Mr. Eden Phillpotts ; his feet as a mountaineer are set in perilous places ; the high hill has an irresistible charm for him ; the silver stream winds its way through all his dreams as well as through the prose he writes ; and we believe at odd moments when he is not brooding over some obscure point connected with the practical side of publishing his mind is off to the Spanish Main ; he is back in the great sea fights of history with Raleigh and Drake and Morgan. It is this peculiar blend of what one might call the pastoral and the picaresque that one finds so attractive in the writings of Mr. Buchan. He may lay his scene in lowland Scotland when the sheep-shearing is on the hills and nothing breaks the drowsy stillness of the summer afternoon but the sharp bark of the farmer's dog and the cries of huddled sheep, but it is ten to one that the vagrant spirit of the author will throw off the burden of the peaceful scene and plunge light-heartedly into his favourite atmosphere. At one moment he is playing on an oat-stalk a caressing pastoral ; the next he is wielding a cutlass.

It is difficult to believe that Mr. John Buchan is still well on the sunny side of forty and that he has a long leap in front of him before he arrives at the terrible barrier that divides youth from middle age, when one considers the formidable row of books that stands to his name. He seems not only to have " lisp'd in numbers," a comparatively easy matter when one is born an author ; he seems almost to have lisp'd in tomes. When other men were still looking round for the choice of a profession Mr. Buchan was already half way up Olympus looking down at the stragglers at the foot of the hill. He was born in 1875 and was brought up in Tweeddale, the land that provides him with the pastoral note of his writings and which he loves as only a Scot can love the land that gives him birth. He was educated at Glasgow University, and from thence he went to Oxford as a scholar of Brasenose. While a student in Glasgow he already possessed a clear idea as to his walk in life. He had blossomed out as an author ; he had become the slave of a prodigal Muse and he had contributed at least one brilliant essay to The Gentleman's Magazine. Glasgow could not hold him long. He exchanged the murky glade of Kelvin for the dreaming spires of Oxford and here it was that the brilliant young Scotsman went through a period of intellectual activity that at one time threatened to rival in scope and abundance the feats of the Admirable Crichton. He carried off the Stanhope Historical Essay, the subject being Sir Walter Raleigh, a theme which he has taken up and developed in later years ; and the Newdigate Prize and a brilliant First in " Greats " fell to the list of his Oxford honours. He became President of the Union in 1899. He then exchanged the cloisters of the university for the Temple where he became a barrister in 1901. Mr. C. L. Graves has thus described the soaring spirit of the man in a set of dedicatory verses :

" Every Tuesday morn, careering
Up the stairs with flying feet,
You would burst upon us,
 cheering
Wellington's funereal street,
Fresh as paint, though you'd been ' railing '
Up from Scotland all the night,
Or had just returned from scaling
Some appalling Dolomite."

But the law could not tie his ardent spirit down. He was in search of further laurels and he got them when he became private secretary to Lord Milner who was then High Commissioner for South Africa. Here, according to the author of " ' The Times ' History of the South African War," he showed that indetigable activity and resource in affairs that have distinguished his later and no less brilliant career.

One cannot be long in the presence of Mr. John Buchan without coming under the spell of a singularly charming and genial personality. There must have been something wrong with Sydney Smith when he gave vent to that astonishing observation that has unfortunately become proverbial about the surgical operation necessary before a Scot can see a joke, and the good-humoured growl of a Doctor Johnson against the dwellers north of the Tweed has long ceased to be taken seriously. The Scot is not only a humourist, but he has the imagination to go to the very root of a joke and extract from it all its possibilities of humour which will serve him for days when the ordinary mortal is content to laugh and get it over and pass on to something more substantial. The humour of the Scot is the one great asset he possesses against the boredom of life. Mr. Buchan's humour is perhaps more a matter of personality than a matter of creative art. There seems no room in his vivid pages for anything but colour and romance. But even when he is the serious man of affairs, and most when he is the man of the world, the features of the imaginative man struggle through the mask. He will toss it aside as an encumbrance like the old conventional college gown and reveal himself a fantastically Stevensonian personality, blithe and debonair, brimful of humour and the high spirits that make for happiness—a veritable Florizel of letters.

Photo by G. C. Listerford.

Mr. John Buchan.

It is difficult, and always invidious, to define the exact place a contemporary man of letters holds in modern literature. In the case of Mr. John Buchan the difficulty becomes even more accentuated. The very scope and variety of his achievements perplex the critic. Besides novels and stories he has written on law, history, politics, metaphysics and sport. The probability that he will produce as much again before he has done coquetting with the "grissette of literature" as Mr. Barrie whimsically calls her, makes the duty of the critic both premature and supererogatory. We may, however, lightly sketch the character of the author, dwell on his style and methods and call attention here and there to a glowing phrase, a felicity of expression, perhaps even a conceit, but beyond that we dare not venture. Mr. Buchan is essentially Stevensonian both in the matter of literary style and in his outlook on life. He is the child of fancy. The world in which he moves has no attraction for him as an author except when he deals with a contemporary type that has no real place or business in the modern world; ordinary life has no meaning for him beyond the fact that it has got to be lived. We do not mean to say that he would go so far as to consider it a desecration of the printed page to introduce a vignette from real life; he has done so more than once; but he finds his inspiration in the romantic past and in the shadows of things that have become romantic. His great background is Jacobite Scotland, when he is not rapt in some peculiar myth or lost in the maze of some weird superstition. His earlier works, "Scholar Gipsies" and "Grey Weather" were in the true pastoral vein; his romances such as "John Burnet of Barns," "A Lost Lady of Old Years," and "Prester John" are all cast in the true Stevensonian mould. It is only in his last book "The Moon Endureth," that he has broken away in some respects from the traditions of the Stevensonian manner. In this book he has probably found his true métier in the short story, which he has developed and brought to artistic perfection in such tales as "The Grove of Ashtaroth" and "The Lemnian." "The Moon Endureth" contains his best and most mature work, and in this perhaps more than in any other of his books he represents the classical-romantic school, with all its restraint and severity of style; its poise and balance; the coldness even of its romance; the clear-cut, concise phrase:

"The little more and how much it is,
The little less and what worlds away!"

In his own peculiar manner he is probably the best modern exponent of the short story. His stories are perfect cameos of expression, delicately cut and delicately rounded, that stand out clear and distinct from their background of romance. "The Lemnian" opens with an almost Homeric dignity and roll. It is a brilliant example of the cold classical restraint that distinguishes the author's best work:

"He pushed the matted locks from his brow as he peered into the mist. His hair was thick with salt, and his eyes smarted from the green-wood fire on the poop. The four slaves who crouched beside the thwarts—Carians with thin bird-like faces—were in a pitiable case, their hands blue with oar weals and the lash marks on their shoulders beginning to gape from sun and sea. The Lemnian himself bore marks of ill usage. His cloak was still sopping, his eyes heavy with watching, and his lips black and cracked with thirst. Two days before the storm had caught him and swept his little craft into mid-Aegean. He was a sailor, come of sailor stock, and he had fought the gale manfully and well. . . ."

And this beautiful vignette from the same source deserves quotation:

"Then, while the waves lapped on the white sand, Atta made a song. He was thinking of the homestead far up in the green downs looking over the snows of Samothrace. At this hour in the morning there would be a tinkle of sheep-bells as the flocks went down to the low pastures. Cool winds would be blowing and the noise of the surf below the cliffs would come faint to the ear. In the hall the maids would be spinning, while their dark-haired mistress would be casting swift glances to the doorway, lest it might be filled at any moment by the form of her returning lord. Outside in the chequered sunlight of the orchard the child would be playing with his nurse, crooning in childish syllables the chanty his father had taught him. And at the thought of his home a great passion welled up in Atta's breast. It was not regret but joy and pride and aching love. In his antique island creed the death he was waiting for was not other than a bridal. He was dying for the things he loved, and by his death they would be blessed eternally. He would not have long to wait before bright eyes came to greet him in the House of Shadows."

Mr. John Buchan has gone further than most men go in a life twice as long and he has achieved much in many rôles. He is an accomplished writer in a rare and difficult manner; he has written verse that will at least stand the test of contemporary poetry; he is the author of some half a dozen novels and he has visualised the African Colony for us in a vivid volume of travel. We feel that he will go further in the future, and it is of interest to note in view of the many-sided character of the man that he has of late devoted himself to politics and has been adopted as Unionist candidate for the counties of Peebles and Selkirk, with which he has been so long associated. As a writer he has to some extent freed himself from the shackles of tradition and he has proved himself a brilliant artist in the short story. If we may intrude a note of personal criticism we feel that he has but to weave some of the joy and laughter of his own sunny personality into his work to reach that wider public that demands that an author shall amuse as well as enthrall. Let him launch out into a new atmosphere by giving real life a chance now and again; let him deal with things as he sees them; not the abnormal but the commonplace; not the supernatural, but the natural; the everyday things that lie about his feet; for a little real life is worth a great deal of tradition. Romance does not always lie buried in some half-forgotten legend. It is often the things that are commonplace to-day that are the legends of to-morrow. Mr. John Buchan has now attained his literary majority; we still wait for the great work; the more ambitious flight of his matured imagination.

R. B.

THE READER.

RUDYARD KIPLING.*

By DIXON SCOTT.

A WRITER'S reputation is often a kind of premature ghost that stalks between him and his audience, blurring their vision; but in Mr. Kipling's case this doppel-ganger has proved specially pobby and impervious and full of energy. The convincing autobiography it rattles off runs something like this: "I came out of the East, a youngster of twenty, but wiser than your very oldest men. Life had told me her last secrets, I could do anything I liked with words, and I tossed you tales of twisted deaths and queer adulteries with the nonchalant neatness of a conjuror and an air of indulgent half-contempt. I was an uncanny mixture of bored pierrot and bland priest, and in my splendid insolence (I was only twenty, mind you), I made poetry learn slang and set her serving in cauteens. 'Born blasé,' muttered one of your own writers, maddened—himself reckoned something of a prodigy. I was the cleverest young man of my day.

"And then I came West to your dingy, cosy Babylon, and tasted fame and flesh-pots: very good. And the brightness died out of my colours and the snap from my tunes. Your snug horizons hemmed me in, I lost my vision, I relied contentedly on tricks I'd learned before. I wrote a bad novel and it made a worse drama. I made money, I made speeches, I spoiled my paints with party politics. And now here I am, sir, the popular favourite. — Vide Max.—Seen the Post? 'Save the King!'"

Well, the main desire of this article is to denounce all that as perjury—force aside the phantom—gain a glimpse of the real man behind; to suggest, that, instead of depreciating, the quality of his work has constantly improved, that his technique has never been so amazing as now, nor his artistic integrity more Lutheran,—and that instead of immensely precocious and worldly-wise—"born blasé" as Barrie (it was Barrie) once said—this young poet has always been, far more than Barrie himself, one of those who never grow up, who are never quite at home in the world, but who wander through it, like Hawthorne or Poe, a little alien and wistful,

* "The Collected Verse of Rudyard Kipling." 20s. net (Hodder & Stoughton.)

a little elf-like,—and that this quality of envy of "the happy folk in houses," of the practical grown-ups and worldlings, is indeed the essential characteristic of the man and the key to and core of his work.

* * *

Now to get the first glimmer of the ghost, to follow this Jekyll-and-Hyde from the outset, it is necessary to go back to the days of the "Ditties"—so swiftly did the severance begin. Many readers, not yet aged, will no doubt still remember the stab and glitter of the first Kipling furore, and the way the critical raptures went rocketing up, breaking into a superior fire of epigrams, eager to announce the discovery. A new star had arisen, a rival to Loti, and the elect were at once in full song. Perhaps the hour was specially apt for such an overture. It was the hour of the 'eighties, the ineffable, amateur 'eighties, when a recondite vulgarity was the vogue; and æsthetic London was not at all unanxious to display its capacity for enjoying raw sensation. Hedonism had deserted the Oxford of Pater for "The Oxford" of Marie Lloyd and Walter Sickert. If you were a poet you were ashamed not to be seen in cabmen's shelters; and a little hashish was considered quite the thing. A superior hour! And so, when the rag-time chords of the "Departmental Ditties" flicked and snapped an introduction to the laconic patter of the "Tales," and when the "Tales" themselves, with their parakeets and ivory, their barbaric chic and rubricated slang, proved a mixture of Persian print and music-hall, then the "ten superior persons scattered through the universe," were persuaded that their hour had found its very voice, that they were listening to the last delicious insolence of æsthetics:

"'Er petticoat was yaller and 'er little cap was green,
An' 'er name was Supi-yaw-lat—jes' the same as Theebaw's queen,
An' I see 'er first a-smokin' of a whackin' white cheroot,
An' a-wastin' Christian kisses on an 'eathen idol's foot:
Bloomin' idol made o' mud
Wot they called the great Gawd Budd Plucky lot she cared for idols when I kissed her where she stood."

Photo by E. O. Hoppé.

Mr. Rudyard Kipling.

More daring, this, than even lithographs of music-halls: bizarrerie of the best. The youngster was bracketed with Beardsley, was bracketed with "Max." Mr. John Lane began to collect his first editions; Mr. Richard le Gallienne was told off to Bodley Head him. Mr. Gosse (this is perfectly true), Mr. Edmund Gosse spake publicly of "the troubling thrill, the voluptuous and agitating sentiment," which these tales sent through his system. The little sun-baked books from Allahabad seemed if anything more golden than "The Yellow Book." The proof of the literary epicure was his palate for the Kipling liqueur.

And then the exasperating fellow became popular.

* * *

What do you call the apostles of the Cubists? Cubicles? Very well then. Consider the consternation of the cubicles if the general public began to clamour for Picassos. Think even of Mr. Roger Fry's chagrin if we made a popular favourite of Matisse. A consternation not dissimilar, we may be sure, shuddered through the initiates of the 'nineties. Absurd, of course, to suggest that the paling of critical approval, the soft extinction of the starrier estimates, was entirely due to the widening blaze of popularity; but even critics are human, and it helped. It was impossible to watch their liqueur being drained like Bass without having doubts about its quality. They felt that the public's enjoyment of Kipling was too true to be good. They grew querulous, they qualified, they discovered defects.

The defects they discovered, the demands which they made, and the effect of all this hedging and shuffling on Mr. Kipling's development, we will consider in a moment. Remark, parenthetically, first, what an entirely wholesome and satisfactory thing that wider popularity was,—and is. There is probably no living writer who is regarded, in England, with such widespread and unprompted veneration. It is the nearest thing we have nowadays to the reverence that used to be excited by the great literary figures of last century. It is touching, it is beautiful, it is altogether honest and good. Bank clerks and clerics, doctors and drapers, journalists, joiners, engineers,—the average sinful jurymen and his usual daughters and wife, all speak of this man and his work much as another kind of people speak of Wagner. Only, honestly. There is no priggishness about it, nor any desire to impress or be improved; and yet they find beauty in his work, they find magic, they find hints of strange forces and powers and constant reminders of something unimaginable beyond; they experience that delicious commotion of the blood we call romance, and are thrilled and shaken and renewed by it much as others of us are supposed to be renewed and thrilled by poetry. And at the same time, unlike so much of their "romance," it is never a mere dallying with lotus-land sensations, a coloured refuge from the drudge of day. Its action is always to excite their zest for life, to send them back into reality more exultantly—not (of course) because of any policy it may preach, but because it so crisply handles, names, and sanctifies, the tools of each man's trade. Much has been written of Mr. Kipling's capacity for picking up knowledge from experts; far too little of the lessons the experts have learned from him. He has renewed the workman's pride in his work and restored their mystery to the crafts. He has done more than any man of his time to make the middle-classes less middle-class.

But all this the ten superior ones were in no position to foresee. Said they, "Yellow Book?"—we meant yellow press. Said they,—but he likes the music-hall? And, to him,—these little tales are very neat, very clever; but before we can take you seriously you must produce a full-length novel. This is striking—but is it Art?

* * *

And the real Rudyard Kipling? Had been meanwhile moved, one avers, as little by a desire to please the great public as by the desire to épater it. Essentially a dreamer, born in exile, he was oddly innocent of all the motives men ascribed to him;—and it was an accident of environment, and a streak of sinful pride, and a sort of homely emulation, that really determined his first choice of tone and topic,—the violent topics and the casual tone of those "Plain Tales from the Hills." He had no notion of exalting the common soldier. He wanted rather the soldier to reverence the pen. His spur was the kind of half-resentment from which many writers suffer—the emotion that probably had a good deal to do with the making of "Don Juan," and that is accountable for Mr. Shaw's affectation of ferocity and that perhaps prompted Mr. Maurice Hewlett's early hectics. It is the artist's human retort to that intolerable tolerance with which the workers, doers, men of action, regard his anæmic indoor trade. It was Beetle's way of enforcing respect at Westward Ho! It was young Kipling's way of adjusting things at Simla. He would prove that ink is thicker than blood and the pen more masculine than the sword; and that a certain small spectacled sub-editor fond of poetry was not quite the lamb that he looked. And so he borrowed tales from the bazaars and the barracks, and Bret Hartened them and pointed them with Poe; and wrote them out, with an infinite cunning, in a hand like an indifferent drawl. One of the ways of out-Heroding Herod is to yawn when the head is brought in. Mr. Kipling's yawn was a masterpiece. His make-up was perfect, the deception complete; the mess-rooms were duly impressed: it was another victory for the pen . . .

But a mask is a dangerous thing; it often moulds the face beneath. Left alone with his soothing Simla success, quietly sheltered behind it, young Kipling might indeed now have softly discarded his make-up and let his instincts find their native expression. But there leapt out upon him from Europe our roar of applause, and that riveted him to his rôle. Even the dabs of deprecation, the raps from falling rocket sticks, perversely whipped him in the same direction. "You can write these little tales," said they, "but are you knowing enough to write long ones?" He did not know enough: he was never meant to be a novelist;—but even less was he adapted for letting taunts slip by unanswered, and so he set his teeth, took up the challenge, and produced "The Light that Failed." It did fail; and the critics who were really its sponsors had their moment of mean triumph. But by now his pride was in pledge; he would write a brilliant novel if it broke him; and for ten years he fought out fresh perfections of technique, using his convention of violence to hammer out new details of equipment until at length by dint of sheer virtuosity he achieved the protracted tale called "Kim." He

Specimen Illustration from "SHE STOOPS TO CONQUER" By OLIVER GOLDSMITH
Illustrated by HUGH THOMSON
(HODDER AND STOUGHTON, LONDON)

himself, it is said, considers "Kim" his master-work. He might well view it as a second vindication; his work hence-forward, if I see it aright, stands for one long attempt on the part of his relieved genius to loosen the bars it had built about itself, and to twist an alien and artificial technique into an instrument for its deeper desires.

* * *

For it is the books that followed "Kim"—it is "Traffics and Discoveries," "Actions and Reactions," "Puck of Pook's Hill," "Rewards and Fairies," and the concurrent verse—that betray to us most clearly this queer subterranean disharmony and feud. If a reader will take these four books and consider them apart; if he will let their characteristics form a picture in his mind, an image of the kind of man who wrote them; and if he will then apply this reagent to the books that came before "Kim," he will see how it eats out their accidentals. The falsities fade, there is a linking up of lighter touches, certain qualities, unrecognised before, rise glittering like veins. This fundamental filigree, this clear resultant mesh, is a map of Kipling's mind.

Now of this fundamental Kipling the cardinal qualities are three. The first is a passion for definition—a spiritual horror, almost desperate, of vagueness—a hunger for certitude and system. The second is the imaginative instrument of the first: a prodigious mental faculty, namely, for enforcing design, compelling coherence, for stamping dream-stuff into shapes as clean-cut and decisive as minted metal discs. And the third, on the physical plane, is the almost manual counterpart of these: a craftsman's cunning and capacity for fitting these terse units into complex patterns, adjusting them like the works of a watch with an exquisite accuracy, achieving miracles of minute mechanical perfection.

These are the three faculties, often bitted and strained, that form everywhere the sinews. Take, first, because most obvious, the so-called technical elements of his style. "There is a writer called Stevenson," he once said, "who makes the most delicate inlay-work in black-and-white and files out to the fraction of a hair." Kipling's own work is no less free from fluff or haze or slackness. The rhythms run with a snap from stop to stop; every sentence is as straight as a string; each has its self-contained tune. Prise one of them out of its place and you feel it would fall with a clink, leaving a slot that would never close up as the holes do in woollier work. Replace it, and it locks back like type in a forme, fitting into the paragraph as the paragraph fits into the tale. There are no glides or grace-notes, or blown spray of sound. Most prose that loves rhythm yields its music like a mist, an emanation that forms a bloom on the page, softly blurring the partitions of the periods. Kipling's prose shrinks stiffly from this trustfulness. The rhythms must report themselves promptly, prove their validity, start afresh after the full-stop. Lack of faith, if you like—but, also, constant keenness of craftsmanship.

Turn next to the optical integers—the sudden scenes which stud his page like inlaid stones. "The leisuredly ocean all patterned with peacocks' eyes of foam." "I swung the car to clear the turf, brushed along the edge of the wood, and turned in on the broad stone path to where the fountain-basin lay like one star-sapphire." "When his feet touched that still water, it changed, with a rustle of unrolling maps, to nothing less than a sixth quarter of the globe, with islands coloured yellow and blue, their lettering strung across their faces." And these are no mere decorations. These tales are jewelled, as watches are; it is round these tense, irreducible details that the action revolves. What is the emotional axis of "The Finest Story in the World?" It is that "silver wire laid along the bulwarks which I thought was never going to break." Are we to know that a man was struck dumb? Then "just as the lightning shot two tongues that cut the sky into three pieces . . . something wiped his lips of speech as a mother wipes the milky lips of her child." The motive of all his tales, as of "At the End of the Passage," is a picture seen in a lens. Even the shadowy outer influences that brood over Kim's life, the inscrutable Powers that move in its background, come to us first in shapes vivid as heraldry—as a red Bull on a Field, as a House of Many Pillars; and before the close are resolved into the two most definite, clean-cut, and systematic of all earthly organisations: the military mechanism of India and the precise apparatus of Freemasonry. Kipling must have pattern and precision—and he has the power as well as the will. He can crush the sea into a shape as sharp as a crystal, can compress the Himalayas into a little lacquer-like design, has even in "The Night Mail"—that clean, adroit, contenting piece of craftsmanship—printed a pattern on the empty air. He is primarily a pattern-maker; and the little pieces thus obtained he builds into a larger picture still. As the sentence into the paragraph—as the paragraph into the page—so do these sharp-edged items click together to form the geometrical pattern called the plot.

"The pattern called the plot." It is here that we come very close to the irony that has ruled and wrenched all his career. Switch this map-making, pattern-making faculty upon the third element in fiction, the element of human nature, and what is the inevitable result? Inevitably, there is the same sudden stiffening and formulation. The characters spring to attention like soldiers on parade; they respond briskly to a certain description; they wear a fixed suit of idiosyncrasies like a uniform. A mind like this must use types and set counters; it feels dissatisfied, unsafe, ineffective, unless it can reduce the fluid waverings of character, its flitting caprices and twilit desires, to some tangible system. His characters will not only be definite; they will be definitions. His heroes will be courage incarnate; his weak men will be unwaveringly weak; and those who are mixed will be mixed mathematically, with all their traits clearly related to and explained by some neat blend of blood and race and caste behind. Is not all this true of Kipling's characters? They are marked by a strange immobility. They strike certain attitudes and retain them. Mulvaney, Ortheris and Learoyd live long but never alter; Kim never grows up. And indeed it is this very fixity that makes the short stories so effective. Their maker took these frozen gestures, rigid faces and tense attitudes, and fitted them together to form his effect; and whilst the inflexibility was exactly what he needed for neat mosaic-work, for making the sudden star called the story, the vividness of the details ("life seen by lightning-flashes" someone called them) seemed to prove the piercing humanity of the writer. It was only when he tried to construct a novel with them that the stiffness of these details turned to obstinacy, and their numbness became a kind of death. A short tale can be told in tableau—but a novel is not a long short tale. The pattern of "The Light that Failed" is as neat as the most successful of the contes, but it is the static symmetry of decoration and stained glass. It is applied art,—that is to say, misapplied art. Its logic is not that of life. The characters are stowed into the interstices of a design that relies upon them remaining fixed quantities.

Perceive, then, the almost maddening position! The very qualities that made the first tales tell, that seemed to prove his supreme capacity for fiction, are exactly the qualities that cut him off from the ability to write novels. The novelist is essentially the explorer, the questioner, the opener of doors; and the only law of human nature he knows is that the exception is the rule. But Mr. Kipling's first word is obedience; he is all for rules and rivets; for regularity and a four-square plan. Born under the sign of the Balance, his emblem is the compass and the square—and it is not with tools like these that men's motives can be measured. His vision of the world, like the Lama's, is a Wheel of Life with a neat niche for the individual; and even his famous militarism, his worship of the apparatus of war, is nothing more, in essence, than a longing for quiet comeliness and order. It is the mind, if you like, of a martinet—incapable therefore of complete imaginative sympathy. Any lapse from efficiency fills his craftsman's nature with disgust, and the only characters he can handle with perfect satisfaction are the Stricklands, the Mowglis, the Kims, as unconquerably capable as machines. His voice indeed is never so tolerant and humane as when he is dealing with heroes and heroines that are not human at all—with beasts and ships and polo-ponies or those odd little half-animals called children. His "Jungle Books" are among his best because here a psychology as elementary as Æsop's serves to convey the sense of an unusual understanding. A like reason gives its race and richness to his dialogue the moment it takes refuge in a dialect. For dialect, in spite of all its air of ragged lawlessness, is wholly impersonal, typical, fixed, the code of a caste, not the voice of an individual. It is when the novelist sets his characters talking King's English that he really puts his sympathy for the unconventional and capricious to the strain. Mr. Kipling's plain conversations are markedly unreal. But honest craftsmanship and an ear for strong rhythms provide him with many suits of dialects. With these he dresses the talk till it seems to surge with character.

And so, in this way and in that, the actual words he wrote joined in the conspiracy to keep him toiling, still hopefully, after that ignis fatuus of fiction. Until at length he made his supreme effort, fitted all the lore he had gathered—the sharp-set scenes, the well-cut dialects, the crisp impressions of life—into a single zoetrope, set it whirling on one of the spindles of the Indian machine, the secret spindle called the Great Game, and so created that spirited illusion of a novel which we know as "Kim."

* * *

Thenceforward his work in prose has been a wonderful attempt to make his qualities cure their natural defects—to make sharpness and bright neatness produce their natural opposites—depth and shimmer and bloom. And by dint of an incomparable dexterity he has succeeded. There is no space left me now to trace the process with completeness—but roughly it may be described as an attempt to superimpose, as when you furl a fan, all the elements which in "Kim" had been laid side by side. The best example is perhaps "Rewards and Fairies." If the reader will turn back to those wise fairy-tales he will see that each is really four-fold: a composite tissue made up of a layer of sunlit story (Dan's and Una's plane), on a layer of moonlit magic (plane of Puck), on a layer of history-story stuff (René's plane and Gloriana's), on a last foundation of delicately bedimmed but never doubtful allegory. And he will note, too, the exquisite precision of the correspondences, a kind of practical punning, so that the self-same object plays a different part in every plane. One instance will suffice. Puck kicks a bunch of scarlet toadstools idly. Why? Simply so that the red colour may stain back through all the textures till it matches, in the third, with the name of Rufus. This is not the mere swagger of virtuosity. The result of these impositions is a very beautiful imposture. It gives the tales an opalescence that had hitherto seemed foreign to his work. It gives them the milkiness of a magic crystal and makes them the completest symbols of life he has yet produced. These fairy tales for children are far more realistic than "The Plain Tales from the Hills." For half of life is moonlit, and the image that would copy it exactly must be vague.

Nor is this all. If there be any logic in the lines of effort we have traced it is not here they find their consummation: they leap forward through this magic haze, emerge beyond it strangely clarified; they make it impossible not to believe that this woven obscurity, this new delicate dimness, is indeed but a curtain—a mist—not of dusk, but of dawn—that will dissolve to reveal Kipling carving his true master-work. Released at last from the conventions thrust upon it by pride and accident and the impertinencies of criticism, his system-seeking genius can now openly take up its true task, the task it has hitherto attempted only intermittently, and begin the sustained practice of that colossal kind of craftsmanship for which it is so singularly suited. It will beat out for itself a new form of imaginative prose, as unclogged by characterisation as his verse. The devices of drama it will use no doubt, and some of the tricks of narration; but its true medium will be massed impersonal things—tangles of human effort—the thickets of phenomena—the slow movements of industry, so muffled to the average eye—the general surge and litter of sensation. What his genius can do with material of this kind we have already in some sort seen. Driving into the darkness that beleaguers us; swirling and thrusting like a search-light in a forest; it could bring out the essential structure of events and display the soaring pillars of contemporary achievement. It might not be the perfect definition; it might tend too much to turn the tides into firm floors, the branching constellations into rafters; but it would be enormously exhilarating. It would give toil a conscious habitation; like actual architecture, like statuary, like all firm material forms, it would create, instead of merely copying, the emotions it lacks power to reproduce.

THE CHRISTMAS BOOKSHELF.

NOTES ON SOME OF THE NEW COLOUR BOOKS.

IN his recently published volume, "The Fascination of Books," Mr. Joseph Shaylor has a very interesting essay on "The Christmas Book" in the course of which he remarks that "during the early part of the last century Christmas books, as we now know them, did not exist. There were, of course, a number of books published suitable for Christmas presents, but they were of a general, solid, or technical character, and not special Christmas books. In looking through the book catalogues of the first twenty years of the nineteenth century one cannot help remarking upon the few volumes published entirely for the Christmas season. It is also impossible not to be surprised at the small number of books issued for the entertainment of women and children."

Well, we have quite reversed all that, and the surprise now is at the enormous number of books published especially for the Christmas season, and at the bewildering variety of them. Men, women and children of all possible tastes are amply provided for; nor is our improvement only in the matter of quantity and variety; never was the Christmas book more beautifully or artistically produced than it has been in these latter years. I am not forgetting those famous Annuals, The Amulet, Friendship's Offering, Forget-Me-Not, and the rest of them, but after all there was something finicking about their fineness, and in point of general interest and in wealth and beauty of illustration they are not to be compared with the best of the splendidly produced Christmas books of our own day. Sometimes the book is an ancient or modern classic newly illustrated; sometimes, as in "The Uffizi Gallery,"¹ the illustrations are reproductions of Old Masters and the text is new; sometimes the book is specially written for this season, and the pictures specially painted for it.

Of the eight nature studies in Maeterlinck's "Hours of Gladness,"² one, on "Our City Gardens," now appears within covers for the first time; the rest are selected from two other of his books, but the translations have been carefully revised by the translator who has introduced into them all the author's latest additions and corrections. There is no need for me to praise these delicate, fanciful, subtly suggestive essays of Maeterlinck on flowers, their intelligence and their perfumes, and the glory of the garden in spring, or to say more of the new essay than that it has all the charm and gracious philosophy that delighted us in the older ones. Mr. Detmold's illustrations, here and in his edition of "The Fables of Æsop,"³ are in his happiest mood and style. His birds and flowers in the one series and his animals and birds in the other are painted in with a boldness of colouring and a vividness of decorative effect that are unrivalled outside the work of the great realistic artists of Japan. It is characteristic of him and right that he should illustrate Æsop with birds and animals that are things of grace and beauty; but it is characteristic of Mr. Arthur Rackham, and equally right of him, that he should illustrate "Æsop's Fables"⁴ in a wholly different vein. It is the queeriness, the quaintness, the fantastic grotesquerie of Æsop that has appealed to him, and not his birds and animals only, but his very trees and inanimate objects are alive with a weird, amusing and at times grimly uncanny humanity. The same grotesque fancy and bizarre imagination runs Andrea del Sarto (1486-1531).

Florentine School, No. 1,112.
"The Madonna of the Harpies."

From "The Uffizi Gallery" (Jack).

riot through his wonderful pictures to "Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens."⁵ See how cunningly he plays with his trees there and makes them humanly alive. At a first glance they look like ordinary trees strangely contorted, but at a second you see, in that painting of the trees warning Mamie, for example, or in that of the elderberry hobbling across the walk to talk to the young quinces, that their trunks and branches are transformed into amazing arms and legs and they are mysteriously endowed with nightmare heads and faces. But you have glimpses in Mr. Rackham's work of the loveliness as well as of the oddity and fantasy of fairyland, and it is because he can so deftly mingle grace and quaintness, beauty and ugliness

¹ "The Uffizi Gallery." By P. G. Konody. Edited by T. Leman Hare. Illustrated with 50 Plates in Colour. 21s. net. (T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

² "Hours of Gladness." By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Teixeira de Mattos. Illustrated by E. J. Detmold. 21s. net. George Allen.)

³ "The Fables of Æsop." Illustrated by E. J. Detmold. 15s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

⁴ "Æsop's Fables." Illustrated by Arthur Rackham. 6s. net. (Heinemann.)

⁵ "Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens." By J. M. Barrie. Illustrated by Arthur Rackham. 15s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

that I have always regarded him as the ideal illustrator of any story in which Peter Pan is concerned.

I was talking just now of the realism of the Japanese artists. If you are not acquainted with it, you may make acquaintance with some remarkable examples of it in Mr. Yoshio Markino's unique illustrations to the new edition of Mr. Alfred H. Hyatt's well-known anthology, "The Charm of London."¹ Take any one of them—this of "Regent's Canal": how vividly true it is. Dull, sluggish stream, dull sky, drab banks, commonplace trees and houses, a floating mist, lamps twinkling through it, the gleam of them here and there reflected in the quiet water—there is no separate item of the picture that you would call beautiful, and yet how rhythmically beautiful is the effect of the whole.

¹ "The Charm of London: An Anthology." Compiled by Alfred H. Hyatt. With 12 Illustrations by Yoshio Markino 5s. net (Chatto & Windus.)

Frontispiece to Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens.

New illustrated edition. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Yoshio Markino finds the spirit of beauty in London's streets and smoky atmosphere, as Mr. E. W. Waite finds it in the clearer skies and country fields and leafy woodlands that Richard Jefferies with such loving and exquisite intimacy and artistry describes in "The Story of My Heart;"² or as Mr. James Heron finds it in the ancient, more picturesque, more romantic looking streets and byways of Edinburgh. "The Story of My Heart" is, as Mr. C. J. Longman says in his Preface, "one of the most singular books that man of genius ever wrote. . . . It is an outpouring of Jefferies' innermost soul." Not the story of his everyday existence, but of his inner life, his emotional experiences, his intellectual delights. Stevenson's book is of a wholly different class; but no little of his heart was in "Edinburgh;"³ he has put some of his most magical and glamorous writing into this volume about it, and to say that the pictures of Mr. Heron are worthy of Stevenson's beautiful prose is to give them very high praise indeed.

The serene philosophy of Marcus Aurelius⁴ has never perhaps been more fittingly housed than it is in this tasteful binding of blue and gold, nor more fittingly embellished than it is by Mr. Russell Flint's thoughtful and delicately toned water colours; and there is a similarly perfect fitness about the style in which Messrs. Chatto & Windus have produced Tennyson's stately poem, "Morte D'Arthur."⁵ Printed in red and black Gothic lettering on pages richly illustrated and illuminated in colour and in gold after drawings by Alberto Sangorski, its ancient missal-like

² "The Story of My Heart." By Richard Jefferies. Illustrated by E. W. Waite. 7s. 6d. net. (Duckworth.)

³ "Edinburgh." By Robert Louis Stevenson. With 24 Illustrations in Colour by James Heron. 12s. 6d. net. (Seeley & Co.)

⁴ "The Thoughts of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus." In the Translation of George Long. Illustrated after the Water Colour Drawings of W. Russell Flint. 10s. 6d. net. (Lee Warner.)

⁵ "Morte D'Arthur." By Alfred Lord Tennyson. Reproduced in Gold and Colours after original Illuminated Drawings by Alberto Sangorski. 6s. net. (Chatto & Windus.)

LITTLE BO-PEEP

*Specimen Illustration from "OUR NURSERY RHYME BOOK."
Edited by LETTY and FRANK LITTLEWOOD, with a Preface by S. R. LITTLEWOOD, and Twelve Coloured and numerous Black and White Illustrations by HONOR C. APPLETON. 5s. net.*

appearance is harmoniously in keeping with the old-world grandeur of the mediæval legend. Mediæval, and earlier and later stories go to the making of "The Book of Saints and Heroes"¹ in which Andrew Lang retells some more of those deathless tales of the good and the brave that nobody could narrate with quite such ease and lightness and pleasant skill as he, and that he will never tell us any more of. An ideal book, this, for younger readers, with some excellent colour and black and white pictures by Henry Ford.

Shakespeare has not been so freely laid under contribution in the colour books of this winter as of last; the only play of his that has come my way in this form is a sumptuous edition of "Romeo and Juliet,"² illustrated with a series of masterly paintings by W. Hatherell—paintings that body forth with most delicate fidelity the touching youth and beauty of Juliet and are alive with the essential poetry and passionate romance of this greatest of all love stories. Another that is sure of wide welcome is a new translation of Anatole France's dainty fairy-tale, "Bee: The Princess of the Dwarfs."³ Swift, our merciless English satirist, left us in "Gulliver" one of the most popular of nursery books, though he never intended it to be that; and here we have the greatest living French master of satire and irony deliberately turning his back on the world of grown-ups to tell a charming tale for children that will live in future along with Gulliver. It is sweeter than Gulliver, kinder, more gracefully fanciful, more of the sort of wonder-story that a child loves to imagine for itself, and Mr. Charles Robinson has illustrated it in the same gracious, delicately imaginative spirit. The children in his pictures have in their faces and figures all the innocent helplessness and wonder and simplicity of childhood; his Princess is just what a child would wish her to be; and look at his dwarfs! Curious, quaint little men, droll, mischievous, large-headed, incalculably old, and painted cunningly, imaginatively, with a brush that has been dipped in the very colour of dreams. Fantastically imaginative too and alive with the beauty and eeriness and elusive magic of that eternal wonderland that can only be rightly seen through the eyes of a child are the verses and pictures that Miss Florence Harrison has written and painted for her "Elfin Song."⁴ Whether you are flying with the Wood Witch who scatters the snow-flakes down:

"What do you there blowing
Up in the starry waste?
'I set the clouds a-snowing
Over the world in haste.'"

¹ "The Book of Saints and Heroes" By Andrew Lang Illustrated by Henry Ford. 6s. net (Longmans)

² "Romeo and Juliet." Illustrated by W. Hatherell. 15s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

³ "Bee." By Anatole France. Retold in English by Peter Wright. 20 Coloured Illustrations and many other Decorations by Charles Robinson. 7s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

⁴ "Elfin Song: A Book of Verse and Pictures." By Florence Harrison. 6s. net. (Blackie & Son.)

From "Bee" (Dent)

"They made their way through meadows enamelled with flowers."

—or whether you are seated with little Robin out in the forest, watching for the fairies:

"Through the grasses playing
Golden pipes, they came,
Calling, ever calling
Robin by his name."

—you are in the tricky land of make-believe where nothing is impossible and the best things are always happening. Every child who is fond of gnomes and fairies will be fond of "Elfin Song." Every child, too, will be delighted with "Our Nursery Rhyme Book,"⁵ with Miss Honor C. Appleton's fascinating pictures in colour and in black and white. How pretty and dainty her sketches of children are, and how jolly and how instinct with life and movement! The youngest editor and editress that ever did any editing—one aged six and the other three—have chosen all their favourites from among the old Nursery Rhymes, Nonsense Verse, Riddles, Alphabets and Games, and here they all are in the prettiest of books with the prettiest of pictures.

Another artist who is his own author this year is Mr. W. Heath Robinson,⁶ but he writes in prose and relates an amusingly marvellous romance of the old mushroom gatherer, Crispin, and of Crispin's wife Chloe, and their ten children, nine of whom are shockingly bad-tempered. There is a Sicilian Charwoman in the book who would be worth any amount of money if you could employ her to come and talk to you whilst you scrubbed the floor; and a doctor, a musician, a real soldier and a lost grocer, to say nothing of an ancient mariner, each of whom it is a sheer joy to be acquainted with. The humour of this tale of "Bill the Minder" and the humour of the pictures is so delicious that when you look at it you almost wish you were a child again yourself, and when you read it you are one, and don't want to grow up any more.

⁵ "Our Nursery Rhyme Book." Edited by Letty and Frank Littlewood. Illustrated by Honor C. Appleton. 5s. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

⁶ "Bill the Minder." Written and Illustrated by W. Heath Robinson. 10s. 6d. net. (Constable)

But since you must grow up again, whether you like it or not, here for your consolation are excellent new editions, excellently illustrated, of the greatest of English historical romances, "The Cloister and the Hearth,"¹ and of one of the gayest, breeziest and most idyllic love romances of recent years—Jeffery Farnol's story of "The Broad Highway,"² Gordon Browne's colour drawings for the first, and C. E. Brock's for the second, are among the ablest and most attractive book illustrations that these two notable artists have ever done.

Superficially, this handsome volume about "Royal Gardens,"³ that has been written and illustrated by Mr. Cyril Ward (if these artists go on writing their own books like this there will soon be nothing left for the mere authors to do) has nothing in common with any of the books I have just been dealing with, but when you come to think of it a garden is the oldest home of romance, and where there are flowers there are always fairies. In the main, however, Mr. Ward is practical and keeps to matters of fact. His pages are rich in suggestions and information that the garden lover will find helpful. He unfolds a very interesting history of gardening in Great Britain, with particular reference to Royal gardens. He traces the development of the English garden through various phases; how it came under French influences when Charles II. reascended his throne after long residence in France; and under Dutch influences with the coming of William of Orange and his following. The great gardens of Windsor Castle, Bagshot, Hampton Court, Osborne, Sandringham, Holyrood, Kensington and other of the Royal Palaces are vividly and pleasantly described and illustrated with many reproductions from the author's original water colours. A pleasant book to read, and one that the gardener, professional no less than amateur, may study with much profit as well as pleasure.

Yet one other volume of which the author is the artist is "An Artist in Egypt"⁴—a picturesquely written record of a journey through the land of the Pharaohs. It is one of the most interesting travel books of the year;

Mr. Tyndale has seen and felt the glow and mystery and sleepy majesty of the Orient and realises them with a fine and sensitive art in his remarkable illustrations.

Here among the colour books, too, are two—or rather four—of an historical kind. Miss H. E. Marshall has written a capital "History of France"⁵ for boys and girls, beginning as far back as 390 B.C., with the descent Juliet:— 'O Romeo, Romeo! wherefore art thou Romeo?

From "Romeo and Juliet" (Hodder & Stoughton)

¹ "The Cloister and the Hearth." By Charles Reade. Illustrated by Gordon Browne. 21s. net. (W. & R. Chambers.)

² "The Broad Highway." By Jeffery Farnol. Illustrated by Chas. E. Brock. 10s. 6d. net. (Sampson Low & Co.)

³ "Royal Gardens." By Cyril Ward. 32 Full-page Colour Reproductions from original Water Colours, and 5 Pen Drawings by the Author. 16s. net. Large paper edition, £2 2s. net. (Longmans.)

⁴ "An Artist in Egypt." By W. Tyndale. 15s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

⁵ "A History of France." By H. E. Marshall. Illustrated by A. C. Michael. 7s. 6d. net. (Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.)

of the Gauls upon Rome, coming down through crowded years of great and picturesque events to the great days of the first Napoleon, and ending with the break-up of the French Empire and the fall of Napoleon III. It makes a very instructive and thoroughly readable gift book and the striking colour pictures of Mr. A. C. Michael add appreciably to its value. For boys and girls again is "The Story of Rome"¹ by Mary Macgregor. Miss Macgregor narrates carefully and alluringly the history of Rome from the earliest times to the death of Augustus—she has the true story-telling gift and makes a thrilling and absorbing tale of how Rome was born, and grew through storm and stress and gathered in power and splendour until it was the centre of a vast world-empire. There are twenty admirable colour plates illustrating notable incidents in Roman history. "Germany,"² the latest addition to Messrs. Black's deservedly successful colour-book series, is mainly concerned with Germany as it is to-day. The Rev. J. F.

Dickie describes the cities, the villages, and the country, the homes and haunts of its famous men, such as Luther, Goethe, Beethoven and Wagner, relates the old legends and tells something of the past history of the places he describes, and Messrs. E. T. and E. H. Compton have painted seventy-five beautiful, delicately finished pictures by way of illustration. This is an ideal guide-book, and we strongly recommend it to any who are desirous of learning to know Germany and the German people. More timely, and if anything larger in its scope and aim, is Mr. James Baker's "Austria: Her People and their Homeland."³ It is strange how little we know of Austria in this country—how few books have been written about it in the last half century. But Mr. James Baker has at length made ample amends for this neglect. He has travelled throughout Austria with Mr. Donald Maxwell, the artist, and has studied the home and business life of the varied parts of the Austrian Empire and the result is a soundly informing and thoroughly interesting book. Mr. Maxwell's numerous colour pictures are painted with rare skill and are full of life and atmosphere.

The heart of the child and the imaginations of primitive man seem to be very much alike all the world over. I have just been reading the "Folk-Tales of Bengal,"⁴ collected by the Rev. Lal Behari Day, and the "Myths and Legends of Japan,"⁵ by F. Hadland Davis, and you find them full of much the same gnomes and fairies, wicked giants or dwarfs, beautiful princesses and handsome lovers, and much the same marvellous and magic doings as have from old time delighted the children of our Western world. There are differences, of course, for such stories can be infinitely varied; the fairies, elves, and supernatural beings have strangely different

Photo. by Messrs. W. A. Mansell & Co., London.

From "Greuze and His Models" (Hutchinson).

Votive Offering.
(Wallace Collection, London.)

¹ "The Story of Rome." By Mary Macgregor. 20 Plates in Colour by Paul Woodroffe, W. Rainey and Dudley Heath 7s. 6d. net. (T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

² "Germany." Painted by E. T. and E. Harrison Compton. Described by J. F. Dickie. 20s. net. (A & C Black.)

³ "Austria: Her People and their Homeland." By James Baker. 48 Illustrations by Donald Maxwell. 21s. net. (John Lane.)

⁴ "Folk-Tales of Bengal." By the Rev. Lal Behari Day. 32 Illustrations by Warwick Goble. 15s. net. (Macmillan.)

⁵ "Myths and Legends of Japan." By F. Hadland Davis. 32 Full-page Illustrations by Evelyn Paul. 7s. 6d. net. (Harp.)

John Knox's House, High Street.
From "Edinburgh" (Seeley).

names, the magic of the tales may sometimes be more grotesquely or more imaginatively wonderful, but they are never so alien in matter or style, these fairy-stories of India and Japan, that an English child cannot be enthralled by them and believe in them. Mr. Day who wrote a memorable book on "Bengal Peasant Life," has travelled all about Bengal gathering up the old folk-tales from the lips of the natives, and these in his volume are some of "the old, old stories told by old Bengali women from age to age through a hundred generations." Mr. Hadland Davis has gathered his tales together from a wide variety of authentic sources, and it is enough to say that his tales and legends are as fantastically and characteristically Japanese as Mr. Day's are pensively or quaintly characteristic of the more sombrely imaginative Bengali. They are strange and fresh and freakishly fanciful and will appeal to our own children as fascinatingly as the German brothers Grimm or as our old familiar nursery legends do. The illustrations are exceptionally good; you have the luxury and brilliant colouring and blazing splendour of India in Mr. Warwick Goble's interpretations of "The Folk-Tales of Bengal"; and the softer lights, the quainter beauty, the grimmer, more grotesque terrors and gentler simplicities of the land of the chrysanthemum in Mr. Evelyn Paul's charming colour drawings for the "Myths and Legends of Japan."

Kinglake's "Eothen,"¹ with the wonderful Rembrandtesque pictures of Mr. Frank Brangwyn is unquestionably one of the finest of the season's art books. Brangwyn's paintings are so full of thought and life that they do not reveal all that is in them to a casual glance; their shadows are so subtly massed, that you need to look into some of his scenes until your eyes grow used to their magic darkness, then from the depths new and newer beauty glimmers and grows upon you, the shadows are alive with it, a sky that seemed only a streak of glooming blue shows presently a hint of stars in it, a landscape that seemed at first little more than a sombre smear reveals the shape and foliage of its trees, the forms of men moving across it, and at length the whole scene becomes as clear to you and as crowded with suggestion as if a cloud had gradually lifted from it. I am inclined to think that the paintings in this book are higher, rarer art than even "Eothen" itself is.

All the world knows the Greuze girl, as Mr. John Rivers says in "Greuze and his Art"² and "no one who has seen her can ever forget the sweet sting of her beauty," and he writes of her and her characteristics and the models from which Greuze painted her. His book is an unconventional biography; it tells in a very attractive, gossipy fashion the story of Greuze's life and loves, and gives a careful and illuminating study of his character and his art. It is an uncommonly able and interesting piece of work, and the forty-two full-page engravings of Greuze's paintings are most admirably reproduced.

Messrs. Bell have reissued in four separate and artistically bound volumes four more of the plays of Sir W. S. Gilbert that have already been published by them in collected form.³ With Mr. W. Russell Flint's charming illustrations, these are amongst the best and most desirable of gift-books. As a sort of recreation, perhaps, after the heavy labour of writing his "Life of Ruskin" Mr. E. T. Cook has written a delightful volume on "The Homes and Haunts of John Ruskin."⁴ The drawings in colour and black and white that illustrate it are by Miss E. M. B. Warren; when she was a beginner, Ruskin saw some of her work, and encouraged her with his advice, and after his death, says Mr. Cook, "she conceived the idea of making a pilgrimage in Ruskin's footsteps to the places where he lived or which he loved." Then Mr. Cook was asked to write an account of those homes and haunts, and the result, in reading and in pictures, is one of the happiest, most entertaining books of the kind that I have ever had the good fortune to come across.

A.

¹ "Kinglake's 'Eothen.'" Illustrated in Colour by Frank Brangwyn. 12s. 6d. net. (Sampson, Low & Co.).

² "Greuze and his Models." By John Rivers. With 45 Full-page Plates. 10s. 6d. net. (Hutchinson.)

³ "Princess Ida."—"The Gondoliers."—"Ruddigore."—"The Yeomen of the Guard." By Sir W. S. Gilbert. 3s. 6d. net each. (Geo. Bell & Sons.)

⁴ "The Homes and Haunts of John Ruskin." By E. T. Cook. With 28 Illustrations in Colour from Original Drawings, and 16 in Black and White by E. M. B. Warren. 21s. net. (Geo. Allen.)

"THE BOOKMAN" PRIZE COMPETITIONS. DECEMBER, 1912.

Answers to these competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing the name and address of the sender) should be forwarded not later than the 15th of the month to

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, Warwick Square, E.C.

- I.—A PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA is offered for the best original Lyric.
- II.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this number of THE BOOKMAN. Preference will be given to quotations of a humorous nature.
- III.—A PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is offered for the best original New Year's Greeting addressed to any living author, in not more than eight lines of verse.
- IV.—A PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best review in not more than one hundred words of any recently published book. Competitors should give the names of authors and publishers at head of their reviews.
- V.—A copy of THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for THE BOOKMAN Competitions. The Editor reserves the right to use any suggestions submitted.

We select for printing :

REVOIR.

I saw you after many years,
And you were weak and poor and old ;
There was no music in your voice,
Your greeting hands were shrunk and cold,
You had gleaned nothing from the years.

Yet there was music in your voice
When once you bade me wake and see
The wonder of the world around,
The glory of your love for me,—
And I shall always hear your voice

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

- I.—The PRIZE for the best LYRIC is divided, and HALF A GUINEA is sent to Mr. Toman Boothroyd, of Holmleigh, Batley, and HALF A GUINEA to Miss Margaret K. McEvoy, of 3, Claremont Road, Cricklewood, N.W., for the following :

IF LOVE ENDURE.

If Love endure, why weep, my Soul, for all
The little sorrows that beset our way ?
Why deck ourselves in desperate array ?
We may be sure
The sum of all our woes can be but small
If Love endure !

If Love endure, what count these little griefs
That beat against the portal of our fears,
And bring strange cups to carry off our tears ?
We are secure,
And they like wavelets beating at the reefs,
If Love endure.

Nay, Soul ! though dark the pathways we have trod,— Though darker still a little while they be,
Eyes dimmed with blinding tears shall not see Through ways obscure ;
Let us the meantime fill with songs to God
That Love endure.

TOMAN BOOTHROYD.

AUTUMN.

Farewell, my love, the autumn leaves are falling ;
The last pale rose has sighed itself to sleep ;
Hark ! that sad bird from yonder coppice calling
And calling,—while our souls call, deep to deep.

Since we are parting, love, we shall have pardon ;
So rest your soul though summer's flowers decay.
I think yon sad bird sang in Eden's garden
When those first lovers wept and went away ;

Yet they together went, and we go parted ;—
Love's summer blighted of its autumn sheaves.
Yon bird will mate ; but empty, broken-hearted,
We say farewell among the falling leaves.

MARGARET K. McEVoy.

Water-Melon Seller.

From "An Artist in Egypt" (Hodder & Stoughton).

"Through the grasses playing
Golden pipes they came,
Calling, ever calling
Robin by his name."

From "Elhn Song" (Blackie).

The wonder of the world around!
Godlike, you gave it me to hold,
A chalice for love's ecstasy.—
Pass on to-day, weak, poor and old,
I know you not,—
But where you stood, I kiss the ground.

(T. La Chard, 34, Kildare Terrace, Bayswater, W.)

TO LALAGE, A COQUETTE.

Mademoiselle, when I came in that day to you,
Little I recked you could do me an ill.
Life was a comedy; love was a play to you,
Men were your toys that you shattered at will Smiling you glanced at me, straightway I fell—
How did you manage it, Mademoiselle?

Mademoiselle, how you laughed at my love for you.
I, a poor dreamer deluded by June.
Thought I could reach to the heavens above for you,
Climbed up a cobweb to snatch at the moon.
Then the thread broke, and I dropped into—Hell! . .
Humorous, wasn't it, Mademoiselle?

Mademoiselle, it was only a game to you
All the world knows that the queen does no wrong,
If you have broken a heart, then small blame to you
How should you guess it was not over strong.
So I absolve you and—bid you farewell,
Give a good-day to you, Mademoiselle.

(D. Tweeddale, 8, Weld Road, Birkdale.)

From among the numerous Lyrics received, we specially commend those sent by Margaret McDonnell (Glasgow), Guenn, F., Newnham (Gillingham), Stanley Simpson (Birkenhead), Maud McDonald (Enfield), Mrs. Grenfell (Heavitree), David McCormack (Glasgow), Alice W. Linford (S. Tottenham), Joseph Poole Addey (Kingston-on-Thames), Robert Cogger (Dartford), Mrs. Shirley Thompson (Hythe), Alice Banks (South Shields), Eleanor Turnbull (Ecclefechan), Walter G. Priest (Norwich), W. W. Pope (Notting Hill), Rev. F. Balch (Welshpool), Lettie Cole (Pontrilas), Miss M. K. Wiens (London, S.E.), Will Londen (Dunfermline), C. A. Renshaw (Sheffield), A. J. Caird (Edinburgh), W. J. King (Catford), Emily Kington (Blairgowrie), John I. Leekie (Spennymoor), T. W. Maynard (London, W.), Frances Highmore (Exeter), L. Healy (Chapelizod), Evelyn I. Banks (Sheffield), E. W. Priest (Norwich), Monica Baines (Fleet), M. L. T. (New Milton), Nell Roy (London, N.W.), D. A. Robinson (London, S.E.), Margery S. Lewis (Folkestone), Bertram J. Saunders (Pontypridd), D. Hanbury (Bournemouth), Audrey Thompson (Hastings), Marion Cowall (Murrayfield), J. H. Gladwell (Worcester), Florence Bagster (Kendal), Wilfred Morris (Bodmin), D. K. Boileau (Bath), G. W. Turner (Burnley), Mary C. Jobson (Middleton-one-Row), Sybil H. Greves (Bournemouth), Robert Everall (Plais-tow), Agnes E. M. Baker (W. Hampstead), John Chapman (Bromley), L. M. Priest (Norwich), P. Selver (Redhill), G. J. Holme (Great Malvern), Sarah J. Cole (Nottingham), Miss M. M. Crump (Golder's Green), E. Irene Seaton (Dresden), Arthur Waghorn (Addiscombe), Isabel Lewis (Edinburgh), Arbel M. Aldous (Saffron Walden), Ellen J. Clutterbuck (Bromley), E. F. Seymour (Kilburn), M. A. (Wood Green), Miss A. E. Richardson (London, S.E.), J. E. Jones (Cardiff), H. R. Smith (Newcastle-on-Tyne), M. L. Davies (Harrogate), Phyllis Tweeddale (Southport), G. Lenorme (Bingley), N. D. Gullick (Bristol), W. H. Thompson (Birmingham), E. F. Parr (Bristol), Edwin Waters (Denmark Hill), G. G. Jackson (Northampton), W. Stonehouse (Linton, Kent), Percy Thomas (Hornsey), E. Close (Shanklin), Bernard Delorme (Canonbury), Fred E. Holt (Anerley), A. R. Williams (Worcester), Edward Griffiths (Liverpool), Ethel Tudge (Cricklewood), D. Le Febvre (Jersey), O. T. Scarfe (Sunderland), Dorothy Poole (Godalming), Annie M. Willcock (Scarborough), Clement H. Whitby (Yeovil), M. A. M. Marshall (Oxford), H. F. L. Cocks (Uxbridge), R. J. Preston (Norwich), B. Hughes (Llandudno), Mrs. Nevill Heard (Swanage), John Cadman (Southport), John Helston (London, S.W.), E. Hope (Bridlington), Keltie D. Dixon (Clapham), J. Drummond C. Monfries (London, S.W.), Dorothy G. Gibbings (Derby), Miss A. Clarke (High Wycombe), Donald R. Gooding (Southwold), R. King (Lewisham), Constance Goodwin (Clapham), Marjorie Ogle (Colne), C. S. Smith (New Cross), John M. Townsend (Hebden Bridge), A. S. Barnard (Walsall), J. H. Langlois (Roundhay), H. Elrington (Monkstown), D. H. R. Layton (Westgate), Esther M. Preston (London, W.), Miss E. M. Alston (Bury St. Edmunds), Florence M. Wilson (Bangor), M. G. Alexander (Maida Vale).

II.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to Miss Beatrice Craig, of Craigdanagh, Straidanan, Londonderry, Ireland, for the following:

A YEAR WITHOUT A CHAPERONE. By ELSIE M. CAWTHORNE. (John Long.)

"I sink dear mamma ought to know about dat!"

W. S. GILBERT—The Precocious Baby—

We also select for printing :

THE BLACKBERRY PICKERS. BY MISS ST. LEGER.
(Messrs. Putnam's Sons.)

"What, will these hands ne'er be clean?"

SHAKESPEARE.—Macbeth.

(Ernest A. Carr, Lyndall, Park Crescent, Tonbridge.)

THE WHITE COMPANY. BY SIR A. CONAN DOYLE.
(Smith, Elder & Co.).

"There's but a shirt and a half in all my Company"

SHAKESPEARE—King Henry IV.

(E. A. Pearson, Branksome Road, Fleet.)

III.—We have received a large number of Fairy Tales with morals touching on some prominent current topic, but unfortunately none reach publication standard. Most of them deal with the Woman's Suffrage question, and are not terse nor pointed enough. The best comes from Miss Nellie Strutt, of 11, Rose Villas, Devonshire Road West, Merton, to whom the PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS is awarded.

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best Review in not more than a hundred words is awarded to Mr. Edgar Frere, of Imperial Chambers, Cursitor Street, Chancery Lane, W.C., for the following :

THY ROD AND THY STAFF
BY ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER
BENSON. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

The vital interest of Mr. Benson's book lies in the fact that it is an analysis of the process known as "regeneration," written by a practical essayist. Five years ago the author had a nervous breakdown, and from this time he takes us, without a single jarring note, through an experience which "may not be an unusual one," but which left him, speaking broadly, with an entirely new point of view. And rightly he decided to share his experience with others. However painful self-revelation may be, there are cases when it is a duty—and this is one of them.

We also select for printing :

THE ROYAL ROAD. BY ALFRED OLLIVANT. (Methuen.)

All who love their fellow-should read this book. A young leather-worker, sure and gay as the true cockney, is gradually overcome in the relentless struggle of the modern industrial world, and falls a victim to tuberculosis. Hankey lives before us, typical of modern discontent and modern ideals: dazed and embittered by present injustice, but hopeful of a future in which Love shall adjust inequalities and the dreamer realise his vision. The story is told with exquisite sympathy and insight. Edward Hankey, his wife and child, and their great-hearted friends, Dr. and Miss English, are folk to love and remember.

(Muriel Barnard, 5, Victoria Terrace, Walsall.)

GEORGE BORROW: THE MAN AND HIS BOOKS.
BY EDWARD THOMAS.
(Chapman & Hall.)

In writing this new estimate of George Borrow, Mr. Thomas has adopted the only reasonable and sane method of treating this unique personality. Instead of clothing his hero with the notions and ideas of the present day, in order that we may place Borrow on a convenient stand in our own private literary gallery, the biographer has been at pains to relieve him of all the gauds that modern estimates have given him and, as a result, we see this wild gipsy figure in all his natural beauty and surroundings—just, indeed, as Borrow himself would have us see him.

(F. W. Lawfield, 39, Mill Road, Cambridge.)

THE JOYOUS ADVENTURES OF ARISTIDE PUJOL.
BY WILLIAM J. LOCKE. (At the Bodley Head.)

Aristide is a veritable son of Paragot, the Beloved Vagabond, inordinately possessed of the charm of Provençal gaiety, but lacking his "father's" philosophic vein. For Aristide, through all his adventures and misadventures, persists possessed of an irrepressible optimism, an unfailing joie de vivre. His company might work upon our nerves, his impertinences jar, were we his victims. But, reading, one cannot fail to enjoy the tale of this mountebank's presumptuous careers, whether in England or in France; for Mr. Locke, by his perfect touch of local and personal description, infects us with the charmingly irresponsible spirit of the children of Provence.

(J. Drummond C. Monfries, 313, Upper Richmond Road, Putney, S.W.)

Enter the Princess, reading.

From "Princess Ida" (Bell).

THE LEE SHORE. By ROSE MACAULAY.
(Hodder & Stoughton.)

Peter Margerison shoulders the burdens of others. He is one of the "Have-nots," nothing can he hold—luck, friendship, love—but, finally triumphant, he attains the lee-shore where he can "lose and laugh." Although we read the last pages with a lump in the throat, longing for happiness to come to him, we would not have it otherwise. Peter prosperous is unthinkable. We know that the failure is made of nobler stuff than Denis, the "Have," who wins everything, even taking from Peter his love Lucy. Sentiment is here, but it rings true; Miss Macaulay never stoops to sentimentality.

(Miss Bertha C. Priestley, 10, Great Ormond Street, London, W.C.)

ALGIERS, THE SAHARA AND THE NILE.
By RACHAEL HUMPHREYS. (W. J. Ham-Smith.)

A pleasant, simply-written account of a winter's journeying; absolutely unpretentious and with no straining after effect, though with an under-current of enthusiasm for "fresh fields and pastures new." It contains passages of unhackneyed description of scenes in the Near East that wake the longing in the reader to see for himself its brilliant colouring and vivid contrasts. The whole book is apparently written, without thought of publication, simply for the pleasure of living over again in memory the experiences of a pleasant journey, and its very simplicity of style makes the recital of interest to the world at large.

(Miss Henrietta M. Auden, Alderdene, Church Stretton.)

THE REVELATION OF GEORGE MEREDITH.*

By DR. WILLIAM BARRY.

LAST year we had Richard Wagner's life, told by himself with a frankness and a vivacity which carried the serious reading world by storm. Even those who imagined that they knew the man "intus et in cute," found that there was much they had not dreamt of, a greatness in doing and suffering of which his musical drama gave evidence indeed, but which it never could exhaust on the stage. Meredith, a name to endure in English prose certainly, perhaps in rhyme also, was hidden from his generation far more deeply than Wagner, by achievements as debatable, yet never, until his closing period, known except as curiosities to the public at large. Whether that public does anything but pretend to read his works now, I should not like to pronounce. But they are published and sold to an extent which would have amazed the Victorian England of 1866; and in these Letters we come almost suddenly upon the man himself. A very great man, cast in a mould heroic and magnificent; not English, far from conventional, impassioned, resolute, affectionate, reserved, and not to be mistaken for another in the long gallery of those celebrities most of whom outrivalled his fame while they lived, yet cannot from henceforth eclipse him where he moves in his own sphere.

It is no slight tribute when reviewers (though they will sometimes clutch at any adjective to make a sentence) are led towards the word "Shakespearean" in speaking of dead greatness. Yet the quiet, unceasing display of intellectual power in Meredith's correspondence has prompted more than one critic to venture on those canonizing syllables, as if an epitaph not unfit for the daring and sure thinker who could never be taken off his guard. As a story-teller Meredith did not enter into his kingdom. He was wanting in the gift of narrative, the flow or the epic simplicity by which a tale comes trippingly on the tongue. Not on this account will he be likened to the king of dramatists. But the spark of life was in his creations; and, in the mind that visibly brooded over them, a concentration of thought sometimes almost terrifying showed how beyond formal philosophy there may be in romance a depth, a range, recalling the secret potencies of Nature itself, shaping men and women to fulfil their doom. It is the same strong intellect, in earnest or at play, that has thrown off these letters without an effort, and that betrays the peculiar affinity with Shakespeare. Thus, we say, he might have written between his productions at the Globe, to close friends, with an irresistible spirit or a piercing pathos, acting his own life tragically in pensive mood, yet again taking it as a frolic, but always getting his terms out of events and his profit for reflection.

* "Letters of George Meredith." Collected and Edited by his Son. 2 Vols. 21s. net. (Constable & Co.)

From "Homes and Haunts of Ruskin" (Allen).

Bonneville and the Brezon.

Tragically, one must repeat. The letters do not attempt a task which Meredith perhaps would have rather left undone. They give us no biography in a complete sense. And the discreet editor is sparing of elucidations. A very fine problem-play might be constructed on the lines of Meredith's experiences from first to last. His ancestry, including "the great Mel" of "Evan Harrington"; his religious training in a Moravian school at Neuwied on the Rhine; his adventures when a young man adrift from home as a London journalist; here, surely, we discern the opening chapters of a career not destined to be common. His marriage with Mrs. Nicholls, daughter of Thomas Love Peacock, follows, and it turns to disaster. Was he thinking of his first wife when he ascribed to Diana of the Crossways her beauty, irrepressible wit, and married troubles? We are told that it was "diamond cut diamond," with Meredith and his too gifted partner. The sad incidents are spared us. Left with his little son, this Richard Feverel (for the most Shakespearean of his characters is himself) fronts life boldly, is wrapped up in the child, almost dies when he is hurt; and, with poetry cherished as his true calling, he offers to England novels which it will not look at. His letters to the fascinating Dr. Jessop, the boy's schoolmaster, who has so much more of his presence than the father can get, are beautiful. And all through Arthur's boyhood there is the sense of a very perfect devotion lavished on him with exquisite tenderness. We do not anticipate the later years when this young man turned into his own path, travelled aloof from his father, and estrangement came. The end is melancholy. How difficult does genius make the common life! The philosophy which sees in great original men something abnormal may take illustration from this obscurely indicated story of Meredith and his eldest son. It is a page for Schopenhauer. Happily, in the second marriage love found its reward.

From "Germany" (Black).

Cochem.

But, fail as he might to charm the novel reader and to win his son's confidence, the strong man never drooped. He was in various ways an unbeliever even of a violent sort, taking delight in his Bradlaugh, then vociferous, almost French-Jacobin when he touched on orthodox articles of belief, and enthusiastic for John Morley's first aggressive manner, long since given up by Viscount Morley of Blackburn. "O Meredith," one can scarcely help exclaiming, "great is thy agnostic faith, yet not so great as thou deemest!" He belonged to a passing group of sentimental rebels against Christian dogma, of whom Leslie Stephen, Admiral Maxse, Cotter Morrison, may be quoted as instances; while Lord Morley and Mr. Frederic Harrison remain to tell a later age what many Liberals thought about religion forty years ago. These all achieved renown; but perhaps their most remarkable quality was a turn for friendship, a kindness in private life that has endeared them to wide circles in which their doctrines meet scanty welcome or none at all. Meredith, not troubled by the proverbial shyness of the English temper at which he so pleasantly smiled, was in the glory and triumph of his attachments an Elizabethan, not a modern. His worship of Admiral Maxse paused only a little way on this side of idolatry. His lively boy-like fun with Sir William Hardman has many a surprising caper that will remind us of Charles Lamb or of Lewis Carroll. He is always ready to make friends. But his finest inspirations, as we might expect, descend upon the creator of Clara Middleton and her compeers when he is writing to women. All the world has been lately enchanted with reminiscences from the pen of Mrs. Janet Ross; and the letters addressed to that name in the present volumes will be studied eagerly.

For deep sustained observations, running almost into a system, we may turn to the correspondence with Lady Ulrica Baring, which abounds in them. To Miss Alice Brandreth, afterwards Mrs. J. G. Butcher; to his daughter, Mrs. Sturgis; to his grand-daughter, Dorothy, words grave and gay, wise and laughter-provoking, are sent freely, without a dream of publication, by the man whose greatness did not depend on acknowledgment, but, making him a sovereign in his own right, gave him liberty of speech where and how he would. He admired yet sharply criticised Tennyson, too much in his Idylls—a drawing-room poet. He defied Ruskin's claims to autocracy. In mood, at last, he was an austere loyal believer, without hope for anything personal after death, but still a believer, in the reason and the justice by which the universe is carried forward. So, at all events, I construe George Meredith. As for these letters, they furnish at once his monument and his revelation. Whatever may be lost of his writings, they will survive and he in them.

THE POETRY OF GEORGE MEREDITH.*

BY ALICE MEYNELL.

GEORGE MEREDITH as a poet teaches explicitly; as a novelist implicitly, or with a word indirect, a look askance, and by means of a lesson rehearsed for our observation rather than spoken for our conning. But in prose and verse he teaches, and in verse emphatically, with reiteration, and insistence, and the announcement of a law, "Thou shalt love thy mother Nature with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength. Thou shalt put thy whole trust in her. She is benign even when she seems cruel, albeit she loves thee not at all." This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it: "Thou shalt not love thyself." It is chiefly in poetry that this law can be delivered; for in poetry personification is not only permitted, it is prescribed. Meredith proclaims a personal Nature, and predicates of her the "intention," the "wish," the "aim," the "care," the "will." We are compelled to ask ourselves, How much is philosophy, and how much is poetry? Would Meredith, in prose, attribute this foresight, this intention à parte ante to the lawgiver—Nature, who made the law of the survival of the fittest, for example? All men recognize and confess the law in action and after action; Meredith, the poet, recognizes it as a design, as it were, before action. Paley's is not a more respectful recognition; but Paley does not use the feminine pronoun. Now the question, How much is philosophy, and how much is poetry? is obviously very important to the students of Meredith's philosophy, less momentous to the readers of his poetry; let me be allowed to cite one personal recollection in this case. This is that Mr. Meredith habitually used the same forms of speech and of thought in the prose of conversation: Nature "does not care," and "Nature's intention," "Nature's only wish," and phrases of like significance.

Honouring the personality of a law-giver, Meredith observes the law of the lives of animals and vegetables upon earth, submits his intellect to all that seems unkind or imperfect there, accepts all, loves all, and gives back to all his own blessing as a creature. It is when he professes to draw from Nature the tables of the moral law that we question the poet who limits himself, who circumscribes himself, by the art of poetry, who takes refuge, as it were, in its imagery, who encloses himself within the boundaries of the art, and also gives himself the liberties of the fancy without which poetry is not poetry. Meredith professes, in verse and rhyme and imagery, to find all moral law in the Earth, our only visible friend, our only teacher, the only revelation of whatever Power—

"The great Unseen, never the dark Unknown—"

St. Francis Preaches to the Birds.

From "The Book of Saints and Heroes" (Longmans).

* "The Poetical Works of George Meredith." With Notes by G. M. Trevelyan. 7s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

is above and beyond her. "Never the dark unknown," because that Power has revealed itself in Nature. I say "professes" advisedly. I cannot see that he does more. Meredith loved the unit—the child, the friend; the Nature he adored loves only the species much, the genus more, the unit not at all. An inexplicable love—for love, personal love, he predicates of her—which enthusiastically and aforethought provides for the multiplication of units she cares nothing for! The question of revelation is all. The definite religions are for another system; asserting that morality—if it does not begin where Nature leaves off—develops, corrects, alters, chastises the revelation of the earth and her laws. They aver that Meredith's "great Unseen" is not "the dark Unknown" because when the consciousness of moral good and evil was established—established for ever—in man, and in man alone, a direct appeal to that consciousness, now become conscience, became the chief necessity of the world, and—in several forms—took place. Morality is assuredly the greatest fact on Earth; but, as assuredly, Earth does not suffice for it. In our human kind we have all seen some foolish little mother looking with unintelligent wonder upon an illustrious son. If Earth is, as Meredith will have her, the mother of Morality, then is Morality such an alien son.

To his love of the Earth—the heart-whole, all-trusting, optimistic, courageous, submissive love he bore her—we owe Meredith's most wonderful poems. To the woods, on the moss, on the track of wild life, with exquisite tenderness, with joy such as human happiness fails to inspire in hearts less exquisite than his, with rapture of heart, without a "whimper" for the pain he found there, but with a valorous pity, this great poet betook himself. He counted all the cost of his love and his creed. Much that is human he overcame within himself, or thought that he overcame. The peace he found was not without an agonising novitiate. Some solitary crucifixion of the heart, such as his great contemporary, Coventry Patmore, underwent in a man's love for women, Meredith underwent in his love of the woods. Patmore's poem—the struggle over—is of heavenly grief, Meredith's, of earthly rapture. And both were spiritual men, and knew man to be a spirit. With a heart so subdued at once and so ennobled, Meredith faced the facts of Nature, using the incomparable alertness and sweetness of his observation, and using it with a strange delicacy; for the urbanity of his character, so constant in his letters, so charming in his manners, was his in the enchanted woods. Urbanity is a pleasantly paradoxical word to use in regard to one who dared thus to trust his own mind with the problem of wild life. But George Meredith was the most civilized of men. "Civilized" was with him a favourite word in commendation of his friends. No professed lover of country life, having half Meredith's love for it, has had half his urbanity. And he knew—and conquered his grief in knowing—that the wild thing must go down before the cultivated. He compelled himself to acquiesce in the killing of the young fox; though, for my part, I think he need not have so subdued his heart as to consent to "sport." And his own bearing observed the perfection of manners; it belonged to the time, gone by now, when it was permissible to speak of manners; he practised even the little tricks of that time—worth remembering because they were significant—and had an obvious dislike of the more modern bearing and address in which manners are, as it were, negative; with him they were positive. And even thus he cherished the worm, the snake, the bird, the seasons, and the wildest of all the winds.

The Jelly Fish and the Monkey.

From "Myths and Legends of Japan" (Harrap).

It is rightly that the true student of this great poet gives almost his whole attention to the philosophy—"my philosophy" he called it with grave appropriation—for the sake of which nearly all his poetry was written. Nearly, but not all. Outside of this persistent "Reading of Earth," and sermon on the text of the reading, are the great dramatic poems, "Attila," "Napoléon," and other "Poems of Tragic Life," in which action and passion brandish a vitality of words altogether amazing; and the quieter but no less vital drama of "Modern Love," "Love in a Valley," and their kind. And here, and throughout, appears, conspicuous, not fantastic, not habitual, not disproportionately exhibited, a marvellous vocabulary. Perhaps no reader pauses necessarily upon Meredith's vocabulary, for there is no obvious research in its high distinction (let us except some of the Odes on French history). It is to what I dare to call the pocket vocabulary of such poets as Swinburne that our unwilling attention is compelled. So with Meredith as a metrist. There are refinements in the mere mechanism of his verse—the punctual relation of syllables, for example, at the conclusion of one line and the beginning of the next—such as I have not found in any other poet, Shakespeare always excepted. To make an unwilling comparison of different arts, the "music" of Swinburne seems a tune, while Meredith's is a melody. It is, therefore, as a singer of words, among other and greater qualities, that George Meredith stands among the score of major poets of our incomparable literature.

Mr. Trevelyan's edition is a masterpiece of knowledge and care.

MRS. GASKELL'S BIRTHPLACE.

BY MRS. ELLIS H. CHADWICK.

THE glory of England centres largely around her literary shrines, as is testified by the number of pilgrims from all parts of the world who flock to the haunts and homes associated with authors whose works have enriched our literature. It is the birthplace of a great man or woman which naturally claims the first consideration in these pious pilgrimages. For nearly half a century the devotees of Mrs. Gaskell have had to be content with the scanty information regarding her birthplace which appeared in the biographical sketches in the Dictionary of National Biography, and the Encyclopædia Britannica, written from information supplied by the members of Mrs. Gaskell's family. Here it was merely stated that the author of "Cranford" was born in Lindsey Row, Chelsea. This, of course, was too indefinite, and many who were interested in Mrs. Gaskell and her works have long wished to know the exact house in which she was born. As the name Lindsey Row has now almost passed into oblivion, few even of the oldest inhabitants of Chelsea can locate it to-day, for previous to the celebration of the Gaskell Centenary in September, 1910, when I gave an account of Mrs. Gaskell's birthplace,* many, including troops of Americans, I am told, had to leave Chelsea, with its wealth of literary associations, without satisfying their desire to gaze on the very house in which Mrs. Gaskell first saw the light.

Unfortunately, Mrs. Gaskell's own daughters have never been able to help materially in the matter. All that they knew was that their mother was born in a modest house in Lindsey Row, on the Thames Embankment, and that the house had a small enclosed forecourt. This was a remembrance they cherished from a drive which they had with their mother some time before her death.

* Mrs. Gaskell: Haunts Homes and Stories. (Pitman.)

In response to many appeals, and also for their own satisfaction, Mrs. Gaskell's daughters, some years ago, employed a specialist to explore Chelsea, with the object of locating their mother's birthplace, but the search was unsuccessful, and it was concluded that further efforts were useless. It is not surprising that Mrs. Gaskell's daughters did not know the house in which their mother was born, for she died very suddenly and quite unexpectedly at Holybourne, Hants, in November, 1865, and her daughters had always lived in Manchester, except when at boarding school.

Although so much has been said about Mrs. Gaskell's wish not to have her life written, I have always cherished an idea that in the beautiful and quiet home at Holybourne, which Mrs. Gaskell had purchased with the proceeds of her last novel, "Wives and Daughters," she would have written her own life story, much on the lines of that of her friend Mrs. Fletcher, which was printed at first for private circulation only. If that had been so, we should have had a description of her birthplace, and probably an authoritative reply to the hard criticism which was levelled at the head of the biographer of Charlotte Brontë, for I have good reasons for stating that what Mrs. Gaskell wrote regarding the Brontë home was obtained from what she considered to be absolutely reliable sources, and she concluded that it was perfectly accurate in every detail.

It was generally believed that the house in which Mrs. Gaskell was born had been demolished, but I have proved beyond a shadow of doubt that Mrs. Gaskell was born on September 29th, 1810, in a house which is now known as 93, Cheyne Walk, Chelsea. There she lived for the first nine months of her life, after which her parents removed to 3, Beaufort Row in June, 1811. This house

Old Lindsey Row, Chelsea (now Cheyne Walk).

From a water colour painting by W. W. Burges in the Chelsea Free Library.

Photo by Percival
M. Chantwick.

93, Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, the birthplace of Mrs. Gaskell.

has since been demolished to make room for the Beaufort Mansions in Beaufort Street. It was at 3, Beaufort Row that her mother died at the end of October, 1811, and the year-old baby was taken to live with her Aunt Lumb at Knutsford. Afterwards, when about fourteen years of age, she was sent to school at Stratford-on-Avon, and three years later she returned to Chelsea to nurse her father, who had been stricken with paralysis. After nearly two years suffering he died, leaving his second wife with two children, Catherine and William. This sad two years was the only part of the Chelsea life that Mrs. Gaskell could remember. Unfortunately, the stepmother and Elizabeth Cleghorn Stevenson—to give Mrs. Gaskell her maiden name—were almost strangers to each other previous to the father's illness, and the beautiful young daughter had a trying time during the two years she lived at Chelsea. This is probably the reason she did not visit more frequently in later life the haunts of her birthplace, for, in one of her letters to Mary Howitt, in 1838, she says: "Long ago I lived in Chelsea occasionally with my father and stepmother, and very, very unhappy I used to be; and if it had not been for the beautiful, grand river, which was an inexplicable comfort to me, and a family of the name of Kennett, I think my child's heart would have broken."

It is now nearly fifty years since Mrs. Gaskell died, and the approach of the Gaskell Centenary in 1910 caused many interesting facts to be brought to light, which otherwise would probably have passed into oblivion. Previous writers, however, who referred to

Mrs. Gaskell's life had to recognise that her actual birthplace was unknown, and they simply quoted the vague reference from the Dictionary of National Biography and the Encyclopædia Britannica. Finding that relatives and friends of Mrs. Gaskell could not help me, in February, 1909, I wrote to the London County Council, which has always been interested in the literary landmarks of London. The reply was that the Memorial Committee had previously investigated the matter, and had come to the conclusion that the house had been demolished about the year 1830. Curiosity prompted me, however, to visit the part of Chelsea which was associated with Mrs. Gaskell's birth.

My first difficulty was to find Lindsey Row, and after interviewing no less than seven of the old residents of Chelsea, including antiquarians and authors who dealt with the history of "the little village of palaces," I was unable to determine which part of Cheyne Walk was once known as Lindsey Row. After consulting old maps and plans in the Chelsea

Copyright.
By permission of the London County Council.

Design of the Medallion to be fixed on the birthplace of Mrs. Gaskell.

Copyright.
By permission of the Registrar General.

Birth Certificate of Elizabeth Cleghorn Stevenson (Mrs. Gaskell).

Library, I concluded that it extended from the corner of Beaufort Street, formerly Beaufort Row, to the end of Milman Street—thirteen houses in all. My next point was to be quite sure which of these thirteen houses had been rebuilt, for I was still under the impression that the Memorial Committee of the London County Council had good evidence to support their conclusion. My own limited knowledge of architecture convinced me that, judging by appearances, all the houses were old, and none of them seemed to have been rebuilt as recently as 1830. To confirm my opinion I was fortunate in being permitted to search the old rate books of Chelsea from the year 1777, the year in which Mrs. Gaskell's birthplace was built. In the rate books I found that Lindsey Row consisted of twelve houses, described as "in or near Beaufort Gardens."

The following is a copy of the Register of Rates for the September quarter of 1810—the time of Mrs. Gaskell's birth.

LINDSEY ROW

Rateable Value	Tenant	Rates paid: £ s d.
£23	Captain McKilwaine
£20	William Stephens	0 18
£60	Mary Smith	3 2

The "William Stephens" is a clerk's error, as I explained in my article on "The Mother of the Author of 'Cranford'" published in the January Number of THE BOOKMAN for 1912; the entry should have been William Stevenson, which is the name of Mrs. Gaskell's father, who appears afterwards in the rate books as Stephenson, and also as Stevenson. Continuing my research, I found that "William Stevens" (Stevenson) took possession of the house at the Midsummer half-quarter of 1809, paying six shillings as his proportion of the rate for that quarter. At this time I also found a William Stephenson was appointed keeper of the Records in the Treasury office, which was the position Mrs. Gaskell's father held in London. In the old Chelsea Directory, William Stephenson is entered as a tenant in Lindsey Row. In the rate books, Mr. Stevenson's name appeared as the twelfth in the list of tenants of Lindsey Row, Miss Smith occupying the thirteenth—the large house known as Belle Vue House, with a rateable value £60, whilst Captain McKilwaine was the tenth, and was rated on £23. These three houses are still assessed in the same ratio, though their values have risen considerably. I had thus proved that William Stevenson lived next to Belle Vue House, which was then the corner house in Lindsey Row, and from the rate books of 1822 I found that Thomas E. Flood built Belle Vue Cottage, adjoining Belle Vue House, which now stands at the corner of Beaufort Street, Chelsea.

The fact that William Stevenson lived next to Belle Vue House was a great help in tracing the birthplace of Mrs. Gaskell, both backwards and forwards in the rate books, which were not kept so methodically in those days as they are now. In order to find the date when the house was built, I traced its history back to 1777, when the words "A new house empty," appear in the rate book, and opposite is the name of Captain McKilwaine, the ground landlord, as I found by consulting the present owner, who holds the title deeds which are dated 1777 and which prove that the land was bought by Mr. John Hatchett from Captain McKilwaine, though the land on which the next house was built belonged to Lord Cadogan.

I had now evidence that Mrs. Gaskell's father lived at the house which was 12, Lindsey Row according to the rate books, though the two houses adjoining Belle Vue House came to be known as Nos. 1 and 2, Belle Vue as the old sign-plate on the wall still shows.

My next point was to discover when the house built in 1777 had, according to the information I had received, been demolished. The rate books up to 1827 showed that the house was occupied by different tenants, for William Stevenson removed from 12, Lindsey Row, to 3, Beaufort Row, in June 1811. In the September quarter of the year 1827, in the space where the tenant's name usually appears, was a large cross in pencil, and the words "To be left blank until occupied." In 1828, 1829 and 1830 there was a blank, and in 1831 the letter E. (for empty, I presume) appeared; but in the June quarter of 1834 a Mr. Felix Whitmore was entered as tenant.

I am told by an old resident of Chelsea, that although the house was entered as empty in the rate books for no less than seven years, Mr. Charles Hatchett, an antiquarian and collector, who was the owner of the house, and owner and occupier of Belle Vue House next door, used it as a store house for his large collection of pictures, bric-à-brac, etc., and this seems to be borne out by the fact that Mr. Hatchett paid an additional rate during those years. From June, 1834, the house has been tenanted, and for several years, Mr. Caröe, the well-known architect to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, lived next door, and his conclusion that the house had been built before 1830 helped to prove the case.

The fact that the house was not credited with rates

Photo by Warwick Brooks, Manchester.

Elizabeth Cleghorn Stevenson (Mrs. Gaskell) before her marriage.

From a miniature painted in Edinburgh about 1830.

for some years evidently led previous investigators to conclude that it had been demolished, although at the time it was only fifty years old. The title deeds show that the father of the present owner bought the house in 1851, and that it was an old house when he purchased it. The title deeds and the evidence derived from the rate books both prove that the present 93, Cheyne Walk, formerly 1, Belle Vue and previous to that 12, Lindsey Row, is the actual house in which Mrs. Gaskell was born.

The Chelsea rate books have been transferred to the Town Hall, but in the summer of 1909, when I spent two days examining them, they were kept at the office of the Board of Guardians. It was unfortunate that Mrs. Gaskell's birth certificate merely stated that she was born in Belle Vue, Chelsea, but as no number is given, it does not help in determining which of the four houses now known as Belle Vue was the actual birthplace, nor does it prove that the house now known as 93, Cheyne Walk is the one described as Belle Vue, Chelsea, so that without the title deeds and the evidence of the rate books, the birth certificate does not prove the actual birthplace to be in existence, though it settles the question of the date.

The many devotees of the author of "Cranford" will be glad to know that as a result of my investigations, the Memorial Committee of the London County Council has decided to place a bronze memorial tablet on 93, Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, to commemorate the birthplace of Mrs. Gaskell. The design has been decided, and the tablet will shortly be fixed on the house.

Mrs. Gaskell was proud of being "a Londoner by birth" and though London has been tardy in establishing this literary landmark, yet it will be the first memorial tablet fixed to a house occupied by the author of "Cranford" and the distinguished biographer of Charlotte Brontë. Knutsford has its Gaskell Tower in quaint King Street; Manchester has its Gaskell Collection of the author's works, housed in the Moss Side Library, and there is a memorial tablet to the memory of Mrs. Gaskell in the Unitarian Chapel, Cross Street, Manchester. Chelsea will shortly add one more to its list of literary shrines, and will thus mark in a fitting manner the birthplace of one of the greatest women writers of the Victorian era.

New Books.

THE LOEB SERIES OF TRANSLATIONS FROM THE CLASSICS.*

Every humanist will sympathize with the aims of the enterprising founder of this series. Mr. Loeb, in the general preface which is prefixed to each volume, tells us that the idea of this Library was suggested to him by Mr. Salomon Reinach, the French savant, and that his imagination was deeply stirred by the thought that in it "might be found a practical and attractive way to revive the lagging interest in ancient literature which has for more than a generation been a matter of so much concern to educators." That the combination of text and translation on pages facing each other is both practical and attractive cannot be gainsaid. It is that of the Didot series and of others that Mr. Loeb cites. The standard English edition of Sophocles is a familiar example, and within recent times it has been adopted in two editions of Catullus. Mr. Loeb has secured for his scheme the countenance of an "Advisory Council" of an international character in a body of ten scholars of acknowledged position, which does not however include any Latinist of the first rank (for Prof. W. G. Hale of Chicago counts chiefly as a grammarian); and, as general editors, Mr. T. E. Page and Dr. W. H. D. Rouse, whose capacity to direct an undertaking that has both literary and educational importance requires no proving to an English public. Nor (to speak here of externals) has the Library been less fortunate in its printers. The type and paper are excellent, the pages of a convenient size and the volumes handy to hold. The only fault to be found is that the lines of verse should have been numbered in accordance with common practice in five's, and not in ten's, which makes it more difficult to find one's place.

The terms of the general preface, and the contents of the first ten volumes, raise directly the question: "What should a translation be?" and both of these suggest that to this question there is more than one answer. Some of the translations are new; others are revisions of older ones.

Mr. Way's Euripides is in verse; Mr. Butler's Propertius in prose. It is clear that there should be some reason for these disparities either in the essential theory of translation itself or in the conditions of its application. Translation on the old lines has been compared to engraving; its operations are minute, punctilious and slow. But the methods of our modern paraphrast, the plaything of the reaction against literality, may be compared to the scene-painter's. His reproductions are lively and true, provided you do not look too close. Details must be sacrificed, lines thickened and colours heightened, to suit the position of the spectator. When a translation of this kind is placed side by side with the original, of which it professes to be a copy, dissatisfaction is sure to arise and to create a sense of discomfort, which will be great if the reproduction is seen to be false as well as inadequate. Let me illustrate the risk of this from Mr. Sargeant's version of Terence. The slaves in Terence consistently address their masters by name; Mr. Sargeant as consistently renders the proper name by "Sir." This modernizing certainly gives greater life to the translation, and just as certainly it obliterates a characteristic touch of ancient manners, which may be paralleled from the modes of address current in certain towns in the North of England. And we may be content with Davus's "Seems to me a damned improbable story," till we compare it with "mi quidem hercle non fit ueri simile" Andr., l. 224. Fidelity, not force, must be the first aim of the translator, and his guiding principle should be that of all idiomatic renderings of his original the one nearest to that original is best.

The use of an archaic translation is exposed to dangers of its own. It practically interposes another medium between our mental vision and its object. To change the metaphor, the genuine flavour of antiquity is dashed with Elizabethan or Jacobean sauce. In the translation of "St. Augustine's Confessions," adapted by Dr. Rouse, this makes itself felt less than it would elsewhere owing to the prevalence of the symbolic and the traditional in the expression of religious emotions.

As for the translation of verse, far harder task than that of prose, I am with those who hold, as Conington did, that the metrical form of an original is a feature which the translator is bound to preserve—if he can; and so I welcome the inclusion in the series of a Euripides in verse. Failing this, and, unhappily, in many cases it must remain a counsel of perfection, I think that the rendering of a verse original should be differentiated in rhythm from prose; and I am glad to see that, consciously or unconsciously, Mr. Butler's version of Propertius has to a large extent been influenced by this consideration.

* The Loeb Classical Library. Edited by T. E. Page, M.A., and W. H. D. Rouse, Litt.D. First 10 volumes. Cloth 5s. net; Leather 6s. 6d. net, each volume. (Heinemann.)

The Preface claims, and emphasises the claim by italics, that the Library will consist of "a uniform series of the best texts." Unless the phrase is the offspring of inexperience or a too sanguine temperament, it is to be understood in the qualified sense of the best texts available. The texts issued in the first instalment are on the whole reasonably good texts; but to ask them to be taken as the best texts possible would be to ask too much.

Mr. F. C. Conybeare has translated the "Life of Apollonius of Tyana" by Philostratus, the letters ascribed to Apollonius and the pamphlet in which the biography and its subject are the subject of a criticism by Eusebius. The text which he follows in all but some six passages is Kayser's second one. Kayser had improved it after the criticisms of Cobet in Vol. VIII. of "Mnemosyne"; but he might have improved it more, and Mr. Conybeare would have done well to accept a number of the great Dutch scholar's suggestions. That Philostratus did not use the base form καταδραθέντες II. 36 fin., is shown by the correct infinitive καταδραθῆν in the previous chapter. In VI. 25, Kayser, in ignorance, perhaps, of the ease with which βοράν could be confused with ἀγοράν in Greek cursive, rejects that correction for his own much more improbable change of βρώσεως to κράσεως, and thus gives us an unheard-of appellation for a tribe, "the elephant-sellers," in place of the "elephant-eaters," for which there are numerous analogies, and one, "the man-eaters," in the very next sentence. We might, too, have been spared Kayser's sins against metre (Empedocles, ap. I. i., II., 4.451, ap. V. 26). Mr. Conybeare's translation is pleasant to read. It renders the "light" touch of his author; and, apart from a certain redundancy and concession to the fashionable laxity, and occasional slips, e.g., at I. 7, where the young eagles are said "to snuff the quarry," instead of the odour of the burnt-offering, and ib., 24 p. 72, where Eretria and Athens are seemingly both made "neighbours of Eubœa," it is sufficiently exact. Perhaps one may regret his adoption of the tiresome and out-of-date habit of prefixing "O" to the vocatives.

Dr. Rouse adopts the translation of "St. Augustine's Confessions" by W. Watts, published in 1631. The Latin is given almost invariably by the text of Knöll (Teubner). The bibliography does not mention the apparently still unfinished edition by F. Ramorino, 1909, nor, a stranger omission, Gibb's and Montgomery's commentary (Cambridge, 1908). The text of Knöll is a sound one, though he was too much enamoured of one particular manuscript. But it is not immaculate; thus in VI. 8. peruiam = obuiam is required by the sense. Nor was it the text of Watts; and Dr. Rouse has not removed all the discrepancies thus arising between the Latin and the English. Three instances of this occur in the chapter already cited; the words (1) et ibi constituistis; (2) oculos (after peruit); and (3) prius before abductus est translated by Watts are not to be found in Knöll.

Dr. Rouse shows a commendable reluctance to alter much in the version he has taken; but he appears to expect from ordinary readers his own familiarity with our earlier English. To such "recollecting myself out of that broken condition" (II. 1) will only seem bizarre; but "abler" for opulentiorum, ib., 3 and "calumnies," (VI. 3) for calumniarum where "cavils" is meant, are likely to mislead. In the latter case there is no possible objection to the change, as "cavilling" is given for calumniosorum in Ch. 5. Retouching in these respects need not have impaired the literary quality of the version.

Mr. Way's two volumes include nine of the plays attributed to Euripides. His text is of the kind that is often called "safe." To take the beginning of the "Helena," he rightly rejects the correction of Nauek at 112, but wrongly that of Wecklein, at 354, and of Verrall at 381. Examples from the "Troades" are his retention of ἡμῶν (474) and ἐκείνοι without an obelus (1188). His translation in verse was already known and favourably esteemed; it has now been improved by "many hundreds of corrections." The spirit and vigour of much of it is notable, and in the dialogue it often reaches, and usually approaches, the goal of faithful translation. But in the choric portions his rhyming and double rhyming prevent him from achieving this result. Sometimes, indeed—as in the commos of the "Iph. Taur.", 153–169—Mr. Way surprises us by the deftness with which, in spite of all, he renders the Greek; but more often his glittering phrases and resonant lines are a long way from the original. The risks that dog a free translation may be shown by one example. In "Electra," 730, Euripides describes how light fled from the sight of Thyestes' crime; Zeus turned back "the bright face of the Dawn." Mr. Way, repeating an error of Paley, who renders "grey," expands this into "the misty eyes of the morning grey," a wholly false image. Mr. Way takes most licence in his translation, or rather travesty, of the "Cyclops," now published for the first time. He has missed the significance of the satyric drama which was burlesque, not comedy, and still less farce. That he has missed it, a comparison with Shelley's incomplete translation will show, or the mere consideration of such phrases as these: "All right. Fetch out your cheeses and your mutton" (162). "Paris' gaudy bags" (182). "Callooh! Callay!" (464). "His teeth are foul wi' flesh o' man! He's damned to hell for a' that!" (374).

Terence is naturally associated with Westminster School, which, in Mr. John Sargeant, has supplied the series with a very competent workman. His text is sound. In the first 800 lines of the "Hautontimorumenos" there is, perhaps, nothing to evoke protest beyond his rejection of Bentley's reading at 125; and if the prominence given in the Preface to a violent emendation of "Andria," 940–1, brings a Westminster Latinist into too close a proximity to that great scholar, this is only a mistimed offering to the genius of the place. Mr. Sargeant's uneasy devotion to the traditions of an institution that has not yet wholly shed its mediæval slough may have prejudiced some of his critical and literary judgments, as when he disputes, on an irrelevant issue, the estimate of Terence by Caesar; but it has not injured his translation. This, in the style of the older rather than of the most recent English comedy, is spirited, terse and euphonious; a rendering both readable and actable. In the main, it is faithful too, though sometimes exactness is sacrificed to other considerations. I will take one case where the loss is greater than the gain. In "Hautont," 379, saltem salutare is rendered "Just one kiss." But Clitophon does not ask Syrus to let him kiss Bacchis, only give her good-day, and Syrus will not trust him even so far.

Having had to translate a considerable part of Propertius myself I sympathize with Mr. Butler in the task that has been allotted to him. The selection of the author of the only complete commentary in English since Paley was a very natural one; but Mr. Loeb was ill-advised in including this author in the first instalment of his Library. Propertian scholars, at accord on little enough, would, no doubt, agree that texts produced under present conditions have little chance of permanence. In such circumstances the translator's lot is a hard one. He cannot take refuge in silence, so often the shelter of the nonplussed editor and commentator. He must face the dismal choice between perverse translation and unsatisfying correction. Mr. Butler's text of 1912 differs from that of 1905 in what, with another author than Propertius, would be deemed a considerable number of passages; but his critical position has altered little. It may be summed up in saying that he deals better with the superficial than the deeper corruptions of the text. Thus no regard is paid in either edition to Santen's tua for mea at II. 20, 10, where Propertius says that he will break through all obstacles, bronze chains and iron tower of Danae, to come to his love, and the vulgate puts this tower to the novel use of confining the lover; and if Mr. Butler will compare Cic. ad Fam. IX., 22, 5, with Catullus, 54, 4 (Scotch and German papers please copy), he will find that "nymphis leuiter crepitantibus" II. 32, 15, might suggest to a Roman an idea very different from that of "Naiads babbling through the streets of Rome." There are not a few places where I should say that Mr. Butler's text is right but his rendering incorrect; but to go further into these here would have the effect of depreciating what, all things considered, may be described as a useful and estimable performance.

J. P. POSTGATE.

FREDERIC HARRISON AMONG HIS BOOKS.*

A book from Frederic Harrison is always something to be received with gratitude. He has a flexible style that reaches from easy colloquialism to virile eloquence, and, as befits "a sworn foe to specialism of any sort" (p. 4), his interests range over, apparently, the whole field of literature and history. He is permeated by the Positivism of Auguste Comte, but this does not prevent him from having at least a spice of the Positivism of John Bull. A score of books carry his name as author and they can all be read with pleasure and profit, and with the greatest pleasure and profit by those who do not insist that their authors shall view things exclusively from the reader's own point of view. Although the world cannot be precisely divided into those who do and those who do not approve of Positivism all per-vid-opponents of Auguste Comte and all his works will act wisely in carefully studying the writings of Frederic Harrison. It is pleasant to find him among his books and to listen to the gossip of an octogenarian on the authors that have pleased him whether in youth or in old age. We hear his views on Homer, on Tennyson, on Ruskin, on Lord Rosebery. He tells us of the poets that he loves, he discourses on great biographies. In history his topics are as remote as the Roman Empire on the Bosphorus, and as recent as Chatham's creation of the British Empire by his policy that made the whole of North America English when otherwise it might have been partly if not wholly French. And that the great work of Chatham as he planned it was shattered by the stupidity of the Ministers of George III. and their still more stupid master is one of the tragedies of history. Mr. Harrison says that Frederick of Prussia and Washington had no direct relations with each other (p. 252), but there is a curious legend which connects them, for John Brown at Harper's Ferry was armed with a sword which tradition said the great German had presented to the great American.

Mr. Frederic Harrison is an accomplished bookman, and gives a capital account of that boon to students, the Subject Catalogue of the London Library, but it is somewhat of a shock to learn that he classifies his own library—ranging from "Lagrange on Analytic Functions" to "Pickwick"—not by subjects but by sizes. The slight economy of space thus obtained is purchased at far too great a price when John Henry Newman, Bunyan and Häckel are placed cheek by jowl. Comte in 1851 published a list "to guide the more thoughtful among the people in their choice of books for constant use." An English version of this, first published in 1886 and revised in the present year, is an interesting contribution to the difficult art of book selection. Mr. Harrison's commentary explains some of the apparent oddities of the list which it has to be remembered was "avowedly provisional." Still it cannot be fairly said that Protestantism is adequately represented by one book and that book Bossuet's controversial treatise on the history of Protestant divergencies. On the other hand no one who really appreciates Thomas à Kempis would care about Corneille's feeble paraphrase of the "Imitatio," in French verse except as a curiosity. Like many other lists that of Comte fails to distinguish between books that record facts, the constants of physical and historical science, and the books that seek to influence conduct either directly or by the stimulation of the imagination or of the soul. De Quincey's division was the literature of knowledge and the literature of power. The possession of a modest encyclopædia would enable the studious Positivist to dispense with many of the compilations that find a place in Comte's list and are now absolutely obsolete. The difference may be illustrated by the temporary value of such a book as that of Malte-Brun—excellent in its day and of its kind—and the perpetual value of Plato—who does not figure in this Positivist Library. The personal equation comes in when Comte excludes the "Bride of Lammermoor," because Lucy Ashton "betrays a weakness of character unworthy of her sex." In annotating this list, and in many other places, Frederic Harrison emphasises, as Emerson did, the value of translations. It is the merest pedantry of affectation to think that the average man who can read Greek is able to interpret for himself the text of Euripides as successfully as it has been done for the English reader by Professor Gilbert Murray, who unites the not always concurrent gifts of the accomplished scholar and the true poet. But let the reader who accepts the aid of translators make sure that they are trustworthy. Mr. Harrison's annotations are very useful. Comte included Cornaro's "Vita Sobria" in his list. The commonest of the English translations have not been made direct but by way of Latin and French versions, but Mr. Harrison at once picks out the only complete English translation of the delightful gossip of the old Italian who is equally proud of the dramas he wrote in old age and of his method for the recovery of shattered health. Mr. Harrison in praising Plutarch says with epigrammatic truth that "the conventional biography records what the person did: the true biography what the person was." Most readers of the "Parallel Lives" ignore the "Moralia"; it would be interesting to have Frederic Harrison's opinion of that wonderful collection of essays about things on earth and in the moon, but unluckily he is silent on that side of Plutarch.

Amongst the modern topics discussed by Mr. Harrison are the artistic position of Rodin (whom he regards as a caricaturist), the centenary of Tennyson, and the Coronation of Queen Victoria and that of King George, both of which he witnessed. There is also a delightful chapter of travelling impressions:

"When first I knew France under Louis Phillippe, Guizot and Marshal Soult, the opponent of Wellington in Spain, were in power; Louis Napoleon was a prisoner at Ham; the Emperor Napoleon's widow and his brother Jerome, were still living; and his body had only just been restored to France. In things visible—and to some extent in things political and social—France was much as it had been at the Restoration of Louis the Eighteenth in 1815. The only means of locomotion was by means of diligence, post-chaises, or the ponderous hooded gig. Each department—almost each village—had its local costumes and manners; the old provincial life as described by Balzac, Hugo, Erckmann-Chatrian, was in full career with its markets, fairs, pardons, and pilgrimages. The churches and cathedrals were still undefiled by the hand of the restorer, and they were full of honest worshippers."

This and other incidental passages mark the changes that have come in the lifetime of Frederic Harrison. And happily he has found that there is a charm in old age which, as Cicero puts it, is not tedious but pleasant. "Nec solum non molesta, sed etiam jucunda." So mote it be.

WILLIAM E. A. AXON.

LIFE IN THE DESERT.*

Mr. Douglas' name is already familiar to discriminating readers by reason of his contributions, to The English Review, and of his book "Siren Land"—that delightful and ironical volume of Italian impressions. "Fountains in the Sand" should widen his reputation, for it is the work of an exquisite literary artist, who has the mind not only of a poet but of a shrewd and competent observer, and who

* "Among My Books: Centenaries, Reviews, Memoirs." By Frederic Harrison. 7s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

* "Fountains in The Sand." By Norman Douglas. 7s. 6d. net. (Martin Secker.)

adds to his other qualifications those of learning and philosophy. For the book before us is no ordinary travel book, although its ostensible raison d'être is to describe the desert towns of Southern Tunisia, such towns as Gafsa, Metlaoui, and Nefta. No, it is something quite different and much higher—a book of reflections, as it were, roused by contemplation of the desert and its dwellers. His style is so extraordinarily finished, and his tone, though romantic, so politely sceptical, that he reminds one strongly of some of these old French writers whose polish always seems half malicious. But perhaps this is rather unfair on Mr. Douglas, whose irony, cutting as it is, is yet genial. For he is nothing if not a thorough man of the world, cynical, disillusioned, but very sensitive to impressions. The book is full of really beautiful descriptions, especially, perhaps, the latter part, when he has escaped from deadly cold Gafsa to the warm oasis of Nefta. If only there had been a map it would have been a great convenience as it would have shown us exactly what ground he covered, but, of course, in the very idea of the book, all that is subsidiary. It is the atmosphere he creates that is so valuable, and possibly some precious part of that would actually have been dissipated by so concrete a thing as a map. As a substitute, he has given us some charming photographs.

Mr. Douglas' opinion of the natives of these desert-towns is by no means flattering, nor does he think that the French have carried out their occupation in a satisfactory manner, but he is enthusiastic over such a pioneer as the late Monsieur Philippe Thomas, the discoverer of the vast phosphate deposits at Metlaoui. But with all his critical dislike of the dirt and discomfort of a place like Gafsa, he infinitely prefers it to the tourist-ridden delights of Biskra and similar spots. For him, the untrodden path is sweetest—he hates all the sugary romance of the guide-book desert. It would be interesting to hear his opinions on "The Garden of Allah"—well, perhaps that depends on whether you admire Mr. Hichens or not.

In short, this is a type of book of which we get too little. The author is one of those rare people who are truly romantic and yet always have their feet firmly on earth. And he is full of curious information, which he presents to us, not in heavy slabs but in small doses that seem to fall accidentally from his lips. "Fountains in the Sand" is a remarkable book.

RICHARD CURLE.

A STEPCHILD OF THE CZAR.*

This is an intensely interesting book. It is the life story of a Russian Jewish girl, who spent the early years of her childhood under the menacing shadow of Czarism, and then passed, by the emigration of her parents, into the spacious freedom of America. At seasons convenient to the politician we hear much of the alien immigrant; and we, in London at least, are familiar with him in all his forms, from Turiddu of Saffron Hill to Isaac of Petticoat or Park Lane. Moreover, we have our views of him, which we express at length in the newspapers, but do we ever really think about him—his loves, his affections, his domesticities, his humanity? Ill would it become the countrymen of the artist Shakespeare, whose tragic Shylock so often gets the better of the comic Jew designed by the commercial Shakespeare, and becomes Israel itself articulate, chanting super flumina Babylonis—ill would it become us who speak the tongue of Shakespeare to look abroad across Europe for instruction in handling the alien. But, who knows? We yet may rise to the heights of Continental efficiency, and prove worthy even of Holy Russia, our friend and ally in the task of crushing the impudent attempt of Persian nationalists to cleanse and re-make their country.

* "The Promised Land." By Mary Antin. 7s. 6d. net. (Heinemann.)

I suppose Christianity means to the Russian Jew much the same as it meant to the countrymen of Atahualpa. At least, this is how the Cross in Russia appears to our author:

"Fedora Pavlovna would tell us that the Russian people were not to blame. It was the priests, she said, who taught the people to hate the Jews. . . . I tried not to look in the corner where the icon was when I came into a Gentile house. I was afraid of the cross. Everybody was, in Polotzk—all the Jews, I mean. . . . For it was the cross that made the priests, and the priests made our troubles, as even some Christians admitted. The Gentiles said we had killed their God, which was absurd, as they never had a God, nothing but images. Besides, what they accused us of happened so long ago. Everybody had been dead for ages who could have had anything to do with it. . . . To worship the cross and to torment a Jew was the same thing. That is why we feared the cross."

So much for religion. Now what of the State?

"You went out to play one morning, and saw a little knot of people gathered around a lamp-post. There was a notice on it—a new order from the chief of police. You pushed into the crowd, and stared at the placard, but you could not read. A woman with a ragged shawl looked down upon you, and said, with a bitter kind of smile, 'Rejoice, rejoice, little girl! The chief of police bids you rejoice. There shall be a pretty flag flying from every housetop to-day, because it is the Czar's birthday, and we must celebrate. Come and watch the poor people pawn their samovars and candlesticks, to raise money for a pretty flag. It is a holiday, little girl. Rejoice. . . . You accept the hint and go and watch the people buy their flags. . . . One customer puts down a few kopecks on the counter, saying, 'Give me a piece of flag. This is all the money I have. Give me the red and the blue; I'll tear up my shirt for the white.' You know it is no joke. The flag must show from every house, or the owner will be dragged to the police-station, to pay a fine of twenty-five roubles."

There is a moral here—not to say several—for the free Briton in all these islands. I forbear the exposition. The life of a child cribbed, cabined and confined in the Jewish quarter of a Russian town is movingly described. Incidentally there is a picture of the women's bathing house, not unworthy to be set by the side of Dostoeffsky's terrible vignette of the convicts at their bath in Siberia. Trouble was ahead for the little Jewish girl. The father plunged several times into commercial adventures for which he was lamentably unfit. Apparently he bequeathed some of his commercial incapacity to his daughter, who assisted the mother in serving goods from the store. She delivered tea to one customer:

The Gravedigger of Polotzk.

From "The Promised Land," by Mary Antin. (Heinemann.)

"She sniffed and sniffed. She pinched the tea, she shook it all out on the counter.

"'Na take it back,' she said, in disgust; 'this is not the tea I always buy. It's a poorer quality.'

"I knew the woman was mistaken. I was acquainted with my mother's several grades of tea. So I spoke up manfully. 'Oh, no,' I said; 'this is the tea my mother always sends you. There is no worse tea!'"

And so a customer was lost. The family lingered on in the bondage of Russia, longing for the exodus that was to take them to the "Promised Land"—not Palestine, but America. At last the chance came; and away they went to the wonderful country where knowledge was not a crime, where even a little girl, hungry for books, could go to school and learn all the wonders of the world. The introduction to the "school ma'am" is quite moving:

"But the figure that challenged attention was the tall, straight father, with his earnest face and fine forehead, nervous hands eloquent in gesture, and a voice full of feeling. This foreigner, who brought his children to school as if it were an act of consecration, who regarded the teacher of the primer class with reverence, who spoke of visions, like a man inspired, in a common schoolroom, was not like other aliens who brought their children in dull obedience to the law. I think Miss Nixon guessed what my father's best English could not convey. I think she divined that by the simple act of delivering our school certificates, he took possession of America."

(Of her further adventures, her meeting with that great old veteran, Edward Everett Hale, and her ambition to write, let the book itself speak. Its vivid story and its clean good style are themselves testimony to the brave spirit of this alien child, once stepchild of the Czar, and now a daughter of America.

GEORGE SAMPSON.

A LETTER BAG.*

Mrs. Stirling, who achieved fame with an admirable biography of her ancestor "Coke of Norfolk," first Earl of Leicester, last year published a selection of the Cannon Hall papers, entitled "Annals of a Yorkshire House." Encouraged by the reception given to that work, Mrs. Stirling has now given to the world a further selection of the family correspondence. Much of the charm of the work now under consideration is due to the interludes of the author, whose acquaintance with the Georgian era is so profound that she is never at a loss for a character-sketch, an anecdote, or an explanation. Indeed, a book is rarely given forth that is so admirably and interestingly annotated. Illustrations are a feature of this book, and there is especially to be noted a portrait of Lady Elizabeth Spencer-Stanhope, grandmother of Mrs. Stirling, a lady apparently at once so beautiful and charming, that Mrs. Stirling must often have addressed to the painting those lines of Locker-Lampson (with a difference):

"If Barber's touch be true,
What a lucky dog were you,
Grandpapa!"

In her preface Mrs. Stirling mentions that in this "Letter Bag" there "is represented the social existence of two generations and the current gossip of over half a century, as first set forth by their nimble pens in all the freshness of novelty." None may gainsay this statement, for the first letter is dated 1805 and the last 1868. The correspondence, it must be confessed, is not of first-rate importance, but the book makes very good reading, and throws light on many folks who moved in the Society of the day. "One

* "The Letter-Bag of Lady Elizabeth Spencer-Stanhope." Compiled from the Cannon Hall Papers, 1806-1873. By A. M. W. Stirling. With numerous Illustrations. Two Volumes. 32s. net. (John Lane.)

Barber Pinxit

Lady Elizabeth Spencer-Stanhope,
Youngest daughter of Thomas William, 1st Earl of Leicester of the second creation, and wife of John Spencer-Stanhope, Esqre., of Cannon Hall.

From "The Letter-Bag of Lady Elizabeth Spencer-Stanhope." (Lane.)

night [at the opera, we were a good deal amused by having His Royal Highness and his chère amie in the next box to us, really they squabbled so you would have imagined they were man and wife," Marianne Spencer-Stanhope, early in 1805 wrote to her brother John. The "chère amie" was, of course, Mrs. Fitzherbert, who, though it was not then known, had twenty years earlier been secretly married to the Prince of Wales. For Mrs. Fitzherbert Miss Spencer-Stanhope had no great respect, nor for the King's sons, as witness the following extract from another of her letters written during the same season:

"Our neighbour, Mrs. Fitzherbert, in the next box to our own, affords us plenty of amusement. I shall almost become an adept at finding out royalty by their conversation, from frequently overhearing what passes between the Lady, and not only one but several of Their Royal Highnesses. I will give you an infallible guide to a Royal conversation. Stupidity for its basis, an ignorance of intellectual merit for one prop, and a contempt of moral excellence for the other; witticisms, doubles entendres, mimicry, and every species of oath that any English gentleman ever made use of for the fond, as a whole, you may call it double refined loily and vulgarity. This is only doing justice to the conversations I have overheard; far be it from me to wish to diminish the meridian lustre with which these noble gentlemen shine. Let me rather forgive them for understanding who have no conduct and those for conduct who have no understanding. The excellent qualifications of the Lady as an associate are evident, she has neither conduct nor understanding."

The judgment may be harsh, but how well that girl of nineteen wrote. As we read on we meet such dandies as "Skiffy," Petersham, "Golden Ball" Hughes, and "Kangaroo" Cooke, such a wit as Albanley; such theatrical favourites as young Roscius and Maria Foote; and such a soldier as Blucher. That rough diamond, we learn, at a banquet, after an honorary degree had been conferred upon him at Oxford, "got hopelessly tipsy, and was found afterwards strolling about the College by himself, totally incapable of finding his way back to his lodgings." We are re-introduced to Lady Hertford, but is her liaison with the Prince of Wales so well-established as Mrs. Stirling assumes? The general impression is that though His Royal Highness sat at the noble dame's feet, if he sighed for her favours, he sighed in vain. When the Marchioness was asked if she was acquainted with Lady Conyngham, "Well as I knew the Prince," she replied, with dignity, "he would never have ventured to introduce his mistress to me." It is possible, therefore, that Mrs. Stanhope was not wrong when she wrote that "Lady Hertford is very busy trying to bring about a reconciliation between the Prince and Princess." In these volumes we meet such different folk as the Princess of Wales, Hudson the Railway King, Mary Anne Clarke and the Duke of York, Mrs. Disraeli, and "The Little Admiral," Sir Harry Keppel; and are taken to the opera, the Argyll Rooms (before they became infamous), the clubs, and the Salon des Etrangers at Paris. There is a pen-portrait of Mrs. Disraeli at Fryston in 1844 that cannot be omitted:

"Mrs. D'Izzy was in a lace dress, looped up on each side, over pink satin, and a wreath on her head, though, I should think, near fifty. However, she is very amusing and off-hand, saying everything that comes uppermost and unfeignedly devoted to her D'Izzy. She does not give herself airs, and seems very good-natured."

At parting from this entertaining work, it may be mentioned that it contains references to the engagement and honeymoon of almost the last surviving link between the Georgian era and the present day, Lady Dorothy Nevill.

LEWIS MELVILLE.

RODIN ON ART.*

Talking art is one thing, revealing the inner meaning of art as the result of long and masterly practice, another. M. Paul Gsell's record of the obiter dicta of Auguste Rodin taken down from time to time after a series of friendly interviews and published with the approval of the great sculptor, belongs to the latter category. Nothing further in the nature of appraisal need be said of the book, save that the author deserves honour not only for the skill with which he has recorded his conversations with Rodin, but for the consummate art he has displayed in revealing just enough personalia to lend reality to the interviews. The tendency to-day is to allow personal detail to obscure idea. M. Paul Gsell has not done so; on the contrary, he has given us several vivid little glimpses of the man Rodin at work and at leisure, but in every case he has contrived to use such personal glimpses as auxiliaries to the discussion of the master's view of Art. That view although not altogether new to the world, for Rodin has on several occasions expressed opinions to friends and interviewers upon his own art, that of others, and of art in the abstract, but these opinions are either lost in ephemeral journals or scattered over many books. Thus the present volume gives us for the first time a considerable body of the sculptor's artistic philosophy under one cover. It is a kind of anthology of Rodin's opinions about art, and coming as it does from so great an artist, who is also known as one who has pondered the problems and ideas of his craft, it must rank with the notable expressions of artistic opinions. Less comprehensive than Ruskin and Morris, and with nothing of the large puritanism of Tolstoy, or the culture-heroism of Nietzsche, and entirely free of the artistic insolence of Whistler and Oscar Wilde, Rodin does in a sense act as a sort of bond between all of these seemingly conflicting attitudes, because you are convinced that his opinions are merely the by-products of an art and not attempting to be art in themselves. Rodin has worked first and talked last, or rather, talked by the way, for he will work last as well as first, and his real achievement is to be found in statuary not philosophy or criticism. This gives his views upon art a natural value which those of the others, despite their importance, lack. You feel that Rodin has analysed the processes of his craft whilst working, and discussed with himself the technique of imagination and feeling whilst these were guiding those strong sensitive hands of his and those exacting visionary eyes in their creative work upon clay and marble. And knowing this, one is less inclined to discuss his conclusions where they differ from one's own as to accept them because of their origin. Such homage does the mind pay to art. In discussing realism, for instance, Rodin declares himself to be an uncompromising naturalist. "I obey Nature in everything," he says: "and I never pretend to command her. My only ambition is to be servilely faithful to her." And when M. Gsell suggested that it was not Nature exactly as it is that he invoked in his work, Rodin replied: "Yes, exactly as it is!" But after further pressure from his interlocutor, without yielding from his original position, he admitted that mere copying was not the ultimate aim of the artist although it must ever be the method. By such a process art caught the spirit of nature accentuating and exaggerating unconsciously for the benefit of greater realism. "The only principle in art is to copy what you see," he says. But seeing for Rodin connotes feeling, it is an operation of eye and heart, and the unity of the two distinguishes the artist from the ordinary man. Thus the naturalism of Rodin becomes something more than mere copying, as those who know his works would agree, despite the hottest protestations of the great sculptor. But even he would help us to agree with him for he admits that the "mediocre man copying nature will never produce a work of art." All of which amounts to saying that the artist not only copies nature but during that act he copies himself into nature for he and nature are one. And from such an angle we can understand Rodin's final word upon realism, that "the artist has only to trust to his eyes," realising that it is at one with our own William Blake's differentiation of seeing with and through the eye. The artist can afford to trust to mere optical vision because he cannot escape his inner vision. And if such a rendering of Rodin's thought be true, as I think it is, it joins issue with that of those thinkers who look upon art as interpretation of nature rather than exact representation. Later on in this book of conversations Rodin supports this idea when he says:

"Art shows man his raison d'être. It reveals to him the meaning of life, it enlightens him upon his destiny, and consequently points him on his way. When Titian painted that marvellously aristocratic society, where each person carries written in his face, imprinted in his gestures and noted in his costume, the pride of intellect, of authority and of wealth, he set before the patricians of Venice the ideal which they wished to realize. When Poussin composed his clear, majestic, orderly landscapes, where Reason seems to reign; when Puget swelled the muscles of his heroes; when Watteau sheltered his charming yet melancholy lovers beneath mysterious shades; when Houdon caused Voltaire to smile, and Diana, the huntress, to run so lightly; when Rude, in carving the Marseillaise, called old men and children to his country's aid—these great French masters polished in turn some of the facets of our national soul; this one, order; this one, energy; this one, elegance; this one, wit; this one, heroism; and all, the joy of life and of free action, and they kept alive in their compatriots the distinctive qualities of our race."

But Auguste Rodin does not see the need of art only in the fine arts. He is at one with John Ruskin and William Morris in his recognition of the need for the expression of the artistic spirit in all works. Like them he knows that artists take joy in their work because they are artists and their work is art, and he sees no reason why that joy in work and its resultant art should not follow all occupations. He sees that what is most lacking in the modern world is love of work, though it is not clear that he has any idea of the causes of this lack of interest. Nevertheless he is convinced that the same sort of passion which inspires the artist might and should inspire all who work with like happy results. And he knows also, with the author of "Unto this Last" and our great craftsman who revived so many noble arts and crafts for us, that time was when man possessed in a very large measure the intimacy of hand and soul which produces results equal to the arts, and that what common things have survived to us from those days are beautiful and likeable as well as useful. Thus Rodin in mind, as well as in craft, protests against the divorce of the fine arts from the common arts. He creates not for luxury and aloofness, but for utility and familiarity, and in that he is in the tradition of the great builders of life, the inspired architects of human kind.

HOLBROOK JACKSON.

* "Art." By Auguste Rodin. From the French of Paul Gsell. 16s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

MARKINO THE CHILD.*

But, one is inclined to ask, how can a person like Markino speak about the days of childhood as if they were over? He is surely one of those in whom the child has happily survived, so that he looks with wonder on the magic show, whatever it may be, and those in whom the child has vanished gather from his pages a delightful sorrow. In his other books he has expressed himself as children would if there existed not the stupid gate of language; if they could convey to us their thoughts it is most probable that they would often have resemblance to Markino's. This of course, is not meant to allude to his especial, private English, but to what he would convey. His English has been thought to be an affectation, and the more successful he has been the louder grows that horrid chorus which insists that, an he would, he—such a clever fellow—could write the correctest English in the world. As a matter of fact he, even like Disraeli and Meredith, speaks as he writes. That he and they could do otherwise is open to discussion, but as the talk and novels of Disraeli were eminently characteristic, and those of Meredith certainly not less so, thus it is with Markino. If he made the effort he could probably speak and write with the utmost conventionality; he could clothe his thoughts as he arrays his person. Long may the fatal day be in appearing when he will repress his individuality. If we were all as wise as he, we would each have our private English that would give an accurate expression to our sacred thoughts. Yes, so it is; for if we have an individuality, it finds expression in our style. The best style, admittedly, is that which is a mirror of the soul. Therefore let no one say that Yoshio Markino's style is otherwise than excellent. Whatever he may yet become—from his powers of observation it may be that he will still develop until he is Occidental as an author just as he has, with complete absence of affectation, become an Occidental artist. For the time being, however, his thoughts are not as our thoughts and his utterance of them is not as ours would be. Whether he is satisfied, to reach this stage is not a matter that we need discuss. What is most certain is that even if his present writings tickle him as much as they tickle his faithful public, they are not persisted in because he knows that they are popular.

Having thus broken a lance with some of his critics and waved—-he in his broken English might have spelled it "waived"—a bamboo at him for pretending that he is a child no longer, we may sit down to enjoy the pleasant years when San Francisco's cruelty was far away. This is, in truth, one of the most tender and most charming books that we have ever read. The pathos and the laughter go, as they should always go, together; and on almost every page one feels as if one's own experience were enriched. Surely it will now be introduced in English families, this mirror of Markino's parents which they held in front of him when he gave way to tears. "I hated," he says, "to see my own face so ugly with the tear-marks, and I immediately began to laugh. Very often when I wanted to cry a little longer I used to scream, 'Oh, don't show me the glass for a few moments!'" His father obviously was uncommon, even in Japan; his wisdom in the matter of the school-books, when he said he was prepared to buy a hundred of the self-same book. "If one can take every word into his heart," said he, "what does it matter to tear the books into pieces?" And the teacher was so much impressed that he apologised to the seven-year-old boy.

The missionary school experiences are extremely, even poignantly, interesting. We cannot discuss them here. Only they make us think it doubtful if one realises of what value are these writings of a Japanese who at the same time is not moved by mere patriotic fervour, as are the majority of his countrymen who would accept any religion which it pleased the Emperor to lay upon them. Page after page of this book shows Markino as a quaint, sagacious child, even as his father was sagacious in the matter of the books.

* "When I was a Child," by Yoshio Markino. 6s. net. (Constable).

Photo by Soma, Paris.

Mlle. de Levis-Mirepoix (Claude Silve).

It may well remind us of that mediæval Arab who exclaimed:

'What matter if the look to ruin be addressed,
When all that therein was is printed in my breast?'

HENRY BAERLEIN.

THREE FRENCH NOVELS.*

Three exceptional contributions to French fiction have recently come within our ken, the first representative of the old French irony and mockery the last two suggestive of new types and new phases of thought in the French mind and the French capital. Anatole France has seldom written anything finer than "Les Dieux ont Soif." We have all probably meditated on the state of Paris under the Reign of Terror, have wondered how we should have comported ourselves among the perils and monsters of that sanguinary and frenzied time, and pictured our surroundings in terms as lurid and as extravagant as those employed by Carlyle or by Dickens in "The Tale of Two Cities." We scarcely reflect that the Jacobin domination lasted for nearly two years, and that the essential character of men and women whose habit of thought has become set cannot be profoundly modified by external changes extending over a considerable period of time. Anatole France sedulously avoids every opportunity of making our flesh creep. He is concerned to show how almost all even of the serious historians of the time have fallen into journalistic forms of exaggeration, how people, under changed outward conditions, went about their usual avocations with much of the ordinary nonchalance of human beings, how they dressed extravagantly, discussed art theories, maligned and perjured each other, went to places of amusement and pursued all kinds of amorous diversion very much in the same spirit that they do these things under the most ordinary circumstances. Gamelin, the hero, with a classical profile and a gentle humanitarian spirit is a fanatic in the people's cause. The spell thrown by his countenance, his melancholy, his far-away look, his spiritual earnestness over the fancy of some of the fair intrigantes who fished in the troubled waters of 1792, procured his nomination to a committee of the Revolutionary Tribunal. As in 1650, with us, so in the France of 1792, the "committee" was all powerful. It was composed not of rich or influential persons, but of men of the impecunious and often of the humblest ranks, stern and incorruptible in their spirit of devotion to what they regarded as the most sacred of trusts—the cause of the people. Marat on account of his hypertrophied hate and suspicion was revered by them as a hero, and then worshipped as a martyr. They are supported, not by instant strength, old tradition, or the symbolical force of an organised and widely representative State, but simply by the public opinion of the dominant mob in the capital, convinced still that in continued subversion lies the only hope of an issue from their grievous afflictions, and by the prestige of the distant armies over which they maintain a precarious control. Defensive armies must look to some centre for control and guidance and these determined fanatics alone seemed able to supply what they wanted. Innocent, inoffensive, uxorious in private life, these committee-men were fierce as Hyrcanian tigers where the credit or safety of the Revolution was concerned. No matter what sphere of life the delinquent was in—a note, a word, a suspicion of disloyalty, the least slur upon the honesty or sincerity of the new régime was enough to merit death. The sickly sheep, never mind at what sacrifice, must be eliminated from the fold. Hence, the tender-hearted Gamelin is adamant against the appeals of his circle of former acquaintances, careless livers, philosophers, Bohemians, ladies of pleasure. Their characteristic philosophy is disengaged in the course of the narrative. Their circumstances are changed, but not their thoughts. It is extraordinary how little intimidated they are. The rich, the corrupt, the treacherous, are frightened, but they are in most cases far too cunning to fall in the net of such simple fanatics as Gamelin. Copious dust is thrown into his eyes by his own mistress, who trembles with ecstasy at the eloquence, the terrible power, the unfathomable and mystic revolutionary bigotry of her lover. As the tale of victims mounts, and most of his old friends, many denounced through him, have swollen the prisons and ridden on the fatal tumbrils until the mob is exasperated by satiety into a profound indifference, Gamelin is haunted now and again by bad dreams and terrible doubts. But he haunts a new idol now with a dog-like fidelity, and his new idol is Robespierre, with whose grim death the book ends. Of hope for humanity Anatole seems to have little. As an historical philosopher his first and last word is despair. He brings to the exposition of this gloomy view, the subtlest of perceptions, the most plausible of doubts, the most insidious of queries, the most delectable of styles.

* "Les Dieux ont Soif." By Anatole France. (Calmann Levy.)

"L'Evasion: Histoire d'une femme d'aujourd'hui." By M. L. Alméras (Mrs. David Nutt).

"La Cité des Lampes: Ouvrage Couronné." By Claude Silve. (Calmann-Levy.)

Mrs. Nutt's agreeably written "L'Evasion" must seek admirers among a class to whom the wicked smile of Anatole is anathema. She seeks to interest her readers in a new Norah—in her story a charming Alsatienne, by name Pauline, who resolves under the sternest and most repelling conditions not once, but twice, to break away from group-morals and the conventions that surround her, in order that she may create for herself and lead her own life. The break from her people is not wholly unlike that of "Magsie" in Mr. Wells's new novel, but the motive is quite different. Her ideal is to become an artist. On the strength of a promise of £200 for her trousseau in the event of marriage to an unloved suitor, she virtually abstracts that amount from her father's bureau, and on that small capital manages to set up independently on the Riviera. There she meets a young scientist, physiologist and pathologist (a counterpart of Trowbridge). Her independence does not preclude marriage, but it forces her eventually to break with her husband upon grounds not too clearly defined and to terrify him by a great demonstration of moral force into leaving her the sole charge of the children of the marriage. Here, she finds a new call to creation. The social philosophy upon which the story is based appears to be very intensely and earnestly believed in by the writer, but its precise nature remains to us shadowy. The justification of such revolts as those of the heroine from the secular order of things cannot be justified by isolated instances and, even if they could, Mrs. Nutt's expository eloquence is inadequate to the task. Her strength lies in the handling of episodes many of which are described with a power akin to that of the Russian realists. A good story would serve her turn far better than a feminist theory, however strongly she may be convinced of the solemn truth of it.

Gsell. 16s. 6d.

Mlle. Claude Silve's "La Cité des Lampes" is a more striking example of the emancipation of the young French-woman of to-day. The authoress is said to be no more than twenty-three years of age, yet her short book has been crowned by the Academy, has passed through edition after edition, and has sent religious France into a fury of resentment. It is a series of impressions, not a consecutive story; it is no unfairness to the book to say that it could hardly have seen the light, but for such precursors as "Marie Claire" and "L'Elève Gilles." The subject, she can hardly be called the heroine, of the story, a young girl, Gemma, enters a convent as retraitante, with a view peradventure of becoming a novice. Nothing could be tenderer than the reception she receives. Smells, sounds, peeps of the convent garden, the lamps in the sanctuary, the discreet ardour of the nuns—everything excites Gemma to a devout emulation. How those who speak of the apathy and petty spite of the conventual life must have labelled the inmates of the cloister! Gemma describes every changing phase of the life in colours as fresh as they are delicate and sincere. Far from imagination and feeling being depressed, hers is unduly exalted. St. Gertrude, St. Theresa, St. Bernard, are quoted, extraordinary experiences over a waxen effigy of a Pietà in an old lumber room are narrated, and we begin to discern the expectation of the novice that the new spiritual joys will entirely efface the normal physical yearnings of youth and adolescence. High hopes appear to be entertained that these last may be entirely absorbed in a kind of ecstatic spiritual pain, and a field of speculation is just delicately hinted at which one may possibly excuse the professed religious for not regarding as particularly edifying. Gemma, at any rate, is not prepared to pay the cost and emerges from the convent gate a sadder, and perhaps wiser, girl. The French decadent, Huysmans, has penetrated a somewhat similar sphere of exploration. Mr. George Moore in his "Sister Teresa" has adumbrated certain of the supersensuous subtleties of the contemplative life. All those who are interested in the psychology of the cloister will certainly note Claude Silve's remarkable book—if only as a curiosity of the modern French spirit.

THOMAS SECCOMBE.

"GIG-MANITY": PAST AND FUTURE.*

"Gig-manity" in particular and humanity in general should be vastly interested in Mr. Straus's fascinating pages. His story takes us back to primitive times, when the first wheel was evolved from the tree-trunk, the raft was succeeded by the sledge, the sledge by the chariot, and so on down to the triumph of the motor car. It has its philological, its literary, its biographical, its social, and its philosophical phases. We are still undetermined about the etymology of such words as coach, sedan, and hammercloth, though it is pretty certain that "hackney" means common, and that the French fiacre derived its name from an all-but-forgotten saint. Mr. Straus has ransacked the archives of his ramified subject, extracting rich tribute from poets and dramatists, diarists and historians; and he compares and criticises as well as quotes his authorities. So numerous are the vehicles that come under the caption of coaches and carriages that a fair-sized dictionary might well be devoted to them. This is a matter for the experts and the antiquaries. A sort of parallel study might be made of road-making and carriage-building, for both subjects are intimately related, as Mr. Straus very effectively shows. But when all special technical points are eliminated from the discussion there remains a wide field for the student of social customs to traverse. Not once are we allowed to forget that, while man's ingenuity has been brought into play through the centuries to make the way of the world easier for the warrior and the merchant and the traveller pure and simple, each step in the path of progress has been beset by more or less organized opposition. Full many a protest against innovations in old-time coach and carriage building has its counterpart in the opposition to the automobile. Taylor, the water-poet, declared that :

* "Carriages and Coaches: Their History and Their Evolution." By Ralph Straus. Illustrated with Reproductions from Old Prints, Contemporary Drawings, and Photographs. 12s. net. (Martin Secker.)

"Carroaches, Coaches, Jades and Flanders Mares
Do rob us of our shares, our wares, our Fares
Against the ground we stand and knock our heels,
Whilst all our profit runs away on wheels"

Coaches were railed at as the beginning of ruinous extravagance, and the tax upon them was bewailed later as an injustice to the poor clergyman. Even the sedan-chair had bitter enemies. Steele referred to the chairmen of his time as "slaves of the rich," who "take up the whole street, while we Peripatetics are very glad to watch an opportunity to whisk across a passage, very thankful that we are not run over for interrupting the machine, that carries in it a person neither more handsome, wise, nor valiant, than the meanest of us." What would the essayist say in these days, when the phrase, "the Quick and the Dead" is used to identify those who can escape from the motor-car and those who are too slow on foot to do so? We are apt to think of the old sedan-chair as a vehicle of luxury; but in doing so we forget the time-honoured vagaries of the English climate, which made of the common chair at all events a very uncomfortable means of conveyance indeed—not far removed from a death-trap. Public coaches were opposed on the ground that they made the vice and luxury of the town too approachable by simple country-folk. Another point touched upon by Mr. Straus shows there was a battle of broad and narrow wheels, just as there was one between the broad and the narrow gauges on the railways. The humour of our subject is not forgotten. Hood had a notable hit at the rude forefather of the motor-bus, the "gay Shillibeer." And when Sir Goldsmith Gurney brought out his steam-carriage in 1827, and a boiler exploded at Glasgow, Hood commemorated the event in the following lines :

"Instead of journeys, people now
May go upon a Gurney,
With steam to do the horses' work
By power of attorney :
"Tho' with a load it may explode
And you may all be undone ;
And find you're going up to Heaven
Instead of up to London."

The future holds the flying-machine in store, perhaps, as a "hackney" vehicle, and it would be easy to prophesy a total extinction of horse-driven vehicles except for purely ornamental purposes.

"Yet," observes Mr. Straus, "I believe that there may be a reaction in favour of a more leisurely means of locomotion. As yet it is impossible to be truly dignified in even the most gorgeously-appointed motor-car. . . . Although it is not probable that any horse-carriages of an entirely new type will be constructed, I imagine that the older forms will persist, at any rate, for the next century or two."

We have only touched the fringe of the subject as it is treated in Mr. Straus's pages, which are lavishly illustrated and contain ample material for many a winter night's entertainment.

THE BIRD OF TIME.*

This is a new volume of poems by the lady whom Mr. Gosse calls "the most accomplished living poet of India. . . ."

* "The Bird of Time: Songs of Life, Death and the Spring." By Sarojini Naidu. With Introduction by Edmund Gosse, and Portrait of the Author. 5s. net. (Heinemann.)

the most brilliant, the most original, as well as the most correct, of all the natives of Hindustan who have written in English." Mr. Arthur Symonds has also praised her, and no one interested in contemporary poetry neglects two such critics when they are in agreement. No one will dispute that Mrs. Naidu is brilliant and correct. The bold colouring, the massive rhythms, the unveiled and unhesitating emotions, of more than half her poems recommend her to the eye more swiftly perhaps than any other living poet, native or not. Mr. Gosse finds her peculiarly and exclusively Eastern. This may be so but only a few foreign words in italics stand between the English reader and an instant and decisive sympathy. No one, for example, will be surprised or disturbed by "An Indian Love Song," written we are told, to an Indian tune, where the man speaks first :

"Lift up the veils that darken the delicate moon of thy glory and grace,
Withhold not, O Love, from the night of my longing the joy of thy luminous face,
Give me a spear of the scented keora guarding thy pinioned curls,
Or a silken thread from the fringes that trouble the dream of thy glimmering pearls ;
Faint grows my soul with thy tresses' perfume and the song of thy anklets' caprice, Revive me, I pray, with the magical nectar that dwells in the flower of thy kiss "

Or if the reader be surprised it is at the fulness rather than the novelty of her achievement. She possesses her good qualities in heaped measure. Her boldness of feeling, imagery and expression, for example, is exuberant, superb, and abounding in spacious gestures. She tends to grandiloquence, perhaps, and is not above royally apparelling what is either vague or slight. At her worst she will write :

"Springtime, O Springtime, what is your secret,
The bliss at the core of your magical mirth,
That quickens the pulse of the morning to wonder
And hastens the seeds of all beauty to birth,
That captures the heavens and conquers to blossom
The roots of delight in the heart of the earth ? "

But time after time her free and joyous mastery proves that verse to her is as "to hawk and to heron the pride of their wing," while the book as a whole is summed up by the short poem where she connects the nasturtium flower with the immortal women of Sanscrit legend and song :

"Poignant and subtle and bitter perfume,
Exquisite, luminous, passionate bloom,
Your leaves interwoven of fragrance and fire
Are Sivitri's sorrow and Siva's desire,
Draupadi's longing, Damayanti's fears,
And sweetest Sakuntala's magical tears."

Mrs. Naidu enriches contemporary verse by her mastery and her brilliant temperament more than by what is indubitably Oriental in her verses.

E.T.

A PHILOSOPHIC FANTASY.*

When I had read "The Crock of Gold," I noticed that in The Times list of new books it was placed with "Books for the Young." At first I was inclined to smile at such a collocation, but on second thoughts it seemed to me to be not so ill-placed after all, for the young are less affected by conventions than the old, and have a special gift of seeing things in the right perspective, a gift often lost in later life. So it is likely enough that this book will be better understood of the young than by any save the elect of the old.

The more direct and less complicated mind of a child will see no incongruity, will be aware of no anachronism in meeting the gods of the old world, Angus Og, Pan, Sheogs and Leprecauns, side by side with every-day peasants and police, neither will it be puzzled or dismayed by the freakishness and general topsy-turviness of the "Crock of Gold." Mr. Stephens uses no such device as Mr. Kipling for reconciling anachronistic anomalies. He presents you with ancient gods and modern men, heroes and pigmies together, with so daring an assurance that you are untroubled by doubt. It is not easy to place the book, it is so different from anything else in literature. At times the writing somehow recalls Sterne, and again the treatment Mr. Kipling, but the essence is Mr. Stephens's own.

* "The Crock of Gold." By James Stephens. 5s. net. (Macmillan & Co.)

In a chapter of singular beauty is told how Caitilin Ni Murrachu, the Shepherd Girl, became conscious of womanhood.

"But very slowly there was growing in her consciousness an unrest, a disquietude to which she had hitherto been a stranger.

Sometimes an infinite weariness oppressed her to the earth. A thought was born in her mind, and it had no name. It was growing, and could not be expressed. She had no words wherewith to meet it, to exorcise or greet this stranger who, more and more insistently and pleadingly, tapped upon her doors and begged to be spoken to, admitted and caressed and nourished."

And then she hears the piping of Pan among the bracken, and she went home, her feet tripping to a wayward measure.

"The evening was full of peace and quietude, the mellow dusky sunlight made a path for her feet, and everywhere through the wide fields birds were flashing and singing, and she sang with them a song that had no words and wanted none."

Mr. Stephens has an exquisite sense of humour, and the account of the arrest of the Philosopher by the policemen, and his rescue by the Leprecauns is delightful. Equally effective, in a different way, is the terrible story, overheard in jail by the Philosopher, of the hard-driven clerk who was dismissed by his employer for absence through ill-health.

"The Crock of Gold" is a strange medley, and fascinating as it is strange. It is full of fantastic philosophy, poetry, humour and shrewd observation on the jumble of things which make up what is called Life, and one is left wondering what Mr. Stephens will give us next.

H.A.H.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF WILLIAM MORRIS.*

Of these four latest volumes of the "Collected Works of William Morris," three contain prose—"The House of the Wolfings," "The Glittering Plain," "The Roots of the Mountains," "News from Nowhere," "John Ball," and "A King's Lesson"; the translation of Homer's "Odyssey" fills the other. More than the earlier volumes these four remind us what imperfect justice his written work does to Morris. It never culminates. His powers are never seen, all harmoniously and as one, attaining a difficult goal. If they could have united so, Morris would have had no rivals among his contemporaries. But though these fictions fall short of mastery, both in skill and in natural impulse, and though "The Odyssey of Homer" is a surprising adventure for a busy man, they are dull only to one who cares nothing about Morris. And now his daughter, Miss May Morris, has made dullness impossible by the companion biographical chapters in each volume, which have a charming combination of respect and familiarity. It seemed at first doubtful whether these notes should have appeared bit by bit between the same covers as Morris's own writings, and that, too, at the beginning and not the end. But though I still hope that the chapters may be printed separately for those who cannot afford or do not desire the "Collected Works," I find them perfectly justified.

* "The Collected Works of William Morris." With Introductions by his daughter, May Morris. 24 vols. Vols. XIII., XIV., XV., and XVI. £12 12s. net. (Longmans.)

Mr. James Stephens.

Few other writers could reasonably be treated in the same way, because their work either reaches artistic independence by success or it is an artistic failure which nothing can redeem. But Morris's greatest poem was his life. The twenty-four volumes of his complete works will exhibit chiefly innumerable rough drafts of that poem. Hence it is that a reader can pass so easily from his poems or tales to his daughter's notes. You read that passage in the twenty-second book of the "Odyssey," where Odysseus has made an end of the suitors:

"But about his house peered Odysseus, if yet a man there were Who shunning the black doom-day was left a-lurking there; But adown in the dust and the blood he beheld them all lying about,

Yea, as many as the fishes which the fishers have drawn out With a net of many meshes from out the hoary sea

Up on to the hollow sea-beach: there heaped up all they be Cast up upon the sea-sand, desiring the waves of the brine; But the sun their life is taking with the glory of his shine.

Thus then in heaps the wooers on one another lay."

And you turn from it to the "Introduction," to find him telling his wife that he is wool-gathering, and "must collect my scattered wits by doing some Homer," or that "Homer goes on, and will be out in about a month, but Smith is insisting on paper-hanging so I must do one at least besides those I have in hand." Miss Morris tells us that his "withdrawal into the company of a great poet" was a rest and solace. Again, if you know that in September, 1888, the book which was to be "The House of the Wolfings" went on "merrily," so that Morris added: "I think I shall be rather melancholy when my book is finished. What is the next job to be?"—then you will not be so easily inclined to dismiss the tale as of a thin, flat beauty. Still more interesting is it to turn from that book and read how the poet wanted to alter "written in prose and verse by William Morris" to "written in prose and in verse," in order to "gain the necessary fulness of line." Miss Morris quotes from Mr. Buxton Forman:

"I mildly protested that the former reading was the better sense, and that it should not be sacrificed to avoid a slight excess of white that no one would notice. 'Ha!' said Morris, 'now what would you say if I told you that the verses on the title-page were written just to fill up the great white lower half? Well, that was what happened!'"

It is a pure pleasure, also, after pictures of the warrior "clad in glorious raiment," and the warrior maid "with a wreath of wind-flowers round her head," to come on Morris's letter, written from Hammersmith in August, 1894, to his daughter, ending "Home to Kelmscott on Tuesday," and then "Wot Larx," which is followed immediately by this note of Mr. S. C. Cockerell's:

"All day at Kelmscott House. . . . When I went up into the drawing-room to say good-night, W. M. and Mrs. M. were playing at draughts, with large ivory pieces, red and white. Mrs. M. had on a glorious blue gown, and looked like a king and queen in some old manuscript."

It is another kind of pleasure to find the author of "News from Nowhere" moved by "Looking Backward" and its admirers to say: "I wouldn't care to live in such a cockney paradise as he imagines," and that "if they brigaded him into a regiment of workers he would just lie on his back and kick." The only thing that Morris accepted with all its imperfections on its head was his own temperament; and it is his imperious efforts of many different kinds to create a real and a pictorial world endurable to that temperament which make him so delightful and amusing. How keen his satisfaction was with a pictorially suitable world we shall perhaps never exactly know. But pictures did satisfy him. It is not altogether the fictitious dream character of "John Ball" which makes him say that he looked at the battle "as on a picture." Miss Morris is careful to say that Merton Abbey was chosen by her father "because it had the two principal necessities for printing and dyeing—good water, and plenty of space for drying grounds;" but she has to add that "if he unconsciously demanded beauty in his surroundings, that too was practical, really." A certain amount of beautiful detail was necessary to him, and if it had to be artificial, pictorial, carefully cloistered, he did not refuse it; his books, from beginning to end, are never without a cloistered choiceness; and it is their most serious limitation. Miss Morris, as usual, includes, among her illustrations photographs of a large number of choice things connected with his private life—his bed, his library, his painting of Iscult, the cabinet painted for his marriage gift by Burne-Jones, specimens of types, together with his notes on his aims in founding the Kelm-scott Press.

EDWARD THOMAS.

"AN INVERTED IDEALIST."*

Only once had I the privilege and pleasure of meeting George Gissing: that was at Mr. H. G. Wells' house at Worcester Park. He sat on a couch after dinner, and I never met a man with a lighter touch than he displayed in conversation with a few literary men and some rather high-spirited young women. His talk was full of easy wit and a most charming humour. And yet the sadness of his face throughout was never for a moment relaxed. It seemed as if sorrow had been so ground into the texture of his being that no inner light could ever shine through. There was always that look of ineffable tragedy behind the smile, always that note of wistful pathos in his laughter. I had the chance of only a few words with him aside, and then he talked rather above my head, assuming in me an erudition that never was and never will be mine. It amazed and I am afraid disgusted him a little, to find that I was far more interested in life than in books. I had always admired him as a conscientious literary artist, but after I had met him there was some pity mingled with my admiration. I had that sort of feeling toward him that one has toward a sanguine ambitious boy who has tried to do some worthy thing, and failed—he knows not why.

His friend, Morley Roberts, has dubbed him "an inverted idealist. . . . He looks back. It is the more hopeless, the more impossibly vain," says Mr. Roberts. And therein, I think, lies the secret of Gissing's tragedy.

He scorned the title of Realist. No doubt he felt, as most sincere artists feel, that there is no room in art for any 'ism. A man can only bring his view of life to bear upon life as he sees it, and render that view through the speech and actions of his characters. To tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth about anything is impossible. The truth can be told in a way that makes a lie of it; on the other hand it is possible to deal with the most improbable fictions in a way that makes them truth indeed. What seems most real to some men to other men would seem an idle vision. When we look at a heathen idol we see only a misshapen, senseless lump of wood or stone, but when the heathen looks at it he sees God. Truth is, as beauty is said to be, in the eye of the beholder. The methods of the confessed realist bear the same relation to truth as a photograph bears to life: it has no depth or colour or movement. George Gissing was right to scorn and discard the label which those would have applied to him who hold that realism and idealism are as the poles asunder; that no realist can be an idealist; that every realist is of necessity a pessimist and every idealist a heaven-born optimist; that the Real is always depressing and unlovely and the Ideal always exhilarating and visionary. As if there were not such real things in the world as mother-love and moonshine, sunshine and the way of a man with a maid, art and music, the call of the sea, friendship, heroism, faith, hope, and charity!

These reflections have been suggested by Mr. Frank Swinnerton's new critical study of George Gissing's work and character, and by several days of casual dipping into a new edition of "Henry Ryecroft,"† a book that I have often read before and always delighted in. These are both fine books, with everything handsome about them, delightful to look at and to handle, and reflecting the greatest credit on their respective publishers. If only some of us poor novelists were published in the chaste style of some of these reprints and belles lettres, I believe the public would just have to succumb to our charms. I wonder why it is that we are not!

* "George Gissing: A Critical Study." By Frank Swinnerton. 7s. 6d. (Martin Secker.)

† "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft." By George Gissing. A New Edition. 6s. (Constable.)

"Big fleas have little fleas upon their backs to bite 'em, And these fleas have littler fleas, and so ad infinitum!" To criticise a critic is to feel painfully like one of the littler fleas. But Mr. Frank Swinnerton's book is not mere criticism. Mr. Swinnerton is himself a novelist of considerable achievement, and he brings into play in his latest book those qualities of sympathy and insight and imagination which have made him one of the most promising of our younger writers. One may differ from his opinions and quarrel with his conclusions occasionally; but that is only to say that he provides food for thought. The glib rascal who runs away with us by sheer dint of some airy magic of style or humorous devilry is all very well in his way and a diverting companion; but when I am reading a man's book about a man I want to know something definite about my author as well as all about his subject. I want to feel that he and I understand one another; and how can I understand him if he disguises himself in the cloak of a pontiff and is grimly impersonal? How can I feel en rapport with him if he has no natural humanity? The best books are an expression of their author's personality, and thus every book should be a book of revelations.

Mr. Swinnerton fulfils these conditions admirably. He is a man after my own heart. He is not afraid to be obvious when the thing to be said is obvious wisdom. But he can be subtle, too, and even profound, as when he says toward the end of his book: "We have no need to inflate an author's talent after he is dead: before his death let us by all means exalt the good, because we know that the bad will exalt itself," and thus gives his reason for trying "to value Gissing's books without reference to the author's material prosperity." Indeed Mr. Swinnerton's judgment seems to me particularly sound in this concluding chapter in which he sets out to prove that Gissing, all things considered, enjoyed his due meed of recognition during his life, and has received perhaps more than his due meed of posthumous fame. You cannot have your cake and eat it. If you are set on having a good time with your artistic conscience you cannot grumble if that is the only sort of good time you are permitted to have. Material rewards—pleasant enough if they happen to come your way!—are only incidental to the more abiding reward of a fully gratified egotism. George Gissing was a ferocious egotist. It was because he so seldom got out of his own skin into the skins of the people of his novels that he failed so often and so egregiously to win the sympathy of the public. The public is composed mainly of average people, and Gissing, not understanding average people, and not wishing to understand them, almost hating them, in fact, should have been pleased rather than vexed to think that he did not appeal to them. If he had been only a little more just to them they would have been more than just, they would have been generous, to him. All this, if I have read him aright, Mr. Swinnerton brings out clearly in his most penetrating and illuminative book.

EDWIN PUGH.

THE REAL GISSING.*

Mr. Morley Roberts is a fine novelist; and this fascinating book shows him to be a fine friend. For "The Private Life of Henry Maitland" is, with only the most superficial disguises, the story of George Gissing's life by the only person who could have written it. That unique knowledge possessed by Mr. Roberts was in itself enough to give the book extraordinary interest. Mr. Roberts knew Gissing—nobody else knew him; and he was a life-long friend. The book has therefore an authentic value: it is a more valuable book than "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," because it gives a truer and more pungent impression of a memorable writer.

* "The Private Life of Henry Maitland." Dictated by J. H. Edited by Morley Roberts. 6s. (Nash.)

Gissing's life, from the unquestionable promise of his early years, through the later disasters caused by his temperament and the absence of wise control, to the beginning of his literary career; his second wretched marriage and further tribulations of poverty, unhappiness, and ill-health, are all set down here frankly and delicately. Mr. Roberts cares less for the writer than for the man. The man he loved; the writer—although he praises discriminatingly the works of Gissing that should be praised—seemed always a lesser person than his friend. And that is quite understandable by a reader of Gissing, for Gissing's work was too steadfastly produced, without inspiration, by the over-exacting labour of eight hours a day. For eight hours each day Gissing wrote steadily. Is it any wonder that he had no time for active experience, except the insistent discomforts of poverty and matrimonial misalliance? That of course was what prevented Gissing from realising his best talents. "It seems to me now," says Mr. Roberts, "that all his so-called social work and analysis were in the nature of an alien tour de force." He took his subjects as mere subjects, and putting them on the table, lectured in pathology." For the same reason, Gissing was largely dependent upon himself and Mr. Roberts as types for his male characters, drawing them again and again, and in the end—as Mr. Roberts says—by stress of circumstances, making his friend develop into a villain. On himself, Gissing perpetually drew—for temperament, moods, distastes, and disabilities—but he never stood so clear as he stands in "The Private Life of Henry Maitland." Here he is before us with the warmth of life, a lovable and engaging figure, weak, obstinate, "a moral coward," but human. In his own novels, too often, the weakness was apparent, while the genuine character of the man was drowned in exposition. What Mr. Roberts calls "translated self-pity" was too often the foundation of his work. "It was the fact that he should never have written fiction at all."

Yet putting aside this point, it is certain that some of Gissing's books will survive for their own great qualities; and we are sure that Mr. Roberts's book deserves to survive along with them. It is in the highest degree sympathetic and veracious. Having much to handle that was difficult, Mr. Roberts, by his apparently artless ruse of recording the story of Henry Maitland by the hand of one "J.H." has been enabled to move easily among his difficulties. He has been able to refer to himself—always a treacherously inviting form of sport—as frankly and unaffectedly as the most troublesome reader could desire. In no single passage does there seem to be any lapse from the high level of disinterestedness which marks the book. It would be impossible, we think, for any unbiassed reader to say that Mr. Roberts has "used Maitland's memory for his own ends," as he fears may be the case. The interest of the narrative throughout, as well as the fine sincerity of the writing, would sufficiently ridicule such an idea. And in addition to these things it must clearly be stated that Mr. Roberts could have done Gissing's memory no better service than by writing this book. Other books may or may not be written about Gissing—that will depend upon the estimation of his work in the future—but we are convinced that no more true and sympathetic account of his life will be written.

Owing to certain disguises of names—nearly all of them, such as "G. H. Rivers" for H. G. Wells, and "The Vortex" for "The Whirlpool," easily decipherable—it is a little difficult to find one's way among the publishers with whom Maitland had dealings. For example, Mr. Roberts may perhaps have given unintentionally a wrong impression about the time of Maitland's desertion of "Miller and Company," which he suggests took place after "The Flower," whereas the separation occurred after "Paternoster Row," although "Bond and Free" intervened. Also, he is surely in error in saying that "Isabel" was the last book published with "Andrews and Company."

FRANK SWINNERTON.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF ART.*

This book is monumental in more senses than one. It is monumental in the sense of being a conspicuously great study of Art in the Eastern World. It is also monumental in the sense of being a posthumous memorial worthy of the distinguished man whose name appears on its title page. For Professor Ernest Fenollosa died before more than the rough draft of his great work was accomplished, and it is to four years of pious and devoted labour on the part of his widow that we owe these two admirable volumes, which no serious student of Art—Art, that is, in its fullest sense—can afford to be without.

Professor Fenollosa played a conspicuous part at a great crisis. He was privileged to preach to a nation what Montaigne preached to the individual when he wrote "La plus grande chose du monde c'est de savoir estre a soy." And he was privileged to know that his sermon fell on attentive ears.

It was in 1878 at the crucial moment in their history when the Japanese found themselves turning from all their old traditions and indulging in a very orgy of foreignism, that this brilliant young American was called to the Chair of Political Economy and Philosophy in the University of Tokio. And few things are to be found in the History of Art more curious and romantic than the fact, which the leaders of Art in Japan are themselves ready to admit, that it was the keen and prophetic eye of this young Westerner that first realized the tragedy which threatened the Eastern Art Movement and his energetic enthusiasm provided the mainspring for a swift and wholesome reaction.

The story is too long to tell in this place. Here, it is enough to say that on the eve of his departure in 1890 he received from the Emperor's own hand "The Order of the Sacred Mirror," the most exalted Order ever up till that moment given to a foreigner, and was dismissed with the following eulogy from the Emperor's own lips: "You have taught my people to know their Art; in going back to your own great country, I charge you to teach them also"; surely a diploma, a certificate of recognition, for which it would be hard to find a parallel. And no one who is privileged to read this fascinating work will deny that Fenollosa more than amply obeyed the royal command.

It would be useless in the space at my disposal even to attempt a résumé of the subject here treated with such mastery and knowledge. But it will be useful to attempt to present to the readers of these pages some idea of the author's general aim and scope, and so whet their appetites for an intellectual feast of the first order. The book though planned on a large scale is yet kept within reasonable bounds, both as regards letterpress and avoirdupois (an important matter when the world is in such a desperate hurry and so impatient of anything weighty) and this, notwithstanding the fact that it does not confine itself to one branch of art, painting, sculpture, ceramics, lacquer or what not, but also concerns itself with the spirit of Art which permeates all contemporary Art practices.

Take, for example, the section dealing with Primitive Chinese Art. Here we have cheek by jowl reproductions of such apparently diverse objects as New Zealand Totem poles, Chinese bronzes, long-nosed wooden masks from the Philippines and Japan, frigate bird designs from New Guinea, and an Alaskan blanket, all presented with set purpose to show the universality and interaction of Art waves, and as a protest against the general assumption that national or racial arts are isolated phenomena. True, as we proceed we are presented more liberally with reproductions of Chinese and Japanese paintings, but this rather because the earliest manifestations of Art in flimsy materials have of necessity ceased to exist, as well as because by its nature Art lends itself to more diverse treatment when the material used is graphic as opposed to plastic.

This book must of necessity make its chief appeal to scholars, collectors and general readers interested in Oriental topics, but, paradoxical though it may sound, its chief

* "Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art: An Outline History of East Asiatic Design." By Ernest F. Fenollosa. 2 Vols. Illustrated. 36s. net. (Heinemann.)

Painting by Shigemasa.

From "Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art." (Heinemann)

In the collection of Mr. Charles L. Freer.

value seems to me to lie in its wider message of eclecticism. Just as the Turk, notwithstanding his custom of filling his harem with women ravished from foreign countries, has practically retained his type, so Art wheresoever wedded has maintained her constant characteristics. True, these volumes deal specifically with the Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art, or as I should rather put it, "of Art in China and Japan," but it is carefully insistent from beginning to end that the art-works of all the world are but infinite variations in a single kind of social or mental effort; that there is no sense in artists and writers of different schools flying at one another's throats; that the sun does not rise on Oriental Art and set on Occidental; but that it rises and sets on Art one and indivisible, which embraces the whole world, and of which, though there are infinite manifestations, there is but one spirit. That is why Art the moment it becomes a trade ceases to exist. The true spirit of Art refuses to be confined. The real artist is of no country. His appeal is to the Art sense which is as universal, though as rare, as radium. As classification has its uses in the animal world, so it has its uses in the world of Art. But the classification of animals is only a convenience to mark the outstanding variations of the gradually changing but universal manifestation of Life. So with the classification of works or schools of Art. Just as man and amœba have both the same common denominator, so has the Mona Lisa the same as the Alaskan blanket or New Zealand Totem pole. Here, then, seems to me the great value of Professor Fenollosa's work, that he has written a history of Oriental Art from the universal point of view.

Incidentally, by treating Art in China and Japan as a single æsthetic movement, as closely inter-related as Art in Greece and Rome, and denying the very existence of the essential differences insisted upon by schoolmen and pedants, he goes far to remove the shibboleths by which it is attempted to distinguish between Art pictorial and Art decorative, to break down the illogical barriers which have been erected between Art European, Asian and African. In a word he denies that "East is East and West is West, and never the twain can meet." He emphasizes the Universal Brotherhood of Art which speaks in a universal language and has an instinctive Freemasonry of its own.

As I have said, I have not here attempted the impossible, the reviewing of these volumes in the limited space at my command. Rather have I attempted to indicate the spirit of its inception and accomplishment. And if, in the process, I have suggested that this work is only fit for the hard-reading student, let me, in conclusion, rectify that impression.

As a mere picture book it is an amazing feast, stimulating the imagination, satisfying the eye, cultivating the Art sense.

As a romance it is entrancing as a fairy tale.

As history it is that best sort of all which has in it the elements of a great poem.

Certainly Japan owes a great debt of gratitude to Professor Fenollosa, but he would, I believe, have been the first to acknowledge that he owed an equal debt of gratitude to Japan. For it has long been apparent to me that no Westerner can saturate himself, as he did, in Oriental Art, without emerging with a fuller sense of what Art really means, with a more subtle understanding of its universal spirit and purport, than can possibly be attained by the mere study of Art in Europe, whether before or since the Italian Renaissance. Such study seems to add a new sensitiveness to even the most sensitive of Western tastes. Therefore I hope that a large proportion of the readers of THE BOOKMAN will seize the opportunity here offered to them by Mrs. Fenollosa's pious and unstinted completion of her distinguished husband's magnum opus and the liberal enterprise of its publisher.

G. S. LAVARD.

THE HOLY FAMILY.*

Queen Victoria, according to her diaries, once asked Lord Melbourne why it was that the Holy Family figured

* "Mary, the Mother of Jesus." By Alice Meynell. Illustrated by R. Anning Bell. 16s. net. (Lee Warner.)

so often in art, and the statesman answered the question with another by asking what was more beautiful than a mother nursing a child. From a worldly old man like Melbourne, who had always been a strong evangelical, if anything, and whose marriage had been a long disillusion, the remark showed a deep fund of human nature. It must have touched a responsive chord in the susceptible heart of his questioner, and it was certainly worth many dissertations on the anthropomorphic tendencies of art and religion and the rest of it. Besides, it condensed into a sentence our feelings concerning the most winning of all the aspects in which we view the Redeemer. And it may fairly represent the mental attitude of a Protestant nation which still keeps the name of the Virgin on many of its parish churches, and recites in them the "Magnificat" every night of the year.

Mrs. Meynell, as might have been expected, takes a much more fervent view of her subject. A Catholic poet with a wonderful vein of prose, and a still profounder knowledge of literature and the arts, she was certain to wear the mantle of the rhapsodist and charm us where she might not always convince. As a matter of fact, she has taken uncommon pains to repel no one in this tribute by a woman of sensibility to the greatest of her sex in history. In her own way she has developed a thought which shines out to perfection in one of Mr. Stopford Brooke's best sermons, the indebtedness of Christ to the meditative, reverential character of His mother. She has been careful not to make the occasion, as so many of the eulogists of Joan of Arc have done, an excuse for a sex crusade. She has sedulously avoided matters of doctrine in a field where doctrine is fundamentally an issue. She has not tried our patience with dead theology about Nestorius and the Council of Ephesus. And she has been wise to put the relevant portions of the Gospels in an initial chapter by themselves as a simple statement of her theme, as well as to quote not from the Douai text favoured by her own Church, but from the Authorised Version endeared so unspeakably to us all.

Even when her self-restraint has been allowed for, it will be seen that the author of this book has had an enormous field from which to draw in the way of tradition and association. Raffaele, who painted fifty Madonnas, is only a unit in a host of Christians (and many of them non-Catholics), who have celebrated the sentimental claims of the subject here treated, and we can all appreciate Mrs. Meynell's moderation in drawing only on the representative few. She has preferred, especially in her chapters on poets and painters, to fuse the general feeling into a strain of imaginative and persuasive thought, coloured by a tone of mysticism here and there, but never far removed from common ground. For such a task we know no one so well qualified, and certainly no book of our time which treats with such delicate tact and perception a theme which has been too far obscured by controversy. Sometimes one could wish that her collaborator, Mr. Anning Bell, had been more uniformly happy in his illustrations. They are a careful blend of his idyllic style and the tense austerity of Puvis de Chavannes. His last plate is spoiled by the crippled effect of the left arm, and his "Presentation in the Temple" looks more like Lear cursing Cordelia than the holy Simeon showering on the Virgin Mother all his prophecy and pity. Still, these colour plates help to round off the perfections of a beautiful book. It does not lack fulness considering its moderate length, and as a piece of workmanship we cannot sufficiently commend it, even bearing in mind the successes of the same press in the past.

RECREATIONS OF A TOWN PHYSICIAN.*

This volume might have been called the "Recreations of a Town Physician," though in the Welsh parson's words:

"There is also another device in my prain, which, peradventure, prings goot discretions with it"

* "Another Device." By Stephen Paget. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. Paget has found a title for it that carries some of its own flavour. One or two of the contents are semi-professional papers—addresses delivered at the Middlesex Hospital and at Bart's—and not one of them perhaps but reflects the writer's profession. But the physician is here away from his consulting room. In a sense he is a "man in the street," for whom the first and the happiest of his chapters is a suggestive apology.

The street, in Mr. Paget's phrase, is the life of responsibility, and the man in it is fifty if he is a day. He too has dwelt on the mount of contemplation. He too once looked out from first-floor windows upon the crowd to which he now belongs. His place used to be with the young man up there, "apostrophizing time and space, and getting more like Shelley every minute," and gazing down upon the elders with a regret, sometimes wistful, at their indifferences. But, ungraciously, maybe, yielding to the compulsion slowly, he has condescended to the street, among those who have learned to judge and sentence themselves to narrow their plans and pay their way. You cannot imagine him young, or unmarried, or athletic, or fashionable. "It is natural at his age to be rather slow: and his myopia is presbyopia." Middle-age has compelled him to put away those things which are invisible, and look at those which are at his feet. He is tired. But the change is not all loss, though the loss is great. Oh! it is fine to be up there, at the first-floor windows. And the comfortable folk, looking down, think with some pity, how he must envy them. But he does not. This is the gain of being in the street, that it has its own wonders, and that these suffice. The street is busy and it is human, and it has a wisdom unknown to youth and to the old who remain wiseacres. That is the consolation for the man who has stepped down into it when he does lift his eyes to the place he has left.

This gives a taste of Mr. Paget's quality. In the same mood, but regarding his subject at a narrower angle, he writes of the "Influence of Berkeley," "Hora Mortis Nostræ," the "Revival of Phrenology," the "Genius of Pasteur," "Heredity and Life." Genius he recognises to be something more wonderful than is guessed at in the "childish definition" of it as an infinite capacity for taking pains. "Infinite or finite, all capacities must come from somewhere: and genius is where they come from." In Pasteur's case, the signs of it, says Mr. Paget, are the mysterious fulfilment of a plan for his life that seems to have been made for him, not by him, so that he is in himself a better argument from design than any amount of Paley's "Evidences," and next, that, being dead, he still lives in the work of his successors. From this it will be gathered that, in the paper called forth by the fashionable cult of Eugenics, the last word is not Mendel's famous experiments on the crossing of peas. Materiality is not a question of size, and "whether we talk in terms of germ-plasm, or in terms of full-sized adult bodies of men and women, we are talking of that which we do not understand." Life, in fact, is a mystery which we do not solve by invoking the Cell, and considering its ways.

D. S. MELDRUM.

THOMAS HARDY.*

Mr. Abercrombie has written an excellent and challenging study of Thomas Hardy. It is easy to find matter for contention (and keen contention) on almost every page. Moreover, his style is not an attractive one, being too often, it seems, the fault of undigested thinking; of thinking, that is, too much occupied with the intermediate stage of its own cogitation and less concerned with reducing that cogitation to a completer and more lucid order. But these are faults by the way. It is a churlish insolence to dismiss a work by personal standards, that change and progress. For example, in his "Introductory" he takes a perplexed and cogitated (it is permissible to think, even a psychologically fantastic) way of saying that Man is always conscious of a Being greater, far more splendid, than the contradiction of circumstance would assert; and that it is this greater Being of his he wishes to realise in the rituals of Art. Yet the fact is that, however arrived at, this is one of the most neglected things in modern verse or prose; and it is a very excellent thing that Mr. Abercrombie should have laid it down in the forefront of his book.

Its bearing on Thomas Hardy's Art is obvious. Indeed, it is the vindication of that Art in the teeth of its author's philosophy. Though he will not see it himself, Mr. Hardy has envisaged in his Art certain expressions of Beauty, by which indeed it lives, that constantly refute what Mr. Abercrombie calls its metaphysic formation: that constantly challenge its limitations, rather. According to our worthiness, we would rather sink with Tess, terrible discipline though it be, than swim with Alec D'Urberville. That is the moral exercise of the book: anything that might tend to drive in the opposite direction is, in the deepest sense, immoral. Similarly we would rather strive with Jude, though striving be failure, than float in the stream with Arabella. In fact, only in a limited sense can striving be failure; for the only failure, really, is the relinquishing of strife. And this indisputable sympathy of ours, this irrefutable claim to a Being greater than the contradiction of hostile circumstance, is the supreme beauty of Hardy's work, and is at the same time the contradiction of the metaphysic in which it is couched. Thereby we are purified; therein we are exalted. Mr. Abercrombie would have it that our perception of Beauty, our exaltation, arises only from seeing Hardy cast his story, with all its metaphysic implications, into a well-knit form. In fact, he is so deservedly pleased with this idea that he repeats it, with and without changes, persistently every few pages throughout the book. I suggest that this is another half-way house in his thinking. There is a higher than the beauty of craftsmanship, and it is the beauty of idea. The former quickens a sense of gratification and large ease; it is the latter that exalts. And we are profoundly stirred by Hardy's sense of tragedy because in it we instinctively ally ourselves with beauty and worth, we instinctively take rank with a more splendid and less gross Being, even though they may seem to be crushed down by the wheels of circumstance. Which is another way of saying that, in some more significant metaphysic (to hold to Mr. Abercrombie's phrasing), that is even implicit in Hardy's formation, beauty and worth are not failures. Else whence came this instinct, the basis of the purest Art?

We have given detailed attention to this because it is the central idea of Mr. Abercrombie's arresting book. It is one of the causes why the word "formation" (in and out of italics) is given such heavy work to do; and it gives a curiously tantalising limitation to the book. Yet if it be tentative and insecure on its more philosophical side, on the critical side it is as finished as it is just. His division among the novels is particularly happy. Wisely he decries any over-emphasis on artificial and arbitrary definitions; yet in speaking of such novels as "Far from the Madding Crowd," "The Return of the Native," "The Mayor of Casterbridge" and "The Woodlanders" as being in Dramatic Form, and "Tess" and "Jude the Obscure" as in Epic Form (with his exposition of the advantages of each form), he states a distinction so just and true that it must always be thought of henceforward in dealing with Hardy's novels. The massed grouping of the first series, with the implicit spiritual background, and the continuous narrative of the latter series, with Hardy's own explicit outcry, and the way in which "The Mayor of Casterbridge" leads out from one to the other, is expounded with a clearness of critical perception that well illuminates its subject.

Indeed, Mr. Abercrombie is far happier here than in the chapter on "The Dynasts," though it is evident that he chiefly values the latter. There he scarcely realises his own axiom of a "formative" power in the artist. He fails to make theme follow theme simply and justly; and consequently repeats himself unnecessarily. He does not less than justice to that very great poem ; yet it is not always easy to follow the line of his approach. For example, in declaring it to be "one of the most momentous achievements in modern literature" he surely carries all of us with him. But in saying "This is great modern poetry, artistic formation of humanity related with our ultimate conception," he carries us by no means so securely. Why "modern poetry," we ask? Did not Æschylus create an artistic formation of humanity related with ultimate conception? Surely it would be truer to say, not that "The Dynasts" is either modern or ancient, but simply that it is great, and therefore outside the interposition of Time.

* "Thomas Hardy: A Critical Study." By Lascelles Abercrombie. 7s. 6d. net. (Martin Secker.)

Mr. Arthur Ransome's useful addition to "critical apparatus" in distinguishing between kinetic and potential poetry, is laid under tribute with excellent effect in this book, particularly in dealing with Hardy's poems. It would be fair to say that Mr. Abercrombie's own style is kinetic rather than potential ; unhappily so, even, when one is told that "Tess's tragedy is a specimen syllogism in the cruel reasoning of universal fate." Moreover, on its own lines, his thought is too often fond of perplexities for their own academic sake. Yet when he is less concerned with his often bookish philosophies his thought shines clearly out in some penetrating criticism ; and the result is a book that is illuminating in the main, and arresting always.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

THE HABIT OF LETTERS.*

In his latest book Mr. Austin Dobson, with reference to Fielding, speaks of "that natural habit of letters . . . which a cheap criticism is accustomed to stigmatize as pretentious erudition." Whether withered by that criticism or moribund from some other cause, the habit is certainly growing rarer. The disinterested love of literature is not nowadays in high repute as a motive for writing. The man of letters, pure and simple, is almost an extinct species. Critics and essayists we still have in abundance, but they are all busy reconstructing the cosmos, a little regardless of the not impertinent question whether they have the necessary qualifications for that really rather arduous undertaking.

With the death of Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. Dobson and Mr. Gosse become almost the last, as they are certainly the most distinguished, survivors of a less ambitious generation. The coupling of their names carries one back to the days when it was the youthful poet's aspiration "to rhyme with Gosse, Dobson and Co.," in the intricacies of ballade and virelai. That fashion is almost forgotten in the hurry of modern changes, and these two books also—"At Prior Park" and "Portraits and Sketches"—have a certain old-time flavour, due far more to their isolation than to any archaism of manner. That this should be so, is a pity, for such books are very desirable. We cannot live on a diet of theories such as the moderns insist on serving us. Let us, if only by way of a change, enjoy things (whether books or men, walks or wines) for their own sake, and not be for ever concerned with an ulterior motive which recedes as we advance. Theories of life are apt to be inhuman, and we turn from them with relief to the records of its practice, whether that practice take the form of fighting battles or of painting pictures. We agree with Mr. Gosse in enjoying what M. Paul Desjardins has called "la cinématographie d'une abeille dans le mystère de la mellification"; and that is what Mr. Dobson and Mr. Gosse are pre-eminently qualified to show us. "At Prior Park," clad in the familiar blue buckram which Messrs. Chatto and Windus reserve for their most distinguished authors (Swinburne, Stevenson, Dobson) is a series of essays in Mr. Dobson's accustomed manner. It deals, that is to say, with various eighteenth century topics of secondary importance, and deals with them with unsurpassable intimacy, erudition and charm. Mr. Dobson really lives in the period of which he writes. Even his immense allusiveness is bounded by its limits or, on the exceptional occasions when he reaches backwards or forwards beyond these, by its spirit. Horace and Thackeray represent his extreme divagations. The eighteenth century, differing so completely from our own, can yet be made peculiarly real to us ; partly because of the wealth of lively memoirs in which it is chronicled, but mainly because its society was so homogeneous that its spirit may be imprisoned in a small compass. It is the admirable distinction of Mr. Dobson to be able to express that spirit almost as vividly as Horace Walpole himself. In one of the most delightful studies in his present volume he writes of Carmontelle that "his backgrounds and accessories are always informing and appropriate ; and his details of costume minutely studied." No criticism of Mr. Dobson's own "eighteenth century vignettes" could be more aptly phrased, unless it be added that his principal figures are in due proportion to their setting and sufficiently endowed with the circumscribed vitality of their age.

If Mr. Gosse's studies are old-fashioned, it is only by virtue of their catholicity and urbanity. In all other respects they are modern enough. All of his subjects lived in the nineteenth century ; most of them died in the twentieth, one of them is still alive ; and with all of them has Mr. Gosse had personal acquaintance. The chapter to which most readers will turn with the greatest interest is the first and longest, that dealing with Swinburne. While the poet lived, a proper, but by no means usual, reticence was observed as to his personality and habits. The consequence was that rumour had its way with him. Mr. Gosse's pages are the first portrait, of anything approaching finish, which has appeared ; nor is it likely to be surpassed for vitality and tact. Mr. Gosse loves the truth and is not afraid to tell it ; but since he has a genuine admiration and understanding of his subject, there is nothing displeasing in his frankness. He shows us the Swinburne he knew, a man of great powers and great limitations, and incidentally he clears away various misconceptions, such as that for which Maupassant was largely responsible in connection with the famous adventure at Etretat. One would like to see a full biography of Swinburne by Mr. Gosse.

The only other writer of a stature equal to Swinburne's dealt with in "Portraits and Studies" is Tennyson, and the pages dealing with him are few and lightly sketched. Some of Mr. Gosse's subjects are forgotten or unfamiliar. Bailey, the author of "Festus," and "Orion" Horne are names and nothing more to all but the curious. Of the latter, whose "farthing epic" was once famous, the record is entertaining reading. How he sat on the floor and played the guitar at Arthur O'Shaughnessy's wedding ; how he threw a snowball at Keats ; how "suddenly, and desperately determined to marry, he went down to stay with Miss Mitford in Berkshire, and proposed to all the neighbouring heiresses one after another, to the intense indignation of that lady, who declared that he had used her hospitable dining-room, on the same day, to propose to a lady (with £50,000 a year) at lunch, and to another (with £40,000 a year) at tea" ; how he professed the art of natation in Australia : these are only a few of the incidents in the career of a remarkable character.

But Bailey and Horne and Aubrey de Vere were old men when Mr. Gosse knew them. He is at his best when writing of contemporaries with whom he has long been acquainted. Perhaps the most interesting study in the book, after the "Swinburne," is that on Mandell Creighton. To many of us the late Bishop of London has been an august ecclesiastic and a historian more erudite than entertaining. For the future he will also be the redoubtable pedestrian who not only walked Mr. Gosse off his legs but insisted on his fording the Coquet in two places and walking bare-foot across an intervening mile of stubble.

But Mr. Gosse goes deeper than mere anecdote. There is a wealth of critical wisdom in his study of Creighton, of Shorthouse "faciendo il bergamasco," of Andrew Lang.

* "At Prior Park and other Papers." By Austin Dobson. 6s. (Chatto & Windus.)

"Portraits and Sketches." By Edmund Gosse. 6s. net. Heinemann.)

One paragraph concerning the latter should, as a corrective to loose thinking, be underlined :

"When he died, all the newspapers were loud in proclaiming his 'versatility.' But I am not sure that he was not the very opposite of versatile. I take 'versatile' to mean changeable, fickle, constantly ready to alter direction with the weather-cock. The great instance of versatility in literature is Ruskin, who adopted diametrically different views of the same subject at different times of his life, and defended them with equal ardour. To be versatile seems to be unsteady, variable. But Lang was through his long career singularly unaltered; he never changed his point of view; what he liked and admired as a youth he liked and admired as an elderly man. It is true that his interests and knowledge were vividly drawn along a surprisingly large number of channels, but while there was abundance there does not seem to me to have been versatility. If a huge body of water boils up from a crater, it may pour down a dozen paths, but these will always be the same; unless there is an earthquake, new cascades will not form nor old rivulets run dry. In some authors earthquakes do take place—as in Tolstoy, for instance, and in S. T. Coleridge—but nothing of this kind was ever manifest in Lang, who was extraordinarily multiform, yet in his varieties strictly consistent from Oxford to the grave."

Here is one of those obvious truths which only the wise are simple enough to see. But the whole chapter is full of sympathetic and penetrating things.

Perhaps the essay on Carl Snoilsky will not mean very much to those innocent of Swedish, but those dealing respectively with Eugène Melchior de Vogué and André Gide are most interesting evidences of the sympathy with modern foreign literature which Mr. Gosse has so often shown. The latter is the one living author of whom he writes.

"If the presence of M. André Gide among so many of those who have passed away is objected to," he says charmingly in his preface, "I will say that I like to feel that I take one living friend with me in my round of respectful visits to the dead. His is not a portrait; it is hardly an outline; but I wish to delay no longer in recommending to the study of English readers a fascinating writer, still young, who is destined, I believe, to take a place in the very first rank of European writers."

There could be no better proof of the vitality of the critic's mind, of his lasting readiness to extend the range of his sympathy, than this study of a comparatively new writer. Here is the very reverse of that "curious ossification of intellect" which Mr. Gosse notes to have overtaken Swinburne before he had reached his fortieth year. M. Gide has already, one fancies, a small circle of admirers in England. It seems scarcely too much to prophesy that he will find a new adherent in every reader of Mr. Gosse's attractive essay. Most of his books are at present out of the London Library: a practical demonstration, surely, of the potency of Mr. Gosse's pen.

FRANCIS BICKLEY.

A CENTURY OF GREAT ACTORS.*

Mr. Cecil F. Armstrong, who, we believe, is a son of Sir Walter Armstrong, the Director of the National Gallery of Ireland, and has been for some time a theatrical manager's reader, has produced in "A Century of Great Actors," a very alert, a very scholarly, and an entirely readable account of fourteen eminent players who flourished between 1750 and 1850. His list is fairly comprehensive, including names as familiar in one's mouth as those of Garrick, Kemble, Edmund Kean and Macready, a great jeune premier and lover such as Spranger Barry, lesser tragedians of the rank of Henderson and of Cooke, and such popular comedians as Macklin, Munden, Mathews and Robson. But we could wish that he had extruded Henderson to make room for the distinguished personage who figured as that actor's colleague in the readings which the two men used to give at the Freemasons' Hall—we allude, of course, to the father of the great Richard Brinsley. Thomas Sheridan, the son of Swift's witty but unlucky friend, has never yet received his due. We may call him the Hermann Vezin of his time. A scholar who could boast of having received the honorary M.A. degree from both our older Universities, a dictionary-maker like Dr. Johnson, and, like Doctor major, a pensioner, too; a teacher of elocution to the nobility and gentry who thought he had a mission to reform the pronunciation of English, an actor who was a contemporary of David Garrick's and of Spranger Barry's, and who maintained a professional rivalry with both men; the husband of the lady who, as the author of "The Memoirs of Miss Sidney Biddulph" and of "Noujahed," was the most popular woman novelist of her time; the friend who reconciled James Boswell to his father, Lord Affleck, and lent Bozzy money to pay his gambling debts; a theatrical manager who suffered in purse and in popularity for his gallant attempt to preserve decency and decorum in the conduct of the leading Dublin playhouse; a father who on one celebrated occasion drank himself drunk while delivering a lecture on sobriety to that famous future tippler, Richard Brinsley Sheridan, such a man, a man of pluck, of grit, of personality, a real character—to use the cant phrase, was surely far more worthy of commemoration in a procession of great actors than a brilliant mime like Henderson, or an infant prodigy like Master Betty. Again, we cannot understand why Mr. Armstrong, who rightly devotes the largest space in his book to Edmund Kean, the greatest tragic actor who has appeared on our stage since Betterton retired, should, by the number of pages which he assigns to a description of their respective careers, put Macready, "moral, grave, sublime," as Tennyson hails him, but otherwise essentially mediocre, on the same level with Garrick, the greatest, because the most versatile, player who has ever trodden the boards of an English theatre. Nor can we appreciate the point of view which makes the compiler of this volume dismiss that great and leisurely declaimer, John Philip Kemble, in a chapter no longer than that which he allots to the centenarian character-actor, Charles Macklin. Otherwise we have nothing but praise for "A Century of Great Actors." Mr. Armstrong's attitude is neither that of the actor-lover nor that of the theatrical enthusiast. Knowing the stage both from the front and from behind the scenes, he, of necessity takes a detached view, and he is candid enough to give his readers the benefit of his detachment. The result is a work which is as outspoken in criticism of the William Charles Macready.

From "A Century of Great Actors," by Cecil F. Armstrong. (Mills & Boon.)

* "A Century of Great Actors." By Cecil F. Armstrong. 1cs. 6d. net. (Mills & Boon.)

human vanities and weaknesses from which his subjects suffered as it is discriminating in its appraisal of their histrionic merits and demerits. In a word, the author writes of these cabotins of yesterday with the air of a man who has studied the genus actor at close quarters, and has pursued his studies with a gentle cynicism, a mingled sense of tolerance and of amusement. But we have one serious complaint to make. What authority has Mr. Armstrong for asserting in his life of Garrick that "Johnson to the last nursed a grievance against" his old friend and scholar in the matter of "Irene"? So far as we know, neither Boswell, Fanny Burney, Hawkins or Murphy affords the slightest evidence for such a declaration. Moreover, prima facie, the Doctor was far too magnanimous a person to cherish a lasting feeling of resentment against an old friend—even though he were a player—in respect of a failure for which that friend was in no wise responsible, and which, indeed, he did his best to avert. Dr. Johnson, as dramatic author, was assuredly not a feeble creature of the stamp of Fanny Burney's friend and adviser, "Daddy" Crisp.

THROUGH INDIAN EYES.*

Time and again Anglo-Indian writers have taken the reading public into their confidence and, in the frankest language, stated their opinions of the educated Indian, or "the Babu," as they style him; but rarely has a native of India been accorded the privilege of returning the compliment by plainly telling just what he thought of the Englishman in Hindostan and at home. In this circumstance, the publication of this volume presenting the ideas of a Bengalee barrister regarding institutions as they exist in Great Britain, the relations of the Mother Country with the Colonies, British rule in India, and the Britons in whose charge it is placed, is of more than passing interest.

The book, the author tells us, is written with the purpose of showing how India "may impart (to Great Britain) the philosophic temperament which, in struggle, success, or failure retains a uniform serenity, without which the capacity for virile effort is marred by undue elation or despondency," and how Great Britain "may communicate (to Hindostan) physical and mental energy, and the spirit of unrest, without which the glory of life and its ideals can not be attained." This is a noble but herculean task, and its accomplishment is likely to take a long time. The "Anglo-Asiatics," as the writer calls them, will question Mr. Manmath Mallik's right and ability to undertake a work of this character, and after a careful perusal of his book, will condemn the way pointed out by him as one leading to perdition. The stay-at-home Briton, if he possesses the virtue of patience in excelsis, however, will read with interest the philosophic disquisition which takes up the bulk of the volume, since it reflects the psychology of the British-made Indian. But whether or not he will become a convert to the Bengalee writer's system of reasoning is a moot question, which shall not be answered here, though the reviewer has a definite opinion on the subject.

The latter portion of the book, devoted to a criticism of British institutions, is, no doubt, the part which will appeal to the average Englishman more than the réchauffé of idealistic platitudes which is served in the first two chapters. The author admires the limited monarchy, which he likens to the "Aryan conception of Godhead," influencing everything and vitalising every department of State without mixing up with them, and gives it as his opinion that this feature of it constitutes the greatest asset of the nation. England, to his mind, is unsurpassed for originality of thought and boldness of enterprise. The Liberal Party, according to his belief, appeals to all the virile instincts of all sections and races at home and in all parts of the Empire, and enjoys the support of those who are opposed to privilege and who favour equality of opportunity for all British citizens. He believes that the British aristocracy has become degenerate, basing this conclusion upon what he describes as its foolish attempts to usurp authority over the representatives of the people in finance as well as in legislation, this degeneracy being indicated by the language in which some of its members openly indulge. While he believes that trade unions and combinations may be necessary in order to check the selfishness of capital, he exhorts the Labour leaders to beware lest they sink in the mire of selfish greed, and advises the executive ruthlessly to put down all excesses of democracy. Mr. Mallik is not favourably impressed with the manners of English tradesmen and shop assistants, but thinks well of London on account of its excellent sanitation, the comforts of life and scientific and educational facilities which it provides, and the true Imperial spirit prevalent amongst all classes, which makes no distinction of race, nationality, or place of birth, and is tolerant of religious differences. He admires English women, declaring that they generally have a more intellectual type of countenance than their Continental sisters. He considers the women of Great Britain to be generally business-like and well able to take care of themselves, less prone than other women of Europe to waste time and thought on frivolous affairs of the heart, and he believes that some of them should be given the vote.

The Bengalee author has a very poor opinion of Anglo-Indians, and declares it to be his belief that they return from India so saturated with self-importance and contempt for others that they are degenerating the manners of Britons. He pooh-poohs their knowledge of Hindostan, and says their claim of omniscience is based merely upon the fact of a long residence in the Peninsula, during which the only natives they came in real contact with were their servants.

Mr. Mallik dislikes the British Colonials even more than the Anglo-Indians, asserting that hitherto they have shown little consideration for British trade and other interests. The word Empire, according to his conception of its meaning, ought not to be applied to British dominions which can pass any laws they like without fear of veto, and impose duties on British manufactures. The term, in his opinion, is strictly applicable only to the connection between Great Britain and India, and he refers to the native Indians as "Britons," throughout the volume.

The author finds serious flaws in the Government of India, describing it as a hotch-potch of good intentions and helplessness, and declaring it to be wholly opposed to British instincts and traditions and so openly displaying fondness for Mongol methods that it can "scarcely be designated as British merely because it is administered by natives of Britain." As to the claim that the present Administration of India is better than previous régimes, the writer points out that it is no great compliment to Great Britain to say that it is better able to govern than its predecessors, who have been described by responsible men as semi-savages, and directs attention to the fact that British-Indian rule cannot even claim to give the lead to progressive Asian governments. Unless the British are willing to let the natives have some "control over taxation, some safeguard against official vagaries, some method of prevention of the growth of bureaucratic infallibility," Mr. Mallik does not hesitate to say that the system cannot truthfully claim to be British, or even as far advanced as the purely Asiatic government of Japan.

As to what he wants in the future, the author, after making it clear that India should not part company with Great Britain, pleads for the recognition of the Dependency as a vital part of the Empire; for Indian representation in both Houses of Parliament; for the removal of partiality in the administration of justice between Europeans and Indians; for the cessation of personal ill-treatment to which Indians of all classes are subjected whenever they come in contact with any European on the railways or at other public places; and for the discontinuance of racial distinction in the civil, military, and naval services; and urges that the Government shall be so carried on that the people of the Peninsula may feel that it is really their own rather than a foreign domination superimposed from the outside.

S. N. S.]

* "A Study in Ideals: Great Britain and India." By Manmath C. Mallik. 10s. 6d. net. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

The Native Village

From "Joseph Pennell's Pictures of the Panama Canal." (Heinemann).

JOSEPH PENNELL'S PICTURES OF THE PANAMA CANAL.*

"In another place" [as the old House of Commons phrase had it] Mr. Pennell has spoken of the inspiration to the artist that the work of his own time has always been, from Rembrandt who drew the mills and dykes of Holland, to Meunier who found his subjects in the coal mines and furnaces of Belgium. Mr. Pennell went out to see if the stupendous work of the Panama Canal could give him motives of pictorial value, for, he says, to-day the greatest works are in progress that man has ever undertaken, and he believes "great work means great decoration." He describes how he found one of his pictures, the time being at the dinner-hour, when the workmen were coming to the surface from the bottom of a great lock they were building on the canal. "I looked into a yawning gulf, the bottom filled with crowds of tiny men and tiny trains—all in a maze of work. Overhead huge iron buckets flew to and fro, great cranes raised or lowered masses of material. As I looked, a bell rang, the men dropped their tools, the engines whistled, everything stopped instantly save that from the depths a long chain came quickly up, and clinging to the end of it, as Cellini would have grouped them, were a dozen men—a living design—the most decorative motive I have ever seen in the Wonder of Work." Mr. Pennell's pictures are lithographs, and it is unnecessary to say they are masterly, for we all know and all admire his work; but the originality of the subjects may daunt some of his admirers who would prefer pictures of the mountains, crowned with strange trees, long level lines of cloud that hang motionless before the hills, the impenetrable jungle and native villages the artist speaks of but does not draw. A hint of the jungle we have in the drawing of "The Old Railroad," a picture so full of atmosphere that it seems to suggest stories of the Spanish Main in its view of the islands and a distant shore. But generally the drawings are of engineering feats, lock gates and railroads, a record of that wonder of work the artist made a journey of 15,000 miles, he says, to see, in an enterprise he congratulates himself upon. With this result before us, he must allow us to say it was an enterprise everyone else will congratulate him upon also.

SCOTT.†

When a writer tells us that Scott is overrated, or grown old-fashioned, and that nobody reads him nowadays, you

* "Joseph Pennell's Pictures of the Panama Canal." 5s. net. (Heinemann).

† The Novels of Sir Walter Scott. 24 volumes. Illustrated. 1s. 6d. net each. (Henry Frowde: Oxford Press.)

cannot safely take it to mean more than that that particular writer was never under his spell, or is not so much under it now as he used to be—perhaps because he is himself the nobody who no longer reads him. Of course there are all manner of faults to be found with Scott, as there are indeed with the universe: he is careless, even slipshod in style; he took large liberties with historical facts and personages; he is sometimes verbose, his dialogue is sometimes too stilted and formal; he amplified his novels with prefaces that many of us like better even than the novels themselves and many of us do not like at all. Carlyle gave him a black mark because he had no message, but more modern criticism counts that among his virtues, for we have learned that the novelist burdened with a message is invariably overburdened by it. What we want from the great novelist is a great story, and I doubt whether Scott or any other teller of tales could wish for a higher or more satisfying testimony than that of Coleridge, who said: "When I am very ill indeed I can read Scott's novels, and they are almost the only books I can then read."

It is by those qualities in him that appealed to Coleridge that Scott still lives and will go on living. Personally, I have found that those of his stories which I read as a boy disappointed me a little when I re-read them in maturer years, but I know that was only because I am too sophisticated ever again to recapture my intense boyish rapture, and absorbed interest in them, and I am always glad that I left some of them unread, for these have given me an after-taste of that first luxury of delight, and there are still one or two that I am keeping for the future, in case no new Scott emerges to provide for my old age. I am assured that "The Pirate," "Peveril of the Peak," and "The Black Dwarf," are three of his worst novels. I only know that I read them when I was very young, and that if any man published now a novel that I thought would give me half the pleasure that they did I would buy it with my own money. I doubt if I shall ever read them or "Count Robert of Paris" again, but when people who are easily bored assure me they are dull I, with my memories of them, find it quite impossible to believe it. I confess I thought less of "Waverley," and if I was enraptured with "The Fortunes of Nigel" it may have been because it is so largely about old London and places in it that were very familiar to me. "Rob Roy," had first place in my later affections until I read "Ivanhoe," and at present I am not certain whether his greatest work is in "The Heart of Midlothian" or in "The Bride of Lammermoor," and do not especially care: it is enough for me that they are great novels, both.

No one who can enjoy Scott wants to criticise him. He delves into Scottish history for such books as "Waverley," "The Heart of Midlothian," "Old Mortality," "Rob Roy," "The Antiquary," into English history for "Woodstock," "The Fortunes of Nigel," "Peveril of the Peak," "Kenilworth," into French history for "Quentin Durward," and what does it matter to you or me whether his history is good or bad? We go to him for a good story and he gives it to us, and those who ask for more have no business to be reading novels at all. He is the true successor of those old bards who "held children from their play and old men from the fireside" whilst they sang or said their tales to spellbound audiences in the halls and courtyards of an earlier day. And it is because he is the primitive, natural story-teller at his highest that I am never comfortable with his books when they appear in library editions. He is not for the library so much as for the ingle-nook, the seat in the garden, the resting-place somewhere in the open air, and his books have their appropriate form in some such handy, pleasant editions as this that Mr. Frowde has just issued. Well and clearly printed; neatly and tastefully bound; enriched with a numerous selection of the old illustrations; light to handle and not too large for the pocket withal: these volumes produce Scott exactly as he ought to be produced

I am not sure that it was not rather a mistake to gild the top edges ; but in spite of that this is an ideal edition of the work of the world's greatest teller of tales ; the very sight of it tempts you to write no more of them, but to take your pick and settle down with a volume in the arm-chair and employ yourself more profitably, dreaming through again one of the Wizard's glorious dreams.

S. J.

FRANCE, MÆDIAEVAL AND MODERN.*

These two books—both of them by writers who have unusual qualifications for handling their respective subjects—present a piquant contrast, not only with one another, but with the current view of the Middle Ages and the popular notions of the modern Frenchman and Frenchwoman. Instead of the splendours of knightly prowess and chivalry, and gallant courtesy, the Sorbonne professor offers us the sordid picture of a civilization overrun by violence, rapine, and famine, where the mass of men led an existence of almost unbelievable misery, and where women were in a condition of extreme wretchedness and degradation. And instead of the elegant, trifling, brilliant but unstable Frenchman of our imaginations, with his companion, the vivacious, witty, doll-like, volatile Frenchwoman, Madame de Pratz shows us a nation of industrious workers, whose men are motivated by thrift, prudence, and foresight, and whose women hold their own with the men in every department of practical life as well as in intellectual affairs.

M. Luchaire, whose death before this book was ready for publication caused a serious loss to historical research, was one of the leading authorities on mediæval France, and the present volume is a comprehensive account of the state of the country at the beginning of the thirteenth century, a period that has suffered more than most from hasty and unfounded idealisations. It was, as M. Luchaire paints it, one of the darkest periods in French history. Security for person or property did not exist ; petty feudal tyrants exploited and oppressed the poor, and harried one another with every circumstance of rapine and cruelty ; robber bands infested the country ; famine and pestilence were habitual visitors ; religion had become a childish and degraded superstition, finding expression in a "ritual magic" such as we usually associate with tribes sunk in the depths of barbarism. Yet "in this human society, excited by daily sufferings and terrors, living in the midst of hallucinations and visions," as M. Luchaire says, "everything happened, even the improbable." The Children's Crusade, for example, is so improbable that some historians have denied its existence, but the couple of pages devoted to it in the present volume enable us to see something of the glamour and horror of that astounding episode.

But the value of M. Luchaire's book does not lie in any picturesque details, but in his account of the daily life of prince and noble, priest and peasant, as far as materials exist for an accurate picture of these. We are given chapters on the noble at war and the noble in time of peace, and their perusal leads one to doubt which state was preferable for the unhappy peasants.

"To the knight or baron," writes M. Luchaire, "the peasant, serf or free, was only a source of revenue, of income : in time of peace they oppressed him at home as much as they could with imposts and corvées ; in time of war in foreign territories they pillaged, murdered, burnt, trampled upon him, in order to inflict the greatest possible destruction upon the adversary. It was of this that war consisted . . . Disdain, even disgust, on the part of the proprietor and seignior for the cultivator and artisan whose work supported him, is one of the most characteristic features of the middle age."

To even the most advanced thinker of the period of which M. Luchaire writes, such an apparition as Madame Claire de Pratz would have been a portent far more marvellous than the wonders in which he freely believed. The status of women is a good test of civilisation, and the rise in that status is one of the most significant things in the progress of the past seven centuries. Madame de Pratz is something of a feminist, and her most interesting chapters are those in which she writes of the triumphs of her sex. Indeed, the development of woman's work in France is astounding. Teaching is a profession in which women excel, and in the Lycée Racine, where Madame de Pratz was a professor, there are forty married women teachers, earning salaries twice as large as their husbands, many of whom are clerks in Government offices. Then in Paris there are women barristers, women doctors, dentists, oculists and chemists, doing admirable work and winning the favour of increasing numbers of clients. In the business world, an acquaintance of Madame de Pratz has established a shop that brings in 40,000 francs a year, the proprietor's husband being employed as cashier at an annual salary of £100.

* "Social France at the Time of Philip Augustus." By Achille Luchaire. Translated by E. B. Krehbiel. 10s. 6d. net. (Murray.)

"France From Within." By Claire de Pratz. 10s. 6d. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"There are fifty women owners or editors of papers, gazettes, reviews or magazines, and considerably more engaged in journalism. According to the lists published by the Société des Gens de Lettres, there are over two hundred writers in France earning from 4,000 to 20,000 francs a year. There are 117,000 women fonctionnaires in France altogether, including the Post Office and Telephonic contingent. The primary educational schools employ 60,000, the secondary schools between 1,500 and 2,000. The Assistance Publique employs 4,000 women, and there are now twenty inspectresses and more at the Ministry of Commerce.

"There is no material or intellectual work in France in which women have no part. Out of the 14,381,462 female population, there are 6,381,658 women employed in some kind of remunerative professional work, which makes an average of nearly half the women of France. There are 7,728,854 married women in France, and of these 2,685,796 are wage-earners as well as wives. In no country in the world are there so many professional workers amongst married women as in France."

And, our author notes, the rapid growth of feminist ideals in France has been less the work of leagues and groups than of the "quiet, concentrated, unanimous effort of all Frenchwomen, each for her own individual enfranchisement. . . . Each is convincing her own men as well as the other men around her," with the result that, without any clamour, changes are being made in the Code Napoleon, and this social and economic feminism is making itself felt in the political sphere.

Many other aspects of contemporary French life are pleasantly treated in Madame de Pratz's pages, but this is the one on which she lays most stress. One of her anecdotes, illustrating the democratic spirit that welds together Frenchmen of all grades of society, deserves to be quoted, if only for the contrast it presents to the mediæval temper which M. Luchaire describes. In one of Madame de Pratz's classes at the Lycée Racine there were two little girls—Jeanne and Louise—who had become close friends. As they went home one day with their respective escorts, they discovered that they both lived in the same building, that part of the Palace of the Louvre which is occupied by the Ministry of Finance.

"Do you mean to say that you live here ?" asked Jeanne of Louise.

"Yes, my papa is the usher to the Minister," said Louise, in the most simple manner possible, and without the slightest confusion.

"Oh !" exclaimed Jeanne, "how funny ! My papa is the Minister !"

The next morning the Minister stopped his usher in the ante-chamber, and said :

"I hear that your daughter and mine attend the same lycée. It might save your wife two journeys a day, if the maid who accompanies my little girl brought yours back with mine. Mention it to your wife, and let it be arranged in that way."

A. W. EVANS.

MR. MAX BEERBOHM AS "A SEDULOUS APE."*

What would be your sensations, if you bought a ticket for a Paderewski concert and found, when you got to the hall, the stage littered with all sorts of musical instruments, and the Master, instead of offering you a sonata of

* "A Christmas Garland." Woven by Max Beerbohm. 5s. net. (Heinemann.)

Beethoven, a nocturne of Chopin, and a rhapsody of Liszt, in his inimitable manner on the piano, presenting you with an imitation of Kubelik on the violin, of Pablo Casals on the 'cello, Sir Frederick Bridge on the organ, and Yvette Guilbert on the human voice? Would you be disappointed or would you be well pleased? Personally I should be grievously disappointed; but then I happen to be one of those persons who would rather see Miss Cissie Loftus playing Peter Pan, than see her mimicking, however cleverly, other actresses playing other parts.

All of which is a prelude to saying that those who would like to see Mr. Max Beerbohm masquerading in the literary guise of his contemporaries will welcome his "Christmas Garland," whilst those who prefer to see him garbed in his own dainty cap and bells will be a wee bit disappointed, at moments perhaps a little resentful. For it will, I think, be admitted that parody must of necessity have in it the element of disrespect, and, however much we may regard the eccentricities of Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. George Moore, Mr. Chesterton, or even Mr. Kipling as fair game for the caricaturist, we are hardly disposed at this time of day to take too kindly fun poked at George Meredith, Mr. Thomas Hardy and Mr. Henry James. It may be that I am old-fashioned, but I prefer not to laugh at sacred subjects.

Which being said by way of qualification, I can otherwise heartily recommend to those who like this sort of thing Mr. Max Beerbohm in his assumption of the character of "the sedulous ape." Certainly he catches his victims to the life. Here are two passages taken almost at random.

"There was a man came to an inn by night, and after he had called three times they should open him the door—though why three times, and not three times three, nor thirty times thirty—which is the number of the little stone devils that make mows at St. Alcesius of Ladera over against the marshes Gué-la-Nuce to this day, nor three times three hundred (which is a bestial number), nor three thousand times three-and-thirty, upon my soul I know not, and nor do you—when, then, this jolly fellow had three times cried out, shouted, yelled, holla'd, loudly besought, caterwauled, brayed, sung out, and roared, he did by the same token set himself to beat, hammer, bang, pummel, and knock at the door," etc.

"My roving thoughts were caught back to the divine score which Arnold Dolmetch was reading to me. How well placed they were, those semibreves! Could anyone but Palestrina have placed them so nicely? I wondered what girl Palestrina was courting when he conceived them. She must have been blonde, surely, and with narrow flanks. . . . There are moments when one does not think of girls, are there not, dear reader? And I swear to you that such a moment came to me while Dolmetch mumbled the last two bars of that Mass. . . ."

Delightful, are they not, and unmistakable? Indeed, I can imagine few more amusing games than taking this clever "Christmas Garland" of Mr. Beerbohm's in a circle of literary and sympathetic friends, reading out passages taken like these at haphazard and seeing which of the circle could quickest recognise the clever mimicry. That there would be plenty of laughter I am sure, for laughter is infectious, and I can pay this rare tribute to Mr. Beerbohm, that he has made me laugh aloud in the solitude of my own study.

G. S. LAYARD.

ESSAYS AND STUDIES.*

In the last of the essays which go to make up this collection Mr. Galsworthy remarks that much criticism of late has been converted "from judgment pronounced into impression recorded." The method is eminently suitable in the present case. Mr. Galsworthy has himself supplied a rough and ready classification of the two main headings under which these studies naturally fall by labelling them "Concerning Life" and "Concerning Letters" respectively, but this classification does not carry us very far and the territory of "Life" is continually being invaded by marauding expeditions from the country of "Letters." A better classification, perhaps, (if classification there must be) would have separated those essays which show Mr. Galsworthy in an introspective mood from those which reveal him as the artist describing his impressions unembroidered to any real extent by his reflections. But the point will not bear undue elaboration, and it is made mainly to show that any "pronounced judgment"—beyond that of praise and admiration—is impossible upon a book of which the component parts are so various and so disconnected.

And yet one may trace, perhaps, a certain underlying coherence in the thoughts which inspire many of these studies and say that the general impression produced is that of a plea for tolerance. This plea, addressed to all people who are sufficiently educated, and so constituted naturally as to be able to see two sides of a question, is the very soul of the opening essay from which the book takes its title. Wandering through a wild and beautiful Italian countryside, Mr. Galsworthy comes upon an inn with the legend "Osteria di Tranquillità" upon which Progress has already laid her hand. Out of the olive grove which grew to its very doors a skittle alley had been formed, and the owner of the hotel, standing in that alley with his ugly modern clothes, blandly announces between the puffs of his full-flavoured cigar that he is about to call his inn the "Anglo-American Hotel." The incongruous presence of the man "within one short flight of a cuckoo from this home of Pan" (an exquisite Hesiodic touch) plunged Mr. Galsworthy into meditation from which he emerged with the conviction that, if everything in the universe which has an individual shape is a fit expression of the separate moods of a great underlying Mood, perfectly adjusted and everlasting, then "we are all little bits of continuity, and if we are all little bits of continuity, it is ridiculous for one of us to despise another."

The same philosophy is at the bottom of his description of "Sheep-Shearing" with its vignette of the unsophisticated postman:

"In that little misunderstanding between me and the postman was all the essence of the difference between that state of civilization in which sheep could prompt a sentiment, and that state in which sheep could not."

The postman's lack of perception, we are left to infer, brought sympathetic compassion, indeed, into the heart of his interlocutor, but no sense of contempt.

But how, Mr. Galsworthy asks, about such as do not feel it ridiculous to despise, whose temperaments and religions show them all things so plainly that they know they are right? In this class is the old College chum, now a clergyman, with whom he discusses the ethics of marriage and divorce. To this problem also Mr. Galsworthy furnishes his own answer. Such people, he says, are right to feel contempt, it being natural to them, for they are "the expressions of contemptuous moods (of the great Mood), having religions and so forth suitable to these moods." And so, though he cannot claim that these thoughts are new (and, indeed, Nietzsche has expressed much the same thing) he at least feels that they have given him some feelings of tranquillity.

But the philosopher is not always insistent. There is the sheer artist in the study "Magpie Over the Hill" with its beautiful descriptions of Nature and its simple picture of the little boy torn between his two young mistresses. As an example of skill in writing the sketch is supreme. Mr. Galsworthy can say in a few lines what other writers cannot express in as many pages. There is not a superfluous word, and each word is chosen with a sureness that leaves nothing at which to cavil. Another excellent sketch, though of a very different type, is "Quality." No words are wasted in otiose commiseration of the poor old bootmaker who falls a victim to the very thoroughness and excellence with which he prosecutes his calling. The plain facts are set forth in the simplest style, and it is not because we are prompted by any moralizings that we feel as exquisitely as we do all the pathos of that humble tragedy.

Those studies, to which reference has been made, all occur in the portion which is labelled "Concerning Life." What Mr. Galsworthy has here to say "Concerning Letters" is not, perhaps, equally important. His essays "About Censorship" and "Some Platitudes about Drama" contain an undue proportion of the obvious, and "Wanted—

* "The Inn of Tranquillity." By John Galsworthy. 6s. Heinemann.)

Schooling," while it starts in his best vein, shows a sad falling-off. But if in his "Vague Thoughts on Art" and "Meditation on Finality" Mr. Galsworthy does much to make amends, it is, undoubtedly, in the first part of the book that we get that "flower of author" which he himself finds in the pages of all great writers, and which is certainly not absent from his own best work.

M. H. H. MACARTNEY.

LEARNING IN LITTLE.*

Those who to-day hunger and thirst after knowledge have certainly no ground of complaint against the enterprising publisher if they remain unsatisfied. It is a point for consideration whether we yet fully realise the meaning of the present enormous output of books, small, cheap, and generally adequate, on nearly all the subjects of the encyclopædia. The standing puzzle regarding the consumption of the novels which swarm from the printing press meets us again here. Such activity in the popularization of knowledge is manifestly a sign of the times. It may be taken for granted that the publishers who are most active in the enterprise contrive to make it pay. There must therefore be a public, presumably a large public, for the volumes they produce. But what sort of public? How wide a circulation do these books attain? Who buys and reads them? Do the same people devour everything that is offered, from summaries of biology to treatises on art? Or do particular works appeal to particular classes of students only? And what kind of subject—science, say, or history, or philosophy, or letters—is found to be most popular? To these questions it would be interesting to get authoritative answers.

I have before me twenty-seven new issues in three of the collections which appear to be gaining, as they certainly deserve, special success in this democratic field: Messrs. Williams & Norgate's "Home University Library of Modern Knowledge" at a shilling a volume; Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton's "Useful Knowledge Series," also at a shilling; and Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack's sixpenny series, "The People's Books." The extent of ground covered by these volumes collectively is remarkable; and even more remarkable is the general standard of excellence maintained in them throughout. They are well printed and bound. The title-pages show that the publishers have usually been able to enlist the best talent. In nearly every case the subject has been treated by one who obviously, is a master of it, and who moreover has the happy faculty of presenting it to the uninitiated in a clear and attractive way. The books vary indeed, as general principles would lead us to expect, more under the latter than under the former head. But speaking broadly, the two conditions of good popular exposition are commonly fulfilled: the work is sound, and, so far as limits permit, thorough, and the requirements of the general reader are met. It is not usual for a critic to parade his ignorance, still less to base his judgment upon it, but in a matter of this kind there is a real advantage in being able to take up the point of view, not of the expert, but of the ordinary layman. Knowing little or nothing to begin with of some of the subjects handled in these libraries—aviation, for instance—I have been able to identify myself with those who go to them in search of elementary instruction; and usually, where I have imposed this test, the results have been satisfactory.

I have said that among the questions which these libraries naturally suggest is that of the relative popularity of the different departments of study. I do not of course allege that any final answer can be found in the make-up of these twenty-seven volumes, for the general programme of each series would have to be taken into account. But as they stand, they lead one to infer that the greatest demand is for the various branches of science, that philosophy, religion, and social topics hold their own, and that a comparatively small place in public attention is occupied by literature and even by history; and this I am inclined to think is a fair index of the current taste. In the present issue, indeed, literature is very poorly represented by two volumes only—Mr. Maclean Watt's rather thin and disappointing study of Carlyle, in "The People's Books," and a clear and readable sketch of "The Great Writers of America," by Professors Trent and Erskine, in the "Home University Library." In the former case, our enjoyment in reading is not increased by such unhappy remarks as—"Jeffrey and his kind could not understand mysticism, confusing it with misty-ism," and Carlyle "is not a milk-and-water theorist, giving jujubes to the discontented to keep them silent while they are sucking sweets." If this sort of thing is introduced in the interests of "popularity," I think the writer has mistaken his means and his public. The joint work of the two professors, on the other hand, is irreproachable in manner, and is fortunately almost entirely free from that patriotic twist which mars most American criticism of American literature.

* "Useful Knowledge Series." Five Volumes. 1s. a vol. net. (Hodder & Stoughton).—"Home University Library of Modern Knowledge." Ten Volumes. 1s. a vol. net. (Williams & Norgate).—"The People's Books." Twelve Volumes. 6d. a vol. net. (T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

History fares somewhat better with an excellent outline of Oliver Cromwell's life and career by Miss Hilda Johnstone, in "The People's Books," a work well packed with facts, sympathetic, and sound in judgment; and two volumes of great freshness of interest in the "Home University Library"—"Warfare in England" by Mr. Belloc, and "Master Mariners," by Mr. John R. Spears. Mr. Belloc deals with the campaigns which have been conducted and the battles which have been fought on English soil from the time of the Roman conquest, and as a study of military operations and strategy his essay should prove specially valuable to those students who (like the present writer) usually find such matters the least interesting part of history. Mr. Spears' book (the title of which seems to me to be rather unfortunate) contains a fascinating record of maritime exploration and discovery, from the days of the Phœnicians down to our own time, and concurrently traces the evolution of the ship. The story is well told, and everyone who has any feeling for the romance of sea adventure will read it with pleasure.

In the domain of philosophy it is interesting to find the past and present linked by the names of Aristotle and Eucken. Dr. A. E. Taylor's outline (in "The People's Books") of the principles of the great "master of those who know," is quite a model of its kind. It would indeed be difficult to condense more than he has done into the space of under a hundred pages, and his expositions are wonderfully lucid. This does not of course mean that his book is easy reading. In the nature of things any epitome of Aristotle's theories, however simplified, must make large demands upon the student. But anyone who goes patiently and carefully through this little volume will close it with a clear idea of the fundamentals of the peripatetic philosophy and of the place that it occupies in the history of thought, while the appended bibliography will guide the English reader into further researches on his own account. Dr. Abel Jones's "Rudolf Eucken" (in the same series) is also an excellent little treatise, and may be cordially recommended to those who, as the author says, "cannot find time to make a thorough study" of Eucken's works, and yet very properly desire "to know something of the man and his teachings."

In social science a distinctly modern note is struck. Professor Chapman's "Political Economy" and Mr. G. E. Moore's "Ethics" (both in the "Home University Library") are alike thoroughly modern in method and outlook, and those who turn to them for information on their respective subjects may be assured that they are in the hands of teachers fully abreast of the latest thought and speculation of the time. Mr. J. H. Harley's essay on "Syndicalism," in "The People's Books," is manifestly opportune, and cannot fail to prove useful to the many readers, who, recognising with the author that syndicalism is at least a "significant movement," are anxious to clarify their ideas regarding its origin, aims, and bearings. Messrs.

Jack also provide a serviceable little manual on a most practical subject in Mr. W. A. Robertson's "Insurance as a means of Investment."

It is perhaps worth while to note that the three books of the present issue dealing with religion happen to represent three distinct lines of interest:—Mrs. Besant's "Theosophy," in "The People's Books," which may doubtless be regarded as an authoritative statement of a subject concerning which there is a great deal of public curiosity; Mrs. Creighton's excellent account of "Missions: Their Rise and Development," in the "Home University Library," and, in the same collection, "The Making of the New Testament," by Professor Bacon of Yale. This last-named work seems to me to be one of quite outstanding importance, for it provides the general reader with a compact summary of the latest results of New Testament criticism as they are accepted by advanced theologians. From a perusal of its illuminating pages we learn how far and in what directions such criticism has travelled since the time of Baur and his early followers in the Tübingen school. Dr. Bacon sets out by noting the striking paradox that the New Testament is a body of literature "born of protest against the tyranny of a canon, yet ultimately canonised itself through an increasing demand for external authority," and he proceeds to a searching examination of origins and development. He brings out strongly the fundamental distinction between the two leading schools of early Christian thought—the Pauline, or "Greek-Christian gospel about Jesus," and the Apostolic, or "Jewish-Christian gospel of Jesus"—the "Gospel of the Spirit" and the "Gospel of Authority," and he lays stress upon the fact that, arising as it did as the product of conflicting forces, "the unity of the New Testament is a unity in diversity." His underlying principle is that of historical interpretation: "the literature of the New Testament must be understood historically if understood at all."

The remaining volumes are concerned with various aspects of science, natural or practical. Five belong to the admirable "Useful Knowledge Series"—Mr. Chambers' "The Story of Eclipses," Mr. E. A. Martin's "A Piece of Coal," the late Grant Allen's "Plant Life," Mr. Rodway's "Forest and Stream," and Professor Henslow's "Wild Flowers." Three belong to the "Home University Library"—Professor Gregory's "The Making of the Earth," Professor Keith's "The Human Body," and Professor Kapp's "Electricity." In Messrs. Jack's series Mr. Macpherson writes on "Practical Astronomy with the Unaided Eye," Mr. Goodrich on "Evolution," Dr. Leighton on "Embryology," Dr. Price on "Dietetics," and Mr. Sydney Walker on "Aviation." We have here indeed—the hackneyed quotation is unavoidable—"infinite riches in a little room."

WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON.

TWO FRIENDS AND A WOMAN.*

As a novelist Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch is somewhat uncertain. At times he is a man of cultivated talent: at times a man of original genius. At his best he has a fine, whimsical, tender power of imagination, but it needs a strong under-current of emotion to set it working with full energy; and the only thing that inspires Sir Arthur with this necessary emotion is his half humorous and yet intense love for Cornwall. When his foot is on his native heath and his name is "Q.," he is one of the most delightful writers in the world. He can stand comparison with the finest masters of the short story or the long novel. The little Cornish town to which he gives the name of Troy is his grand source of inspiration. His slightest sketch of its ways, people and traditions is touched with genius.

In "Hocken and Hunken, a Tale of Troy," we have "Q." in his happiest mood. By turns he is cynical and tender, humorous and serious, and always delightful. The work is composed of the quintessence of all the qualities of his veritable genius. If he had not placed the tale among his own people, it might have been as harsh a study of a mischief-making minx of a woman as Thackeray and Mr. Thomas Hardy have done. For there is something of Becky Sharp and Barbara of "Far from the Madding Crowd," in Mrs. Bosenna of Rilla Farm on the outskirts of Troy. Having married an old man for the sake of his wealth, even as Becky might have done, she has the pleasure of inheriting his money and land just when she is in the flower of her age and beauty. Intelligent and sensuous, half in sport and half in earnest, she makes advances to a well-to-do sea-faring man, Captain Caius Hocken, a native of Troy, who settles there, after a life of adventure, with his friend Captain Tobias Hunken. Hunken is a bigger, sterner man than his chum, and the pretty widow woos him while she is carrying on with the sweeter-natured and more companionable Hocken. The result is the two friends fall out and astonish and entertain the whole of Troy with their fierce, bitter and open quarrel for the hand of Mrs. Bosenna. Still living together, but taking their meals separately and only meeting in the streets, the two men turn every public affair in Troy in the year of the Diamond Jubilee, into a personal contest. They put up against each other at elections, turn both agricultural shows and regattas into pathetic, ridiculous scenes of rivalry, till at last Hunken loses all the money he has saved, and Hocken's deep feelings of friendship return and he renounces the fascinating widow. Not to be outdone in generosity, Hunken, on recovering his fortune, tells his old friend that he will leave the field open for him. In the end they both refuse Mrs. Bosenna's subtle and picturesque offer of marriage, and friendship thus triumphs over love. The book is really a fine and touching study of comradeship, but it is so lightened by humour and whimsy, and so crowded with strange, quaint and memorable characters, that it is a pure delight. Perhaps it is the richness of background in "Q.'s" tales of Troy that chiefly distinguishes them from his other works. In painting it his imagination is able to draw on his memory, and his memory is so irradiated and quickened by his Greek-like intensity of local patriotism that it gives to his work the strange vividness of conception which is rather wanting in his stories of alien scenes.

E. W.

THE FASCINATION OF BOOKS.*

Probably no one in London has a longer or fuller knowledge of the bookselling trade than Mr. Joseph Shaylor; he has been engaged in the handling of books practically all his life, and this familiarity has so far from bred contempt in him that he still treats them and thinks and speaks of them as Izaak Walton behaved towards his worms—as if he loved them. The elder Disraeli would have rejoiced in the curious and interesting information that Mr. Shaylor has gathered in here from literary byways. There is an excellent chapter on the beginnings and development of the Christmas book; it is amazing to learn that the once popular Annuals yielded in one year a profit of ten thousand pounds to their publishers, thirty thousand to the retail booksellers, and six thousand between their authors and editors. It is very interesting to trace the rise and decline of these annuals; the appearance of Dickens' and Thackeray's Christmas books, and the coming of the Christmas volumes of later years. Not less interesting are the chapters on Booksellers and Bookselling; on Some Old Libraries; on the Life and Death of Books; Bookselling and the Public; Bookselling and Some of its Humours; Hymns, Hymn Writers and Hymn Books. On Nineteenth Century Book Distributing; on the Selling of Books, and on Publishing Mr. Shaylor writes as an expert; he gives you an inside history of the growth of the business of bookselling from the middle of last century, when publishing and bookselling first became separate trades; he explains the old methods of publishing, and the present system discusses publishers' agreements and gives sound, practical advice

* "The Fascination of Books." With other Papers on Books and Bookselling. By Joseph Shaylor. 6s. net. (Simpkin, Marshall.)

* "Hocken and Hunken." By "Q." 6s. (Blackwood.)

Mr. Joseph Shaylor.

to the inexperienced author. From the first chapter, on "The Fascination of Books," to the last, on "Reprints and Their Readers," this is one of the most genial and pleasantly gossipy books about books that we have ever read.

A WANDERER IN FLORENCE.*

According to its publisher's notice, this is an "impressionistic travel-book," in which the author "follows his accustomed line, blending latter-day impressions with historical lore, and recording minutely the sensations of pleasure produced by the beauties of art, architecture and natural scenery." The critic is thus, in some sort, disarmed at the outset; for who shall dare to deny to anyone, and least of all to so well-known and accomplished an author as Mr. Lucas, the liberty to record his impressions? And how can one criticize anything so subjective and unsubstantial as an impression? Let us hasten to add that Mr. Lucas' "impressions" of Florence are interesting and very pleasantly recorded. Indeed, the traveller will find in his book not only a stimulating companion to the arid if indispensable Baedeker, but a means of reviving his own memories of the fascinating city, after he has returned home. The enjoyment of a visit to Florence depends so largely on the possession of some knowledge of its long and complicated history that we asked ourselves with some curiosity how this important feature was to be treated from the "impressionistic" standpoint. Mr. Lucas evidently realizes that there is indeed a difficulty here, and modestly disclaims any attempt to trespass on the domain of the historians, to whom he refers his readers (p. 51). He contrives, however, to give vivid biographical details about many of the numerous personages whom he has occasion to mention as well as a brief and spirited, if not always meticulously accurate, sketch of the Medicean supremacy. In his references to the earlier political system he is less felicitous. His account (p. 96) of the Guilds, the Priors and the "Gonfalonier of Florence" (by which title he seems to indicate the official known as the Gonfaloniere di Giustizia, added to the Signoria in 1293) is singularly misleading; while, on p. 184 he appears to regard the Capitano del Popolo and the Podestà as identical. This is "impressionistic" history with a vengeance and we trust that, in another edition, these things will be "straightened out," to use Mr. Lucas' own expression.

* "A Wanderer in Florence." By E. V. Lucas. With sixteen illustrations in colour by Harry Morley, and thirty-eight photographs from paintings and sculpture. 6s. (Methuen.)

Starting with the Cathedral, Mr. Lucas leads his reader successively through the principal places of interest in Florence, and the traveller who puts himself under his guidance will miss little or nothing that is worth seeing. His account of the Uffizi Gallery, and indeed of the paintings and sculpture in Florence generally, is excellent. His attitude towards Ruskin illustrates the sanity and catholicity of his taste; that great art-critic is, indeed, a guide to be followed, but not to be followed blindly: Mr. Lucas can find room in his Pantheon for Ghirlandaio as well as for Giotto, for Bronzino as well as for Botticelli. The tourist will find in this book many noteworthy counsels which will be useful to him, and not in Florence only. Thus Mr. Lucas remarks (p. 114) that "one should never forget in any gallery of Florence to look out of the windows." Again (p. 117) he bids his readers remember that the great works of art in the galleries were not painted in order to be exhibited there; and he exhorts the visitor not to overlook the predellas of such paintings as have them, for there "the artist often throws off formality and allows his feelings to have play." Elsewhere, he notes, very justly, that "nothing is easier than to overlook ceilings." More than once he makes merry over the squabbles of the experts about the attribution of pictures to this master and to that, and sensibly observes (p. 360) that "the untutored visitor in the presence of so much scientific variance will be wise to enact the part of the lawyer in the old caricature of the litigants and the cow, who, while they pull, one at the head and the other at the tail, fills his bucket with milk. In other words, the plain duty of the ordinary person is to enjoy the picture."

Some minor blemishes need correction: On p. 209, we read that the most famous of all the Franciscan churches, that at Assisi, was begun while St. Francis was living; whereas the site for its erection was only conveyed to Friar Elias on behalf of Pope Gregory IX. nearly a year and a half after the Saint's death; on p. 271, the puzzle about Zacharias is solved by Luke i. 63, and Henry VIII. did not become Defender of the Faith after throwing off the shackles of Rome (p. 335) but before. The mention of "holograph relics" in connection with Dante (p. 177) might lead the reader to suppose that there are autographs of the poet in the Laurentian Library. Unfortunately, every scrap of his writing has perished.

The illustrations call for high praise; the photographs are well chosen, and the coloured reproductions of Mr. Morley's drawings are delightful. "Evening at the Piazzale Michelangelo" and the "Ponte Vecchio" are among the most beautiful and characteristic; but one would hardly realize from the representation of the Palazzo Vecchio, facing p. 90, that it is, as Mr. Lucas says it is: "One of the most resolute and independent buildings in the world."

W. H.

THE MIND OF MR. BALFOUR.*

Mr. Short was private secretary to Mr. Balfour for some years, and he has thought it would be interesting to present his chief's non-political views "in a convenient and permanent form." "Non-political" does not exclude, fortunately, the characteristic and apt tributes paid in the House of Commons to Mr. Gladstone, the Marquis of Salisbury, and the Duke of Devonshire. In speaking of Lord Salisbury, Mr. Balfour observes that his difficulty was to restrain, not to find, epigrams, and that his literary gift was natural and great. This is not a reflection which will occur to the reader of the Balfour anthology. The pages of this large, carefully arranged, and comprehensive book are not studded with epigrams, and their literary quality, though larger on the whole than Mr. Gladstone's letters and essays, is not the outstanding feature. It is the easy play of intellect upon all sorts of subjects, from golf to eugenics, the application of a highly cultured mind, with singular powers of penetration, to topics like philosophy and music and science, which is the real interest and value of these pages. The selections contain a considerable amount of scattered wisdom, and they certainly display a versatility of mind, which in this case is something more than the power of a public man to speak at random upon all sorts and conditions of subjects. There are not more than two other first-class politicians, whose non-political utterances could furnish material for a book like this.

* "Arthur James Balfour as Philosopher and Thinker: A Collection of the more important and interesting passages in his non-political writings, speeches, and addresses (1879-1912)." By Wilfrid M. Short. With Portrait. 7s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

"Matter grows under our hands," said Sterne, "let no man say, 'Come—I'll write a duodecimo.'" If Mr. Short ever said this to himself, he quickly changed his mind. The matter seems to have grown under his hand, and the result is a thick volume of over 500 pages. Some of the extracts, especially those in small print, could have been spared. Thus Mr. Balfour's address at the St. Andrews University Quincentenary was not a success to hear, and it does not improve upon reading. Neither was it worth while to reprint this casual remark on marriage:—

"I think all will agree that if matrimony is to succeed, good manners should be adopted on both sides. Everybody will admit that a relation not always easy to keep smooth can only be kept smooth if there is mutual consideration and mutual respect . . . That is a moral which I recommend to all husbands and to all wives. I recommend it from the serene platform of the confirmed bachelor."

Mr. Short might have assumed that "The Pleasures of Life" and "How to be Happy Though Married" are still in circulation. But it is really serviceable to get sections of the "Defence of Philosophic Doubt" reprinted, as that volume has been inaccessible for some time. For this, among other things, we can forgive Mr. Short's inability to confine himself to a duodecimo volume of Mr. Balfour's wit and wisdom.

In point of general interest, the things one turns to most readily are not the writer's set essays, but his opinions on the by-ways of life, or his opinions in undress on the high-ways. These are not always easy to find, but they are worth looking for. Things like these, for example, to choose almost at random.

"Most of the pictures we look at in galleries never were intended to be looked at in galleries at all; they were painted to be enjoyed under very different conditions."

"The movement of population is as continuous from Scotland to the outer world as is the stream of ocean from the Euxine Sea through the Bosphorus into the wider ocean. There is no return current except, indeed, when Scotchmen have made their fortunes."

"I give the public notice that if any speech of mine appears with Latin quotations in it these quotations are due to the reporter, and are not due to me."

"A book which is read for examination purposes is a book which has been read wrongly. Every student ought to read a book, not to answer the questions of somebody else, but to answer his own questions."

And so on.

JAMES MOFFATT, D.D., D.Litt.

MR. CONRAD AT HIS BEST.*

The most remarkable quality of Mr. Joseph Conrad's new set of long-short stories, "Twixt Land and Sea," is the ease and simplicity of the language. Mr. Conrad is as intense, curious and subtle a student of human nature in action as he was in that early masterpiece of his, "The Heart of Darkness," but his manner of tackling a subject is now extraordinarily fine. He used to be a melancholious amateur of the picturesquely violent side of life vainly trying to masquerade as a simple seaman. His point of view was essentially literary, and all kinds of literary influences were apparent in it—Zola's, Maupassant's, and that of the Russian school of abnormal-psychological novelists. The striking originality of his exotic themes and the inspiring zest for the adventurous side of life that mingled curiously with his rather morbid interest in the derangements of the human machine, saved him from being a mere importer of the latest Continental fashions in literature. Yet his authenticity of imagination was somewhat over-laid by the various evidences of his literary apprenticeship. In "Lord Jim" he became his own master: yet one still felt he was a literary man studying a case of conscience rather than a sailor who had gone to sea from the love of adventure. Even that splendid vigorous sketch, "Youth," was the tale of a literary pilgrimage: it might have been written by Pater, had it been possible for that amateur of curious emotions to make a voyage to the Orient in search of new sensations. The rich and heavily loaded diction, with its search for strange and telling epithets, and its laboured though effective studies of picturesque effects, gave too literary an air to the narrative.

* "Twixt Land and Sea." By Joseph Conrad. 6s. (Dent & Sons.)

In his new set of stories of seafaring in Eastern Seas Mr. Conrad retains all his old subtlety, intensity and disquieting, brooding imaginativeness. But instead of displaying his literary power, he conceals it. He comes forward as an ordinary retired master-mariner in a mood for telling in simple, easy, artless speech, some yarns about life in the Indian Ocean and off the coast of Siam. He leaves out important bits of his narrative, and has to interrupt his tale later on in order to bring them in and make clear what he is leading up to. Not only is the dialogue colloquial, but much of the description is the talk of a middle-aged skipper repeating himself at times and using little tricks of speech of a commonplace sort. Yet, with this loose and apparently unlaboured way of writing, Mr. Conrad gets a wonderful power of expression. He does not now go in search of sensations and emotions, strange, subtle, exotic and tragical. They happen to him—a simple-minded unadventurous skipper of a windjammer engaged in carrying sugar and potatoes, grand pianos and other chance cargoes, from island to island. He begins with an extraordinary love affair, the character drawing in which is one of the finest things he has ever done. Poe and Baudelaire, and someone with a sense of humour they did not possess, might have written it in collaboration. The next tale is about a murderer, whom the skipper helps to escape; and the last is a study of love and jealousy and death. Each of them represents Mr. Conrad as an incomparable master of the longish-short story. His art now owes nothing to anybody: it is distinct, incisive, and yet suggestive of a thousand things left unsaid, while in appearance it is easy to the point of slipshodness. Each tale, we think, is likely to stick for ever in the memory of the reader; and we are sure we shall never forget Jacobus, the chief character in the first tale, ironically entitled "A Smile of Fortune."

E. W.

MACREADY'S DIARIES.*

By the members of his own craft William Charles Macready was never beloved, and the tradition of him which still persists in theatrical circles is of an actor no doubt great in his way, but unsociable to the last degree, ashamed of his stage-surroundings, morose and arrogant towards his colleagues, jealous of any and every rival, and generally snobbish and egotistical. For his own part he did his best, not always intentionally, to earn his fellow-players' dislike. The language he used of them in private—"these wretches," "these creatures," "these insects,"—was, we may be sure, repeated by him in public places and must have been canvassed in pot-house and green-room. It was notorious that his early retirement from the playhouse was due to his disgust with the vulgarity and disreputable morals of its rank and file, and he had never concealed his impatience of the habits, speech and manners of the stage-Bohemia of his time. No wonder the easy-going mummers dubbed him a prig and objected to his airs of superiority and disdain.

* "The Diaries of William Charles Macready, 1833-51." Edited by Wm. Toynbee. 2 Vols. 32s. net. (Chapman and Hall.)

But there is an easy explanation alike of Macready's aloofness and of the resentment which it provoked. Caste-feeling was on both sides the cause of ill-will. Macready belongs to a type of player common enough in these days, when the stage is so largely recruited from the universities and our professional and upper-class families, but almost unique eighty years ago. A public-school boy, dreaming at Rugby of glory to be gained at the bar, he was called upon to sacrifice his ambitions and to resign himself at seventeen to the atmosphere of a miserable provincial theatre and its company of uneducated and probably drunken and foul-mouthed actors. His father had to be rescued from bankruptcy and the lad put his shoulder to the wheel. Young prodigies even then could secure a vogue in theatre or concert-room, and the boy Romeo won favour and set the elder Macready on his feet again. But in saving his father he condemned himself to a species of servitude and exile. If he had his ideal—and a very lofty ideal—of the profession he thus perforce embraced, he never grew used to or tolerant of its practitioners, and the nausea which the fastidious youngster must have felt as he contrasted the accent and behaviour of his stage-associates with those of his Rugby school friends was never forgotten, and seems to have affected permanently his relations with actors of the old school. Their slang, their illiterateness, their weakness for alcohol, their improvidence, their stupidity in their own work, got on the nerves of this student and Puritan who could not see the touch of kindness that so nearly excused their vices. To this excess of sensitiveness he added an irascibility which found vent in the wildest invective. Macready had always got a grievance against somebody and was always making or inventing for himself enemies. At the same time his demands on his friends were far too extravagant, with the result that he was constantly being disappointed and embittered. His resource in the case of foes fancied or real, or of "false" friends, was the free indulgence of his tongue. He railed against these sinners at his club, and the victims of his abuse were not long left uninformed. Critics and brother-players were often attacked; what wonder that they "conspired" together to thwart Macready's hopes of self-advancement. The slowness of his rise to fame is to no small extent to be accounted for by the antagonisms he aroused. His fits of anger, too, had their bad effects on his peace of mind and his art. An explosion was always followed by worrying moods of repentance and he never acted his best if his thoughts were distracted or his emotions in a turmoil. An unhappy man, as he must on the whole be described, he with his suspiciousness and irritability, was himself the author of much of his unhappiness.

We see the man for what he really was, we see his good side as well as his external faultiness, in his diaries already printed in part by Sir Frederick Pollock along with the "Reminiscences" and that editor's continuation of Macready's autobiography, but now for the first time published in Messrs. Chapman & Hall's two handsome volumes, more or less in their entirety. No more remarkable and complete revelation has ever been penned by an actor. Incidentally these diaries provide us with most valuable sidelights on the social life of the time, for there were few contemporaries of mark with whom Macready did not rub shoulders, and these fit as it were in procession through the pages of his journals. But of far more vital significance is the portrait which all unconsciously the diarist paints of himself. From first to last we discover him actuated by two great passions, the one, professional ambition, the other anxiety to secure the ease of his wife and children. Always he is studying and re-studying his parts; never had he to face even among the pressmen he denounced as "vermin" and "filth of the world," so severe a critic as he himself was of his own performances. Always, too, he is thinking how he can add to the comfort and provide for the future of his family, and sees in his home the haven wherein he can throw aside every anxiety and annoyance; storm as he might out-of-doors, he sought and found peace there, and quite the most charming feature of his diaries is the tenderness and loyalty which inform his every allusion to his children and their mother.

Like most actor-managers he had his temptations to infidelity, but love-sick girls got no encouragement from him—there was never a more constant husband. Warring against these passions were the contrary instincts of pride and ill-temper. He was conscious of mauvaise honte in his social and business dealings, yet he could never cure himself of the fault. Again and again, in his diaries he makes confession of ridiculous surrenders to bursts of anger and earnestly vows to make a change. Yet within a short while there comes a fresh record of offending and remorse, and resolutions are made once more only to be broken. His unrestraint, as he knew quite well, had its most serious side in the fact that it not merely jeopardised his professional position but also his family's prospects. Yet even the thought of these could not prevent his assaulting his own manager, Bunn of Drury Lane, to pay off old scores of persecution and insult. Only when the affair was over could he contemplate the consequences; then he passed a sleepless night in agony and bemoaned his folly. If sometimes he could not control his fists he could rarely put a bridle on his speech. The man who could denounce a whole people, the Americans, as "a nation of blackguards," was not likely to be merciful to individuals. So Talfourd came in for censure as having what we should call, nowadays, a swelled head. Browning became "an insect" and a "puppy," because when, smarting under the failure of "A Blot on the Scutcheon," he met Macready one day he showed signs of embarrassment. Dickens though once voted "conceited," could live up to the actor's ideal of friendship and so was "dear Dickens" to the last, just as Carlyle pleased somehow even in his "exceptional moods." But other authors, Bulwer excepted, were not so fortunate, much less actors. It is a tell-tale fact that Macready has hardly a good word to say for any rival player of his day, from Edmund Kean to Charles Mathews; at every one he carps and gibes. Even Helen Faucit, whom he championed so handsomely during a phase of undeserved scandal, is spoken of as "silly" on occasions and is described as "generous in her requisitions." The touchiest of men, Macready seems to have let all sorts of imaginary wrongs sour his feelings and prompt him to reprisals. And so he went on manufacturing miseries for himself. Pity is the sentiment his own account of his career inspires. And yet he had his consolations. He conquered success. He had the refuges of his God and his home.

F. G. BETTANY

THE NEW LIFE OF BYRON.*

It was high time for a new "Life of Byron"; for, as Miss Mayne reminds us, there has been no "full-length" Life and Letters of the poet compiled in English since Moore's authorized biography was published in 1830. During the interval of eighty-two years much valuable material has been made public, of which I need specify only the Recollections of Lady Blessington (1834), of the Countess Guiccioli (1869), and of Lord Broughton, published two or three years ago; the Letters and Journals, edited by Mr. Rowland Prothero, and, last and perhaps most important, the "Astarte" of the late Lord Lovelace (1905). Of the new matter furnished in these volumes, the authoress of the new "Life" has made fullest use, and hence it may be fearlessly asserted from the outset that for the present Miss Mayne's "Life" holds the field. For those who read but one Life of Byron, her work has superseded all others. Not that it is to be understood that the book is faultless. Miss Mayne has not always arranged her facts with due regard to perfect ease in reading; nor is her literary style, at least at the outset, always perfectly clear and simple. She is not happy when she quotes, with apparent approval, (p. 87) a description of Cambridge as "a mere receptacle for youth," or characterizes Henry Mackenzie's "Man of Feeling," (p. 108) as a "rather foolish book," or John Galt (p. 160) as "author of two novels whose names still survive." In her next edition such slips as Canæne (p. 269), pacim (p. 270), Monteith for Monreith, may fitly be amended. But these are the merest details. What is of infinitely more importance is that her book is characterized throughout by full information and by a generous and unflagging, yet not uncritical, enthusiasm for her subject.

* "Byron." By Ethel Colburn Mayne. 2 Vols With Eighteen Illustrations. (Methuen.)

In her chapter on Byron, "The Man's Man," Miss Mayne quotes the saying of a recent writer not named, that a "Life of Byron" is in reality little more than an account of Byron's love-affairs, which she proceeds to characterize as "perhaps the most foolish and shallow of the many judgments in that sort which have been delivered upon him." None the less, I must confess that to myself the most interesting part of her book is its discussion of the love episodes. For, in the first place, she writes of these from the feminine point of view, which in itself is interesting; and secondly, from that of one who unites a woman's innate sympathy and delicacy of feeling with a breadth of mind and a knowledge of the world which are less generally characteristic of the sex. Nor is she prudishly reserved. As will be gathered, then, from what has been already said, she rises above the triviality of "taking sides," whether for or against her own sex, studying each successive problem on its merits, and bringing to bear thereon the sympathetic insight, as it were, of a dramatic poet.

Of Byron's childhood, school and college life, there is now nothing fresh to be told. Nor does Miss Mayne add to our information regarding the "Girl of Cadiz" and "Maid of Athens" amourettes. But she is probably right in surmising that the influence on Byron's after-life of his school-boy passion for Mary Chaworth has hitherto been exaggerated. His later feeling for her was at most the constancy of the inconstant. Mr. Edgcumbe's theory that Medora Leigh was Mary's child by Byron* is justly dismissed, after examination, as surmise wholly unsupported by evidence.

It is scarcely until 1812, then, that the love-drama of Byron's life begins in earnest. This was the year of the "Byron Fever," when, following the publication of the first half of "Childe Harold," "language could hardly exaggerate the folly that prevailed." The first victim was Caroline Lamb, the story of whose relations with the poet begins romantically and closes sordidly. Already a wife and mother, though still very young, she was then at the height of her social success—a success of freshness, originality, daring impulse and "spoiled childishness." "That beautiful pale face is my fate," she wrote, after her first meeting with Byron, and her immediate impulse was to flee from him. But she quickly thought better, or rather worse, of it, and paid the penalty with her reputation, reason, and perhaps life. Had that been all, she would have remained at least a romantic figure. But, alas! her ill-regulated impulses had ere this betrayed her into hysteria or ill-breeding. Nor is it easy to avoid imputing to her the rumours which, four years later, led to Byron's social ostracism. The Countess of Oxford, that mature voluptuary, who succeeded Lady Caroline as Byron's mistress, seems to have appealed to him as calm after storm, for to her alone of all his loves did he profess gratitude.

The truth regarding the separation of Lord and Lady Byron, which, long familiar in the form of rumour, was imparted to a limited circle by the late Lord Lovelace's "Astarte," is here for the first time made public property. By Miss Mayne's skilled investigation of this delicate and painful matter a tardy act of justice is done to Lady Byron, who emerges from the ordeal in her true character—as a woman of narrow mind, perhaps, but of unswerving rectitude of conduct and of almost superhuman powers of self-control and of keeping her own counsel. "Annabella"

* See "Byron; The Last Phase." By Richard Edgcumbe.

Byron, 1813-14.

From the engraving by C. Turner after the painting by R. Westall, R.A.

Byron never invited sympathy, nor craved to be understood; but, stoic as she was, one cannot doubt that she must often have longed for both. The indiscretion, to put it temperately, of the most egregious advocate ever vouchsafed to prisoner at the bar did her cause incalculable wrong. But she has now at last triumphed over this, and is henceforth beyond reach of injustice. One question now alone remains unanswered: To what degree did she love her husband? Another point which must occur to every masculine reader is, Why in the name of common-sense did not she ask her sister-in-law to leave No. 13 Piccadilly Terrace? It is true that in 1815 wrong done was already a thing of the past; true, also, that Annabella's suspicions were still far short of confirmation. But there can be no doubt that the situation would have been much simplified, the moral strain very much relieved, by Mrs. Leigh's departure. Miss Mayne's book is, I believe, the first to publish an authentic portrait of Lady Byron.

In the episode of Jane Clairmont, Miss Mayne reveals "Claire" as recklessly throwing herself at Byron's head, in a manner wholly unsuspected by readers of Professor Dowden's "Shelley." For her assignation with Byron seems to have been contrived by herself and consented to by him. Certainly to none of his mistresses, so far as is known, did Byron, the most chivalrous of men, behave with greater harshness than to Claire. The subsequent Venetian period, during which Marianna Segati and Margarita Cogni reigned conjointly over his heart, marks the radii of his career. For four years after this Countess Guiccioli saved him from himself; but she accomplished this at the expense of ennui and satiety, and of what looks very like an attempt at blackmail on the part of a complainant husband. It says much for Miss Mayne's enthusiasm that she is able to follow Byron's devious course without losing a jot of her admiration for what was essentially noble, generous, miraculous in him.

GEORGE DOUGLAS.

Novel Notes.

THE ROCK OF THE RAVENS: A ROMANCE. By John A. Steuart. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. Steuart has chosen for his theme the old-world one of a brave man beset by treachery and blindly bent on wreaking vengeance on the heads of those most faithful to him. The scene is in the Highlands, and the period that in which the clans were divided by feuds no less than distinguished by their tartans. The Macdonalds, under the redoubtable Drumshead of Drumshead Castle, are at bitter enmity with the Mackintoshes. Their chief is growing old, and, when the story opens, banishes Conall the seer, and hands over the gallant Ranald Glenranald to the charge of the young man's enemy and rival, Mungo Dearg. How Mungo is eventually involved in the meshes of his own toils, and Ranald and the chief's beautiful daughter Mona are united, must be left to the author to tell. Suffice it that there is ample excitement for the most excitement-loving of readers to enjoy ere the coils of the serpent are set straight and the just and the unjust come to their own.

BUNCH GRASS: A Chronicle of Life on a Cattle Ranch. By Horace Annesley Vachell. 6s. (Murray)

As a novelist Mr. Vachell has scored so many successes that a new volume from his pen cannot fail to excite the curiosity, and confident anticipations of goodly entertainment, of many readers. But Mr. Vachell is also known as the author of a delightful volume dealing with life and sport on the Pacific Slope of California, and therefore this volume has as it were a double claim on our attention. And it may be said at once that which ever may be the earlier interest which moves a reader to take up "Bunch Grass" he will have no occasion for disappointment. Whether the score of stories are read as fiction or for their vivid pen-pictures of Californian life around and about a cattle ranch thirty years ago they are quite absorbingly attractive. Mr. Vachell points out in a preface that "in a modest way he may claim to be a historian, not forgetting that the original signification of the word was a narrator of fables founded upon facts." The history which he presents is of the circumstances that attended the transmuting of "the Land of Yesterday" into "the Golden State of To-day—and Tomorrow" and in the course of it he shows us something of the comedy and tragedy which attended the transmutation. He begins with an account of the way in which "Althea-Belle" the first "school-marm," of the village of Paradise fought down the weaker side of her own nature, and how she mastered single-handed the refractory youth of the neighbourhood; he tells of the "holding up" of the stage-coaches in the lawless days, and of the whipping out of revolvers and shooting "on sight"; of the Chinese Riots when the "Coon Dogs" hunted out and tortured the Celestials, and of how a Chinaman cook, "Mary" was saved from these ruffians by his master's coolness and resourcefulness; and in the closing story he gives a remarkable account of the way in which a wife-beater and torturer of the "under-dog" came by his end. The stories are at once vigorous in character and incident, and vivid in their descriptions of a past that is recent when measured by years but far distant if measured by the changes that have taken place in the country described.

THE MYSTERY OF 31 NEW INN. By R. Austin Freeman. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

To those critics that have grown weary of the modern detective and his cheap melodramatic dives into the troublous sea of present-day crime, we would recommend an acquaintance with Dr. Thorndyke, the central character in this novel. It is easy to gather the sympathy and skill that have gone to the creation, and the justification, of Mr. Austin Freeman's detective hero. "The Mystery of 31 New Inn" has not been written in the usual style of detective fiction—that is from the end backward, with an irritating explanation clumsily fitted to a series of more or less unconvincing mysteries. The writer has honestly grappled with two apparently insoluble problems in London's criminal life. On the one side, he has confronted us with the pathetic figure of an old man in a lonely house in Kennington, one who is being obviously poisoned by morphia by a mysterious German and his housekeeper, both of whom pretend that their charge is dying from sleeping sickness. On the other, he places the sudden and unexpected death of a comparatively wealthy man in New Inn, who has made two wills within a brief period and in practically the same terms, and yet, by his latter act, has diverted £30,000 from its legitimate destination. It is easy to see that Mr. Freeman has been born with the mind of a writer of first class detective stories, for he has an eye for every detail that matters, a most entertaining style and method, and an extraordinary patience in the adjustment of details. This new story with its brilliant climax should certainly establish him as a recognised English Gaboriau.

THE CELESTIAL CRITIC. By Vincent Brown. 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)

In his latest story the author of "A Magdalen's Husband" has given us a remarkable study of the mind of a working-man. It contains just those elements that might have made a really notable work of fiction. Mr. Brown, however, disappoints us, though he provides several strong situations which are cleverly treated. Real dramatic power is shown in the passages which describe John Brood's discovery of his wife's infidelity, and much, we think, might have been made of his acquaintance with the "wonderful creature" who appeared to him "like a woman out of Shelley's poetry." For a time she proves to be an interesting mystery, and talks with Brood, who is "a man of theories," of the great things of life. But she does not long remain on her pedestal. Brood hears that his brother, a drunken soldier, is to marry this "herald of his dawn," and he suddenly realizes that he has been worshipping an image of clay. And in the end it is the little cripple, "The Celestial Critic," to whom he turns, finding peace in her simple religion. It is an uncommon and readable story, and one of unusual merit despite its disappointing features.

THE SECOND CITY. By W. J. Eccott. 6s. (Blackwood.)

There has been a brief and passionate episode in the past of Sheriff-Substitute Dunluce, which has made him the father of an illegitimate son, of whose very existence for a long time he is unaware. When the blow falls he is happily married—for the second time—to a devoted and very charming wife—an attractive and admirably-drawn character. Mrs. Dunluce is in reality the Sheriff's erstwhile mistress, fearing that the revelation would involve the loss of her husband's affection and respect. The situation is further complicated by the fact that in Scotland the subsequent marriage of parents legalises their offspring. On these foundations Mr. Eccott has built up an altogether admirable novel, which presents several unusual features. "The Second City," however, is primarily noteworthy as a sympathetic and suggestive study of life in modern Glasgow. In this respect, indeed, the novel appears to be of considerable value. In any case it will add to Mr. Eccott's reputation.

COMMONERS' RIGHTS. By Constance Smedley. 6s. (Chatto & Windus.)

This is a book that leaves you congratulating yourself that you did not miss it. "The most perplexing factor in the marriage question is the inevitable growth of the human soul," says Miss Constance Smedley in her preface. It is to be hoped that some day wives and husbands will be viewed in the same light as ordinary individuals, and their service to each other estimated by the genuine growth in good which their mutual influence effects, not only individually, but in relation to the community in which they live. The "perplexing factor" and the great problem of the people's rights provides the theme of an uncommonly fine story. Miss Smedley attacks her subject in a straight, clear-sighted, sympathetic way, and draws for us with great skill and quiet humour a group of characters absolutely true to life. The book is admirably illustrated by Mr. Maxwell Armfield. "Commoners' Rights" concludes a trilogy of novels by Miss Smedley (each complete in itself) dealing with the same big question—the family life in its relation to the individual and to the community.

A DAUGHTER OF THE MORNING. By Hugh de Selincourt. 6s. (Chatto & Windus.)

Constance Howard, a young lady of some twenty-five summers, awoke one morning unusually early and was annoyed to find that she could not go to sleep again. She was at a loss to know how to occupy the time before breakfast; she had a horror of thinking about such elementary questions as her own life and her own body. Such matters were considered morbid in her respectable household, and Constance distrusted "morbidness." Eventually she jumped out of bed and gazed out of her window, and then fell on her knees to pray that she might be made "a daughter of the morning." She was not quite sure what she meant by the phrase, but it remained in her mind. Constance's prayer is answered, and the steps of her development are cunningly portrayed by means of two threads in the story. Smith, the gardener in Constance's home, has an invalid wife, who is so devoted to her husband that his happiness is her only joy. Hence an illicit connection with Lucy, Constance's maid, merely causes the good lady gratefully to sing her "Nunc dimittis." Before Constance could gain spiritual insight, however, it was necessary for her to fall in love with a man who was already married, and who only withdrew from an alliance on the ground that if one lives in the world one must conform to its standards. It was impossible for the story (as conceived by the author) to proceed on anything but unpleasant lines, and we are sorry that his great gifts should not have been displayed to better advantage.

WINDFRINT VIRGIN. By Wilkinson Sherren. 6s. (Ham-Smith.)

Mr. Wilkinson Sherren breaks new ground in his new novel; he does not this time write in the tragic vein, nor does he lay his scenes in the glamorous atmosphere of Wessex. For the most part, his story passes in London, and is a brightly written, very entertaining sentimental comedy. Windfrint Virgin is a charming little country maiden who comes to London bent on seeing life and earning her own living. She calls with a letter of introduction at the office of Mr. Wentworth Williams who has recently opened a Friend-in-Need-Bureau and set up to give advice on all subjects to any who need it—for a consideration. He finds Windfrint is delightfully unqualified to act as a clerk but partly out of sympathy with her, partly attracted by her pretty face and happy ingenuous manner, and partly persuaded by the letter of introduction, he engages her, and in her capacity of assistant to the proprietor of the Bureau she presently begins to enter upon adventures, and upon one that alters the whole course of her career. Timothy Squebb, who falls in love with her and with whom she falls in love does not strike you as being good enough for her; good man in his way though he may be. Williams for all his flippancies is a far more pleasing and attractive personality; he is moreover something of an idealist, and his knightly behaviour towards Windfrint when her guardians shut her out after midnight is a charming romantic episode. And Williams, too, falls in love with her, and somehow in spite of appearances at the end you cannot help suspecting that she really loved Williams the better of the two men though she did not know it herself. It is a brisk and lively tale, so thoroughly modern that the Suffrage Movement plays a part in it, and told so deftly and with such skill in characterisation that one is as keenly interested in its men and women as in the romance that is woven about them.

HONEY, MY HONEY. By Katharine Tynan. 6s. (Smith, Elder.)

This is a fresh, sweet, wholesome tale of youth and love, with a stately English home for its setting, and a cosmopolitan atmosphere. The de Crepignys live in Rose Hall, an old mansion on a hill just outside the village of Hartwell. Down in the valley lies a beautiful old Elizabethan house—"Frant," which originally belonged to the de Crepignys but which passed out of their hands some generations back. The latest occupant has been Honey's godfather, Sir John Barton. It was known that he intended leaving Frant to Honey so that the old house might be restored to its rightful owners; but Sir John dies suddenly, just before Honey's nineteenth birthday, without leaving a will, and so Frant passes on to fresh hands. The de Crepignys are too poor to buy it when it is put on the market, and it is finally bought up by an American family, the Fairbrothers. The village is thrown into agitation by the unconventional ways of the new owners of Frant. Lucinda Fairbrother is delicious with her fascinating chatter and her manner of looking after her Poppa and Momma. Poor Momma can never get used to having all her work done for her and longs sometimes to "hustle round" herself, and Poppa can never recognise social distinctions and is always being brought to order by his Bunty-like daughter. Honey, prepared to hate these people for desecrating Frant, grows to like them and their simple, unaffected ways immensely; indeed she grows to more than like the tall young son of the house, Denis, and this although she is already engaged to a middle-aged, courteous gentleman of her parent's choosing. The plot develops easily, naturally, holding the reader's interest from first to last. Each character in the story portrays the sympathy and insight for which Miss Tynan is famous, and the story of Honey will add yet one more name to its author's long list of deservedly successful books.

THE BANDBOX. By Louis Joseph Vance. 6s. (Grant Richards.)

Although the picture on the wrapper of this book shows a mammoth liner, and one of the chapters is entitled "Ismay?" it has nothing whatever to do with the Titanic disaster. It is, in fact, one of those delightful stories which Mr. Vance knows so well how to produce. He has a light touch, a sprightly wit, and gives us a succession of absorbing incidents which never allow the interest to flag from beginning to end. Two bandboxes—identical twins—two characters—identical in appearance—a Cado-gan collar worth a king's ransom, a beautiful actress, a jealous lover—these are the ingredients which go to make up an ingenious story which is sure to attain wide popularity. The actress finds that the necklace mysteriously vanishes from her state-room on the Autocratic, and a Mr. Iff, a most laughable passenger, who is suspected of the theft, disappears just as strangely when the ship reaches New York. The subsequent chapters are full of adventure, telling how the twin bandboxes reach the wrong owners, and how Mr. Iff's double is frequently thought to be Mr. Iff himself, and altogether there are complications of a most exciting and amusing character. It would spoil the reading of this capital story to even indicate how Mr. Vance eventually unravels the amazing tangle.

VARICK'S LEGACY. By G. B. Burgin. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

"Varick's Legacy" takes the form of three young literary men, "left" to him by the dying Terson, who has befriended them. It is fortunate for Kesteven, Isaacs, and Benne that Varick is starting a new monthly magazine, on the staff of which he promptly enrolls them. Although no longer in danger of actual starvation, it must not be supposed that the three friends find their way altogether clear and smooth before them. Not the least of their difficulties is that there are only two heroines to divide between them. But you may always rely upon Mr. Burgin to bring to pass a happy, yet withal natural, ending, and he certainly has not failed in his latest novel. The story is good, as a story, but we are inclined to think that the book will attract more particularly by reason of the admirable pictures of the light and shade of London literary life which it affords. In this respect the book is really admirable, unstrained, yet effective, natural and truthful. It possesses also several of those quaint and humorous minor characters with the treatment of whom the author has many times proved himself to be adept. In fact, "Varick's Legacy" is quite one of the best books Mr. Burgin has written.

THE MAKESHIFT MARRIAGE. By Baillie Reynolds 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton)

Mrs. Baillie Reynolds has a remarkable ability for placing her characters in the most hopelessly complicated circumstances, then unravelling the entanglement easily and reducing the discord to perfect harmony. Her latest book, "The Makeshift Marriage," displays to great advantage her talent in this direction. It is an interesting book because of its convincing naturalness, and it is told in the author's usual absorbing, unaffected style. It is the story of a man who, too weak to face his first real disappointment with courage, and jilted by the girl he has loved, is piqued and jealous and immediately marries somebody else. The strong, ably realised characters of the man's wife and his mother are drawn with striking truthfulness and sympathy. And the makeshift marriage which might have, and almost did succeed in ruining three lives, despite difficulties and apparent failure, proves to be the pathway to happiness after all.

THE STREET OF THE FLUTE-PLAYER. By H. de Vere Stacpoole 6s. (Murray)

One feature of the author's consummate skill, proved in other fields, is that he can throw the veil of romance over the Athens of Socrates, the contemplative critical Athens, the city, too, of pettifoggers and demagogues. We may feel inclined to condemn the passion of the hero and heroine as an anachronism, but the adoration of the fisher-boy for the hero is pure Greek, Greek romance. But apart from all this there is endless romance, for all who have our author's eyes, in the sunrise and sunset which the fisher-boy sees at the beginning and end of the book: "the stars were all shivering away and dissolving," "he noticed that dusk and night do not fall from the sky which is eternal, but rise from the earth which is mutable." As "Seaballads" might have foretold to us, Mr. de Vere Stacpoole creeps farthest into the romantic heart of old Athens, when he gets on board the ship and shows us the romance of trade. "The perfume of old cargoes still clung to her, spice and wool and oil." She sets sail "to the tune of a flute, the slatting of canvas, and the rhympa-pai of the hauling chorus: haunted by the tune of Proteus blowing his conch to the flocks of ocean." The rescue of the heroine from this ship is a brilliant piece of conception and expression. We glory in her rescuer, the fisher-boy, even as he glories in Diomed. We suffer agonies when the brutal Egyptian pursues him round the pond. His survival reconciles us to the Romeo and Juliet tragedy.

THE GOODLY FELLOWSHIP. By Rachel Capen Schaufler. 6s. (Macmillan.)

"You don't seem to know much about Christianity. I should think you were a Moslem or something just as niggerent. When we read round at prayers the other day, you looked for John in the Old Testament. I saw you. Mary Freyer thinks we ought to pray for you to be converted." This is how the heroine, a wealthy young American girl, is addressed by one of the children of an American missionary in Persia. Jean Stuart has to take refuge with her fellow countrymen and women for a winter, and though she has no sympathy with their creed, she learns to appreciate most of them, and in the end to marry a sort of Rochester, a gruff antipathetic man, who proves too strong for her. Miss Schaufler has not fallen into the common mistake of novelists who make capital out of foreign missions. She can write a romantic story of love, adventure, and the little intrigues which go on even in a mission community, but the thing is done without undue sentiment on the one hand and without the affectation of superiority which spoils many novels of this class. The characters are vividly drawn, there is a strong romantic interest, and above all there is a humour in this book which makes it singularly pleasant. Persia has an attraction for us at present, and although the authoress does not give lessons on Persian policy she will throw a number of side-lights on life in that country, for the readers of her delightful story.

CHARLES THE GREAT. By Mrs. H. H. Penrose. 6s. (Methuen)

Mrs. Penrose has not, perhaps, chosen the happiest title in the world for her new novel. To many minds "Charles the Great" will suggest a study in historical romance, and many case-hardened readers nowadays will tell you that they are tired of all forms of "period" stories. It would be a pity, however, if the public neglected the delightful modern comedy that figures under this disappointing title.

"Charles the Great" is really a Great Creation, and he deserves to be known, not for his virtues, but for vices. These are the common property of many self-indulgent and easy-living bachelors who make a pretence of a culture and genius which they do not possess, and who, for a time, at all events, invariably succeed in imposing their own views of their importance upon their friends. Mrs. Penrose herself would not pretend, we imagine, that the pivot, upon which she has based this full-length study of a petty rural tyrant, has any remarkable novelty of conception. As a matter of fact, the idea of a man getting a poor and needy author to write a book for him, and then sending this spurious novel forth as his own production, has been used many times. Mr. Anstey, for example, did it with sardonic effect in "The Giant's Robe"; but Mrs. Penrose has a more delicate touch, and we are not stretched on the rack for a period covered by three hundred pages before we are satisfied that the impostor will be unmasked by the people who matter to the scheme of her book. Mrs. Penrose has distinct gifts of humour and literary charm.

THE WEAVING OF THE SHUTTLE. By C. Holmes Cautley. 6s. (Duckworth.)

As the title implies, this is a story with a mill as the mainspring of its plot. It is by no means a new idea, and there is nothing peculiarly arresting about the treatment. But the book, though it could have been briefer with advantage, is of sufficient interest to demand one's entire attention. Michael Esholt was the owner of Barsland Mills. He had one daughter, and one son who had spent enough time at Oxford to make it difficult for him to settle down to work in a Yorkshire mill. Esholt's works manager was Mathias Tempest, whose daughter Zillah, by reason of her good looks and superior education, was the belle of the village. Stephen, of course, falls in love with her, and on his father's discovery of the fact is forbidden to pursue matters to their natural conclusion. Michael Esholt sends his son away temporarily and advises Mathias to do the same with his daughter, but in the best chapter of the book Mathias refuses to acknowledge his master's control over his private affairs. The climax is reached when Mathias gives his master notice, after serving him all his life. Mathias Tempest sets up a rival concern, which by drawing off the spring-water from the other mill has the effect of bringing Esholt to the verge of ruin. It would be unwise to reveal the happy conclusion of the book. It only remains for us to congratulate the author on a good piece of honest, unsensational workmanship.

ONE CROWNING HOUR. By Sydney C. Grier. 6s. (Blackwood.)

Owing to a highly-developed sense of right and wrong, Geoffrey Carrick has been placed in an invidious position towards his command in the Indian Army (of the East India Company). He has made himself awkward to the Government, and the Queen has dispensed with his services. He adds to his troubles by a misunderstanding with his fiancée, Geraldine, and his engagement is broken off. A disappointed man—and, to tell the truth, rather a sulky one too—he is looking for trouble wherever he can find it. Opportunely enough, there comes to him a meeting with Leeson, a journalist and acquaintance, who has some knowledge of the intentions of Garibaldi. And thus it is that Carrick becomes a member of the historic Thousand who invaded Sicily and paved the way for a united Italy. At the same time Geraldine pays a lengthy visit to her alarming and aristocratic aunt in Naples, in whose house she is kept in the utmost seclusion while an attempt is made to marry her off to a highly unattractive Neapolitan. With such materials as this for a beginning, you may be quite sure that Miss Grier's story is readable and dramatic. It is also something more—an extraordinarily well-realized and many-sided picture of the times. The book contains many admirably presented types, and the figure of Garibaldi is invested with the glamour that the devotion and enthusiasm of his followers have given him. "One Crowning Hour" is a fine historical novel, full of fire and vigour, and it will rank as one of the best books that Miss Grier has written.

THE HERO OF HERAT: A FRONTIER BIOGRAPHY IN ROMANTIC FORM. By Maud Diver 6s. (Constable)

Anglo-Indian records contain few more thrilling chapters, apart from the Mutiny, than those relating to Lord Auckland's policy towards Afghanistan and the men to whose lot it fell to carry out that policy along the North-West frontier. The bare facts are romantic in themselves, and Mrs. Diver, who has studied them closely, marshals them with consummate skill into a narrative that will command the deepest interest of everyone in whose heart the voice of duty, raised against the specious pleas of mere self-interest, is capable of awakening a sympathetic chord. Her chief authorities are Sir John Kaye, Sir Henry Durand, and Captain Trotter; but she has gone beyond these, to every available source, in her endeavour to make this record of a brave man's career as complete and as truthful as possible. Her hero is Eldred Pottinger, scion of a notable Irish family that has given of its best to the Empire, and a man whose upright dealing, simple faith, and sterling courage were sorely tried by Simla and its satellites no less than by the duplicity of Shah Kamran and his uncannily gifted Wazir, Yar Mahomed; but who was as beloved of the common people of the hills as his memory must be dear to every lover of his country. Eldred Pottinger is shown to us as explorer, soldier, and soldier-political, in a story that takes us from the spring of 1837 through the long siege of Herat, the fatal supersession of Dost Mahomed by Shah Shujah, the recall of Eldred Pottinger, and the failure of Major Todd, his successor at Herat, to succeed where Eldred Pottinger failed—failed, that is, to achieve the impossible. The characters of such men as Stoddart, Burnes, Conolly, Keane, Fane, Nott, Cotton, and Macnaghten are limned with a sure and graphic touch, which is just as sure in sifting the good from the bad in the men against whom their respective wits were pitted. The tortuous course of Oriental diplomacy and intrigue is followed as clearly and surely as are the idealism and the subterfuge of the Simla Cabinet. In fact, the attention of the reader is held in thrall throughout; but the finish is unfortunately postponed. For this one has to await the appearance of a second volume, to be entitled "Retribution." And this is the only disappointment of the book.

COME RACK! COME ROPE! By Robert Hugh Benson. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

Father Benson has written a noble and uplifting romance, in which the evolution of character is set high above merely transitory happiness. The plot unfolds by means of the Babington conspiracy and the story incidentally includes a careful study of Anthony Babington and a brilliantly attractive portrait of Father Campion, as well as a priestly interview with Mary Stuart, a passing vision of Elizabeth in her barge of state. It reaches its culminating moment at the time of the Spanish Armada and closes with a terribly realistic description of the brutally devised torture and death endured by a young Catholic martyr, and his spiritual victory. In his last moments, having commended himself to the outstretched arms of the Crucified, he becomes aware of the suppliant agony of a recusant kinsman to whose unwilling means he owes his death, and whom with his dying effort he absolves—aware too of another presence, the brave and tender woman he had once desired to make his wife, but who had loved him so divinely as to care supremely for what she believed his highest good, even though it led away from all earthly fulfilment of their youthful dream and pierced her with a very anguish of renouncement. Their story uplifts with salutary clearness in these days of erotic paganism that immortal ideal of love which Plato shadowed forth and the Christian Church, when true to her divine mysteries, has ever cherished—a love which can renounce all except what is most Godlike in the beloved, if such be the command of Love Himself. The contrast between the deep heather-scented quietude of Derbyshire uplands, in which we hear the bees and the sheep-bells, and the tragic horror of the closing scene, emphasizes the wide range of Father Benson's power.

The Bookman's Table.

THE LOVE-SEEKER. By Maud Churton Braby. 2s. 6d. net. (Herbert Jenkins.)

Mrs. Braby has undertaken a most difficult task in "The Love-Seekers," and has accomplished it with conspicuous success. She is not afraid to make the admission, which some very advanced people would have us believe is old-fashioned, that "woman's great fundamental need is for love"; she takes the world and its men and women as she finds them, knows that the scorn of love is as much a pretence as the sentiment and romance of love often turns out to be, but realises that for men and women alike without love a human life cannot be altogether happy, and that "there is much more need for love-making after marriage than before it." Her outlook is everywhere broad, practical, eminently sane. She has some frank and true things to say of man's selfishness in love and woman's unselfishness; and writes shrewdly of the little matters that lead to a "falling in love," and the equally little matters that bring about an estrangement. There are chapters on the difficulty of finding the right mate; on how to please men, and how to please women; and one of the best chapters is that on how to keep love when one has gained it. It is a very interesting, sympathetic and wise little book, with much of excellent counsel in it for those who are happy, and of comfort for those who are sad.

Mrs. Churton Braby.

A TRAMP'S SKETCHES. By Stephen Graham. 5s. net. (Macmillan.)

The reader may consider Mr. Graham's book in two lights: either as a volume of remarkably interesting reminiscences of life on the open road, or as a powerful appeal to the modern world to forsake the worship of the golden calf. The author's tramp was along the Caucasian and Crimean shores of the Black Sea, and eventually to the Heavenly City in the company of Russian pilgrims. His pen paints delicate little portraits of the simple and lovable Russian peasant; it describes, too, with striking vividness, nights spent in strange cities and in lonely shacks. "I slept with the bare world as my house, the sky as my roof, and God as host," he writes, and, lest an incautious reader should exclaim "how lovely," we hasten to add that, like the Apostle Paul, Mr. Graham was often in perils of waters, in perils in the city, and constantly in weariness and painfulness. But the author expressly states that his book is more concerned with the tramp than with Russia. "It is the life of the wanderer and seeker, the walking hermit, the rebel against modern conditions and commercialism who has gone out into the wilderness." Commercialism, he says, is at present the great enemy of the individual man, and the only hope for salvation is first of all for a few to live their lives out to the full in order that all others may live their lives completely. Mr. Graham seems conscious as he writes that he is a prophet crying in the wilderness, and even if some of his readers may consider that he is imagining a vain thing they will be constrained to admit that the pursuit of this ideal has one great merit, so far as Mr. Graham is concerned—the delightful record of his vagabondage.

LAFCADIO HEARN. By Edward Thomas. 1s. net. (Constable.)

Mr. Thomas has achieved a tour de force. By skilfully linking together Hearn's own words, he has constructed, after the manner of a mosaic, a just, precise and adequate picture of the man and the artist. Never was critic more dispassionate. Rarely did a book spring so entirely from the brain. It is an absolutely heartless piece of work. This is at once its virtue and its condemnation. As we once before pointed out in these pages, Hearn's position is peculiar. Since his death he has been belauded by a number of persons who have in the main taken up the pen especially for that purpose, not being naturally addicted to criticism. The consequence is that he has assumed a position which the reputation of his works, either among the many or among the few, hardly warrants. We expressed an opinion that the considered verdict of some less partial and more practised judge would be of interest. Mr. Thomas gives us that verdict, and it is in effect unfavourable. Mr. Thomas's love of the simple and fresh in literature is well known. He was the first to insist on the qualities of Mr. W. H. Davies, who is one of the finest living writers both in prose and in verse, but, the very antithesis of Lafcadio Hearn.

The elaboration of the author of "Some Chinese Ghosts" would scarcely be likely to arouse his enthusiasm. As a matter of fact, they leave him entirely cold. We thoroughly sympathise with him. Hearn was a skilled juggler with phrases, though not so clever as Gautier, whose influence he never shook off. That he was only this we do not assert. He is said to have understood Japan better than any other Westerner. But he himself confessed that this was very little. Naturally, he could only make us understand a tithe of what he himself understood. Such partial interpretation is scarcely sufficient to place him in the hierarchy of English letters. Hearn is emphatically not "of the centre." Not only did he love the unfamiliar, but he fled the familiar. His work gives us a nostalgia for simplicity. All this Mr. Thomas brings out most admirably, but in doing so condemns his book. It is one of a series of "Modern Biographies," to be concerned presumably only with people of importance. If Mr. Thomas's estimate of Hearn is just, Hearn does not deserve to be included in the series. If, on the other hand, Hearn's claim is admitted, then Mr. Thomas was the wrong person to whose care to assign him.

IN PATRIA: An Exposition of Dante's "Paradiso." By John S. Carroll, M.A., D.D. 10s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Dr. Carroll is to be congratulated heartily upon the completion of the task to which he set his hand nine years ago. To "Exiles of Eternity" and "Prisoners of Hope" his readers can now add this exposition of the Paradiso; the title is Latin, but in all other respects the book corresponds to the plan and method of its predecessors, and crowns the series with an exposition, canto by canto, which enables the ordinary reader to grasp the poet's symbolism and enter intelligently into the somewhat remote world of his conceptions. Many years ago Mr. A. J. Butler observed that "probably no great writer has given occasion for so much writing on the part of lesser men." If he knew the bibliography of the Pauline epistles he might qualify that verdict. Still Dante-literature, even in English, has attained formidable proportions, and Dr. Carroll, with a scholar's modesty, has evidently felt occasional qualms about adding another volume to those on the Paradiso. Anyone who has read Mr. E. G. Gardner's study will understand these qualms, but he will also appreciate the fresh line which Dr. Carroll has followed. "It had been easy to rhapsodize over the poetic beauty; but I have generally found that such rhapsody is in inverse ratio to the writer's knowledge of the actual thought in the poet's mind." The object of "In Patria" is to unbare that thought. Even after Dr. Carroll's patient and very careful analysis, most of his readers will probably retain the early conviction, or prejudice, that the Paradiso is less interesting than its predecessors. But at least they will understand better the theological substructure of the poem and the elaborate intricacies of thought and dogma which the poet has taken over from Aquinas and Bernard. On p. 519 the author changes the interpretation of a difficult passage in the Inferno (ix. 64ff) which he held in his earlier volume. He now suggests—and makes out an ingenious case for the suggestion—that the heavenly messenger who rebukes the fallen angels is not Michael but Gabriel, and that the rod he carries is the virga which symbolized the Virgin Mary. On this theory Gabriel "represents some intervention of the Virgin's grace to save Dante from the fiends of doubt that held the gate of the City of the Heretics."—The book deepens the impression, made by its predecessors, that the author knows his Dante through and through, and that he possesses the knowledge without which, as he remarks, no real enjoyment of the poem is possible. He has further the ability to convey this knowledge clearly and concisely. There is a vein of quiet humour and human interest in his solid work which is singularly attractive. But most of all it is his width of reading and independence of judgment which lend a special value to the book, and which deserve to win for it, as well as for its predecessors, a place on the crowded shelf of the best Dante literature.

FAR OFF FIELDS. By JOSEPH WHITTAKER. 1s. net. (Dartford: Thomas W. Jenkins.)

One fine quality that takes you at once in Mr. Whittaker's poems is their absolute sincerity; following the wise and simple way of Wither, he looks into his own heart and writes, and so there is a human note in all his verse that appeals to the inner life and experience of his readers. He has no traffic in the eccentricities and pretty artificialities that make so much new poetry dreadfully mortal and even wearisome; you would say he had suffered too much and seen too much of real sorrow to be able to play daintily with simulated regrets and imaginary woes; there is a touch of intimacy, a depth and feeling of reality in whatever of sadness gets into his song, and withal a strong, indomitable spirit of hope that arises out of his darkest moods and sees that for all its hardship and pain and injustice life is a good thing and the world is still turning always towards the sunrise; that it is not only "the years that once have been,

Whose far off fields are green," but that fields as green as they lie far off also in the future. There is pathos in such poems as "Reverie," "To My Mother at Rest," in "Sweet Lavender" (one of the most delightful lyrics in the book), and it touches you by its utter naturalness, its utter simplicity, and there is poetry in them too both of feeling and of utterance. A passionate pity for the poor and the unhappy, a quick, intense sympathy with broken lives and those whom the world has wronged inspire much of Mr. Whittaker's poetry, but he finds inspiration also in his home happiness and his love of children—nothing could be more wholly charming than the birthday verses "Ten Times"—for if he has walked through the valley of the shadow, he has climbed to the hilltops if he has wearied of a close city life, he has felt the wind of the open country in his face, has gloried in seeing the heath afire with gorse-bloom, and perhaps more than all he has learned among the children something of "all the lessons the fairies teach in the garden that no man knows,

And all that the birds have tried to tell in song since the birth of time,
—These were the dower of the baby flower that stole like a visible chime Into our day from the Faraway and Once upon a Time."

One may say of him, as he says here of Eugene Field, he has "the heart that knoweth the heart of a child," which is the only sort of heart that really knows likewise the heart of a man; and out of this knowledge he has written a little book that is veined with the true gold of poetry. We can say nothing higher in praise of it than that it makes one desirous of reading those other volumes that we gather from the title page Mr. Whittaker has written.

THE INNER LIFE OF GEORGE ELIOT. By Charles Gardner, M.A. 5s. net. (Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons.)

Lovers of George Eliot will peruse with interest and sympathy Mr. Gardner's study in the mental and spiritual development of that author. Though not a set biography, it gives a fairly complete view of her career. Very early in her life he traces some secret root of sorrow. In "Daniel Deronda" she wrote of "an entailed disadvantage—the deformed foot, doubtfully hidden by a shoe, which makes a restlessly active spiritual yeast, and easily turns a self-centred unloving nature into an Ishmaelite. But in the rarer sort, who presently see their own frustrated claim as one among a myriad, the inexorable sorrow takes the form of fellowship and makes imagination tender." It is part of Mr. Gardner's theory that there was something in George Eliot's make-up equivalent to "the deformed foot." As she has not revealed what it was it would be impertinent to be over-curious; but, adds Mr. Gardner, it was the beginning of her wide tolerance, and it brought her to the conviction, which grew ever stronger as life advanced, that fellowship was the heart of all morality. Pursuing this train of thought, he dates the great advance in George Eliot's religious position from the time when her interest in Judaism was aroused. Her view of art was part of her religious life; she cared little for art that did not enlarge the human sympathies. Yet Mr. Gardner arrives at the view that in "Daniel Deronda," which he places as her highest achievement as a work of art, the moralist does not eat up the artist. While admitting no sign that she ever regarded her union with Lewes as in itself immoral, he acknowledges that in the end she envied the simple faith of her unlearned relatives in Warwickshire, and would have given all to be able to change her past. The conclusion of the whole matter is that George Eliot's life was not in agreement with her inner convictions, else, like Mordecai, she might have stood, "a master spirit carrying the rich inheritance of the past into the future, fashioning new forms to hold the life-giving things of the Spirit." "Because she failed to reach her own highest conception of morality, she just failed to accomplish the world's highest conception of art."

THE ROYAL VISIT TO INDIA. 10s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

Bacon told us that "travel is a part of education," but "The Royal Visit to India," the Hon. John Fortescue's narrative of Their Majesties' tour last year, provides a liberal educative feast on matters pertaining to India for those whom circumstances keep at home. Mr. Fortescue commences his work with an interesting résumé of historical events leading up to the position of India at this juncture. His narrative is exceedingly attractive and an invaluable chronicle. The brilliant scenes of the landing at Bombay were excelled only in splendour by the gatherings at Delhi. Here His Majesty announced the revision of the partition of Bengal, and if anything further were needed to ameliorate the Bengali, we can confidently hope that the Royal visit to the three hundred million odd subjects of the Indian Empire must surely be the greatest peace-making action. Mr. Fortescue remarks the somewhat surprising fact that the King-Emperor entered Delhi unrecognised by those who had so long and eagerly awaited his coming. December 13th was the day of days when the King's Proclamation was read, and, after being repeated in Urdu, the massed bands played the National Anthem, followed by the firing of thirty-four salvos from north to west, and afterwards came "a faint sound as of rending paper, which died away into a faint mutter and swelled again into an angry snarl as the feu de joie of the troops that lined the roads sped away for three miles from the amphitheatre to the King's Camp, and rushed back from thence to the amphitheatre again." It was the present writer's privilege to see the State functions pictured in perhaps the most remote part of the British Empire from the scenes of their origin, and the tremendous enthusiasm shown by the spectators could not but inspire the hope that the day may not be far distant when Australia, Canada, and the whole of this vast Empire, will share the honour India has just received in the Royal visit, which Mr. Fortescue has so ably recorded.

INTERPRETATION IN SONG. By Harry Plunket Greene. The Musician's Library. 6s. net (Macmillan & Co., and Stanier & Bell.)

This is the fifth of the ten books by experts, each of the first rank in his particular phase of the art of music, which are planned under the series entitled "The Musician's Library." Some time ago Mr. Plunket Greene lectured on "Interpretation in Song," and both those who then had the privilege of listening to his own racy delivery of maxims which are the fruit of a lifelong experience of singing, teaching and judging vocal competitions on his part, and those who missed it, will be delighted to find them all here, pickled (if one may emulate the author's adroit use of metaphor) in the brine of his native wit. Salt has a certain mordant quality, and if any preparation of it is strong enough to bite into the envelope of self-complacency which surrounds the average "steady and stolid-y" concert-singer of the bad old school, here it is. For the intelligent young singer already well-grounded in technique (the book is avowedly not written for the beginner) whose career lies plastic in his own hands, this treatise bodies forth a model, perfect in its proportions, exquisite in its details, which should fire his noblest aspirations. He is made to realise in the clearest fashion that the mere physical efficiency of his vocal muscles and their control are to him but as the mallet and chisel of the sculptor: tools and nothing more. So far does the author press this point that he actually recommends his students not to know too much about the muscles and how they do their work—so long as they do it. His greater concern is with those delicate affairs of brain, temperament, magnetism, sense of atmosphere and sympathy which must guide the tools if a work of art is to result. The trenchant chapter on Purity of Diction cannot be too strongly recommended; nevertheless, its distilled common sense is merely such as pervades the entire work. The hints on Programme-making, the Singing of Folk-Songs, and above all, on How to Study a Song—in which three songs, by Schubert, Schumann and Stanford, are dealt with line by line and word by word—add greatly to the intrinsic value of this exposition of the complete art of singing.

Notes on New Books.

MESSRS. MILLS & BOON.

It is clear from Mr. Harold Simpson's Rambles in Norway (6s.) that there are not many parts of Norway, south of Trondhjem, which Mr. Simpson has left unvisited. His unpretentious, pleasing little book will be a useful guide to those who have not yet seen Norway; they could do much worse than follow in his steps. While those who know their "gamle Norge" will like to have the illustrations. Mr. Simpson tells us nothing very new or startling—except when he describes the motor services, which did not desecrate those lovely roads when we were last in Norway. Neither does he give us any picturesque Berrovia conversations with outlandish fellows or romantic ones. He obviously writes what happened to him, nothing else, and is that not excessive honesty? While he was driving the long miles—he was not base enough to patronize the motors—did he not, by some chance word from his attendant, see a story fit for us? The scenery, of course, is thoroughly described, and literary matters are remembered. He visits Ibsen's grave, and gives us pleasant tales of Bjørnson. We ourselves were fortunate enough to speak to both of these great men, and to encounter Grieg at Vossevangen, where the tourists pressed against each other at the windows of the best hotel, to watch the fragile, little, white-haired genius eat his supper. What this book might profitably have included is a map, on which the author's route and the alternative ones, both by fjord and land, could have been marked. To ramble as this author did is probably the best way, for the distances forbid a walking-tour, unless only a small portion of the country is the traveller's object, and to bicycle is very arduous. It is surprising that the Romsdal did not find much favour with Mr. Simpson; but he had heard so much about it and he was determined not to let himself be led by the nose. Yet one cannot say that, like Iago, he is "nothing if not critical," and judging from this book he is a pleasant man to travel with. He has a good deal yet to see in Norway; especially some of the more secluded spots, and one of them alongside of a lake in which a water-sprite is said to live. If he will please in his next volume on this country not to be quite so matter-of-fact and full of good advice and kindly gossip, if he will be more like the delightful creature of that lake we shall have pleasure in revealing to him where it may be found.

The publishers of Miss Maude Annesley's new book, My Parisian Year (10s. 6d. net), fairly take the wind out of our sails by describing the work as "fascinating," "very amusing," and "most delightful." It is a tribute to the author's skill that, having read the book, we are left without any of our natural desire to quarrel with the publisher's description of it. The work is obviously the result of a long acquaintance with her subject; and Miss Annesley everywhere makes good her claim to possess "a good memory, a keen observation, and complete honesty." The topics discussed are remarkably varied, and may be said to cover the subject as far as is possible within the limits of a single volume. Children, servants, students, theatres, halls, shops and restaurants, are some of the topics on which Miss Annesley writes with a whole-hearted enjoyment that she succeeds in communicating to her readers. To the modest list of qualifications that she claims she had every right to add a refreshing sanity of outlook, which displays itself in much subtle criticism, as well as in much valuable information. The intending visitor to Paris should not miss this book; it will greatly whet the appetite, and undoubtedly reduce expenses, by its valuable instruction on the best methods of countering the tricks of the wily garçon. Split infinitives and a superfluity of "of courses" are a few of the sacrifices that Miss Annesley makes to the Graces.

MESSRS. STANLEY PAUL & CO.

Mr. Sabatini has been aptly described as a writer of cloak and dagger novels. In The Justice of the Duke (6s.) we have an exciting and well-told tale, with Cæsar Borgia as hero. Mr. Sabatini has already published a long and careful life of Cæsar Borgia, so that he knows his period well, and has rightly seen that it forms excellent material for a romantic, historical novel. The atmosphere of excitement and the villainy of the times is well portrayed. The excitement of the plot is well sustained, and we read on continually anxious to know what will happen next. We do not get—nor do we expect in a novel of this sort—much subtle psychology, nor are we particularly interested in the actual individuals. But Cæsar Borgia does stand out. We can see that he is a great man, and we are impressed by his ruthless personality; he seems a veritable superman, not cruel for the sake of cruelty, but quite merciless in the means he uses to gain his ends. We feel that he was not altogether an unbenevolent despot. The most thrilling chapter in the book is "The Lust of Conquest," in which Monna Panthasia-lea uses all in vain her woman's wiles, and is herself taken captive.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN.

An unfailing interest clings about any first-hand record of the tragic events of the Indian Mutiny, and in China Jim, by Major-General J. T. Harris (3s. 6d. net), we have not only a description by an eye-witness, but an account by a soldier who took part in the quelling of the mutineers. "China Jim" tells of his march to Umballa, and on to Delhi in those terrible early days of the massacres; he tells of his work at the famous Flagstaff Tower, and of his part in the taking of the Ridge. His style is not particularly inspired, but his concise, plain statements are not without their impressiveness. The reason for the book's title, which might be puzzling to the uninformed, is that General Harris passed from active service in India to active service in China, where his deeds, and his "acquisition of property" earned him the name which has since stuck to him. Apart from the big events with which the author was concerned, the volume is a chronicle of minor personal matters, with here and there a mild anecdote. Minor personal matters can, however, sometimes shed a sidelight on larger affairs, and the General's experiences touch on some rights and wrongs of Army life, which do not usually appear on the surface. These are the recollections of a soldier of close on eighty years of age, and they are published at "the oft-repeated request of many friends and acquaintances."

MESSRS. GEORGE ALLEN & SON.

Basil Verely: A Study in Charterhouse Life, by Archibald K. Ingram (3s. 6d.), is one of the best books for boys that we have met for a long time. Although it makes a special appeal to present and former Carthusians, it will be eagerly devoured by every youngster who loves a good yarn. Mr. Ingram has not only a wonderful knowledge of the thoughts and aspirations of boys, but he also knows what will interest them. In this story he gives the career of Basil Verely at Charterhouse. We first meet him as a year-old baby left on a doorstep and adopted by a kind-hearted old lady; next he becomes a "new bug," determined to have a jolly time and enjoy himself to the full. The incidents and exciting adventures of his school life are faithfully recorded, and it is evident the author has an intimate acquaintance with the Charterhouse. Basil, one of the most popular boys at the famous school, meets his father, a broken-down actor and drunkard, under extraordinary circumstances and has a sad awakening. The boy is suspected of the theft of a valuable diamond, and runs away. The sequel tells how he overcame the difficulties which suddenly beset him, and how he determined to undertake a noble and worthy work.

SUNRISE PUBLISHING COMPANY, WARRINGTON.

Luke Hamilton Talbot, whose Poems (3s. 6d. net) have been collected by Mr. Arthur Bennett, was by turns actor, policeman, detective, and had been for some time Chief Constable of Warrington before he died by his own hand at Cairo in 1907. In a long and very interesting Introduction Mr. Bennett tells the story of Talbot's life, and the poems themselves amply justify the care he has taken to give them something of permanent form. They were evidently written under many influences, and, as their editor admits, one may hear in some of them echoes of Keats, of Poe, of Wilde, of Kipling, but always there is in them too that individual note that saves them from being echoes only. The moods, feelings, experiences they embody are the poet's own. There is a pathos of real regret in "Lost Bohemia," and power as well as pathos in "A Slum Dweller to the Sea." Some of the poems have flowered out of poignant incidents that Mr. Talbot must have encountered in his everyday working life among the poor, the outcast and the lawless sinners of Warrington; on the other hand there are love songs and thoughtful lyrics that are full of charm and fancy and delicacy of sentiment and music. It is clear from Mr. Bennett's sympathetic memoir that Talbot was no ordinary man; and his work has in it qualities of strength and beauty that lift it above that of the ordinary minor poet. This is a book that the lover of poetry will thank us for bringing to his notice.

The Bookman Annual Art Supplement

A SELECTION FROM MR. JOHN LANE'S AUTUMN BOOKS MEMOIRS, BIOGRAPHIES, Etc.

THE LETTER - BAG OF LADY ELIZABETH SPENCER STANHOPE

By A. M. W. STIRLING. With a Colour Plate, 2 Photogravures, and numerous other Illustrations. 2 vols, 32s. net.

FANNY BURNEY AT THE COURT OF QUEEN CHARLOTTE

By CONSTANCE HILL. With numerous Illustrations. 16s. net.

COKE OF NORFOLK AND HIS FRIENDS

By A. M. W. STIRLING. New Edition, Revised, with some additions. 16 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

THE VAN EYCKS AND THEIR ART

By W. H. JAMES WEALE, with the co-operation of MAURICE W. BROCKWELL. With numerous Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE

By JOSEPH TURQUAN. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

A TRAGEDY IN STONE

By LORD REDESDALE. 7s. 6d. net.

CROSS VIEWS

By WILFRIDS JACKSON. 5s. net.

VITAL LIES

By VERNON LEE. 2 vols. 10s. net

THIRTEEN YEARS OF A BUSY WOMAN'S LIFE

By Mrs. ALEC TWEEDIE. With 16 Illustrations. 16s. net.

THE HISTORY OF THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

By MYLES BIRKET FOSTER, F.R.A.M. With Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

ROMANTIC TRIALS OF THREE CENTURIES

By HUGH CHILDERS. With numerous Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

NAPOLEON'S LAST CAMPAIGN IN GERMANY

By F. LORAINÉ PETRE. With 17 Maps and Plans. 12s. 6d. net.

THE STORY OF DON JOHN OF AUSTRIA

By LUIS COLOMA. Translated by LADY MORETON. Illustrated. 16s. net.

MY LIFE IN PRISON

By DONALD LOWRIE. 6s. net.

TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, Etc.

AUSTRIA—HER PEOPLE AND THEIR HOMELANDS

By JAMES BAKER. With 48 Pictures in Colour by DONALD MAXWELL. 21s. net.

THE OLD GARDENS OF ITALY AND HOW TO VISIT THEM

By Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND. With 100 Illustrations from her own Photographs. 5s. net.

GATES OF THE DOLOMITES

By L. MARION DAVIDSON. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. 5s. net.

POETRY AND DRAMA.

DRAKE: THE TEXT OF THE NEW PLAY AT HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

A Pageant Play. By LOUIS N. PARKER. Illustrated. Cloth, 2s. net, paper, 1s. net.

THE POEMS OF ROSAMUND MARRIOTT WATSON

With a Portrait in Photogravure. 5s. net.

THE VOICE OF THE GARDEN

Chosen and Edited by LUCY L. CABLE BIKLE 3s. 6d. net.

NEW FICTION

THE JOYOUS ADVENTURES OF ARISTIDE PUJOL. 6s. ...
With 32 Illustrations by Alec Ball. (3rd Large Impression)

HOFFMAN'S CHANCE. 6s. ...

THE UNBEARABLE BASSINGTON. 6s. ...

THE LOVE DREAM. 6s. ...

THE ILLUSIONS OF MR. AND MRS. BRESSINGHAM. 6s. ...

THE BOUNTIFUL HOUR. 6s. ...

JOCASTA AND THE FAMISHED CAT. 6s. ...

SUNSHINE SKETCHES OF A LITTLE TOWN. 3s. 6d. net. ...

CLARA. 6s. ...

THE NEW HUMPTY DUMPTY. 6s. ...

GRIT LAWLESS. 6s. ...

AN AMERICAN GIRL AT THE DURBAR. 6s. ...

AT THE SIGN OF THE REINE PEDAUQUE. 6s. ...

ALSO AND PERHAPS. 6s. ...

ELIZABETH IN RETREAT. 6s. ...

ELSIE LINDTNER. 3s. 6d. net ...

THE LAST RESORT. 6s. ...

BEGGARS AND SORNERS. 6s. ...

THE TOMBOY AND OTHERS. 3s. 6d. net ...

... By W. J. Locke

By William Caine

By H. H. Munro (Saki)

By George Vane

By Gerard Bendall

By Marion Fox

By Anatole France

By Stephen Leacock

By A. Neil Lyons

By Daniel Chaucer

By F. E. Mills Young

By Shelland Bradley

By Anatole France

By Sir Frank Swettenham

By Margaret Westrup

By Karin Michaelis

By H. F. Prevost Batterby

By Allan McAulay

By H. B. Marriott Watson

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON & NEW YORK.

HERBERT & DANIEL'S

Christmas List of Choice

ILLUSTRATED GIFT BOOKS

A Book by Children for Children

OUR NURSERY RHYME BOOK

Edited by LETTY and FRANK LITTLEWOOD, with a Preface by S. R. LITTLEWOOD, and Twelve Coloured Illustrations by HONOR C. APPLETON. 5s. net.

SONGS OF INNOCENCE By WILLIAM BLAKE

With a Preface by THOMAS SECCOMBE, and Twelve Coloured Illustrations by HONOR C. APPLETON. Small 4to, 5s. net. POPULAR EDITION, 3s. 6d. net.

FAIRY TALES By CHARLES PERRAULT

Newly translated by S. R. LITTLEWOOD, with Twelve Coloured Illustrations by HONOR C. APPLETON. 5s. net.

WIVES AND DAUGHTERS By Mrs. GASKELL

With a Preface by THOMAS SECCOMBE, and Eight Coloured and Sixty Black and White Illustrations by M. V. WHEELHOUSE. 5s. net.

The STORY of SAINT ELIZABETH of HUNGARY

By WILLIAM CANTON, Author of "A Child's Book of Saints." With Eight Coloured Illustrations by ELEANOR FORTESCUE BRICKDALE. 6s. net. A limited Edition de Luxe is also issued: Price on application.

THE STORY OF SANTA CLAUS

By S. R. LITTLEWOOD. With Coloured Illustrations by SIDNEY FILMORE and GERALD LEAKE. 1s. 6d. net.

THE STORY OF PIERROT

By S. R. LITTLEWOOD. With Black and White Illustrations and Cover Design by SIDNEY FILMORE. 1s. net.

DANCING: Ancient and Modern

Charmingly Illustrated. By ETHEL L. URLIN. 3s. 6d. net.

AN ARTIST IN CORFU

Written and Pictured by SOPHIE ATKINSON. 18s. net.

BRITTANY AND THE BRETONS

Written and Pictured by GEORGE WHARTON EDWARDS. 18s. net.

PERSIAN LITERATURE. 3s. 6d. net. By CLAUD FIELD. Illustrated.

ITALIAN LITERATURE. 3s. 6d. net. By MARIE-LOUISE EGERTON CASTLE. Illustrated.

MUSIC IN POETRY AND PROSE. By ADA M. INGPEN.

THE CHARM OF INDIA. By CLAUD FIELD.

FOR HER NAMESAKE. An Anthology of Poetical Addresses by Devout Lovers to Gentle Maidens. Edited by STEPHEN LANGTON.

NEW VOLUMES OF THE REGENT LIBRARY

Small Crown 8vo, Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; Leather, 3s. 6d. net.

CHARLES DICKENS. By W. H. HELM.

JANE AUSTEN. By LADY MARGARET SACKVILLE.

SHELLEY. By ROGER INGPEN.

GEORGE ELIOT. By VIOLA MEYNELL.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH. By PADRAIC COLUM.

WARDS OF THE STATE

A Study of the Prison Life. By TIGHE HOPKINS. 10s. 6d. net.

A HANDBOOK OF RELIGIOUS ORDERS

By the RIGHT REV. ABBOT GASQUET and DOM NORBERT BIRT, O.S.B. 7s. 6d. net.

LACORDAIRE

By the COMTE D'HAUSSONVILLE, of the French Academy. Translated by A. W. EVANS. Several Portraits. 3s. 6d. net.

EVOLUTION IN THE PAST

By HENRY R. KNIPE. With Fifty Illustrations by ALICE B. WOODWARD and Six Landscapes by ERNEST BUCKNALL. 12s. 6d. net.

ITALY'S WAR FOR A DESERT

Being some Experiences of a War Correspondent with the Italians in Tripoli. By FRANCIS McCULLAGH. Fully Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

Please write for Complete Catalogue to 95, NEW BOND ST., LONDON, W.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS SUPPLEMENT
ART, POETRY AND BELLES LETTRES

B

B

B

B

B

B

From "Parsifal " (Harp).
Illustrated by Willy Pogány.

"BUT POWERS MORE STRONG THAN WE ARE HAVE UNFURLED THE FLAG THAT THOU MUST FOLLOW THROUGH THE WORLD."

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

ART AND ARCHITECTURE.

It is little or no use arguing on questions of taste. Some of us are in the way of affecting an appreciation of what is admittedly great in art and literature, simply because we have not the courage to acknowledge that it does not books, I am not so keen to criticise and find fault with Cruikshank, say, because he did not rival Rembrandt, or with Tom Moore because he was a lesser poet than Milton, as I am to enjoy myself. Therefore, when I sit down with a stack of new illustrated volumes on the table before me, I do not open them with any intention of showing how clever I am by belauding this artist or belittling that, but in a comfortable, catholic frame of mind, prepared to be interested in whatever is interesting and to be pleased with whatever is beautiful, no matter what form it may take. The Venus de Medici is more beautiful, touches a higher perfection of art than Peter Pan in Kensington Gardens, but Peter Pan is very beautiful sculpture nevertheless.

I shall start then, with "The Uffizi Gallery,"¹ because I can enjoy all the pictures in it, and praise them freely without risk of bringing my artistic taste into disrepute. Here we have a collection of old masters whose work the suffrages of many generations have justly stamped with their approval. There are other and less known paintings in the famous Italian gallery that Mr. P. G. Konody and Mr. T. Leman Hare have not included in their book, and of these I shall say nothing—partly because that is nearly as much as I know of many of them—but the fifty they have reproduced are beyond criticism. They include some of the finest work of Sandro Botticelli, Fra Angelico, Andrea del Castagno, Fra Filippo Lippi, Domenico Ghirlandaio, Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael, Michaelangelo, Andrea del Sarto, Carpaccio, Giovanni Bellini, Giorgione, Titian, Tintoretto, Rubens, Albrecht Dürer, the younger Hans Holbein, and many another of those greatest of great painters who were neither for any one age nor any one country, but for all time and for all the world. The pictures are most admirably reproduced in colour, and Mr. P. G. Konody writes of them and of their painters ably and with fulness of knowledge. He traces skilfully and very interestingly the rise and passing of the various potent schools of painting from the earliest evolutionary stages of Italian art down to the younger years of last century. The attractive and sumptuous appearance of the book is in every way worthy of its contents.

In "The Van Eycks and Their Art,"² Mr. W. James Weale, with the co-operation of Mr. Maurice W. Brockwell, gives a sufficient biography of Hubert and John Van

¹ "The Uffizi Gallery." By P. G. Konody. Edited by T. Leman Hare. With 50 Plates in Colour. 21s. net. (T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

² "The Van Eycks and their Art." By W. H. James Weale; with the Co-operation of Maurice W. Brockwell. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)

From Ballads Weird and Wonderful (Lane).

TAMLANE.

appeal to us. We may dispute boldly enough as to whether the work of this old master is or is not greater than the work of that, but if we really thought the books or paintings of one or other of them were inferior to what had been done by some quite new and practically unrecognised genius, we should be too discreet to say so out loud.

* Well, I don't think I am a critic of that sort—none of us do. But then I am never much disposed to draw comparisons. When I go through a gallery, or a parcel of Eyck, and biographical notes concerning other members of their family. They reproduce in black and white and deal in detail with twenty-four authentic paintings by the Van Eycks, and furnish in an appendix a list of four hundred other of their pictures; there is an exhaustive catalogue raisonné, and concise chapters on their last paintings, their drawings, and a chapter on those characteristics of their work that enable one to decide on their authenticity and date. It is a well-arranged, carefully written book, and one that students will find invaluable.

Two very adequate and pleasantly written handbooks to the Louvre¹ and our own National Gallery,² have been written by E. E. Richards and J. E. Crawford Fitch, in Mr. Grant Richards' daintily produced "National Treasure" series. They tell how these two great collections came to be formed, and give ample accounts of the paintings, sculpture, antique pottery, and miscellaneous artistic treasure that is enshrined in them; each being illustrated with thirty-one beautiful reproductions of representative work. From Mr. Grant Richards, too, comes a handsome volume of "The Engravings of William Blake,"³ with a critical study and a catalogue raisonné by Archibald G. B. Russell. It is as easy to run into extravagance in praising Blake as in depreciating him. To me it has always seemed that the thought, the symbolism, the rich imaginative suggestiveness of most of his paintings and engravings are finer, more majestic than the pictures themselves. He seldom drew a really beautiful face, though he drew many that were impressive and full of pathos or cloudy grandeur. His angels are too solid; too sinewy and muscular; his old men are too often hairily grotesque when he means them to be clothed in majesty and terror. Again and again you are charmed and thrilled by the exquisite grace and sweeping freedom of his lines, to be badly shocked by the crudely-drawn features or strained, wooden, impossible attitude of some central figure in his design. The masculine figure, the eagerness and alert, vigorous life of it, in "Glad Day"

¹ "The Louvre." By E. E. Richards. Illustrated. 2s. net. (Grant Richards.)

² "The National Gallery." By J. E. Crawford Fitch. Illustrated. 2s. net. (Grant Richards.)

³ "The Engravings of William Blake." By Archibald G. B. Russell. Illustrated. 25s. net. (Grant Richards.)

is all a wonder and a glory, and there is the right ecstasy shining in the eyes, but the simpering mouth and clumsy nose hurt you where all else is so fine. But it is no use saying such things—Blake's work is far too great for the flaws in it to leave it other than splendid. Turn over these leaves and marvel at the dreadful energy and might

From Ballads Weird and Wonderful
(Lane).

HUGH OF LINCOLN.

expressed in his engraving of "Death! Great Proprietor of All!"—a grim, monstrous creature ruthlessly trampling a crowned king under his feet, flourishing a great dart in one hand, and with the other tearing the sun down out of the heavens. There is something of strange, quaint beauty in "When the Morning Stars Sang Together," though the scheme is too bizarre; it is too literal in its interpretation; in a sense it is too simple, but in a higher and deeper sense it is not simple, not spiritual enough. Nevertheless, you turn back to it, curiously fascinated, touched and pleased with the grace and abandon of those singing stars in human shape; the noble-featured, ineffably ancient god dominating the centre of the picture, the day and the night riding forth to left and right of him, his foot planted on a too tightly curled substantial cloud that forms an arch from under which a group of mortals kneel, gazing up in worship. But I still think Blake's finest engraving—the simplest in idea and yet one of the most profoundly significant—is the "Death's Door," and it says much for the soundness of the often despised public taste that it is also the most popular. That, also, is one of the thirty-two excellent examples of Blake's prints with which this book is illustrated. Mr. Russell has written a good and concise biography, and pays just and discriminating tribute to the genius of "the only great master of original engraving whom England has produced." This is a book of unique interest, and will be regarded as the standard work for collectors.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

Puvis de Chavannes,¹ the subject of M. André Michel's monograph in Mr. Heinemann's "French Artists of To-day" series, died only some fourteen years ago, and is beginning to win that due recognition in our country which has long been accorded to him in his own. He was an idealist; he was uninfluenced by the teachings of the realists and the impressionists and, working in the classical tradition, conjured on to his canvases those "luminously lovely visions that restored French art to the empire of idealism." M. Michel's biographical and critical study of this great latter-day painter is enriched with forty-eight engravings of his pictures.

Art—it may not be necessary to say this, but there is no actual necessity for leaving it unsaid—art fulfils itself in many ways: in the building of a church or a house, no less than in the painting or drawing of a picture; in making furniture, glass, pottery, arms and armour, no less than in carving a statue, and among the books that still wait on my table are some containing manifestations of art in all these divers kinds. Here are four containing paintings by four distinguished living artists, and I take "Parsifal"¹ first because it chances to be uppermost. This is the glorious story of the Holy Grail not modelled on the Wagner opera, but retold from ancient sources by T. W. Rolleston, and illustrated in colour and in black and white by Willy Pogány. The text is printed on a soft grey paper, and a series of delicately-wrought decorative designs beautify each printed page. In the illustrations I think I am almost as much taken with Mr. Pogány's remarkable black and white effects as with his gracious and exquisitely finished colour harmonies. The book is, as Mr. Rolleston suggests in his preface, "an artistic whole"—his scholarly, sensuous, jewelled verses and Mr. Pogány's brilliantly imaginative drawings and paintings are the complement of each other, and between them they present the matchless old legend of "Parsifal" worthily, as a thing of splendour and haunting sadness, fashioned out of mortal clay and the divine stuff of dreams:

¹ "Puvis de Chavannes." By André Michel. Notes by J. Laran. Illustrated. 3s. 6d net. (Heinemann.)

From The Louvre LOUISE BRONGNIART (P), BY HOUDON.
(Grant Richards). Photo., Giraudou.

"The human tale of sin and woe,
Of strife and victory, that long ago
Was rhymed and written of the Cup and Spear
By many a golden pen."

What a contrast between this work in "Parsifal" and this in "She Stoops to Conquer,"² and the very sharpness

¹ "Parsifal." By T. W. Rolleston. Presented by Willy Pogány. 15s. net. (Harrap.)

² "She Stoops to Conquer." Illustrated by Hugh Thomson. 15s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

THE BOOKMAN
CHRISTMAS 1912

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Mediaeval Figure-Sculpture in England.

(Cambridge University Press).

EXETER, WEST FRONT. THE STATUES OF THE UPPER TIER. "JOHN," "JAMES," AND "SIMON," c. 1380.

of the contrast helps you to a keener appreciation of the widely differing merits of both. It is with "Parsifal" as somebody said it was with "Paradise Lost"—you almost want to sit and listen to a solemn organ music before you turn to the reading of it. But you need no such preparation for Goldsmith's jolly comedy "She Stoops to Conquer." You have only to say his name to yourself, and look at the first of Hugh Thomson's colour drawings in this charming edition of the play to be in tune with its humour—and what a buoyant, happy humour it is, and how mellow and rich it is with its old-world modes and manners, and who but Hugh Thomson could so nicely, so easily and naturally have caught the whole spirit of eighteenth-century gaiety as it breathes through Goldsmith's lines and shadowed it forth in the faces, dresses, figures, attitudes of the men and women, and the quaint furnishings of the pleasant rooms he has painted into his pictures. His jovial Tony Lumpkin, his gracious, dignified Hardcastle, his portly, complacent Mrs. Hardcastle, and his delightfully pretty damsels and servant wenches—these are the very characters that Goldsmith drew, rising out of his written words in the very shape and colour of life itself.

The popularity of Kingsley's "Heroes"¹ seems to be perennial—those stories of the old Greek fairy tales that he wrote for the entertainment of his own three children are revived in some new form or other as sure as each Christmas comes round, and this Christmas they come to us in a sumptuous new edition enriched with colour plates after drawings by W. Russell Flint, that in style and tone are sensitively in harmony with the glamorous old classical tales that they illustrate.

A comparatively new-comer into the world of Christmas books is Edgar Allan Poe.² Scarcely any writer is more difficult to illustrate; I can recall several illustrated English editions of his poems, but not one that has been illustrated adequately until now. His eerie, weird, grisly, terrible

¹ "The Heroes." By Charles Kingsley. Illustrated by W. Russell Flint. £2 12s. 6d. net. Limp vellum, £3 3s. net. (Lee Warner.)

² "The Bells and other Poems." By Edgar Allan Poe. Illustrated by Edmund Dulac. 15s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

imaginings are such, vast, evasive, scarcely - realisable things of the mind that to give them definite expression with brush or pencil has seemed well-nigh beyond the capacity of the artist. Those impalpable, dreadful, ghoulish souls that haunt the steeple and the echoing air of "The Bells"; all the dark, dream-peopled immensity that lies behind the sombre musings of the poet in "The Raven"; the nameless horrors of "The Haunted Palace"; the unearthly twilight of "Ulalume"; the tragic gruesome-ness of

"The Conqueror Worm"—the bodying of such things pictorially calls for almost as vivid and burning an imagination in the artist as their creator himself had. It is high praise to say that Edmund Dulac has pictured these visionary creations, these marvellous allegories and unrealities, with a skill and vigour and imaginative daring that no artist who has preceded him in this difficult enterprise has ever surpassed. And he has been as successful with the quiet, marmoreal beauty of such lyrics as "To Helen," the elusive loveliness of "Fairy-Land," the Oriental splendour and passion of "Tamerlane."

From Mediaeval Figure-Sculpture in England. IPSWICH, ST. MATTHEW'S CHURCH, c. 1480.

(Cambridge University Press).

I have no more colour-books. Next in my bundle comes a book of a very different order—the "Antiques and Curios in Our Homes"¹ of Grace M. Vallois, which offers some delightful illustrations of old furniture, old china, pottery and glass, and antique silver, with a lucidly and pleasantly written account of all such "nice old things," as the author calls them, which should prove of the greatest service to the amateur collector in particular. A larger, stately tome, as befits its theme, is "The Armourer and His Craft," by Charles Ffoulkes,² with its perfect reproduction of Brueghel and Van Balen's "Venus at the Forge of Vulcan" by way of frontispiece, its thirty-one other plates illustrating varieties of armour worn in various ages and countries; and numerous smaller diagrams and sketches in the text. This is a learned and curiously interesting book dealing exhaustively with the making and the use of armour, supplemented with a glossary of words, a list of armourers, and with what is not the least interesting section of it, a series of short biographies of notable armourers.

¹ "Antiques and Curios in our Homes" By Grace M. Vallois. Illustrated 6s net (Werner Laurie.)

² "The Armourer and his Craft" By Charles Ffoulkes. Illustrated. £2 2s. net. (Methuen.)

From Mediaeval Figure-Sculpture in England
(Cambridge University Press).

WESTMINSTER. HENRY VII.'S CHAPEL,
c. 1510. THE CONFESSOR. ST. PETER.
ST. EDMUND.

From Mediaeval Figure-Sculpture in England
(Cambridge University Press)

WALSOKEN (NORFOLK).
FONT OF 1544.

Ruskin said there were only two fine arts possible to men, and they were painting and sculpture, and that architecture was merely the association of these arts in noble masses or the placing them in fit places, and perhaps Canterbury Cathedral offers, as Mr. Woodruff and Canon Danks suggest in their "Memorials of Canterbury Cathedral,"³ the finest and fullest illustration of the evolution and development of Gothic architecture in this country, and the completest illustration, too, of what Ruskin meant when he said that the twin arts of sculpture and painting were blended in architectural design. The authors of this book have set themselves to supply "a trustworthy, readable and compendious account of the Cathedral from the earliest time to the present day," and they have carried out their intention carefully, completely and with marked ability. The numerous plans and sketches add appreciably to the attractiveness and the value of their work. In "Byzantine Churches in Constantinople,"⁴ Mr. Alexander Van Millingen traces the history of a very different type of architecture—the Byzantine—as it may be found in such churches of that kind in Stamboul as survive in whole or in part from the fifth century. Comparatively few now remain of the many churches of that type which once filled the city, but these—some twenty or so in all—are dealt with most exhaustively in detail, care being taken to distinguish the original parts of each building from any alteration made in Byzantine days or since the Turkish conquest. Mr. Millingen makes it abundantly clear that there is no foundation for the general idea that Byzantine ecclesiastical art is a stereotyped, lifeless type, and has been able to furnish a great deal of valuable new information concerning both the architecture and the history of these ancient churches.

³ "Memorials of Canterbury Cathedral." By C. Eveleigh Woodruff and William Danks. Illustrated. 16s. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

⁴ "Byzantine Churches in Constantinople." By Alexander Van Millingen. Illustrated. 31s. 6d. net. (Macmillan.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

To the student of architecture and to the general reader we can strongly recommend Mr. Reginald Blomfield's "Architectural Drawing and Draughtsmanship"¹—it studies the evolution of architectural drawing through the work of the master draughtsmen from mediæval times to the present day, including in its survey the greatest draughtsmen of France and Italy as well as of England. It is copiously illustrated and written in an agreeable, non-technical fashion that makes it readily intelligible to the veriest beginner.

A.

From Mediæval Art
(Duckworth).

CHARTRES CATHEDRAL. SCULPTURES OF THE WESTERN DOORS.

"The Four Gardens"³ consists of four fond and graceful prose studies, where nothing is said or done out of harmony with the verse from Jean Ingelow which is prefixed to "The Old-fashioned Garden":

"A brave old house!
a garden full of bees,
Large dropping poppies, and queen hollyhocks,
With butterflies for crown—tree
peonies,
And pinks and goldlocks."

The gardens are peopled with flowers, children, a millionaire, a Scotch gardener and a most gentle ghost, and others; for one garden is haunted, another old-fashioned, the third a poor man's, the fourth a rich man's. Mr. Charles Robinson's coloured pictures and line drawings are as pretty and dainty as possible, and always appropriate.

Blake's "Songs of Innocence"⁴ is now almost as constant at Christmas as rain and fog, but until now it has not been illustrated by Mr. Charles Robinson. His collaboration with Miss Mary A. Robinson has made a very suitable Christmas book.

The illustrations are suggested by "On a Cloud I saw a Child," "Little Lamb," "The birds are silent in their nest and I must seek for mine," "That an emmet lost its way," "The Lily White," and "Tiger, tiger." The last is a charming evasion of difficulty; for the tiger is in a picture book which a child has opened in an old garden by a sundial.

Matthew Arnold's "Scholar Gypsy and Thyrsis"⁵ have been illustrated before now, and Mr. Russell Flint's ten coloured pictures

³ "The Four Gardens." By Handyside. Illustrated by Charles Robinson. 6s. net. (Heinemann.)

⁴ "Songs of Innocence." Illustrated by Charles Robinson and Mary A. Robinson. 3s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

⁵ "The Scholar Gypsy and Thyrsis." Illustrated by W. Russell Flint. 3s. 6d. net. (Lee Warner.)

POETRY AND BELLES LETTRES.

"Francis Thompson, the Preston-born Poet"² is by another Prestonian, but not a relative. The brief outline of Thompson's life contains a few slight additions to what is generally known about the poet, especially with regard to the house where he was born:—a photograph of this is among the illustrations. There follow a number of enthusiastic appreciations abundantly fortified by extracts from all sorts and conditions of celebrities. Other enthusiasts who wish to have everything that has been written about Thompson should possess the volume. Everyone will be glad to see the portraits of Thompson at the age of fifteen and thirty-four.

¹ "Architectural Drawing and Draughtsmanship." By Reginald Blomfield. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net. (Cassell.)

² "Francis Thompson." By John Thomson. 2s. 6d. net (Preston: Alfred Halewood.)

From Leopards of England and other Essays on Heraldry
(Constable).

THE KING'S DRAGON AND THE QUEEN'S PANTHER.

appeared in 1910 in a large quarto edition. They are now reduced so that the book fits the pocket of the pilgrim to Childsworth Farm, Bablock-hithe, Godstone Bridge, and Cumnor Hurst. He may also compare notes with Mr. Flint as to his vision of the "shy traffickers, the dark Iberians," the "grave Tyrian trader," the "groups under the dreaming garden-trees," and Demeter who "herself had trod Sicilian fields." As end-papers Mr. E. H. New has contributed picturesque maps of a piece of the Oxford country, about nine miles by eight, but marking, with appropriate lack of proportion, Childsworth (or Chilswell) Farm and "The Tree." It is difficult to imagine that these two poems could be given a form more suitable for a gift book.

It will be a long time before Browning's "Pied Piper of Hamelin"¹ has exhausted the imagination and invention of illustrators. The lover of rats, the lover of children, above all the lover of pipers, each has his chance, and the man who best combines in his vast comprehension all three loves will be the best accompanist to Browning. In the meantime it is no little thing to have one love and to be inspired by it. Miss Margaret W. Tarrant probably prefers rats. At the same time she has most loyally attended various moods of the Piper, and has watched children running out of school. Her illustration to "Licked the soup from the cook's own ladles" ought to hang in the state apartments of the King of the Rats.

Miss Glazier's "Field-Flowers' Lore"² is an attempt to tell again, in verse and in pictures,

¹ "The Pied Piper of Hamelin." Illustrated by Margaret W. Tarrant. 2s. 6d. net. (Dent.)

² "The Field-Flowers' Lore." Legends re-written and illustrated with wood cuts by Louise M. Glazier. 1s. 6d. net. (Mathews.)

From Medieval Art
(Duckworth).

CHARTRES CATHEDRAL. JAMBS OF THE LEFT-HAND AND CENTRAL DOORS OF SOUTH PORCH, ST. GEORGE, ETC.

cubs and "the neolithic loves in a neolithic June." His verses are neat, light, never pointless, always stingless.

"Songs from the Forests of Tane"³ is a little book containing a dozen pages of verse relating to personal emotions and New Zealand, together with a portrait of a handsome Maori, Mr. Chamberlin Chamberlin's adopted son, who has translated one of the poems into his own tongue. The poems express with some grace and simplicity the love of man and nature.

Mr. Walter Phelps Dodge's "King Charles I.: a Study"⁴ has evidently been a labour of love. He is a happy victim to the charm of that "world of romance, of loyalty, of ³ "Green Days and Blue Days." By Patrick R. Chalmers. 3s. 6d. net. (Maunsel & Co.).

⁴ "Songs from the Forests of Tane." By J. Chamberlin Chamberlin. 2s. 6d. net. (Mathews.)

⁵ "King Charles I.: A Study." By Walter Phelps Dodge. 1s. 6d. net. (Long).

From Leopards of England and other Essays on Heraldry
(Constable).

THE KING'S LEOPARD AND
THE QUEEN'S UNICORN.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

faithfulness unto death" which "belongs to those words 'The Stuarts.'" By his enthusiasm he hopes to counterbalance "the average historian" who "is accurate but uninteresting." The result is a small but tender monument of loyalty to "the most tragic king in history," illustrated by the portrait in Middle Temple Hall.

It is now seventeen years since Ernest Dowson's "Dilemmas"¹ was first and last published. These short stories are interesting in themselves, and also from their connection with Dowson and with his epoch. No one who studies that distinct and not very fertile period can ignore them. They bear witness to the writer's tastes in literature and life, and to his theory of style. They are of course experiments, but the experiments of a man like Dowson are not to be neglected; and they are but five.

E. T.

COUNTY CHURCHES: SUFFOLK.

By T. HUGH BRYANT. In 2 Vols. With 42 Illustrations. 2s. 6d. net each vol. (Allen.)

For architectural interest and beauty of design, the churches of Suffolk are probably only equalled by those of the neighbouring county of Norfolk, and the inclusion of Suffolk in the County Churches series was inevitable. Mr. Bryant, who has made excellent use of his opportunities both from an artistic and an historical point of view, is a painstaking and accurate worker, with a full sense of the value of brevity, for into two small volumes he has compressed brief accounts of every church in the county. The little books are well illustrated and form a pleasant addition to the series in which they are included.

MEDIAEVAL ART: FROM THE PEACE OF THE CHURCH TO THE EVE OF THE RENAISSANCE, 312 to 1350.

By W. R. LETHABY. With 68 Plates and 124 Text Illustrations. 5s. net. (Duckworth.)

We have little doubt that the reading public will welcome a new and cheaper edition of Mr. Lethaby's authoritative work on Mediaeval Architecture. Having originally appeared in 1904 the book has now attained the dignity of a third edition, revised and corrected. The art of the period treated by Mr. Lethaby is principally, if not entirely, architectural and sculptural, and the volume contains a very large number of excellent photographs and line drawings of interest to the student of the history of art. It is a wonderful book at the price.

¹ "Dilemmas." By Ernest Dowson. 2s. 6d. net. (Mathews.)

BALLADS, WEIRD AND WONDERFUL.

With 25 Drawings by Vernon Hill. 21s. net. (Lane.)

Mr. Vernon Hill has already made a big reputation for his extraordinary art by the publication of his illustrations to "The Arcadian Calendar" and "The New Inferno," but we believe it will be admitted that he has never done better or more effective work than in "Ballads, Weird and Wonderful." Here, of course, we have a subject which the artist has made peculiarly his own, and the supernatural, even the monstrous, in the ballads unquestionably inspires Mr. Hill to some of his most remarkable imaginative efforts. In the course of a short note it is quite impossible adequately to appreciate these illustrations, but we believe we have said enough to warn the ordinary book-collector that in "Ballads, Weird and Wonderful" he may expect no prettinesses or sentiment. Whether or not he will care for the drawings depends upon his own personal predilections. For ourselves, we admire them very much indeed.

THE CATHEDRALS AND CHURCHES OF ROME AND SOUTHERN ITALY

By T. FRANCIS BUMPUS. 16s. net. (Werner Laurie.)

Mr. Francis Bumpus has already, in other volumes of this "Cathedral Series," shown us the great churches of Northern and Central Italy, England and Wales, Northern Germany, Scandinavia, and Northern France; and now, with his ripe experience, he takes us to Rome itself, and thence to Naples, Capua, and other cities less known to British pilgrims. A pleasant and trustworthy guide is Mr. Francis Bumpus. No one seeking the Eternal City for the first time could have a better. Nay, though many visits have been paid, we should still welcome appreciatively the information of our author, and be tolerably certain that he

From The Armourer and his Craft

(Methuen).

ARMOUR OF SIGISMUND OF
TIROL, 1427-28.

Waffensammlung, Vienna, No. 41.

could tell us something that would increase our enduring joy when we wander and worship in St. Peter's and its neighbouring Christian temples. For those whom fortune denies entrance to Italy this really beautiful book, it may well be, will be even more acceptable. Possessing it, these glorious churches are open to us, and the photographs (forty-two in number) reveal to our eyes the wonders discoursed of by travellers. All lovers of Europe's most sacred buildings are under lasting obligation to Mr. Francis Bumpus for his conscientious work.

SHAKESPEARE'S ENGLISH KINGS.

By THOMAS CARTER. 5s
net. (Harrap.)

As the author says in the preface to this volume, it is inevitable, in any attempt to retell Shakespeare to the children, not to recall the names of Charles and Mary Lamb. "These gifted authors," he says, "are associated immortally with Shakespeare, and their 'Tales' must remain a classic for youthful readers, to whom a simple prose rendering is of great value as an introduction to the genius of our greatest poet." Since, however, the Lambs did not retell the story of Shakespeare's historical plays, the present volume should be very welcome as fulfilling, to use the familiar phrase, a "much felt need." It should be especially welcome in that the author does not obtrude his own personality, but allows the poet, wherever his verse is simple enough to be appreciated by children, to speak for himself. Indeed, the author's work is in the nature of connecting notes between the many passages quoted direct from the plays; and by this means the youthful reader has prepared for him a very attractive mixture of history and poetry. The author's style is not always quite so simple as might be desired; he is unfailingly picturesque and has a vivid narrative gift, but is sometimes fond of the long word where the short would suffice. Nevertheless, an intelligent child should not find it beyond him, while a child of any age or intelligence will revel in the many admirable coloured pictures by Gertrude Harrison, with which this very handsome volume is embellished.

METALWORK AND ENAMELLING.

By HERBERT MARYON. With 333 Line Drawings by Cyril Pearce, and other Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net. (Chapman & Hall.)
Mr. Maryon's aim has been to produce a practical work, rather a piece of artistic or historical criticism. With this end in view, "I have taken," he says, "a different course from that followed by many writers on the subject, in that, instead of describing the making of a brooch, a cup or a casket, I have so planned the book that soldering, raising, stone-setting, enamelling and the other branches of the work are treated in separate chapters. I have tried to describe as simply and definitely as possible each process. . . ." The book appears to us to be very simply and efficiently written, and it seems likely to prove an extremely useful handbook and introduction to its subject.

SHERATON AND CHIPPENDALE.

Little Books about Furniture. Vol III. Chippendale and His School. By J. P. BLAKE. — Vol. IV. The Sheraton Period. By A. E. REVEIRS HOPKINS. 2s 6d. net each. (Heinemann.)

These two little volumes are admirable in their scope and their manner; they are excellent both for what they tell and what they omit. As an introduction to a fuller study of the eighteenth century furniture they could hardly be improved. Most people nowadays like to potter about with an eye for a possible bargain in the way of a chair, a settee, an old four-poster, but most of these most people really know very little about these things. They are easily persuaded or else over-suspicious simply for want of knowing. But these little books will tell such folk enough to make them intelligent and usefully discriminating. Each is illustrated with a great many plates giving typical or supreme examples of pieces of every kind. One very pleasant thing about both books is that they are written in a very easy style, and full of details that help one to understand the life of the time, and are not merely catalogue information about tables and chairs. They are meant chiefly for the amateur collector, rather than for the very wealthy person who buys regardless, and we can recommend them cordially. It is a small thing, but why does the name Reveirs Hopkins appear spelled differently on the title page and as signature to the preface of the Sheraton volume?

From The Armourer and his Craft (Methuen).

ARMOUR OF KURFÜRST MORITZ.
By Matthäus Frauenpreis, 1548. Königl.
Hist. Museum, Dresden, G. 39.

OAK CHAIR,
with sunk seat for squab cushion turned uprights and legs and curious back, showing transition from lath back to splat back.
From Chats on Cottage and Farmhouse Furniture
(Unwin).

authority on collecting,
and he has already put his special knowledge to effective use in a number of volumes for
Mr. Fisher Unwin's
"Chats" series. So far as the generality of collectors is concerned, old cottage and farmhouse furniture is the most accessible to a narrow purse. It seems to us perfectly clear that what the author does not know about it is not worth knowing.
But he possesses also

CHATS ON COTTAGE AND FARMHOUSE FURNITURE.

By ARTHUR HAYDEN. With a Chapter on Old English
Chintzes. By HUGH PHIL-LIPS. With 73 Plates. 5s.
net. (Unwin.)

Mr. Arthur Hayden is an

A HISTORY OF PAINTING IN NORTH ITALY.

By J. A. CROWE and
G. B. CAVALCASELLE.
Edited by Tancred Borenius, Ph.D. 3 Vols.
Illustrated. £3 3s. net.
(John Murray.)

All art students will

From Chats on Cottage and Farmhouse Furniture
(Unwin).

SIDEBOARD OF CARVED OAK.
English. Seventeenth century. (In the Victoria and Albert Museum.)

OAK CHAIR,
with cresting rail of Charles II. period, retained and perforated arch centre peculiar to walnut designs.
From Chats on Cottage and Farmhouse Furniture

be grateful to Mr. Borenius for the careful and scholarly work he has done in editing and reissuing this invaluable survey by Crowe and Caval-caselle that has long since taken its abiding place among the classics of art history. It is a most careful and exhaustive record of the achievements of the great artists of Northern Italy from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century, and though later research and discovery have, as the editor remarks, necessitated a revision of the authors' conclusions, "it is remarkable in how many instances their instinctive rightness of

From Chats on Cottage and Farmhouse Furniture
(Unwin).

WINDSOR CHAIR,
horseshoe back, saddle seat, turned legs, with stretcher
Sheraton style.

the faculty of embodying his hints in pleasant readable English, with the result that his work is of unusual interest and value.
An unusual topic has been dealt with by Mr. Hugh Phillips in his chapter on Old English Chintzes. The volume is made the more attractive by its numerous illustrations,
and it is in every way a worthy addition to a popular series.

judgment has been fully confirmed. Mr.
Borenius has added all newly discovered facts, but otherwise, except for the correction of misprints and obvious blunders, has reprinted here verbatim the text and notes of the original edition. The seventy-five engravings are beautifully reproduced. This is an admirable edition of an important work that is never likely to be superseded.

From Chats on Cottage and Farmhouse Furniture
(Unwin).

AN ACCOUNT OF MEDIÆVAL FIGURE- SCULPTURE IN ENGLAND.

By EDWARD S. PRIOR and ARTHUR GARDNER.
Illustrated with 855
Photographs. £3 3s.
net. (Cambridge University Press)

In this large and splendidly produced volume Mr. Edward Prior and Mr. Arthur Gardner discuss the successional development of figure-sculpture and the part it played in mediæval architecture. They treat learnedly and exhaustively of the materials in which such sculpture was worked, and the aspects under which we see it to-day—deteriorated under excellent photographs of architectural statuary, relief sculptures, monumental effigies, figure-sculpture in capitals, gargoyles and arch moulds, and on fonts and tomb-chests in and about our ancient cathedrals and churches. It is a book of great interest and value, pre-eminently a work for students, and one that no student of mediæval architecture can afford to overlook.

THE THOUGHT IN MUSIC.

By JOHN B. McEWEN.
M.A. 3s. 6d. net
(Macmillan & Co.)

"This book," says Professor McEwen in his first sentence, "is an

OLD GERMAN "STEIN."
From The ABC of Collecting
Old Continental Pottery
(Stanley Paul).

OLD GERMAN "STEIN."
From The ABC of Collecting
Old Continental Pottery
(Stanley Paul).

From The ABC of Collecting Old
Continental Pottery
(Stanley Paul).

OLD BEER MUG.

the vicissitudes to which that material has been exposed, they give a careful and very adequate account of the subjects of Gothic sculpture, and devote one section of their book to a suggestive and interesting study of the personality of the Gothic sculptor. They find that in the main the mediæval sculpture of England was contemporaneous with Gothic architecture in England, and that the various expressions and phases of it were intimately associated in England with the circumstances that created the successive manners of Gothic building; that the same classifications will usually cover both arts. As the building art grew dexterous and supple in the first half of the thirteenth century, so the sculptor's art too grew fine and sensitive, "it mastered its means of expression, and what up to 1200 had been of the nature of a block-carving, more symbolic than natural, is seen at Wells and Westminster by the middle of that century as the finished modelling of an assured faculty." These changes and the beautiful development of the art are demonstrated in the numerous attempt to formulate a definite basis on which the musical facts underlying the principles of shape in musical structure may be correlated and codified." There is no doubt of the value of the methods of musical architecture outlined by him to the student of form in music, and particularly to the young composer. But just because of this value to the young student, it is a pity that such a fascinating subject should be expounded in so academic a fashion, for a first sight of the treatise will certainly not invite him. The dog Latin of the apothecary must be learnt by the aspiring 'prentice before he can follow the teaching of the adept, and some acquaintance with the language of High Philosophy is a necessary equipment for remunerative perusal of this book. The author approaches his subject from the standpoint that rhythm is the basis of all music, and shows the logical relation by which Units of Thought, as he terms them, should grow into musical Phrases and then again into Sentences if a well-balanced work is to result. He also insists, with justice, that it is not enough for the would-be-interpreter of music in studying his subject-matter to follow the old analytical method of considering the bar as a unit, a normal phrase as made up of four bars and so forth. This is inadequate—he must search for and isolate and articulate the hours of rhythm in the musical structure just as the composer did before him. The book becomes more explanatory as it progresses and many theories of absorbing interest are touched on as for instance, the suggestion that as during its three hundred years of existence European music has expanded chiefly in harmonic elaboration—to which there must necessarily shortly come a limit—future developments may be looked for in rhythm. Our accepted rhythms have re-

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Puvis de Chavannes (French Artists of our Day series)
(Heinemann)

LA SORBONNE LES SCIENCES.

From Metalwork and Enamelling
(Chapman & Hall)

CHALICE, FIFTEENTH CENTURY.

mained much what they were then and are elementary as compared even with those of some Oriental nations

THE CHARLES DICKENS ORIGINALS.

By EDWIN PUGH Illustrated 6s net (Foulis)

Those of us who have read Charles Dickens The Apostle of the People know Mr Pugh already as a shrewd sympathetic student and interpreter of Dickens and therefore look in The Dickens Originals for something more than literal descriptions and accounts of the actual persons on whom Dickens modelled certain of his fictitious characters, and are not disappointed. Mr Pugh gives us very much more than this. He tells again the story of Dickens's early love romance, sketching in deftly and vividly that Maria Beadnell who rejected him, and for whom his heart ached and yearned as after a gracious ineffable ideal until he met her again, after many years to be completely disillusioned, so that having fashioned Dolly Varden, and the Dora of David Copperfield "out of his tender recollections of her, he came to picture her as he found her at last in the arch coy absurdly girlish but kind-hearted Flora of Little Dorrit. To meet the real Maria, grown middle aged and so unlike the exquisite girl of his dreams was the rudest, harshest of awakenings. "From the moment of his great disillusion," says Mr Pugh Dickens was a changed man. He was so greatly changed that his art was perceptibly affected. Never again does he recapture his old careless mastery over his material. It is as if, from that time onward, he is forced, almost against his will to examine and criticise the healthy, hearty ideals of his youth his youth that has lasted in the full bloom of its virginal innocence until now, and even now is only a little faded, a little sere. But what he has lost in buoyancy he has gained in steadiness, what he has lost in lightness of heart he has gained in depth of insight and intensity of feeling. He does not forget that idyll of his youth, or the wanton maid who was its heroine, but he remembers, he wears his rue, with a difference." And you see the difference when you compare the latter Estella, of "Great Expectations," with the less humanly feminine Dora and Dolly Varden. In like manner Mr. Pugh traces the influence of the much loved sister of Dickens's wife, who died when she was seventeen, in other of the novelist's girl-characters, and he carefully and suggestively deals with the many originals of his other fictitious persons that Dickens found among acquaintances and friends and in his family circle. It is an able and deeply interesting study, not the least interesting parts of which are the tracing of Dickens himself in his books, as boy and man, as young man full of hope, high spirits and dazzling idealism, and as older man grown wise and tolerant and perhaps a little world-weary. The series of thirty portraits of Dickens, and of the men and women who served as some of his models add greatly to the attractiveness of one of the best and most enjoyable of the many volumes that Dickens and his work have inspired.

From Puvis de Chavannes (French Artists of our Day series)
(Heinemann).

LA SORBONNE.

THE OLD COLLEGES OF OXFORD: THEIR ARCHITECTURAL HISTORY.

By AYMER VALLANCE, M.A. With 50 Collotype Plates and 232 Illustrations in the text £4 4s. net. (Batsford.)

One hesitates before this magnificent volume. It is impossible to deal with it at all in a short note or to give any idea of its excellencies. It deals with the colleges of Oxford from a new point of view—the solely architectural, and the wealth of beauty pictured in the illustrations is nothing short of a revelation even to one who knows his University well. Either one must write at length about this book or content oneself with a mere notification of its existence. The latter course sounds condescending, but unfortunately it is the only one open to us. Our heartiest congratulations and thanks go to both Mr. Aymer Vallance and Mr. Batsford.

IN FRENCH AFRICA.

By MISS BETHAM-EDWARDS 10s. 6d. net.
(Chapman & Hall.)

These pictures of Algeria are a rechauffé or something very much like it. Miss Betham-Edwards herself frankly calls them "memories," admitting that she has incorporated passages from other works of hers now out of print. The fact too that most of her expeditions were undertaken in the company of Mme. Bodichon, who died in 1892, gives a clue to the nature of the book. But Miss Betham-Edwards' "memories" are better reading than the first impressions of many another traveller. "This book is intended as a stimulant to others longing for the palms and temples of the South." That intention is fully realised. We do feel stimulated to make the acquaintance, not so much perhaps of the palms and temples, as of the French in the hill stations, of their hospitality "as genuine and gracious as any in the world." To Frenchwomen also, so often labelled as brilliant and elegant playthings, justice is done. In circumstances of peculiar hardship, in lonely desert stations, in a semi-hostile land, they show themselves good wives, careful mothers, capable help-meets. It sometimes happens that while their husbands are away fighting in the hills, a neighbouring tribe takes the opportunity to menace with destruction the half-deserted, ill-defended fort. Yet do they not lose their cheeriness, as the author and her party found when overtaken by a snowstorm in visiting the Cedar forest near Teniet. Drenched as they were to the skin, they had perforce to accept the French captain's

From Metalwork and Enamelling
(Chapman & Hall).

SILVER CUP, NÜRNBERG,
16TH CENTURY.

THE BOOKMAN
CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Old Colleges of Oxford
(Batford).

ST JOHN'S COLLEGE, OXFORD: THE LIBRARY

From The Old Colleges of Oxford
(Batsford).

MERTON COLLEGE, OXFORD: THE CHAPEL

From Architectural Drawing and Draughtsmanship
(Cassell).

DESIGN FOR A CEILING BY DANIEL MAROT.

hospitable invitation to dinner. A military baker's big oven dried their skirts. Next day the report went round the witty little colony that the four drenched Anglaises had bodily entered the oven! Next to the French the wonderful air of the desert attracts us, "softer and sweeter than the breath blown off Cornish moors, fresher and more invigorating than the seabreezes at Lowestoft." For the artistic there is the dark rich red and yellow ware of the Kabyle villages, water jars, vases and lamps at nominal prices, and of such loveliness that it seems as they must have "a village Ruskin among them to inculcate the worship of the beautiful." A pretty wit is not confined to the French; it is also one of the characteristics of Miss Betham-Edwards, coming out in the Æsopian story of how the two jackals got the heavy water melon up the slope of the garden, and of how the local barrister thinned down visibly as he approached Mostaganem and the Assizes. Excellent, by the way, is the impressionist picture of the diligence containing his vast bulk, as it rolled over the monotonous plain, crossing horizon after horizon. If there is one request we may make of our author it is that she would take a less exalted view of the average intelligence of her readers, and allude less to "Astolfo's winged chariot," "Mezentian unions," the bright dress of Prince Bedridden and the "cilices" of High Church parsonages.

From Antiques and Curios in our Homes
(Laurie).

JACOBITE GLASSES.

OSCAR WILDE. ART AND MORALITY.

BY STUART
MASON. 5s. net
(Frank Palmer).

This is a new and revised edition of an interesting little volume that Mr. Stuart Mason compiled and first published a few years ago. It gathers up all the controversy—reviews favourable and unfavourable; Wilde's witty and shrewd replies to certain of his severer critics, and their angry or obstinate retorts—all the newspaper judgments and discussion that followed on the publication of "The Picture of Dorian Gray."

There is an air of ancient history about it all now, yet it still remains curiously interesting. Mr. Mason has added some new matter and there is a good portrait of Wilde by way of frontispiece.

From Architectural Drawing and Draughtsmanship
(Cassell)

DESIGN FOR A CEILING BY DANIEL MAROT.

THE IDEA OF MARY'S MEADOW.

By VIOLET O'CONNOR 5s net
(Alston Rivers)

There is a great deal of self-revelation in "The Idea of Mary's Meadow," the kind of self-revelation found in one of the first books of this style, published many years ago, entitled "The Day-Book of Bethia Hardacre." The present volume has neither the wit nor the general interest of the earlier one, but it gives a reader the impression that it is a more genuine chronicle. The writer, after some intensely-felt troubles in early life, embraces the Roman Catholic faith; and, with all the fervour of the convert, works for the spread of that faith in the town where she ultimately settles. The town referred to is Ludlow, in Shropshire; and here in due course a Church is built. Here, too, the author adopts a baby girl, conceives the idea of building a home "and calling it "Mary's Meadow," and to her here comes what may be termed a St. Martin's summer of love. She is married in the Church she has helped to build, and this book is dedicated to her husband. The chapters tell

From Antiques and Curios in our Homes
(Laurie).

WEDGWOOD JASPER VASE.

of the building of the Church, of the finding of the site for the new home, and of the planning, the design, the furniture, garden, and life of that home. The whole book is permeated with the author's religion, and with references to and legends of the saints. Her self-revealed character is not to us entirely attractive. The rules of life laid down impress us, whether rightly or wrongly, as being over full of self-satisfaction, and charitable without being altogether tolerant. "For the present," she says, "our way seems clear, to love everyone, to make the meadow beautiful, and to pray for graces." But—when she takes intimate friends to walk in the glen, and they are not quite sufficiently imaginative, she writes "Sometimes there follows an uneasy silence, during which another name is removed from our visiting list." Indeed, "our way seems clear." Nevertheless, the book is not without graciousness and charm in its happier moments, which are neither few nor far apart, and are charming enough to make us forget the occasional intolerance and lack of the larger charity.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From *The Cottages and the Village
Life of Rural England*
(Dent)

HARVINGTON, NEAR EVESHAM, WORCESTER

THE COTTAGES AND THE VILLAGE LIFE OF RURAL ENGLAND

By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A. With 52 Coloured Illustrations and 19 in Line by A. R. QUINTON 21s net (Dent)

Mr. Ditchfield is one of the most hard working and prolific of our writers upon subjects of antiquarian interest, but he has seldom been better suited by his theme than in the very beautiful book at present before us. This study of English village life and architecture is particularly timely, in view of the fact that the old country life seems to be on the verge of change. It is well indeed that Mr. Ditchfield and his able assistant Mr. Quinton have seized the present opportunity of recording their impressions of our rural life—one of the most picturesque of English characteristics. In format and in printing the volume is produced with all the skill of which Mr. Dent is capable—which, as everybody who knows modern methods of book production will agree—is saying a great deal.

THE OXFORD MOMENT SERIES

With Coloured Frontispieces and End Papers 6d net each (Frowde)

* The latest volumes have reached us of the charming little "Oxford Moment Series," one of the latest substitutes for the Christmas card. The little books are of pocket size, and are charmingly printed and produced, with two different coloured end-papers and a coloured frontispiece portrait. The titles of these volumes are: D. G. Rossetti, Christina Rossetti, Herrick, Browning's "Pied Piper and Other Poems," Lila Wheeler Wilcox, and Ruskin's "The Mystery of Life and its Arts," the third lecture of "Sesame and Lilies." In cases where the title consists only in the name of a poet, a short selection of course has been made from the whole of his work.

NEW POEMS

By DORA SIGERSON SHORTER
1s net (Maunsell)

One quality inherent in all the poetry of Mrs. Dora Sigerson Shorter is its tender humanity. Even her dreams of heaven are touched with wistful thoughts of the earth she loves and the people who have made earth dear to her here, as in "When I shall Rise"

'When in the vapourish
blue I wander lost,
Let some fair paradise reward
my eyes—
Hill after hill, and green and sunny vale
As I have known beneath the Irish skies'

There is a poignantly passionate note of sorrow in "The Good Lord Gave," with its heart-cry of the weeping mother—

'But 'tis lonely yet, Lord, by the little grave,
Oh 'tis lonely lonely by the little grave'

And everywhere there are such quaint and delicate fancies as

"All night the small feet of the rain
About my garden ran"

If there is no ballad quite so fine as "The Child," or "Kathleen's Charity," there are at least two in this volume that do not fall far short of those in their strength of feeling and imaginative power, one, "The Guardian Angels," tells a weird legend with cunning narrative skill and eerie suggestiveness, and there is the same simple directness of narration and terse fulness of suggestion in "The Last Coach." This is a little book of true and spontaneous poetry, it is instinct with spiritual beauty and its thought and music have their own distinctive freshness and charm.

End paper from Herrick (Oxford Moment Series) (Frowde).

From The Cottages and the Village
Life of Rural England
(Dent).

COTTAGES AT DUNSTER, SOMERSET.

called) of the twenty-one. But, to be fair, we must admit they are less numerous than one feared. Dr. Talmage possessed buoyancy, irrepressible vigour, and the temperament which is free from self-criticism. Perhaps for such a career as his, self-criticism would have been a handicap. He got plenty of criticism from his friends and allies the newspapers, and possibly thought it superfluous to add any on his own account, though it is doubtful if he ever deliberated on the subject. In any case, the autobiography is a human document of the Transatlantic type, frank and naive to an unaccustomed degree. What prevents it from becoming wearisome is the redeeming fact that Talmage was intensely interested in his world, and fond of travelling. He recalls the enthusiasm of America over Jenny Lind, and how New York went mad with delight in 1885 over the first chrysanthemum it had seen. The chrysanthemum was more welcome than the labourer from China! He also tells a curious story about Florence Nightingale. When he preached in London in 1900, he happened to mention her as "the Lady of the Lamp." Next day he got a note from her, inviting him to call. When he went, he was astonished to find that she had not known about this title till she read it in the newspaper report of the sermon. This sounds almost incredible. Talmage, like Mr. Stead, had the knack of standing before kings as well. He had private interviews with the Czar and his family. He was on intimate terms with nearly all the American Presidents of his day; he visited Gladstone; in short, he travelled with a restless desire to extend his

T. DE WITT TALMAGE AS I KNEW HIM.

By the late T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D.D. 12s. net. (John Murray.)

"It is an abominable thing for a man to commend himself." This sentiment was uttered by Dr. Hall, Bishop of Exeter under James the First, and Sterne quotes it with approval. "I really think it is so. And yet, on the other hand, when a thing is executed in a masterly kind of fashion, which thing is not likely to be found out; I think it is full as abominable, that a man should lose the honour of it, and go out of the world with the concert of it rotting in his head." Dr. Talmage achieved a masterly success in his own way; his sermons, printed as well as spoken, had a vogue which resembled that of Spurgeon's; and probably this volume will bring the fact home to many who are not likely to find it out for themselves. We can make this justification for its publication. There are, indeed, touches in the book which are egotistical in rather a repellent way:

"No event of any consequence in the country, social or political, or disastrous, happened, that my name was not available to the ethical phase of its development."

"I first met Spurgeon in London in 1872. 'I read your sermons,' I said to him first. 'Everybody reads yours,' he replied."

"The word 'immensity' may give adequate idea of the audience present."

These are the sort of things that a man might leave his wife to write, and Mrs. Talmage contributes the last four chapters ("Milestones," they are of which Messrs. Herbert & Daniel have just published a new edition.

From Songs of Innocence by William Blake, 'FAREWELL, GREEN FIELDS!'

From Parsifal
(Harrop).

"... as he started on it, in rosy flame
About its rim the shapes of letters came
And vanish'd, but he read them as they glow knowledge of men and things, and his book, for all its rhetorical style and frequent chronicles of small beer, is decidedly racy. The account of his ministry reveals trouble at the hands of his fellow-ministers, but he does not seem to have borne malice. To the end, even after his church at Brooklyn had been burned three times, even after witnessing the shortcomings of American politics—which is the only experience that appears to have damped for the time being his optimism—he remains a cheery figure. And, for all his cosmopolitan interests, he was American to the core.

MISS ALCOTT.
A Play based upon whose "Little Women" has been published recently by Messrs. Sampson Low.

"Better and better did America become to me as the years went by. I never wanted to live anywhere else. Many believed that Christ was about to return to His reign on earth, and I felt confident that if such a descent could be, it would come from American skies. I did not believe that Christ would descend from European skies, amidst alien thrones."

So?

PERSIAN LITERATURE.

By CLAUD FIELD. With numerous illustrations. 3s. 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

Mr. Claud Field has written a very useful and very interesting study of Persian Literature. It deals in scholarly and attractive fashion with the religion, history and philosophy of Persia, its folk-songs, drama, epic and lyrical poetry, and we warmly recommend it both to students and the general reader.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF ROBERT BRIDGES.

With Portrait. 1s. 6d. net. (Frowde : Oxford University Press.)

This new and remarkably cheap edition of Mr. Robert Bridges' poems includes all that is contained in the collected edition of his poetical works, with the exception of his eight dramas; in addition there are two groups of Later Poems and Poems in Classical Prosody which are now first published in book form. Mr. Bridges has long had his sufficient audience, "fit though few," and though this excellent popular edition of his work may not serve to make him popular it will take him into the library of every lover of what is highest and finest in latter-day poetry. His appeal is not to the multitude; he is severely classical in form and diction—he makes no easy play with sentiment or emotion; the great charm of his work lies in its exquisite delicacy of phrase and the high restraint of its emotional intensity, it touches your heart mostly through your intellect; its beauty is of the statuesque sort, but it is a beauty that thrills and subdues you by its sheer grace of form and chaste loveliness of thought and utterance.

We have no other poet living who has given or could give us such stately and majestic music of poetry as sounds through that mask in the Greek manner, "Prometheus the Fire-giver," and through the mask of "Demeter," nor any other who has surpassed the tenderness, the strong, restrained passion and height of poetic feeling that lift "The Growth of Love" to its place among the greatest of modern poems. But Mr. Robert Bridges is not to be discussed in so brief a note as this, and we hope to deal more adequately with his collected work at an early date. Meanwhile, we express our gratitude for so rich a gift that is now brought within the reach of whoso cares to possess what is so well worth possessing.

ROBERT BRIDGES, AUG. 1912.
Frontispiece to The Poetical Works of Robert Bridges (Clarendon Press).

SHELLEY.

By ROGER INGPEN. (The Regent Library.) 2s. 6d. net. (Herbert and Daniel.)

Nothing could be more complete in their way than the volumes included in the Regent Library series. The scheme on which the contents are arranged is as lucid as it is exhaustive. Here, for instance, Mr. Roger Ingpen sets himself to select for us the best and most representative things from the work of Shelley. His prefatory biography of the poet is admirable—you have all the parts of Shelley's life presented in it fairly, clearly and sympathetically; there is a useful chronology of the chief events in the poet's career; a good and sufficient bibliography; an iconography; and some appreciations by famous authors. In the anthology itself, Mr. Ingpen has chosen the poems for inclusion with unerring taste and judgment, and has supplemented these with characteristic passages from Shelley's essays and pamphlets and a copious and excellent selection of his letters. Altogether a very admirable addition to an artistically produced and altogether admirable series.

RECENT FRENCH CRITICISM.

Among recent French works likely to be of special interest to readers of THE BOOKMAN, a front place may fairly be assigned to the study of contemporary English fiction by M. Firmin Roz the well-known student of Tennyson and of our recent literature as a whole. This admirable study* starts off with an appreciation of Meredith (an appreciation which is by the way, cited in the recent memoir of the novelist in the Dictionary of National Biography). Like its subject, it is suggestive rather than definitive. A short view of Meredith is, perhaps, a contradiction in terms. The point of view will no doubt be considerably enlarged by a careful study of the recently published Meredith Letters, an incomparable document of a life devoted in no ordinary sense. The relation of the text to the work, the work to the life, and the life to the epoch has now only for the first time become really intelligible. The next study is one of Thomas Hardy, whose sympathy, humanity, and "Dutch realism," M. Roz appreciates at a very high value. He is the master observer who sees the bloom on the landscape and hears the wind among the fern, and as a master of English prose, he appears to the French critic to have no possible modern rival. He finds fault only with his melodramatic arrangement and handling of certain episodes and a certain tendency to abuse romantic circumstance—twilight, solitude, the appeal to the prehistoric. The two substantive "Merits" are followed by studies equally thorough

CHARLES DICKENS.
Frontispiece from Dickens
(Regent Library).
(Herbert & Daniel).

* "Le Roman Anglais Contemporain." Fr. 3.50. (Hachette.)

From Parsifal
(Harrop).

"He mounted his rough steed, and forth, alone Into the shadowy wood he took his way."

and well sustained of Mrs. Humphry (whom a malign printer occasionally caricatures as Mme. Hymphry) Ward, Rudyard Kipling and H. G. Wells. The two first are regarded as valuable assets of English history and tradition, the last as the courier of social crisis, the realist of a new world.

Having read M. Roz, whose critical work lives in every line, the explorer of French opinion concerning contemporary English masters must go on to "Bernard Shaw et Son Œuvre"† by Charles Cestre. This writer is well known to students over here for his masterly study of revolutionary currents deriving from France in the Age of Wordsworth. A Frenchman has by the law of his being to

PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY
Painted at Rome in 1819 by Miss Sylvia Curran.
Frontispiece from Shelley
(Regent Library).
(Herbert & Daniel)

† Fr. 3.50. (Mercure de France.)

From The Yeomen of the Guard
(Bell).

"OH, FATHER, FATHER, I CANNOT BEAR IT"

classify, and to classify Bernard Shaw is no easy matter; but M. Cestre accomplishes his programme with extraordinary dexterity. The play of ideas is analysed under five headings. Realism, Psychology, Love, Ethic, and Social Philosophy, and M. Cestre has a good many words to say about each, the "grand maître" himself occasionally intervening. The critic speaks out of the heart of his pays when he condemns "B. Shaw" for excess. The world has got so satiated with novelty that to attract its attention an orgy of paradox, and self-advertisement is deemed necessary. Shaw he implies, despite his extraordinary intellectual fertility, has erred unpardonably in this direction. The egotism, cynicism and negation, however, he leaves us to deduce, are only a prickly envelope, and the rare and delicate flavour of the pine apple will be perceptible to anyone who pushes his researches far enough into the interior.

M. Jules Douady is already well known to English students for his researches into the life of Hazlitt and the period of our romantic renaissance commencing in 1798. He has written evidently with equal pleasure to himself and to his French readers a most scholarly and diverting book on "La Mer et les Poètes Anglais."† That England has produced sea poets in proportion to its output of sea dogs is a thesis which it would be excessively hard to maintain. One of the most touching and most dignified of nautical lays "The Loss of the Royal George," was written by a poet who was probably never on the sea in his life. Of marine prose-poets, such as Conrad and Meredith, M. Douady has nothing to tell us, though he writes at length of Kipling and Stevenson. He is indeed an exception to the rule which demands of a French monographer logical order, exhaustive enumeration, strict analysis. He is quite content to write around his subject. He is no exacting critic of vocation to the service of the Sea Muse. He prefers to recite such landmen's tales of sea adventure as Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice" and Tennyson's "Enoch Arden"; and it must be admitted that he gives a breath of new interest to both stories by means of his perfectly delightful manner of narration no less than by his acute commentary. He disentangles for us the sea-strands in Spenser, Milton, Wordsworth and Shelley. He discovers rightly in "Full Fathom Five" the one lyric of comparatively early date in which we seem to catch a whisper of the mystery and witchcraft of the Ocean; and we have to pursue our way through leagues of dull "Shipwrecks" and "Mariners of England" until we light upon another in "The Ancient Mariner." The subject-matter is relatively familiar to English perusers of marine anthologies,

From The Thoughts of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius (Lee Warner).

"A PRAYER OF THE ATHENIANS."

† Fr. 3.50. (Hachette.)

From Ruddigoe
(Bell).

ENTER ROSE.—HE 'S MUCH STRUCK BY HER.

We are somewhat dubious as to how extensive M. Douady's acquaintance is with our sea ballads and chanties. But there is no doubt that for English readers hardly less than French, he has linked together compositions of indefinable charm, many of which have suffered an appreciable sea-change due, it may haply be supposed, to their genesis in a maritime country and the largest island in Europe.

Of all the Anglophile writers of our new century it is probable that after Chevrillon, M. Charles Bastide has the most philosophic outlook upon our special contributions to the literary art as a mode of civilization. His new work on "Anglais et Français du XVII^e. Siècle" is a collection of studies in by-paths of our history by a virtuoso of the very finest equipment. With Beljame and Jusserand, he depicts the England of Charles II. as seen through foreign spectacles; of the former especially he is the disciple in studying with minuteness the pronunciation and spelling of the English of that period as affected by their intercourse with France. He reveals to us the little world for which French newspapers were printed in London. He discusses the translators and especially the first renderer of "Robinson Crusoe" into French. He has also a scholarly paper on Shakespeare and the wigmaker Mountjoye. M. Bastide is a complete master of his material and his seventeenth century vignettes command the attention of every literary antiquary. His volume is a notable investment for four francs.

In the sphere of the illustrated History of Literature, of which we had almost an epidemic half a dozen years ago, we have seen nothing to surpass the five-franc "Histoire Illustrée de la Littérature Française" (Didier) by E. Abry, C. Audic, and P. Crouzet, with 660 quarto pages and 324 illustrations. The book forms a methodical précis of the whole range from the "Chansons de Geste" down to Taine and Brunetière. A good deal of it is in semi-tabulated form, with lists of bibliographies. The critical portions, however, are thoroughly well edited and as a summary work of reference, it is deserving of the highest credit.

"THE ANGELS CAME THROUGH THE FOREST TO WHERE THE LITTLE TREE STOOD, AND, GATHERING AROUND IT, THEY TOUCHED IT WITH THEIR HANDS."
From Christmas Tales and Christmas Verse
(Laurie).

CHRISTMAS TALES AND CHRISTMAS VERSE.

By EUGENE FIELD. (F. Werner Laure.)

Here is a real Christmas book for children, full of the real Christmas spirit: six little tales and six little poems by Eugene Field, including the story which all true children will love to read of how Santa Claus was born and what he did when a boy. There are also stories of the little mauve mouse and the moonbeam and how the little mouse's sister,

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

DUCHESS OF MILAN. HOLBEIN.
From The National Gallery
(Grant Richards).

"Oh, hush thee, little Dear-my-Soul,
And close thine eyes in dreaming,
And angels fair shall lead thee where
The singing stars are beaming.

The illustrations, by Miss Florence Storer, contain wonderfully clever studies of childhood—the little faces are so natural and the colouring exquisite. It is a delight to linger over each picture.

COKE OF NORFOLK AND HIS FRIENDS.

By Mrs. A. M. W. STIRLING. 12s 6d net. (Lane)

It is not often that a new edition of an expensive biographical work is demanded, but the compliment which the reading public has paid to Mrs. Stirling's "Coke of Norfolk and his Squeaknibble, was caught by the artful cat who got inside a white fur muff and pretended to be Santa Claus; of the beggar maid who was not allowed to go into the great cathedral to wait for the coming of the prince, so went out into the dark forest and found him there; of Mistress Merciless; of the First Christmas Tree; and another story of Santa Claus and how he visited old Joel who was never happy at Christmas time. The lines of many of the poems haunt one's memory:

turist, which wholly transformed the character of Western Norfolk. For its presentation of a detailed panorama of the life of a great landed proprietor—who also sat in the House of Commons for over fifty of the most eventful years of the history of this country—the book is one of the most notable of modern biographies. It is finely produced, and contains a number of interesting illustrations.

ANN.

By LECHMERE WORRALL and EDGAR FRERE. 1s. net. (Greening).

It must have been no easy task for Mr. Lechmere Worrall and Mr. Edgar Frere to turn into a novel the

From A Child's Day
(Constable).

HENRY PURCELL.
From A Short History of Music in England
(Sampson Low).

Friends" is particularly well deserved. The book is a fitting memorial of a noble character, the remembrance of which otherwise would have been likely to perish in a totally unmerited obscurity. The new edition just published contains a considerable amount of fresh material, largely devoted to vindicating still further the memory of Coke and the importance of his achievement as a scientific agriculplay "Ann," which was produced at the Criterion Theatre during last summer. In one notable instance the novel is distinctly inferior to the play. One of the best scenes was that in which Ann, having won over Mrs. Hargraves to acquiesce in the original methods whereby she sets herself to scandalise Edward Hargraves' prudish fiancée, is faced with the task of wheedling Edward's father, the Very Reverend Samuel Hargraves. Of this scene the novel makes practically nothing. In other respects, however, the book appears to us to do ample justice to what was, undoubtedly, a "thin" drama. The book explains the character of Mrs. Hargraves in a wholly satisfactory manner, which is more than was done before the footlights; moreover, it makes Edward himself a distinctly less improbable character than he appeared upon the stage. Nor has Ann herself suffered, and this is, perhaps, the best tribute that can be paid to the authors.

THE ENGLISH CHARACTER.

By SPENCER LEIGH HUGHES ("Sub Rosa"), 5s. net. (Foulis.)

Mr. Hughes excuses himself for having written this book on the ground that "it is only a little one, and that this is my first offence." But no excuse is needed. "Sub Rosa's" admirers are to be numbered by the ten thousand, and their only cause of quarrel with him is likely to be that he never wrote a book before. Last year Mr. G. A. Birmingham's volume on Irish life and character was among the most popular gift-books of the Christmas season. Mr. Foulis has done well to follow it with a comparable book on English life and character by a popular humourist like "Sub Rosa." As was to be expected, "Sub Rosa" has no revolutionary views in the Bernard-Shaw manner that if he did so he would 'give the scoundrels an advantage.'" Dr. Johnson, indeed, was the most John-Bullish, if not the most English person who ever lived. This droll and entertaining book is very tastefully got up, and is illustrated by sixteen effective coloured illustrations from oil paintings by Mr. Frederick Gardner.

From A Child's Day
(Constable).

to propound on the English temperament. He writes discursively rather than critically on politicians, officials, cranks, Londoners, sportsmen, dandies, commercial travellers, airmen, clergymen, clubmen, soldiers, sailors, criminals and minor poets, to name the subjects of some of his chapters. His book is less anecdotal than we had imagined it would be, but it has its fair share of venerable tales, like that of the anglers who had arrived at some remote spot for their fishing, when one of them explained: "Hang it all, we've forgotten the bait." The other replied cheerily: "So we have—but that doesn't matter, we've brought the whiskey." More revealing in the light it throws on the English point of view is the reminder of how, "when Dr. Johnson went to Paris, he talked Latin—declining to attempt French on the ground are romantically inclined, they are apt to confuse her with the woman who is misunderstood; if of the commonsense school, they tend to regard her curtly as an uninteresting minx. But Mrs. de la Pasture is as interested as a man in the soulless beauty whose

THE PASSION FLOWER
From The Field-Flowers' Lore
(Elkin Mathews.)

ERICA.

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE 6s. (Smith, Elder and Co.)

The woman without a soul has for long fascinated the imagination of writing men. In poems and novels and allegories, they have attacked her and worshipped her, cried over her and loaded her with curses—provided, of course, that she was beautiful as well as soulless. The woman made for love and yet not loving, has not exercised the same fascination over the writers of her own sex. No doubt the problem does not touch them so keenly. If they

From The English Character
(Foulis). "ONLY A PENNY, DEARIE!"

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912 1

portrait she sketched in her last work "Master Christopher." Not only is she giving the fascinating young adventuress a novel to herself, but she promises to continue the story of her career in a later volume. We look forward with pleasure to the sequel. In touches light and yet vigorous, subtle and yet lively, she portrays a monster of a girl who is, however, thoroughly human. The spoilt child of a fond, weak mother, Erica is naturally enormously selfish—a feminine Narcissus lost in love and admiration of her beautiful self. That is why she has no love to spare for her lovers, and her point of view does not change when she marries. She is one that takes and never gives. But such is the art with which she is drawn that we do not tire of her company. Her vain attempts to be straight, truthful and unselfish, are described neither satirically nor sentimentally. We are indeed rather surprised when, at the close of the book, the illness of her baby son awakens something like a soul in her. But perhaps her maternal instinct is only a subtle variety of her selfishness; she feels her child a part of herself, and begins to fight for him with the same weapons with which she fought for herself. It is a curious and extraordinary study of character.

SOUTH AMERICA.

Observations and Impressions. By JAMES BRYCE. With Maps. 8s 6d net (Macmillan)

In this singularly vivid and able book, Mr. Bryce has recounted his experiences of a four months' holiday in South America. He started from Colon, crossed the Panama

From The Life of George Frederick Watts
(Macmillan).

LOVE AND LIFE.

From Undine
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

UNDINE
From the original by W. E. F.
Britton.

isthmus, which he describes at length, and then, skirting Colombia and Ecuador, he came in sight of the Peruvian coast, the terrible bareness of which impressed him strongly. Landing at Callao, Mr. Bryce stayed in Lima, the capital of Peru, for a short while. He then made his way inland to Cuzco, the ancient capital of the Incas, and so, on to Lake Titicaca and the high, bleak plateau of Bolivia. He halted at the chief town, La Paz, a city of about 50,000 inhabitants, the majority of whom are Indians. His description of La Paz is really impressive—that strange city, 12,470 feet above sea-level, built in the hollow of an arid wilderness. From La Paz he travelled south through the Bolivian desert, crossing, finally, the border into Chile and speeding through the vast nitrate fields, which have brought untold wealth to the republic. Mr. Bryce writes of the southern part of Chile (not the extreme south which is practically uninhabitable) in very warm terms. He would rather live there than in any other part of South America. After a stay at Santiago, he journeyed by the Transandinian Railway far up into the mountains over the boundary line between Chile and the Argentine, where a colossal figure of Christ with hand upraised has been erected as a symbol of peace between the two nations; but, instead of crossing right down into the plains, he cut backwards again to the Chilean coast, and sailed through the Straits of Magellan and out to the Falkland Islands. Thence, three days' steaming brought him to Buenos Aires, that enormous city of 1,300,000 people, that lies so flat as to be invisible from the sea. Thence he crossed into Uruguay, of which he has a good opinion, and thence into Brazil, sailing from Montevideo to Santos. He went inland to São Paulo, centre of the Brazilian coffee trade, and up the coast to Rio de Janeiro, the second largest city of South America and probably the most splendidly situated port in the world. From this place he took steamer home.

This, in very brief epitome, is what Mr. Bryce accomplished on his trip, and, in itself, it was a remarkable feat for a man well turned of seventy. But, not content with the mere journey, he has produced this volume of nearly 600 pages, which will become, in time, something very like a classic. For it is not only an extraordinarily full, learned, and vigorous description of the countries through which he passed, but it has a kind of epic quality about it which could only have been produced by a mind of immense width of vision and understanding. Moreover, his last chapters, that deal with the conditions, the problems, and the future of these republics, are extremely suggestive and valuable. The whole book is written with such entire lack of dogmatism or political bias that it is unlikely to offend even the very touchy South Americans, and in years to come it is possible that it may hold the same position in their eyes as "the American Constitution" holds in the eyes of the people of the United

From The Heroes
(Lee Warner).

HE TOOK DANAE AND HER BABE DOWN TO THE SEASHORE, AND PUT THEM IN A GREAT CHEST AND THRUST THEM OUT TO SEA."

From Poems of Passion and Pleasure (Gay & Harcock).

States. For Mr. Bryce touches with a sure finger the salient points about South America, the weakness and strength of the various republics, their unrest, the prosperity of some and the poverty of others, their vanity, their sense of patriotism, and so on. His grasp of their economic, their social, and their political conditions is powerful, and his keen, common-sense judgments seem to be particularly just and correct. Of the republics, he ranks Chile foremost in a political sense, with the Argentine next. These two republics with Brazil make up the trilogy of "Great Powers." A state like Peru lies midway between the excellence of Chile and the disorganisation of Venezuela. Of the future of the Argentine, with its almost unlimited grazing and corn-bearing land, he has, like everyone else, a glowing opinion. It is in this country and in Brazil, that the chief South American developments are taking place to-day, and are likely to take place for years to come. There must be upwards of £300,000,000 of European capital in the Argentine alone. Chile, with all its enlightenment and comparative prosperity, is, compared to the Argentine, quite a sleepy, old-world land.

It is a pity that Mr. Bryce did not have the opportunity of visiting Paraguay, Ecuador, Colombia, and Venezuela, for then his survey of the South American Republics would have been complete, and we would have had further valuable facts and generalisations from him. But none of the four are in the front rank of importance, and to have seen them could hardly have altered the general conclusions of his book.

We heartily recommend "South America" to all readers interested in this large continent with a future. R.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

THE LATTER DAY SAINTS.

A STUDY OF THE MORMONS IN THE LIGHT OF ECONOMIC CON- DITIONS.

By RUTH KAUFF-
MAN and REGIN-ALD WRIGHT
KAUFFMAN 10s.
6d. net. (Williams and Norgate.)

Very few people outside the fold of the Mormon faith seem able to feel much sympathy for that strange and unattractive religion. Artemus Ward was contented to pour ridicule upon it and its professors; later generations have taken them more seriously and from ridicule have turned to denunciation and condemnation. On the whole, the investigations of the American authors of this book seem to justify that later attitude. They have gone most exhaustively into the history of Mormonism—from the founding of it by the egregious Joseph Smith to our own day. They have traced its progress, its growth in wealth and influence, its rise in England and on the Continent, and have made a close and conscientious study of its social, economic and political development. The whole tone of the book impresses you with a sense of the impartiality of its authors; if they extenuate nothing they set down nought in malice; they have written in the widest and fullest possible spirit of enquiry, and their final conclusion is that, for good or ill, Mormonism has struck root into the life of the American nation—it has become a part of the capitalistic system of the United States, and there are no signs of its falling into decay or being put an end to. We have had fierce outcries against the Mormon missionaries

From The Mineral Kingdom
(Williams & Norgate).

Reduced illustration of twinned Crystal Gypsum in this country of late; and the cult is making little or no progress here nowadays, but all those who, on public grounds, are interested in the crusade that is being waged against it will do well to read this remarkable history and know exactly what it is that lies behind the Mormon propaganda which they have to fight. Sooner or later, no doubt, America will be compelled to take up this problem of Mormonism and deal with it decisively; if, as our authors think, the time for this is not yet, it surely cannot be far off.

MINES AND THEIR STORY.

By J. BERNARD
MANNIX With 61
Plates and 30 Illustrations in the text 16s. net (Sidgwick & Jackson.)

Mr. Mannix seems to know everything about mines, whether they be for the production of gold, diamonds, silver, coal or iron—the five divisions of this exceedingly readable book. He traces their history through the earliest years to the present day, and always he finds some fresh field of interest to put before the reader. It is curious for the unthinking person to note how great a part mines have played in the history of the world. "The Punic Wars arose out of the Romans' desire to wrest the mines of Iberia from the hands of the Carthaginians. The procuring of gold and silver was the openly avowed object of the conquest of Mexico by Cortes, of Peru by Pizarro, and in fact of the New World generally by the nations of the Old. The story of mining is far more romantic than it may seem to be at first blush. In Mr. Mannix's efficient hands you may be sure that the romance loses none of its attractive qualities. The illustrations are numerous and good.

From *A Short Critical History
of Architecture*
(Batsford).

ST. ANTONIO, PADUA
(13TH CENTURY)

From The Mineral Kingdom
(Williams & Norgate).

GEMMA AUGUSTEA IN VIENNA.

Saidonyx of two layers - the figures are cut in the upper bluish-white layer, whilst the dark under layer forms the background. This magnificent example of the glyptic art is probably the work of Dioscurides, the famous sculptor to the court of Augustus. (Reduced illustration).

CRUIKSHANK REFLECTIONS: THE PAST AND THE PRESENT IN MERRY TALES AND HUMOROUS VERSE.

With 70 Illustrations by George Cruikshank. 1s. net
(Holden & Hardingham.)

Mr. H. Hardingham, who has apparently made the selections from the work of George Cruikshank which compose this volume, is probably right in thinking that there is still a public which will take an interest in the work of the great humorous artist, particularly as "the collection is largely of matter and illustrations considered interesting for comparison with events of the present day, although nearly eighty years have passed since the first number of the Comic Almanack appeared." The editor's selections have been made with much skill, and it is particularly interesting to note how up-to-date is Cruikshank in many matters, particularly as regards aviation and woman suffrage. The illustrations are well reproduced and the volume is excellent value at a shilling.

NOBLE THOUGHTS FOR DAILY LIVING.

Compiled by J. C. Wright. 1s. net to 3s. 6d. net.
(Allenson.)

From Cathedrals and Churches of Rome and Southern Italy
(Laurie).

ROME: INTERIOR OF SAN CLEMENTE.

As a companion volume to his own "Thoughts Worth Thinking," Mr. Allenson has induced Mr. J. C. Wright to make a further compilation of quotations from famous authors. The "Thoughts" are arranged for every day of the year, and represent all shades of religious and philosophical opinion. The book is charmingly produced, and we have little doubt that it will sell as largely as its predecessor.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Paolo and Francesca THE RIDE TO RAVENNA.
(Nelson).

PAOLO AND FRANCESCA.

Retold by W. E. SPARKES. Illustrated by W. Matthews. 2s. 6d. (Nelson.)

Mr. Sparks retells in Messrs. Nelson's beautiful series of "The World's Romances" the poignantly dramatic romance of "Paolo and Francesca." It has been the theme of poems and plays for—how many centuries is it? The tragedy and the pity of it all haunt the memory of Ravenna like a shadow to this day, and Mr. Sparks narrates the touching, terrible, old story again of the wronged Giovanni and the two unhappy lovers whom he slew in his wrath, and narrates it with a skill and delicacy that brings out all the sadness and tense dramatic interest of it and make it as new again almost as when it first was told. Mr. Matthews' colour plates are excellent.

THE LIGHT SIDE OF LONDON.

By EDMUND B. D'AUVERGNE. 6s. net. (Werner Laurie.)

It is perhaps a pity—we put this in the forefront—that Mr. D'Auvergne has paid so much attention to the merely vulgar aspects of the metropolis. What he has called the Light side of great cities is not in reality amusing; and, therefore, is out of place in a book which sets out to be funny and in the main is so. His best pages are the index, which would make even the blasé laugh. He has been well-served by his artists, especially by Mr. Dawson, who brings out much of the absurdity of the poses and fashions of our young Londoners. The text of the book, however, misses much of the real humour of London. The "nut" and the shop-girl who flaunts finery borrowed from the stock are but brief footnotes in the long chapter of London life. To Mr. D'Auvergne they are it, all through: and so he asks us to accompany these aristocrats of the shiny hair and purple ankles through "pubs," and tea-shops, offices and bar-lounges, parks and parades, when the shop-hours are ended, merely to laugh at the moths in their vanities. The game is not worth the expedition. London in its joys and its earnestness has many aspects of comedy; but those are not for Mr. D'Auvergne. He has seized the feathers and missed the bird.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF GEOFFREY CHAUCER.

Edited from numerous manuscripts by the Rev. WALTER B. SKEAT. 2s. and 1s. 6d. net. (Frowde: Clarendon Press.)

There could be no more fitting memorial to the late Professor Skeat than this remarkably cheap edition of his monumental edition of Chaucer. It contains his concise sketch of Chaucer's life and study of his character; with useful hints for students concerning Chaucer's grammar and the metrical structure of his verses. There is also a full and good glossary with careful notes of variations and emendations of the text. These and the whole of Chaucer's works clearly and neatly printed in a volume of some eight hundred and fifty pages for eighteenpence is an achievement on which Mr. Frowde is to be congratulated. Neither the student nor the general reader could desire a better or more attractive edition than this.

From Exeter (Blackie)

OLD COURTYARD IN THE CLOSE.

From The Scholar Gypsy and Thyrsis
(Lee Warner).

"AND THE EYE TRAVELS DOWN TO OXFORD'S TOWERS."

HAMPTON COURT.

Hampton Court—Pictured by Ernest Haselhurst. Described by Walter Jerrold. 2s. net.
Exeter—Pictured by Ernest Haselhurst Described by Sidney Heath. 2s. net (Blackie)

There have now been about twenty volumes published in Messrs. Blackie's "Beautiful England" series. Few of the volumes, we imagine, will be more popular than Mr. Walter Jerrold's on Hampton Court. Without an afternoon at Hampton Court no visit to London is complete, and it is safe to say that the time spent at Hampton Court will be made doubly enjoyable if the visitor goes armed with the historical and descriptive information given in Mr. Jerrold's charming guide-book. Not that Hampton Court Palace takes back the memory across many centuries. Its history begins in the days of Henry VIII., and Hampton Court as we know it now was not formed until William the Third and Mary made it a favoured residence. Exeter, which is the subject of Mr. Sidney Heath's volume, has a longer history. "Here each influence—military from the Roman legions, ecclesiastical from the Saxon prelates, feudal from the Norman lords—has sunk deep into the land." A great part of Mr. Heath's book is occupied with a description of Exeter Cathedral. Mr. Heath aims at giving us the facts rather than at conveying to us the spirit of the place. Both of these volumes are illustrated by Mr. E. W. Haselhurst, whose pretty paintings of the chief historical buildings and beauty spots will be appreciated by many people. The colouring is not always sensitive or subtle, but some of the pictures are very charming.

ESSAYS IN CRITICISM.

By MATTHEW ARNOLD. 1s. net.
(Gowans & Gray.)

Messrs. Gowans and Gray have made Arnold's "Essays in Criticism" the second volume in their charming little Pocket Masterpieces series. These essays comprise perhaps the most valuable and certainly some of the most permanently interesting of Matthew Arnold's prose. Those on Marcus Aurelius, on Spinoza, and other of them, were written as reviews, those on "The Function of Criticism at the Present Time," and on "The Literary Influence of Academies," have a good many topical references; but they are all written with a breadth and fulness of treatment that keep them living when the topics they touch upon are out of date and gives them a high and abiding place as literature. "Taken together," as Professor Raleigh says in his preface, "they are a manifesto, an attempt to define, and to illustrate in practice, the vital functions of criticism." Arnold felt that literature in his day was degenerating from want of ideas, from want of knowing what the world was doing and how it was going. He asked, as he puts it himself, "What must a national literature do to be saved?" and his answer was that "it must generate a sound and enlightened criticism." He defined poetry as a criticism of life, and in him the critic ended by absorbing the poet, and a reading or re-reading of these essays, with their delicious humour, delicate irony, and finely sensitive insight make it impossible for us to regret that absorption.

In some of them he maintains, now and then, that pose of the superior person which so exasperated his opponents in controversy, but the general tone of them all is one of scholarly seriousness and urbanity.

From Hampton Court
(Blackie).

THE GREAT GATEHOUSE, WEST ENTRANCE.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

Caruso

From The Song of the Evening Stars
(Gay & Hancock).

friends. They include, too, the scarcely less delightful letters of his sister, Mary. To say anything in praise of Lamb's letters at this time of day is, or ought to be, a work of supererogation. If you have read them you know how delightfully self-revealing they are, and how steeped in the charm of his unique and curiously lovable personality; how rare and incommunicable their humour is, how poignant their pathos, how homely and human and intensely interesting their careless intimacies. If you have not read them, you have missed one of the finest pleasures of literature. Here, then, are the letters, to be had for a trifle in handy and artistic volumes, that are edited by a man who has much in common with Lamb himself, and has edited his work with a scholarly accuracy, a knowledge and sympathetic understanding that make his notes pleasantly informing, and his six volumes the fullest, most interesting, most satisfying edition of Lamb that has yet been published—an edition so thoroughly well done, that it is never likely to be supplanted.

"WHERE OLD PLACES ARE PROPPED UP WITH NEW DOLLARS AT THE EXPENSE OF CUPID."

From Epigrams of Eve
(Gay & Hancock).

THE WORKS OF CHARLES LAMB.

Edited by E. V. LUCAS.
Vols. V. and VI. With Frontispiece Portraits
5s. net each (Methuen)

These volumes complete Messrs. Methuen's cheap re-issue of Mr. E. V. Lucas's admirable edition of Lamb's complete works.

They contain, these last two volumes, what some of us rank above all the rest of Lamb's writings—his letters to his many and various pleasantly incisive way with her, and just the proper mixture of sentiment and cynicism which seems to be demanded by the nature of her work. She is ably assisted by Miss Ruby Land, whose ten charming drawings deserve close attention.

BOSWELL THE BIOGRAPHER.

By GEORGE MALLORY. 7s. 6d. net (Smith, Elder.)

Not more than a few months ago Mr. Percy Fitzgerald

From Greuze and his Models
(Hutchinson)

HEAD OF A CHILD.

From the original chalk drawing in the Print
Department of the British Museum.

EPIGRAMS OF EVE.

By SOPHIE
IRENE LOEB
With 10 Illustrations by Ruby Land
3s. 6d. net
(Gay & Hancock)

The cult of the epigram seems to be falling into disuse, but that there are still writers who are capable of a number of smart sayings on varied topics (chiefly Love and Marriage) is proved by the entrance of Miss Sophie Irene Loeb into the literary arena. This writer has a put forth the decidedly cynical but not unamusing view that the "Life of Johnson" was written primarily for Boswell's own glorification. Whatever Johnsonians and others may have thought of so startling a theory, it must certainly have set their minds to work once again on that ever-interesting subject of Boswell's rather baffling personality. Not a critic but has had his say on the point. Boswell was a genius—a fool, a tipsy buffoon, an obnoxious parasite, a snob, what you please—but always the author of one of the greatest books in the language. Assuredly not in the whole range of fiction is there a character with whom he may reasonably be compared. No novelist could have invented a James Boswell, and yet he is by no means altogether outside the common comprehension. In spite of his admiration, Mr. Percy Fitzgerald painted his hero blackly, and with a challenge lurking on every page. It was to be expected, therefore, that the next book on Boswell would contain a very complete refutation of Mr. Fitzgerald's theory. And in a sense Mr. George Mallory's "Boswell the Biographer," just published, is the anticipated counterblast, none the less potent from the fact that the author makes no mention of Mr. Fitzgerald's book, and, indeed, seems to be unaware of its existence.

Briefly this new essay—for biography it does not pretend to be—is a sober, extremely well-written and dignified "explanation" of Boswell's character. It is neither an apology nor a mere eulogy—rather a judicial summing up of such facts in Boswell's rather chequered career as at all act as guides to his true self. Such biographical vignettes as the author adduces add considerably to the bulk of the book, and most of them will be familiar to its readers, but without them, perhaps, Mr. Mallory would have written a less satisfactory work. Early enough he shows some of his cards:

"To be entirely respectable and conventional, to be the man of the world, the gentleman of society," he says, "that is what Boswell wanted most in life; and that he never could become, because there was in his nature a further consciousness which was not to be subdued, and which determined, by reason of the curious inconsistency so produced, his whole capacity for interesting mankind, for fame, for greatness . . . The story of Boswell's life is the story of a struggle between influences and ambitions which led him towards the commonplace, and the rare qualities grafted deeply within him, which bore him steadily in an opposite direction."

That, one must think, is very fairly put, and may be taken to be the keynote of the whole book.

From Greuze and his Models
(Hutchinson).

HEAD OF A YOUNG GIRL
From a drawing in the British Museum.

Quite rightly Mr. Mallory draws particular attention to the two sides of Boswell, shown so early in his life—in point of fact immediately after his return from Corsica. A certain fame was already his, but he must needs play the buffoon at the Shakespeare festival at Stratford and spend not a little of his time in acting as his own publicist. Always Boswell must be interesting to people, the limelight must be focussed upon himself; and one is tempted to treat his extraordinary capacity for hero-worship, shown, by the way, as Mr. Mallory points out, not by any means with Johnson alone, as primarily the outcome of a desire for that limelight. Yet even if this were so, one likes to think of Bozzy as one of those rare beings who must be allowed to do things which are forbidden to ordinary mortals. There is usually one such in a generation. And even apart from his books, he must have given pleasure of one kind or another to hundreds of people whom he met in the social round. His eccentricities were of the clubbable sort: a snub at Boswell's expense was not always a painful incident, for the snub could so easily be metamorphosed into something else.

Very wisely, too, Mr. Mallory draws material from Boswell's lesser known writings. Few Johnsonians can be familiar with "The Hypochondriack," a series of papers which were written for the London Magazine. They are certainly illuminating, and taken in conjunction with the letters to Temple can be made to give a fairly coherent picture. Further chapters are devoted to particular points. Johnson's influence on Boswell gives Mr. Mallory the opportunity to attack a problem of uncommon psychological interest. Then there is the question of Boswell's position amongst his contemporaries. There can be no doubt that Boswell owed much of his popularity to his ability to adapt himself to his audience, not always an easy matter. He of all mortals was gifted with an insatiable curiosity. One figures him again and again attempting tiny experiments, often quite ludicrous, in the success of which he will find a most solemn satisfaction. Yet this is not altogether difficult to understand.

Essentially a moralist he was, says Mr. Mallory, and one does not feel inclined to disagree, yet morality, one imagines, often took a second place to romance. Bozzy in one sense was the predecessor of Oscar Wilde. To him life was an art, for the better understanding of which he was willing to go to ridiculous lengths. And the fact that he knew he was going to ridiculous lengths in no wise interfered with his pleasure or satisfaction. But at the back of things there was ever the desire to justify the position he had adopted, and this brings Mr. Mallory more particularly to Boswell's qualifications as a biographer. The question has been treated in great detail before, and Mr. Mallory does not seek to establish any very novel theory. Herein, of course, he is at a disadvantage, for, without fresh material, it is almost impossible to say anything new. And, indeed, upon reaching the last page of his book, one is bound to admit that, apart from its general interest, apart from its manifold good qualities as a piece of well-sustained writing, it will not do much more than refresh the Johnsonian's mind. Coming, however, just after Mr. Fitzgerald's book, it will tend to inculcate into the mind of the general reader a juster view of an extraordinary character. Also it should send him to the "Life."

RAIPH STRAUS.

MISS ELLA WHEELER
WILCOX,
Author of "Forms of Passion and Pleasure."
(Gay & Hancock).

From The London River (Foulis).

*From The Uffizi Gallery
(Jack).*

RUBENS (1577-1640). FLEMISH SCHOOL,
No. 233. PORTRAIT OF THE ARTIST.

THE HISTORY OF THE PHIL-HARMONIC SOCIETY OF LONDON, 1813-1912.

By MYLES BIRKET
FOSTER. 10s. 6d.
net. (John Lane.)

If inquiry were to be made into the causes which have led to the present widespread appreciation of orchestral music in this country, doubtless the existence for a century past of the Philharmonic Society would be set down as of potent influence. In glancing over the programmes of the Society's one hundred years of concerts, so admirably summarised and annotated by Mr. Myles Birket Foster, one realises, with renewed admiration and gratitude, that there has not been a composer or performer of music of any eminence not only in England but throughout Europe during that period who has not been actively connected with the undertaking. Founded at a time when Beethoven's mighty genius was still unfolding itself, but already was proving irresistible in its impulse towards a higher development of the art of music, the Philharmonic was happily able to acquire merit by commissioning from him a Symphony, which proved to be the immortal No 9 (Choral). This was performed in 1825 and when, two years later, it was learned that Beethoven was ill and in need, the Society sent one hundred pounds "to be applied to his comforts and necessities during his illness." The composer's malady however proved fatal and it became useless to speculate on how much music was thus lost to the world. In 1829, Felix Mendels—John Bartholdy, made his first appearance, an event charged with much significance not only to the Philharmonic, whose orchestra he subsequently directed for a season, but to the whole of musical England. Another

From A History of Painting in North Italy (Murray).

LORENZO LOTTO: THE VIRGIN IN GLORY, WITH SAINTS.
Alinari photo. Asolo: Duomo.

From The Van Eycks and their Art
(Lane).

OUR LADY AND CHILD AND CHANCELLOR ROLIN.
Paris. Louvre.

portentous conductor was Richard Wagner, who succeeded at once in stirring up life and strife amongst performers and critics. Spohr, Cherubini, Joachim, H. R. Bishop, Hallé, Costa, Grieg, Tschaiakowsky, Elgar, the list of saints in the musician's calendar who and whose works were introduced to the English public by the Society, is of rare length.

It is interesting to recall that the first concerts were held in the old Argyll Rooms, Regent Street, until they were burnt down in 1830; and that the Society subsequently inhabited the Hanover Square Rooms, the old St. James's Hall, and of late years Queen's Hall.

Spohr was the first to introduce the baton for beating time, and so to institute the art of conductorship. The innovation met with considerable opposition, particularly from "Leaders of the orchestra," as they were then called, or as we should say to-day, "Principal Violins." The Society has of course had its ups and downs, and has at least twice been financially embarrassed. But it showed how great is its vitality last year when it celebrated its centenary. He who would read of the manner of the acquisition of the Beethoven bust, which is such a precious possession of the Society, of the institution of the Beethoven medal, and would dip into a running commentary on a century's music, will find the book enthralling. The work has been carefully done; Mr. Foster has a very light and agreeable style. The volume is well indexed and illustrated with reproductions of various autograph letters and scores, the property of the Philharmonic Society. Every musician wishes it God-speed in its second century of work "in the cause of music" now entered upon.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Poems to Pavlova
(Herbert Jenkins.)

PAVLOVA.
Photo: Claud Harris, Ltd.

THE A B C GUIDE TO MUSIC.

By D. GREGORY MASON. With 12 Portraits and 27 Musical "Figures" in the Text. 5s. net. (Stanley Paul.)

It seems to us that there is an excellent opening for a popular book on Music, such as the one now before us. Mr. Gregory Mason gives a sort of bird's-eye view of the whole subject—theories, advice, critical biographies, in fact almost anything you can think of in connection with music. Starting with the duties of the listener, he follows this up with a few critical chapters on the theory of music. Here, where there is a great temptation for an expert to fall foul of an ignorant public, Mr. Mason has particularly distinguished himself. He makes use of but few technical terms, and those which he does use he takes care fully to explain beforehand. The author then proceeds to take his readers to a piano recital, a symphony concert, a song recital, and the opera. On all of these branches of his subject he writes pleasantly, clearly, and well, and we can strongly recommend a book of sound sense to the musical amateur.

POEMS OF PAVLOVA.

By A. GULLOCH CULL. With 8 Illustrations of Madame Pavlova in her most famous dances. 3s. 6d. net. (Herbert Jenkins.)

Surely never before has a dancer been the theme of a whole volume of poems and of poems so full of grace and melody and poetic beauty as are those of Mr. Cull. But surely, on the other hand, never before has poet had so wonderful, so indescribably perfect a dancer to inspire his muse. Considering the limits of his subject, Mr. Cull gets an amazing variety into his series of sonnets, rondeaus, roundels and poems—he rarely repeats an image, he describes the miracle of Pavlova's dancing with a continual freshness of fancy and vision, an unfailing passion of delight. The sestet of the sonnet to Anna Pavlova in her dance "La Rose Qui Meurt" is fairly representative of his charming verse:

"A rosebud swaying in the breeze would seem
A joy less perfect than the roselike grace
Of your delicious limbs and mobile face:
While shone the sun, you danced your dance supreme
Through gay glad gardens, drifting in a dream,
Till evening fell, then hung a breathless space
And, like a rose whom Night's cold lips embrace,
You gently fluttered down on Death's dark stream."

THE HISTORY OF CRIEFF.

By ALEXANDER PORTEOUS, F.S.A. Scot. 21s. net.
(Edinburgh: Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

LANGHOLM AS IT WAS.

By JOHN HYSLOP and ROBERT HYSLOP. 7s. 6d. (Sunderland: Hills & Co., 1912.)

Two of the best parish histories that have appeared within recent years are those that treat of Crieff and Langholm. What an amount of painstaking research has gone to the production of these goodly tomes, handsomely printed and illustrated as they are, and above all, so admirably written! Of local history there can never be an over-plus, and the parishes dealt with have their own importance historically, and in every other respect. The author of "Crieff" has much to tell us of its earlier story, and he tells it well; it is, however, Crieff's later life which shines conspicuous. Every native will be grateful to Mr. Porteous for his enlivening account of the social annals of the interesting little capital of Strathearn. This is decidedly the gem of the book, and is likely to be read and re-read a dozen times for the once or twice of the other chapters—by the ardent Crieff-lover, at all events.

From The A B C Guide to Music
(Stanley Paul).

Liszt

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

made use of in this particular fashion. Does it not frequently happen that those who are most ignorant of the local landmarks are just the natives themselves? So far as Langholm goes there can be no excuse on that score henceforth. From every point of view its story has been told once for all, nor could it have been accomplished with a more capable pen. The racy "reminiscences" of the author's father will be read with unfeigned delight during these long winter nights and for many winters to come.

GERMAN MEMORIES.

By SIDNEY WHITMAN. With many portraits. 7s 6d. net. (Hemmann.)

No Englishman knows Germany better than the author of these "German Memories," no one is better qualified to pronounce judgment on the German temperament, on the German character, on those easily explicable and yet forlornly inexplicable dilemmas that seem to have made Germany the Carthage to our Rome. The school-fellow of many well-known Germans, the friend of Bismarck, a frequent visitor to the Fatherland, Mr Sidney Whitman writes about Germany and about Germans as one who loves the country and the people, as one who cannot see any valid reason why England and Germany should meet in irreconcilable conflict, as one who believes that the real entente cordiale is not that which binds England to France in an alliance which Disraeli desiderated more than eighty years ago, but in an understanding between England and Germany, which he seems to think might conceivably pave the way for that Tennysonian

From The Engravings of William Blake
(Grant Richards).

Drawn by Huet Villiers, engraved by
W. Blake, 1821.

The book is sparse in the anecdotal element, and it is almost entirely lacking in the humorous. By way of compensation there is a sufficiency of solider stuff, diffuse, but never tiresome, all of which is sure to be prized by the reader nursed under the shadow of Torleum. The ecclesiastical chapters may be particularly commended. Curiously, the modern historian of the Church of Scotland, Dr. John Cunningham, is Crieff's chief literary hon. The Principal was parish minister for forty years, a sagacious, progressive, kindly man, who came to his own far too late in the day, like many another toiler whose best work has been done, not in the high places of the field, but amid the shadows and the obscurities.

The "muckle toon of Langholm," lying so picturesquely in the lap of the Scottish Border, boasts a hoar antiquity. It is, as the writer of its story says, "a word of magic meaning to the sons and daughters of Eskdale wherever they are found." Within well-nigh a thousand pages Mr. Hyslop has gathered together all that can be known about the parish and its people. Of Border parish histories this is about the finest we have seen. There is only another—that of Channelkirk, in Lauderdale—to compare with it for sheer exhaustiveness. Only one on whose heart the place of his birth has been written (as Calais was on Queen Mary's) could have executed this so faithful and fascinating record. It is impossible to quote from it. There is so much that is of general interest that the volume (a marvel of cheapness) will find its way into many other hands and homes than those of Langholmers. The notes on the stone-circles, for instance, and the barrows, and hill-forts of the district might well be reprinted for the use of schools; indeed, we see no reason why parish histories should not be

From J. M. Synge
(Constable).

J. M. SYNGE

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

Utopia, "the Parliament of Men, the Federation of the World."

But, while readers may differ as to the value of the political views which Mr. Whitman expresses, there can be but one opinion of "German Memories" considered in the dual light of a study of a people and of a volume of reminiscences: in both these respects the book is entirely admirable, at once genuinely instructive and unfailingly entertaining. Undoubtedly, Count Herbert Bismarck showed real prescience when he said to the author: "What can a man like you have to do with business? You ought to take up political journalism; that would be a far more congenial occupation for you." Indeed it was the Count's recommendation of his friend to Gordon Bennett that started Mr. Whitman on his career as special correspondent. It is fitting, therefore, that apart from the exceedingly interesting record of the author's Spartan schooldays at Dresden—the most arresting feature of these "Memories" should be those which tell of the great founder of German unity. Mr. Whitman has a boundless admiration for Gustav von Moser, the German officer who wrote "Der Bibliothekar," the original of "The Private Secretary," and he reveals the interesting fact that he offered the play to Sir Charles Wyndham, who in rejecting it made one of the admitted great mistakes of his career. But it is the picture of Bismarck which will lend enduring value to these "German Memories." We see the man of blood and iron in a new light, as one fond of meeting cultured Englishmen, as one wishful for an entente between England and Germany, as a host exquisitely polite and courteous to ladies, as a devoted admirer of Zola's later novels. For the rest Mr. Whitman tells an admirable anecdote about Lord Rosebery, and he relates a story connected with a visit which the old Emperor William made to Gastein, which is certainly calculated to make staid Englishmen and women stare, a story quite Pepysian, in fact.

From Life in the West of Ireland (Maunsel)

DOWNPATRICK HEAD.

POEMS OLD AND NEW.

By HENRY NEWBOLT. 5s. net. (John Murray.)

We have just received this handsome collected edition including those stirring lyrics of the sea and the rest of the early verse that made Mr. Newbolt famous, the work from his recent books, and eight or ten new poems. It is one of the most desirable of gift-books and something more—and because it is something more we reserve it for further and fuller consideration next month.

From The Art of Josef Israels
(Allen).

IDEALE LANDSCHAFT.

Von JOSEPH GRAMM. In 2 Vols. With 135 Illustrations. 36s. (B. Herder, Freiburg im Breisgau and London.)

German art criticism is noted for its conscientiousness, a quality which is to the fore in Herr Gramm's fine volumes. At the same time, the work is by no means lacking in those lighter qualities which conduce to easiness of reading, and no art student conversant with the German language should neglect an opportunity of studying a work which we believe to be one of much value. The illustrations, which are finely produced, are embodied in a separate volume.

THE BOOK OF HIGHLAND VERSE.

Edited by Dr. MITCHELL. 4s. 6d. net. (Paisley: Gardner)

We do not judge men by their weight, otherwise Daniel Lambert would come out far in front of John Keats or Alexander Pope or Algernon Swinburne. And so it is with verse. Some men have written single poems which are more to us than all the portly volumes of Southey or Rogers or even of Byron. Indeed, few poets have published good volumes; the best of most of them would go into the compass of a pamphlet. So that it always will be necessary to rescue rare gems from commonplace volumes and from the magazines and newspapers. There has been no rescue work of this kind amongst the verse of the Highlands since the publication of "Lyra Celtica" by William Sharp. Excellent as it was, Sharp's book did not succeed, probably because it cast its net too wide. It included Kelts from every country, and, therefore, lacked the local interest and the literary individuality which so strongly distinguishes Dr. Mitchell's Book of Highland Verse. Mr Sharp mixed all the types together. The present book will enable us to realise that amongst Highlanders there is a literary impulse, and that it differs in many respects from any we have yet known. As one would expect in a people so intensely conservative in matters of sentiment, the book is wonderfully unanimous. All the writers are full of the sense of the injustice done to their race, with regret for the passing of the old times when the clansman regarded himself as sib to the chief, and the difference of rank did not exist, and the land was held as a possession of the whole clan and not of

From King Charles I.
(Long).

KING CHARLES I.
From the portrait in Middle Temple Hall.
By permission of the Treasurer and Masters of the Bench.

From Ideale Landschaft
(B. Herder).

CORREGGIO: ENTFUHRUNG
DES GANYMED.
Wien, Hofmuseum. Photo: J. Lowy

the individual. The book is full also of the present day romance of the Highlands, and that not less moving than the old ones. The desire of all the bards is to see the glens re-peopled with the descendants of the same old clans, and to hear them echoing with the songs with which the Highlander accompanied even the humblest of his daily tasks. And, of course, in the van figures the revival of the Gaelic tongue as the speech of the Highland people. Nowhere else, save in Sharp's book, can we find the same note, the Highland flavour which is neither quite like the Welsh nor the Irish; for the Highlands, and that is the point of literary interest, are preserving their own type. Less satisfactory is the translation section in which are included some rather feeble attempts by Patison and Blackie, far inferior to the work of the later men like Dr. Carmichael, and better forgotten. Amongst the work of living writers there are poems that should find a permanent place in the anthologies like Mr. Gow's excellent "Waking Year," Mr. Neil Munro's "Heather," Mr. Kappey's "Arran," and such work by other writers as "Shon Campbell," the charming description of the Fairies in the "Wee Folk," and the Duke of Argyll's whole-hearted and patriotic lines, ending—

"Keep the knees still free for climbing
Or where Reels swift dances flow;
Keep the heart still strong for rhyming
Where the Bards old legends know,
Make your Highland kinsfolk own
You are Highland blood and bone."

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Pied Piper of Hamelin
(Dent).

"AND LICKED THE SOUP FROM THE COOK'S OWN LADLES"

MARGARET ETHEL MACDONALD.

By J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, 3s. 6d.
net. (Hodder & Stoughton)

Criticism is not permitted when such a book as this is presented. What can we say when our acquaintances show us the photographs of deceased relatives? The late Mrs. MacDonald had a wide and extensive circle of friends, and they will value this book. For them it was written, we take it. Those outside the circle who read this record of a life spent largely in the service of the public, can only pay grave respect to the memory of a lady whose good works were so numerous, and regret her early death. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald tells of his wife in his own way, quite simply, and without any attempt at a full biography. We learn of Miss Gladstone's youth, her religious feelings, and social activities. There are many quotations from early diaries. To her husband, Mrs. MacDonald's life has its full beginning in her marriage and acceptance of Socialism.

"Her life was one act of Christian worship," he writes, "which grew into a final grandeur only after she had left the paths of individualist religion and stood upon those of the great atonement of humanity through Socialism."

Brought up an evangelical, we make this out to mean that Mrs. MacDonald left off going to church, especially in the light of the following paragraph:

"As I have said, she was not at home in an ordinary congregation. It distracted her. It was not a spiritual union of believers. She worshipped, when that act was specialized from her every thought and deed, with her own family at her own fireside."

Only at Lossiemouth, her husband's native place, was Mrs. MacDonald happy at public worship. "The simple Presbyterian services unsullied by gaudy display and conscious effort soothed her and led her in spirit far along the road of her pilgrimage." The congregation at Lossiemouth "pleased her."

In May, 1895, Mr. MacDonald, then a Labour Candidate for Southampton, received his first letter from the lady he married. It came to him "from an unknown person signed 'M. E. Gladstone,' enclosing a subscription for my election fund." A fortnight later and they were both present at a debate on Socialism at the Pioneer Club. The following year came the engagement, and, in November, marriage. "The term of endearment she used most frequently was 'my dearest sir.' In her most sacred feelings there was always a strange reticence begotten of a sense of the holiness of life," Mr. MacDonald tells us.

Marriage and motherhood did not hinder Mrs. MacDonald from sharing her husband's political interests. Their home "became a workshop of social plan and effort," and "Socialism was the idea which inspired and guided her." "A Blue Book was second in rank of sacredness only to the Gospels." It is inferred that Mrs. MacDonald was thoroughly happy in her strenuous life. "In investigation, on labour committees, in politics, in temperance, in social purity, in trade unionism, she found herself." Travel and walks in Buckinghamshire are the recreations allowed.

From The Gondoliers
(Bell).

END OF ACT I.—GIRLS WAVE
FAREWELL TO MEN.

The book is obviously a labour of love, a tribute to a very earnest and high-minded woman, a token of regard for a faithful wife. As such it will be acceptable to many who enjoyed Mrs. MacDonald's companionship. J.C.

THE POCKET GEORGE BORROW.

Compiled by EDWARD THOMAS. 2s. net. (Chatto and Windus).

The other day we were reviewing Mr. Edward Thomas's admirable "Life of George Borrow," and close on the heels of that book comes this charming pocket anthology of passages chosen from Borrow's works. Borrow does not lend himself readily to this treatment—he is not, as Mr. Thomas remarks, a pithy writer, "nor is he best when sententious." Nevertheless, here is an interesting and very delightful collection of many of the finest, wisest and happiest things that Borrow said—all of them with what a breath and healthful vigor of life in the open blowing through them! You remember that glorious passage: "What is your opinion of death, Mr. Petulengro?" said I, as I sat down beside him," and Petulengro's reply:

"When a man dies, he is cast into the earth, and his wife and child sorrow over him. If he has neither wife nor child, then his father and mother, I suppose; and if he is quite alone in the world, why, then he is cast into the earth, and there is an end of the matter."

"And do you think there is an end of a man?"

"There's an end of him, brother, more's the pity."

"Why do you say so?"

"Life is sweet, brother."

"Do you think so?"

"Think so! There's night and day, brother, both sweet things, sun, moon and stars, brother, all sweet things,

From The Loves of Great Composers
(Harrap).

MOZART AND THE EMPEROR.

From The Four Seasons
(Heinemann).

THE CHILDREN'S GARDEN.

there's likewise the wind on the heath. . . ."

And the rest of it. That is one of the most curiously haunting passages in Borrow, but there is many another as good in different ways, and Mr. Thomas has missed none of the best. His book is an ideal volume for the pocket of the wayfarer.

THE PEOPLE'S BOOKS.

Tennyson, By AARON WATSON. The Church of England, By the REV. CANON MASTERMAN. The Hope and Mission of the Free Churches, By the REV. EDWARD SHILLITO. Navigation, By WILLIAM HALL, R.N. Marriage and Motherhood: A Wife's Handbook, By H. S. DAVIDSON. The Baby: A Mother's Book by a Mother. Hypnotism and Self-Education. Weather Science, By R. G. K. LEMPERT. Structure of the Earth, By PROFESSOR T. G. BONNEY, F.R.S. The Training of the Child, By G. SPILLER. Co-operation, By JOSEPH CLAYTON. A History of English Literature, By A. COMPTON-RICKETT, M.A., LL.D. 6s. net each. (T. C. & E. C. Jack).

The twelve new volumes in this admirable and successful series cover a wide variety of subjects, and each is lucidly and concisely written and compresses within its small compass an amazing amount of information. Mr. Aaron Watson's biography of Tennyson is an interesting and thoroughly capable piece of work; Mr. Compton Rickett's is the best tabloid History of English Literature we have ever read; Mr. Joseph Clayton is suggestive and informing on "Co-operation"; the volumes on Marriage, Motherhood, The Baby and The Child are quite ideal handbooks in their way—in a word, we have nothing but praise for these latest developments of Messrs. Jack's notable enterprise.

A page from Poems of Passion
(Siegle, Hill).

FINE BOOKS.

By ALFRED W. POLLARD. With 40 Plates. 25s. net. (Methuen.)

The latest volume of Messrs. Methuen's "Connoisseur's Library" is decidedly one of the most interesting. Really good printing, whether of text or of illustrations, is—or at any rate used to be—an art of no mean order, and in "Fine Books" Mr. Pollard gives a history and a criticism of the beautiful books of the past four hundred years. He is modest enough about his achievement: "While the desired completeness has not been attained (for the writer had intended to make a complete survey of book-illustration, but found such a task impossible) the ground here covered is still very wide, and for the book as a whole no more can be claimed than that it is a compilation from the best sources . . . controlled by some personal knowledge, the amount of which naturally varies very much from chapter to chapter." Nevertheless, in the scope of one volume Mr. Pollard gives us a vast amount of information upon a subject to which but too little attention has been paid. The illustrations are exceedingly interesting and they are well reproduced. Every lover of beautiful books should study Mr. Pollard's work.

SHAKESPEARE, BACON, AND THE GREAT UNKNOWN.

By ANDREW LANG. Illustrated. 9s. net. (Longmans.)

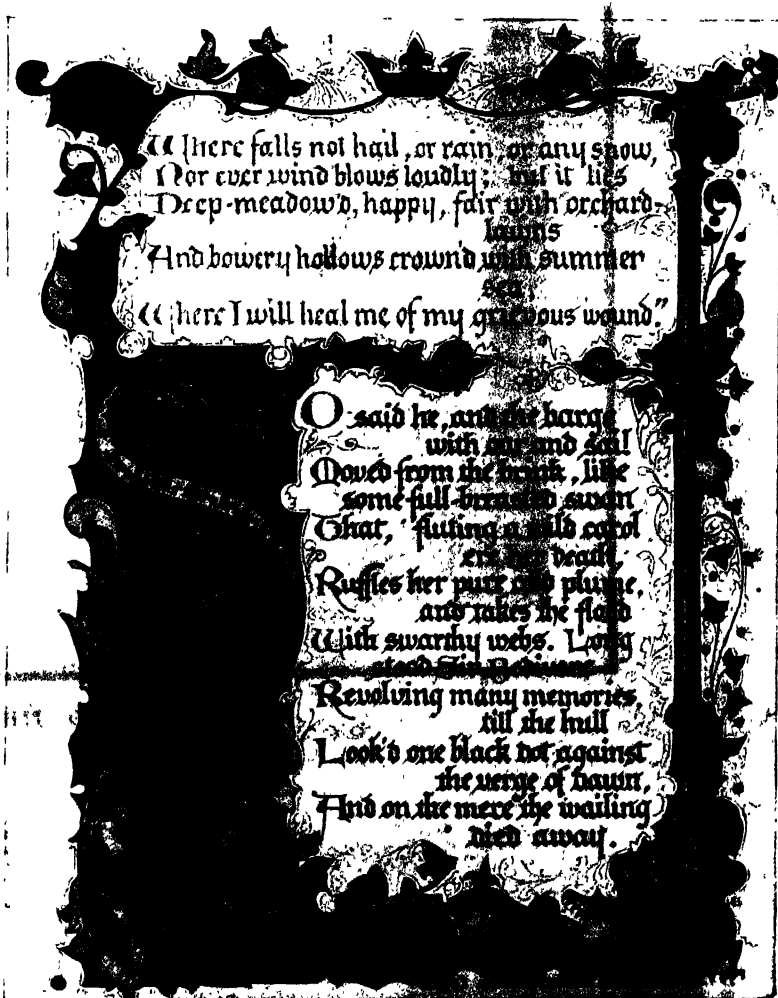

It was a reading of Mr. Greenwood's, "Shakespeare Problem Restated," that tempted Mr. Andrew Lang to enter the lists and take part in the great Shakespeare-Bacon controversy. He says he found Mr. Greenwood "worth fighting," and in this goodly volume he fights him with all the lightness and cunning of fence in which he was a past master. It is hardly necessary to say that Andrew Lang was of the true faith; he marshals all the arguments that have been advanced by the Baconians, and blithely knocks the bottom out of them one after another, and shows the fatuity and solemn nonsense of all these ridiculous theories against the simple fact that Shakespeare and none other was the author of his own plays, and that a mere study of Bacon's biography must suggest to the mind of any reasonable person that supposing his partisans to be in the right, "his poetic supremacy and imaginative fertility border on the miraculous when we consider his occupations and his ruling passion." As for the plays having been written by another man of the name of Shakespeare—he dismisses this "fantastic pedantry" with amused contempt and says if he has sometimes spelt the name Shakespeare and sometimes Shakspeare "by any spelling of the name I always mean the undivided personality of 'him who sleeps by Avon.'" Surely, delightfully shrewd, witty and sagacious inquiry shows the last word on a topic that is not worth any more serious discussion. One feels that Andrew Lang enjoyed writing it, and he has made much suggestive and most enjoyable reading of it.

THE EMPIRES OF THE FAR EAST.

By LANCELOT LAWTON. 2 vols. 30s. net. (Grant Richards.)

The Japanese have a naïve way of telling foreigners who visit their land: "Pray do not trouble to mention any virtues you may find in us, but do frankly point out our faults." If such requests are sincerely meant, the Nipponese will find it hard sufficiently to thank Mr. Lancelot Lawton, who devotes a goodly portion of his 1,600-page book, "Empires of the Far East," to detailing the foibles and shortcomings of the Japanese, and in doing so does not permit a single phase of their life to go uncensured. His sledge-hammer, journalistic style, relieved here and there by a touch of grim humour, is admirably fitted for his purpose, which is to prove to the wide world that the Oriental ally of Great Britain is not fit to be set on a pedestal to be worshipped for its military and naval achievements, and its advancement in social and political matters, but ought to be regarded as "still essentially barbaric," deserving to be despised for its moral delinquencies. These discoveries were made by the author during his sojourn in the far East as War Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, and on a subsequent visit or two, in the course of which he once had somewhat rough treatment at the hands of Japanese rowdies, and a rather cool reception from Japanese Government officials. He saw so many wicked things going on in the Daybreak Kingdom that he seriously set himself to the task of exposing the frailties of the Nipponese character in the plainest terms, of which the English language is capable. According to him, the Japanese are "without moral conception." He says that "at least among the lower classes of womanhood there is little, if any, conception of morality in its specific application," and that "given opportunity the daughters of the higher castes are not as strict in their conduct as were their mothers whose lives were jealously regulated by the rigidity of the feudal régime." He believes "that the present social system, which has remained practically untouched by Western influences, is defective inasmuch as it conduces to, if it does not actually promote the worst forms of immorality." The Government, be it remembered, according to this author, is no better than the people, but, indeed, "lends its aid and authority to negotiations that, plainly put, enable parents to thrive on the ruin of their own children." As a necessary corollary to all this, Mr. Lawton emphatically declares "that a people who are not ashamed of the existence of concubinage in their midst, who reduce their women to the level of slaves, and who in certain instances barter the virtue of their daughters for a few pieces of silver, are unsuited from the standpoint of morality alone to assimilate with the peoples of Europe and America." He avers that the Japanese, while abroad, do not scruple to resort to underhanded devices to become affianced to Occidental women; but, on the eve of their return home, either forsake their foreign wives and progeny or take them to Japan to live on a poor income and to occupy an anomalous position in society. Such unions, he finds, are unhappy. He does not half so much mind Europeans marrying Jap women; but a white female tied down to a yellow man is too dreadful a thing for him to contemplate. The Nipponese, according to the author, are just as deficient in their commercial honesty as they are in moral virtues. As to

A page (reduced) from the Merry Wives of Windsor
(Chatto & Windus).

From Fine Books
(Methuen).

Engraving of Christ in a mandorla from Bettini's Monte Santo di Dio. Florence, Nicolaus Laurentii, 1477. (Reduced).

newspapers in Japan, we learn that "a large section of the Japanese Press . . . is certainly unfit for the perusal of any decent-minded individual," that "some newspapers even go to the length of organising a regular system of espionage in connection with the movements of public men," and even prominent foreigners; that "not a few of the lower organs of publicity resort to blackmail"; that "the law of libel is to all intents and purposes a dead letter"; and that "it is next to impossible to obtain from the columns of Japanese newspapers any real indication of public opinion in connection with foreign affairs." The Nipponese Government, Mr. Lawton tells us, views the world through glasses which hide everything but its own selfish interests. Its conduct in respect of the "open door" in Manchuria has been most perfidious, and English commercial interests in that part of the Far East suffer more now than they did during the Russian régime. Its conduct in Korea has been atrocious. To be sure, he acknowledges, it has built railways and roads, telegraphs and telephones, and other signs of material progress in Formosa, but, he points out, it is unable to advance its charges along moral lines, the Japanese themselves being too deficient in that respect to be able to help others.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

Mr. Lawton wishes us to remember that those Western nations—Americans, Canadians, and Australians, for instance—who have come in contact with large numbers of Nipponese, entertain such a poor opinion of them that they will have none of their cheap labourer-immigrants—a matter which is giving birth to vexatious problems, which may lead Americans, Canadians, and Australians into war with the Oriental Isle, in which eventuality Britain's position obviously will be embarrassing. Mr. Lawton believes that such a contingency will be likely to lead Great Britain, America, and Russia into one another's arms in order to teach manners to the Eastern upstart.

From The Field-Flowers' Lore THE MORNING STAR.
(Elkin Mathews).

Curious to say, the author displays a high regard for the Chinese, whose character he admires in general, but about whose governmental innovations he wisely does not set himself up as an omniscient prophet. He also has unbounded praise for Russia, which he considers to be a great Asiatic power, destined to become still greater, and designed by Providence to carry Occidental culture to the barbarians of the East.

S. N. S.

PORCHES AND FONTS.

By J. CHARLES WALL. 10s. 6d net (Wells Gardner, Darton & Co.)

The author says that many people would regard the subjects which furnish the title of this book as two separate entities; but his purpose is to insist that the objects are related to one another, and both are doors; the porch, the approach to the material fabric; the font, the entrance into the spiritual life of the Church. He has given us, therefore, a book about the Gates of the Church, and a book upon such a theme should be beautiful. We venture to think it is marred if a tone of acrimony be adopted; and if an author scolds too much he may limit the appeal of his book. In this case it would be a pity, for though the author is primarily concerned with liturgical observance, yet in writing a history of the fonts and porches of the English countryside he has become enrolled among those faithful servants of Art and of History to whose labours we owe a debt of gratitude inadequately and too seldom acknowledged. They care for the monuments of olden days, and rescue the relics of the past from decay and degradation. The illustrations of the book are charming, representative examples being brought together of beautiful old fonts and the porches still existing in our parish churches.

THE LOVES OF GREAT COMPOSERS.

By GUSTAV KOBBE. With 8 Illustrations in Colour.
5s net. (Harrap.)

Mr. Kobbé's composers include Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, and Wagner; and to the principal love affair of each he devotes a pleasing chapter, for the materials of which he has had recourse to the best authorities. The author has a special knowledge of musical subjects, and a pleasant style, which appears to particular advantage in the present volume. Pleasantly produced and very prettily illustrated, it should be in much demand as a Christmas gift.

From Shakespeare, Bacon, and the Great Unknown (Longmans).

SHAKESPEARE MEMORIAL.

A SHORT CRITICAL HISTORY OF ARCHITECTURE.

By H. HEATHCOTE STATHAM. 10s. 6d. net. (Batsford.)

It is possible that enthusiasts, in the evolution of Art (for instance), may consider Mr. Heathcote Statham has a somewhat breezy way of dealing with a good many theories. If he sets out to deny that the Doric style was derived from an original wooden construction he will make nothing even of the rock cut tombs of Lycia, but says, "The wooden origin

From A Short Critical History
of Architecture
(Batsford).

SANCTUARY AND SOUTH-EAST
EXEDRA, HAGIA SOPHIA, FROM THE NORTH AISLE.

From a drawing by Mr. A. E. Henderson.

of the Doric entablature is only a conjecture with no real evidence to support it"; and disposes of the theory. But we think an appreciative public probably awaits Mr. Heathcote Statham and one unlikely to be captious. Perhaps it is due to the University extension movement that we find so many people nowadays devoting leisure to a pleasant interest in the history of Art. At all events among educated persons there is a growing interest in Architecture, and we can foretell a good reception for the book. That it is a good book goes without telling, indeed, for it is written by a master who yet does not disdain to take pains to be very clear and very simple. Even the chronological appendices with which the book is furnished have been contrived to aid the memory, and they will be eagerly consulted by students who will all be grateful for them.

GREAT BUILDINGS AND HOW TO ENJOY THEM: BYZANTINE ARCHITECTURE.

By EDITH A. BROWNE. (Adam & Charles Black.)

The idea of this series is excellent. The glossary of architectural terms is illustrated, and the volume contains

From At Prior Park
(Chatto & Windus)

PRIOR PARK: GARDEN FRONT
(from a photograph).

Reviewed by Francis Bickley in this Number of THE BOOKMAN.

an album of photographs. All this makes for clearness and is precisely what the amateur needs. But there is some falling off in the text, where with an affectation of simplicity rather too elaborate, the author says she is about to explain things, and gives an explanation that is at times hardly satisfactory. It would be very difficult to understand from this text what the "pendentives" were and how the dome was constructed.

Photographs of Byzantine architecture are necessarily beautiful. One of the Golden Gate has a note appended of particular interest at the present time. The Turks have blocked it up for precautionary reasons; there is a tradition that through this gate a Christian conqueror of Turkey will some day enter Constantinople.

POEMS OF PASSION.

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX. Inscribed and Illuminated by F. Sangorski and G. Sutcliffe. With Frontispiece in Colour. 6s. net and 7s. 6d. net. (Siegle, Hill.)

Miss Wilcox is one of the most popular, if not the most popular, of the world's living poets, and new editions of her favourite works follow one another with almost bewildering rapidity.

Among these books, however, Messrs. Siegle, Hill's two renderings of "Poems of Pleasure" and "Poems of Passion" must take a very high place. These two editions are printed in a beautiful script, specially designed for them by Messrs. Sangorski and Sutcliffe, and compelling the use of a liberal amount of colour. The "Poems of Pleasure" and "Poems of Passion" contain some of the best and most poignantly human of Mrs. Wilcox's verses. Nobody can possibly desire anything more dainty or more artistic than these beautiful volumes.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

TWELVE MOONS.

By FRANCES A. BARDSWELL. Frontispiece in Colour by Isabelle Forrest. 2s. 6d. net. (Elkin Mathews.)

In twelve thoughtful and very gracefully written little essays Miss Bardswell describes the varied pageantry of the passing year. She takes you through the months, from January to December, picturing with light, deft touches and a sure knowledge of the natural life of the fields, the woods, the hedgerow, the characteristic beauty of each of them. The snows and frosts of the white winter, the singing ecstasies of spring, the glories of the summer, and the lovely sadness of autumn, she sketches them each in turn, and the nice gradations of each with a sensitive feeling for the wonder of them all and a delicate art in the fashioning of her phrases. Above all she is a lover of the flowers, and something of their loveliness and their fragrance seems to enter into her words when she writes of them. Those who have read Miss Bardswell's delightful books about gardens and gardening will know how closely she has studied the little people of the garden, and will need no better recommendation of this pleasant new book of hers than the sight of her name on its title page

AN ANTHOLOGY OF BABYHOOD.

Edited by MURIEL NELSON D'AUVERGNE Illustrated with Drawings by T J and E A Overnell 3s 6d. net.
(Hutchinson.)

A very charming little book is this, very daintily produced. Mrs. d'Auvergne has cast a wide net through the centuries and gathered in a delightful and representative selection of the finest, loveliest things that have been said and sung about children from the days of Robert Greene, whose "Weep not, my wanton," must needs have its place in every such anthology, down to our own time, strictly limiting her choice to prose extracts and poems applicable to babies of not more than four years old. Shakespeare, Vaughan, Wither, Crashaw, Blake, Wordsworth, Coleridge.

From Porches and Fonts
(Wells Gardner).

SOUTH-EAST PORCH, LINCOLN CATHEDRAL

Frontispiece to Twelve Moons
(Elkin Mathews).

Scott, Tennyson, Swinburne, and many another of the past are laid under contribution, and among living authors represented are Edmund Gosse, Watts-Dunton, G. K. Chesterton, Mrs. Meynell, E. Nesbit, Norman Gale, Coulson Kernahan, Katharine Tynan, Mrs. Sigerson Shorter, Ford Madox Hueffer, J. M. Barrie; and one must add a word of special praise for the eight or nine graceful and fanciful original poems and translations by the editor herself. It is not a book for children, but for the lover of children, and to all such it will prove an attractive and wholly acceptable Christmas gift.

JEWISH LEGENDS OF THE MIDDLE AGES

Translated by Claud Field 2s 6d (Robert Scott)

The short stories comprising this volume are narrated in a concise and interesting manner. Though the book consists of Jewish legends, it should be of interest to Gentile readers, as affording some insight into Jewish character. Some of the principal traits here depicted are superstition, as illustrated by the story of the bridegroom, fortitude, as displayed by the prisoner of the inquisition, and the Jews at the Massacre of Prague, and faith in God, as shown by the "poor but honest and pious Jew" in the story of "The Ape and the Gold Pieces." Very few Jewish expressions are used, and these are explained. The book is suitable for children, but its circulation should by no means be limited to them, and it should prove an acceptable Christmas gift. Each story enfolds a moral. The words spoken to the avaricious Mohel in the story of the "Kamzan" may perhaps be quoted here: "If God's key is not made use of, He delivers it over to us."

and then the man is not himself master of his money, nor of his coffer. He can put in, but cannot take out; and at last his own soul is locked up therein." The volume is quaintly and plentifully illustrated by Miss May Mulliner.

RANDOLPH CALDECOTT'S SKETCHES.

With Introductions by Henry Blackburn and Harold Armitage. 3s. 6d net. (Sampson Low.)

Randolph Caldecott, says Mr. Harold Armitage, "is no more likely to be forgotten than Keene or Cruikshank. . . . It will be noticed that though his drawing is not so exiguous as that of a later artist, Phil May, yet he had the power to attain his ends without tiresome over-elaboration and without needless multiplicity of lines. For more than twenty years these sketches have amused our fathers, some of our grandfathers, and our own generation, and there can be no doubt now that amongst our children they will make many new friends for Randolph Caldecott." We very cordially agree with Mr. Armitage's opinion, and we welcome—having no doubt that the public will do the same—this new edition of a charming little book first published in 1889. As a combination of art and humour it is irresistible.

MARCANTONIO AND ITALIAN ENGRAVERS AND ETCHERS OF THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

Edited by Arthur M Hind. 2s. 6d net (Heinemann)

There is none of the cheaper series of art-books which appeals to the connoisseur more deservedly than the Great Engravers series, to which a volume of Marcantonio's work has now been added. Marcantonio is by no means one of the most popular of engravers; many art-lovers to whom Durer and Hogarth are enthusiasms remain cold in the presence of the work of the Italian

From Byzantine Churches in Constantinople (Macmillan).

S. ANDREW IN KRISEI, EAST END.
From a photograph by A. E. Henderson, Esq.

From Early Christian and Byzantine Architecture
(Black).

STA. SOPHIA: EXTERIOR, CONSTANTINOPLE.
Sébah ana Joaillier.

master. Still, he was a master—the greatest master of engraving in Renaissance Italy. Brought under the influence of Raphael in Rome, he worked largely from Raphael's designs. Not that he generally reproduced Raphael's finished work, but that 'he must somehow have obtained many of the master's preparatory studies and elaborated them with a setting of his own invention.' It is his virtues as a craftsman rather than as an original genius that interest us most to-day. Besides Marcantonio, several other line-engravers working largely under his influence are represented here. There are also four of the

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Life in the West of Ireland.
(Mau:ssel).

THE JUNE FAIR.

etchings of the charming painter-etcher, Parmigiano, and Meddolla's etching, "Moses and the Burning Bush." Publisher and editor alike are to be congratulated on the progress of this beautiful and reasonably-priced series.

ESSAYS IN CRITICISM.

"Studies and Appreciations." By DARRELL FIGGIS.
5s. net. (Dent.)

The notable thing about Mr. Figgis's essays is that they are purely critical. Their subject is not a poet but his poetry, not a dramatist but his plays. They do not deal in gossip, however entertaining. In consequence, though for this reason they are always stimulating, they seem sometimes limited and sometimes perverse. Mr. Figgis perceives this objection, and meets it in his introductory "After Thoughts." Many of the essays were occasional, centenary notices and the like, done within a limited space, having in mind some or other definite end that was to be served. It is, as he says, an unfortunate limitation of speech that a man can only say one thing at a time. It is also the case that he does not always select the one thing to say which on ampler consideration would seem to him most worth saying. There is nothing perverse in this, but only enthusiasm in the pursuit of the moment. And it is this enthusiasm that gives these essays their vitality, and also, be it added, their air of great confidence. We do not expect diffidence in a volume dedicated to Mr. Chesterton.

The essay on Browning is typical. Written as a centenary paper, it does not attempt to sum up the poet's "message." Mr. Figgis, one fancies, would not shrink from the word, or from the elucidation of the thing it stands for, did they happen to attract him. But what does interest him, and was certain to interest him most, is not Browning's message, but his method of delivering himself of it. And this not because he separates the two and selects one as being more essential. His pronouncement on that point is as clear as it can be made, in the essay on Mr. W. B. Yeats's poetry. Mr. Yeats understands, he says, "that the peculiar thing he has to deliver has its own peculiar manner. More than this, it is not itself until it has found its own peculiar manner, for the matter and the manner are so indissolubly married in all Art that the matter becomes the manner, and the manner is the matter." This could not be better said, and the reader will understand what he is to expect in the essay—probably the best of the bunch—from which we have quoted. As with the younger poet, so with the elder; and Mr. Figgis sets himself to discover the peculiarity of the manner in which Browning found the predestined medium through and in which his "peculiar thing" became itself. Incidentally he was led to the quest by the consideration of the difficulties met with in reading Browning. The greatest of them was "having to enter into so many different characters with apparently so small a purpose." And this led the inquirer to realise that the poet seemed ever to need some other personality whom he may fashion to sing for him. "He seems never to be able to get at grips with Reality till he is able to approach it in the guise of another's soul." Hence—passing over the associate question of how far Browning is and is not dramatic—his use of the dialogue which in time passed into his "peculiar manner" of monologue.

Frontispiece to An Anthology of Babyhood
(Hutchinson).

This endeavour to reach what is usually spoken of as the poet's or the artist's point of view by means of what we may call the set of his manner is apparent throughout this volume, and constitutes, as has been said, its vital interest. It is engaged on the work of J. M. Synge, Mr. William Watson, Mr. W. H. Davies, Mr. Herbert Trench, Mr. Robert Bridges, George Meredith, Samuel Butler, Dickens and Thackeray, as well as that of Mr. Yeats and Browning already referred to. Only in the case of Thackeray—"The failure of Thackeray" is the title of this essay—does the attempt to perceive the particular quality of the artistic effort seem prejudiced. With Mr. Figgis's recognition of Dickens's peculiar manner in the grotesque and fantastical as the medium of revelation and illumination one can heartily agree. It would be equally possible, surely, to find such a medium in Thackeray's prolixity and diffuseness—and, indeed, Mr. Chesterton has done so admirably. But this peculiar manner of Thackeray is fastened on here for condemnation, not for understanding. It is only this reversal of the customary process—followed in the Dickens paper, for example—that one can complain of, although, of course, this way of approaching Thackeray's pages inevitably prejudices the effect that emerges from between the lines in them. To say of Thackeray that "he cannot deny himself the impulsion to loveliness and beauty, but it suffuses him with blushes, and so he endeavours to turn it to burlesque," is good criticism, and Mr. Figgis's method elsewhere would have been directed by the wish to discover the quality of the artistic attempt resulting from that fact. To add, instead, "Had he only possessed the god-like faculty of absolute abandon, there is no telling what

From Jewish Legends of the Middle Ages
(Robert Scott).

"HARK! A BIRD BEGAN TO SING SO SWEETLY."

From Randolph Caldecott's Sketches
(Sampson Low).

WANDERING MINSTRELS.— CHÂTEAUNEUF DU FAOU.

he might not have achieved" is to express the quite legitimate but entirely different wish that Thackeray had not been Thackeray.

In addition to the essays referred to there is one entitled "Falstaff's Nose." Here Mr. Figgis condemns, with one's hearty approval, Warburton's alteration of "being good kissing carrion" to "being a god kissing carrion." Then he passes on to the "for his Nose was as sharp as a Pen and a Table of greene fields," of the first folio, and the emendation, generally and generously approved, "for his nose was as sharpe as a pen, and a babled of green fields." We cannot summarize the "accumulated argument," from Shakespeare's attendance at the Lord High Steward's Board, and his habit of heraldic speech, by which Mr. Figgis reaches the ingenious reading of a nose "as sharp as a pen on a table of green fields." Very ingenious it is, and only, or nearly, a "d" of difference. But we cannot help asking what Mr. Figgis would say did we suggest one more little change, and the reading "on a table of Green Cloth!"

D. S. M.

THE VOICE OF THE GARDEN.

Compiled by LUCY LEFFINGWELL CABLE
Bibli. With a Preface by GEORGE W. CABLE.
3s. 6d. net. (John Lane)

"Between garden and verse," writes Mr. George Cable in a charming preface to this very dainty anthology, "there is so close a kinship that the rules of art for either are adequate for the other. Poetic verse is the gardening of thought. Gardening is the versification of Nature's poetry." He goes on presently to tell us that the poems in this book might never have been gathered into one company "had not its collector been brought up in a garden, a story-teller's garden"—the story-teller being, of course, Mr. Cable himself, and the collector of these verses, his daughter. In the matter of choice, the volume covers a wide range; Mrs. Bickle has selected her flowers of poetry with a fine and delicate taste, and has arranged them admirably. Poets of the past and present, of England and America, are all placed under contribution, and from the delightful little opening poem of T. E. Brown's "A garden is a lovesome thing, God wot!

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Marcantonio (Great Engravers series) (Heinemann).

MARCANTONIO RAIMONDI. ST. CECILIA. B. 116. After a study by Raphael for the picture in Bologna.

Rose plot,
Fringed pool,
Fern'd grot—
The veriest school
Of peace; and yet the fool
Contends that God is not—
Not God!—in gardens—when the eve is cool?
Nay, but I have a sign;
'Tis very sure God walks in mine"

to the closing passage in prose—Jago's musing of "Our bodies are our gardens"—there is nothing one is not glad to have included. We have seen other garden anthologies but none that has been so complete, certainly none that has given us more enjoyment than we have had from this. In its dainty and very artistically designed blue and gold cover this makes one of the best and best-looking of gift-books.

POEMS AND DRAMAS OF GEORGE CABOT LODGE.

2 vols. 10s. net. (Heinemann.)

This handsome collected edition of the plays and poems of George Cabot Lodge should win a public among English readers for a poet who has for some years past enjoyed a considerable vogue in America. He died recently, in the full vigor of his powers, and in a sympathetic preface to these volumes ex-President Roosevelt bears testimony to the loftiness of his ideals and the beauty of his character, and says "of all the men with whom I have been intimately thrown, he was the man to whom I would apply the rare name of genius." Mr. Lodge's poems are thoughtful and scholarly; he had a graceful fancy, a strong imaginative gift, and no little dramatic power. A note of sadness runs through much of his verse; it has rare moments of poignant pathos, but its characteristic note is of reflection and description, such as make the first of his two verses on "Evening":

"The strangled breath
Of life and death
Falls to a lost complaint and dies.
And softer than sleep a tawny light
Furrows with fire the dawn of night
As the moon swells soft o'er the ocean's white
Like love through the desert centuries"

A MISCELLANY OF MEN.

By G. K. CHESTERTON 5s. (Methuen)

It is so easy to accuse Mr. Chesterton of freakishness, of too great a fondness for paradox, of delighting to stand on his head and all the while insisting that he is right side up and firmly planted on his feet. Of course he is given to those tricks; we all know that, and there is no use in denying it; but it is the merest folly to say those things about him as if they were all there was to be said. There is always a lesson of sound sense in his most fantastic sayings, his paradoxes are usually the result of a too meticulously logical way of thinking; and if he stands on his head

From Songs of Innocence

"TIGER, TIGER, BURNING BRIGHT."

he has a good reason for doing so—a symbolical meaning of some sort at the back of his burlesque behaviour, and when he turns over and brings his head up into its right position again, with a serious, wonderfully illuminating word or two he will justify what had seemed his folly and give it a depth of meaning that dignifies and at times almost sanctifies it.

If you have read "The Napoleon of Notting Hill" or "Manalive" you will not dispute this with me. Nobody, not even his warmest admirer, would insist that Mr. Chesterton is always at his best, or even that he is not sometimes quite far away from it; but what then? His inspiration comes and goes like the tides and the seasons, occasionally, but not often, he sings without his singing robes; but he never writes anything that is not worth reading—never anything that is not redeemed by some touch of brilliancy in thought or expression, and for the most part he gives us some of the most sententious, fanciful, imaginative prose that is nowadays being written.

He writes too much; nearly everybody does in these days; but the surprising thing is that he turns out essays week after week all the year through, and, though their merit varies, their general level is surprisingly high and their freshness is unfailing. "A Miscellany of Men" contains a selection of some three dozen essays, mainly chosen from amongst those that Mr. Chesterton has been contributing weekly to the Daily News for—how many years past is it? They are all more or less written in those moods of easy and robust gaiety, of alternating fantasy and high seriousness, that we have come to recognize as characteristic of him. He has the secret of saying the wisest things with a burst of laughter;

From Symbol and Satire in the French Revolution
(Putnam's).

AN EXAGGERATED REPRESENTATION OF WHAT TOOK PLACE IN THE TUILERIES ON THE "DAY OF DAGGERS," FEBRUARY 28, 1791.

his sense of the ridiculous is too keen ever to allow him to degenerate into pomposity; he looks out over all life with unobtrusive sympathy, and says the truest, deepest things about it in the good language of common speech.

"Whenever you hear much," he writes here in "The Mystagogue," "of things being unutterable and undefinable, and impalpable and unreasonable, and subtly indescribable, then elevate your aristocratic nose towards heaven and snuff up the smell of decay. It is perfectly true that there is something in all good things that is beyond all speech or figure of speech. But it is also true that there is in all good things a perpetual desire for expression and concrete embodiment; and though the attempt to embody it is always inadequate, the attempt is always made. If the

From Sensations of Paris

THE SEINE BANKS, WITH NOTRE DAME IN THE DISTANCE, AND ANGLERS.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

Idea does not seek to be the word, the chances are that it is an evil idea. If the word is not made flesh it is a bad word." And from this beginning he passes to a shrewd criticism of the Cubists and Post Impressionists who "do not attempt to translate beauty into language ; they merely tell you it is untranslatable—that is, unutterable, undefinable, indescribable, ineffable, and all the rest of it. . . . If the art critics can say nothing about the artists, except that they are good, it is because the artists are bad. They can explain nothing because they have found nothing ; and they have found nothing because there is nothing to be found "

Nearly all the essays in the book, in this way, find their text in some topic of the hour, and there is so much in them of insight and spiritual interpretation and tolerant philosophy that it is safe to say they will preserve those topics, as in rich amber, long after some of them would otherwise have been forgotten as well as dead. What need is there to say more in recommending this book ? It gives us a miscellany of Mr. Chesterton's thoughts, fancies, humour, philosophy, and is one of the wittiest, wisest, and most enjoyable of recent volumes of essays.

DIGRESSIONS.

Being passages from the Works of E. Temple Thurston. Collected and arranged by Bellwattle. 3s 6d net. (Chapman & Hall.)

Possibly Mr. Temple Thurston will be a little surprised himself when he reads through this compilation and finds how many good things he has said on a variety of subjects. His digressions are conveniently arranged under such headings as " Women," " Men," " Romance," " Music," " Art," " Religion," " Life," " Prayer," " Ideals," " Human Nature," " Dogs," " Poverty," " London," " Time," and a score or so of others. And here are a few examples of his sayings and epigrams chosen at random :

"What a woman expects of a man goes to his credit if he brings fulfilment, but she counts it against him if he fails "

"The first realisation in a woman of her failure to attract is the beginning of every woman's tragedy."

"Dignity may often come before humanity with a woman, but pity will always outride the two "

"Few women can draw a straight line. None can argue in it "

"There is nothing in life quite to equal it, that song and flight of the lark ; nothing quite so magnificent in its simplicity. If the grandeur of monarchy were as simple as this there would be no need of revolution ; if the simplicity of republics could ever be so grand, there would be no need of kings "

"We could all afford to be generous some time or another. The pity of it is that not all of us realise it until it is too late "

"You have only to go into the Black Country to know what can be done with a wonderful world when God delivers it into the hand of man "

"Everyone is good at keeping secrets, but you must ask them first. They never know how good they are until they are waiting for a secret to be told "

"Success and civilisation—these are the two subtle poisons from the effects of which we are all suffering. Nothing fails like success ! Nothing degrades us like civilisation ! "

"The price of freedom in a free country is beyond the reach of most pockets."

"Life is not the dreadful thing ; it is the living of it "

"There is always a balance at the poor man's bank, and the greater his pride the bigger the balance "

"The tragedy of life is indecision. They bury suicides at the cross-roads, for that is where lurks all tragedy—the indecision of which way to choose "

"And yet these simple things are life. A face peering from a window, a hand trembling at a touch, a sudden laugh, a sudden silence, they all may hide the greatest history, if one had but the eyes to read "

"Money has no value in Romance. There are coins of the realm, it is true, but once you begin to count them—puff ! out goes Romance like the flame of a candle. You will find yourself in the dark with the counter and the till between you and the only thing in the world that matters "

*Volumes of The Home University Library
(Williams & Norgate).*

*Volumes of The Home University Library
(Williams & Norgate).*

THE BOOKMAN
CHRISTMAS SUPPLEMENT
TRAVEL AND SPORT

From The Land that is Desolate
(Smith, Elder).

THE DOME OF THE ROCK.

TRAVEL AND SPORT.

All the six continents are represented in these eight books while the two largest namely Asia and Africa, have each of them an extra volume to their credit. Of course this is a mere coincidence but it serves to show what a wide interest is taken nowadays in every corner of the earth and how strong is the fever of travel and sport. These books before us vary not only very greatly in subject but in excellence but all have in common a desire to enlighten the reader about phases of life altogether foreign to his experience. Let us examine them one by one.

1. The Adventures of an Elephant Hunter by James Sutherland. For sheer excitement Mr Sutherland's book is not only the pick of the eight but in all probability of any other eight you could get together. He has been an elephant

1. The Adventures of an Elephant Hunter. By James Sutherland. Illustrated. 7s 6d net. (Macmillan.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Camp Fire Tales
(Nelson).

"THE BUCK PLUNGED INTO THE ABYSS BELOW."

hunter in Portuguese and German East Africa for the last ten years. "During these ten years" (to use his own words) "I have shot 447 bull elephants (I do not count females), thereby creating a world's record." We should think so, indeed! His book is one long series of blood-curdling encounters, which prove that Mr. Sutherland possesses a wonderful nerve, presence of mind, and (one must really add) luck. For on several occasions he has actually had personal encounters with elephants from which it seemed impossible for him to emerge alive. And yet he not only lives, but lives in perfect health and contentment. It is strange to find so mighty a hunter writing with real passion of the splendour and mystery of night in the tropical forest, and yet that is what Mr. Sutherland does. He is evidently a poet at heart, though his business is the business of slaughter. One cannot help regretting these 447 bull elephants (not to mention the females), especially when one sees the photographs of the dead bodies of a good many of them that strew these pages. But no qualms seem to pass over Mr. Sutherland's mind. In fact, he thinks the preservation of big game in Africa in danger of being carried too far—and then there is the ivory! At any rate, approve or not, one must admit that he has written an absorbing book.

² "British Somaliland," by R. E. Drake-Brockman. Mr. Drake-Brockman is a doctor in the Government service of British Somaliland and, as he has been out there since 1902, his book is full of authentic information about the colony, and is a really valuable guide on such subjects as fauna and flora, commercial products, ethnology, and so on. The illustrations are photographs of exceptional interest, and the appendix tables are the work of an expert. The author begins his book with an historical account of the country, leading up to the British administration and the trouble with the "Mad" Mullah—who still seems to have it pretty well his own way. How little known is this outpost of the Empire! It is a country of about 58,000 square miles, but its population cannot be much over a quarter of a million. Much of the land is desert, and the heat on the coast is tremendous. Altogether it cannot be called "a white man's country."

³ "Trails, Trappers, and Tenderfeet in Western Canada," by Stanley Washburn. Mr. Washburn belongs to that increasing

From The Childhood of Animals
(Heinemann).

BLACK-NECKED SWAN CARRYING CYGNETS ON HER BACK.

army of adventurous men who listen to "the call of the wild." Year after year he has set out with the arrival of summer to pierce into the untrodden fastnesses of the silent West. He has suffered innumerable hardships, been half-starved, been lost, been frozen, but all these things only seem to add to the deep fascination of the trail. His book breathes an unconquerable love of wandering and adventure. It is not great literature at all, but there is something great in the spirit in which it is written. One feels that the author actually has a kind of epic sense of romance which is far above anything that he could describe in language.

⁴ "In Jesuit Land," by W. H. Koebel. Mr. Koebel has added to all his other books on South America an account of the Jesuit rule of Paraguay, that curious and successful experiment which lasted unbroken from

¹ "British Somaliland." By R. E. Drake-Brockman. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net. (Hurst and Blackett.)

² "Trails, Trappers and Tenderfeet in Western Canada." By Stanley Washburn. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net. (Melrose.)

³ "In Jesuit Land." By W. H. Koebel. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net. (Stanley Paul.)

From Babes of the Wild
(Cassell).

"GRIPPING THE REPTILE IN INEXORABLE TALONS
JUST BEHIND ITS HEAD, THE GREAT BIRD BIT ITS BACKBONE THROUGH."

1586-1767, a period of nearly 200 years. He has been so fortunate as to get an introduction from the pen of Mr. Cunningham Graham, and his own work abounds in fascinating glimpses of the long, romantic past of Paraguay. Mr. Koebel has come to the conclusion that there was much in the Jesuits' rule worthy of high praise, and certainly it would appear that the state of the native Indians speedily deteriorated after the expulsion of the Fathers. For it is true, undoubtedly, that they were, in many ways, a most self-sacrificing body of men, preventing, as far as they could, the exploitation of the Indians by the civilian Spaniards. Of course, their government fostered gross narrow-mindedness on religious questions, but, apart from their Catholic intolerance, they seem to have acted with justice and to have improved the state of the Indians. It is, altogether, a strange chapter of history.

⁵ "Alpine Studies," by W. A. B. Coolidge. Says the author in his preface: "In the following pages I give a selection of twenty of the very numerous articles relating to the Alps which I have written during the past forty-two years." These twenty papers will be eagerly read by all Alpine climbers, to whom Mr. Coolidge's name has for long been familiar. Although of real interest, also, to the general reader, they bear all over them the stamp of the trained climber, and they are full of details that are almost technical. This adds to their real value, though it may be rather chilling to the casual enquirer. It is what might be called a truly learned book which half-succeeds in hiding its learning. Some of the photographs of the snowy Alps reproduced in its pages are very impressive. It is, in short, obviously a book by a man who understands his subject.

⁶ "Sport and Pastime in Australia," by Gordon Inglis. Mr. Inglis' handsomely produced volume need not detain us long. In twenty-one chapters

⁵ "Alpine Studies." By W. A. B. Coolidge. Illustrated. 7s 6d net (Longmans.)

⁶ "Sport and Pastime in Australia." By Gordon Inglis. Illustrated. 7s 6d net (Methuen.)

From On Nature's Trail
(Nisbet)

"THE END CAME WHEN THE PINE-MARTEN GAVE A YELL AND CRASHED DOWN THROUGH THE BRANCHES HEAD FIRST."

From Wild Sport and Some Stories
(Blackwood).

"IMHAIRI THE TRACKER" AND THE 25-ST. STAG.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Italian Travel Sketches
(Constable)

Reviewed in the October BOOKMAN

SAN GIOVANNI DEGLI EREMITI, PALERMO.

he discusses the various sports and pastimes of Australia, and by the help of copious photographs he tries to make us realise what the life of the sportsman is like in that island-continent. The most interesting chapters to the ordinary, as apart from the sporting, reader will probably be those in which he describes the wild duck shooting and the trout fishing in the solitary country spots. It is not many people to whom the statistics of cricket, racing, and so forth, are of absorbing importance. This is, in fact, a book for the universal sportsman, and for him alone.

7 "Picturesque Nepal," by Percy Brown. The narrow valley of Nepal, with its wonderful temples, old towns, and works of art, is the subject of this book. And it is, indeed a fascinating subject. Mr. Brown crowds his volume with a magnificent series of photographs, which give, far more eloquently than any words could, an idea of the richness and the beauty of Nepalese art and of Nepal itself. Although it is a country 450 miles long by 150 miles wide, still the actual valley, in which is all the activity of the State, is only about the size of the Isle of Wight—20 miles long by 15 miles wide. Behind this valley rises the vast range of the Himalayas, of which Mr. Brown gives one thrilling photograph. In this little valley, then, is concentrated practically all the life of Nepal, and especially in its three principal towns, Patan, Bhatgaon, Katmandu. The race is of two origins: the Newars, who are the artistic element, and the Gurkhas, who are the fighters. Apart from the English Resident, Nepal conducts its own affairs and is an Independent State. In the modern rush for "improvements" it is, according to Mr. Brown, fast losing much of its old-world charm. What a cynical intonation sounds in the word "improvement" sometimes!

7 "Picture-que Nepal." By Percy Brown. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net. (A. & C. Black.)

8 "Snapshots in India," by J. W. Burton. This is the work of a missionary of Fiji who, with his fellow-missionary, took his furlough in Ceylon and India, and has industriously turned it to account in this sparkling little book. One could, no doubt, have spared the author's constant moralizing on the Christian religion (which is really quite out of place in a travel book), but still, in the circumstances, it is easily accounted for. Apart from this, Mr. Burton has an energetic and engaging way of recounting his experiences, and an infectious degree of good spirits which carries all before it. Pleasant and well-taken photographs (most of them by the author) are scattered throughout his work.

So we have finished a review of these eight very diverse books. The reviewer, at any rate, knows more of the world now than he did before he took them up. How many of his readers will follow his example?

R. C.

ON THE HIGH SEAS.

Year after year for some time past we have been offered, usually in the spring, at about fitting-out time, books on yachting—from the deepest of technicalities to the amusing records of cruises, alike for the amateur and for the professional. But in all that have come my way—not a few, by any means—the point of view was limited, purposely, because each book (the technical, that is) was aimed at the explanation of a certain set of problems

8 "Snapshots in India." By J. W. Burton. Illustrated. 5s. net. (Elliot Stock.)

From Snapshots in India (Elliot Stock).

INLAID WORK UPON MARBLE.

of one sort or another. Here, however, Mr. Heckstall-Smith and Capt. E. du Boulay have combined in the production of a big volume¹ that shall be the vade mecum and the epitome, the be-all and end-all to all the "gentlemen sailors" around our coasts; and, as their numbers are legions in the summer months, the book should have a signal success. Of the authors it is enough to say (in the ear of the poor, circumscribed landsmen only, of course) while the one is secretary to the International Yacht Racing Union, the other is one of the best known authorities on marine motoring—a certainly thrilling yet as certainly the least picturesque of all water pastimes. Above all the book is for the practical yachtsman, and mainly for the man who carries a crew beyond the handy young man who can steer, reef, and do a little rough cooking—very rough sometimes. Still, the authors have included a considerable amount of information for the beginner, from the sailing of a dingy, to the rigging and management of a cutter, and even building one. The diagrams of handling a craft, of knotting, splicing, etc., are unusually clear and helpful to the novice. Altogether there is so little missing from the book, which is excellently written withal, that it must soon be known as a "consultine on everything—yachting" everything except those little importances which cannot be gained other than by experience.

In Mr. Chatterton we have a yachtsman writer of a different class—not that he claims no attention as a technician on his favourite pastime. His output is various, and reaches a high level of achievement. In the present instance² I think that he could have done more that retell us what we know, if he had taken the pains of going

¹ "The Complete Yachtsman." By B. Heckstall-Smith, and Captain E. du Boulay. With 200 Illustrations in the Text and 24 Plates. 15s. net. (Methuen.)

² "King's Cutters and Smugglers, 1700-1855." By E. Keble Chatterton. With 33 Illustrations and Frontispiece in Colours. 7s. 6d. net. (George Allen.)

From Moscow
(Black).

THE CHURCH OF ST. BASIL IN THE PLACE
ROUGE ON CHRISTMAS EVE.

further, or of adopting a different method. Which is not to say, that the book will prove other than interesting to those who have read nothing of the true story of smuggling. On the contrary, it requires no stretch of imagination to see them absorbed in Mr. Chatterton's record—unfinished and disjointed though it appears, to me, to be. Nay, let me be honest—it will break no pates and maybe avoid misunderstandings, those semi-tragical nothings out of which come so many of the world's troubles. The author has, no doubt, done his work excellently well, within his limits, but I am disappointed with it not so much because of its limitations or the manner of its doing, as because it is not the true book on smuggling, as that unlawful calling was practised on our coasts from the Humber around to Bristol throughout the eighteenth century and thereabouts. During the past few years we have had several books on the subject, including Messrs. Atton & Holland's two handsome volumes on the cause of it all ("The King's Customs,") and with many of the tricks and riots to

From Picturesque Nepal
(Black).

A PICTURESQUE CORNER IN THE HOLY PLACE OF A PASHPATTI.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

which the Customs led ; als)
—the best of the gleanings
so far—Mr. C. G. Harper's
"The Smugglers," with its picturesque and highly fitting illustrations. And this is one point that must not be omitted as to the present contribution to the subject
—the small, pen and ink sketches, such as are reproduced on pp. 72, 202, 211, etc., are a delight ; the reproductions of old prints are interesting. But there are two features for which Mr.
Chatterton's books always deserve high praise—their original illustrations and the manner in which the volumes are turned out generally, and this casts no slur on his own particular share in them.
"King's Cutters and Smugglers" is distinctly good, so far as it goes, and will be read with great enjoyment.

Messrs Seeley & Service are still finding subjects for their Romance series. This volume³ appears to be the twenty-ninth ; and there is apparently no particular reason why the series should not continue to the ninety-ninth—for do but adopt the right manner, the proper presentment of your subject and, as this series shows, romance can be got out of even—well, cow-breeding, to judge by Lord Rayleigh's developments and successes. There is romance in everything, from ploughing a field to building castles in Spain.
Here the subject—that is submarines proper—is a narrow one, but Mr. Corbin has handled it well and succeeds in being both very informing and very interesting. Every boy who is drawn to the romance of the sea will read it with delight.

³ "The Romance of Submarine Engineering" By T. W.
Corbin. With 54 Illustrations and Diagrams is (Seeley, Service & Co.)

From The Adventures of an Elephant-Hunter
(Macmillan).

ELEPHANT SHOT AT BANGALLA.

During these thirty years and more I have more or less read far more books of the sea than can be remembered now ; but if the whole list were put down it would not contain a book like to this one.⁴ Let me be understood, lest I be forthwith dismissed as a heathen—not that I should care, or suffer any harm thereby. I have read religious books, sometimes to my spiritual advantage, but never one in which religion, fiction and the sea were blended in this ratio, nor ever have I seen one before in which the author went reverently and properly to work and told the story of how the sea has entered into Christianity, particularly in the days of its persecution. This is what Mr. Frank Elias has done ; and, benighted creature that I am, seeking for stones with which to build when I probably ought to look for stars on which to dream, I wish him well of his honest effort.

It fully deserves the attention of the "Christian minded" at that time of the year which is at hand.

J. E. P.

MOSCOW.

Painted by F. de Haenen.
Described by H. M. Grove.
7s 6d. net. (A.
& C. Black.)

One hundred years ago

⁴ "Heaven and the Sea : Being
Some Records of the Association between Sea Enterprise and the Faith." By Frank Elias.
3s. 6d. net.
(James Clarke.)

From Sport in Five Continents
(Blackwood)

"MY HUNTER IN THE ROCKIES WITH A GRIZZLY AND THE DOG 'CARABOO.'"

Moscow drew the gaze of all Europe. In 1912 many minds have been engaged in the task of reminiscence and comparison. Mr. Grove, in his graphic little historical sketch, brings the city before our eyes from the days of old Prince Dolgorouky and his wooden fort, the days of 1147, to the present time, when no wooden buildings are allowed, and Moscow has a population of 1,400,000, rapidly increasing, and an area comparable with that of Paris. He adds some interesting impressions, with accounts of the Kremlin, the Treasury, picture galleries, etc., and a chapter on social and other characteristics. There are sixteen beautiful illustrations in colour, the same number in black and white, a good map, and a serviceable index. The volume is one of the most acceptable of Messrs. Black's colour-books, and should be in demand for presentation purposes. The text is well written, and touches upon the most notable phases of the historic city, and the illustrations are excellent, each and all possessing character, atmosphere, and harmony of composition.

From By Flood and Field
(Bell).

DUGONG.
The Black on the right is wearing the Malay Saarong.

SPORT IN FIVE CONTINENTS.

By E. A. LEATHAM. 15s. net. (Blackwood.)

One is inclined to ask what are the five continents of Mr. Leatham's travels. He has shot ibex in the Pyrenees, tiger and gaur in India, lions and rhinoceros in Africa, grizzlies and bighorns in America. So far so good. There are indubitable Europe, Asia, Africa and America. Four continents and not another one, Mr. Leatham. True, he had good sport in New Zealand, but is that pleasant land now a continent? Let it be "sport in five quarters of the globe," and we shall not quarrel with the phrase, though someone will heap scorn upon it and call it a "bull" and speak of Ireland. But apart from this there is no reason to quarrel with the book. It was sport indeed, whether in the Pyrenees or along Chinese rivers or deep in central China, whence the hunter brought back a new variety of tufted deer, or after moose and wapiti and grizzly in North America or in New Zealand, and the writer was by no means wholly absorbed in killing, he had an eye for people and places and customs, and as a result he has stored up for himself a multitude of good memories, and given his fellow sportsmen a book that is a friendly guide and a record of the things they like best. Some of the best pages in the volume give an account of sport in the Rocky Mountains, but wherever Mr. Leatham went the good spirits of sport and adventure awaited him and gave him experiences that make capital reading.

From Wild Sport
(Blackwood).

A 52-LB. SALMON.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Germany
(Black).

UNTER DEN LINDEN, BERLIN.

WILD SPORT AND SOME STORIES.

By GILFRID W. HARTLEY. With 3 Illustrations in Colour, 52 in Half-tone, and 8 Line Drawings in the Text 15s net (Blackwood)

Mr. Hartley has already made a reputation for himself with an earlier volume entitled "Wild Sport with Gun, Rifle, and Salmon Rod," and in the pleasant volume now before us he gives us a further instalment of his sporting reminiscences, together with two stories, for the accuracy of whose facts he vouches. The author, who is an all-round sportsman, who has seen service in various parts of Europe, treats here of subjects so diversified as salmon-fishing in Norway and snipe-shooting in the West of Ireland. He possesses a knack of vigorous and direct narrative which is especially convincing, and we have little doubt that the present volume will prove even more popular than its predecessor.

MONACO AND MONTE CARLO.

By ADOLPHE SMITH. With 8 Colour Plates by Charles Maresco Pearce, and 48 Illustrations from Photographs. 15s net. (Grant Richards)

The principality of Monaco, as Mr. Adolphe Smith points out, divides itself into two sections—the trade, the seriousness, the science of Monaco proper, contrasting strongly with the lightness, the frivolity, and the extravagance of Monte Carlo. Attention has frequently been paid to the latter aspect of the Principality, and as frequently denied to the former. It is the author's aim to balance the two—an aim in which he seems to us to have succeeded, for his account of Monaco is in its way quite as readable as that of Monte Carlo. Mr. Pearce has captured the atmosphere of the Riviera in his very effective coloured illustrations, while for the numerous photographs which are also included in the book we have nothing but praise.

VEILED MYSTERIES OF EGYPT, AND THE RELIGION OF ISLAM.

By S. H. LEEDER. With 38 Illustrations from Photographs. 16s. net. (Nash.)

Mr. S. H. Leeder, of whose "Desert Gateway" we have pleasant remembrances, now follows up his studies of Oriental peoples with a highly unusual and suggestive volume on Egypt. He gives us none of the "impressions" of the ordinary traveller, no lengthy descriptions of quite ordinary customs, no summary treatment of character. Mr. Leeder has spent several years as a resident in Egypt, and he thoroughly understands the inhabitant of that country. His book consists principally in a defence of Islam, more particularly against certain recent aggressions of Christian theologians. It should be understood that the author is not himself a Moslem; he seems to have been driven to write this book by his sense of fair play. We can safely recommend it not only to all travellers in Egypt, but to all who wish properly to understand the real dignity and occasional beauty of the Mahommedan religion. Although, as we have said, there is no summary treatment of character, it goes without saying that a writer of Mr. Leeder's experience and capacity does not discuss the peoples of Egypt without conveying a subtle idea of the peculiar temperament and personality of the average Egyptian. The volume includes a number of effective photographs.

From Monaco and Monte Carlo
(Grant Richards).

EAST VIEW OF THE GARNIER THEATRE: FACING SARAH BERNHARDT'S STATUE OF SONG.

WILD LIFE AND THE CAMERA.

By A. RADCLYFFE DUGMORE, F.R.G.S. With 51 Illustrations from Photographs. 6s. net. (Heinemann.)

If ever you saw Mr. Dugmore's earlier book, "Camera Adventures in the African Wilds," you will be something more than interested to hear that he has written another and has illustrated it too with his own remarkable photographs. "Wild Life and the Camera" is a collection of sketches and stories with North America for their scene. We confess that the book is not so exciting as its predecessor, but in its way, it is no whit less interesting, nor are the photographs with which it is adorned any less effective. Mr. Dugmore's pot-pourri is at once of value to the naturalist, and of interest to the general reader. It deserves to succeed.

CHANCES OF SPORT OF SORTS.

By Colonel T. A. ST. QUINTIN With 58 Illustrations. 16s. net (Blackwood.)

This really is a most remarkable book. It is not literature and it does not pretend to be; it is good talk on sporting subjects from the lips of a gentleman, who, we are sure, would rather be called a good sportsman than anything. Colonel St. Quintin has had sporting experiences in all parts of the world, but naturally enough you will find that he devotes most space to an account of his experiences in India. It is quite impossible for us to give any hint of the good tales that he has to tell, and even of the manner of their telling we have been able to do no more than hint. "The even tenour of your way may be all very well," writes the author, "but it cannot really stir your feelings and give you the pleasure and pain which means 'life.' I have never experienced that even tenour, but I should think you could easily have too much of it." At any rate, the author has not had too much of the other thing—nor indeed have we had anything like enough of such books as these. "Chances of Sport of Sorts," is in no way a "made" book. It is the overflow of a genial and humorous nature, and it demands only a modicum of sympathy in the reader for it to become engrossing.

BABES OF THE WILD.

By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS With 33 Illustrations by Warwick Reynolds 6s. (Cassell.)

THE FEET OF THE FURTIVE.

By G. D. ROBERTS With 8 Illustrations by Paul Bransom 6s. (Ward, Lock.)

Although we have bracketed together these two volumes by Mr. Charles G. D. Roberts, we have no intention of comparing them or of criticising one against the other. Indeed, so even is the level of all Mr. Roberts's best work, that such a course would be almost impossible. In literary merit, and even in the general style of the author's treatment, we doubt whether there is anything whatever to choose between the two books. As regards the manner of them both, we imagine that the general public is already sufficiently familiar with Mr. Roberts's work to know that he invariably writes short dramatic stories which tend to bring out certain definite characteristics in the animals with which he deals. Both "Babes of the Wild" and "The Feet of the Furtive" are the same in this. The first has the advantage of two characters which occur in all the stories—a small boy and his uncle, who is represented as the narrator—and thus serve to give the book a certain measure of continuity. On the other hand, it is a trifle unfortunate that the boy should degenerate into a juvenile Dr. Watson, which is what has happened before you have reached the end of the book. We have no preferences for any one story in either of the two collections. It is possible that the fish tales—of which there are representatives in both books—strike rather a fresher note than those which deal with the better-known animals, and this is a branch of nature-study which Mr. Roberts clearly recognises that it would be well to develop. In conclusion, we would thank the author for the ease and the restraint of his writing. Always he is polished, unforced, natural, and above all he is interesting. Both Mr. Warwick Reynolds and Mr. Paul Bransom are efficient artists, and the drawings with which they have illustrated these volumes are mostly worthy of high praise.

From Veiled Mysteries of Egypt
(Nash).

A TYPICAL STREET-SCENE IN CAIRO. SHARIA HELMIEH
(Photo.: Dittich, Cairo).

PROVENCE AND LANGUEDOC.

By CECIL HEADLAM, M.A. Illustrated 8s. 6d. net. (Methuen.)

Many a traveller has taken his turn at describing the country of Provence; nor can we wonder that the fascination of the subject should have been felt even by some little susceptible to the glamour of romance, little worthy to recount the deeds of high heroic souls, little able to hear across the centuries the martial tread, or comprehend anything of "the grandeur that was Rome." The traveller has no easy task who undertakes to tell the story of the Land of the Troubadours, the story of the Albigenses. How Mr. Headlam rises to the level of his subject when he is speaking of the Roman Province will be seen in his fine description of the Triumphal Arch at Orange: "Beneath that arch, glowing almost as rich a golden-brown then as now in the same brilliant Provençal sunshine, how many thousand Roman legionaries have tramped before us as they marched northwards to Lyons to defend the Rhemish frontier, or to conquer Britain, and have saluted with a thrill of pride, this splendid record of their successful

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Wild Life and the Camera
(Heinemann)

WILD MALLARD RISING.

The speed with which these birds rise is clearly shown by the water, which has not subsided, although the bird is five feet or more in the air.

arms! And beneath it, too, head hung, with black despair in their hearts, have tramped the lines of captives, fair-haired, blue-eyed Northerners—non angli sed angeli— driven southwards to the slave market at Rome." We have to thank Mr. Headlam for a good book upon what is indeed a difficult, yet a gracious theme; and there is nothing in the book, perhaps, better done than his summary account of Provençal scenery "set in a frame of arid mountains", and of Provençal character typified, he says, by the contrast of climate, the cold bracing violent wind, and hot kindly enervating sunshine.

LITERARY GEOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL SKETCHES.

By WILLIAM SHARP. 5s net. (Heinemann)

There is always a certain fascination about literary geography. If one is within reasonable distance of the home or haunt of any great man, one is rarely too supercilious to make the pilgrimage. If one is in a country dealt with in some favourite novel, one will trace the characters in their comings and goings. William Sharp, whose interest in books rarely seems to have been confined to the book itself, at one time produced a series of articles on the country either inhabited or described by famous writers. These, with a few travel-sketches of a kindred nature, form the fourth volume in the selection of his works, which Mrs. Sharp is editing. They are no mere itineraries. He deals with the country of Stevenson and of Meredith, of Carlyle, George Eliot, Thackeray, and the Brontës, with Aylwin-land, the Thames and the Lake of Geneva. In every case, he has something of criticism and reminiscence to add to his geography, and he freely supplements his own words with quotations from the author under consideration. Especially good was Sharp at such miscellanies as "The Thames from Oxford to the Nore." Characteristically, he leaves the ancients to look after themselves, and devotes himself to the Victorians. This is all to the good, for he knew the moderns personally, and he is most interesting when reminiscent. He is good at a pen-portrait. He describes his first sight of Stevenson (not knowing who it was) and lays stress on his drowned appearance, which one can quite imagine from some of the portraits. "But the extraordinariness of the impression was of a man who had just been rescued from the sea or a river. Except from the fact that his clothes did not drip, that the long black locks hung limp but not moist, and that the short velveteen

From Chances of Sport of Sorts
(Blackwood)

MEXICO. MY MULES IN THE SIERRA MADRE.

jacket was disreputable, but not damp, this impression of a man just come or taken from the water was overwhelming." However, when a friend arrived, R.L.S., revived in an amazing way. Altogether, this is an entertaining book, though lacking the permanent interest of "Papers Critical and Reminiscent."

THE LAND THAT IS DESOLATE.

By SIR FREDERICK TREVES, Bt Illustrated. 6s. net. (Smith, Elder.)

There are two ways of visiting a country. First, to prepare yourself beforehand by learning the common knowledge of what to expect; and second, not to do so. Sir Frederick Treves seems to have followed the latter course. It has the obvious advantage that one's impressions are one's very own. On the other hand it may lead one to suppose that they are only one's own and have never occurred to anyone before. The famous surgeon is becoming quite a globe-trotter, yet in his experience he recalls only three occasions when the actual view of a scene far exceeded the anticipation he had formed of it. These were the first glimpses of Venice, as seen from a ship's deck at the dawn of a summer's day, the first sight of the Grand Cañon of the Colorado from the brink at Bright Angle, and (as many others have felt) the first sudden view of the Taj Mahal at Agra. In the Holy Land, however, whoever expects something uncommon must, he says on p. 3, "prepare for a great disillusion", and "it was not until we were actually ashore at Port Said that we felt safe." are his final sentiments on p. 284—"safe from the possibility of being asked to visit another sacred site." The Via Dolorosa is "a lane of lies, a path of fraud"; the Pool of Bethesda contains "water which would probably be condemned by any medical officer of health"; of Calvary, his first impression is of a lamp-shop, "an idea which was encouraged by the overpowering smell

From The Feet of the Furtive
(Ward, Lock).

"GAZED FIXEDLY AFTER THE FUGITIVES FOR SOME MOMENTS."

of oil and by the chattering of a number of tourists who surveyed the chapel and the lamps with the air of intending purchasers", and so on. Sir Frederick's tour in Palestine is in fine large print, well-spaced, with good photographs by himself and some good description of a railway accident. It is all entertaining in a way. Yet we infinitely prefer Conder to Treves.

WHITE-EAR AND PETER:
THE STORY OF A FOX AND A FOX-TERRIER.

By NEILS HEIBERG With 16 Coloured Plates
by Cecil Aldin. 6s. net. (Macmillan.)

Mr. Neils Heiberg is quite clearly a lover of animals. He has also—what so many animal-lovers have not the literary equipment and ability to give comprehensible form to his special knowledge. "White-Ear and Peter" is the story of a fox which was adopted into the stables of a large English country-house, the home of an M.F.H. For some time he lives an unnatural life in comparative happiness, but after a while the call of nature is too strong and he returns to a wandering life. Now, however, he is acquainted with the ways of men, and is accordingly a particularly cunning desperado. Such a story can only end in tragedy for the fox; but a comic element is supplied by the figure of the stable-dog Peter, a gallant little fox-terrier. Mr. Heiberg has an intimate acquaintance with the ways of the animals with which his book deals, and he has used his knowledge to particularly good effect. Mr. Aldin's illustrations—there are sixteen of them, in colour—are characteristically delightful.

From White-Ear and Peter (Macmillan).

"PETER."

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Complete Yachtsman
(Methuen).

THE KETCH "JULNAR" WINNING THE KING'S CUP AT COWES, 1911.
From a photograph by Beken & Son, Cowes.

GUERRILLA LEADERS OF THE WORLD.

By PERCY CROSS STANDING. Illustrated. 6s. net. (Stanley Paul.)

Mr. Standing has composed fourteen chapters, which range the world in search of famous guerilla leaders and their exploits. The distinction between the guerilla fighter and the brigand is established. One definition of the guerilla mode states it to be warfare carried on by means of small independent bands of armed men, self-constituted and ordered, unconnected with a regular army, and entitled to dismiss themselves at any time. We are not sure that De Wet and Delarey could fairly be classed as

From Provence and Languedoc
(Methuen).

"guerilla" leaders in this sense. General De Wet himself, indeed, as Mr. Standing shows, objected to the term. The author protects himself at the outset, however, by a wider application with which there need be no quarrel: The guerilla fighter "is essentially a soldier, but a soldier attaining his end by ways and means diametrically opposed to those of the military school, the drill-ground, and the technical field-order." Beginning in France with the struggles of the Royalists in La Vendée and Brittany against the Republican armies, Mr. Standing finds his first hero in Francis Charette de la Cointre, in Napoleon's opinion "the only great character" produced by those troubles. Next, in Tyrol we have the adventures of Andreas Hofer, inn-keeper; Joseph Speckbacher, peasant; and Joachim Haspinger, Capuchin priest; in Germany the exploits of Ferdinand Schill, the Duke of Brunswick, and the Black Brunswickers; in South America the deeds of Bolivar and Miller; and so on to Schamyl, Sitting Bull, Osman Digna, and finally De Wet. In treating of Porfirio Diaz, Mr. Standing might have been more liberal in estimating the debt of the Mexican people to their former President-Dictator. The book is essentially stirring, and is much helped by illustrations.

THE SIGN AT SIX.

By STEWART EDWARD WHITE. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton)

THE ADVENTURES OF BOBBY ORDE.

By STEWART EDWARD WHITE 6s. (Fisher Unwin.)

Had Mr. White designed that two works of his should appear in England at the same moment in order to exhibit his versatility, he could not have achieved success better than by presenting these books. In theme and treatment they offer a complete contrast, though the American argot is common to both. "The Sign at Six" is a weird story of New York City. Remembering that the eyes of the whole of that world which follows crime are at the present moment centred upon the peculiar revelations of the Rosenthal murder trial, we hazard the suggestion that

LES MARTIGUES.
From a photograph by Sir Henry Maxwell-Lyte, K.C.B.

Mr. White writes with a purpose. The purpose may conceivably be to arouse the American people to a greater interest in their city government. The scientist Percy Darrow, who is the hero of the story, is made to say at one point: "It's a good thing for people to find out that there's something bigger than they are, or than anything they can make. That fact is the basis of the idea of a God. These"—namely the people of New York—"are getting to be a godless people." No one will complain that the novelist's way of rousing the city is not drastic. Malachi McCarthy, the political boss, who "quite simply at that time owned New York," receives in his office in Atlas Buildings, a mysterious wireless summons to flee the city. He defies the command, with the result that the currents of electricity are cut off in the buildings, then in the city. Next the city is reduced to absolute silence. Someone has control of the ethereal vibrations of light and of sound. Darrow is the first to realise the terrible danger should the unknown possess also the control of heat vibrations. This is proved when the Mayor and confederates are found frozen dead in the City Hall. At six o'clock utter extinction is threatened by Monsieur X.; the population are fleeing; the rival scientist's failure is complete, when suddenly Darrow produces the cause of all the mischief in the person of an old man—a crank who has made a discovery so tremendous that it must be sacrificed—sitting in the next office of the building. It is an ingenious exercise in imagination, easily read, thoroughly enjoyable, and adorned with some excellent drawings. To turn to Mr. White's other genre, "Bobby Orde" is small boy all through. We meet him disporting among the logs which it is his father's business to float down stream towards the sawmill town. By way of a printing press, an attachment to a small girl, and a break into Mrs. Owen's cake at the picnic, he graduates to a shotgun, and figures—creditably—in a murder. The philosophy of Mr. Kincaid strikes the note of the story. "Sonny, you can always be a sportsman, a sportsman does things because he likes them, Bobby—for no other reason—not for money, nor to become famous, nor even to win—and a right man does not get

From The Complete Yachtsman
(Methuen).

THE "METEOR."
From a photograph by Beken & Son, Cowes.

pleasure in doing a thing if in any way he takes an unfair advantage—if you—not the thinking you, nor even the conscience you, but the way-down-deep-in-your-heart you that you can't fool nor trick nor lie to—if that you is satisfied it's all right."

From Through Holland in the "Vivette" (Seeley).

THE "VIVETTE" AT BEMBRIDGE.

AMONG CONGO CANNIBALS.

By JOHN H. WEEKS
With 54 Illustrations and a Map 16s. net.
(Seeley, Service & Co.)

Mr. Weeks was stationed for thirty years as a missionary at Monseme on the Upper Congo, and it is to be presumed, therefore, that his account of the habits, customs, religion, and laws of the Boloki tribe is as well-informed as it is entertaining and well-written. There is, however, a darker side to his narrative—the immorality and horrible social conditions prevalent among the Congo natives, caused, in Mr. Weeks' view, by the—at one time universal—custom of polygamy. Now, however, "polygamy is giving place to monogamy, and that means a higher morality, a purer and more self-respecting womanhood, and the introduction of a truer affection between the husband and the wife which will result in a better and more healthy home-life for the children, and will lead to the coming of a brighter day in dark, oppressed Africa." Mr. Weeks also devotes much space to a consideration of native history and folk-lore; a folk-lore that, for all its crudity, has a curious, bizarre beauty of its own. His book presents a remarkably complete picture of a people but little known. The illustrations are numerous and good.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Kara Koram and Western Himalaya
(Constable).

From Trails, Trappers, and Tenderfeet in Western Canada
(Melrose).

ASPECTS OF ALGERIA.

By ROY DEVEREUX. Illustrated.
10s. 6d. net. (J. M. Dent & Sons.)

This is a capital general analysis of historical and contemporary conditions in Algeria. The author writes with great charm. On the practical side his discussion of the future of Islam, and the problems involved by the French Government's design of making the Arabs trained soldiers, are the most important. In speaking of the "renaissance of Turkey" he is either too late or too soon. He quotes an estimate that at least a fourth of the 11,500,000 inhabitants of that large section of West Africa within the French sphere of influence have already been converted to Islam, whose tenets are more comprehensible to the savage than those of Christianity. It is looking far ahead to think of such a consolidation of the Islamic races into separate nationalities as would result in the expul-

From Aspects of Algeria
(Dent)

SAND DUNES IN THE SAHARA.

"THE KIND OF COUNTRY THAT MAKES THE PACKERS CURSE." THE TRAIL NEAR TÊTE JAUNE CACHE.

sion of the French from Algeria, Tunisia and Morocco. But should that happen, he is probably right in saying British tutelage of Egypt could not continue. "European domination of Northern Africa will stand or fall as a whole." There is an interesting description of the republic of seven cities on the fringe of the Sahara called the M'Zab. The Arabs declare that while it takes two of them to outwit a Jew, two Jews have little chance of outwitting a Mozabite. France's Northern Dependency is rightfully expensive, judged by British standards. It has cost her at least £160,000,000. Mr. Devereux tells of the beautiful and varied scenery and excellent roads. But one or two first-class hotels are wanted before Algiers can hope to surpass the charms of the Nile or of the Côte d'Azur.

IN THE SHADOW OF THE BUSH.

By P. AMAURY TALBOT. With 122 Illustrations, 2 Insets, and about 60 Text Drawings. 18s. net. (Heinemann)

Mr. Talbot has spent some five years among the Ekoi, a Nigerian tribe whose country is situate in Southern Nigeria, on the borders of the German territory of Cameroon. It is of this remarkable, and in many ways lovable, people that he treats in "In the Shadow of the Bush." This is no ordinary collection of traveller's yarns, but an extremely close and detailed study of every aspect of the life of the Ekoi. A considerable portion of the book has been taken from the lips of the natives themselves — expressions of their superstitions and beliefs, tales of personal experiences, and in particular their folk-lore. This all gives to the book a lightness and vraisemblance which is sadly lacking in most works of the kind. Mr. Talbot deserves the gratitude of the public for this fine record of a rapidly changing people. The illustrations are liberal and excellent.

From In the Shadow of the Bush (Heinemann).

FALLS AT THE SOURCE OF THE IKPAN RIVER.

IN THE AMAZON JUNGLE.

By ALGOT LANGE. 10s 6d. net. (Putnam's.)

Mr Lange's book describes his adventures on the headwaters of the Amazon, including a strange sojourn among cannibals, whose guest he was, and who treated him with amazing courtesy, hospitality and kindness. His travels were in the region of the Javary River, just between Brazil and Peru, a vile country, swampy, the forest growth rank and dense, and in times of high water the whole basin is inundated. One of the two most interesting things in the book is his description of the sucurujú, the giant anaconda, which lives to a great age and reaches a tremendous size. Mr Lange claims to have shot one fifty-six feet long, it is a pity he did not include its photograph among the many excellent pictures used to illustrate his book. However, he got the skin home to New York, where, dried and shrunk a little, it measures fifty-four feet eight inches in length.

From The South Pole—Captain Amundsen's book, which has just been published by Mr John Murray.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Sport in Five Continents
(Blackwood).

GRIZZLY, ROCKIES, CANADA.

The other is his tale of the Mangeromes, the cannibal tribe with whom he lived for some time, their habits, weapons, manners and customs, including an account in detail of the way in which the famous wourabli poison is prepared; and the tale of a desperate battle between the tribe and a band of half-castes who were attacking them to steal their women. The tribe conquered, and had the spoils in the shape of a stew. Mr. Lange's book contains these two novelties which are sufficient excuse for publishing it even if there were no other reasons.

A COLONY IN THE MAKING:

Or Sport and Profit in British East Africa. By LORD CRANWORTH. 12s. net. Illustrated. (Macmillan.)

Lord Cranworth urges that British East Africa is in some respects the most peculiar of the King's dominions, because within a comparatively small area it embraces so much variety: in the way of climate, soil, human inhabitants, fauna, flora, and, finally, possibilities for British enterprise. As to the system of government, he submits that the Protectorate at the present day subsists mainly on faith and hope. The principal ground of complaint lies, in his own words, in "the quantity of cooks who contrive to spoil the flavour of so excellent a soup." According to his lordship it is extremely difficult to get a quick, definite answer to any question or complaint through the long chain of links which separate the settler from the Colonial Office. He devotes a special chapter to settlers and officials. He considers interests as diverse as pigs, cattle, ostriches, big game, labour, crops, education, and the Uganda railway. Local politics and pastimes also come within the scope of his survey. Indeed he apparently determined to take the Protectorate with a business seriousness and thoroughness. To certain types of readers the book will be a surprising and engaging revelation as to the plain and practical things that a man who does not pretend to be a business man can notice. Here and there is an acceptable touch of airiness. Apart from his lordship's varied work there is a chapter by Lady Cranworth, giving "Hints for a Woman in British East Africa."

THE VELDT DWELLERS.

By F. BANCROFT 6s (Hutchinson.)

Mr. Bancroft's "Of Like Passions" was a sound and clever study of the colour peril in South Africa, but "The Veldt Dwellers" is a considerable advance on his earlier work. It is a treatment of the racial question during the last Boer War. The brothers Brandon, Thane and George, are devoted to each other, but their sympathies are not akin. Their home is in the Transvaal, where they have been born; but while the outbreak of war brings no difficulties to Thane, whose sympathies are entirely with the English, for whom he fights, the more conscientious George is placed in a far more difficult position. The Transvaal, after all, is his country, and he has no quarrel with the Boers. Finally it is to them that he determines to give what assistance he can, on the proviso that he is not required to take part in battle. On this theme Mr. Bancroft has built a novel of tragic power and intensity. "The Veldt Dwellers" is well and conscientiously written, and it contains several striking portraits—both male and female—of South African types. It should be read by everybody who takes an interest in the literature of Greater Britain.

From In the Amazon Jungle
(Putnam's).

FOREST INTERIOR. THE GLOOM THAT PERVADES THESE IMMENSE AND WONDERFUL WOODS.

THE BROWNS.

By J. E. BUCKROSE. 6s. (Mills & Boon.)

The Browns belonged to a class the nation is getting rid of, but which it will miss, whatever comes instead: this the author tells after delightful pictures of every-day folk, with their big and little trials, their small joys and many sorrows. Margaret Brown is more attractive, because of her accepted place amongst us all, than she would be as a striking heroine of impossible fiction. Her natural impatience with an unjust Fate, which compels her mother and herself to live in poverty, provokes the impetuous action of throwing her Cousin Rebecca's will into the fire, before the astonished gaze of the old lady. Miss Brown's intention to disinherit this hot-headed relative and her mother is frustrated, however, by her timely death before another will is made, and we enjoy seeing the weight of poverty lifted, and revel with these happy possessors of the munificent income of two hundred pounds a year. What wonders it was able to do! But Margaret's conscience is sorely troubled when the dispossessed young man cousin makes his appearance and announces his intention of starting in business at Flodmouth. When she discovers, too, how he is striving to save his small capital for his new enterprise, by living in the most meagre fashion and carrying it off with a debonnair bearing, her trouble increases. But the author must be left to tell the story in her own simple way, for, despite the almost provoking femininity of the book, it is so refreshing and straightforward that we could only lay it down with a hope that the next work from this author may not be long coming. "Down our Street" made her name, and "The Browns" will help to perpetuate it.

THE LIGHTED WAY.

By E. Phillips Oppenheim 6s (Hodder & Stoughton)

Mr. Phillips Oppenheim is irresistible. Pick him up and you lose all sense of time. His pen drips with mystery on mystery, and, try how you will, in the end it is he—not you—who provides the solution. He is a baffling conjurer who can squeeze mystery out of anything from a precious stone to a cheesemonger. Who indeed but Mr. Oppenheim would have scented mystery in the prosaic Mr. Samuel Weatherley, the wholesale provision merchant, of Tooley Street, London? Yet the reader of "The Lighted Way"

From The Feet of the Furtive
(Ward, Lock).

"AT LAST ONE ALIGHTED WITHIN A COUPLE OF FEET OF HIS VERY MUZZLE."

From A Colony in the Making
(Macmillan.)

A TYPICAL CAMP.
By permission of Messrs. Newland, Tarlton & Co.

From To Mesopotamia and Kurdistan in Disguise
(Murray).

A JAF CHIEFTAIN,
S. KURDISTAN.

who accompanies young Arnold Chetwode, a humble clerk in Mr. Weatherley's counting-house, on a polite mission to his employer's house at Hampstead, will find himself immediately on the fringe of a great mystery. For if the provision merchant suggests the prosaic, an atmosphere at once fascinating and sinister surrounds his beautiful wife and her cosmopolitan circle—an atmosphere which is speedily

From A Wanderer in Florence
(Methuen).

Reviewed in this month's BOOKMAN.

electrified by a startling murder. Love and mystery are interwoven with Mr. Oppenheim's usual cunning, and it is safe to say that the reader of "The Lighted Way" will know no peace of mind until the final page is reached.

TO MESOPOTAMIA AND KURDISTAN IN DISGUISE.

By E. B. SOANE. With 6 Illustrations and a Map. 12s. net (Murray)

Mr. Soane's route on his recent adventurous journey took him from Constantinople, via Beyrout and Aleppo to Hierapolis, whence he made his way to Diarbekr on the Tigris, and followed the valley of that stream as far south as Mosul. At this town he forsook the regular track, and made his way in a south-easterly direction to the Persian frontier, returning thence to the Tigris, and so to Bagdad and home. Seeing that the Kurds have the reputation of being one of the most cruel and treacherous races on the face of the world, it will be realized that the author took a good many risks. As a matter of fact, the treatment that he actually received was far better than he had expected, but this does not mean that he had not some awkward moments to live through. Mr. Soane also includes in his volume a considerable amount of matter dealing with the history of Kurdistan. This he claims to be entirely new, and certainly it adds appreciably to the interest of a very unusual book.

BISMYA, OR THE LOST CITY OF ADAB.

By EDGAR JAMES BANKS, Ph.D. With 174 Illustrations. 21s. net (Putnam's)

In almost the exact centre of Mesopotamia lies Bismya, the site of the lost city of Adab, the spot which Dr Banks selected for the excavations which began on Christmas Day, 1903. He was phenomenally successful. "The lost city of Adab was found; a perfect marble statue of King Daudu, the oldest statue in the world, was unearthed, names of forgotten kings and rulers were restored to history; questions long puzzling to the historian and to the archaeologist have been answered, and others have been presented to them to solve." A popular account of the excavations, together with one of Dr. Banks's travels and adventures in Mesopotamia, is now presented to the general reading-public in this fine volume, which nobody with any soul for romance can read without a thrill. The illustrations are of extraordinary interest and include three representations of the remarkable statue.

THE AUTHOR AS AN ARAB.
From Bismya
(Putnam's).

MEN AND MANNERS OF MODERN CHINA.

By J. MACGOWAN. 12s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

The Rev. J. MacGowan shows in "Men and Manners of Modern China" a ripe knowledge of, and abounding sympathy with, the interesting people who, before Germany built a Dreadnought, were regarded by the patriots who tremble as the Yellow Peril. The folly of such bogey-building in connection with the Chinese has now been proved. We know them better. Their writings, philosophy, and poetry have been searched, translated, and studied; the character and circumstances of the people have been described by all manner of pens, so that, with their qualities and faults, they may be estimated truly. Mr. MacGowan, having spent fifty observant years in China, helps to that better understanding. His book is entertaining and comprehensive. The chief defect is a shocking bad index. He writes with pleasant humour, and on the

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

of different association from the jails of Ruffini and Mazzini. We have a picture, however, of a villa mournful enough in its association; of the haunted house by San Terenzo, where, "with the sound of the sea in our ears" we read the inscription upon a marble tablet under its wreath of laurels: "Here Mary Godwin waited with tearful anxiety for Percy Bysshe Shelley, who sailing from Leghorn in his frail boat was borne to the silence of the Elysian islands."

ARABIC SPAIN.

By BERNHARD and ELLEN M. WHISHAW. 10s. 6d. net.
Illustrated (Smith, Elder)

The modesty, industry, and devotion of Mr. and Mrs. Whishaw are to be highly commended. Their book is an effort to elucidate points and problems in the history and art of Seville under the Moslems. The real story of Moslem Spain, as they point out, has yet to be written. They lament their ignorance of Arabic, a knowledge of which is manifestly essential for the finished performances of such work as they have undertaken. They have had, however, the advantage of a long residence in Seville and an intimate acquaintance with places, personalities and interests inaccessible to Spanish visitors and tourists. They have collected and presented some exceedingly interesting material. Some of the conclusions can only be regarded as tentative, several points are still uncertain or confusing, but sections of the historic lore and not a little of the artistic revelation are suggestive and valuable. The chapter entitled "Egypt and the Church in Seville" is specially attractive, and we would be grateful for a more elaborate treatment of that subject and kindred ones. The authors are more appreciable pioneers than they realise, notwithstanding all their drawbacks, and difficulties

From Arabic Spain
(Smith, Elder).

THE VIRGIN OF ROCAMADOR, CHURCH OF SAN LORENZO, SEVILLE, a mural painting over eight feet high. Mozarabic, renovated with additions about the fifteenth century, but the original outlines respected whole praises warmly a remarkable congeries of nations, as modern China may fairly be called. The day of that people has been long, and it will continue. No nation under the sky can be said to have a more hopeful prospect than the present-day Chinese, who have realised a miracle by stopping the cultivation of the opium-poppy. It was the flower of death; its evil was everywhere, so they abolished it. What country cursed with drunkenness could so thoroughly have eradicated the evil?

WANDERINGS ON THE ITALIAN RIVIERA.

By FREDERIC LEES. 7s. 6d. net. (Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons)

The author is least happy in his preface, where he talks of "cultured travellers," surely a very vile phrase! But when he once sets out on his wanderings with a friend who was an antiquary in search of curios, he writes a pleasant book, and illustrates it with well chosen photographs. He shows us an ancient winding stony mule track up the heights seen in a flood of golden light at sunset: feudal castles, and a rocky valley. We see the chapel at Lampedusa rising from amidst the olives and cypress trees, over against Taggia where Ruffini lived; Ruffini who wrote English books, "Doctor Antonio" and others, popular in their day; Ruffini of the family of Italian patriots and of the country of Mazzini. Our author does not talk about Mazzini, but he gives us a photograph of the villa at Genoa where Dickens lived, and which he described as "a kind of Pink Jail." It was a prison house

From Men and Manners of Modern China
(Unwin).

A PRIEST IN THE COURTYARD OF THE "WHITE DEER" TEMPLE.

From The Romance of the French Châteaux
(Putnam's).

CHÂTEAU OF MEILLANT
(By permission of Neurdein, Paris).

A MODERN PILGRIM IN MECCA.

By A. J. B. WAVELL, F R G S 10s. 6d. net (Constable.)

Mr. Wavell's remarkable book is divided into two portions of almost equal length and general interest—the first of which describes his pilgrimage to Medina and Mecca in the winter of 1908–9, while the second introduces him two years later as one of the two Europeans who went through the siege of Sanaa, the most important, indeed the only, inland city of South-West Arabia. Of these two portions we imagine that the general reader will most probably prefer the first, but in many respects the experiences dealt with in the second portion were even more remarkable. Mr. Wavell was accompanied to Mecca by two Mohammedan friends, an Arab, Abdul Wahid, and a Mombasa Swahili name Masaudi. He accomplished his purpose with scarcely a hitch in his arrangements, but we are inclined to think that he somewhat underrates the difficulties of making the pilgrimage. He believes that anyone entering the country in disguise at the pilgrimage season and possessed of "a passable knowledge of Arabic and Moslem ceremonial, and proper vigilance," may make the pilgrimage to Mecca without running any risk worth mentioning. "Medina is much the more dangerous place of the two, and no traveller should adventure himself there who is not very thoroughly at home in his Oriental character. From what I have since heard I am disposed to attribute our escape to a series of happy chances rather than to good management on my own part." The author journeyed to Sanaa in his European character, which possibly accounts for the interest taken in him by the Turkish authorities, who restricted his freedom of movement from the moment of his landing at Hodeidah. It would, however, have been impossible as a native to take with him the scientific outfit made necessary by his projected journey through unexplored portions of Southern Arabia. This journey of exploration never came off; it was effectively blocked by the Turkish forces in the siege of Sanaa by a force of about 150,000 Arabs. This expedition, in fact, was a failure, it "had accomplished nothing whatever, cost a great deal, and entailed a fearful waste of time," but, the author reflects, "at any rate we had had a run for our money." It also gave him the material for some of the most exciting incidents in the book. Mr. Wavell may be warmly congratulated on the highly attractive manner in which he puts the account of his experiences before the reader. While primarily a traveller, he possesses powers of literary observation and description of a very high order. For its force, its interest, and its humour, "A Modern Pilgrimage to Mecca" must take a place in the front rank of modern travel-books.

THE ROMANCE OF BAYARD.

By Lieut.-Col. HAGGARD 6s (Stanley Paul)

It is rather surprising that a writer of historical romance should find so good a subject practically untouched as Lieutenant-Colonel Haggard has done "The Romance of Bayard." Colonel Haggard gets briskly to work with a lively description of the joustings and intrigues at The Field of the Cloth of Gold. The spirited nature of the romance may be gathered from the fact that his second chapter describes a vigorous wrestling match between Francis I. and Henry VIII.; in the middle of which historic "mill" the redoubtable Chevalier makes his entrance into the story. Great names star the pages—Henry, Wolsey, Margaret of Navarre, and her very arch maid-of-honour, Anne Boleyn. The hero of a hundred fights loses his heart to the merry author of the Heptameron, the reading of which collection naturally causes some humorous comparisons to the Chevalier sans peur et sans reproche. But the Bayard was clearly not destined for the life domestic, and Colonel Haggard's story comes to a dramatic conclusion with the death of the Chevalier on the field of battle as Margaret approaches with the Papal missive dissolving the hateful marriage that had kept them apart. Readers who have no finicking objections to a liberal use of Wardour Street English will find few pages to skip.

From Wanderings on the Italian Riviera (Pitman).

MONTEROSSO AL MARE, NEAR SPEZIA.

THE LIFE OF MICHAEL ANGELO.

By ROMAIN
ROLLAND. Translated from the French by Frederic Lees. Illustrated. 6s. net.
(Heinemann.)

Emerson wrote that Michael Angelo had "a sad sour time of it." The words might have been the text for this vivid biography of the great Florentine. A highly cultured aristocrat, he was the prey of genius and grew to find a

From The Gateway of Scotland
(Constable).

KELSO BRIDGE.

From Trails, Trappers, and Tenderfeet in Western Canada
(Melrose).

PACKHORSES TAKING A FORD

bitter pleasure in pain. He loved, but was not loved in return. Looking upon Vittoria Colonna dead, he was distressed to think he had not kissed her forehead and her face,
as he had kissed her hand. He kept fowls and cats. Invited out by his friend Gian-notti, he replied:
"You are all so highly gifted that if I accepted your invitation I should lose my liberty," meaning that his admiration for them would disturb his own equilibrium. Again:
"When a man is so formed by nature and education that he hates ceremonies and despises hypocrisy it is senseless not to let him live as he likes. If he asks you for nothing and does not seek your society, why do you seek his?"

Truly, it is not a happy life; yet M. Rolland, having set out to present a tragedy of innate suffering, perhaps over-does the note. The painting of the Sistine Chapel occupied the years 1508-12, and here we see, says the author, the legendary Michael Angelo, "he whose majestic image is and ought to remain engraved on the memory of humanity."
Pope Julius II. threatened to have him thrown from the top of the scaffolding during the progress of the work. The haughty Michael Angelo must indeed have been trying.
Yet for all of his temperament the advice of Clement VII.
is as wholesome to-day as when it was tendered—not to overwork himself, to show restraint, to work at his ease, to take a walk now and then. His pride of race; his filial forbearance, his constant kindness to the unfortunate, are traits of character M. Rolland's copiously annotated pages do bring out. We remember, too, that the old man who, when his nephew's baby died, wanted the parents to rejoice, and who wrote that "Death is not, as people believe, the worst thing, for the last day is the first—the eternal day—near to the throne of God," was good Christian enough

From In Jesuit Land
(Stanley Paul).

OLD JESUIT BATH, APOSTOLIS.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Stevenson's Works. Swanston Edition
(Chatto & Windus).

Reviewed by Neil Munro in the November BOOKMAN.

R. L. S. IN APEMAMA ISLAND. A DEVIL PRIEST MAKING INCANTATIONS.

to regard prayer as more efficacious than all the medicines of the world. Little as he enjoyed life, his physical constitution was of the hardest. At eighty-five he is on horseback, and a year later sits for three hours with naked feet, drawing.

THE ARABS IN TRIPOLI.

By ALAN OSTLER. With 8 Illustrations by H. Sepping Wright 10s. 6d. net. (Murray)

Mr. Alan Ostler's avowed purpose is not to present a study of the recent Tripolitan war, but to afford the reader a picture of a strange people in their natural surroundings. He has, he tells us, spent several years among the Arabs—a fact which is obvious from the many vivid and effective touches in which the book abounds, and which could not have been supplied by a merely superficial observer. War is apparently a natural state with the untamed Arab of the interior of Northern Africa, and the sentiment is echoed in the last words of the book: "Ibrahim, the pallid young Spahi interpreter, came up and stood beside me, looking across the desert towards Tripoli. 'Well, Ibrahim,' I said, 'what do you think will be the end of it all over there?' The Spahi smiled quietly, looking down at the host of his untamed brothers marching by their camels. 'No end, monsieur,' he answered, 'Only war; always war.'" Mr. Ostler's is one of the most remarkable revelations of Oriental character we have ever come across.

WOMAN AND WOMANHOOD.

By C. W. SALEEBY, M.D.,
F.R.S.E., Ch B., F.Z.S. 10s. net.
(Heinemann.)

Dr. Saleeby's book, whatever its merits or demerits, scarcely justifies its sub-title, "A Search For Principles." Here is no "search" for anything; rather is it a direct statement of convictions. On many subjects, but particularly on those of eugenics and alcohol, only one side is presented, and that with unqualified emphasis. This feature of the book has its drawbacks as well as its advantages. Perhaps the chief disadvantage is that this method, while it is calculated to hearten the convinced, will scarcely convert the opposition. Dr. Saleeby, in fact, has much of the professional manner, presenting the results of his wide reading and serious reflection with a certain categorical definiteness even on questions that cannot by any means be said not to be still sub judice. On the other hand it is a rare pleasure to encounter clear and definite statement, and that Dr. Saleeby's contentions make for national welfare and progress there can be no manner of doubt. His evident sincerity and earnestness easily counterbalance the one-sided aspect of his method of dialectic. And now for a brief survey of the contents of an interesting and essentially valuable book. The best chapters are those which may be called the most practical, under which heading we would include his discussion of "The Physical Training of Girls," "The Higher Education of Women," "Education for Motherhood," "The Marriage Age," "The Conditions of Divorce," "Women and Economics." On all these important subjects Dr. Saleeby writes frankly and acutely, a combination of qualities that marks his book off sharply from an ever-growing and not always too judicious a literature on these subjects. And these same qualities are seen, perhaps to even greater advantage, in his more unconventional treatment of such a topic as "The Price of Prudery." It is obvious that much of the area covered by Dr. Saleeby is a region coated with thin ice. He is to be certainly congratulated on the skilfulness of his skating.

From The Arabs in Tripoli
(Murray).

TUAREG MEHARI RIDERS COME IN FROM THE SOUTH.

"THY ROD AND THY STAFF."

By ARTHUR
CHRISTOPHER
BENSON. 6s.
net. (Smith, Elder.)

Mr. Benson has entered the confessional. He now says what some of his critics have been saying about him for some time past. "I had done my old work in a pretentious spirit, not exactly for show, but certainly for effect. I had tried to satisfy my enjoyment and my vanity alike. . . .

I had loved ease and comfort, money and dignity, friendship and culture. . . . I thought that I was doing a fine, unworldly thing to seek a retirement in the prime of life." In his book "Beside Still Waters" he had meant, though not consciously, "to draw a charming picture of contemplative seclusion and to arouse the envy of the hustled and hurried." The confession will be read with mixed feelings. How far the author may be conscious of it is uncertain; but he remains introspective. He still offers to a busy world the picture of one peculiarly favoured. He is, after all, but Hecuba to the majority; and few will weep with or over him. His illness, during which for nearly three years he was a victim of neurasthenia, is not of a kind to extract sympathy—except from those who have passed through a similar trial. He was able to travel, he still had friends. His bank balance accumulated. He was left with almost the only kind of work that he could do. None but those who have lost the savour for the good things that surround them can have more than a faint idea of the effects of the illness to which Mr. Benson refers: the perpetual desire for rest on any terms, even on terms of death itself. To those not so fortunately placed as was the essayist it means dire failure to the last degree. His advice that in such circumstances any sort of excitement or distraction should be avoided is counsel of perfection. But it would be unfair to take up the attitude of Charlotte to Werther in this matter. There is a lesson for all in this book, as well as the recreative charm afforded by the skilful use of a literary faculty of no mean kind. Mr. Benson has brought out of the valley of humiliation a message. This message concerns man's relations with his fellow man and with his Maker. But the message must be read carefully. Isolated passages, cut off from their context, even in hurried reading and unconsciously, would sadly misrepresent the author's meaning. Put in a sentence, the message may be interpreted in the words of the catechism: to love God with heart, soul, and strength; and one's neighbour as oneself. One of the most valuable sentences in the book, reminding us of the words addressed by a famous Magdalen professor to a young Divinity student, is this: "I read the Gospel afresh, almost as a new book, and a mist seemed to clear away from my eyes." In another sentence self-revelation stands out clearly: "I

From In French Africa
(Chapman & Hall.)

TLEMCEM: A STREET SCENE.

From Sport and Pastime in Australia
(Methuen);

FINISH OF A RACE AT FLEMINGTON.
The horses are shown passing the judges' box have learnt by experience that it is not good to be much alone, but I have not learnt not to enjoy solitude." It is to be hoped that the readers of Mr. Benson's earlier books will not have been so enamoured of their gracious style as to be deluded into the neurasthenia their writing encouraged in their author. In any case the readers referred to should lose no time in taking the antidote Mr. Benson now offers them.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

THE UNDER TRAIL.

By ANNA ALICE CHAPIN.
6s. (Pitman.)

In Juliet Gray, the heroine of this vigorous American story, we meet no helpless gossamer maid, but a thoroughly capable and business-like nurse, whose professional keenness combined with a rare beauty sweeps her into a veritable mountain torrent of adventure. The Under Trail itself is a secret underground passage through a wild mountain range in West Virginia. "A dozen paces to the left of the laurel clump. Not ten men know, and, once you make it, God Himself has to look twice to find you!" These words, spoken by Nat Mooney, a delirious patient, one of a rude colony of road-makers dwelling on Liberty Ridge, give Nurse Juliet the clue to the Under Trail, where Derry Blake, the man who has shot Mooney, lies concealed. If her patient dies Juliet knows that Derry will swing for it—and Derry is the man she loves. If, on the other hand, he pulls through, Mooney has sworn to have Derry's life. Such is the situation which faces Juliet, a situation complicated and made more perilous by other love-ties binding both Derry and herself. Frankly melodramatic in parts,

From A Winter Holiday in Portugal
(Stanley Paul).

THE CHURCH OF THE ORDER OF CHRIST, THOMAR.

there is no lack of action in "The Under Trail," the remote mountainous setting of the story enabling the author to introduce an interesting gallery of characters, and incidentally to give a decidedly "creepy" account of a "voodoo celebration" in a negro's shanty.

PAUL BURDON.

By SIR WILLIAM MAGNAY, Bart. 6s. (Stanley Paul.)

Paul Burdon is not, at the outset, an attractive person. Things have gone badly with his farm, and he has lost nearly every farthing of his money, when Chance throws in his way a bag full of money and easily negotiable securities. He annexes the bag and contrives to fix the suspicion of a supposed murder upon the only man who can suspect him. After that all goes well with Paul Burdon; his speculations flourish, he returns the money he has "borrowed," and becomes a highly respectable citizen, a J.P., and a considerable landowner—a wealthy man, in fact. And then the man who suspects him returns from America, where he too has made money. Rumours begin to spread. How, in the first instance, did Paul Burdon raise the capital wherewith to speculate? What really happened to the owner of the bag? It says much for the hero's strength of character that he refuses to be blackmailed, and that he continues to face the world apparently undismayed. Sir William Magnay has done very well with his "strong man," for Paul Burdon is a convincing figure. The book contains, perhaps, less excitement than the author's admirers are accustomed to expect in his novels, but it has several dramatic moments, and the story as a whole is carefully and cleverly worked out.

From Through the Heart of Africa
(Constable).

THE COMMUNITY OF BLACK NUNS.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

life. Now that Mr. Marion Crawford is dead, Mr. Bagot has this field to himself, and he manages even a cardinal in the present novel without making him more than sympathetic, privately, with ideas frowned on by the Curia. An Italian professor tells this cardinal incidentally that he objects to "wade through pages of amatory silliness in novels which might otherwise be interesting." Mr. Bagot has evidently had this warning before his mind, for the novel has more breadth and atmosphere than usual. It is not anti-papal or anti-anything. The incidents, beyond a ghastly murder at the end, are neither sensational nor amorous. On the other hand, the story is rather long, and there is not enough humour to relieve the descriptions and dialogues.

From In the Footsteps of Richard Cœur de Lion
(Stanley Paul).

ROUEN CATHEDRAL
(where Richard's heart was buried).

HOFFMAN'S CHANCE.

By WILLIAM CAINE. 6s. (John Lane)

We gather that Mr. William Caine has crowded a great deal of personal experience into his new novel, which has Stageland for its setting and deals with the birth and death of a would-be comic opera. Hoffman has considerable musical talent and great ambitions, but no money. He has dreams of writing a comic opera—not a musical comedy, but the genuine article—which shall take London by storm; but the Ring is impregnable, his ability avails him nothing. Enter Hoffman's "Chance" in the shape of Bertram Orde, a wealthy young bachelor with a weakness for amateur theatricals and a talent for writing stuff "good enough for the blue pencil." Hoffman seizes his chance, flatters the young author-capitalist, and the two co-operate to write "The Conspiracy at Capri," Orde agreeing to finance a West-End production. Here, indeed, is the chance of a lifetime, and Hoffman flings himself at it headlong, working furiously and unceasingly. Mr. Caine then proceeds to demonstrate with very intimate touches the difficulties and obstacles which beset the writer of comic opera who is dependent on other people's money for his production. Very soon Hoffman finds his opera perverted into a musical comedy, and the piece is shockingly mutilated to provide an entirely irrelevant part for a favourite of Orde's. This favourite is the altogether amazing daughter of an altogether amazing father, and their eccentricities are quite in Mr. Caine's funniest vein. "Hoffman's Chance" gives one a memorable picture of musical comedy in the making—and breaking.

DARNELEY PLACE.

By RICHARD BAGOT. 6s. (Methuen.)

Hypnotism and spiritualism are enough to spoil any novel. "Trilby" did succeed in spite of the former, but "Trilby" was the exception, and Mr. Bagot, in allowing spiritualistic motives to affect his characters has not added to the reality and interest of his story. The Sicilian vendetta would have borne development better than the somewhat elusive and roundabout influence of the spirit-world after two generations. Still, there are pretty pieces of Italian

THE NEW BOOK OF GOLF.

Edited by Horace G. Hutchinson. Illustrated by Photographs. 6s net. (Longmans)

Golf, a game as old and as persistent as Scottish pride, familiar as the Scot all over the earth, and perhaps as difficult to understand and to master, but withal perennially fascinating, makes an insistent claim upon the novice and

From Japan As I Saw it (Jarrod).

MOTHER AND CHILD.
(After a sketch by G. Bigot).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

the expert. There must be a pretty considerable library on the subject of this pastime; but there will always be a demand for books that profess to tell one how to play it. One recalls several more or less recent works with this particular claim; but it may be said at once that in workmanship and in price the volume before us is a formidable rival in the field. The name of the editor counts for much, and his "team" of contributors have much to recommend them. Mr. A. C. M. Croome, a professional instructor of youth, is responsible for the prologue, wherein the young idea is counselled "How to Learn." Mr. Bernard Darwin supplies clear instruction of the needed elementary kind on driving, the proper use of the clubs, and the things to avoid. Mr. J. Sherlock treats of the game from the professional point of view, touching also on the important subject of temperament. Mr. C. K. Hutchinson assures us that the definition of genius as the possession of an infinite capacity for taking pains is at least happily applicable to the genius at golf. And Mrs. Ross (née Hezlet) contributes an excellent guide to the game from the ladies' standpoint. There are nearly seventy photographs, photographs of well-known players, and photographs of players in position, from which the novice should gather many a hint that will enforce the lessons in the text.

WOMAN IN MODERN SOCIETY.

By PROFESSOR EARL BARNES. 3s 6d. net (Cassell.)

WOMAN AND TO-MORROW.

By W. L. GEORGE. 2s. 6d. net. (Herbert Jenkins.)

The arguments for woman's suffrage have rarely been marshalled with greater skill or presented with more force, sanity and earnestness than they are in these two books. Professor Barnes is well known as an American educationist; Mr. W. L. George as an English novelist and sociologist; each writes with special knowledge of his subject, in a spirit that is at once judicial and broadly human, and each comes to the same conclusion, that there is no reasonable ground on which woman's claim to an equal share in the government of her country can be opposed; that the doors which usage and convention have locked against her must, in simple justice and right, be thrown open; that in a word, whatever the selfish, the old-fashioned, the timid, the complacently tyrannical may say to the contrary, the triumph of feminism is a foregone conclusion. And they see that its triumph will not only do away with "a great source of dangerous sex antagonism," but the influence of women actively exerted in public affairs will widen the minds, strengthen the weaknesses of women themselves and be wholly humanising and civilising. It is absurd to say that women take no interest in politics or public life. Men would take no interest in them either, if they had no vote, were allowed no share in the ruling of themselves and their fellows, were merely compelled to sit meekly aside and accept arbitrary laws and rules in whose shaping they had no voice. Speaking for the feminists, Mr. George says: "We are not content with the more or less sterile products of the ballot box; we wish to arrive at a state when the differences between men and women will be reduced to sexual differences, because those alone are natural. . . . We do not think it material that girls should learn engineering, but we do wish to attain a social condition where no one will be surprised because they learn engineering. We attach far more value to the formation of character than to knowledge they may acquire." If women are petty, vain, dishonourable, he urges: "it is because everything that could be done to develop those traits in them has been done;" for "woman has had no opportunity in the feminist sense since the intellectual life of the world began." Men and women are not alike, as Professor Barnes has it, "but they are perfectly supplementary," and each will "achieve greatest freedom and happiness, not by minimising sex differences, but by frankly recognising them and using them." Man does not like surrendering the supremacy he has so long arrogated to himself, but no just person can thoughtfully weigh the case against him, as Mr. George and Professor Barnes state it, without feeling that he is in the wrong and that the time has come for woman to be his partner and not his servant. These are two timely, significant and altogether admirable books.

HISTORICAL VIGNETTES.

By BERNARD CAPES.

2s. 6d. net. (Sudgwick & Jackson.)

Most of these "vignettes" have been collected in book form before, but in this new and very dainty issue they should enjoy a renewal of their just success. These sketches of historical personages are among the most brilliant essays that Mr. Bernard Caves has yet given us.

From Republican France MARSHAL
(Holden & Hardingham). MACMAHON.

From The New Book of Golf (Longmans).

PUTTING. HOLDING OUT.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS SUPPLEMENT

BIOGRAPHY & HISTORY

From The Diaries of William Charles Macready
(Chapman & Hall)

WILLIAM CHARLES MACREADY, 1850.
From the bust by William Behms

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY. *

Lady Dorothy Nevill is now recognised as one of the wittiest and shrewdest observers of the long Victorian era, and the nineteenth century and after. Born in 1826, still vivacious and in every current of thought and movement of social life, she has many

* "My Own Times." By Lady Dorothy Nevill. 15s net. (Methuen.)

"The Romance of a Favourite." By Frédéric Loliée. 15s. net. (Constable.)

"The Irish Revolution" Vol. I. By M. J. F. McCarthy. 10s 6d. net. (Blackwood.)

"Gregory the Great." By Sir H. H. Howorth. 12s net. (Murray.)

"Autobiography of Henry M. Stanley." 6s. net. (Sampson Low & Co.)

a good anecdote to tell, many a piece of delightful gossip, many a pungent and wise comment to make upon the men and the manners and the doings she has seen and known and been in touch with all her life. Her book "My own Times" is rambling and without form, but never void. Story follows story, we have glimpses of people of supreme interest and highest place in their day—Lady Dorothy Nevill knew and knows them all—notes upon changes in ways of living, a flick of satire to this new custom, a word of praise for another the whole book has an air of gaiety and cheerful geniality which, taken with its keen perception, makes it fascinating reading. It is a great temptation to quote some of her stories, or some of her pronouncements on the changes in social life and manners, for which she always gives her reasons, and good reasons too, even when one holds an opposite opinion from hers. But we must be content with one little anecdote apropos of the behaviour of certain kinds of nouveaux riches.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

"Talking of dinners on one occasion, and commenting upon the eccentricities of hosts, an individual of this sort said: 'For instance, only a few days ago I was dining at my friend's, the Duke of Northumberland, and there was no fish.' 'I suppose,' said a quiet voice from the other end of the table, 'it had all been eaten upstairs.'" Very neat, and very powerful, and sharp as any two-edged sword.

Lady Dorothy Nevill tells us that Madame de Castiglione "used to be called the 'silent lady' because her voice was so seldom heard." Comtesse de Castiglione is the heroine of M. Frédéric Loliée's "Romance of a Favourite," written with all the knowledge and grace that distinguish M. Loliée's books dealing with the histoire intime of France under the Second Empire. The lady in question was a great power in Europe while her day lasted, and in her day she was certainly one of the most surprisingly beautiful creatures ever seen. When she appeared for the first time in a box in a London theatre, quite a commotion was caused, the attention of the audience was focussed upon her and not on the stage, and men were standing everywhere on their seats the better to see the beauty. She was the wife of a Piedmontese diplomatist, whose first wife had been, it was said, hideous beyond degree. After the death of the latter, M. de Castiglione, who inherited some money, declared he would marry the most beautiful woman he could find. The Comtesse was deep in international intrigue, but after the break-up of the Empire in 1870 her day was ended. We can most of us remember how some dozen years ago she died in straitened circumstances and almost forgotten in that same Paris where, forty years ago, she had been all but a queen by virtue of her beauty and charm. And we remember the apprehensions in the highest circles in Europe lest her papers, which included carefully hoarded letters and documents containing most compromising and inflammable matter and signed with the most august and venerable names, should fall into indiscreet hands. But the whole of her story is best left with M. Loliée, who tells it with insight and sympathy.

Mr. M. J. F. McCarthy's history of the Irish Revolution, an account of the rise and development of the present relations between England and Ireland, begins in 1877, just before the days of the Land League and terrorism. He divides the period into two parts, the first of which he calls "the Murdering Time," which is to be followed presently by a second volume, bringing the tale down to the second Home Rule Bill. The years dealt with in this volume are within Mr. McCarthy's own personal recollection, and he claims to be himself a child and product of this Revolution. His own recollections, supplemented by references to Hansard, to the newspapers of the time, and to the works devoted by other writers to this period, have furnished him with the material for a plain unvarnished story, which will be read and consulted with very great interest at this moment. The volume, of course, centres upon the great personality of Parnell, and Mr. McCarthy pays no inadequate tribute to that leader and his work. The story makes very instructive reading, the record of the Land League is very fairly displayed, and the tally of killings, woundings, and minor outrages under its sway, is an astonishing hint of the possibilities of determined lawlessness. Mr. McCarthy's book gains very much in weight and authority by the disappearance of a somewhat crude parti pris so immediately apparent in that very aggressive volume, "Priests and People in Ireland," and the present history will, when completed, present an admirable summary of events, and in many cases explain things that have been obscure to those not behind the scenes.

In his monograph on Pope Gregory the Great Sir Henry H. Howorth presents to us a man who exerted an immense influence in his own time, not merely from his position as Pope, but through his own inherent powers and qualities, and whose influence extended down for several centuries until the Renaissance broke through it finally. His time was the end of the sixth century, when the Empire was centred at Byzantium, when once-great Rome was reduced to a population of some forty thousand instead of the million of Augustus's days, when great public buildings were mouldering away, when grass and weeds grew in the deserted streets, when the life of Rome was denuded of every activity, of learning, of the hope of prosperity. The Lombards were in Italy, and Gregory had many conflicts with them, not always to the satisfaction of Byzantium or the Exarch in Italy. But through every trouble from without or from within Gregory held on his way, administering his charge, looking after the temporal welfare of the city and the country, establishing great principles in the Church, writing works that became and remained for many centuries the "most potent and the most read of all manuals. They formed the inspiration of the Mediæval

From Christmas in Ritual and Tradition
(Unwin).

THE ADORATION OF THE SHEPHERDS.
By Fouquet. (Musée Condé, Chantilly).

Church." He sent missionaries to England, and as Sir Henry H. Howorth truly says "few men in so short a time with such a fragile life ever did so much that proved to be lasting." He was deeply opposed to the study of the ancient classical writers, and in this way led men away from the old-wise humanities to the narrow, fierce, and to some extent barren study of dogma. But he deserved the title of "great," and the author of this monograph is to be congratulated on his labours in interpreting to us a man so little considered in his relation to the civilized world and to modern Christianity.

An edition of Stanley's Autobiography at six shillings is sure to be welcome. The great African explorer gave much to the world, and not the least gift was this portrait

From The Life and Letters of Frederic Shields (Longmans).

THE CHAPEL OF THE ASCENSION, BAYSWATER.

of himself from which we can see what manner of man he was, his beginnings, the influences that helped to shape him, the circumstances that led to his career. The actual autobiography comprises only nine chapters, after that the book is made up of personal narrative, derived from

Stanley's books, lectures, letters, chiefly from hitherto unpublished writings, linked up and explained by a commentary supplied by Lady Stanley. What an inspiring record does this life present! A boyhood spent in a Welsh workhouse, ill-treated by a brutal schoolmaster, without affection, neglected and disowned by his mother, the running away, the vicissitudes and hardships that followed, the finding of America and independence, and the friend who became all the father he ever knew, even to giving him his name. Then the Civil War in America, in which he fought for the South, and was taken prisoner, to become a journalist when released. Wanderings in Europe and Western Asia fitted him for his first great task, the finding of Livingstone, and it was his time with Livingstone that turned him into an explorer, bent on discovery, not upon errands. Just what he did for Africa and civilization we are sometimes in danger of forgetting, we talk glibly of the Congo and Belgium and King Leopold, and atrocities, and fail to remember that it was Stanley who traversed that State, who created it, who begged England to make it hers and develop it, who was refused and laughed at, and who finally, failing England, gave it to Belgium, and did the first pioneer work of settlement. The map of Africa is very different in our atlases now from what it was in those of forty years ago; we know the blank it then presented, whereas now, thanks chiefly to Stanley and his followers, we have

From Christmas in Ritual and Tradition
(Unwin).

ST. FRANCIS INSTITUTES THE "PRESEPIO" AT GRECCIO.
By Giotto. From a photo. by Allinari. (Upper Church of St. Francis, Assisi.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Grandeur that was Rome.
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

ROMAN BRIDGE AT RIMINI.

all this great central district populous with towns and stations and known landmarks. But beyond all this record of achievement, the autobiography is interesting for what makes the success of any biography—the man we find there. Stanley conceived himself to be a man with a definite special mission, and bent all his life and his immense energy upon fulfilling it. He succeeded, and few things are more stimulating than a tale of success nobly won.

F. M. A

THE GATEWAY OF SCOTLAND;

Or East Lothian, Lammermoor, and the Merse. By A. G. BRALLEY. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net. (Constable.)

Of the making of wander-books there is no end. Mr. Bradley is a past-master of the art, and his latest production is not the least acceptable of the many volumes that now stand to his credit. It is in some respects the best of them. Are people aware of the number and variety of beauty-spots that are to be found at home and the wealth of romance that attaches to them? There seems to be need for a revival of interest in the old land, and these so informative pages cannot but help in that direction. The book deals with some of the most haunted spots in the "North Countree." For of this particular "gateway"—a picturesque phrase—it has been declared there is not a field but has its battle and not a rivulet its song. It was here that Thomas the Rhymer, "the father of Scottish poetry," flourished as early as the 13th century, and since his day the succession of seers and singers has been almost numberless. This, too, is the land of the Maitlands, the Hornes, and the Erskines, names clothed with historic glory. Greatest of all, it was the birth-place of John Knox and the home of Sir Walter Scott. To find on the map of the Merse and Lammermoor places like Earlstoun, Cowdenknowes (who has not heard of its "bonnie broom?") Gordon, Lander, Spottiswood, Weddeburn, Coldingham, is to feel at once the supreme significance of this "gateway." Strangely enough, Berwickshire still waits its historian, albeit it can boast of one of the oldest, and certainly one of the best, Naturalists' Clubs in the kingdom, whose Proceedings are a perfect mine of scientific and antiquarian richness. Neither had Haddington its historian till then. Mr. Bradley's book can quite well fill the niche for both counties. There is no more trustworthy guide, whose task has been made possible only after an unconscionable amount of reading and patient, studious investigation. The author has explored every inch of this extremely fascinating corner of the old Eastern March, to which some of his own earliest memories cling. Nothing has been omitted that is of any importance, and there has been restored to the light of day much old-world lore that was in danger of perishing altogether. There can be nothing but praise for the work, and to praise the literary craftsman is by no means to ignore or belittle the artistic efforts of the illustrator, whose sketches lend distinction to so notable a contribution to the literature of the open road.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF FREDERIC SHIELDS.

Edited by ERNESTINE MILLS. With Photogravure Portrait and 41 other Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net. (Longmans)

Mr. Mills has written a very able and finely sympathetic biography of one of the greatest and most interesting of the great Victorian artists. Shields outlived the Victorian era—he has been only some two years dead—but in any general classification he counts among the famous Victorians. Of his art we need say little here, for Mr. Mills has set himself to tell the story of the artist's life and work; to write a biography and not an art criticism, and he has fulfilled his task admirably. Though he was reticent and retiring and lived less in the public eye than many of his smaller contemporaries, Shields moved much in the best society of his time; he knew Ruskin, Swinburne, G. F. Watts, Noel Paton, William Morris, Rossetti, and the members of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, and the letters that passed between him and some of them, notably Rossetti and Madge Brown, are among the most valuable and interesting features of the volume. The greatest of

PORTRAIT OF ST GREGORY IN STATE DRESS, FROM AN IVORY DIPTYCH ON A BOOK AT MONZA, PRESENTED BY HIM TO QUEEN THEODELINDA.

From St. Gregory the Great (Murray).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

Shields' work is probably in that wonderful series of paintings on the walls of the Chapel of the Ascension at Bayswater. When the last of these noble pictures was finished, despite the interruptions of ill-health and monetary anxieties, Arthur Hughes said of them: "I think there never could have been a greater triumph of endurance and character in any date of Art's history," and Mr. Mills adds: "And this surely applies not only to his latest work, but to the whole life story of Frederic Shields"; and the whole life story as it is unfolded here amply justifies him in saying so. It is a book of real and permanent value—one of the very few enduring biographies that this year has produced.

CHRISTMAS IN RITUAL AND TRADITION.

By CLEMENT A. MILES. With Four Coloured Plates and other Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net. (T. Fisher Unwin)

Mr. Miles has set himself a fascinating task, and he has exercised it with praiseworthy industry and with an enthusiasm that will keep his readers' attention to the last page of a portly volume. The scope of the book is in reality the Scotsman of his "sowans," and Hogmanay. The illustrations are well chosen and well reproduced, and the book as a whole stands far apart from the merely pleasing compilations made for the Christmas market. It is about the Christmas season, but not of it.

THE GRANDEUR THAT WAS ROME.

By J. C. STOBART. With 95 Plates and 13 Illustrations in the Text. 30s. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson)

Mr. Stobart's remarkable work, which was published last year, and to which was given as a title the first half of the Quotation—"The Glory that was Greece"—will long be remembered as one of the happiest of popularisations of the classical tradition. The companion volume which has just been published deserves to meet with equal success. Once more the writer proves that he understands to a nicety the treatment of this subject which a non-expert but intelligent public demands. He shows the same skill and sureness in his handling of all questions pertaining to literature and art, and his study of the Roman methods of

From The Grandeur that was Rome
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

HADRIAN'S WALL: NEAR HOUSESTEADS, NORTHUMBERLAND.
Photo., Gibson & Son.

much wider than its title might indicate. As is well known, the Christmas ritual and tradition represent the resultant of many forces, pagan and Christian, and have absorbed characteristics originally connected with other celebrations. For this reason Mr. Miles's history extends from November to Twelfth Night; and so ambitious is his survey, that he ranges from the Roman Saturnalia to the Hampstead Carnival of last year. He has succeeded in collecting and arranging a vast amount of information, and has provided a useful index, which, if it had been fuller, would have added to the value of a book that is certain to find favour as a work of reference. There is also a very useful section of bibliographical references. The only fault we have to find with the book is its attempt to embrace too much. It thus falls between the two stools of the scholarly and the popular, with the natural result that it is sometimes sketchy and fragmentary, sometimes disproportionately elaborate and unnecessarily "documented." But the most insular Briton will find abundance here of interesting lore. The Englishman may learn here the true significance of his mistletoe and plum-pudding and Christmas cards; government is quite unusually able. The volume is finely produced—in a manner which does justice to its contents.

FORTY-FIVE YEARS OF MY LIFE, 1770 to 1815.

By the PRINCESS LOUISE OF PRUSSIA. Illustrated. 16s. net. (Eveleigh Nash)

Someone fancied the Princess Louise of these memoirs might have made a match with the Prince of Wales of her day. On a visit to Spa, "where all London is gathered," she notes that persons attached to the Prince were saying he ought to marry in order to maintain his popularity. "I was assured of his favour if my parents should decide to make the journey to London. My mother was not unwilling." This journey was not to be—death in the family intervened—and the Princess duly married Prince Anton of Radziwill, the same who set Goethe's "Faust" to music, and was called by him "the first and only veritable troubadour I have ever known." The memoirs and diary were written in French. They show the author a womanly Princess, a loving wife and mother, who bore her full share of sorrow. Daughter of Prince Ferdinand of Prussia and niece of Frederick the Great, Louise writes with detachment of the demoralised Prussian Court of the late eighteenth century. We read of Frederick William II. marrying two women in face of his Queen. One died a suspicious death; the second, returning in a vain attempt to retrieve lost favour, threw herself at the King's feet, then became violent, and finally cast at him her two children, whom she never wished to see more. Princess Louise accompanied the Royal Family on their flight, after Jena, to Königsberg and Memel; and perhaps the best passages are those in which Napoleon struts upon the stage. When the Queen of Prussia anxiously wanted him to talk conditions of peace he asked: "You are wearing a superb dress, where was it made? Do they make crape in your factories, too?" Looking the King up and down, Napoleon said of his grey pantaloons: "You are every day to button all those buttons? Do you begin at the top or the bottom?" Murat, at whose Cossack breeches Napoleon poked fun, remarked in a fury: "He is a scoundrel, is the Emperor." On the whole that will be the measure of the reader's respect for the Corsican here. Apart from the index, there are useful biographical data of persons mentioned in the book. Although not exciting, the memoirs have many points of historical interest and entertainment.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

ALEXANDER HENDERSON, THE COVENANTER.

By JAMES PRINGLE THOMSON, M.A. With Foreword by Lord Balfour of Burleigh, and 4 Illustrations. 1s. 6d. net. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

But few books have been written on one of the most interesting of the Scottish Covenanters—Alexander Henderson—and it is surprising that so excellent a subject for biography should have been neglected for so lengthy a period. Since 1846 no one, as

From Forty-Five Years of my Life (Nash).

PRINCE ANTON RADZIWILL (HUSBAND OF PRINCESS LOUISE).

the author says, "has attempted anything like an exhaustive survey, although our historical knowledge has been greatly widened during the last sixty years." To all persons, therefore, who are interested in religious history, Mr. Pringle Thomson's handy little volume will be welcome. The author possesses a genuine gift for the fair and unbiassed presentation of historical character. He has consulted a large number of authorities, and has been able to include several details about Henderson which have not before appeared. We hope that the book will find its way into the hands of a large number of readers.

A PRINCE OF PLEASURE: PHILIP OF FRANCE AND HIS COURT. 1640-1701.

With 25 Illustrations and 3 Genealogical Tables. 12s. 6d. net. (Herbert Jenkins)

From Alexander Henderson, the Covenanter (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier).

ALEXANDER HENDERSON.
From the picture in Yester House, by permission of the Marquis of Tweeddale.

"If some of the intrigues require a clear brain to unravel," says Mr. Stokes in his introduction, "the reader must admire the audacious ingenuity of the men and women who wove the tangle, and not enter judgment in any other than a charitable spirit." We are willing enough to agree with this sentiment in theory, but, where King Philip of France is concerned, it is one remarkably difficult to put into practice. A loose liver even for his easy times, effeminate in the extreme, and the possible murderer of his first wife, his is not an attractive figure, in spite of the calm justice meted out to him by Mr. Stokes. The latter, however, need have no fears as to the interest that his book aroused in us. It impresses us as an exceedingly well-written book, of a type very much superior to the average of its class, and to those who have a taste for biography of this kind we can cordially recommend it.

CARDINAL RICHELIEU.
After a miniature by J. Petitot in the Jones Collection.
From A Prince of Pleasure
(Herbert Jenkins).

long and ardently laboured, Justin McCarthy was compelled to put aside much of his literary work and fight his old leader and friend, in the hope of enabling Gladstone to retrieve the damage done to the scheme of Home Rule for Ireland. So "Our Book of Memories" was not written in the form intended. But by collecting the letters that her collaborator wrote to her from 1885 to 1911, and weaving them into a narrative of their friendship, Mrs. Campbell Praed has produced just the sort of book that she and her fellow-worker once hoped to compose. Moreover, she has succeeded in raising a fine and touching monument of the life and character of one of the most interesting and attractive of modern literary politicians. For Justin McCarthy's letters more fully reveal his nature than does any work published by him in his lifetime. Writing to a lady who was his pupil, friend and, in some matters, his inspiuer, he tells much more than he would to a man. For he supposes she is ignorant of political life, and

OUR BOOK OF MEMORIES.

Letters from Justin McCarthy to Mrs. Campbell Praed. 12s. 6d. net. (Chatto & Windus.)

After Mrs. Campbell Praed and Mr. Justin McCarthy had written three novels in collaboration, they conceived the idea of working together on a book of recollections of the political, literary and social life of England and Ireland during the last quarter of a century. But when Parnell ruined his career and injured the cause for which he had much of his passion for the quietly laborious life of the scholar to his personal affection for Parnell and his patriotic devotion to Ireland. The man and the cause were one to his mind; and when they were separated, and he had to strike down the man in order to save the cause, he put forth just the strength to do it and then broke down himself. It has often been said that McCarthy lacked the force of character necessary to lead the distracted Irish party out of

CARDINAL MAZARIN.
After an enamel by J. Petitot.
From A Prince of Pleasure
(Herbert Jenkins).

From A Prince of Pleasure
(Herbert Jenkins).

HENRIETTA OF ORLEANS.
After a portrait by an unknown artist in the Palace of Versailles.

the extraordinary difficulties into which it fell. But this is not true. What he really lacked was the masterfulness of temper that would then have destroyed the party. By combining a definite resolution with a definite moderation he accomplished the main object of his intervention, and preserved some sort of transition between the strange fortunes of the cause of Irish Home Rule. His personal reputation and his fame as an historian were always assets of high value to the party he joined; and if when Parnell fell he had retired from the strife, the Irish party would not occupy its present position of power. He was a man with a genius for friendship, and the most bitter of his political opponents were swayed by his charm, his geniality and his cultivated mind. Yet beneath all his urbanity and sociableness and love of peaceful ways, there was a strength of soul that none suspected until it was revealed. Such is the main impression that we have obtained from his letters,

"LA GRANDE MADEMOISELLE," MADEMOISELLE DE MONTPENSIER.
After an enamel by Petitot in the Jones Collection.
From A Prince of Pleasure
(Herbert Jenkins).

so explains matters in detail and gives just that kind of simple and yet intimate description of affairs which has a special interest for a general reader. Thus we get in a long series of letters, written every day in the heat and dust of the conflict, a broad and vivid picture of the inner aspect of the strange, dramatic and tragic struggle over the first Home Rule Bill. Justin McCarthy's part in the struggle was heroic. He had begun by sacrificing which for the most part abound in gay and pleasant sketches of life in Upper Bohemia, a delightful region of London, where literary men and women, politicians, players and society people mingle and entertain each other, and in which during many years of his life Justin McCarthy was a familiar and a welcome figure. Mrs. Campbell Praed does her part of the work excellently well: she writes with deep but restrained feeling.

FRANÇOISE ATHÉNAÏS DE MORTEMART, MADAME DE MONTESPAN.
After an enamel by Petitot in the Jones Collection.
From A Prince of Pleasure
(Herbert Jenkins).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

THE VICEROYS OF IRELAND.

By CHARLES O'MAHONY.
16s. net. (John Long.)

Mr. O'Mahony's theme is vast and varied, affording occasion for the study of heights and deeps—but the latter more than the former—of humanity. England sent some strange characters to Ireland as viceroys in mediæval and early-modern times, and some rather interesting personalities in days nearer our own, and in our own for that matter. Mr. O'Mahony presents them all with a certain detachment and candour, and in the result not a little light is necessarily thrown on the crowded and complicated Anglo-Irish situation in the Middle Ages and modern times. The real Ireland, with its vivid and wonderfully persistent civilisation, scarcely comes into the survey; very often, the viceroys had no contact whatever with that inner Ireland, its intellectual and spiritual life was remote and dim to their consciousness. Mr. O'Mahony wisely avoids theory and controversy, letting his facts speak for themselves. He has a kindly eye for comedy and tragi-comedy, and a certain zest for stories illustrative of life's little ironies. He does not try to paint his viceroys any better than they were; his book was obviously not prompted by any sense of enthusiasm for the generality of his subjects in themselves. The work is not meant as history in any deep or vivid sense, but it is a serviceable and straightforward record, incidentally affording a measure of food for thought.

MARIE-ANTOINETTE: HER EARLY YOUTH 1770-1774.

By LADY YOUNG-HUSBAND. With 9 illustrations. 15s. net. (Macmillan.)

For her study of the youth of Marie-Antoinette, Lady Young-husband has had access to a considerable amount of unpublished or untranslated material, and the result

From The Viceroys of Ireland (Long).

LORD WHARTON.

is a book of the greatest interest. In her introduction the author points out that, although much has been written about Marie-Antoinette, we know but little about her girlhood. "What were the forces that impelled her nolens volens into that stormy arena, so foreign to her character and tastes; what were the details of an education scarcely begun when she left Vienna, and continued under inconceivable conditions during the crucial years succeeding her arrival as the fourteen-year-old official bride of the heir to the French throne—of all this we knew little or nothing until Comte de Mercy-Argenteau lifted the curtain that veiled the scenes of her strange girlhood." Lady Young-husband evinces a very decided talent for the historical memoir. Her style is bright and readable, and she finds her way through the mazes of research with a graceful facility which is entirely admirable. Her book well deserves reading and keeping.

A TRAMP IN SPAIN FROM ANDALUSIA TO ANDORRA.

By BART KENNEDY.
40 full-page illustrations. 6s. net.

This is a handsome re-issue of one of the ablest and most interesting of Mr. Bart Kennedy's books. In his characteristic and very graphic style he tells in it of a tramp he undertook from one end of Spain to the other, and of the adventures and dangers he encountered by the way. With no knowledge of the language, he made his way afoot over hundreds of miles of mountainous, lonely country; his character sketches of the people he met are vividly and cleverly done, and his descriptions of scenery are always admirable. Mr. Bart Kennedy is the authentic Super-Tramp and this is a delightful account of one of his most notable journeys.

From Marie-Antoinette: Her Early Youth
(Macmillan).

THE DAUPHINE.
From a pastel by Joseph Krantzinger, 1771. Imperial collection.

DON JOHN OF AUSTRIA.

By LUIS COLOMA. Translated by Lady Moreton. 16s. net.
(John Lane.)

Don John of Austria was indeed almost a Prince of Fairyland. The natural son of the Emperor Charles V. half-brother of Philip II. of Spain, as a boy brought up in ignorance of his birth until he was fourteen, then at court, where he became a favourite; he was destined for the Church, then at the height of its power and splendour in Spain and Europe. But the boy was no Churchman; he was a soldier, and the Church's loss was the gain of Christendom, when as Generalissimo of the Christian armament he won the epoch-making sea fight of Lepanto, which checked the hitherto unvanquished Ottoman Empire. Afterwards he was one of the most renowned men of his day: proposed as a husband for Mary of Scotland, set out to rescue her from prison, to marry her and be king of England with her as queen, a plan much favoured by the Pope, but thwarted by Philip who sent his brother to command in the Low countries where he died of plague or poison, was buried first at Namur, then brought to Spain, cut in pieces at the joints and packed in three leathern saddle bags for the journey to be buried again with the utmost pomp in the Escorial.

From The Romance of a Favourite
(Constable).

COUNTESS DE CASTIGLIONE.
From a portrait by Giraud.

This translation is from the Spanish of Padre Luis Coloma's book "Jeromín," half a novel and half history, and tells in a most interesting way the life of one of the most interesting young men who have ever lived. He is almost as romantic a figure as was Carlo Zeno of Venice. The book is sumptuously illustrated with portraits, many of which were specially photographed for the first time for Lady Moreton.

WHEN KINGS RODE TO DELHI.

By GABRIELLE FESTING. 7s. 6d. net. (Wm. Blackwood & Sons.)

With the story of Delhi is bound up the memories and traditions of nearly three thousand years. It is a story of battles and intrigues in which sultans, shahs and rajahs play their part amid scenes where the "barbaric pearl and gold" of the purple East is poured out in high profusion.

From The Letter Bag of Lady Elizabeth
Spencer-Stanhope
(Lane.)

GEORGE III.,
WHEN MAD.

From The Story of Don
John of Austria
(Lane.)

PHILIP II. AS A YOUNG MAN.
Titian. Prado Gallery, Madrid.
Photo., Lacoste

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

Recognising that the real history of India begins with the Muslim conquest, the author commences the record with the story of the Sultan Mahmud who plundered and conquered Hindustan in the eleventh century, although he himself never reached the city, which fell in the year 1191 to the prowess of Mohammad Ghori who, with his reserves of 12,000 men in steel armour scattered the Rajputs, for all their reckless bravery, on a field, bestrewn with flags and spears and jewelled swords and armour. Amongst the hosts of dead were the Viceroy of Delhi, the Raja of Chitor, and nearly one hundred and fifty princes and chieftains. With that great tragedy commenced a history that in some aspects recalls the story of the "Arabian Nights," (oddly enough one of the stories told in the book deals with a Sultan Ala-ad-in, although it is not the Aladdin of our nursery days.) We read of Shah Jehan, Aurungzib and Barba. We are taken through a fascinating record of conspiracies, love-tragedies, murders, mysteries and gorgeous pageants, until we arrive at our own prosaic days which are dismissed in the epilogue with a brevity that is quite intelligible after the dazzling annals that have gone before. Nevertheless, we should have been glad to see a more extended reference to the Mutiny, for that is no insignificant part of the story of Delhi. The author writes clearly throughout, and resists any temptation to indulge in "purple passages." The material, indeed, stands in no need of adventitious aid. It can glitter and allure without the help of flowery phrases. There are a number of illustrations, mainly pictures of the various potentates associated with the history of Delhi.

From King René d'Anjou and his Seven Queens (Long).

RENÉ D'ANJOU (Circa 1440).
Painted by himself. "Le Livre des Heures"

From When Kings Rode to Delhi
(Blackwood).

NUR JAHAN DRESSING HERSELF.

KING RENÉ D'ANJOU AND HIS SEVEN QUEENS.

By EDGUMBLE STALEY. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. net. (John Long.)

Mr. Staley's researches into the byways of fifteenth-century France result in a volume of considerable interest and value. One who is so profoundly enthusiastic about his subject can hardly fail to be engaging when dealing with so many romantic episodes as touch the history of King René. The title, of course, is a fantasy. René had two Queens—Isabelle, whom he married in 1420, and whose death in 1453 left him in despair; and Jehanne de Laval, whom he married in 1455, he being then forty-seven and she twenty-two. The other "Queens" are not his wives. One is Jeanne d'Arc, La Pucelle, upon hearing of whose death René cried bitterly: "Ma Royne blanche, Jeanne, est mort—hélas! ma Royne est mort!" Another was Marguerite d'Anjou (daughter of René and Isabelle), who married Henry VI. of England. Henry heard of the sensation Margaret had created when she visited her aunt, Queen Marie of France. She was then nearly fourteen years old. Cardinal Beaufort, moved by her appearance and accomplishments, returned to England to fire Henry's ardour. Mr. Staley describes the wedding at Tours and Nancy. King René was too impoverished to provide a fitting trousseau for his daughter. She had a fearful crossing to England, where Henry awaited her, and twelve days after arriving the English marriage took place at Titchfield. Not only had the terrified girl to pay on her way for her pilot and hawsers and repairs to the vessel, but Henry had to pawn his own jewellery and plate for funds for the double ceremony. To Mr. Staley René is the most remarkable personality in the French Renaissance. He has gathered illustrations from many sources to adorn his book, which, in spite of little discrepancies, is thoroughly enjoyable.

THE ROMANCE OF SANDRO BOTTICELLI. WOVEN FROM HIS WRITINGS.

By A. J. ANDERSON. 10s. 6d. net. (Stanley Paul)

"The Romance of Botticelli" is a combination of fiction and fact, effectively joined and managed. In spite of a great deal of conjecture which can easily be set aside, it is full of constructive criticism of Botticelli's work. The question is, Will this book not fall between two sections of the public? Do readers who enjoy a love-tale want the art-criticism? Will those who are concerned with the creations of genius care for the padding of romance in which the art-interest is wrapped. Necessarily, the association of truth with romance affects both of them; but this we can say, that there is more reliable or likely history in this volume than in half the books which have recently been written round the circumstances and personalities of Napoleon, Richelieu, the Second Charles, Anne of Austria, and some others. It is a bold achievement to imagine a great artist's love-story and work. We can faithfully assert that this book, carefully and intelligently written, deserves a far better success than it is likely to realise.

From The Romance of Sandro Botticelli
(Stanley Paul).

DETAIL FROM MADONNA DI SAN BARNABA.
(Anderson, photo. Academy, Florence).

From The Education of the Women of India
(Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier).

GHURKA GIRL BOARDER AT S.P.G. GIRLS' SCHOOL, MANDALAY.

THE EDUCATION OF THE WOMEN OF INDIA.

By MINNA G. COWAN, M.A. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net. (Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier.)

This is a modest book on a great but complicated subject. Avowedly it is an analysis of the three forces, government, Indian, and missionary, which are contributing to the education of women in India. Much more attention is devoted to the first and third of these forces than to the second, though a certain emphasis is laid upon its varying manifestations. However, it does not receive adequate recognition or treatment, and so the general picture is imperfect. Were Miss Cowan as sympathetic or as generous towards the Indian as she is towards the missionary spirit her work would be wider and more satisfying in appeal. At the same time it must be ungrudgingly admitted that there is no trace of conscious partiality; Miss Cowan writes according to the measure of her insight and sympathy. She devotes a good deal of consideration to the problem of building up a system which will be truly educative, truly national, and truly religious, and in so doing adopts positions which are at least open to question. That India has as much to learn, or will take as much, from the West as she thinks, is more than doubtful. Her view of the future of Christianity in the Orient and the world generally is optimistic or idealistic. As a theorist she does not carry conviction, but a good deal of her objective presentation is informing and suggestive.

THE ANNALS OF HAMPSTEAD.

By THOMAS J. BARRATT. With over 500 Illustrations. 3 vols. £5 5s. net. (A. & C. Black)

HAMPSTEAD: ITS HISTORIC HOUSES, ITS LITERARY AND ARTISTIC ASSOCIATIONS.

By ANNA MAXWELL. With 4 Illustrations in Colour and many Reproductions of Old Prints and Original Drawings. 7s. 6d. net. (James Clarke & Co.)

No suburb of London is richer than Hampstead in literary and artistic associations and historic memories. Great changes have come over it of recent years: many of its

From Annals of Hampstead
(Black).

CHURCH ROW

ancient houses and quaint haunts and picturesque scenes have passed out of existence, but many still remain, and nothing can ever take from it the storied interest of its past. A list of the men famous in art, letters, politics, and general society who made their homes there, or were in one way or another connected with Hampstead, would run to a formidable length; accounts of them and of the history of Hampstead have filled many books, and now fill two more, and two of the best we have ever had the pleasure of reading. This of Mr. Thomas J. Barratt's is one of the stateliest and most beautiful of books; it is in three noble quartos, lavishly illustrated in colour, with photogravure plates, reproductions of old engravings, facsimilies of ancient charters, letters and other documents.

From Hampstead
(Jas. Clarke)

HAMPSTEAD HEATH.
Engraved after a painting by Constable.

From Annals of Hampstead
(Black).

OLD COTTAGES, NORTH END.

Mr. Barratt is a Hampstead resident of very long standing, he has been familiar with the neighbourhood since boyhood; and has for the greater part of his life lived there on the skirts of the Heath itself. Nor does his fitness for the task stop short at his love of Hampstead and the fact of his personal acquaintance with it; he has all along taken a keen interest in its antiquities and its history, and moreover possesses the largest collection in existence of water-colour drawings, prints, portraits, etchings, engravings, notices, programmes, old newspaper cuttings, and such like miscellanea connected with and illustrative of the history of Hampstead, and has been able to draw on this rich storehouse for much of the information and many of the illustrations that his book contains. Less sumptuously produced, and not so historically or topographically exhaustive, Miss Maxwell's book is a very adequate

From Annals of Hampstead, vol. I.
(Black).

WELL WALK, WITH A VIEW OF
THE PRESENT WELL, 1911.
From an original drawing by A. R.
Quinton in the Bell-Moor Collection.

and charmingly written guide to the Hampstead that used to be and the Hampstead that is. It is the result of diligent and conscientious research, and from a full knowledge of Hampstead ourselves we can say that Miss Maxwell has omitted nothing of moment to her story and is praiseworthy accurate throughout. Her pages are rich in the deathless stories of Keats, Leigh Hunt, Shelley, Constable, Stanfield, and famous men of earlier and later times whose life and work have become part and parcel of the History of Hampstead and are among its principal glories. No one could wish for an ampler record than Miss Maxwell has given us here of the literary, artistic and historic associations of the borough; she has a happy talent for describing a scene or relating a good anecdote; and a pleasant gift of writing about interesting things and people in a delightfully interesting style.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

THE BEGINNINGS OF MODERN IRELAND.

By PHILIP WILSON. 12s. 6d. net. (Maunsell)

Mr. Wilson is to be congratulated on the incisive style in which he sets forth his knowledge, as well as upon the mass and detail of the knowledge he has brought together in this book. Modern Ireland begins for him in the days of the Tudors. It has its foundations in the Anglicizing policy of Henry VIII., and in the plantation policies of Mary and Elizabeth and, afterwards, of James I. The present volume brings us down only to the end of the reign of Mary, but we are happily promised a sequel. Not the least interesting part of Mr. Wilson's book is the controversial introduction in which, after the manner of Lecky, he gives us something of the philosophy of the history with which he deals. Here he contends strongly that what we may in general call Irish ills are due neither to racial nor religious causes. As regards the racial question, he quotes Sir John Davies's opinion, expressed a few years after the accession of James the First, to the effect that a majority of the Irish people were of English descent, and, though he does not endorse this estimate, he agrees with those students of race who believe that the population of Ireland is mainly non-Celtic. More to the point in regard to the matter of the present volume is the author's exposure of the fallacy according to which the age-long quarrel between England and Ireland is represented as a quarrel between Protestantism and Catholicism. Mr. Wilson aptly points out that "it was under the rule of the Catholic Mary that the policy of confiscation and colonisation which was afterwards carried out in the name of Protestant ascendancy, was inaugurated." Ireland in those days had her share of the horrors of war, but they were not the horrors of religious war. Mary was only interested in Ireland as a subject country. As a Catholic country, it made no appeal to her sympathies. She was an Imperialist, not a sectarian, in her politics. The difference between her attitude to England and her attitude to Ireland was symbolised in her measures concerning the currency. After she came to the throne she tried to make herself popular in England by restoring the currency, but expressly withheld the reform from Ireland. "A proclamation of September, 1556," adds Mr. Wilson, after referring to the above fact, "made the circulation of base money penal except in Ireland, and the bad coins, which were no longer current in England, found their way in vast quantities across St. George's Channel." In a detail like that we seem to read a summary of nearly the whole course of Anglo-Irish history. Mr. Wilson chronicles the disorganisation of Tudor Ireland with an able and vivid pen; he is a tireless student of original sources. At the same time, one wishes he had departed a little from the conventional method of writing Irish history, and had followed Mrs. J. R. Green in her researches into the social, industrial and intellectual life of Ireland. The history of Ireland will never be written until the historians consent to follow the path which Mrs. Green has so brilliantly opened up. Mr. Wilson's book is, none the less, a forceful, cleverly written, and original piece of work which must find a place on the shelves of all serious students of Irish history.

ETON IN THE SEVENTIES.

By Hon. GILBERT COLERIDGE. 7s. 6d. net. (Smith, Elder.)

It is a commonplace that in middle life most men look back to their schooldays as the happy time. The troubles and griefs that beset them are forgotten, either sunk into their proper proportions or passed into the memory as things almost pleasant to recall for the sake of their associations; while the joys, the freshness, the intense delight of living remain. Any man who could set down unerringly the true tale of his time at public school or at college would make a book priceless for himself and of the strongest interest to others. But when the school is Eton, and the time some thirty odd years ago, and the boys have now become the men of our own generation whose work is done or still continuing, then, it must be agreed, that Mr. Coleridge's volume is in its nature excellent and sure to interest. The life of the school is shown us in its intimacy, the portraits of boys and of masters are excellent and alive, the anecdotes, the little vignettes of scenes and doings are admirably told and with consummate finish: the expression of what Eton was to the youth of that generation is sympathetic and complete. The delight of the author in his work is apparent, and what is done with joy and with knowledge is almost certain to affect others joyously. And in this case the reader of the book must share the pleasure of the writer, who has made a valuable addition to the special Eton bookshelf of the Old Etonian.

LATER POEMS OF ALEXANDER ANDERSON.

Edited by Alexander Brown. 10s. 6d. net. (Glasgow: Fraser, Asher & Co)

This collection of the later poems of "Surfaceman" is sure of a wide welcome from all lovers of one of the tenderest and most delightfully human of Scotland's poets. The volume is beautifully illustrated, and Mr. Alexander Brown supplies a sympathetic biographical sketch.

From My Own Times
(Methuen).

LADY DOROTHY NEVILL
Frontispiece to "The Keepsake," 1851.
After a painting by Buckner.

COUNT CARL VON MALITZ
Carl Gottlob Schröder

PORTRAIT OF A LADY UNKNOWN
Rodolphe B I

PORTRAIT OF A LADY UNKNOWN
Peper, n. 100

KING GEORGE III. OF ENGLAND
Richard Covey

Monotone Reproductions of four of the many Colour Illustrations in "PORTRAIT MINIATURES OF FIVE CENTURIES"
By ERNST LEMBERGER
HODDER AND STOUGHTON, LONDON

FRANCE
(THE MAKING OF THE NATIONS SERIES).

By CECIL HEADLAM, M.A. With 32 Plates, and Maps and Plans in the Text. (Black.)

The task of presenting a complete history of France in a manageable form, which is nevertheless not so condensed as to be a mere list of names and dates, is a very difficult one, and Mr. Cecil Headlam may be warmly congratulated upon his very able volume. Starting from the earliest times, he traces the story of France down to the present day. He has a gift of clear narration, and he does not allow himself to be carried away by prejudice. As a handy history of France the volume will be found very difficult to beat. It is most attractively produced and possesses several illustrations of more than ordinary interest.

FROM MY HUNTING DAY BOOK.

By HIS IMPERIAL AND ROYAL HIGHNESS THE CROWN PRINCE OF THE GERMAN EMPIRE AND OF PRUSSIA. Translated from the German by J. E. HODDER WILLIAMS. 6s. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

In a modest and very pleasantly, gossipy fashion the Crown Prince of Germany has narrated his experiences as a big-game hunter in India, in Switzerland, Germany and various parts of the Continent. It is a vivid and joyous narrative; the Prince reveals himself not only as a keen lover of sport, but as a lover of nature in all her aspects, and he has an easy and sensitive descriptive touch that brings into his pages the light and colour and atmosphere of the scenes that he pictures. There are pleasant records of a visit His Highness paid to Scotland, and he says flattering things about the comfort and hospitality of English country-house life; but perhaps the best chapters, the fullest of life and incident, are those which recount the story of the Prince's doings in India. There is an excellent frontispiece portrait of the Crown Prince, and a number of interesting and beautifully reproduced photographs illustrate the text.

From The Story of St. Elizabeth of Hungary.
(Herbert & Daniel.)

THE VIGO VERSE ANTHOLOGY.

1s. net (Elkin Mathews).

One time and another, many of the most accomplished and best known of our lesser living poets—and a few of the greater—have put forth a little volume of verse in Mr. Elkin Mathews's "Vigo cabinet" series, and now that these familiar little volumes have increased to over a hundred the publisher has been happily inspired to select the best work out of them into an Anthology. The result is a tastefully produced booklet containing some of the most significant of recent poetry. There is nothing in it that is not well worthy of its place, and we warmly congratulate both the publisher on his poets and the poets on their publisher.

From France (The Making of the Nations series).
(Black.)

THE ENGLISH EMBASSY ON THE DAY OF THE MASSACRE
OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW (1572).
From the painting by P. H. Calderon, A.R.A. Aug Rischgitz.

From Adam Lindsay Gordon and his Friends
(Constable).

GORDON ON VIKING.

of his marriage, of the writing of the most brilliant of his novels, his inauguration of the Young England movement, and his rise to the leadership of his party. We shall do no more here than record the publication of the book, which will be reviewed by Mr. Walter Sichel in the January Number of THE BOOKMAN.

THE POCKET
DISRAELI.

Compiled by J. B. Linden-baum. 1s. net. (Mills and Boon.)

Disraeli, with his gift for epigram and his cunning at turning memorable phrases lends himself readily to the art of the anthologist, and Mr. Lindenbaum has gathered into this neat little volume an altogether satisfying selection of those good things that Disraeli scattered so freely through his writings and speeches. Though he did not always act up to such of his aphorisms as "Life is too short to be little;" or "Beware of endeavouring to be a great man in a hurry," that takes nothing from the truth of them; he had grown wise by experience and has condensed no little wisdom and wit into many of the terse sentences with which Mr. Lindenbaum has so happily jewelled his pages. Time has taken something of the bloom from the novels of Disraeli; their plots begin to wear an old-fashioned air; their characters and dialogue to seem formal and artificial; but his shrewd thoughts on men and things have lost none of their freshness and piquancy, and his satirical humour sparkles as brightly as ever when it is taken out of its old setting and reset, as here, in an anthology.

LIFE OF BENJAMIN DISRAELI,
EARL OF BEACONSFIELD.

By W. F. MONYPENNY. Vol. II. 12s. net. (John Murray.)

Immediately on the publication of the second volume of his monumental Life of Beaconsfield we regret to have news of the death of the author. What progress Mr. Monypenny had made with the remaining two or three volumes that were to have completed the biography we do not know; it will not be easy to find an adequate successor who will take up the task he has left unfinished and bring it to a conclusion. This second volume covers the most interesting period of Disraeli's career—the period

From The Union of South Africa
(Pitman)

THE GRAVE OF CECIL RHODES.

Charles Dickens

From The Charles Dickens
Originals

CHARLES DICKENS:
A SILHOUETTE.

Reproduced by permission of the Proprietors of "The Connoisseur"

From Eton in the Seventies
(Smith, Elder).

THE AUTHOR.
By "The Wirer."

WILLIAM HONE: HIS LIFE AND TIMES.

By FREDERICK W. HACKWOOD. 10s. 6d.
net. (Fisher Unwin)

The greatest men are not always the most interesting, and one is glad to see our writers of popular biography giving so much attention of late to the lesser lights of the literary world. The lives of such men have often been more varied and more packed with human interest than those of contemporary immortals in whose circles they used to move unimportantly, and in the turbulent career of William Hone, Mr. Hackwood has found an admirable theme and has handled it with marked ability. Every lover of Lamb knows something of Hone, and has a kindly feeling towards him. Lamb helped him with those useful and entertaining compilations "The Every-Day Book," and "The Table Book," to which Cruikshank contributed many of his early sketches, and these and "The Year Book" represent Hone's principal services to literature. He had a plain, strong prose style, but wrote very indifferent poetry; and though his compilations still make good reading, it is the life he himself lived and the strenuous work he did in helping towards the reform of social and political abuses that keep his memory green. By turns bookseller, publisher, pamphleteer, editor, journalist, coffee-house-keeper, freethinker, so-called atheist, and then ardent religious convert, always more or less harassed by poverty, sometimes reduced almost to actual want, he maintained through all a brave, independent spirit, and made a few good friends and many enemies who were well worth making. He was a great champion of the under-dog; he did fine humanitarian work in the interests of poor

WILLIAM HONE:

A little-known silhouette, kindly lent by Mr. Fisher Unwin and not included in the book

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Historic New York (Putnam's).

BROADWAY AND THE BOWLING GREEN IN 1835.
SHOWING KENNEDY, WATTS, LIVINGSTON, AND VAN CORTLANDT HOUSES.

prisoners and the unhappy souls who were tormented in lunatic asylums; and his prosecution for blasphemy and atheism is at once the most triumphant episode in his chequered record and one of the many disgraceful chapters in the history of English Law. A homely, kindly, public-spirited, genuine kind of man, one has nothing but honour for him despite his eccentricities, and his weaknesses; our respect for him is not lessened even by the touch of ridicule with which Dickens flicked him; and if anything could add to our love of Lamb it is the twice-told tale of how he came out publicly as Hone's friend at a time when Hone was under a cloud and most of his friends were not desirous of being involved in what they considered his disgrace. That is a capital story of how he and Lamb talked themselves into a high and virtuous abhorrence of the dirty habit of snuff-taking and spontaneously and in unison threw their snuff boxes away on Hampstead Heath, and Hone was so wretched that he went out early next morning and bought a ha'porth of snuff at the first shop he could find open, then walking on to the Heath came upon Lamb groping among the gorse bushes for his snuff-box. This is a very entertaining, very good book; well worth writing and well worth reading.

TWO KINGS.

By COSMO HAMILTON. 2s.
net. (Chatto & Windus.)

Of the nine short stories that make up this volume perhaps the one that furnishes it with a title is the freshest and most ingenious. It tells how a young actor, Seymour King, personated for a time the King of Mysonia, and saves the real King from assassination and incidentally secures for himself the sensational advertisement needed to give him his chance of success on the stage. It is a gay, high-spirited romance, brisk and full of incident, with a pleasant love interest which ends in a day being fixed for the wedding. There is a touch of pathos in "Bachelors All;" the bachelors being four girls who are earning their own living and getting just a little weary of their independence and the struggle of making both ends meet.

Accident places a young man in their care, and they nurse him back to health and all fall in love with him, only to find he is engaged already, and the happier girl who arrives to take him from them is as unlike their practical, rather faded selves as any girl possibly could be. "She was like the picture of a girl on the cover of a magazine, so young, so charming, so dainty, so utterly feminine as to be almost untrue to life." But they went to the wedding and gave the wedding-breakfast at their flat, resigned to be his four sisters, and showed no sadness in their faces until after the bride and bridegroom had driven away. All the stories are good; they are written with a lightness of touch, a sparkling humour, a kindness and gentle cynicism that make them very attractive.

We are glad to have them, but we want to see Mr. Cosmo Hamilton give his undoubted gifts fuller scope in another novel—not one of the sensational sort of which he has recently written so many, but in one that shall be a worthy successor of that remarkable story "Adam's Clav."

EARLY NINETEENTH CENTURY CAFÉS ON THE PLACE DU CHÂTELET.

From Old Paris (Melrose).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Fleet Street in Seven Centuries
(Putman.)

ST. BRIDE'S STEEPLE FROM SALISBURY SQUARE.

THE STORY OF THE CAMBRIDGE BAPTISTS AND THE STRUG- GLE FOR RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

By BERNARD NUT-
TER, M.A. With 7
Illustrations 2s. 6d
net. (Heffer.)

More than once Cambridge has been the home of new movements, but in few of them has her influence been so widely spread as in the history of Non-conformity. 1240 is the date when the first known Cambridge heretic was imprisoned for maintaining, among other things, that Gregory IX. was no true Pope, and that "the devil was let loose." His, however, was an isolated instance only. The real cleavage came with the rise of the "Separatists" at the time of the Reformation. Mr. Nutter traces the line of sturdy Nonconformists from 1568 until the death of C. H. Spurgeon. Perhaps the most remarkable of the many fearless characters with whom Mr. Nutter deals, some good stories are told of the Rev. Robert Robinson, author of "A Plea for the Divinity of Jesus Christ" and two well-known hymns. "Do the Dissenters know the worth of this man?" asked a professor, in allusion to the "Plea." "The man knows the worth of the Dissenters," was Robinson's reply. Yet, although this is the spirit which animates the whole of the book, Mr. Nutter has done his work so tactfully that he need have no fears of hurting the feelings of those who are not of the same way of thinking as himself. In a word, this is a thoroughly interesting corner of religious history, and one which was well worth exploiting.

THE MAN WHO SAVED AUSTRIA.

By M. HARTLEY 10s. 6d net (Mills & Boon)

A capital account of the life and times of the famous Baron Jellačić is in these pages, and the story deserved to be told. Jellačić, Field-Marshal of Austria, and as devoted to his race as he was loyal to the Emperor and the House of Habsburg, played a great part in the struggle with the Hungarian revolutionaries in 1848-1849. Kossuth never made any attempt to conciliate the Croats, and revolting against Austrian rule was himself attacked by Jellačić's army as an oppressor. Jellačić, a Liberal, but an Imperialist, rejoiced in the opportunity of striking a blow at his old Hungarian enemies when the throne of Austria was shaken and its occupant a fugitive from Vienna. A man of great qualities, a born soldier and commander of soldiers, Jellačić was both humane and disinterested, and his abilities as a civil governor were proved in a multitude of ways. He is a hero to the author of this exceedingly readable book, and we believe the appreciation is just

From The Story of the Cambridge Baptists (Heffer.)

THE GRAVES AT OAKINGTON.

THE BOOKMAN
CHRISTMAS 1912

*From The Man Who Saved
Austria: Baron Jellačić*
(Mills & Boon). JOSEPH JELLAČIĆ,
1850.

GEORGE PALMER PUTNAM.

By GEORGE HAVEN PUTNAM, Lit.D. With Frontispiece
10s. 6d. net. (Putnam's.)
The publishing house of Putnam's stands high in the literary history both of New York and of London, and the

From The Irish Revolution
(Blackwood). ARCHBISHOP WALSH

life of its founder—the father of the present head of the firm—is worthy to rank among the best biographies of publishers ever written. The original firm of Wiley and Putnam was founded in New York in 1840, and it saw many vicissitudes, in spite of the successful publication of works by Washington Irving, whose relations with Mr. Putnam were of the most cordial character, and several other authors of the first rank. The book contains much interesting correspondence, throwing light upon the literary conditions of the Victorian period. Throughout stands distinct the figure of the founder of the firm, an optimist, and a desperately hard worker, to whose personal rectitude was paid one of the finest tributes ever made by one business man to another. Mr. Putnam, sen., died suddenly—in harness—during the week before Christmas, the most critical of the whole year. The remaining partners of the firm at once left their desks, and the office would have been closed had not three “rival” publishers come forward and arranged to conduct the entire business during the Christmas week. The result was a record week. This is a fine biography of a fine character.

GEORGE HAVEN PUTNAM.
1st Lieutenant and Adjutant 176th Regt. N.Y.
Vols.
From A Prisoner of War in Virginia.
(Putnam's).

G. P. PUTNAM. ÆTAT. 45.
From A Memoir of George Palmer Putnam
(Putnam's).

MELTON PRIOR.
From The Campaigns of a War Correspondent
(Arnold).

A PRISONER OF WAR IN VIRGINIA. 1864-5.

By GEORGE HAVEN PUTNAM. 3s. 6d. net. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

As the title indicates, forty-eight years have elapsed since the author underwent the experiences chronicled in this interesting monograph, but Major Putnam's memory has spanned the gulf with illuminating dexterity, and the pictures he draws for us of the management of the prisons in the South during the last winter of the war are eminently sober and restrained, and for that reason, all the more effective as an indictment. The two prisons dealt with are Libby and Danville. The food and organisation of the prisoners, their amusements and their ingenious and sometimes successful bids for freedom, are detailed with those graphic touches which only personal experience can lend. The history of the autographed prison brick is typically American—a novel could easily be founded on it; indeed, the imaginative reader will be able to glean many a romance from this frank record of a soldier's prison experiences.

THE GIRLHOOD OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

Edited by Viscount Esher, G.C.B., C.G.V.O. 2 Vols. Illustrated. 36s. net. (John Murray.)

This record of eight years of Queen Victoria's girlhood consists of a selection from Her Majesty's Diaries between the years 1832 and 1840. When the first entries in the journals were made their writer was thirteen years old: when she wrote the last she was in her twenty-first year—she wrote them on the day of her marriage, two years after she had come to the throne. The

From The Girlhood of Queen Victoria (Murray).

H.M. QUEEN VICTORIA.
From a portrait by Dalton, after F. Winterhalter.

my poor uncle, the King, was no more, and had expired at twelve minutes past two this morning, and consequently that I am Queen. Lord Conyngham knelt down and kissed my hand, at the same time delivering to me the official announcement of the poor King's demise. . . . I then went to my room and dressed. Since it has pleased Providence

BENJAMIN DISRAELI, 1840.
From a picture by A. E. Chalon, R.A., at Hughender
From The Life of Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield, Vol. II. (Murray).

diaries for the first four or five years are pleasantly artless in style, and perhaps a little formal and restrained, for they were given to her by her mother, who not only kept an eye on them herself but expected the child's governess to do so. They are more intimate and freer in the expression of thoughts and opinions after the Queen's accession, for then she was no longer subjected to such surveillance, but wrote in the confidence that no

From The Year 1912 Illustrated (Headley).

H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES AS AN UNDERGRADUATE

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From My Life on Four Continents
(Hutchinson).

COLONEL CHAILLÉ-LONG ON HIS RETURN FROM THE EXPEDITION TO THE GRAND LAKES.

From a unique photo. taken by General Gordon, October 18, 1874.

to place me in this station, I shall do my utmost to fulfil my duty toward my country ; I am very young and perhaps in many, though not in all things, inexperienced, but I am sure that very few have more real good-will and more real desire to do what is fit and right than I have." She was fortunate in having for her guardian and adviser at this difficult period so tactful, kindly and sensible a man of the world as Lord Melbourne ; his genial, easy, fatherly manner won her confidence, and all his relations with her as they are revealed here are eminently charming. " I said to him," she writes in 1838, " I was reading the first novel I had ever read, 'The Bride of Lammermoor'; he said it was very melancholy—a terrible story—but admires it." She was delighted with "Oliver Twist," but Lord Melbourne did not like it ; it was too much about coffin-makers, workhouses and thieves to please him. Another day, she spoke to him "of Bulwer's novels, none of which Lord Melbourne has read. Lady Durham said it was very

From Lacordaire
(Herbert & Daniel)

LACORDAIRE AS A YOUNG MAN.

odd that so clever a man should be so vain about his personal appearance. Lord Melbourne replied : ' I think clever people generally have more of these weaknesses than others,' Lord Melbourne said : ' I always predicted he would be a genius when he was a boy ; and I was sure he would make a figure ; he used to come over to Brocket when he was seventeen, and show me his poetry.' " These extracts finish on the Queen's wedding-day, describe the wedding, the reception after, and then how " Dearest Albert came up and fetched me downstairs, where we took leave of mamma and drove off at near four ; I and Albert alone." Some day, probably, the rest of the journals will be published, but not till the present generation is gone past reading them. Meanwhile, the printing of these diaries of the Queen's earlier years is a thing to be grateful for. They are interesting and valuable, not only for the lights they throw upon her own character, but for what they add to our knowledge of the inner history of the first two years of her reign and the glimpses they give of the manner of life by which she was surrounded in the six years that preceded them. The volumes are admirably illustrated, the illustrations including a good many reproductions of drawings by the Queen herself.

From The House of Commons from Within

(Williams & Norgate).

THE RIGHT HON. ROBERT FARQUHARSON.

From a sketch by John S. Sargent, R.A.

THE YEAR 1912 ILLUSTRATED.

A Record of Notable Achievements and Events. (Headley Bros.)

This useful and interesting publication has now arrived at its fourth year of issue, and has already taken a permanent place of its own among the year's indispensable reference books. It takes a comprehensive survey, as its sub-title indicates, of all the principal events that happened at home and abroad during 1912. The Durbar Coronation, the Titanic Disaster, the Dickens Centenary, the Coal Strike, the Discovery of the South Pole, the Oxford and Cambridge Boat Race, the Olympic Games at Stockholm, the Death of the Emperor of Japan, the Chinese Revolution, the Death of General Booth—these and all the other outstanding features of the year's history—to say nothing of its weather and its cricket records—are gathered up into these pages and related succinctly and interestingly. There is no attempt at the expression of opinions—it is all, as its title indicates, a sort of cinematograph view of the passing days and principal events of the last twelve months. It is good reading for all and sundry, and the journalist and those of us who are actively concerned in public life will find it a handy and serviceable book of reference. The numerous illustrations are well chosen and excellently reproduced.

MY LIFE IN FOUR CONTINENTS.

By COLONEL CHAILLÉ-LONG. In 2 Vols With 26 Illustrations, 3 Facsimilies, and 2 Maps. 24s. net. (Hutchinson.)

Colonel Chaillé-Long, whose autobiography fills the two portly volumes now before us, is to be remembered principally from the fact that he was General Gordon's Chief of Staff in the Egyptian Equatorial Provinces, now the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan. He has also had an adventurous life in other parts of the world. An American by birth, he served as a young man in the Civil War, after which he went to the Near East, and eventually secured a military commission in Egypt. On General Gordon's arrival he was at once appointed Chief of Staff, and he then made several brilliant journeys of exploration with a view to settling the problem of the source of the Nile. He has fallen foul of Stanley and other explorers over discoveries that he made on his journeys, and much space in this work is devoted to a spirited defence of his position, which has lately—by the way—been completely vindicated. Of the enormous amount of interesting material that remains we fear we can say nothing; we can only advise readers to at once obtain this vivid and well-ordered autobiography.

From The Autobiography and Life of George Tyrrell FATHER TYRRELL
From a group at St. Mary's Hall
An important work which has been published recently by Mr. Edward Arnold

From George Borrow: the Man and his Books
(Chapman & Hall).

GEORGE BORROW.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS FROM WITHIN.

By Right Hon ROBERT FARQUHARSON 7s 6d net (Williams & Norgate)

Dr. Farquharson has already given us one very pleasant volume on his Parliamentary experiences, and now he follows it up with a further instalment of genial anecdotes and personal impressions concerning our legislators in the House of Commons. Dr. Farquharson tells how to get into Parliament and has many a good story of his own contests in Aberdeenshire. He explains how things are done in the House, is luminous on the difficulties of Whips and private members, and helps us to understand what makes for success in political life. On plenty of subjects, from literary style to vaccination, from the opium trade to labour representation, Dr. Farquharson gives us his opinions

From Reminiscences of my Early Ministry
(Jarrold)

F. W. MACDONALD, 1912.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

there is a kindly word in favour of casual charity. But it is a kindly man who writes the book, a lover of his fellows, as every good medical man is; and for all his strong expressions of opinion Dr. Farquharson cannot make us forget the largeness of heart and real goodwill to mankind that supplemented the honest purpose in the author's public life.

REMINISCENCES OF MY EARLY MINISTRY.

By FREDERIC W. MACDONALD. 2s. 6d. net.
(Jarrold & Sons)

These annals of the life of a distinguished minister have that interest which nearly always attaches to the biographies of men who have seen the world in many aspects, and come into close contact with the life of the masses. The author of "Recreations of a Book Lover" adds to a perception of literary values plenty of shrewd good sense and observation, and he has an abounding sympathy with the poor. He recounts his experiences as "a very young minister" in the Staffordshire Potteries, and tells some stories, humorous or pathetic, of the humble folk amongst whom he worked. His remarks on preachers and preaching should prove of especial value to those who themselves occupy pulpits. Mr. Macdonald early discovered that a minister's congregation "can teach him more than all the professors can," and there is keen psychological analysis in his observations on the subtle relationships that develop between the preacher and his hearers. Altogether it is a record full of interest to all who take more than a surface view of life. There are, too, enlightening descriptions of some of the more notable divines with whom Mr. Macdonald came into contact, as, for example, Dr. Morley Punshon—to whose influence he acknowledges a great debt—Dr. W. B. Pope, Thomas Lewellyn and Joseph Hargreaves.

From Following the Drum (Melrose).

GOING ON A TRANSPORT.

FOLLOWING THE DRUM.

By HORACE WYNDHAM.
Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.
(Melrose.)

"'The Cumberland Light Infantry,' returned the sergeant, as though he were its commanding-officer, 'I'm pally with the colonel, and can fix you up there at once. Fine regiment. Only two or three vacancies.'" There is the climax of the remarks of the recruiting-sergeant who persuaded Mr. Horace Wyndham to enlist, but he led up to it skilfully: "'Soldiering is a fine life. Lots of money, lots of beer, and lots of girls. Chance of seeing the world, too. No anxieties. Rations, lodging, clothing and education, with doctors and chaplains simply chucked at you! And if you die, a first-class funeral, with a band and firing party. Better than being a civilian.'" And here is what he said the next day in his "last word of friendly counsel": "'Keep a stiff upper lip, and always remember you wear the King's uniform. Never be late for parade, or give back answers to non-coms. They don't like it. Obey orders at the double, and when you've finished one job ask for another. Somebody's sure to oblige you. Learn to drill, learn to shoot, and keep out of hospital, the canteen, and the guardroom. If you do this long enough, you may get as far as lance-corporal. There's no knowing.'" In his exceedingly interesting book, Mr. Horace Wyndham, writing from seven years' experience, touches upon every aspect

From A History of the British Nation
(Jack).

THE "ALABAMA"
From a sketch by Charles W. Wylla.

of the private soldier's life. Nobody can help being amused and edified by "Following the Drum." It is quite a remarkable book in its way.

ROMANTIC TRIALS OF THREE CENTURIES.

By HUGH CHILDERS. With 24 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net. (John Lane.)

Mr. Hugh Childers has chosen the twelve trials for this collection of his with a sure instinct for their strangeness and the fascination of their human interest. He has gone rather off the beaten track of such books, and though he relates the thrillingly dramatic narrative of the Lyons Mail, he by no means limits his cases to those tales of mysterious murder that appeal irresistibly to some curiously morbid strain in all of us. There is the story of the Lowestoft Witches, with Sir Thomas Browne appearing in the witness-box to testify against two unfortunate old women charged with having dealings with the devil; there is the trial of William Penn for unlawful assembly; of Dr. Dodd for forgery; the extraordinarily baffling case of Elizabeth Canning; the little-known account of the prosecution of Disraeli for criminal libel; the affair of Beau Fielding and the Duchess; the remarkable trial of the murderers of Thomas Thynne; each one of the dozen cases is charged with mystery or romance; it adheres closely to facts, and is unfolded with narrative skill and a nice feeling for the dramatic force of it that make this book at once good history and the best of good reading. The portraits, photographs and reproductions of old prints add not a little to the interest and attractiveness of the volume.

ELIZABETH CANNING,

Drawn from the Life, as she stood at the Bar to receive her Sentence, in the Session's House, in the Old-Bailey.

From Romantic Trials of Three Centuries (Lane). ELIZABETH CANNING RECEIVING HER SENTENCE.

WELLINGTON'S ARMY.

By C. W. C. OMAN. 7s. 6d. net. (Edward Arnold)

A fascinating and authoritative study of "Wellington's Army" during the Peninsular War, has been written by Mr. Oman. No campaign or series of campaigns seems to have so many records, privately, printed or published as that which was fought from 1809 to 1814. It seems almost to have been a popular practice for officers and some of the men to keep diaries; and luminous on the whole, they prove. Beginning with the character of the Commander-in-Chief and his generals, Mr. Oman has summarised the qualities and defects of all departments of the army, and made a book of exceptional historical value and human interest. His judgment of Wellington is similar to that of Lord Roberts, that the more his actions and writings are studied, "the more do we respect and like him as a general, and the less do we like him as a man." Of the personnel of the army, Mr. Oman's views are necessarily variegated. With all its bitter strenuousness and bloody experiences there was something of a holiday character about certain aspects of the Peninsular War, as novelists, such as Lever, have shown. There was plenty of scope for individual adventures of derring-do, and although Wellington was a determined disciplinarian and not too

From King's Cutters and Smugglers, 1700-1855 (Allen). "GETTING A FIRM GRIP . . . PUSHED HIM INTO THE WATER."

From Wellington's Army (Arnold). SERGEANT AND PRIVATE OF INFANTRY IN WINTER MARCHING ORDER, 1813.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Intimacies of Court and Society

(Hurst & Blackett).

CHÂTEAU DE MAINTENON.

kind to officers, general or otherwise, who thought for themselves, there was no waste of opportunity for the ambitious. The great interest of the War is largely due to its period. It marked a chapter of reform in the history of the army. The soldier's pigtail was cut-off: and that is a symbol of the progress of common-sense. We also have it on the authority of a Captain Dobbs, whose privately-printed diary Mr. Oman may not have seen, that the percussion-cap was first used in the Peninsular with an excellent effect. In any case, the War marked the close of an epoch. A book, therefore, which treats fully of the personnel, character, detail, and experiences of Wellington's effective army is welcome, and not only to students of social and military history.

THE HOOSAC VALLEY; ITS LEGENDS AND ITS HISTORY.

By GRACE GRIYLOCK NILES. With
110 Illustrations and Maps. 15s. net
(Putnam's.)

Certain spots on the world's face seem destined to play an important part in the making of history. Among such localities the Hoosac Valley takes a notable place. It has seen the climaxes of half a dozen wars—Red Indians were here decisively defeated, here is situated Ticonderoga, where in 1775 was fought one of the most important engagements of the American War of Independence, and here, too, is Bennington, the battle at which town preceded the surrender of the British forces at Old Saratoga on October 17th, 1777. Since then the Valley has remained in peace, the most important event—and one which was far more important than it sounds—being the construction of the Hoosac Tunnel, an extraordinary feat of engineering. Miss Niles makes excellent use of material at her command, and she has compiled a book which we believe will prove nearly as interesting to English readers as to American. It is very fully and very effectively illustrated.

From The Hoosac Valley

(Putnam's).

LLOYD GEORGE'S SUPPER PARTY.

By the Member for Britain.
1s. net. (Simpkin, Marshall.)

Political skits of this kind have rather gone out of fashion of late years. Even the papers, apart from one or two of the professedly comic character, seldom or never indulge in them. Yet the political cartoon still flourishes vigorously, and so far as one can see the public at large are more interested in politics than ever they were before. But the art of satire has fallen into abeyance; we have grown perhaps too tender of each other's feelings, and there is more bark than bite in most of our attacks on a political opponent. The anonymous author of "Lloyd George's Supper Party" makes fun of the Chancellor and his policy and his public doings, but it is all very good-natured fun; he is mildly satirical, genially sarcastic; there is no sting in his gibes and no ill-nature in his ridicule.

Whether you share his views or whether you do not, you can laugh at his gay burlesque and his lively, irresponsible sallies. Now and then his humour is a little thin, but he gives you an hour's light reading that is well worth the small price of his book.

THE WITENAGEMOT OAK.

A Treaty Tree of Peace and Welfare. Planted by the Christians for the Hoosac and Mohawk Scouts, near the junction of the Tomhannac Creek with the Hoosac River, in the Vale of Peace, Old Schaghticoke, New York. Here assembled the first Council of the Christians with Soquon and Maquon after the Hoosacs' final victory over Kryn's Mohawks in 1676.

ROBERT KETT AND THE NORFOLK RISING.

By JOSEPH CLAYTON.
8s. 6d. net. Illustrated.
(Martin Secker.)

Just now when we are talking of Labour Unrest and asking each other the cause of it Mr. Clayton's story of the Kett Rebellion of 1594 comes to us with a special air of timeliness and significance. There was a similar ferment of unrest and dissatisfaction among the labouring classes of 1594, and it culminated, for the time being, in an uprising of the people of Norfolk under the leadership of Robert Kett. The rebellion lasted only six weeks; but, as Mr. Clayton says, it "had its crowded hours of glorious life," it was not easily suppressed, and there were moments when it bade fair to issue in a great democratic victory. It is merely stupid to dismiss Kett and his followers as a riotous mob; Kett himself was a man of honour and intelligence; he was no mean organiser, and kept order and administered justice in his great camp on Mousehold Heath with a strong and an even hand; moreover, he sacrificed much in his passionate championing of the rights of his poorer neighbours; he risked his life in the cause that was more theirs than his, and not only risked but lost it. Mr. Clayton has made a careful study of all the early narratives of the event and recreates the striking character of Robert Kett impartially and with uncommon literary skill. Kett, like Jack Cade, has been misrepresented and vilified by

From Robert Kett (Secker).

MOUSEHOLD HEATH.
From the painting by (Cromie)

but in the main it is the story of a young girl's love for a good man, and since there is an obstacle to their marrying, she defies law and church and lives with him as his wife, holding that love is enough. The story cleverly and very interestingly shows the first stirrings in the eighteenth century of that feminist movement of which we hear so much to-day. Its old-world atmosphere is very cunningly and effectively created and maintained throughout, the story is told with insight and with power, and the characters are drawn with remarkable skill.

partisan historians, and those who have no praise but for the rebel who succeeds, and not only every good democrat but every lover of good men will be grateful to Mr. Clayton for telling vividly and sympathetically the true story of a significant episode in the long struggle of the common people of England for the freedom, the share in the land of their country, and the general place in the sun that has not been too soon or too ungrudgingly yielded to them. It is a fine and an inspiring story, and one of profoundest interest.

THE BOUNTIFUL HOUR.

By MARION FOX. 6s.
(John Lane.)

There is a charming mingling of imagination and realism in this eighteenth century romance by Miss Marion Fox. We have glimpses of Cowper in it, and of Mary Wolstonecroft,

*From When I Was a Child
(Constable).*

THE FARMER'S COTTAGE SEEN FROM THE TRAIN.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Memorials of Canterbury Cathedral
(Chapman & Hall).

THE NAVE.

BUSH AND SEA RHYMES.

By A. SAFRONI-MIDDLETON. (Walter Scott Publishing Co.)

Mr. Safroni-Middleton is an Australian poet whose name is new to us, though we gather from an advertisement at the end of his book that he has published at least one other volume. He writes of the bush and the sea with a breezy vigour and picturesque descriptive power that tell you he is writing of such life as he has seen and lived himself. His verses have a fluency and lilt that are very pleasing, and he writes always with an admirable simplicity and directness that are in happiest harmony with his themes. The voice of the sea and the voice and lonely vastness of the open country—these are the chief founts of his inspiration. Now, amid the roar and whirl of the salt spray far at sea he broods of London and

"The surging crowds of lamp-lit streets, shut in by blackened walls" and anon, living in London he is haunted by dreams of the bush :

"Down in my heart the bush flower blows,
The sea-bird cries as it comes and goes,
Flashing away on tireless wing
O'er the moonlit dark waves glittering.
Fast o'er the sea the cool wind goes
To kiss the hills where the wattle blows.
Far from the heat of the old Bush town
Stars are pouring God's own wine down. . . .
Our little hut crouched in the hills,
Safe from the wild shore's thunderous thrills—
God's everlasting, thrilling chime,
Where waves for ever crying climb—
In moonlight coil the wild lone shore,
Like children knock each dark cave door. . .

"And still I hear the surf's low moan,
I am awake, old and alone;
It is that blind, wild hollow cry
Of moaning 'neath the birdless sky
In this small room of London Town,
And on my heart the rain beats down."

Some of his love songs—one in particular beginning

"The sea-bird to the sea, and I to you——" are very charming. There is not a smell of the lamp

TRADITIONS OF EDINBURGH.

By ROBERT CHAMBERS, LL.D. With 26 Illustrations in Colour and many Line Drawings in the Text by James Riddell, R.S.W., and a Map. 21s net. (Chambers)

This fine book is a re-issue of the work on which the fame of Robert Chambers principally depends. Originally published in 1825 (when it aroused much interest in Sir Walter Scott), it went through many reprints and was almost rewritten in 1846, while in 1868, shortly before his death, the final edition was issued—and, as Mr. C. E. S. Chambers, the editor of the present issue, puts it, 'since that time old Edinburgh has almost ceased to exist.' The illustrations of Mr. James Riddell give character and magnificence to the new edition, and, whether in colour or line, all are redolent of the atmosphere of Edinburgh. He has had a romantic and richly picturesque subject and has made the very most and best of it. It is, in fact, a dignified volume, worthy and effectively illustrated.

From Traditions of Edinburgh
(Chambers).

THE OLD TOLBOOTH.

in any poem in the book—they are the unaffected outpourings of a man who has lived a man's life and has a natural gift for putting into unpremeditated song the thoughts and visions that come to him by the way. It is the naturalness of his verses that makes them so pleasing and so effective.

THE CHAPELS ROYAL.

By the Ven. Archdeacon WILLIAM SINCLAIR, D.D. With 15 Illustrations and Decorations by Louis Weirter, R.B.A. 21s net (Nash)

"The religious side of an institution," writes Archdeacon Sinclair in his introduction, "is generally the most interesting, because religion of any kind touches the deepest and highest emotions of human nature, and calls up whatever is sincere and genuine even in commonplace minds. The associations of a parish church, where many generations have been baptised, confirmed, married and buried, are rich in personal reminiscences of the most intimate and varied kind. sorrows and joys, struggles of conscience, hopes and fears, instructions and inspirations, sympathies and reflections. And therefore, when we come to families which have to play a large public part on the stage of the world, the place devoted to their worship and religious celebrations cannot but be full of interest, romance, and the more serious aspects of brilliant lives. It is from this point of view that it is worth while to see what can be told about the Chapels Royal of the United Kingdom." Archdeacon Sinclair proves an urbane and efficient guide over many wonderful buildings. He writes with historical accuracy and a charm which is reflected in the drawings of Mr. Weirter, and which should make this finely-produced volume one of the most popular of its kind of the present publishing season.

From The Chapels Royal (Nash).

HOLYROOD ABBEY.

THE FAIREST OF THE STUARTS.

By WINIFRED BROOKS MYLCHREEST.
(Sampson Low & Co.)

Illustrated.

The fairest of the Stuarts was Elizabeth, the eldest daughter of James I, she married the Elector Palatine and afterwards became the unfortunate Queen of Bohemia. Our own royalty derive their Stuart blood from her. Miss Winifred Brooks Mylechreest has told her story in the form of a novel and it makes a picturesque and uncommonly interesting romance. Whether now and then the author does not go a little outside historical facts we are not quite sure, and in any event if she does so she has the highest examples to justify her. The book is illustrated with two excellent portraits and four sketches of Edinburgh and Stirling Castles, Whitehall Palace and the Tower of London.

From The Romance of the Men of Devon
(Mills & Boon).

THE OLD GUILDHALL, EXETER.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

JOHN FORSTER AND HIS FRIEND- SHIPS.

By RICHARD RENTON.
10s. 6d. net. (Chapman and Hall.)

Forster was the author of many books, but probably he will live longest as author of the standard Life of Dickens, and as the friend of many of the greatest men of his day and generation. The cabman who denounced him as "a harbitrary gent" crystallised his character in a phrase that was so true that it will label him as long as he is remembered; you may learn from Macready's Diaries how apt he was to quarrel with his friends, how his dogmatic, self-assertive autocratic manners exasperated them so that he and one or another of them were continually on bad terms with each other. But there was never anything serious in these quarrels; after an interval they were made up, and they left no ill-feeling behind them. With it all, you find that Forster was

From Thirteen Years of a Busy Woman's Life
(Lane).

MRS. ALEC TWEEDIE
From a sketch by John Lavery, R.A.

the most sympathetic as well as the touchiest of mortals; over and over again you hear of him exerting himself and going to no end of trouble to serve those for whom he had some regard. Dickens may have found him occasionally officious, and his airs of proprietorship and management a little trying, but the debt Dickens owes him for his constant and loyal friendship and his many disinterested services makes all such faults of manner seem trivial and of no moment. That Forster had hosts of friends, and kept them all, speaks for itself to the genuineness and lovability of his character, and see what friends they were! We naturally link him with Dickens, but he was intimate also with Browning, with Carlyle, Lord Lytton, Ainsworth, Macready, Landor, Douglas Jerrold, and in his early years he came into pleasant relations with Lamb. One could easily extend the list, but here are enough names to indicate what sort of material Mr. Renton had to his hand when he set out to write this book on "John Forster and his Friendships." He has written it well and interestingly, and given us a full-length portrait of Forster the man and the author, in his daily habit as he lived. He was Dickens's Boswell, but he was as dictatorial as if he had been Dr. Johnson; and some of us think his Lives of Dickens, of Swift and of Goldsmith at least as good as anything that Ursa Major contributed to our literature. Forster was a man of great gifts; a man of talent, if not of some genius; withal he was a remarkable personality, and as

Mr. Renton, writing with first-hand knowledge, makes clear, by no means so forbidding or ungenial as at first blush he may have seemed. The thirty-six portraits and facsimiles add to the interest of a book that is sure of a welcome from all Dickens lovers, and from all who are interested in the great figures of nineteenth century letters. Mr. Renton has met and been intimate with various people who knew Forster and the members of his circle, and this enables him to draw them and Forster for us very vividly. There are flaws in his book—flaws of style and one or two omissions; but it is readable and valuable.

FRANCESCO BERGER.
Author of "Reminiscences, Impressions, and Anecdotes," which Messrs. Sampson Low announce for publication.

From Fanny Burney at the Court of Queen Charlotte (Lane).

PRINCESS SOPHIA.
By Hoppner.

THE FAVOURITES OF LOUIS XIV.

By LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE.
7s. 6d. net. (Chatto & Windus.)

We should not like to say how many books we have come across within the last two years that deal with the careers of courtesans and demireps. We weary of the too-frequent attempt to invest with interest, and even with halos, women who were either frankly mercenary or deplorably vicious; and though we are alive to the fact that virtue in itself makes no man or woman interesting, though we quite agree with Samuel Butler the second when he says in his recently published "Note-book" that "the world can ill spare any vice which has obtained long and largely among civilized people," and that "the truest virtue has ever inclined towards excess rather than criticism," we cannot help thinking that the deliberate exploitation for literary purposes of royal mistresses and mere cocottes neither profits the republic of letters, nor readily consorts with the traditions of English taste. "Cui bono," we say: "Who benefits by this detailed study of royal incontinence, of splendeurs misères? Not the author, whose moral currency is apt to get debased in the transaction; not the reader, who is beguiled into mistaking "chatter about Harriet" for history; not the reviewer—if he counts at all—who is sick to death of this constant appeal to what can only be described as a morbid interest. . . . Yet, when we meet with such an admirably written and judicial book of the kind as "Le Petit Homme Rouge's" account of "The Favourites of Louis XIV.," we are almost persuaded to eat our words. The work is so admirably done, the tone is so fair and reasonable, the historical sense is so manifest on every page, that we feel inclined, against our better judgment, to cry "Bravo!" It is the humanity with which "Le Petit Homme Rouge" writes about Louise de la Vallière, about La Montespan, about Scarron's widow La Maintenon, that redeems the sordid subject matter. And we should like to compliment the author on his introductory chapter. This chapter, in which he links his new book with its predecessor, "The Favourites of Henry of Navarre," is one of the

From The Correspondence of Sarah, Lady Lyttelton
(Murray).

SARAH SPENCER,
LADY LYTTELTON

most piquant and concise historical summaries that we have ever been privileged to read; it is entirely admirable.

QUEEN ANNE.

By HERBERT PAUL. 7s. 6d.
net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

This is a new and revised edition of Mr. Herbert Paul's brilliant study of the life and times of Queen Anne. It was first published six years ago, and has now been carefully revised by the author. Two of its sections are devoted to the politics of Queen Anne's reign, one to the literature, and one to the society and manners, and Mr. Paul has this in common with Macaulay that he knows how to make history interesting. His work has the ease and charm of style that makes for popularity, and the fulness of knowledge, the ripe scholarship that give it permanent literary value.

THE HUMBUG.

By MRS. TOM GODFREY. 6s.
(London: Hurst & Blackett, Ltd.)
Mrs. Tom Godfrey tells with considerable spirit this entertaining story which turns upon one of the commonest of life's little ironies—nay, tragedies. It is the story of a woman endowed with all the natural instincts of her sex who reaches to what is generally considered to be past the marriageable age without finding the happiness in matrimony which she so much desired. . . . Side by side we have the story of a young girl of twenty who looks upon marriage not for the love and sacrifice it demands, but as the thing that can give her position, dress, jewellery and a good time generally. . . . She plays her part with skill and throws off her lover for a clever and wealthy man of fifty, while the heroine gets into no end of trouble and difficulty in personating her cousin in order to save a sick person's life. Some of the incidents in the early part of the book are a little wooden and unconvincing, but later, when dealing with the urgent need of sex for the companionship of sex, the writer handles her theme with confidence, knowledge and power.

From The Favourites of Louis XIV.
(Chatto & Windus).

MADAME DE MONTESPAN.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Guerilla Leaders of the World
(Stanley Paul).

THE AMBUSH AT BRIKEN

IN ABOR JUNGLES: BEING AN ACCOUNT OF THE ABOR EXPEDITION, THE MISHMI MISSION, AND THE MIRI MISSION.

By ANGUS HAMILTON, F.R.G.S. With 87 Illustrations and a Map. 18s net. (Nash.)

Mr. Angus Hamilton's book is a careful and interesting account of the most recent of the "little wars" which are perpetually being waged along the Indian frontier. Aborland lies between Tibet and Assam, and it sprang into notoriety by reason of the murder of Mr. Noel Williamson—of which, be it noted, Mr. Hamilton prints the statement of the Abor Gam who ordered it, which differs considerably from the official explanation of the affair. In its unwarlike aspects the book consists of a study of previously unknown country and its inhabitants, and it is possessed of much interest and value, from the point of view both of the specialist and of the general reader. The illustrations are numerous and a particular feature of the book is a large map—the only one at present in existence—of the Abor, Mishmi, and Miri regions.

LIFE IN THE WEST OF IRELAND.

Drawn and Painted by Jack B. Yeats. 2s. net and 21s. net. (Maunsell.)

In a series of interesting colour plates and wood engravings, and drawings in line and wash, Mr. Jack B. Yeats illustrates life as he has seen it in the West of Ireland—the life of the street, the fair, the race-course, the sea coast, the police-court, the high road, the tavern, and the farmstead. He has a shrewd eye for the quaintnesses of Irish character as well as for the beauties of Irish scenery, and he portrays them in that vividly individual style of his own that is a delightful blend of grace and strength and humour. What force and go he gets into his racehorses, what mischief into his urchins, what weatherbeaten age into the attitudes and visages of his old men! He is realistic without being in the least photographic; his figures have an air of life and movement that are beyond the reach of photography; he reveals the picturesqueness of the country village as well as the squalor of it. A score of written books could not give you so intimate and wide a knowledge of the every-day lives of the common people in the West of Ireland as you may gain from a study of this series of unique drawings. At five shillings it is a miracle of cheapness. There is to be also a limited edition of a hundred and fifty signed copies of the book with an original sketch on the fly-leaf, published at twenty-five shillings net.

From In Abor Jungles
(Nash).

GURKHA SEPOYS OF THE MILITARY POLICE CROSSING BY AN IMPROVISED BRIDGE.

Heinemann's Xmas List.

ÆSOP'S FABLES

ILLUSTRATED BY

A. Rackham.

Large Cr. 8vo

6/- NET

Translation by V. S. Vernon Jones, M. A.
Introduction by G. K. Chesterton.

ÆSOP'S FABLES.

RACKHAM BOOKS

The Best Xmas Gifts.

WAGNER'S RING

- (1) Rhinegold. Valkyrie.
(2) Siegfried. Twilight of the Gods.
Each 15/- net.

INGOLDSBY LEGENDS. 15/- net.

RIP VAN WINKLE. 15/- net.

MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM 15/- net.

UNDINE 7/6 net.

ALICE IN WONDERLAND 6/- net.

The Childhood of Animals.

By P. CHALMERS MITCHELL, F.R.S.

12 Coloured Plates.

36 Illustrations

Royal 8vo.

10/- net

Epochs of Chinese and Japanese Art.

By E. F. FENOLLOSA

2 vols

230 Plates

Crown 4to

36/- net

The Four Gardens

By "HANDASYDE"

Illustrated by CHARLES ROBINSON.
Large Cr 8vo. 6/- net.

A BOOK OF BEGGARS

By W. DACRES ADAMS. Large 4to. with delightful coloured plates. 3/6 net

A CHRISTMAS GARLAND.

Woven by MAX BEERBOHM Cr. 8vo. 5/- net.

ART IN EGYPT.

By G. MASPERO, Curator of the Cairo Museum.

Cr 8vo with 600 Illustrations. 6/- net.

The Encyclopædia of Sport.

In 4 vols. £3 3 0 net, cloth. £3 17 0 net, 1/2-bound 300 sports. 350 contributors 2,000 illustrations

English Literature :

An Illustrated Record.

By RICHARD GARNETT, C.B., LL.D., and EDMUND GOSSE, C.B., LL.D. Thousands of illustrations and coloured plates 4 vols Cloth £3. Half leather £4 4 0.

Wild Life and the Camera.

By A. RADCLIFFE DUGMORE.
Author of "Camera Adventures in the African Wilds," with numbers of his wonderful photographs from nature.

6/- net.

"Twelfth Night."

All the Tales from Shakespeare

By CHARLES & MARY LAMB and H. S. MORRIS.

With coloured plates after the Great Masters.

2 vols. 21/- net.

William Heinemann, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

CAMPAIGNS OF A WAR CORRESPONDENT.

By MELTON PRIOR. Edited by S. L. Bensusan. Illustrated. 16s. net. (Edward Arnold.)

Few men have had a more varied and interesting career, few have enjoyed life more or made more friends by the way than the late Mr. Melton Prior, the famous artist war correspondent of the Illustrated London News. For upwards of thirty years—from 1873 until 1905 he followed the drum and sketched striking incidents of the march or the battle, often sharing in the hardships as well as in the dangers of a campaign; though he joyously confesses that whenever it was possible he secured a cart for his sketching materials, and was careful that items of a more grateful and comforting nature were put into that cart along with them. He went through the Ashanti Campaign; the Turkish War of 1877; the Kaffir War of 1878; the Zulu War; the Boer Wars of 1881 and of 1900-1902; various Egyptian campaigns and the Russo-Japanese War; to say nothing of many minor expeditions and campaigns in divers parts of the earth. And his breezy, gossipy record of all these experiences makes a gallant, a lively, and a thoroughly entertaining volume. Mr. Prior has a great gift for good anecdotes and scatters them liberally about his pages. He has a picturesque and vivid descriptive style, and unfolds his adventures and vicissitudes with the gusto of a man who has delighted in facing dangers, overcoming difficulties, and seeing the wild places of the world and some of the world's wildest doings. It throws valuable sidelights on much of the history that has been making in recent years; but the humour and romance of its light narrative vein make it readable in a fashion that history

From Life in the Indian Police
(Chapman & Hall).

ROUGH ON THE TERRIER.

rarely accomplishes. A sympathetic preface by Mr. S. L. Bensusan gives a very intimate little study of the genial, shrewd, attractive personality of the man who had lived this book of his before he began to write it.

THE CHURCH IN MADRAS. Vol. II.

By the REV. FRANK PENNY, LL.M. With 31 Illustrations. (Smith, Elder.)

The first volume of the Rev. Frank Penny's "History of the Ecclesiastical and Missionary Action of the East India Company in the Presidency of Madras" received an enthusiastic welcome. In the second volume, which covers the period between 1805 and 1835, the writer's strong defence of the East India Company is again a noteworthy feature of his work. All students of Indian history in particular, and of ecclesiastical history in general, will welcome this extension of Mr. Penny's work.

From The Campaigns of a War Correspondent
(Arnold).

THE JAPANESE STORMING THE RUSSIAN POSITION IN FRONT OF AN-SHAN-TIEN.

WHAT THE PUBLIC READS

FOR READERS OF MEMOIRS

A PRINCE OF PLEASURE

A vivid account of the Court Life of Philip of Orleans and his brother, Louis XIV., with its gossip, its scandal, and its pettiness. By Hugh Stokes. With 17 illustrations. Price 12s. 6d. net.

"A MASTERLY EXPOSITION."

WOMAN AND TO-MORROW

A Revolutionary Book that women have been waiting for. By W. L. George, author of 'A Bed of Roses,' 'The City of Light.' Price 2s. 6d. net.

"EVERY WORD IS TRUE"

THE LOVE-SEEKER

A book for lovers and would-be lovers. By M. Churton Braby, author of 'Modern Marriage and How to Bear It.' 4th thousand. Price 2s. 6s. net.

A BOOK FOR GENTLEWOMEN

EMBROIDERY STITCHES

Containing 200 illustrations of different stitches arranged on a new and simplified plan. Price 5s. net.

AN IDEAL GIFT BOOK

THE DAYS OF A YEAR

By M. D. Ashley Dodd. With an Appreciation by Henry James. Price 2s. 6d. net.

THE INCOMPARABLE PAVLOVA

POEMS TO PAVLOVA

By A. Tulloch Cull. With 8 illustrations of Madame Pavlova in her most famous dances. Price 3s. 6d. net.

6s. SOME NOVEL SUCCESSES 6s.

A NOVEL FOR WOMEN—AND MEN

THE RELUCTANT LOVER

A brilliant Society novel. 'Mr. Stephen McKenna has added to the gaiety of nations . . . distinctly a book to be read.'—Standard.

"CHOCK FULL OF HUMOUR"

BACHELOR'S BUTTONS

The Candid Confessions of a Shy Bachelor. By E. Burke. 'A New Humorist.'—Morning Post.

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF ATKINS

PRIVATE SMITH

By Capt. O. Dallas, with a Foreword by Lt.-Gen. Sir Robert Baden-Powell. 'We hope Captain Dallas' book will be widely read.'—Pall Mall Gazette.

"NOTABLE NEW NOVEL"

WINDYRIDGE

'Oh! Windyridge were paradise enow,' says the Saturday Review of Mr. W. Riley's Notable New Novel (Globe) now in its 4th thousand.

HERBERT JENKINS, LTD., 12, ARUNDEL PLACE, S.W.

SELECTED FROM

Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier's NEW LIST.

By Dr. KELMAN.

THE ROAD. Vol. II.

A Study of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress.

By JOHN KELMAN, D.D., Author of "The Faith of Robert Louis Stevenson," &c. Volume II., continuing the Commentary of the First Part, and of the whole of the Second Part of the Pilgrim's Progress. With 8 illustrations from photographs by the author.

Price 3s. 6d. net, postage 4d.

Also in vellum back, gilt top, 6s. net postage 4d.

THE EDUCATION OF THE WOMEN OF INDIA.

By MINNA G. COWAN, M.A. (Girton).

With 12 Illustrations. Price 3s. 6d. net; postage 4d.

The Times says: "Miss Cowan presents us with useful results of a great deal of intelligent study of the problem and of the three factors which go to the solution—the Government, the Missionary, and the spontaneous Indian effect."

By W. J. DAWSON, D.D.

THE BOOK OF COURAGE.

By W. J. DAWSON, D.D., Author of "The Threshold of Manhood," "The Reproach of Christ," &c., &c.

Price 3s. 6d. net, postage 4d.

The Edinburgh Evening News says: "This is a capital book, full of level-headed common sense and ripe wisdom, and the author has literary skill."

The Methodist Times says: "A book like this is a real tonic. If it fails to brace up the one who reads it, it will not be the fault of the writer, but the receiving capacity of the reader."

NEW AND CHEAP EDITIONS.

JACOB BEHMEN: An Appreciation.

By Dr. ALEXANDER WHYTE,

Author of "The Walk, Conversation and Character of Jesus Christ our Lord," etc., etc.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

SANTA TERESA: An Appreciation.

With some of the best passages of the Saint's Writings.

Price 1s. each net, postage 2d.

Velvet leather edition. Price 3s. 6d. each net, postage 4d.

ALEXANDER HENDERSON: The Covenantant.

BY

J. PRINGLE THOMPSON,
M.A.,

WITH FOREWORD BY

Lord Balfour of Burleigh.

Price 1s. 6d. net.

Postage 3d.

CHILDREN'S MISSIONARY SERIES.

Excellent Gift Books for the young people, bright and instructive.

CHILDREN OF BORNEO.
CHILDREN OF PERSIA.
CHILDREN OF CEYLON.
CHILDREN OF EGYPT.
CHILDREN OF JAPAN.
CHILDREN OF JAMAICA.
CHILDREN OF ARABIA.
CHILDREN OF AFRICA.
CHILDREN OF CHINA.
CHILDREN OF INDIA.

Each book is handsomely bound and contains 8 Full-page Coloured Illustrations.

Price 1s. 6d. net; postage 3d.

The Spectator says: "These are excellent books. The history of the countries and the daily life of the people are told in a way that will interest and amuse children, who will also like the brightly-coloured illustrations."
The British Weekly says: "They are very ably written, full of interest, and told with great literary ability. The eight brightly coloured illustrations are delightful."

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER,
100 PRINCES STREET, EDINBURGH.
21 PATERNOSTER SQUARE, LONDON.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

ROMANCES OF THE FRENCH THEATRE.

By FRANCIS GRIBBLE. 15s. net. (Chapman & Hall.)

No present-day writer of popular histories and biographies writes them quite so well as Mr. Gribble. His facts are none the less facts because he has the trick of handling them easily. History and biography are, after all, or ought to be, true stories about real events and real people, and they gain in readability and lose nothing whatever in truth by being interesting, and interesting they certainly are as Mr. Gribble writes them. In an opening chapter he contrasts the French and the English attitude towards the romance of the theatre, and then from a narrative of Molière's married misery and something of Racine's love affairs, he passes to the series of stories that give the title to his book. Sordid some of them are; some are not without humour, and not a little of pathos and tragedy enters into the texture of many of them; too often it is the pathos and tragedy of the actress grown old at last and fallen into neglect and dying in loneliness, haunted by memories of vanished splendour and the days when men loved and fame crowned her. There is the glamorous, sadly ending romance of the beautiful and brilliant Adrienne Lecouvreur; the dramatic tale of the career of Madame Favart; of the astonishing Mlle Clarion, and so on down to the less-than-a-century-old romance of the great actor Talma. They may not make altogether improving reading, yet they carry their own moral with them if you want one, for we suspect that the austere Mrs. Siddons, whom Mr. Gribble seems rather to reproach for her stolid British matronliness, not only lived a happier life, on the whole, but made a very much happier ending than any one of these fascinating heroines of the French stage, who for the most part paid rather bitterly for the joyous sins of their youth when their youth was gone. The book is handsomely produced and contains many excellent portraits.

CORAH'S SCHOOL CHUMS.

By MAY BALDWIN. 3s. 6d. (W. & R. Chambers.)

The story opens with a dramatic quarrel between Jock Sandford and his uncle, which results in Jock and his sister Corah emigrating to South Africa—Jock to work on a farm and Corah to be sent to a school in Cape Town. Miss May Baldwin tells, in a very bright, entertaining manner, of the adventures these two independent young people meet with on the voyage and the many experiences which come their way after they have settled down in their new surroundings. By a curious coincidence an acquaintance of Corah's happens to be going to South Africa at the same time, so the girls become great friends, and Irene Inman's hasty temper and lack of thought are the sources of many amusing incidents and some startling ones. Certain quaint customs of the people in Cape Colony will surprise and entertain readers as they surprise and entertain Irene and Corah and they will find the experiences of the two girls more than ordinarily interesting. It is a very fresh, vivacious book; something quite new in the way of girls' stories.

THE BUILDING OF THE ALPS.

By T. G. BONNEY. 12s. 6d. net. Illustrated. (Fisher Unwin.)

While the Alps can never become commonplace, except to hapless types of mind, it is unhappily true that hurried travelling, superficial sight-seeing, and certain varieties of book-making and journalism have done something to vulgarise them, or rather the conception of them. But the wonder, the mystery, and a hundred scientific interests remain. Dr. Bonney, besides being an experienced Alpine traveller and an enthusiast, is a natural historian and a geologist. He realises the grandeur and poetry of the great mountains, but his purpose throughout is on the whole scientific, though science in this case, as may well be expected, has its romantic suggestions. He considers how the Alps grew, deals with mountain forms, the snowfields and glaciers, the making of the peaks and valleys, Alpine meteorology and vegetation and wild animals, and, in one of the most attractive chapters of all, the Alps in relation to Man. He is aware that some of the conclusions will arouse controversy amongst other specialists. But the Alps are a noble theme to fight about; clash and contest in such a case must be more or less uplifting if not ennobling. Would that all our differences and debates were concerned with issues of Alpine loftiness! The reader who is not a specialist can follow the descriptions and discussions without difficulty. He or she will secure a liberal measure of Alpine lore and science, and will be set brooding in profitable directions. The most expert Alpine studies leave much unsettled, but they bring undoubted fascination and ought to lead to memorable reverie.

From When Kings Rode to Delhi
(Blackwood).

AKBAR LEARNING TO READ.

THE PRINT COLLECTOR'S HANDBOOK.

By MALCOLM C. SALAMAN. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

This is a sixth edition of Alfred Whitman's invaluable work—revised, brought up to date and enlarged with additional chapters by Mr. Malcolm C. Salaman. It supplies expert hints for the beginner and full information for the amateur collector concerning every variety of old etching, line engraving, mezzotint, lithograph, English and French colour print; and makes him wise against fraudulent imitations. There are good chapters on collectors' methods, and the Print Room at the British Museum, and a very useful chapter, which Mr. Salaman has greatly extended, on "The Money Value of Prints." A sound and careful piece of work—this is and will remain the standard guide for the amateur collector.

LORDS AND LADIES OF THE ITALIAN LAKES.

By EDGCUMBE STALEY. With
44 Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.
(Long.)

The guide-book has been linked up with fiction; why then should it not be joined with biography? There is no reason in the world, of course, and Mr. Edgcumbe Staley is just the sort of writer to carry it all off with the necessary spirit and éclat. Indeed, biography which brings history in its train—is a more fitting adjunct of the guide-book than fiction. Mr. Staley has proved this already in his "Heroines of Genoa and the Rivas," and he proves it again in "Lords and Ladies of the Italian Lakes"—a subject which affords quite as pleasant reading in fact as it promises in title. In the course of his leisurely itinerary the writer not only covers the Italian Lakes from end to end, but he revives the great figures of the past and inspires them once again with living breath. We can recommend this volume—which, by the way, is excellently well illustrated—to anyone who is of a romantic turn of mind.

A HISTORY OF THE BRITISH NATION.

By A. D. INNES. Illustrated. 3s 6d. net. (T. C. & E. C. Jack).

Surely so large a book was never produced, and so well produced, at so moderate a price before. In a thousand pages Mr. A. D. Innes has told the history of the British Nation from the earliest times to the present day; it comprises an easily and attractively written account of every period and every aspect of the history of the peoples who have created the British Empire, and contains four hundred illustrations and maps. Mr. Innes is a sound scholar, and, unlike so many scholars, he has the gift of imparting his knowledge in a pleasant and delightfully readable style. We have no space here to do justice to this admirable History, which will be adequately dealt with next month by Mr. Thomas Seccombe.

From Everybody's St. Francis
(Unwin).

CHILDREN OF ASSISI FEEDING THE WOLF OF GUBBIO.

EVERYBODY'S ST. FRANCIS.

By MAURICE FRANCIS EGAN With pictures by M. Boulet de Monvel. 8s. 6d. net. (Fisher Unwin.)

"Everybody's" St. Francis is of course St. Francis of Assisi, the man whose influence over the hearts of multitudes of his own faith, of other faiths and of no faith at all, has its source in love. "Love made him a poet," as Mr. Egan says: "love made him a saint; love gave him life and fire and understanding and all the things that were added to him." The story of St. Francis's life of simple holiness is one of the most beautiful things in literature, and it is narrated here by Mr. Egan with great charm and with a gracious and sensitive feeling for the sweetness and spiritual significance of it all. The illustrations are in every way admirable, especially those that picture the later life of St. Francis. It is always the gentleness, the divine humanity of the man that comes out in them, and the subduing charm of his character—as in that showing how he subjugated the wolf; how he made friends with his little brothers the birds, how he pleaded with Brother Masseo. One of the most delicately finished of the colour-plates is that representing Santa Clara and her sister waiting on St. Francis—the gentle, pale, ascetic face of the saint, its whole expression so completely harmonises with that idea of him that we have preconceived for ourselves. The right mediæval atmosphere is preserved both in the text and the pictures, and the tasteful style in which the book is produced is in fullest accord with its subject.

From Lords and Ladies of the Italian Lakes (Long).

MYSTIC DANCE. MICHELINO DA BEDOZZO.
PALAZZO BONARDO, MILAN.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Man of Pleasure
(Chatto & Windus).

KING GEORGE IV. IN HYDE PARK.
From a scarce print.

THE MAN OF PLEASURE.

By RALPH NEVILL. With Twenty-eight Illustrations.
12s. 6d net. (Chatto & Windus.)

Mr. Nevill is a lively raconteur, and whether we agree or disagree in regard to his comments on the refinements of "this fastidious age," his new book will have a permanent value as focussing some very interesting phases of bygone social life. He incidentally offers sage advice which the young man about town will do well to take to heart. Indeed, one might easily cull a fair number of Chesterfieldian maxims from his pages. When he compares past with present, and talks about "grandmotherly legislation" and so on, he is not convincing, hardly historical, and not always consistent. It may be that the "man of pleasure" is no longer an exception, capable of amusing literary treatment: that he (and his womenkind) are now in the majority. In any case the old Tom and Jerry school, with all its more or less compensating qualities of good-nature, born to some extent from an incipient desire not to be worried overmuch, was not more admirable than its Bohemian and Crutch-and-Toothpick successors, in London and in Paris. One of the best of the many stories scattered plentifully throughout the book is that of Count D'Orsay hurling a plate at the head of a free-thinking officer who had spoken disparagingly of the Virgin Mary. D'Orsay explained his behaviour by saying that, though not a religious man, he could not forget that the Virgin Mary was a woman, and he would allow no man to speak insultingly of a woman in his hearing. It is a pity more "men of pleasure" were not (seriously) of the same way of thinking, for in the case of many the courtesy of words was not necessarily accompanied by courtesy of conduct. The volume is illustrated from the drawings by Cruikshank and Leech and collections of old prints. Some of the pictures are fairly familiar, but all are sufficiently apposite to the theme.

"HAIL AND FAREWELL!" II. SALVE.

By GEORGE MOORE. 6s (Heinemann.)

Mr. George Moore told us in the first volume of "Hail and Farewell!" how he came to hate England. In the second volume he tells us how he came to hate, or at least to despise, Ireland. He could not forgive England the

From The Church in Madras
(Smith, Elder).

THE CANTONMENT CHURCH, PALLAVERAM

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

Boer War. He could not forgive Ireland Roman Catholicism. It will be remembered by readers of the first volume that he was bidden in a vision "on the road to Chelsea" to go to Ireland and help in the revival of the Irish language, in order to prepare the way for the creation of a new literature. Obviously, however, the vision was not from above, but was a jest of the Fiend's. For no sooner had Mr. Moore properly begun his evangelising work than a second revelation was vouchsafed to him, and it now appeared to him that no Catholic country could produce literature, and that therefore it would be a waste of labour to devote himself to a language and literary revival in Ireland unless Ireland became either Protestant or Agnostic. In the result he decided to announce his own adhesion to the Protestant Church. Towards the end of the present volume we find him arguing divinity and repeating the Lord's Prayer with a clergyman whom the Protestant Archbishop of Dublin had appointed to minister to his spiritual needs. Surely in no part of the world did Protestantism ever net so odd a convert as the Mr. Moore of "Hail and Farewell!"

It would be impossible to say how far he is to be taken this kind cannot blame us if we appreciate him as what in the country they call a "character."

Obviously, indeed, Mr. Moore hugely enjoys playing a part. It tickles his sense of humour to imagine himself the leader of a crusade, whether it be a crusade to save the Irish language or to save the Boers, or to destroy the Church of Rome. He seems, according to his own account, to have saved thousands of Boers from being killed at one point. No sooner, again, does he discover the barrenness of Catholicism in literature than he believes that he will "be able to deal Catholicism such a blow as has not been dealt since the Reformation." "Hail and Farewell!" is one of the most delightfully self-important books in the English language. Mr. Moore is richly endowed with the egotism which is the spice of half the books of confessions. One feels that it was his egotism that was responsible for his failure to understand modern Ireland, and led to his regarding her with contempt. If he despises Ireland, however, he despises her wittily, as when he speaks of her people as a race of herdsmen, "divining the steak in the bullock with the same certainty as the Greek divined the statue in the block of marble." And he tells us how he

From The Building of the Alps
(Unwin).

CREVASSES ON A GLACIER.
From a photo. by Mrs. Aubrey Le Blond.

seriously, either as a convert to Nationalism, or as a convert to Protestantism. One thinks of him as trying various ideals—literary, political and religious—as a naughty boy might try a number of pots of jam. These latest books of his are, in some measure, comparable to the naughty boy's cockahoop story of how he enjoyed his raid on the jam-pots. "In some measure," I say, for it is evident that Mr. Moore was angrily serious at least in his abjuration of the Catholicism of his father. Those chapters in which he recalls the odious atmosphere of the sectarian boarding-school to which he had been sent as a boy have the ring of genuine deep-seated resentment. His conversion to Protestantism strikes one as a kind of belated revenge on his schoolmasters. At times, on the other hand, it strikes one as a joke. And it is Mr. Moore's own fault that this is so. He plays with his conversion as a kitten plays with a ball. He tells us, for instance, how at one moment he thought of writing to the Irish Times to say that his reason for abandoning Catholicism was the unpatriotic action of the Catholic priests in welcoming King Edward VII. to Maynooth! A convert who confesses to little mischiefs of once "fell to thinking that, if some meditative herdsmen, while leaning over a gate, had been inspired to compose a sauce whereby the steak might be eaten with relish, the Irish race would be able to hold up its head in the world." The indictment of Ireland as a country that has never produced a sauce is a sweet piece of nonsense. Perhaps, suggests Mr. Moore, the blame may lie with the Irish language, which may be "too harsh and bitter for such a buttery word as Béamaise."

"It may be that the Irish language was merely intended for the sale of bullocks—a language that has never been to school, as John Eglinton once said. If it had only fled to the kitchen one might forgive it for having played truant—the Irish language, a language that has never been spoken in a drawing-room, only in rude towers, and very like those towers are the blocks of rough sound that a Gaelic speech hurls at one when he speaks.

It will be seen that Mr. Moore is the most skilled of triflers. He is the most perfect dilettante old bachelor in contemporary literature. One may disapprove of him, but we cannot dislike him: he does not challenge one seriously enough for that. One's attitude to him must also be softened by the fact that, while he is usually malicious, he is never malignant. He compares himself somewhere to a butterfly; but butterflies do not sting and bite as he does, nor are they up to such eternal mischief. He is really more like the gadfly to which Socrates compared himself in his relations with the citizens of Athens. Mr. Moore enjoyed himself immensely as the gadfly of Dublin for a year or two, and in this book he gives us a shamefully funny account of what his victims looked like and behaved like under torture. His studies of Mr. Edward Martyn and Mr. T. P. Gill are marvellous examples of comic portraiture—comic, but, at times, curiously sympathetic. The portrait of A. E. does not seem to me to be so successful. Mr. Moore had too much respect for A. E. ever to torment him. It is to be feared that he had

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Grandeur that was Rome (Sidgwick & Jackson).

BA'ALBEK: THE TEMPLE OF ZEUS.

too much respect for him to be able to paint him.

One cannot end a review of a book like this without renewing one's protest against the indecencies that are here and there dragged into its pages. It may be that there is no great harm in them from an ethical point of view: they are merely dirty. They may be defended on the ground that Mr. Moore's genius is a genius for frankness—frankness about everything from his immortal soul to his underclothing. But that defence will not stand. Mr. Moore always chooses with the greatest deliberation those things about which he means to be frank. And he does this so skilfully that in the end he leaves us in considerable perplexity as to whether the real George Moore is in any way like the George Moore who is the hero of this brilliant comic Protestant tract.

ROBERT LYND.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS SUPPLEMENT

FICTION

AND MISCELLANEOUS LITERATURE

From The Cloister and the Hearth
(Chambers)

"THE HABITUAL EXPRESSION OF HER FACE WAS A SWEET PENSIVENESS."

SOME CHRISTMAS NOVELS.

If you were to ask me for a definition of the Christmas novel, I should certainly not be able to oblige you with anything more particular than the bare statement that it should be suitable for a Christmas present. That is the broad way in which I should like you to regard the books which follow. Saving that they are all fiction, and in prose, I cannot say that I have been able to discover any ground of subject or of interest, any philosophy of life, which is common to the whole lot. They are all pleasant to read—some more so than others, as I think—but it is quite as likely as not that you would disagree with me if I were to tell you that I prefer A to B, or either of them to C. I wish, in fact, to act merely as a signpost, just to give you a few hints as to what these books are variously about, so that you may avoid giving a sentimental story to a cynic of twenty-one, or a sensational affair to an aged maiden aunt.

I shall play for safety by starting with a few books which have stood the test of time, and have come out in new editions. Of these, the most important is the charming re-issue of "Wives and Daughters,"¹ "one of the most perfect and profoundly interesting English novels ever written," as says Mr. Seccombe in a preface which

¹ "Wives and Daughters." By Mrs. Gaskell. With a Preface by Thomas Seccombe, and 8 Coloured Plates and 60 Line Drawings by M. V. Wheelhouse. 5s. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Old Fireproof
(Duckworth).

"—AND HE THOUGHT, 'WELL, HERE THEY ARE THEN; NOW FOR IT.'"

certainly must not be overlooked. It is a model of its kind. It tells you exactly what you want, and what you ought, to know; it contains much fine critical material and it does what every preface should do—it arouses your interest and makes you want to read the book again. An additional attraction lies in the delightful illustrations, both in colour and line, of Miss M. V. Wheelhouse, who is surely the ideal illustrator of this period.

Hardly a year passes, I suppose, but Messrs. Sampson Low issue a new edition of "Lorna Doone,"¹ one of the best literary properties in existence. This year it is the "Western Moors" edition, an imposing volume (yet not too unwieldy) with a magnificently gilt cover, and sixteen very pleasing coloured illustrations by Mr. Christopher Clark. Altogether an excellent present, this—and besides, the book looks as if it cost at least three shillings more than you have to give for it.

Another very finely-produced volume is that which Messrs. Cassell have just published of "King Solomon's Mines,"² illustrated in colour by Mr. A. C. Michael, who has seldom done better work. Sir H. Rider Haggard contributes a "note," the latter half of which, I think, is worth quoting: "In closing these proof sheets also a kind of wonder takes me. Allan Quatermain has gone, but are Sir Henry Curtis and Captain Good really dead? Will they not perhaps some day break south from their dim Zu-Vendis, grasp their old friend Ignosi by the hand, and even re-visit Solomon's Treasure Cave and look upon poor Foulata's bones?"

Miss Grier is one of the soundest of our historical novelists, and "A Young Man Married"³—that fine tale of the

¹ "Lorna Doone." By R. D. Blackmore. (Western Moors Edition.) With 16 Coloured Plates by Christopher Clark. 7s. 6d. net. (Sampson Low.)

² "King Solomon's Mines." By H. Rider Haggard. With 18 Coloured Plates by A. C. Michael. 7s. 6d. net. (Cassell.)

³ "A Young Man Married." By Sydney C. Grier. With 6 Illustrations by A. Pearse. 6s. (Blackwood.)

Peninsular War—now goes, I am glad to see, into a new edition, the special feature of which is half-a-dozen spirited pictures by Mr. A. Pearse. Another war story is "Old Fireproof,"⁴ a really remarkable book, which everybody ought to read. Never mind whether or not you have heard of it, but take my word for it that you cannot understand the full meaning of war in general, and of the last Boer War in particular, until you have read it. I note that the new edition—the third—is produced as a boy's book, with illustrations by Edgar A. Holloway. This is well enough, provided that it does not scare adults off reading it.

Another volume which should be read by grown-ups as well as by boys (for whom it appears primarily to be intended) is "John Graham, Sub-Lieutenant, R.N.,"⁵ which is the first of my new books. Fleet-Surgeon T. T. Jeans has already made his mark as a naval writer, of course, and I hope I am right in saying that "John Graham" gives quite an extraordinarily accurate (and attractive) description of life as it is now lived in the Navy. If I am wrong, I can only retort that Mr. Jeans has written one of the best "fakes" I have ever read. Anyhow, it is a jolly, galloping story, and there is some particularly good Rugby football in it.

Mr. Jeans' book leads one—certainly it is a good deal of a jump—to "The People of the River,"⁶ a series of stories rather than a novel, the central figure of which is Mr. Commissioner Sanders, the head of a district somewhere or other in Central Africa. The tales contain some cheerful violence, some humorous characterization, and a great deal

⁴ "Old Fireproof." By Captain Owen Vaughan. With 5 Coloured and 3 Plain Plates by Edgar A. Holloway. 6s. (Duckworth.)

⁵ "John Graham, Sub-Lieutenant, R.N." By Fleet-Surgeon T. T. Jeans, R.N. With 8 Coloured Plates by C. M. Paddy. 6s. (Blackie.)

⁶ "The People of the River." By Edgar Wallace. With Coloured Frontispiece. 6s. (Ward, Lock.)

From A Young Man Married
(Blackwood).

"PRESENTED HER WITH A FOLDED PAPER."

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From King Solomon's Mines "AH! BOUGWAN, I DIE!"
(Cassell).

of incident. If you are acquainted with Mr. Edgar Wallace's other books you will know that he does this sort of thing exceedingly well. Another good sensational book is "The Mesh"¹ by John Haslette. Here the scene is a South American republic, the President of which—an altogether delightful scoundrel—is a past master in the art of deception. In order to please his mamorata, he has the English bank, situated in his capital, robbed, afterwards disposing of his associates in so skilful a manner that the manager of the bank, who loses his job in consequence of the theft, believes the President to be his best friend. How Temporel eventually succeeds in recovering the money and unmasking the President, makes a story well worth the reading. Possessed of ingenuity, inventiveness, and a considerable gift for character, Mr. Haslette should go far.

But for really strong, full-blooded sensation I don't suppose anybody is the equal of Mrs. Marie Connor Leighton, the plot of whose latest novel, "Her Marriage Lines,"² I cannot even begin to tell you. In its way, however, it is quite a remarkable tour de force; the author keeps the intricacies of her plot going with the juggling skill of a Cinquevalli, and she holds the reader's interest absolutely—to use a well-worn phrase—from the first page to the last.

It always seems to me that it takes a lot to beat a really good detective story, and, though I do not consider that Miss Elizabeth Kent has played quite fairly in "Who?"³ in that her murder is sadly lacking in motive, I imagine that it is just possible to answer the question of the title on the particulars that the author gives you from time to time. I suppose I am prejudiced against the book because I was completely baffled for a solution; but I can leave "Who?" to less exacting readers with the assurance that I shall be very much surprised if they can discover who killed Lord Wilmersley before the author tells them of her own accord.

¹ "The Mesh." By John Haslette. 6s. (Sampson Low.)

² "Her Marriage Lines." By Marie Connor Leighton. With Coloured Frontispiece. 6s. (Ward, Lock.)

³ "Who?" By Elizabeth Kent. With Coloured Frontispiece by John Cassel. 6s. (Putnam's.)

Among present-day writers of historical novels I should place Miss Beth Ellis very highly. There is a swing and a cheerfulness in her writing which are particularly attractive; she has an accurate knowledge of her periods; and her characters are very decidedly not the inhuman puppets of the average of historical fiction. Miss Ellis is at her best in "The King's Blue Riband,"⁴ an article of attire which belonged to "Le Roi Soleil," and which the Englishman, Anthony Claverton, undertook to steal for a bet. He succeeded, of course, but that part of the book is no more interesting than the account of what happened afterwards. Yes, "The King's Blue Riband" is a very jolly story.

"The Fair Enchantress"⁵ is a historical novel of a totally different type. Probably I am not justified in calling it a novel at all.

⁴ "The King's Blue Riband" By Beth Ellis. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

⁵ "The Fair Enchantress" By Henry Schumacher. With Coloured Frontispiece and 24 Plain Plates after Romney, Gainsborough, Reynolds, etc. 6s. (Hutchinson.)

From The People of the River (Ward, Lock).

"THEN HE SAW HER STRUGGLING."

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Stories of Pendennis and the Charterhouse (Harper).

CLIVE NEWCOME AT THE CHARTERHOUSE.

It is a romantic treatment of the early years of the life of Lady Hamilton, and it resembles fiction only in so far as that the "story" is developed principally by means of dialogue. In other respects it is a sufficiently accurate biography. The book is cleverly and effectively written, and I should think that it is assured of a considerable success. The production of the volume is very handsome indeed.

Mr. Crockett's star is once more in the ascendant—and deservedly so, for there has been much good work in his later novels. "The Moss Troopers" ¹ sees him back in the Galloway of his favourite period, with press-gangs, smugglers, and all the rest of it. Simply to say that it is something like "The Raiders" is probably the best short description I can give you of "The Moss Troopers."

The remainder of the books on my table are modern in their setting. Three hail from America, two are collections of short stories, and the sixth is a very charming short novel by the amazingly popular Mrs. Barclay. "The Upas Tree" ² exhibits all the most attractive of its author's qualities. It has a strong, unusual, and well-constructed plot, four well-contrasted characters, and a highly-developed sentimental interest. I am quite sure that before Christmas comes I shall be hearing that one or two hundred thousand copies of it have been sold.

Miss Jane H. Findlater's genius is quiet and unobtrusive, but none the less real, and her books invariably merit the closest attention. I hope you will on no account overlook

¹ "The Moss Troopers." By S. R. Crockett. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

² "The Upas Tree." By Florence L. Barclay. With Coloured Frontispiece by F. H. Townsend. 3s. 6d. net. (Putnam's.)

"Seven Scots Stories" ³ which are all as good as anything she has ever written. You can hardly help enjoying this book, whether it be the pathos of "The Bairn-Keeper" ("I'm wee, but I'm that bauld and firm") or the wry, gentle humour of "Ower Young to Marry Yet"—to say nothing of the other five tales. I cannot leave this volume without expressing my admiration for Mr. Henry W. Kerr's illustrations. A second collection of short stories comes from Lord Rosebery's daughter, Lady Sybil Grant. "The Chequer Board" ⁴ presents a variety of aspects of modern life, but I must confess that I like the author best in those tales which deal with the supernatural. "Beyond the Boundary" and "?" (which really is the title of one of the stories) are both well above the average in this vein.

Mr. Robert W. Chambers, I believe, has a larger regular public than any other writer in America, and it would seem that he has a considerable following on this side of the Atlantic as well. He is generous enough to give us two books this Christmas. "The Streets of Ascalon" ⁵ has figured as a serial in a popular magazine. It is a very long, but carefully handled and cleverly developed, story of the doings of the American Smart Set and its hangers-on. Perhaps it is a little over-elaborate, but it is by no means lacking in effect, and it remains one of the most successful examples of its author's later manner. "Blue-Bird Weather" ⁶ is the very antithesis of "The Streets of Ascalon," for it is short and slight—a happy little romance of duck shooting, in which a wealthy young city man marries the daughter of his gamekeeper.

³ "Seven Scots Stories" By Jane H. Findlater. With 5 Coloured Plates by Henry W. Kerr, R.S.A. 6s. (Smith, Elder.)

⁴ "The Chequer Board" By Sybil Grant. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

⁵ "The Streets of Ascalon" By Robert W. Chambers. With 29 Illustrations by Charles Dana Gibson. 6s. (Appleton.)

⁶ "Blue-Bird Weather." By Robert W. Chambers. With 7 Illustrations by Charles Dana Gibson. 3s. 6d. net. (Appleton.)

From Seven Scots Stories
(Smith, Elder).

DIVINA.

A SELECTION FROM
Messrs. HUTCHINSON & CO.'s New Books
 SUITABLE FOR GIFTS

By the Author of "A Diplomatist's Wife in Many Lands"
Further Reminiscences of a Diplomatist's Wife
 By Mrs. HUGH FRASER
 With portrait in Photogravure. In cloth gilt and gilt top,
 16s. net

By General Gordon's Chief of the Staff in the Sudan
My Life in Four Continents
 By COLONEL CHAILLÉ-LONG
 With 2 Photogravure Plates and numerous Illustrations. In 2 vols., cloth gilt and gilt top, 24s. net

"A 'LIFE' THAT LIVES"
The Life of
 Henry Hartley Fowler
 FIRST VISCOUNT WOLVERHAMPTON, G.C.S.I.
 By his Daughter, EDITH HENRIETTA FOWLER
 With 3 Photogravure Plates and other Illustrations. In one large handsome volume, 700 pages, cloth gilt and gilt top, 21s. net
 "It is full of solid worth, there is a deep and true interest in the book, since it has character in every page. The 'Life' is to be placed on the same shelf with Goschen and Devonshire."—Morning Post
 "The book will necessarily stand on the shelves of every statesman's library."—Standard.

Marvels of the Universe
 NATURE'S MARVELS IN
 THE HEAVENS. ANIMAL LIFE. THE MIGHTY
 DEEP. PLANT LIFE. THE EARTH'S BODY.
 Told by leading Specialists of the Natural Sciences of the day
 With an introduction by LORD AVEBURY P.C.
 Illustrated with over 1,200 Beautiful Pictures and 64 Coloured Plates from paintings specially executed for this work.
 PRINTED THROUGHOUT ON ART PAPER
 In two large handsome volumes, cloth gilt and gilt edges, 12s. 6d. net per vol., and in various leather bindings

3 SUPERB ART BOOKS

Greuze and his Models
 By JOHN RIVERS
 In cloth gilt and gilt top, 10s. 6d. net. With 39 full-page Gravure Plates and other Illustrations with text.

A NEW AND CHEAP EDITION
Goethe's Faust
 With 33 Coloured Plates after original
 Water-colour Drawings
 By WILLY POGANY
 In crown 4to, cloth gilt and gilt top, 6s. net

The Book of Psalms
 With 24 Illustrations in Colour
 By FRANK PAPÉ
 In crown 4to, cloth, richly gilt and gilt top, 10s. 6d.
 net

Twelve Great Passions
 By J. A. BRENDON
 Handsomely bound in cloth gilt, 6s. net, with decorative end papers and 15 beautiful Illustrations.

Parodies & Imitations: Old and New
 With a Foreword by
 SIR ARTHUR QUILLER-COUCH
 In cloth gilt and gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

A book of which 60,000 copies have been sold in Germany
The Fair Enchantress
 A Romance of Lady Hamilton's Early Years
 By HENRY SCHUMACHER
 With a Frontispiece in Colour and 24 Illustrations. Handsomely bound in cloth gilt, 6s.

3 FASCINATING WORKS

The Wonders of the World
 THE MARVELS OF NATURE AND MAN
 AS THEY EXIST TO-DAY
 With over 1,000 Beautiful Illustrations reproduced from Photographs including 28 Coloured Plates.
 The work comprises an absolutely original collection of Photographs of the Marvels of the World.
 All the World's most wonderful sights as seen by the most eminent travellers, many of whom have supplied the descriptive text.

The Contributors include
 SIR HARRY JOHNSTON, G.C.M.G., K.C.B.
 Earl of Ronaldshay, M.P., Alan Burgoyne, M.P., Perceval Landon, Capt. C. G. Rawling, C.I.E., F.R.G.S., B. C. Putnam Weale, Philip W. Sergeant, Herbert C. Ponting, F.R.G.S., and many others.
 PRINTED THROUGHOUT ON FINE ART PAPER
 two handsome vols., cloth richly gilt and gilt edges, 12s. 6d. net per vol., and in various leather bindings.

THE Living Animals of the World
 With Contributions by Eminent Specialists
 This work comprises an absolutely unique and almost priceless collection of Photographs of Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Reptiles, Insects, etc.
 With 25 Coloured Plates and 1,210 Illustrations from Photographs, printed throughout on the finest art paper
 In two vols., cloth gilt and gilt edges, 10s. 6d. net per vol., and in various leather bindings

THE Living Races of Mankind
 By Eminent Specialists
 800 Photographs from Life, 25 Coloured Plates, and also Maps.
 In two vols., cloth gilt and gilt edges, 10s. 6d. net per vol., and in various leather bindings

Hutchinson's Popular Botany

THE LIVING PLANT FROM SEED TO FLOWER
 By A. E. KNIGHT and EDWARD STEP, F.L.S.
 With about 600 Beautiful Illustrations and numerous fine Coloured Plates.
 PRINTED THROUGHOUT ON FINE ART PAPER
 In two handsome volumes, cloth gilt and gilt edges, 7s. 6d. net per vol., and in various leather bindings.

The Infancy of Animals

By W. P. PYCRAFT, A.L.S., F.Z.S.
 In cloth gilt, 6s. net, with 64 Plates on Art Paper and numerous Illustrations in the text

Astronomy

By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S.
 With 8 Coloured Plates and 300 other Illustrations, in cloth richly gilt, rounded corners, 5s. net.

HUTCHINSON'S New 6/- Novels

GENERAL MALLOCK'S SHADOW W. B. Maxwell
COME RACK! COME ROPE! (2nd Ed.) Robert Hugh Benson
FROM THE VALLEY OF THE MISSING Grace Miller White

MEADOWSWEET (1st Ed.)
THE VELDT DWELLERS (5th Ed.)
MISS MALLORY OF MOTE
VARICE'S LEGACY

Baroness Orczy
 F. Bancroft
 Evelyn Everett-Green
 G. B. Burgin

London: HUTCHINSON & CO.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Isles of Flame
(Alex. Gardner).

"WATCHING THE LITTLE BIRDS, CALLED BY THE BRETHREN THE SERVANTS OF BRIDE."

The last of my novels, "The Mission of Victoria Wilhelmina,"¹ is another short book, but one that is by no means lacking in quality. In simple, poignant phrases—purporting to be extracted from the diary of its heroine—it tells how Ann Wilson is left alone in the world, how she comes to New York and finds employment as a telephone girl in an office, how she is seduced by her employer, and how Victoria Wilhelmina, the baby that is lent to her only for a day, fulfils her mission, and, raising the poor mother out of the depths into which she has sunk, gives her an ideal to cherish and to work for. It is the saddest of the books I have dealt with here, but in many ways it is the one which best repays the reading, and it is not so sad that it is bereft of hope.

L.T.S.

STORIES OF PENDENNIS AND THE CHARTERHOUSE. FROM THACKERAY.

Selected and arranged by AMY BARTER. Illustrated. 2s. 6d. net. (Harrap.)

Every reader of Thackeray knows how large a part his early life at the Charterhouse plays in certain of his novels. In "The Newcomes," "Pendennis" and "The Adventures of Philip" his heroes are sent to school there, and old Colonel Newcome goes there to die. Miss Barter has extracted all these passages from the books and arranged them very deftly, adding so much of the subsequent careers of the characters who are thus connected with the Charterhouse as was necessary to give completeness to the stories. By way of introduction she furnishes an account of Thackeray's own life at the Charterhouse, giving it as far as may be in his own words or those of his contemporaries. The result is a pleasantly readable and entertaining book, and one that can scarcely fail to fulfil its compiler's purpose of sending younger readers to the works of the Master.

¹ "The Mission of Victoria Wilhelmina." By Jeanne Bartholow Magoun. With Coloured Frontispiece by A. Joanna Fry. 2s. net. (Putnam's.)

THE BLACKBERRY PICKERS.

By EVELYN ST. LEGER. 6s. (Putnam's.)

Young Luke Lummond has been the victim of a ragging scandal in the Army, and has sent in his papers in consequence; but Rachael Cremayne, the girl to whom he is engaged, makes the best of things and induces him to pull himself together and to find other employment. The inevitable third takes the form of Robert Haskell, happily but tragically married to a paralysed wife. These are the three important figures of "The Blackberry Pickers," who play off their drama of love and misunderstanding and disappointment. And a very effective piece of work it is, with two well contrasted characters dividing between them the principal male part, a charming heroine, and an even more charming wife for the "other" man. The more tragic and dramatic scenes are well handled by Miss St. Leger, who shows also that she has a turn for comedy and a very complete grasp of character. In fact, "The Blackberry Pickers" is an unusual novel and one considerably above the average. We have no hesitation in recommending it.

THE ISLES OF FLAME: A ROMANCE OF THE INNER HEBRIDES IN THE DAYS OF COLUMBA.

By M. E. M. DONALDSON. With 6 Coloured Illustrations by Isabel Bonus. (Alex. Gardner, Paisley.)

In her preface Miss Donaldson is a little too aggressive on the subject of the historical novel and the harm that a writer does by inaccuracy. Accordingly, we were a little anxious to catch her tripping, and failed to do so. So far as we can tell the historical atmosphere of "The Isles of Flame" is as nearly perfect as is humanly possible. As Miss Donaldson also possesses effective powers of characterisation and knows how to construct a plot, you will gather that "The Isles of Flame" is well worth reading. It is not a long book, but it is one of real quality; a remark which can apply also to Miss Bonus's remarkable illustrations.

From The Isles of Flame
(Alex. Gardner).

"THE VOICE OF THE MIGHTY SPIRIT OF THE MOUNTAINS SPOKE IN MY EAR."

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

A. C. BENSON'S NEW WORK.

Thy Rod and Thy Staff.

By ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON, Author of "From a College Window," "The Silent Isle," &c. Large post 8vo 6s net.
Record.—"We do not think there has been anything quite like this book since St. Augustine wrote his 'Confessions,' or Bunyan his 'Grace Abounding'."

The Church in Madras. Vol. II.

Being the History of the Ecclesiastical and Missionary Action of the East India Company in the Presidency of Madras from 1805-1815 By the REV. FRANK PENNY, LL.M., With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s net.

Scotsman.—"Takes a broad, historical view of the events and changes it surveys, and of the religious, social, and educational progress of Anglo-Indian life during its period."

Eton in the Seventies.

By the Hon. GILBERT COLERIDGE, Author of "An Instinctive Criminal," &c. With 8 Illustrations. Large post 8vo 7s 6d net.

Country Life.—"The impression left on the mind of one who belonged to the nineties is that those of twenty years before were truly desperate blades. There are some thrilling stories of adventure."

Boswell the Biographer.

By GEORGE MALLORY. With a Portrait. Large post 8vo. 7s. 6d net.

Athenaeum.—"Mr. Mallory writes in an entertaining manner about an entertaining subject."

Dawn in Darkest Africa.

By the REV. JOHN H. HARRIS, With an Introduction by the Rt. Hon. THE EARL OF CROMER, O.M., P.C., G.C.B. With 40 pages of Illustrations and a Map. Small royal 8vo 10s. 6d. net.

Daily News.—"Not merely a fascinating picture of African travel, but also a profoundly stimulating and interesting contrast between the work that is being done in Africa by the various civilisations of Europe."

Large post 8vo. 6s. net.

Allegories of the Land.

By Major GAMBIER-PARRY, Author of "The Pageant of my Day," "Murphy," a Message to Dog Lovers, &c.

Times.—"We see something of the old Lewis of labour . . . Characters like Widow Joyce, Hopful Thomas, and the flint pickers are full of force in their unity of effect."

Sixty Years in the Wilderness: More Passages by the Way.

By Sir HENRY LUCY (Toby, M.P., of "Punch"). Author of "A Diary of Two Parliaments," &c. With a Frontispiece. Small demy 8vo 10s. 6d net.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Sir Henry Lucy's reminiscences can be read and re-read, for they are inspired by a perception of the many humorous and dramatic turns that present themselves in the political and social world. He is a true artist as distinct from a mere entertainer."

Scenes and Memories.

By WALBURGA LAJBY PAGET. With a Portrait. Large post 8vo 7s. 6d net.

Times.—"Lady Paget has rich and varied sources to draw upon for her reminiscences. She gives us silhouette portraits of eminent personages and lively sketches of society in the various capitals."

When every Tree was Green.

By G. L. BRADBURY, Author of "Dick," "The Awakening of Birtlesham," &c. Crown 8vo 3s. 6d.

Times.—"A most inviting book of childhood memories of an English country house."

The Conquest of New Granada.

By Sir CLEMENTS R. MARKHAM, K.C.B., F.R.S., Author of "The Incas of Peru," &c. With a Map. Small demy 8vo 6s net.

Times.—"Sir Clements Markham has waited fifty years for someone else to attempt it with greater local knowledge. The present work, short though it is, will probably make students regret that he has waited so long."

A Home Help in Canada.

By FLLA C. SYKES, Author of "Through Persia on a Side Saddle," With a Portrait. Large post 8vo 6s net.

Belfast Northern Whig.—"The whole book is written in a lively, natural, unforced style and gives a tremendous amount of information. The book is instructive and amusing."

God's Playthings.

2nd Impression. Sm. demy 8vo 6s.

By MARJORIE BOWEN, Author of "The Vicar of Milan," "Black Magic," &c.

Scenes of history. A series of dramatic episodes leading up to the death of various historical personages.

The Land that is Desolate:

An Account of a Tour in Palestine.

By Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., G.C.V.O. &c. Sergeant-Surgeon to H.M. the King. Author of "The Cradle of the Deep," &c. With Illustrations from Photographs by the Author and a Map. Small royal 8vo 9s. net.

What the Judge Saw: Being 25 Years in Manchester, by One who has done it.

By His Honour Judge EDWARD ABBOTT PARRY, Author of "Judgments in Vacation," &c. Second Impression. Large post 8vo. 7s. 6d net.

Daily Chronicle.—"The book is diverting and well strewn with personalities. 'If your lordship please,' give us another volume like this. It bespeaks a human man with a good heart as well as a clever head."

A Housemaster's Letters.

Large post 8vo. 6s net.
 A series of letters written to old boys, to parents, or to friends, reflections and counsels on the varied problems of Education which a schoolmaster must solve.

Dogs and their Masters.

By MARION CHAPPELL. With 7 Coloured and other Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 5s net.
 An anthology which draws on prose as well as poetry for the delight of all who love dogs.

On the Track of the Abor.

By POWELL MILLINGTON, Author of "To Lhasa at Last," "Homeward Mail," &c. Crown 8vo 3s. 6d net.

A cheery account from the transport department of an expedition which had little to show to the public.

The Casual Ward: Academic and other Oddments.

By A. D. GODLEY, Public Orator at the University of Oxford. Author of "Lyra Trivola," "Second Strings," "Oxford in the 18th Century," Crown 8vo 3s. 6d net.

The volume consists partly of prose recalling the "Oxford Spectator" and partly of humorous verse, on public and academic affairs.

NEW 6s. FICTION.

Erica.

A New Novel by the Author of "Peter's Mother," etc.

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE (Lady Clifford).

Reviewed by The Times on day of publication.

Times.—"Needless to say the book is finished in expression throughout and full of those delicate nuances which we must always look for in reading Lady Clifford."

Daily Telegraph.—"Even the incidental people who appear once and are gone are depicted with such unerring skill that there is not a single line of the story with which we can dispense."

A New Novel by the Authors of "The Rose of the World," etc.

The Grip of Life.

By AGNES & EGLINTON CASTLE.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"The story is told with rare skill, there is an excellent glamour about it all."

Yorkshire Post.—"This extremely entertaining story."

Promise of Arden.

By ERIC PARKER.

Daily Citizen.—"Mr. Parker is an ardent nature lover and his descriptions of scenery are very telling. He has also a happy knack of characterization and can in a few words convey a clear cut picture."

Chess for a Stake.

By HAROLD VALLINGS.

Times.—"The game, a fairly entertaining one for the spectators, ends up happily for the two heroines, and both get their right mates at last."

Seven Scots Stories.

By JANE FINDLATER. With 5 Illustrations in Colour by HENRY W. KERR, R.S.A., R.S.M.

Three Illustrated Books for Children.

In Cloth Binding of Special Design with Pictorial Covers.

Large Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. each.

Oddle and Iddle; or, The Goblins of Aloe Shamba.

By LIFFY COLLIER. With a Frontispiece in Colours and 8 Full-page Illustrations by Mrs. CRAWSHAY WILLIAMS.

Belfast Northern Whig.—"It is most diverting and exquisitely conceived fairy tale which the writer has placed amid most unusual surroundings—namely, a district in South Africa."

Magic Dominions.

By ARTHUR WALLIS, Author of "Slipped Moorings," With a Frontispiece in Colours and 4 Illustrations by CLAUDE SHEPHERSON, A.R.W.S.

Athenaeum.—"Mr. A. F. Wallis writes with delightful inconsequence. Much wit and wisdom and charming ideas in plenty underlie the pretty froth on the surface."

Two Troubadours.

By ESMÉ STUART, Author of "Harum Scarum," &c. With a Frontispiece in Colour and 8 Illustrations.

Athenaeum.—"A couple of the most engaging enfants terribles imaginable."

Belfast Northern Whig.—"The book is brightly and pleasantly written."

NOT MANY SETS REMAIN OF

Robert Browning's Works.

CENTENARY EDITION.

IN 10 VOLUMES, DEMY 8vo, 10s. 6d. NET EACH, PRINTED IN LARGE TYPE ON FINE PAPER.

The Edition, limited to 500 numbered copies for sale in this Country (and 250 copies for sale in the United States) will be sold in sets only, £5 5s. net the set. The Special Edition of 26 numbered copies on JAPANESE VELLUM, price £10 10s. net the set, has been SOLD OUT.

With Introductions by SIR FREDERIC G. KENYON, C.B., D.Litt., and a Portrait Frontispiece to each Volume.

Spectator.—"As well printed, judiciously annotated, and coverable an edition of the poet as can be imagined . . . this charming and scholarly edition."

Quarterly Review.—"The aspect of these volumes is as admirable as the tact which has gone to the making of the illustrative and biographical notes, few but fit, with which each is introduced."

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

DOGS AND THEIR MASTERS.

Compiled by MARION CHAPPELL. 5s. net.
(Smith, Elder.)

As a lover of dogs one does not know which most to admire: the almost passionate devotion which must have gone to the fashioning of this book or the book in itself, affording, as it does, such remarkable evidence of the kind of freemasonry which animates all who possess an affection for the canine creation. It would be possible, almost, to draw up a kind of philosophy from the materials brought together by the author. In this delightful anthology one finds tributes to our four-footed friend from authors as old as Homer and as recent as "Richard Dehan." Poets, artists, players—all are represented; and the Press is not forgotten. Here are imagination and reality, the one based surely on the other. And knows nothing of farming, and is clumsy about learning, but is so bent on making good that with the help and encouragement of Mandy Haley, the farmer's daughter, he soon begins to improve. Here is his first glimpse of Mandy, who comes up behind him and warns him that he is using the wrong axo for splitting wood. "Turning he saw a girl of about seventeen, here is orderly arrangement also, which anthologies do not always have. Thus we have a section on "Dogs in General." There follow other sections, devoted respectively to "St. Bernards and Others," "Hounds of the Chase," "Dogs of the Gun," "Terriers," "Little Dogs," and "Nondescripts." There are seven illustrations in colour and ten in black and white; the reproduction of the portrait by Mr. Briton Riviere, R.A., of Miss Chappell's fine collie "Brush," and that of the hitherto unpublished drawing by Sir Edwin Landseer of a wire-haired terrier being particularly interesting. Several of the stories in the volume are published for the first time, and some of the contributions are enhanced in value by facsimiles of the senders' autographs. The illustrations, of which we give a selection of seven on this page, are admir-

From Dogs and their Masters ABERDEEN TERRIERS.
(Smith, Elder.) By K. Rashleigh.
(In the possession of Miss Chappell.)

with little grace and less beauty, but strongly and stoutly built, and with a good-natured, if somewhat stupid and heavy face. Her air was dun in colour, coarse in texture, and done up loosely and carelessly in two heavy braids, arranged about her head in such a manner as to permit stray wisps of hair to escape about her face and neck. She was dressed in a loose pink wrapper, all too plainly of home manufacture, gathered in at the waist and successfully obliterating any lines that might indicate the existence of any grace of form, and sadly spotted and stained with grease and dirt. Her red, stout arms ended in redder and thicker hands, decked with an array of black-rimmed nails. At his first glance Cameron was conscious of a feeling of repulsion, but in a moment this feeling passed and he was surprised to find himself ably reproduced, they represent a wonderful variety of dogs and add much to the attractiveness of a very charming anthology.

DACHSHUND

looking into two eyes of surprising loveliness, dark blue, well shaped and of such liquid depths as to suggest pools of water under forest trees." Unlikely as it seems at the moment,

LURCHER

CORPORAL CAMERON.

By RALPH CONNOR. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton).

If you analyse the secret of Ralph Connor's immense popularity you find that in the first place he can always be depended upon to tell a good, live story; he draws his characters in bold and vivid colours; he has a picturesque descriptive gift, and writes of the big, breezy, self-reliant men of the young world of Canada as he has known them. He has, in short, the full equipment of the

NEWFOUNDLAND

it is through Mandy that a love interest comes into the story; for love wakes a soul in the girl and wonderfully transforms her. There is trouble at the farm; Cameron is near to losing his life, and afterwards goes away, and passes through some thrilling adventures into the Mounted Police, which leads him into still more adventure, and it is whilst he is lying wounded in hospital that Mandy reappears in the story—the transformed Mandy who is to make him at last "the luckiest man in the world." It is a capital romance; easily the best that we have come across this season.

CATTLE, SHEEP AND PIGS.

By FRANK TOWNEND
BARTON, M.R.C.V.S.
7s 6d. net. (Jarrold)

Here is a book on the "practical breeding and keeping of cattle, sheep, and pigs," that should be invaluable to farmers and agriculturists, whether their lands are great or small. Mr. Barton knows all that is to be known concerning the animals he writes about, and sets out his knowledge in plain and readable terms. He deals with the selection of dairy cattle, explains the qualities of the various breeds, devotes much attention to the causes of diseases and the common ailments of cattle, and supplies a large number of useful prescriptions. Sheep are investigated with equal thoroughness. Their general management, variety, and diseases—with remedies, are described, and a special chapter is given to shearing, washing, and dipping. We pass on to pigs, pigsties, and all that pertains to the pig in sickness and health. Finally, there are chapters on the Transit of Live Stock by Passenger Train, the Marking of Live Stock, Ranching in Argentina, and British Forage Grasses, Ensilage, and Poisonous Plants. Nearly one hundred excellent illustrations, and an admirably complete

From Cattle, Sheep, and Pigs
(Jarrold)

ROBBINS

(over thirty years herdsman at the Royal Farms Sandringham), and a Prize Shorthorn Steer.
Photo by G. G. Parsons, Alsager.

for which the publishers ask very low.

index add to the value of a book that would be the happiest Christmas present for a cattle-breeder at home or abroad.

MORE WILD ANIMALS AND THE CAMERA.

By WALTER P. DANDO,
F.Z.S. With 12 Collotype Plates and 66 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author.
6s net (Jarrold.)

Mr. Dando's earlier work, "Wild Animals and the Camera," was so successful that he has followed it up with a second volume, produced in a similar manner. The book appears to have been written chiefly for the sake of the many fine photographs which the author has made of wild animals of every description, but the brief notes on each animal are quite adequately done, and taken in the sum total, they embody a tremendous amount of information. For the illustrations once more we have nothing but praise. Many of them are notably artistic, and all are clear and exceedingly well reproduced. Taken in conjunction with the text, they make a fine book price which seems to us

From More Wild Animals and the Camera
(Jarrold).

THE YAK

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Infancy of Animals
(Hutchinson).

CHAMOIS AND YOUNG. After Wolf.

The amazing agility and surefootedness of the Chamois is the outcome of a vigorous selection commencing from a few hours after birth and sustained through life. Only the "fittest" survive.

THE LIFE OF AN ELEPHANT.

By S. EARDLEY-WILMOT, K.C.I.E. 7s 6d. net. (Edward Arnold.)

"My Lord the Elephant" has long been the theme of song and story—we think particularly of Mr. Rudyard Kipling in this connection—and it has a fascination for the animal lover, scarcely inferior to that possessed by the dog and the horse. For the elephant also is a friend of man, and in its intelligence probably surpasses all the remainder of the animal kingdom. Its bulk, of course, as the author remarks, is destructive of familiarity, but it assists, perhaps, to raise it in our esteem—a Samson amongst the brutes placing its enormous strength obediently at the disposal of its pigmy masters, "content with fair treatment and instantly responsive to kindness in word or deed." Sir Sainthill Eardley-Wilmot's treatment of his theme is both vivid and picturesque, tracing the life of the typical elephant from birth till death. And he has the art of arresting and stimulating the attention by the introduction of exciting, and adventurous episodes in elephant life. For instance, we have a spirited account of the elephant mother defending her calf against the attack of a hungry tigress. It is a tremendous duel, ended by the elephant crushing the tigress against a tree, and then stamping it under foot until only a shapeless mass remains. A still more Homeric combat is that between two elephants contesting for leadership of the herd—a struggle that rages all night and from the arena of which even the mammoth companions of the pair discreetly keep clear. This battle of Titans ended, the victor attacks another bull—one bull must be supreme—and pays the penalty of entering on a fresh combat when nearly exhausted by the first, by being defeated in turn. And so we follow the career of the elephant, through herd-life to the time of his capture and then through his training for work and sport and pageant until his death, which in this case ensues from the bite of a cobra coiled in the green fodder from which the elephant makes his evening meal. By this time we have grown to love Maula Bux, and the Nemesis which befalls the snake which he crushes quietly under his mighty forefoot is small solace to our feelings. Throughout the tale is related in graphic phrases and with the sympathy and insight of the true animal lover. The book is copiously illustrated by Iris Eardley-Wilmot.

THE INFANCY OF ANIMALS.

By W. P. PYCRAFT. With 64 Plates and 20 Illustrations in the Text. (Hutchinson)

The scope of Mr. Pycraft's excellent volume can best be indicated by a somewhat lengthy quotation from his preface: "While most people find young animals 'interesting,' few perhaps realise how much more so they become when we ask the Why and the Wherefore of their several peculiarities of form and colour, and of the degrees of activity which they display on their entry into the world. The purpose of this book is to stimulate a wider interest in this theme, which contains food for thought not only for the evolutionist, but also for the students of sociology and all child life in particular, and for that large and growing body who work under the banner of 'Nature Study.'" Mr. Pycraft appears to us to have performed his task with eminent success. His book is exceedingly interestingly written, and we believe that it will be widely read. It should be noted that he deals not only with animals, but also with birds and fishes. The illustrations are numerous and exceptionally effective.

From The Life of an Elephant (Arnold).

"THE ELEPHANTS WERE CAPTIONED FOR A SHOOTING PARTY."

FROM CHATTO AND WINDUS'S LIST

OUR BOOK OF MEMORIES: 1884-1912

Letters from JUSTIN McCARTHY to Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED. With Photogravure Portrait and 9 other Plates. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

AT PRIOR PARK, and other Papers

By AUSTIN DOBSON. With 6 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

ESSAYS IN FRESCO

By EDWARD McCURDY, Editor of 'The Note-Books of Leonardo da Vinci.' With 6 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 5s. net.

A collection of papers dealing with Conradin, Richard Cœur de Lion, Enzo, James I. of Scotland, and other figures in the great pageant of mediævalism.

MOZART'S OPERAS. A Critical Study

By EDWARD J. DENT, Author of 'Alessandro Scarlatti, his Life and Works.' With Portraits and Musical Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

THE MAN OF PLEASURE

By RALPH NEVILL, Author of 'London Clubs: their History and Treasures.' With 28 Plates in Colour and Black and White. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

THE FAVOURITES OF LOUIS XIV.

By LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE. With 4 portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

THE COURT OF THE TUILERIES, 1852-1870

By LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE. A New Edition. With a Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 5s. net.

THE CHARM OF LONDON

Passages Selected and Edited by ALFRED H. HYATT. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by Yoshio Markino. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net; velvet calf, 7s. 6d. net.

THE CHARM OF VENICE

Passages Selected and Edited by ALFRED H. HYATT. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by Harald Sund. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net; velvet calf, 7s. 6d. net.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON'S

'An Inland Voyage' and 'Travels with a Donkey.' New Editions with 12 Coloured Plates and many others in Line by Noel Rooke. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net each; Large Paper Copies, 12s. 6d. net each.

MORTE D'ARTHUR

By ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Each page illuminated in Colours and Gold in Missal Style, by Alberto Sangorski, and the whole reproduced in Facsimile upon ivory surface paper. Uniform with the Illuminated Editions of 'Stevenson's Prayers' and 'The Sermon on the Mount.' In quarto size, jap-vellum gilt, 6s. net; parchment full gilt, with silk ties, 8s. 6d. net.

THE POEM BOOK OF THE GAEL

Selected and Edited by ELEANOR HULL. With Binding Design, Title-Page, and Initials reproduced from Irish MSS. Small crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

SHELLEY'S POETICAL WORKS

Edited by RICHARD HERNE SHEPHERD. A New Edition, in Two Volumes, each with Frontispiece. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net each.

MARCUS AURELIUS

A Dramatic Poem. By JOHN PRESLAND, Author of 'Mary Queen of Scots,' 'Manin and the Defence of Venice,' 'The Deluge,' etc. Fcap. 4to, cloth, gilt top, 5s. net.

THE POCKET GEORGE BORROW

Passages chosen by EDWARD THOMAS from the Works of BORROW. Cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

CLIGÉS. A Romance

Translated, with an Introduction, by L. J. GARDINER, M.A. Lond., from the Old French of CHRÉTIEN DE TROYES. Post 8vo, pure rag paper, brown boards, coloured top, 5s. net; pigskin, with clasps, coloured edges, 7s. 6d. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS

THE OUTCAST

By F. E. Penny

FAUSTULA

By John Ayscough

THREE WOMEN

By Netta Syrett

PANSY MEARES (2nd Impression)

By Horace W. C. Newte

CHEADLE AND SON

By A. Hamilton Gibbs

LARKMEADOW.

By Marmaduke Pickthall

A DAUGHTER OF THE MORNING

By Hugh de Sélincourt

ONE OF US: A Novel in Verse

By GILBERT FRANKAU. Third Edition. 3s. 6d. net.

BRIDGE CATECHISM

Questions and Answers, including the Portland Club Code.

By ROBERT HAMMOND, Author of 'Scientific Whist Cards,' etc. A New Edition. Post 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

From Black Beauty
(Jarrold).

THE HORSE FAIR.

"BLACK BEAUTY."

The Autobiography of a Horse. With 18 Plates in Colour by Cecil Aldin. 7s. 6d. net. (Jarrold & Sons)

"Black Beauty" is a classic, and one which should be in the home of every child—and of every man who has dealings with horses. Children of several generations have given it their approval, and have been the better for reading it; for this autobiography of a horse does not appeal to the emotions by mere sentimentality: it is full of good sense, and a first-hand knowledge of horses and horse-nature. But it is too late in the day to be reviewing "Black Beauty" as a story; our concern is with the handsome new edition of it just published. Here is the chance for generous grown-ups to fill the gap in the nursery bookcase. Beneath the protective outside paper-cover Black Beauty peers out to greet each new friend; while within the book Mr. Cecil Aldin's stirring illustrations show the horse-hero in his many ups and downs of life, and incidentally give some charming pictures of country life. It was a wise decision on the part of the publisher to produce so good a story in new form, with pictures of real merit to enhance its excellence. Mr. Aldin has, so to speak, created Black Beauty's portrait—glossy coat, fine head, one white foot, and a white star on the forehead. The tale, with its pathos and its hard facts, gains impressiveness from the pictures of the hero and his friends, and Mr. Aldin is at his happiest in following the fortunes of the horses of all classes which come into the book. His heart seems to have been in his work, and he has with his brush well supplemented the interest of this well-loved story, and helped to make of it an ideal gift-book.

THE STORY OF A HARE.

By J. C. TREGARTHEN, F.Z.S. With 8 Illustrations. 6s. net. (Murray.)

Mr. Tregarthen has already proved himself an expert in the presentation of vivid and accurate life stories of wild animals, and he is repeating former successes in his latest book—which, by the way, is dedicated to Miss Marie Corelli. The scene of the story is placed in the extreme West of Cornwall, and the time at which the events described are supposed to have taken place is about a hundred years ago, chiefly because "the more primitive days of a bygone Cornwall allowed the inclusion of a more numerous fauna, and permitted the use of a wilder setting."

From The Story of a Hare
(Murray).

"HE SAT AND LISTENED."

MESSRS. LONGMANS & Co.'s NEW LIST.

ROYAL GARDENS. By CYRIL WARD.

Member of the Royal Cambrian Academy of Art, Manchester Academy of Fine Arts and New Society of Water-Colour Painters.

Illustrated with 32 Full-page Colour Reproductions from Original Water-Colours and with 5 Pen Drawings by the Author.

This contains not only the artist's notes on the various gardens, but, in the case of six of the gardens, special articles written by the head gardeners. The gardens that are illustrated are as follows:—Norman Tower Garden, Windsor, Bagshot Park, Hampton Court; Osborne; Marlborough House; Kensington Palace; Holyrood; Claremont and Sandringham.

Large Paper Edition, limited to 250 copies in Royal 4to (13½ by 9½ in.). 42s net.

Ordinary Edition in Demy 4to (11½ by 8½ in.). 16s net.

CARDINAL MANNING & OTHER ESSAYS.

By J. E. C. BODLEY.

Corresponding Member of the Institute of France
With Frontispiece 8vo. 9s net.

These essays are founded on the lectures delivered by Mr. Bodley at the Royal Institution in 1911. The subjects are Cardinal Manning, The Decay of Idealism in France, and The French Institute. The essay on Cardinal Manning is illustrated by a reproduction of a portrait of the Cardinal painted for Mr. Bodley just before the Cardinal's death, and quite unknown.

MEN, WOMEN, AND MINXES. By MRS. ANDREW LANG.

With Prelatory Note by Mr. ANDREW LANG. 8vo. 7s 6d net.

CONTENTS: A Poussee of the Eighteenth Century—The Social Records of a Scotch Family—French and English Minxes—Pitfalls for Collectors—Trials of the Wife of a Literary Man—A Paris Correspondent of 1753—The Fairchild Family and their Creator—A Granddaughter of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu—Rousseau's Ideal Household—Morals and Manners in Richardson—Art in Country Inns and Lodging-Houses—The Home-Life of the Verneys, &c.

THE FIRST TWELVE CENTURIES OF BRITISH STORY: A slight sketch and criticism of the social and political conditions of the British Islands from 55 B.C. to the accession of Henry II., 1154 A.D.

With 23 maps. By J. W. JUDWINI, LL.B. (Camb) of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-law. 8vo. 12s 6d net.

A BREMEN FAMILY. By GEORGINA MEINERTZHAGEN.

With 13 Illustrations. 8vo. 7s 6d net.

A Short Memoir of the Meinertzhagen family who settled in England in 1826, including their pedigree in Cologne and Bremen, in which towns sixteen of the family were Senators in the 17th and 18th centuries.

ALPINE STUDIES. By W. A. COOLIDGE, M.A.

With 16 Views of the High Alps, reproduced after photographs by Signor VITTORIO Sella and the late Mr. W. J. DOKKIN. 8vo. 7s 6d net.

This book contains some 20 articles on the Alps, a large number of which deal with climbing matters, and describe many parts of the Alps from the Higher Maritimes to the Tyrolean Dolomites, especially the Dauphiné and Bernese Oberland ranges.

A NEW BOOK ON GOLF. Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

With contributions from Mrs. ROSS (i.e. Miss MAY HEZLET), A. C. M. CROOME, BERNARD DARWIN, J. SHERRLOCK, and C. K. HUTCHISON. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s net.

NEW CHILDREN'S BOOKS

MR. LANG'S BOOK FOR 1912.

THE BOOK OF SAINTS AND HEROES.

By Mrs. ANDREW LANG. Edited by ANDREW LANG. With 12 Coloured Plates and 18 other Illustrations by H. J. FORD. Small Demy 8vo, gilt top. 6s.

THE DISCONTENTED LITTLE ELEPHANT: A Story in Rhyme.

Written and Illustrated by E. C. SOMERVILLE. With 8 Coloured Pictures and 16 Uncoloured pages. Crown 4to (10½ by 7½ in.). 1s. 6d. net.

* AN ILLUSTRATED LIST OF BOOKS FOR CHRISTMAS WILL BE SENT ON APPLICATION.

SHAKESPEARE, BACON, & THE GREAT UNKNOWN.

By ANDREW LANG.

With Illustrations. 8vo. 9s net.

CONTENTS: Introduction—The Baconian and Anti-William Positions—The 'Silence' about Shakespeare—That Impossible He—The Schooling of Shakespeare—Mr. Churton Collins on Shakespeare's Learning—Shakespeare, Genius, and Society—The Courtly Plays—Love's Labour's Lost—Contemporary Recognition of Will as Author—The Silence of Philip Henslowe—The Later Life of Shakespeare, &c.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF FREDERIC SHIELDS, A.R.W.S., 1833-1911.

Edited by ERNESTINE MILLS.

With Photogravure Portrait and 41 other Illustrations. 8vo. 10s 6d net.

Frederic Shields was well known as a painter of religious subjects. The story of his early struggles and subsequent life is told by his diaries, family letters, and later by the letters of his friends. Among his correspondents were Charles Kingsley, Ruskin, D. G. Rossetti, Christina Rossetti, Ford Madox Brown, G. F. Watts, and Mrs. Russell Gurney, whose commission for the paintings in the Chapel of the Ascension, Bayswater, occupied the later years of the artist's life.

JOHN AND IRENE: An Anthology of Thoughts on Woman. By W. H. BEVERIDGE.

Crown 8vo. 4s 6d net.

A modern love story is told in the Introduction to this book which, however, is mainly a selection, on a novel plan, of sayings, from many times and countries, concerning women in all her aspects and activities; her life, love, education, character and work, her praise and her dispraise. The quotations are arranged by subjects, and are further arranged so as to illustrate the story.

ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR AS PHILOSOPHER AND THINKER.

A collection of the more important and interesting passages in his Non-political Writings, Speeches, and Addresses, 1879 to 1912. Selected and arranged by WILFRID M. SHORT. With Portrait. 8vo. 7s 6d net.

ENGLISH FARMING, PAST AND PRESENT.

By ROWLAND E. PROTHERO.

Agent-in-Chief to the Duke of Bedford.
8vo. 12s 6d net.

THE AGRARIAN PROBLEM IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

By R. H. TAWNEY.

With Reproductions of Plans of Manors (1590-1620).
8vo. 9s net.

EXPERIMENTS IN INDUSTRIAL ORGANISATION.

By EDWARD CADBURY.

With a Preface by W. J. ASHLEY, M.A. Professor of Commerce in the University of Birmingham. Crown 8vo. 5s net.

SCIENCE AND THE HUMAN MIND: A Critical and

Historical Account of the Development of Natural Knowledge. By WILLIAM CECIL DAMPIER WHETHAM, M.A., F.R.S., and CATHERINE DURNING WHETHAM, his wife.

Crown 8vo. 5s net.

A NEW STORY BY CANON SHEEHAN

MIRIAM LUCAS: a Story of Irish Life. By THE VERY REV. P. A. CANON SHEEHAN.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

FOR CHRISTMAS, 1912.

A LITTLE BOOK OF BIRD SONGS. Rhymes and Tunes by LOUISE MURPHY. With Illustrations. Oblong 4to. 3s net.

OLD RHYMES WITH NEW TUNES. Composed by RICHARD RUNCINIAN TERRY, Mus. Doc. With Illustrations by GABRIEL PIPPLT. 4to (8½ by 11½ in.). 2s 6d net.

A set of original tunes (with piano-forte accompaniment) to the old Nursery Rhymes, such as "Baby Bunting," "Little Jack Horner," "Humpty Dumpty," etc.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

The author is fully conscious of the dramatic effects which it is possible to derive from such a story as that which he has to set before us, yet he never allows his creatures to exceed their natural limitations. We have found "The Story of a Hare" a most enjoyable little volume.

THE SHEEP AND ITS COUSINS.

By R. LYDEKKER,
F.R.S. 10s 6d. net.
(George Allen.)

The sheep is one of the first animals to be domesticated and brought under the familiar rule of man. It was food and clothing and a standard of wealth at the same time. To-day sheep are among the great sources of wealth: they feed us and clothe us, and in some countries are useful as beast of burden as well. So much everybody knows, but not that so many varieties exist of the sheep that a weighty volume can be devoted to a very simple enumeration and brief description of them. Mr. Lydekker's book is of great value and a worthy companion to his other volumes, "The Horse and its Relatives" and "The Ox and its Kindred." Although the subject is treated chiefly from a natural history point of view, the book contains many interesting pieces of information that ought to interest the flock-master and the breeder, while the ordinary reader

From The Sheep and its Cousins
(Allen).

HEAD OF FOUR-HORNED PIEBALD RAM.
From a photograph lent by Col. H. Piatt.

who likes to know more than he did will find a good deal of curiosity gratified. He will learn something, for instance, about Astrakhan fur that may set his mind at rest. Mr. Lydekker devotes a chapter chiefly to the names of sheep in different languages. At the end of which he mentions the French brébis, seeming uncertain as to its origin. Is it not simply the Latin vervex?

EVOLUTION IN THE PAST.

By HENRY R. KNIPE,
F.L.S. With 50 Illustrations by Alice B. Woodward, 6 by Ernest Bucknall, and 4 Text-Drawings 12s 6d. net. (Herbert & Daniel.)

From Evolution in the Past
(Herbert & Daniel).

FLYING LIZARDS. REMAINS FOUND IN JURASSIC STRATA OF BAVARIA.
(Rhamphorynchus, P. cassirostris, P. spectabilis).

Mr. Knipe expresses the purpose of his book in the following words: "I have endeavoured to give in non-technical language, and in some detail, an account of ancient life as now known and understood. The wider and increasing interest in the subject is, no doubt, in part owing to many recent discoveries of important fossil remains. The whole subject, however, became invested with a new interest as soon as it came to be recognised that all modern life has been evolved, step by step, from the life of the past." With this object in view, the writer divides his book into chapters corresponding with the various geological periods of the earth, the Messrs. CONSTABLE'S Xmas Announcements.

JUST PUBLISHED.

KARAKORAM AND WESTERN HIMALAYA, 1909.

AN ACCOUNT OF THE EXPEDITION OF

H.R.H. PRINCE LUIGI AMEDEO OF SAVOY, THE DUKE OF THE ABRUZZI.

By DR. FILIPPO DE FILIPPI, F.R.G.S., Author of "Ruwenzori,"

With a Preface by H.R.H. THE DUKE OF THE ABRUZZI. Profusely Illustrated with Maps, Panoramas, and Photographs by VITTORIO SELLA. IN TWO VOLUMES. £3 3s. net. Also Edition de Luxe. Exquisitely bound in Vellum. £5 5s. net.

JUST PUBLISHED.

The Letters of a Post Impressionist, being the Familiar Correspondence of

VINCENT VAN GOGH

With an Introduction by A. M. LUDOVICI. With Illustrations reproduced from Van Gogh's Works. Svo. 7s. 6d. net. This book will be welcomed as the only first-hand account of the post impressionists which has yet appeared. Van Gogh's own life was one long struggle with poverty, ill-health, and failure, yet the spirit of a true, brave, and single-hearted man, inspired with a fervent devotion to art, breathes through these pages. The book is full of human interest, and the portrait of Van Gogh and the numerous illustrations add to its attractiveness.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE CREED OF MY HEART and other Poems By E. G. A. HOLMES

Author of "What Is and What Might Be," etc. 3s. 6d. net.

THREE BEAUTIFUL COLOUR BOOKS.

THE ARABIAN NIGHTS

10s. 6d. net.

A sumptuous edition of these famous stories, beautifully illustrated with 20 colour plates and 20 full-page illustrations and numerous line illustrations in the text by

RENE BULL.

BILL THE MINDER

10s. 6d. net.

A delightful book, written and illustrated with 16 coloured plates and 15 full-page line illustrations and 100 line drawings by

W. HEATH ROBINSON.

CHILDREN OF THE NEW FOREST

5s. By CAPTAIN MARRYAT

E. BOYD SMITH.

A New Edition Beautifully Illustrated in colour by "The most beautiful books of the Year"—THE WORLD

THE LETTERS OF GEORGE MEREDITH

COLLECTED AND EDITED BY HIS SON

Two vols., 21s. net. (2nd Impression).

SELECTED PASSAGES FROM THE WORKS OF BERNARD SHAW

5s. net.

MRS. G. B. SHAW

WHEN I WAS A CHILD

Written and Illustrated by YOSHIO MARKINO

(2nd Impression.) 6s. net.

THE FOURTH GENERATION

(4th Impression.) 12s. 6d. net.

By JANET ROSS

THE GUADALQUIVIR

Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

By PAUL GWYNNE

A MODERN PILGRIM IN MECCA

Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

By A. J. B. WAVELL

THE GATEWAY OF SCOTLAND

Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

A. G. BRADLEY

ITALIAN TRAVEL SKETCHES

Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

Prof. JAMES SULLY, LL.D.

THE COMPLETE POEMS OF GEORGE MEREDITH

7s. 6d. net Cloth, and 10s. 6d. net Leather.

THE POEMS OF ADAM LINDSAY GORDON

Edited by DOUGLAS SLADEN

2s. 6d. net Cloth, and 3s. 6d. net Leather. A large 2nd Impression ready.

XMAS FICTION.

PRISCILLA

MRS. GEORGE WEMYSS

Author of "The Professional Aunt," etc.
(2nd Impression.)

THE HERO OF HERAT

MAUD DIVER

Author of "Capt. Desmond, V.C.," etc.

(2nd Impression.)

"Will be welcome to thousands of readers."—The Graphic

EVE

MAARTEN MAARTENS

(4th Impression.) Author of "The Healers," "Dorothea," etc.
"This is a fine story."—Punch.

A SLICE OF LIFE

ROBERT HALIFAX

Author of "A Whistling Woman," etc.

"A figure in present-day literature who must not be overlooked."—The British Weekly.

THE IMPOSSIBLE SHE

R. RAMSAY

Just Published. Author of "The Key of the Door," etc. A Sporting Novel.

"A fine story. One we can recommend."—The Throne.

TOMMY TREGENNIS

4s. 6d. net.

MARY E. PHILLIPS

"We do not expect to read a truer or prettier book."—The Athenaeum.

RED REUBEN

HERBERT W. TOMPKINS

Author of "The Complete Idler," etc.

A romantic story of the Essex Marshes.

ROSE OF THE GARDEN

KATHARINE TYNAN

(2nd Impression.) Author of "The Sweet Enemy," etc.

THE BLUE WALL

R. W. CHILD

"We can warmly commend this book."—The Westminster Gazette.

MY LOVE AND I

MARTIN REDFIELD

"A work of distinction and value."—The Westminster Gazette.

Write for Constable's Illustrated List of Beautiful Gift Books, free on application.

CONSTABLE & Co., Ltd.

LONDON, W.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

whole forming a complete study of all manifestations of life on this planet. The general reader should pay particular attention to the word "non-technical" in Mr. Knipe's announcement of his purpose. Throughout the whole of the book the author never becomes confusing by an improper use of scientific language, and it forms one of the most brilliant works of popular science which we remember ever to have encountered. Special attention should be given to the magnificent series of illustrations, principally by Miss Alice B. Woodward, in which the creatures of the past are restored so far as possible in their natural surroundings.

HARDY PERENNIALS AND HERBACEOUS BORDERS.

By WALTER P. WRIGHT. With 27 Illustrations in Colour, 53 in Black and White, and 9 Diagrams 12s. 6d. net. (Headley)

Mr. Walter P. Wright and his publishers, Messrs. Headley, deserve particularly well of the garden-lover for this fine volume on a branch of gardening in which knowledge is useful and is sure to be put to good account. Mr. Wright is, of course, a voluminous writer on horticultural topics, but he has seldom done work which will be more generally welcomed than that in "Hardy Perennials and Herbaceous Borders." So practical and easily comprehensible a writer deserves the gratitude of the gardening public. The publishers have performed their part with equal skill. Not only is the volume exceptionally handsome in its general production, but it is very liberally illustrated with a beautiful and useful variety of pictures. In fact, "Hardy Perennials and Herbaceous Borders" is a fine book and one which should rival in popularity "Alpine Flowers and Rock Gardens," the sister volume published last year.

From Hardy Perennials and Herbaceous Borders
(Headley).

"WHERE THE HOURS STEAL BY AMID THE WHITE LILIES."
Bower and sun-dial in a Hampshire villa garden.
Photo. by F. Mason Good.

From The New Gardening
(Grant Richards).

MECONOPSIS INTEGRIFOLIA.

THE NEW GARDENING.

By WALTER P. WRIGHT. 6s. (Grant Richards.)

In a brief preface to "The New Gardening" Mr. Walter P. Wright truthfully says that the book is a guide as well as a record, and adds that "an endeavour has been made to impart a literary flavour to the chapters without impeding the practical movement." Mr. Wright's "endeavour" has been entirely successful, and he has given us a most useful and at the same time a most readable and interesting volume. He does not conceal his dislike of the so-called natural gardens, which at present seem to enjoy such popularity. "Formalism is not dead," he says. "At a period when the triumph of 'natural' gardening is loudly proclaimed, we see the Japanese garden, the clipped tree, the rectangular rose garden with the angular Yew hedges high on the wave of favour. Humanity is a being of form." He maintains that the new art of gardening must begin with a thorough knowledge of plants, and that plants which the gardener has been unable to study should be left out of his garden. There are some capital illustrations; forty-eight of them reproductions from photographs and six very fine colour plates. Everyone who loves a garden and would know how to cultivate it to the best advantage should secure a copy of this book, read it, and keep it on his bookshelf for reference. It would be difficult to find a book of the sort more pleasantly instructive.

THE NET.

By REX BEACH. 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

In the last few years Mr. Rex Beach has taken his place among the most popular of novelists in America, and nowadays he is rapidly becoming equally popular in this country. His tales of life in the mining camps and in the

From Blue-Bird Weather
(Appleton).

"'WELL,' HE SAID PLEASANTLY
WHAT COMES NEXT, MISS HEROLD?"

wild outlands of America are full of vigour and movement and colour, and have the vivid realism that comes of having seen and known and lived in the thick of such stirring phases of existence as are described in them. "The Net" breaks new ground and relates a brilliantly woven story of mystery and excitement, in which the sinister secret society of the Mafia plays an important part. There are two heroines, one an American girl, the other a Sicilian, and a strong love interest makes a delightful thread of romance through one of the most ingenious and thrilling of sensational tales. The characters are drawn with unusual skill and life-likeness, and it is safe to say that everyone who cares for a brisk, cleverly-imagined story, crowded with incident and surprises, will find "The Net" a fascinating and thoroughly enjoyable book.

SIMON BRANDIN.

By PAUL NEUMAN. 6s (John Murray)

In "Simon Brandin," Mr. Paul Neuman takes as his motif the Russian Terrorists' attacks on high officials, and that chapter in their campaign when they discovered that their leader was in reality an "agent provocateur." The name Alexeieff bears a fairly close resemblance to that of a notorious individual who actually played this double part, and whose name was at one time on everybody's lips in connection with the spiriting away of his enemy's daughter outside Aldwych Theatre. To add further verisimilitude to his story, Mr. Neuman locates his conspirators in Mecklenburgh Square, Gower Street, etc., and it is possible even to identify the florist's shop from which the Nihilist set out to "remove" Alexeieff. With no little skill the shallow selfish life of a young English aristocrat who wins the heart and hand of a comedy actress and presumably "lives happily ever after" is contrasted with the unselfish lives of these Terrorists, who speedily arrive at the condemned cells of the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul. Yet happiness of a sort is theirs too, and gleams of a greater happiness to come. Not that Mr. Neuman altogether approves of their methods, in fact his closing pages are devoted to the enunciation of the principle that terrorism is less admirable, as it certainly is less effective, than patience. Even the persecutor is seen to have his merits. Even the black raven has "one little tiny spot of white." Thus it is that Simon Brandin, who had devoted all his life and wealth to the task of avenging his slaughtered parents, and his downtrodden race, comes to see that there is a more excellent way. Romantic feelings play no inconsiderable part in this evolution and in this contest between selfless patriotism and high and spiritual but selfish affection the great analytical power of Mr. Neuman finds full scope for its exercise.

From The Adventures of a Modest Man
(Appleton).

"ONLY ONE PERSON IN THE WORLD CAN EVER MATTER TO ME—NOW."

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Streets of Ascalon
(Appleton).

"Is it to be Sir Charles after all, daring?" she asked caressingly.

THE STORY OF FRANCIS HORATIO AND HIS THREE COMPANIONS

By HILLLL SAMSON Illustrated 4s 6d net (J M Dent)

Mr Samson enters the literary lists a champion of the Ideal and of Romance as against Dry-as-Dust and the Material. One who has spent, as it would seem, days and nights with the philosophers of the Fatherland, who knows his Carlyle also, he is not above essaying experiments with his mother tongue. Thus he gives us the verb "to romance," in the initial line of his "Preliminary." It prepares the reader for thoughts that may be "precious" in a double sense. There are visions about "Francis was given to visions," and some of them are very beautiful. "His companions" are Sailor, Knight, and Saint. And as we follow his story we dwell among untrodden ways and catch glimpses of the light that never was on sea or land, "the consecration and the poet's dream." The book is one in which imaginative youth will delight, and in which the more mature in years may gather many "little flowers" of vital thought. Here is a posy "Let us thank God that Youth knows not, let us pray that Age may delay her steps even to the threshold of Death so that, young in heart, we may bear with us to the end our wishes and our hopes." And Age, in his study, may have worse companions than Don Quixote, Nelson, and Saint Francis.

A STAR OF THE EAST

By CHARLES E PEARCE 6s. (Stanley Paul & Co)

"A Star of the East" is a romantic novel which commences in the year 1857 and ends at the time of the Delhi massacre, five years afterwards. It is full of thrilling adventures and bristles all through with excitement. Its heroine, Nara, is a little Eurasian dancing girl who is saved from her profession by her dead father's friend and sent to school in England. But after five years she returns to India, and the strong passionate love she has for the man who rescued her and his love for her strengthens them to defy all obstacles and, befriended by Fate, to trample under foot at last the frustrated plans of their enemies. Mr C E Pearce has a virile, vigorous style, he has written other gallant stories of the days of the Mutiny, but none that has been more ingeniously contrived or more ably written than this.

CHRISTINE :

A Guernsey Girl. By L GALLIENNE ROBIN
6s (Hurst & Blackett)

This novel will be especially interesting to those who are intimate with Guernsey Island, and familiar with the places that form a background to Christine's joys and sorrows. But all who read it, even if they have never stepped on Guernsey soil, will thoroughly enjoy the story. Miss Gallienne Robin's skilful pen has provided for them. She is wise in her forenote to state that the characters are all fictitious, for they are as natural and true to life as if they were drawn from it. Lisabeau Perchard is a particularly clever study, with her shrewd, hard nature and her avarice for wealth, she makes a vivid contrast to the gentle, timid Christine, who enters the book under a cloud of misfortune, and lives through trials and trouble to meet at last with a very real happiness.

From The Story of Francis Horatio and His Three Companions
(Dent).

FRANCIS HORATIO.
From a sketch by his friend the priest.

HARRAP'S BOOKS BEAUTIFUL

Mr. Pogány's New Colour Book for 1912

Cover of Ordinary Edition

PARSIFAL

Or, THE LEGEND OF THE HOLY GRAIL

Retold from Ancient Sources, with acknowledgment to the "Parsifal" of Richard Wagner

By T. W. ROLLESTON

With 192 Pages reproduced by Lithography in Two Colours, and Sixteen Plates reproduced by the four-colour process

By WILLY POGÁNY

Ordinary Edition.—Size 11 × 7½ in. Bound in Cloth Extra, Price 15s. net, Boxed. Bound in Full Velvet Persian, yapp. Price 21s. net, Boxed

Limited Edition.—Printed on Hand-made Paper. Limited to 525 copies for England and America, signed and numbered by the Artist

Each copy includes an Original Etching, specially drawn and executed for the Limited Edition. Bound in Vellum. Price £2 2s. net, Boxed

This new book is a companion but not a repetition of "Tannhäuser." The general scheme of decoration is similar, but the theme has been treated with the originality now expected from Mr. Pogány

Every page, including the lettering, is the work of the Artist. There are many auto-lithographs, which are all but original drawings, and numerous line drawings. The Sixteen Plates in full colours are reproduced on a somewhat larger scale than in "Tannhäuser," and their delicacy of colouring will be greatly appreciated. It is music in colour and tone and hue, and the book cannot fail to appeal strongly to lovers of Wagner's music. The paper selected is pearly grey in colour; considerably lighter in tone, that is, than the paper used for "Tannhäuser."

A prospectus—printed on the special paper to be employed, and containing examples of the Illustrations—will be sent upon application.

THE 1912 VOLUME OF THE FAMOUS
"MYTHS" SERIES

Myths and Legends of Japan

By F. HADLAND DAVIS Author of "The Land of the Yellow Springs," &c.

With 32 Original Plates in Colour by EVERETT PAUL, and with a complete Glossary and Index. Demy 8vo, 8½ × 5½ in.
432 pages of Letterpress.

Bound in Handsome Cloth
Cover, richly decorated. Gilt-top, price 7s. 6d. net; or Velvet Persian, yapp. 10s. 6d.
net, also in choice bindings,

Boxed, Full Morocco, 21s. net; Half Morocco, 15s. net;

This volume forms the completest collection of Japanese myths and legends that has yet appeared within the covers of one book. The style of the book is delightful, and the Author has made the subject the chief study of his life. Miss Patti's illustrations are beautiful and striking and will add to the reputation she gained by her illustrations to "Indian Gods and Heroes."

The Romance Series, 5s. n. t.
NEW VOLUMES 1912

10. Shakespeare's Stories of the English Kings

Retold by THOMAS CARTER
Doctor of Theology.

With Sixteen Exquisite Illustrations in Full Colours by GERTRUDE DEMAIN HAMMOND,
R.I.

11. The Boys' Froissart

Selected from Lord Berners' Translation of the "Chronicles"

By MADALEN EDGAR, M.A.

With Sixteen Illustrations by M. MEREDITH WILLIAMS

A BOOK FOR EVERY NURSERY

Stories to Tell to Children

By SARAH CONE BRYANT

With Sixteen Illustrations in Colour by PATTEN WILSON.

Size 8½ × 5½ in. 240 pages Letterpress, Price 5s. net.

All the best childhood stories collected by a famous raconteur.

The Fairies and the Christmas Child

By LILIAN GASK

Profusely Illustrated in Colours and Black and White, and with charming End Papers, by

WILLY POGÁNY

Size 8½ × 6½ in.

Bound in Cloth Extra, with appropriate Design by the Artist, Gilt-top, Price 5s. net

The motif of this book is the old country legend that a child born on Christmas Day is able to see Fairies. The hero is a Christmas child, who very early comes to his inheritance and meets Titania and many lesser Enlish fays and sprites.]

SUMPTUOUSLY ILLUSTRATED

The Song of Hiawatha

By HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW

With an Introduction by
Dr. FRANK
W. GUNSAULUS.

With Sixty-Four Full-page reproductions from Photographs, of which Seven are in Colours, and Frontispiece in Photo-gravure. By GRACE
CHANDLER HORN.

Size 10 × 7½ in., 264 pages.

Bound in Cloth Extra,
Gilt-top, with Indian Design.

Price 10s. 6d. net,
Boxed.

Bound in Full Persian, yapp, Price 15s. net,
Boxed.

This is certainly the most sumptuous edition of "Hiawatha." The illustrations present the Legend as it is played by the native Ojibway Indians. The scenery is the forest itself, a real native village, a great lake. The actors are descendants of the tribe of whom Hiawatha was one, and to them every point of the drama has real significance. Miss HORN's exquisite pictures give the sensation of the real thing.

Cover of 10s. 6d. Edition.

New Illustrated Catalogue of Books Beautiful post free upon application to—

LONDON:

GEORGE G. HARRAP & CO 3 Portsmouth Street Kingsway W.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From John Graham, Sub-Lieutenant, R.N.
(Blackie).

"AND 'STOOD BY' WITH THE SMALL GUNS TO FIRE DIRECTLY EITHER OF THEM WAS SHOWN UP IN THE SEARCHLIGHT BEAMS."

to set to work to straighten things out. "Soon as I get back," he says, "I'll take the matter up." Sift it clean to the bottom. We'll give Morley every chance to square himself. But 'til then, you won't see him if you can help it, or read his letters, if he writes? You don't mind promising me that much, do you?" "I promise, daddy," says Miss Lady, and thus tangles up her life. For her father never returns home again, he is killed in a railway accident, and her blind loyalty to this promise eventually leads her into a marriage (one of re-

THE LADY MARRIED.

By the Author of "The Lady of the Decoration" 6s.
(Hodder & Stoughton)

There is so much that could be said, yet so little that need be said in recommendation of this book. The fact that it is a sequel to "The Lady of the Decoration" must surely speak for itself, and those who have read that delightful novel will be glad to meet again with the lady whose whimsical humour and charming, vivacious letters have already afforded them so much wholesome pleasure. After nine years of contented married life the lady's husband goes to China to make some dangerous scientific investigations, and his wife, unable to stay in Kentucky without him, travels out and across to Japan to be as close to him as possible. These letters of hers written to a friend in Italy tell of her hopes and fears, her adventures and experiences, of the prominent part she plays in an unusual romance, of the Eastern customs which delight and annoy her, and of the pain and pleasure that visit her in the blossomy picturesque land of the Mikado. The unknown author writes with the daintiest possible touch, and has unfolded here a story as tender, as humorous, and as elusively pathetic as "The Lady of the Decoration" itself was.

A ROMANCE OF BILLY GOAT HILL.

By ALICE HEGAN RICE 6s. (Hodder & Stoughton)

The heroine of Mrs. Hegan Rice's new Kentucky story is unique among heroines in that she has no Christian name. Her mother dies when she is born and her father decides to leave his daughter to choose a name for herself when she is grown up. Meanwhile, partly through the negro servants, she comes to be called "Miss Lady"; and Miss Lady she remains to the end of the story, flatly declining, when she does grow up, to change her nickname for a real one. The story is told in Mrs. Hegan Rice's own irresistibly attractive manner, and the character drawing throughout is vivid and strong. Miss Lady's romance is arrested at the outset by one of those promises "made for a day, and kept through the years." Don Morley, with whom she is in love, gets mixed up in some shooting affair at a public-house, and subsequently disappears. Between Miss Lady and her father there exists a deep affection, and the father is greatly troubled about the shadow over Morley and his daughter's happiness; he is obliged to go from home for a few days, but determines as soon as he returns spect rather than love) with an elderly professor-author—a widower with three children. The subsequent development of the plot shows how things are gradually smoothed out, and the ingenious situations devised by the author give plenty of scope for the introduction of characters such as Mrs. Wiggs herself would love to meet. One of the quaintest of these is Chick, a little dumb boy, who has been an unsuspected witness of the shooting affray, and who proves of great importance when Don Morley returns

From The Romance of Submarine Engineering
(Seeley).

ESCAPING FROM A SUNKEN SUBMARINE.

GAY & HANCOCK'S GIFT BOOKS

A Beautiful Gift Book.

Poems of Passion and Pleasure

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

With 20 Illustrations in Colour
by DUDLEY TENNANT.

Size 11½ x 9 inches. Cloth, richly gilt extra.
15/- net.

Also EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 500 copies, printed on hand-made paper, bound in Vellum, and signed by the Author and Artist, £2 2s. net.

Cover Design of Wilcox 15/- edition.

POEMS by ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

Only complete and authorised editions.

Poems of Passion
Poems of Pleasure
Poems of Power
Poems of Cheer
Poems of Progress
Yesterdays

Poems of Sentiment
Maurine
Three Women
Kingdom of Love
Poems of Experience
The Englishman

1/- net each, in Limp White Cloth.
2/6 net each, in Limp Lambskin.
3/6 net each, in Velvet Calf.

Double Volumes in various styles of binding.

GEMS from WILCOX.

Four separate selections carefully prepared under the headings—

FAITH HOPE LOVE CHEER

Six 4 in. x 2 in., Jap. Vellum, 6d. net each;
Velvet Calf, with Picture End-papers, 1/- net each, also in padded polished Levant, gilt edges, 2/6 net each.

New Volume.
First Edition: 10,000 Copies.

"THE ENGLISHMAN" AND OTHER POEMS.

By Ella Wheeler Wilcox

Two New Editions of this Popular Book by

KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN.

THE BIRDS' CHRISTMAS CAROL

Special Holiday Edition. Full of Illustrations in Colour. Size 8½ x 6½ inches. With a decorative Cloth binding 3/6 net.

THE BIRDS' CHRISTMAS CAROL

With 4 full-page Coloured Illustrations. Size, 6½ x 5 ins. Cloth Gilt, with Coloured Wrapper
1/6 net

.. This is the Volume that contains the Ruggles Family Party.

THE GREEN DOOR

By MARY E. WILKINS.

With four Coloured Pictures by Francis E. Hiley.
Size 6½ x 5 inches. Cloth gilt, 1/6 net
A Pretty Story about an inquisitive little girl

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

POETRY.

Poems of Love. A Selection. Illustrated. 2/6 net

The Love Sonnets of Abelard and Heloise.

Illustrated, 4/6 net.

The New Hawarian Girl. (A Play.) Illustrated.

2/- net

Autograph and Birthday Book. Size 6 in. x 6 in.

Illustrated Velvet Calf, 10/6 net.

Great Thoughts for Each Day's Life. (Autograph Book.) 2/6 net.

Poems—100 Selected. Cloth, 1/- net, Velvet Persian

1/6 net

PROSE.

A Woman's Letters. (Just Published) 4/6 net.

New Thought Common Sense. 4/6 net

Are You Alive? 4/6 net.

Diary of a Faithless Husband. 1/- net

Six Bad Husbands and Six Unhappy Wives. 1/- net.

E. W. Wilcox (new portrait).

Reduced Illustration from "Epigrams of Eve."

FOR THE "SMART SET"

EPIGRAMS OF EVE

By SOPHIE IRENE LOUI.

With Coloured Frontispiece and other Illustrations by Ruby Lund.

Size 8½ x 5½ in. Cloth Gilt.
Gilt Top, 3/6 net

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK.

A FLOWER ANTHOLOGY

Selected and Illustrated by ALFRED RAWLINGS.

Size 7 x 5½ inches, with 12
Three-Colour Illustrations.
Limp Cloth, 2/6 net, Velvet
Persian, 5/- net

A CHARMING NOVEL.

THE MODERN EVANGELINE

By CATHERINE WILSON.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6/- Morning Post—"The heroine is a girl whom every one must love."

Standard—"His sketches of quaint architecture, imposing churches and bell-towers, hotels de ville, gates and street incidents are admirable."

SOME OLD FLEMISH TOWNS

Written and Illustrated by GEORGE WHARTON EDWARDS.

Size, 10 x 6½ ins. Pp. 175, with 5 Coloured and 30 Half-tone Full-page Plates, Cloth gilt, gilt top, boxed 18/- net

A unique journey of five months on the Mississippi.

THE LOG OF THE "EASY WAY"

By JOHN L. MATTHEWS.

Demy 8vo. Pp. 280, with 24 Full-page Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. Cloth gilt, 6/- net.
Mr. Matthews and his bride built a small "House-boat," and going on board the day of their marriage, at Chicago, drifted down the Mississippi to New Orleans, living a life of idyllic charm and excitement for five months

GRATIS on receipt of address to Dept. E.

A Coloured Picture worth Framing, by Dudley Tennant, illustrating "The Land of Nod," size 7½ in. x 5 in., together with 10 Popular Poems by Mrs. Wilcox.

LONDON: GAY & HANCOCK, LTD., 12 & 13, HENRIETTA ST., COVENT GARDEN.

EDINBURGH: 34, NORTH BRIDGE.

'THE BOOKMAN. CHRISTMAS 1912

From Heroes of Science
(Seeley).

LORD KELVIN IN PRIVATE LIFE.

In the above photograph, taken by his niece, Miss Mary Hancock Thomson, Lord Kelvin is seen reading a sounding taken from his yacht. His brother, James, is looking on.

THE WRATH OF MAN.

By SILAS K. HOCKING.
With 5 Illustrations by
P. B. Hickling. 3s. 6d.
(Warne.)

Sam Mexton is a "crook." His little girl has been slightly injured in a street accident and has been detained at the hospital for a night. On the next day Sam presents himself with the intention of taking her away. To his surprise he is offered another little girl. He notes that she is well-dressed and decides that she is worth kidnapping. His mind is made up in an instant. He greets her as his daughter and takes her away, intending to hold her for ransom. He then finds that she is the daughter of his to take his trial. "He's a ash-barrel baby," says one of Chick's friends, describing him, "he ain't got no real folks, and he's been to the Juvenile Court twice; once for hopping freights and once fer me and him smashin' winders." "A Romance of Billy Goat Hill" is Mrs. Hegan Rice at her best. The book is a worthy successor to "Mrs. Wiggs," and should take the reading public by storm.

great enemy—a wealthy Lancashire manufacturer. Revenge is now his animating motive. He brings up the girl "anyhow," in the hope that she will become a criminal. However, he has reckoned without her . . . but we must certainly not tell any more of Mr. Hocking's excellent plot.

HEROES OF SCIENCE.

By CHARLES R. GIBSON. 5s net. (Seeley, Service & Co.)

Of books on Science there are enough and to spare. But the author may rightfully claim for the present volume that it is unique in that it provides between two covers a complete, if necessarily rather hasty, survey of the main outlines of scientific history from the time when Pythagoras made the humiliating discovery that the earth was not the centre of the universe round which all the other heavenly bodies danced attendance, and the much abhorred Euclid found that any two sides of a triangle were together greater than the third, down to the present day of X-rays and wireless telegraphy. Written in a popular style, and freely illustrated with excellent photographs, the book is specially designed and admirably adapted for boys; but it should appeal also to the adult reader, while even the serious student will find much to interest him in the manner in which the author shows how the latest miracles of science were anticipated in many cases by the very earliest discoveries. Mr. Gibson concludes with a very deserving appeal for an increased public sympathy with the cause of science. And it is to be hoped that it will not sound in vain in the ears of his youthful readers. "When we consider," he says, "the enormous advance that has been made in scientific knowledge, and when we think of the wide field still to be explored, surely we shall not grudge any grants that the State may give towards scientific investigation. It is a matter of national importance to us. We wish to be in the forefront, not only in the number of Dreadnoughts we possess." This is a very healthy message for the rising generation.

From All about Ships
(Cassell).

ON THE STOCKS. THE STERN OF
THE "MAURETANIA."
By permission of the Cunard Steamship Co.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

"HERE, QUICK, I HEAR FOOT STEPS ON THE STAIRS!"
From the drawing by John Cassel
From Who? (Putnam's)

SHENANDOAH: LOVE AND WAR IN THE VALLEY OF VIRGINIA, 1861-5.

Based upon the Famous Play by Bronson Howard by HENRY TYRRELL With 15
Illustrations mostly by Harry A Ogden 6s
(Putnam's)

The mighty drama of the American Civil War has supplied innumerable novels with their subject-matter and Shenandoah is a good example of its type. For its plot it depends apparently upon a play by Bionson Howard—of which we confess we had never before heard—but that it has been considerably expanded, and is thus not a merely mechanical novelisation, is clear from the fact that the book is nearly 400 pages in length.

The main complication arises from the fact that two pairs of brothers and sisters take opposite sides in the war and yet remain mutually in love with one another—Brother A the Northerner with Sister B the Southerner and in like manner
Brother B yearns for Sister A.
Having been told this much you will know that the story is romantic and exciting. Shenandoah is a well-told story, and,
although Mr Tyrrell's style is inclined to be a little bald, it is nevertheless a book worth reading.

From Heaven and the Sea
(Jas Clarke)

ST. AUGUSTINE PREACHING TO THE SAXONS

A CRY IN THE WILDERNESS

By MARY J WALLER 6s (Methuen)

Drummond the poet of French Canada has sung with simple pathos of his loved country, its lumbermen, its

From Wives and Daughters CYNTHIA'S CONFESSION.
(Herbert & Daniel).

voyageurs, its habitant-farmers, and now Miss Waller, a frank admirer of his work, has seized this delightful setting for her new novel, and used it with fine effect. It is a far cry from the fog and noise and mercenary squalor of New York to the pure air and charming tranquillity of an old manor in the Seigniory of Lamoral in Quebec, but a prosaic 'want' advertisement enables Miss Waller to transport her heroine from a sickening life battle in the monster metropolis—Jugernaut, she calls it—into the bosom of a household of lovable people, where the mystery attending her parentage is slowly unravelled with dramatic results.
In "A Cry in the Wilderness" the reader will discover a fresh the cheery spirit of good fellowship which coloured so warmly the earlier novels of this talented writer.

THE FIRST BATTLE OF BULL RUN—"THE REPULSE BECAME A ROUT"

Drawn by Harry A Ogden
From Shenandoah
(Putnam's)

SOME CALEN- DARS FOR 1913

A large and attractive selection of the Marcus
Ward Calendars
'has reached us from their printers and publishers
Messrs
M Caw,
Stevenson
and Or,

Ltd of London and Belfast. They are of the popular
'tear-off-each-day'
variety, and all—except the office
calendar entitled
'To day'—have daily quotations from famous poets or novelists. They are well produced with pictures in colour by well-known artists, and are decidedly cheap at 6d and 1s, the prices asked for them. Another attractive series,
with a strongly religious tone, is published by Messrs.
Morgan & Scott, who supply a very large variety.

"THEN I BEGIN MY NEW LIFE."
Drawn by A Joanna Fry Frontispiece (reduced) to The Mission of Victoria Wilhelmina
(Putnam's).

PITMAN'S CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOKS.

FLEET STREET IN SEVEN CENTURIES. Being a History of the Growth of London beyond the Walls into the Western Liberty and of Fleet Street to Our Time. By WALTER GEORGE BELL. With a Foreword by SIR WILLIAM P. TRELOAR, Bart. Forty six illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 620 pp. 15s. net.

WANDERINGS ON THE ITALIAN RIVIERA. The Record of a Leisurely Tour in Liguria. By FREDERIC LEES. With Frontispiece in colour, 60 photographic illustrations, and map. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt. 7s. 6d. net.

FAMOUS SPEECHES. (Second Series.) From Lord Macaulay to Lord Rosebery. Selected and Edited, with Introductory Notes, by HERBERT PAUL, Author of The Life of Frodo, etc. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 320 pp. 7s. 6d. net.

THE ROMANTIC STORY OF THE MAYFLOWER PILGRIMS. And its Place in the Life of To-day. By A. C. ADDISON. With 50 full-page plates. Size, 6½ in. x 9½ in., 206 pp., beautifully bound. 7s. 6d. net.

THE INNER LIFE OF GEORGE ELIOT. A Study of the Mental and Spiritual Development of the Novelist. By CHARLES GARDNER, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt. 5s. net.

COUNTRIES AND PEOPLES SERIES.

Each Vol. in cloth gilt, gilt top, with about 30 plate illustrations. 6s. net.

FRANCE OF THE FRENCH. By E. HARRISON BARKER.
GERMANY OF THE GERMANS. By ROBERT M. BERRY.
ITALY OF THE ITALIANS. By HELEN ZIMMERN.
TURKEY OF THE OTTOMANS. By LUCY M. J. GARRETT.
SPAIN OF THE SPANISH. By J. VILLIERS WARDELL.

BELGIUM OF THE BELGIANS. By D. C. BOULGER.
SERBIA OF THE SERBIANS. By CHEDO MIJATOVICH.
SWITZERLAND OF THE SWISS. By F. WEBB.
JAPAN OF THE JAPANESE. By Professor J. H. LONGFORD.

THE UNDER TRAIL. By ANNA ALICE CHAPIN. Illustrated. A thrilling new Novel of the Virginia Mountains, full of colour, vitality and life, and commanding in scope and originality. 6s.

THE PLEASURING OF SUSAN SMITH. By HELEN M. WINSLOW. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.
Original in plot—bright and merry in spirit—full of kindly humour in style and incident—amusing experiences and ludicrous situations. Susan—bright, breezy and philosophical.

London: SIR ISAAC PITMAN AND SONS, Ltd., 1 Amen Corner, E.C.

D. APPLETON & CO.

THE STREETS OF ASCALON.

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS. Fully illustrated by CHARLES DANA GIBSON. 6s.

A full-length Society story of a woman's sacrifice for the man she loved. The Academy says: "Here are real people, real passions, and consequently real romance."

BLUE-BIRD WEATHER.

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS. Fully illustrated by CHARLES DANA GIBSON. 3s. 6d. net.

A beautiful little gift book, one of those delightful romances of outdoor life with a charming love story which the author writes so well.

THE PRICE SHE PAID. The Story of a Woman's Struggle.

By DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS. 6s.

The powerful and dramatic life story of an operatic singer and the way success came to her.

THE SINS OF THE FATHER.

By THOMAS DIXON. Author of "The Clansman." With 16 full-page illustrations. 6s.

A romance of the South, with a sex problem of a complex character, treated with power and restraint.

25, Bedford Street, Covent Garden, London.

JAMES CLARKE & Co.

A Selection of Books for Xmas Presents.

A Beautiful Book dealing with London's most Famous and Charming Suburb.

HAMPSTEAD: Its Historic Houses; its Literary and Artistic Associations.

By ANNA MAXWELL. Four Coloured Plates and Thirty-two Full-page Reproductions of Old Prints and Original Drawings. Large Foolscap 4to, handsomely bound in Art Vellum, gilt top. 7s. 6d. net.

"Miss Maxwell has taken much pains in collecting her material, which she puts together agreeably and judiciously, while her illustrations are numerous and varied, and of much interest. The type and its arrangement upon the pages deserve favourable mention. The half-tone illustrations, too, are well printed."—The Times.

THE LIFE OF THE SOUL. VOICES OF TO-DAY:

By J. BRIERLEY, B.A. Author of "The Secret of Living," "Ourselves and the Universe," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top. 3s. 6d. net.

"Vigorous in thought, rich in literary allusions, and incisive in style. . . Mr Brierley is always convincing as well as ingenious."—Methodist Recorder.

ILLUSTRATIONS FROM ART FOR PULPIT AND PLATFORM.

By REV. JAMES BURNS, M.A. Author of "Sermons in Art." Large Crown 8vo. Cloth boards, gilt top. 3s. 6d. net.

"Should be invaluable to those for whom it is particularly issued."—Sheffield Telegraph.

HEAVEN AND THE SEA.

By FRANK ELIAS. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top. Sixteen illustrations from pictures by favourite Artists. 8s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Elias, who writes with ease and effect, has a good subject for a popular volume, and works it well."—The Times.

Studies of Representative Modern Preachers.

By HUGH MINCLAIR. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top. 3s. 6d. net.

"Studies of the manner and message of about fifty leading preachers. . . A book of real insight, opened by me with trepidation, but closed with appreciation for the interpretative quality it reveals."—T.P.'s Weekly.

THE UNFETTERED WORD.

A Series of Readings for the Quiet Hour.

By J. D. JONES, M.A., B.D. Cloth boards, gilt top. 3s. 6d. net.

It is refreshing to feast the eye and mind upon such a book. This splendid volume is to be commended."—Dundee Courier.

EVERYCHILD.

A Christmas Morality.

By HAROLD BEBBIE. Author of "Broken Earthenware," &c. &c. Small crown 8vo cover and frontispiece in Colours. 1s. net.

"This is an imaginative picture of modern life akin to Jerome K. Jerome's famous 'Peeping of the Third Floor Back'."

James Clarke & Co., 13 & 14, Fleet Street, LONDON.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

MRS WINIFRED BROOKS MYLECHREEST

Author of 'The Fairest of the Stuarts, which Messrs. Sampson
Low announce for publication

CHRONICLES OF AVONLEA.

By L M MONTGOMERY 6s
(Sampson Low)

Those of us who have enjoyed the stories of Anne of Green Gables and Avonlea, will take up Miss Montgomery's new Avonlea book 'Chronicles of Avonlea' with eagerness and high expectations. And I fear we shall find ourselves a little disappointed. For, entertaining as the stories undoubtedly are, yet they do not all reach the level of their author's previous work. One or two are a trifle unconvincing and at times the pathos is overdrawn, notably in 'Old Lady Lloyd' and 'Little Joscelyn'. Also there is not quite enough variety in the plots—too much tendency to elderly lover's quarrels and reconciliations. Still these remarks apply to only a few of the tales. 'Each in His Own Tongue' is a powerful piece of work and there are several other fine little stories. Anne Shirley flits through the book like a ghost appearing for a few seconds from time to time but taking little or no definite action in any of the plots. Yet these brief glimpses of her make us long for another book all about Anne and hope that Miss Montgomery will give us one in the near future. There is a beautiful frontispiece to the book, a picture in colour of Anne by Mr. George Gibbs.

MR W J LOCKE, whose "Joy in Adventures of Aristide Puy" has just been published by Mr. John Lane

GONE ASTRAY

By CHARLES DICKENS Illustrated With an Introduction by B W Matz (Chapman & Hall)

This is a little sketch in Dickens' most charmingly whimsical vein, it originally appeared in Household Words in 1853 and relates a trivial incident evidently, as Mr. Matz says autobiographical of Dickens's early boyhood. It is of the adventures of a child who is lost in London, how from being terrified he grows resigned and journeys about London not trying to find his way home, but looking for those famous things in it he has heard of but never seen before. The humour of it—so largely the humour of the child's feelings and fancyings—is full of the grace that plays like a light of happy laughter about all Dickens's happiest pictures of children.

"He saw therein reflected, the cello and the Italian chair; but the figure of a man sat playing, and that man was not himself; that figure was not his own."

Drawn by F. H. Townsend

From The Unseen World (Penguin)

From Magic Dominions
(Smith, Elder).

"HE CARRIED THE SPEAT WITH HIM INTO HIS LITTLE HOUSE AND PUT HIM CARE-FULLY INTO A GLASS BOWL."

CHAMBERS' GIFT BOOKS XMAS 1912.

TWO SUPERB GIFT BOOKS

Traditions of Edinburgh

By ROBERT CHAMBERS 21 - net

An Entirely New Edition which contains 30 Original Drawings in Colour, and over 60 Pen-and-Ink Sketches by JAMES RIDDEL, R.S.W.

The Book is a Handsome Crown Quarto Volume in an Artistic Binding. The New Edition of this famous Work is certain to be a source of delight not only to the citizens of Edinburgh but to her admirers all over the World.

The Cloister & the Hearth

A TALE OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

By CHARLES READE 10 6 net

Charmingly Illustrated by GORDON BROWNE, with 20 Original Drawings in Colour and a series of Pen-and-Ink Sketches.

A Handsome Crown Quarto Volume, uniform with "LORNA DOONE."

Line Drawing by JAS RIDDEL R.S.W.
from "Traditions of Edinburgh"

PEGGY FROM KERRY

L. T. MEADE 6 -

Mrs. Meade is never happier than when depicting the delightful vagaries of the Irish schoolgirl.

KITTY O'DONOVAN

L. T. MEADE 5/-

A story of how Kitty was elected Queen of the May.

CITY SCHOOLGIRL

MAY BALDWIN 5 -

Yvonne is a rollicking, attractive schoolgirl and the heroine in which she and her sister win friends in London cannot fail to interest girl readers.

CAVALIER OF FORTUNE

ESCOTT LYNN 3 6

A romantic story of the Middle Ages.

STORIES FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

Charmingly Illustrated in Colour and in Black and White by leading Artists

CAPTAIN of the KING'S GUARD

COM E. HAMILTON CURREY, R.N. 5/-

A thrilling story telling how in 1623 Charles Prince of Wales and the Duke of Buckingham visited Madrid to see the Infanta Maria.

RED HUSSAR

REGINALD HORSLEY 3/6

A stirring story of the penning stages of the Franco-Prussian War.

DADDY'S GIRL (No. 1 in the series)

L. T. MEADE 3 6

On the life of a girl in an engaging and pathetic study of child life.

CORAH'S SCHOOL CHUMS

MAY BALDWIN 3/6

This story is the result of a visit which Miss Baldwin paid to South Africa and its originality and humour will delight her enthusiastic readers.

TABITHA SMALLWAYS

RAYMOND JACBERNS 3 6

Motherless Tabitha is a loving but mischievous youngster possessed of a wonderful faculty for getting into and out of scrapes.

SALLIE'S CHILDREN

M. BATCHELOR 3/6

Author of "Six Desperate Dinners" and "A Very Fresh and Breezy Story about the Dilemma of a particularly engaging family of Canadian children in England."

W. & R. CHAMBERS, LTD., 38, SOHO SQUARE, LONDON, W., & EDINBURGH.

B. T. Batsford's Finely Illustrated Books on Art and Architecture

ESPECIALLY SUITABLE FOR PRESENTATION.

Dedicated by special permission to His Majesty the King

THE OLD COLLEGES OF OXFORD

Their Architectural History illustrated and described by AYLVA VALLANCE. M.A. One of College FSA. Illustrated by 50 beautiful Plates, finely reproduced in Collotype from specially taken Photographs and from original Paintings and Engravings. With 23 further Illustrations in the text from Photographs, old Engravings and Drawings, of interior and exterior decorative detail, domed buildings, ground plans, etc. Small folio, handsomely bound in art buckram, gilt. 41 4s net.

A SHORT CRITICAL HISTORY OF ARCHITECTURE

By H. H. STATHAM F.R.I.B.A. (in collaboration with The Editor) Author of "Modern Architecture" etc. For the use of General Readers, Students, Architects, and Travellers. Containing 57 plates and 70 illustrations of the chief buildings of all countries and periods reproduced from Photographs and Drawings, with Comparative Chronological Charts, and a comprehensive Glossary of Terms. Large crown 8vo cloth, gilt. 10s net. No short history of architecture is at all comparable to this for originality of treatment, or richness and variety of illustrations.

THE CATHEDRALS OF ENGLAND AND WALES

A Concise Account of their Architectural History. By FRANCIS BOND M.A., Author of "Gothic Architecture in England" etc. (Being a Fourth Edition of "English Cathedrals Illustrated.") Containing 450 pages of text, with 200 new illustrations, including a series of specially drawn Ground Plans. Large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt. 7s 6d net.

A light, handy edition printed on thin paper, for the use of travellers, is issued at the same price.

THE ENGLISH FIREPLACE

A History of the Development of the Chimney, Chimney Piece, and Firegrate with their Accessories, from the earliest times to the beginning of the Nineteenth Century. By L. A. SHUTTLEWORTH. Illustrated by 130 full-page Plates, reproduced in Collotype from choice Photographs with further 200 illustrations in the text from sketches, measured drawings, and photographs. Crown 4to, art linen, gilt. 42 2s net.

LONDON HOUSES FROM 1660 TO 1820

By A. E. RICHARDSON and C. I. GILL, Architects. Containing 100 Photographic Plates with descriptive text, illustrated by plans of typical Town Houses. Large 8vo, cloth, gilt. 15s net.

THE ART AND CRAFT OF GARDEN MAKING

By THOMAS H. MAWSON, Garden Architect. Fourth Edition revised, rearranged and greatly enlarged. Containing upwards of 400 illustrations (reproduced in Colour, Half-tone and Line), of perspective views, plans, and details. Crown folio buckram, gilt. 42 15s net.

NEW VOLUME IN THE OLD COTTAGE SERIES

OLD HOUSES AND VILLAGE BUILDINGS IN EAST ANGLIA

By FASLI OLMER, Architect. A.R.I.B.A. Illustrated by 127 examples in Collotype from specially taken Photographs. With Historical and Descriptive text. Art crown gilt. 15s net.

Further volumes in the series (uniform in size, style and price) comprise:—
(1) Kent and Sussex. (2) Shropshire, Herefordshire and Cheshire.
(3) The Cotswold District. (4) Surrey.

A HISTORY OF ARCHITECTURE IN LONDON

By WAITER H. GODFREY, Architect. With a Preface by PHILIP NORMAN, F.R.I.B.A. Containing 250 illustrations with Collotype Frontispiece and 7 Folding Maps, including an Annotated Guide to all the Buildings shown. 8vo cloth, gilt. 7s 6d net.

MODERN PRACTICAL DESIGN

By G. W. RILEY, R.I. Hon. A.R.C.A. With 100 illustrations of modern designs and decorative objects by well-known designers. Large 8vo, cloth. 7s 6d net.

PIRANESI

By ARTHUR SAMUEL. Containing a sketch of the Life Work and Influence of this celebrated Architectural Etcher. Illustrated by 25 Reproductions of typical examples of his work with a collation of all the Artists' etchings and a Bibliography. Second edition, revised. Large 8vo cloth, gilt. 12s 6d net.

JAPAN AND ITS ART

By MARCUS B. HUISS, LL.B. Second edition, revised and greatly enlarged. With numerous illustrations, including several in Colour. Demy 8vo, cloth, gilt. 10s 6d net.

A full Catalogue and Detailed Prospectuses will be sent post free on application.

B. T. BATSFORD, PUBLISHER, 94, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Joyous Adventures of Aristide Pujol
(I a e)

THE ROAD: A STUDY OF JOHN BUNYAN'S "PILGRIM'S PROGRESS," VOL. II.

By JOHN KELMAN D.D. With 8 Illustrations 3s 6d
net (Oliphant Anderson & Ferriar)

To the first volume of The Road published a year ago now is added its continuation and conclusion Dr Kelman received high praise for the earlier volume praise which we doubt not will now be renewed The complete

From The Road: A Study of John Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," Vol. II.
(Oliphant, Anderson & Ferriar).

PILGRIMS ARRIVED.
Altar and Radcliffe Monument, Elstow Church

From The Wrath of Man
(Warne)

"THE NEXT MOMENT SHE WAS SWINGING IN MID AIR"

From Round the Yule Log
(Sampson Low).

SELECTED FROM Stanley Paul's New List

The A B C of Japanese Art. By J. F. BLACKER. 460 pages, profusely illustrated with 150 line and 100 half-tone illustrations, printed on art paper. 5s. net.

C. K. S. in Sphere says: "We welcome a book which tells us everything about the art and the artists in a pleasant form. The book should be in every library of reference."

The A B C about Collecting. By Sir JAMES VOXALL, M.P. Illustrated. The subjects include China, Clocks, Prints, Books, Pictures, Furniture, Violins, etc. 5s. net.

"A beginner cannot well have a better guide."—Outlook.

A B C of Collecting Old English China. By J. F. BLACKER. With numerous line and 64 pages of half-tone illustrations. 5s. net.

"To the beginner there could be no surer guide."—Pall Mall Gazette.

The A B C of Artistic Photography. In Theory and Practice. By A. J. ANDERSON. 5s. net.

The Amateur Photographer says: "A most delightful book beautifully illustrated with photography and many half-tone reproductions of pictures by leading workers. Every amateur photographer with an interest in pictorial work should get it."

A B C of Collecting Old English Pottery. By J. F. BLACKER. With about 400 line and 32 pages of half-tone illustrations. 5s. net.

"Mr. Blacker speaks with authority, and his pages are full of knowledge."—Bookman.

The A B C Guide to Mythology. By HELEN A. CLARKE. Illustrated. 5s. net.

The A B C Guide to Music. By DANIEL G. MASON. Illustrated. 5s. net.

The A B C Guide to Pictures. By CHARLES H. CALVIN. Illustrated. 5s. net.

The A B C Guide to American History. By H. W. ELSON. Illustrated. 5s. net.

Nineteenth Century English Ceramic Art. By J. F. BLACKER. 10s. 6d. net.

"One of the cheapest art manuals that has appeared in the present generation. For half a guinea the reader may obtain over 500 closely printed pages, full of the latest and most erudite information, together with some 1,200 beautifully reproduced examples of the best products of English Ceramic Art in the nineteenth century. Invaluable to all lovers of historic ware," says the Daily Telegraph.

The Motor. A Practical Work of Original Information and Reference for Owners and Makers of Motor Cars. By JOHN ARMSTRONG. Demy 8vo, 160 illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.

Intimate Memoirs of Napoleon III. Personal Reminiscences of the Man and the Emperor. By BARON D'AMBIS. Illus. Two vols., 24s. net.

Fourteen Years of Diplomatic Life in Japan. Second Edition. By BARONNESS ALBERT D'ANTHIAN. Introduction by BARON KATO. Fully illustrated, 18s. net.

David Garrick and his French Friends. By DR. I. A. HEDGECOCK. Demy 8vo, illus., 10s. 6d. net.

A Winter Holiday in Portugal. By Captain GRANVILLE BAKER. Demy 8vo, illus., 12s. 6d. net.

The Royal Miracle (Charles II.). By A. M. BROADLEY. Fully illus., crown 4to, 16s. net.

In the Footsteps of Richard Cœur de Lion. Demy 8vo, illus., 16s. net.

Sapphire. By LADY SYBIL GRANT. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Godoy, the Queen's Favourite. EDMUND B. D'AUVERGNI. Demy 8vo, illus., 10s. net.

The Romance of Sandro Botticelli. By A. J. ANDERSON. Demy 8vo, illus., 10s. 6d. net.

In Jesuit Land, By W. H. KOEBEL. Demy 8vo., illus., 12s. 6d. net.

The Life of Cesare Borgia. Third Edition. By RAFAEL SABATINI. Demy 8vo, illus., 16s. net.

Rodrigo Borgia: The Life and Times of Pope Alexander VI. By the Most Rev. ARNOLD H. MATHW, D.D. illus., demy 8vo, 16s. net.

Guerilla Leaders of the World. By PERCY CROSS STANDING. Crown 8vo, illus., 6s. net.

A Tour through Old Provence. By A. S. FORREST. Large crown 8vo., profusely illustrated, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

The Beloved Princess. Princess Charlotte of Wales. By CHARLES E. PHARCE. 16s. net. Illustrated.

ALFRED H. MILES'

NEW SERIES FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

Large crown 8vo., 384 pages, fully illustrated, handsome cloth gilt, fully gilt, 5s. each.

Christian World: "Mr. Alfred H. Miles seems to have heard of more brave deeds than any man living."

Daily Chronicle: "Mr. Miles is always a safe guide where boys' reading is concerned."

In the Lion's Mouth: Fierce Fights with Wild Men, Wild Animals and Wild Nature. By CLIVE FENN, THEODORE ROOSEVELT, etc. With coloured illustrations.

Where Duty Calls; or, Danger Records of Courage and Adventure for Girls. By EVELYN EVERETT-GREEN, GRACE STUBBING, etc. With coloured illustrations.

'Twixt Life and Death on Sea and Shore. A Book for Boys.

Heroines of the Home and the World of Duty. A Book for Girls.

A Book of Brave Boys All the World Over.

A Book of Brave Girls At Home and Abroad.

In the Teeth of Adventure Up and Down the World.

THE SWEEP OF THE SWORD. From Marathon to Mafeking. Dedicated by special permission to Field-Marshal Earl Roberts, V.C. In large crown 8vo. (over 600 pages), with a photogravure frontispiece, 16 full-page illustrations of world-famous battle pictures, on art paper, and nearly 150 illustrations in the text, handsomely bound in cloth gilt, with special design, 6s.

Truth: "Never before has Mr. Miles gathered such a harvest as this in a single volume. It is truly a stupendous volume, and there is quality as well as quantity to recommend it."

The Diners-Out Vade Mecum: A Pocket What's What. After Dinner Toasts and Speeches, etc. By ALFRED H. MILES. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net, leather, 2s. net.

A Garland of Verse for Young People. Edited by ALFRED H. MILES. 2s. 6d. net. Contains nearly 900 poems for children.

School Guardian says: "It is a book for a child's whole life; an excellent gift for young folk of any age."

This is my Birthday. Handsomely bound, gilt and gilt top, 756 pages, 2s. 6d. net, paste grain, limp, gilt edges (boxed), 3s. net, paste grain, padded, gilt edges (boxed) 4s. net, velvet calf, gilt edges (boxed), 5s. net. A unique birthday-book. Quotations from the greatest poets, artists, philosophers, statesmen, warriors, and novelists.

The Everyday Pudding Book
The Everyday Savoury Book
The Everyday Soup Book } A Tasty Recipe for Every Day in the Year
Crown 8vo, 1s. net each.

Cole's Fun Doctor. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Recognised as the funniest book in the world.

SIX SHILLING NOVELS

The Irresistible Mrs. Ferrers.

The Three Anarchists.

The Three Destinies.

The King's Master.

Maggie of Margate.

Paul Burdon.

The Thread of Proof.

A Robin Hood of France.

Neighbours of Mine.

A Star of the East.

Susan and the Duke.

A Modern Ahab.

Dagobert's Children.

Her Majesty the Flapper.

The Marble Aphrodite.

The Romance of Bayard.

A Durbar Bride.

The Consort.

ARABELLA KENEALY.

MAUD SITFNEY RAWSON.

J. A. T. LLOYD.

OLIVIA LITTBIDGE and JOHN DE STOURTON.

GABRIELLE WODNIL.

SIR WILLIAM MAGNAY.

HEADON HILL.

MICHAEL W. KAYE.

R. ANDOM.

CHARLES E. PEARCE.

KATE HORN.

THEODORA WILSON WILSON.

L. J. BRESTON.

A. E. JAMES.

ANTHONY KIRBY GILL.

COL. ANDREW HAGGARD.

CHARLOTTE CAMERON.

MRS. EVERARD COTES (Sara Jeannette Duncan.)

The Villa Mystery.

Prince and Priest.

Brass Faces.

The Memoirs of Mimosa.

Love's Cross Roads.

The Swelling of Jordan.

Galbraith of Wynates.

The Career of Beauty Darling.

Francesca.

Between Two Stools.

The Justice of the Duke.

Exotic Martha.

The Second Woman.

Damosel Croft.

Devil's Brew.

Officer 666.

A Babe in Bohemia. (New Revised Edition.)

HILBRI FLOWERD W.

BERYL SYMONS.

CHARLES McEVROY.

ANNE ELLIOT.

L. T. MEAD.

CORALIE STANTON and HEATH HOSKEN.

E. EVERETT-GREEN.

DOLF WYLLARDE.

CECIL ADAIR.

RHODA BROUGHTON.

RAFAEL SABATINI.

DOROTHEA GERARD.

NORMA LORIMER.

R. MURRAY GILCHRIST.

MICHAEL W. KAYE.

CURRIE and McHUGH.

FRANK DANBY.

Complete descriptive list gratis from the Publishers: STANLEY PAUL & CO., 31, Essex Street, London.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

work forms a brilliant exposition of the "Pilgrim's Progress," whether it be regarded from a theological or a literary point of view, and we congratulate the writer on the successful completion of a worthy and important piece of work.

SOME TITLES AND A BOOK.

- "The Grip of Life." By A. and E. Castle. 6s. (Smith, Elder.)
 "The Port of Dreams." By Miriam Alexander. 6s. (Melrose.)
 "The Enlightenment of Sylvia." By A. D. Pickering. 6s. (Murray.)
 "The Unbearable Bassington." By A. A. Munro ("Saki"). 6s. (Lane.)
 "Miriam Lucas." By Canon Sheehan. 6s. (Longmans.)
 "The Happy Warrior." By A. S. M. Hutchinson. 6s. (Alston Rivers.)

A friend of mine, who is a fiction-manufacturer, pro-

From The Fair Enchantress
(Hutchinson).

"KATE"—EMMA LYON-HART (LADY HAMILTON).

From an engraving by T. Bragg after a painting by George Romney.

pounds and sustains the theory that a good title, a fitting title, is more than half the battle when you desire to thrust truth, decently veiled, on a usually recalcitrant public. According to him, experience shows that a good novel with a bad name will not sell, while a bad one with a good name will. My friend, whose art suffers little because he has a keen eye on royalties, avers unblushingly that he himself starts a yarn from a title. He hits upon, or stumbles upon, two or three words that prick curiosity, or stimulate moribund interest, or electrify indifference; and then, with deftly concealed craft, moulds his story to the form the title has suggested. Were I to cite the names of my friend's novels, you would open your eyes!

Here are some titles! Let us see whether the dog wags the tale, or the tale the dog (the pun is undignified, but—) "The Grip of Life." Here, now, is a Gissingesque title that suggests one of those depressing records where we find faithfully reproduced the daily miseries of life, from a broken bootlace and a smoky fire to the crumbling of one's pinnacled ambitions. Yet it is a fairy-tale, one of Captain and Mrs. Castle's fairy-tales, written with elegance and a well-bred wit; and, for joy of the reader, there pervades it a touch of the wizardry, a breath of the spring, that made "Young April," in its time, so sheer a delight. There be eccentrics who love not this genre, yet the story may be commended to them as containing a masterly study of a most unusual woman. Aglaé dominates the volume; she, alone, lives. That she ended as the authors would have us believe—no, no, and no! And after all has been read and weighed, one question will harry the careful reader: What did Aglaé and Solange see in Ughtred Maxwell? Also, Life? and Life's Grip? and which came first to the distinguished authors, the title or the story?

From the coloured jacket of The Rock of the Ravens
(Hodder & Stoughton).

"The Port of Dreams." Celtic glamour, and shut-eye life, and open-eye fantasy? Nay, but the rather drab story of a Jacobite coward, a double, a triple coward, who was rewarded as no coward ought to have been, however much of a suffering martyr and Lancet-case he was. Miss Alexander, I surmise, has felt the responsibility that weighs

From the coloured jacket of The King's Blue River (Hodder & Stoughton).

BEAUTIFUL BOOKS

SPECIMEN ILLUSTRATION FROM

THE STORY OF ROME

By MARY MACGREGOR, Author of "The Story of France," &c.

Illustrated with 20 Coloured Plates by Paul Woodroffe, Dudley Heath, and W. Rainey.

Miss Macgregor is probably the most popular writer of history now living. Of her "Stories of King Arthur's Knights" ("Told to the Children" Series) over 60,000 copies have been sold. Here she tells in her inimitable way the stories of the Great Romans whose deeds boys and girls the world over ought to know by heart.

Large square 8vo, cloth gilt, 7/6 net

Published by T. C. & E. C. JACK, 67 LONG ACRE, LONDON, W.C.; AND EDINBURGH 1912

From Gone Astray
(Chapman & Hall).

THE HERO OF THE STORY.
"When I was a very small boy . . . I got lost one day in the City of London."

From The Light Side of London
(Laurie).

THE NUTS.
By C. E. Dawson.

From Cruikshank Reflections
(Holden & Hardingham)

"AIR-UM SCARE-UM TRAVELLING."

From The Bow-Wow Book A ROBBERY OF A ROOST.
(Nisbet)

("The Bow-Wow Book" is by Conlon Kenahan, and was reviewed in last month's BOOKMAN.)

on the winner in a £250 prize competition, and responsibility of any kind is either a blessing or a curse. She has done some good work here, but "The House of Lisronan" is sounder stuff. She suffers sadly from the inipish pranks of the Correcor of the Press, who has never surely been

From Gone Astray
(Chapman & Hall).

THE HERO OF THE STORY.
"When I was a very small boy . . . I got lost one day in the City of London."

From The Light Side of London
(Laurie).

THE NUTS.
By C. E. Dawson.

THE BOOKMAN
CHRISTMAS 1912

From Kidnapped by Moors
(Blackie) "SHE SANK BACK INTO HER DARK CORNER."

From Tanglewood Tales
(Headley). "'BEYOND TO YOUR STY' CRIED THE ENCHANTRESS"

From The Girl in the Old Clothes "I WISHED TO SEE WHAT I LOOKED LIKE WHEN I WAS A CHILD."

From The Book of the Dead "THE GARDEN OF AN UMBRELLA WAS BUILT IN THE NIGHT."

in more tricky mood: she has my sympathy—and my advice: live with galley-proofs and a dictionary for a week in spite of printers' clamour. And the title? Splendid in isolation.

And what do you think of "The Enlightenment of Sylvia?" Here surely is a woodland girl opening on the eternities her eyes of pervenche. Nor Sylvia, nor any one of her companions, has aught to do with the wild sweet soul of the woods. Mr. A. D. Pickering's narrative is a fluent Society yarn, Trucfitt-clipped and Louise-gowned. 'Tis of the parish of Saint James; of a cosm, if you will, but a microcosm. The title fits, although not like a glove.

"The Unbearable Bassington" fits better. Here is one of those sparkling paste affairs that might pass for five crystal were the light of Nature less strong. It is very amusing; it has a twang of the boulevards; it might have been called "L'Insupportable Dupont du Mont"; it is quotable; and, of its truth and smartness you may judge by:

"The dear Archdeacon is getting so absent-minded. He read a list of box-holders for the Opera as the First Lesson the other Sunday instead of the families and lots of the tribes of Israel that entered Canaan. Fortunately, nobody noticed the mistake."

I incline to think that the Archdeacon, bland nonentity, was not quite so absent-minded as "Saki" would have us believe, but had judged his wearisomely witless congregation to a hair.

The Church has given us good fiction in the past; it still gives us good fiction. Here is Canon Sheehan with "Miriam Lucas," which is not an inspiring title.

The story is somewhat old-fashioned, but it is a moving yarn, full of honest workmanship and careful, if somewhat stereotyped, characterization, and may be recommended with confidence to the Great Public.

To the G.P. who dares recommend "The Happy Warrior"?—a splendid and illuminating title, a fine, because a deeply-felt, book: the only book "as is" a book among the six on my table. It is an erratic piece of work; it is by turns Meredith, Dickens, Borrow, and Hutchinson; but, praise Apollo! it is alive, it is lyric—nay, more, it is Life: not the rabbit-hutch, cabbage-fed, cluttered thing of our smut-grimed backyards, but the vibrating tingling gift we all had once, if now we have it not. It is an irritating, wayward, unequal, magnificent piece of work; it is trepidant, because, like the poplar, its top reaches to the firmament of ideals and its roots bore down into the red earth that is God's chosen paludament; it burns, because "the candle of the Lord," which is the spirit of man, kindles it; it lives—and in this creaking day of puppets and marionettes and fantoccini, is it not good to come on a book whose characters, however grotesque, have blood in their veins, not druggists'-window stuff? The story? Good. But who thinks of the skeleton when the living being takes our eye? . . . I imagine Swinburne rhapsodizing over "The Happy Warrior," and finding the chapters which recount "the" fight, the finest thing done for fifty years. Mr. Hutchinson has the grand amplitude, the grand carelessness, the grand soufflé. He will achieve his own style one of these mornings; and then, may I be there to see!

And so, having chattered of titles, one ends with a book! Luck has not yet, then, left these shores.

W. A. MAC-KENZIE.

AN IDYLL, AND OTHER POEMS.

By E. HAMILTON
MOORE. 2s net.
(Melrose.)

If the molten metal be good the artist has but little need of new moulds, new forms: chisel and file will make the roughnesses disappear; but to reconcile us to the outworn form, the statuette must have life, and the bronze must have that patine which, alone, true things possess. Miss Hamilton Moore has the right metal; and if she has chosen the somewhat rigid forms of idyll and sonnet, it is because she knows the worth of her bronze and the surety of her craft. Her love sonnets are full of passion; they have a dignity rare to-day, and a finish just as rare. Her experiments in octosyllabics are quite remarkable things: picturesque and actual, with the lyric touch: as this:

THE ARMY.

"Where the North-easter bites, and blows
About the squalid Sunday ways
The littered dust of week-days,
Whipped whirling from its dead repose,
And shuttered shops, in vacant rows
Stare with aloof, unfriendly gaze,
The Army's sudden banners blaze,
The lifted cymbals lift and close.
To save a human soul from Hell—
The Hell whose kindled torches flame
Thro' hungry days and nights of shame—
Shrill life and drum! Loud trumpet, tell
The glory of Emanuel;
Signal from Earth to Heaven, All's Well."

From Mines and their Story
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

BLAST FURNACE, KIRKLESS IRON AND STEEL WORKS.

'THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

There are many such good things in this slim white volume, not the least, in achievement, in fervour, in delicate insight, in complete conception, being the fine singing thing called "Eve," the hymn of unrebelling woman, conscious of her mission and strong for her great task. Miss Hamilton Moore is a true poet who sees clearly, feels deeply, and sings truly.

THE SOUL OF GOLF.

By P. A. VAILE. With 16 Illustrations 6s. net. (Macmillan)

You know—surely you must know—the work of Mr. P. A. Vaile, that astonishingly versatile gentleman with the combative manner, who will give you an original theory on everything from imperial politics to the flight of a ball. And you know, too, that his theories are always different from those of anybody else—and usually, aggravatingly, unanswerable, because very much more often than not, they happen to be right. So perhaps you will not be surprised that this book "essays to bring back to the truth those who have been led astray by the false teaching of the most eminent men associated with the game, teaching which they do not themselves practise" (the italics are ours); and that it is "a challenge, but it is not a question of Vaile against Vardon, Braid, Taylor, Professor Thomson, and others. The issue is above that. It is a question of truth or untruth. . . . It rests for the golfing world to find out for itself which is the truth." And there we leave it, confident that the golfing world will find out, confident too that it cannot but be stirred and amused and annoyed by the author's vivacious pugnacity, even though the theories he now expounds turn out to be miraculously wrong.

A REGULAR MADAM.

By ALICE WILSON FOX. 6s. (Macmillan.)

A good, wholesome, historical novel (period—George II. ; scene—England and Canada), with plenty of movement and excitement about it and just that special flavour that makes it suitable to a girl in her teens, is by no means so commonly

From The Great Sea Horse
(Warne).

met with that you can afford to neglect it when it does come your way. Well, here is "A Regular Madam"—the very thing. It is a book which girls will delight in—for the heroine is a young girl, and a very charming one at that—which boys will not despise—for there are adventures among Indians and hostile Frenchmen and a peep at the siege of Quebec—and which adults will enjoy for its freshness and pleasing sentiment. "A Regular Madam" is an excellent piece of workmanship, with a well-managed plot, some pleasant character-sketches, and a dainty attractiveness in the manner of its telling. Mrs. Wilson Fox is to be very heartily congratulated upon it.

THE BLUE WALL.

By RICHARD WASHBURN CHILD. With 5 Illustrations by Harold J. Cue and E. Coles Phillips. 6s. (Constable.)

"A story of strangeness and struggle" indeed, "The Blue Wall" starts with an account of the curious psychological condition of an ailing child in sympathy with the being that is suffering on the other side of the wall which separates their bedrooms and their houses. What is behind the wall is the question that the child's doctor puts to himself. After a series of mysterious occurrences the narrator of the story discovers that it is fairly certain that Mrs. Estabrook is. But she is a young woman happily married to a wealthy and devoted husband, who cannot by any means account for her behaviour—for she has turned him and everybody else, save an old servant, out of the house and has made him promise not to re-enter it for three weeks. Why has she done this? And what is the part played in the mystery by several sinister figures, chief among which is the mechanical image of an Eastern Sheik which can play a remarkably good game of chess? We do not suppose for a moment that you will guess the answers to these questions or to the dozen others that you will ask yourself before you come to the end of this absorbing story. But Mr. Child is artist enough to give you clues in plenty. Perhaps, after all, you may guess; and anyhow, you will enjoy this very original and striking piece of work.

Masterpieces of Book . .
Production.

Messrs. BLACKIE & SON'S Red Letter Editions Beautiful Books in Beautiful Bindings

Dainty Volumes at 3s. 6d., 2s. 6d.
and 1s. 6d. net.

Each book in this list is finely printed in red and black from new type on a specially made paper. The Red Letter Editions are the daintiest examples of book making on the market, and such great care is taken in their production that they are unrivalled for quality and excellence of workmanship.

THE STANHOPE COVER

THE MINERVA COVER

THE LAUREL COVER

The Stanhope Books.

Each 2s. 6d. net.

- Bacon's Essays. Introduction by Frederic Harrison.
Carlyle's Select Essays. Introduction by Frederic Harrison.
De Quincey's Confessions of an Opium Eater. Introduction by Charles Whibley.
De Quincey's Select Essays. Introduction by Charles Whibley.
Emerson's Select Essays. Introduction by R. Whiting.
Hazlitt's Select Essays. Introduction by Charles Whibley.
Johnson's Table Talk. W. A. Lewis Bettany.
Lamb's Essays of Elia. Introduction by Augustine Birrell.

Bound in best beaver grain leather, heavy boards, gilt top. Cover design in gilt illumination. Each book in a box ready for posting.

- Lamb's Last Essays of Elia. Introduction by Augustine Birrell.
Montaigne's Select Essays. Introduction by Charles Whibley.
Thackeray's Roundabout Papers. Charles Whibley.
Thackeray's The Four Georges. Introduction by George Meredith.
Thackeray's Book of Snobs. Introduction by G. K. Chesterton.
Thoreau Walden. Introduction by Richard Whiting.
Henry Vaughan's Silex Scintillans. Introduction by W. A. Lewis Bettany.

The Minerva Poets.

Bound in blue cloth, full gilt back. Dainty and dignified little books. Each 1s. 6d. net.

- Arnold—Select Poems. Introduction by Alice Meynell.
E. B. Browning's Select Poems. Introduction by Alice Meynell.
Robert Browning's Select Poems. Introduction by Alice Meynell.
Byron's Select Poems. Introduction by Arthur Symonds.
Calverley's Verses and Translations. Introduction by Owen Seaman.
Coleridge's Select Poems. Introduction by Alice Meynell.
Cowper's Select Poems. Introduction by Alice Meynell.
Herrick's Select Poems. Introduction by Alice Meynell.

- Keats's Select Poems. Introd. by Alice Meynell.
Longfellow's Select Poems. Introduction by The Bishop of Ripon.
Milton's Select Poems. Introduction by Prof. Sir Walter Raleigh.
Christina Rossetti's Select Poems. Introduction by Alice Meynell.
Shelley's Select Poems. Introd. by Alice Meynell.
Tennyson's In Memoriam. Introduction by Alice Meynell.
Tennyson's Select Poems. Introduction by Alice Meynell.
Whittier's Select Poems. Introduction by the Bishop of Ripon.
Wordsworth's Select Poems. Introduction by Alice Meynell.

The Laurel Books.

A prose series uniform with the Minerva Poets. Bound in green cloth, full gilt back. Each 1s. 6d. net.

- Bacon's Essays. Introduction by Frederic Harrison.
Carlyle's Select Essays. Introduction by Frederic Harrison.
De Quincey's Confessions of an Opium Eater. Introduction by Charles Whibley.
De Quincey's Select Essays. Introduction by Charles Whibley.
Emerson's Select Essays. Introduction by R. Whiting.
Hazlitt's Select Essays. Introduction by Charles Whibley.

- Oliver Wendell Holmes's The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. Introduction by G. K. Chesterton.
Johnson's Table-Talk. Introduction by W. A. Lewis Bettany.
Lamb's Essays of Elia. Introduction by Augustine Birrell.
Montaigne's Select Essays. Introduction by Charles Whibley.
Ruskin's Sesame and Lilies and Unto This Last. Introduction by Alice Meynell.
Thackeray's The Four Georges. Introduction by George Meredith.

The Red Letter Library.

Each 2s. 6d. net. Also in dark green cloth cover. Each 1s. 6d. net.

Another edition of the above books, with the addition of many other excellent volumes. Bound in maroon coloured roan, limp binding.

A BOOKLET, post free, giving a full list of Messrs. Blackie & Son's Red Letter Editions, including many other books not mentioned here.

Messrs. BLACKIE & SON'S
Red Letter Editions
Beautiful Books in Beautiful Bindings

Messrs. BLACKIE & SON, Ltd., 50, Old Bailey, E.C., LONDON.
GLASGOW AND BOMBAY.

BLACKIE'S GIFT BOOKS

* * Messrs. BLACKIE and SON have prepared a Booklet containing particulars of Gift-Books for Grown-ups, Boys and Girls, and Picture Books for Young Children. This List, beautifully Illustrated in Colours, on Art Paper, will be posted free to any address.

A BEAUTIFUL NEW COLOUR BOOK BY CHARLES ROBINSON

THE BIG BOOK OF FABLES

Illustrated by Charles Robinson with 12 full-page pictures in full colour, and 16 in two-colour, together with numerous illustrations in black-and-white. Large 4to, cloth, elegant, gilt edges, 7s. 6d. net. Also special Edition de Luxe, bound in white vellum cloth, price 15s. net.

A CHARMING NEW COLOUR BOOK BY FLORENCE HARRISON

ELFIN SONG

Written and Illustrated by Florence Harrison. 12 plates in full colour and 12 black-and-white plates, with numerous decorative headings and tailpieces. Small quarto, gilt top, 6s. net.

"Altogether this is a delightful gift book."—Athenæum.

"An exquisite book."—British Weekly.

WIT AND WISDOM FROM DICKENS

By ADELAIDE RAWNSLEY FOSSARD, compiler of the "Thackeray Pocket-Book" Pott 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net, and leather, 2s. 6d. net.

Two New Stirring Stories by Capt. F. S. BRERETON

KIDNAPPED BY MOORS

A Story of Morocco. Illustrated by EDWARD S. HODGSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth extra, olive edges, 6s.

A BOY OF THE DOMINION

A Tale of Canadian Immigration. Illustrated by WILLIAM RAINEY, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth extra, olive edges, 5s.

A Thrilling Story of the Navy of To-day, by Fleet Surgeon T. T. JEANS, R.N. JOHN GRAHAM, Sub-Lieutenant, R.N.

A tale of the Atlantic Fleet. Illustrated by C. M. PADDAY. Large crown 8vo, cloth extra, olive edges, 6s.

PIONEERS OF EMPIRE SERIES

Prepared under the editorship of SIR HARRY JOHNSTON, G.C.M.G., K.C.B. The following volumes, all from the pen of SIR HARRY JOHNSTON, and illustrated with pictures in colour and in black-and-white, are now issued:—

Pioneers in Canada
Pioneers in West Africa

Pioneers in Australasia
Pioneers in India

Price 6s. each. Other Volumes will follow.

TRIUMPHS OF ENTERPRISE

A new series of books which recount the fascinating story of the wonderful achievements of human enterprise, and set forth attractively the marvels of science and of nature. This year's volumes, written by CYRIL HALL, and profusely illustrated, are:—

Conquests of Engineering
Wood and what we make of it

Price 3s. 6d. each Other Volumes in preparation.

The most Popular Series of Colour Books BEAUTIFUL ENGLAND

Fcap 4to, bound in boards, with coloured panel; each volume containing 12 full-page illustrations in colour, price 2s. each net; also bound in levant grained leather or smooth lambskin, price 3s. 6d. each net.

New Volumes

Hampton Court - - Text by WALTER JERROLD
Hereford - - - - Text by C. EDWARDES
The Dukeries - Text by R. MURRAY GILCHRIST

Exeter - - - - - Text by SIDNEY HEATH
Dartmoor - - - - - Text by A. L. SALMON
Complete list of previous Volumes on application.

New Books for Girls

By ROSA MULHOLLAND (Lady Gilbert)

Twin Sisters: An Irish Story. Illustrated by FRANK WILES. Large crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, 6s.

By MAUD LEESON

The Discretion of Decima. Illustrated by JAMES DURDEN. Large crown 8vo, cloth extra, olive edges, 5s.

By BESSIE MARCHANT

The Youngest Sister: A tale of Manitoba. Illustrated by WILLIAM RAINEY, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth extra, olive edges, 5s.

A Princess of Servia: A Story of To-day. Illustrated by WILLIAM RAINEY, R.I. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, olive edges, 3s. 6d.

BLACKIE'S CHILDREN'S ANNUAL.

Ninth Year of Issue.

A handsome volume of 192 pages, with over 150 illustrations, including 40 full-page Pictures in Full Colour by the Best Artists. Picture Boards, cloth back, 3s. 6d.; cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, LTD., OLD BAILEY, E.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS SUPPLEMENT

CHILDREN'S BOOKS

THE PEACOCK AND THE CRANE

From The Big Book of Fables
(Blackie)

GIRLS AND FAIRIES.

• BY KATHARINE TYNAN

As one who has experience I may say that girls are little cattle to write for, and most publishers of girls' books would probably bear me out in saying that you can be much surer of the boys' market than the girls' market. Girls are much more Conservative, and apt to jib at new things, but once establish yourself as an old favourite with them and they will swallow a deal of twaddle, which is Gabriel J. Pippet 12.

Bake me a cake as fast as you can.

From Old Rhymes with New Tunes
(Longmans).

indeed what their elders will do. I expect it is because the clever and original girls are reading the books of the grown-ups.

I have asked the Critic on the Hearth, twelve years old, and a born "taster," to read the stories of school-life for me and pronounce upon them, which she is much better fitted to do than I, I keeping the fairy stories for myself, since she is at the moment more interested in school-girls than in fairies.

Of "The Unwilling School-girl"¹ she reports: "This is a book that will hold a girl's attention from beginning to end. From the time the book opens and introduces the heroine, Ethne St. Ives, living in the house of a mistaken, she tells this to her form-mates which leads to many complications. Rosa, a girl who is jealous of Hilary gets her accused of cheating, and though she protests her innocence she is to be expelled at the end of term. How her heroism saves her this time; how she is the victim of another plot; how she saves Rosa's life and Rosa confesses her guilt, all makes a most exciting story.

¹ "The Unwilling Schoolgirl." By Marjory Royce. 5s. (Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.)

"Brave Girls All"² is a book which all girls must enjoy. It is full of excitement and the reader's interest is never lagging. Minnie Perkins who had been expelled from the school where Pat, the heroine of the book was also at school, judging Pat by herself thinks she will tell the neighbours

² "Schoolgirl Honour." By Kathlyn Rhodes. 6d. (Nisbet.)

³ "Brave Girls All." By Olivia Fowell. 3s. 6d. (Nisbet.)

but well-meaning aunt" (Alas, how many such are there!) "who allows her to have her own way in everything to the time she goes to school and meets her 'Ideal,' a girl called Rose Strickland, whose smile or good word she is pitifully anxious to earn, it is a trial to leave the book for a minute and other occupations must be neglected. Of course she meets with many adventures too numerous to relate, but at last she meets her Uncle Basil, her guardian since her aunt's death, and learns that she is not to leave school for a long time, and so Rose will still be here for some precious years.

"In 'School-Girl Honour,'² Miss Kathlyn Rhodes has written a charming book, which records the adventures of Hilary Stone at St. Monica's. One of the girls, Mamie Green, overhears Hilary's aunt talking of some past disgrace of Hilary's. In the excitement of the moment, of her disgrace, so determines to have her tale in first, and insinuates that Pat has done something dishonourable and sets up a scandal about her. How her plot is thwarted by Gwenn Vansittart makes most exciting reading, and it may be heartily recommended as a book that every girl will love."

"Sally's Children" is a very amusing book and one which every child will think a very good present. All children will follow with excitement the adventures of Penelope and Rachel Shaw. The story opens with their coming over on the boat from America, where Penelope, who adores babies, takes charge of Baby Newcome, the son of the lady who is bringing them over, more for convention's sake than for necessity, as they carefully explain to the other passengers, as they are quite able to take care of themselves. The English adventures must be read in the book. They are most delightful. We see just how they looked in Mr. Gordon Browne's pictures."

In the next review we miss the note of enthusiasm, and indeed the present reviewer has often marvelled at the tenuous interest about which some writers for girls manage to spin 80,000 or 90,000 words.

"Tabitha Smallways, Schoolgirl" relates the tale of how Tabitha goes to stay with Mrs. Stevenson who has just returned from India. She has two daughters, Audrey and Judith, who are very discontented and are annoyed with Tabitha who is an ardent Home-Worker. How Judith makes herself ill by trying to become slender, and how Audrey becomes a Home-Worker much to Tabitha's joy will amuse a quiet hour."

Very gay, humorous and spirited are the children of Miss Mabel Atwell's illustrations to "Tabitha Smallways."

¹ "Sally's Children." By Margaret Batchelor. 3s. 6d. (Chambers.)

² "Tabitha Smallways, Schoolgirl." By Raymond Jacobers. 3s. 6d. (Chambers.)

PAT-A-CAKE

Allegro mf

Pat-a-cake, pat-a-cake, baker's man

f mf

Ped p cres poco a poco

Bake me a cake as fast as you can. Prick it, and roll it, and p cres poco a poco mark it with T; And bake in the oven for baby and me.

cres molto

Pat-a-cake, pat-a-cake, Pat-a-cake, pat-a-cake, baker's man!

cres molto f

Ped Ped

From Old Rhymes with New Tunes
(Longmans).

The next book of the bundle, "Molly and Margaret" has a pathetic interest, for as Mr. W. H. Hudson, that great servant and friend of childhood, tells us in his poignant and tender foreword, it is the work of a little girl, a bright and brave spirit, with an incurable heart trouble from which she died still in childhood. Despite her delicate health, she had all the joys of childhood, and only dreaded growing up to the joylessness of grown-ups, which she was never destined to do. So Pat's little story has a sweetness as of bruised wild-thyme to the grown-up; the children will perhaps not read the foreword, but will rejoice in the gay and roguish mischief of the story.

Many schoolrooms should welcome the dramatization of Miss Alcott's immortal "Little Women" by Elizabeth

³ "Molly and Margaret." By Pat. 3s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

⁴ "Little Women: A Two-Act Play." By Louisa M. Alcott. Adapted by Elizabeth Lincoln Gould. 1s. net. (Sampson Low.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Dewdrops from Fairyland
(Warne).

Lincoln Gould, the more so as the delightful illustrations by Reginald B. Birch show us exactly how Jo and Meg and Beth and Laurie looked in life, and their friends as well. To girls getting up a play this book is warmly commended.

"Stories to Tell"¹ has really the authentic touch. The stories have wit, wisdom, and humour. They are full of a delightful inventiveness and they handle the immortal simpheties. There are here all the talking animals which the child has no difficulty in accepting; and they are full of marvels. It is a charming book equally for the grown-up, who knows something of the child's heart and the child. The illustrations by Mr. Patten Wilson are as good as anything we are likely to see this Christmas, and the colour-printing is a wonder. Only one thing needs revising, and that is Mrs. Bryant's brogue in the gay and spirited verse-rendering of the Little Red Hen. But that, after all, is a bagatelle in a truly delightful book from America.

Children at home always like to know what children abroad—that is to say everywhere else but England—are reading and learning; and here from the North, from next door to Denmark, which gave us dear Hans Christian Andersen, come Norwegian Fairy Tales told in "Round the Yule Log"² by P. C. Asbjørnsen, who is own brother to Andersen in the invention and the lovely manner of telling of these fairy-stories. This book, copiously illustrated with truly fearsome and wonderful drawings, will be a new nursery classic, and one can imagine many a little lass and lad far away in the fiords in the spirit this winter, while their bodily presence lies face downward on the nursery hearthrug at home in England.

Here comes Mrs. Rodolph Stawell, another benefactor, with the "Fairy of Old Spain,"³ which has nothing at all to do with Spain except that the Fairy in the first story came out of a Spanish cabinet and so of course was a Spanish fairy. The child who has wandered away to other countries will quite gladly come back to things that might conceivably happen in the fairyland which lies all about us. Mrs. Stawell has a delicate fancy and she knows how to make her words a web of bright colours, glittering with jewels, wherefore the children will love her. The illustrations by Frank C. Pape live up to the stories. Mrs. Stawell and Moira O'Neill did not look for fairies in Cranagh Wood long ago without finding them.

In "The English Fairy Book"⁴ Mr. Ernest Rhys, himself a true poet, goes gathering immortalities for the children, and is helped in his quest by Grace Rhys, the possessor of an exquisite fancy, a delicate observation, and a grace of style very rare in current literature. So that the book is bound to be out of the common, and out of the common it is. All the old beloved fairy stories are here, and as well poems and ballads by old masters of the art, and there is a delightful Fairy Philtre by the aid of which one can summon a

³ "The Fairy of Old Spain" By Mrs. Rodolph Stawell 3s 6d net. (J. M. Dent)

⁴ "The English Fairy Book" By Ernest Rhys. (s. (J. M. Dent)

From The Bran Pie
(Duckworth).

"HE TUMBLED RIGHT OFF HIS BEE'S BACK."

¹ "Stories to Tell to the Children." By Sara Cone Bryant. 5s. net. (Harrap.)

² "Round the Yule Log." By P. C. Asbjørnsen. (Sampson Low.)

Frontispiece to Bill, the Minder
(Constable)

fairy at time of need. So it will be the fault of children fortunate enough to possess this book if they do not actually see fairies for themselves.

Quite unlike any other of the books in my batch is the book of a real girl, Elizabeth Ann,¹ presented in many photographs, very sweet studies of childhood, some of which will cause Elizabeth Ann to blush when she grows up: and then will come Mr. Walter de la Mare's day of reckoning. "A Child's Day" is rather for the child-lover than for the child, who will rejoice in the quaint and tender jingles with which Mr. de la Mare accompanies these capital photographs of a beloved child.

KATHARINE TYNAN.

OLD RHYMES WITH NEW TUNES.

Composed by RICHARD RUNCIMAN TERRY With 8 full-page Illustrations and numerous Decorations by Gabriel Pippet 2s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

Mr. Terry's musical settings for the sixteen old nursery rhymes included in this pleasant little book are what they pretend to be: they really are tuneful. At the same time they are simple—both for accompanist and vocalist—and they should be by no means difficult to teach or to remember when once learnt. There should be a very large public for so original a little book as this. Mr. Gabriel Pippet's illustrations are fanciful and decorative, and they add considerably to the attractions of the book.

¹ "A Child's Day." By Walter de la Mare. 5s. net. (Constable.)

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Arabian Nights
(Constable).

"HE SAW A GENIE OF MONSTROUS BULK ADVANCING TOWARDS HIM."

THE ARABIAN NIGHTS.

With 20 Coloured Plates and 98 Line Drawings by René Bull 10s. 6d net. (Constable.)

Mr. René Bull's gift for the grotesque makes him an excellent illustrator for "The Arabian Nights," a fine edition of which has just been published by Messrs. Constable. Probably the least satisfactory of the artist's illustrations are those in colour, which, though well printed, are lacking in the atmosphere of mystery which other artists have given to the theme. For the line illustrations, however, one can have nothing but praise. Many of these drawings are purely decorative, but hardly one of them is lacking in its effect. They are, moreover, genuine illustrations to the stories; they add something to the mental picture conjured up by the reader. And as there are ninety-eight of them, you will realise that the book is very well worth buying and keeping.

CARAVAN TALES AND SOME OTHERS.

By WILHELM HAUFF. Freely Adapted and Re-told by J. G. Hornstein. With 15 Illustrations in Colour and 7 in Black and White by Norman Ault, and a Portrait. 5s net. (Wells Gardner)

The original "Caravan Tales" were published in 1824-25 under the title of "Die Karavane," since when they have had a steady sale in Germany, and they are the best known of the three collections of fairy tales which Hauff made during his brief life. The present volume embodies four tales from "Die Karavane," one from each of the author's other works, and one original tale by Mr. Hornstein in the Hauff manner. To those who are unacquainted with it, it will suffice to say that the latter consists in a strongly pictorial and romantic presentation of life in the East. The stories are exceedingly well suited to children, for whom indeed they were originally written. They are vivid and humorous, and in Mr. Hornstein's excellent adaptation they should meet with a very large success in this country. So far as "The Rusty Key"—the author's own story—is concerned, we must content ourselves with remarking that it is worthy even of Hauff himself. Mr. Norman Ault's coloured illustrations are exceedingly effective, and several of them reach a high artistic level. Altogether a truly delightful book.

AS IT IS IN HEAVEN.

By ALFRED CLARK. 7s 6d (Sampson Low)

The author of this book invites each girl and boy reader to write and tell him which incident, story, or picture he or she likes best, and it would be very interesting to see the letters Mr. Clark receives and find out how far his idea of heaven appeals to the average girl and boy. For the theme of the book is the dying of a little boy and his awakening in heaven, and what he sees and does there. Mr. Clark's heaven is a curious blending of the ethereal and material. Somehow we cannot imagine any normally healthy child being satisfied with a heaven in which children play together "merrily but without roughness or screaming," and whose "prattle and laughter was like the lapping of crystal wavelets on a gem-strewn beach," and where even snowballs do not "sting or squash" but feel like "balls of soft wool," where no one does any work, but all find "endless occupation and joy in sweet and holy companionship, and singing praises ceaselessly." The author's style is rather heavy at times, but there is much in the book that is pretty and interesting, and the illustrations are always charming.

THE ROMANCE OF INDIA.

By HERBERT STRANG. Illustrated 6s. (Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.)

"The Romance of India" is the third volume in the excellent "Romance of the World" series that Mr. Herbert Strang is editing. Its predecessors, the Romances of Australia and of Canada, have already given the series an extraordinary popularity, which this latest addition to it

From Caravan Tales
(Wells Gardner).

"FOUR MEN OF SELINE'S ROBBERS
BAND."

should thoroughly maintain. It is not only an absorbingly interesting, exciting book, crowded with heroic adventures, but it is ably compiled and its history is sound. As Mr. Herbert Strang says in his preface: "India is pre-eminently the land of romance. From the time of Alexander the Great to the present day it has exercised an extraordinary fascination upon the people of the Western world. . . . Successive ages have added to our knowledge of its peoples, their history and literature." He has selected his romantic narratives from all imaginable sources; he has laid the leading historians, travellers and biographers under contribution, and has fashioned a varied volume that any boy or girl who loves the adventures and romance of real life will read with unflinching and absorbed interest. The book has a distinct educational value: it is history in the attractive guise of romance, and will teach a young reader more about India and its story than he will gather from the conscious study of his more general school-books. He will read it for the sheer pleasure of its many-coloured narratives, and learn without knowing that he is learning.

THE STAR DREAM.

By ELLEN M. DOBINSON. With Preface by the Bishop of Chichester. Illustrated by Mowbray Percy. (Murray & Evenden.)

"The Star Dream" is the story of Joseph and his brethren re-told for children in very simple language, which any child will not only understand but appreciate. Miss Dobinson's method of teaching the great Bible stories has met with the approval of the Bishop of Chichester, whose preface seems to foreshadow other works from the same pen. We have no doubt whatever that they will be welcomed by a large circle of readers, who are advised in the meantime to procure "The Star Dream" as quickly as possible.

From The Romance of India
(Henry Frowde and Hodder
& Stoughton).

BABER CHEERING ON HIS TROOPS.

From Folk-Tales of Bengal
(Macmillan).

"IN A TRICE SHE WOKE UP, SAT UP IN HER BED, AND EYING THE STRANGER INQUIRED WHO HE WAS."

THE PIRATE AEROPLANE.

By Captain GILSON 5s. (Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.)

Captain Gilson is already well known to troops of boy readers as the author of some stirring historical stories. His new story is as stirring as could be desired, but it is, in the journalistic phrase, nothing if not "up-to-date." There was never a more modern pirate than de Flood, a gentleman who commits his crimes in the American dialect of English. He goes in for piracies on an aeroplane, his objective being a vast store of gold which lies in the chief city of an almost unknown people in Arabia. Luckily, there are also some gallant young Englishmen who have discovered the place, and who are of a more virtuous disposition, and heroes and pirates—to say nothing of the natives—have plenty of excitement before wickedness is finally struck down and the chief pirate doomed to a horrible death. No one enjoys the thrill of a fight more than Captain Gilson. He almost opens his book with a duel of fists between the gentlemanly young hero and a muscular lout, in which the lout very properly succumbs. Afterwards the young gentleman becomes an officer and the lout a private soldier, and they share the chief adventures of the book together. There is also a learned old Professor in the story, and natives of all sorts up to the rank of king. The chapter-headings—"The Whistle of the Bullet," "Buried Alive," "To the Tombs!" "The Fight Among the Gold," and so on—give an idea of the appetising fare the author has provided for young and adventurous readers.

From The Mighty Army
(Wells Gardner).

THE RECEPTION OF SAINT AUGUSTINE BY ETHELBERT.—CANTERBURY.

THE MIGHTY ARMY.

By W. M. LEWIS. With 12 Plates in Colour and Decorations by Stephen Reid. 5s net. (Wells Gardner)

Certainly "it is not everyone who has a Bishop for a grand-uncle," and we doubt whether every one of those who have find their grand-uncle so pleasant and efficient a teller of stories as the Bishop in "The Mighty Army." The stories are just those which you would expect a bishop to tell, but they are none the worse for that (indeed, they are all the better for it). They consist in brief, but dramatic, accounts of the principal saints of the English Church from Saint Columba to Bishop Ken. They are written in a manner which can hardly fail to interest children, and they are beautifully illustrated by Mr. Stephen Reid. Those who are looking for a Christmas present of rather a more serious type than the average school-story, cannot do better than get "The Mighty Army."

From The Star Dream
(Murray & Evenden).

JOSEPH'S BROTHERS BOWING DOWN BEFORE HIM."

THE CHILDHOOD
OF ANIMALS.

By P. CHALMERS MITCHELL.
10s net. (Heinemann.)

Were we boys again our greatest ambition would be to see the Zoo under the guidance of Dr. Mitchell. It is too enormous a favour even for the boy of to-day to ask. Yet here is one of the next best things: a beautiful book by the Secretary of the Zoological Society with everything about the childhood of animals set out in such a guise that the adult and even the specialist reader, equally with the young person, will find in it instruction and entertainment galore. You meet, for example, his caracal kitten that liked plum-tart and milk; the tree-hyrax that liked bread sopped in claret immensely; and the young elephant seal that ate buns voraciously when it ought to have eaten nothing but fish. You learn that polar bear cubs seem to cry almost continuously from the moment they are born; that the new-born kangaroo is less than an inch long, although its mother may be nearly as tall as a man; and that the ancestors of birds were quadrupeds. It is true some of your cherished notions may suffer. The dog you

From The Pirate Aeroplane
(Henry Frowde and Hodder
& Stoughton).

"AND AS THE WORDS LEFT HIS LIPS, HIS OWN SWORD FLEW FROM ITS SCABBARD."

think so affectionate may be only showing what a slave he is, since man has knocked all the independence out of his kind. And the elephant is not really so intelligent as his reputation makes out; while it is ridiculous, also, to suppose that the cleverest talking birds have any consciousness of the occasional appropriateness of their remarks. As an expositor, Dr. Mitchell has no equal. His book originates from the Christmas course of lectures last year at the Royal Institution. It has exquisite coloured plates by Mr. E. Yarrow Jones, and skilled drawings by Mr. R. B. Brook-Greaves. On the question of taming animals, the author's humanitarianism will find universal welcome. "A chimpanzee in evening dress, lighting a cigarette and drinking brandy - and - soda on a music-hall stage, is a shameful abuse of man's power over the ape's docility."

THE STORY OF HEATHER.

By MAY WYNNE. 2s. 6d.
(Nelson.)

This story of an Exmoor pony (purporting to be related by the pony itself) with its six illustrations in colour, should make a strong appeal to the juvenile mind. The authoress has a pleasant, homely style, and an evident command of all those little artifices which are so dear to the hearts of the young readers :

From The Story of Heather (Nelson) "THEY PUT THE TINY GIRL ON MY BACK."

From Legends of our little Brothers (Harrap). "HE WAS CLINGING FIRMLY TO THE TIGER'S TAIL"

"We ponies, of course, have our giant and fairy stories just like you earth children, and we always used to think that the cruel giants lived in those green bogs, and that it was their hands which drew down to death all who ventured near their homes, whilst the fairies lived in the heather bells and rang the evening chimes which called forth the white evening mists to hide them from the rude staring of the moor ponies when they came to dance on the smooth hill-side."

Children and ponies, birds and kittens, and much frisking and romping in the open air—the book is thoroughly healthy and attractive. The authoress has a pretty gift of humour and is wise enough, while conveying many little lessons in humanity, to avoid any direct moralising. Incidentally young readers will gain from the book some useful knowledge concerning ponies and their ways.

LEGENDS OF OUR LITTLE BROTHERS.

By LILIAN GASK. Illustrated by Patten Wilson. 3s. 6d. net. (Harrap.)

A boy loved the Wind, and knew that the Wind was a teller of stories. He used to lay awake of nights, and heard the Wind go by laden with echoes of elfin laughter, roarings of strange animals, singing of birds. He yearned that the Wind should tell him the tales it knew of all those things, and told it so on a certain stormy day ; and it promised to bring him stories from distant lands "of the little brothers and sisters which you call birds and beasts ;" and next night the Wind slipped down the chimney into his bedroom and told him the first of its stories, and afterwards came again and again with another and another tale, all of bird and beast, and all imagined and related in the right fanciful spirit and style that take the interest of children. A very fresh and delightful book of stories for the youngsters, for which Mr. Patten Wilson supplies sixteen clever and very pleasing illustrations.

From The Tale of Mr. Tod (Warne). (Warne).

THE TALE OF MR. TOD.

By BEATRIX POTTER. 2s. net. (F. Warne & Co.)

"I have made many books about well-behaved people," says Miss Beatrix Potter. "Now, for a change, I am going to make a story about two disagreeable people, called Tommy Brock and Mr. Tod." And we pay Miss Beatrix Potter the compliment of not caring whether her book-people are good or bad ; for her book is sure to be charming, whatever the character of her "characters." Mr. Tod is a wily fox, Tommy Brock is a heartless badger, and neither sinner has much love for the other. One of the incidents in this exciting history of the theft of the baby-rabbit family of Benjamin and Floppy reminds us pleasantly of the famous encounters in the pages of "Uncle Remus"; and it is good to find that here, too, "when rogues fall out honest men come by their own." Miss Potter possesses that enviable gift of being able to be her own illustrator, and her pictures are gems of colour and expression. We first made her acquaintance in "The Tale of Peter Rabbit," and have been her sworn admirer from that day. Rabbits look out again from these dainty pages; and badger and fox are new and certain delights. The present volume is rich in black-and-white pictures as well as coloured plates, and must be one of the not-to-be-omitted purchases of this Christmas season.

THE TWINS OF TUMBLEDOWNDREARY.

By MAGDALENE HORSFALL With 6 Illustrations in Colour by Honor C. Appleton 3s. 6d. net (Duckworth)

The twins are lonely little people, living in seclusion as they do at Tumbledowndreary, with only an aged grandfather to keep them company, and a cross one at that. Happily, however, they have imaginations, and the fairies come to their aid. Not only have the twins their own experiences in Fairyland, but they are told a number of stories of things that happened to other little children. Thus they manage to while away many days that might otherwise have been wearisome. And if you are, or if you have, a child without the gift of seeing the fairies, you will find that Miss Horsfall's book is quite an efficent substitute for them. It is very easily and interestingly written, and it has the great advantage of half-a-dozen most delicate illustrations in colour by Miss Appleton.

From The Jolly Book
(Nelson).

THE JOLLY BOOK.

With Many Illustrations in Colour and Line 3s. 6d. and 2s. 6d. (Nelson.)

We note that this is the third annual issue of the appropriately named "Jolly Book," so that presumably it has come to stay. We are glad of this, for literature adapted for young children is somewhat rare, and anything more suited to its purpose than "The Jolly Book" could scarcely be imagined. A compendium of charming short tales and verse, together with very numerous illustrations, it makes about 350 pages in all, while the price which the publishers demand for it is almost ridiculously low.

From The Twins of Tumbledowndreary
(Duckworth).

"HE TUCKED HER UNDER HIS ARM AND STARTED ON HIS WAY."

From The Mole and the Mouse
(Warne).

at ails you, Madame Marguerite?"

From The Fairies and the Christmas Child (Harrap).

GULLIVER'S VOYAGES TO LILLIPUT AND BROBDINGNAG.

By JONATHAN SWIFT. With 8 Coloured Plates and 79 Drawings in the Text in two Colours and in Black and White. 6s. net. (Sidgwick & Jackson)

Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson's edition of the two most popular of Gulliver's Travels is made remarkable by the illustrations of Mr. P. A. Staynes, which we have no hesitation in describing as the most effective renderings of their subjects that we have ever seen. The artist possesses a grotesque humour which is in excellent accord with the spirit of Dean Swift's writing, and he knows, moreover, what will please children. In the illustration which we reproduce, for instance, the simplicity of the general scheme, together with an abundance of minor detail, is certain to please the ordinary child—and probably, also, the very extraordinary one for whom you are buying a present. In other respects the book is finely printed and bound. We shall be surprised if it is not one of the successes of the present season.

From Gulliver's Voyages to Lilliput and Brobdingnag
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

HEART O' GOLD, OR THE LITTLE PRINCESS.

By KATHARINE TYNAN. With Illustrations by Victor Prout. 3s. 6d. (S. W. Partridge & Co.).

This is not a fairy-tale, although its heroine is a princess. Cushla MacSweeney was considered a princess by the peasant people round about her home in Ireland, and her dead father had been called the Prince, in loving reverence. "The MacSweeneys were princes in this country before the mountains were made," said Cushla to her English aunt, Miss Talbot, who had come to Ireland to look after Cushla and her little sister, Nancy, after their mother and father were dead. Sweet, dainty little Nancy grew to be a selfish, fretful woman; but Cushla, to whom Ireland was the one dear place in the world, was a large-hearted, noble-minded child who grew to be a woman worthy of the name of "princess." Katharine Tynan writes with a knowledge and love of Ireland and the Irish people which do not blind her to their faults and failings, and she has made a charming, wholesome, appealing story out of Cushla's life from childhood to womanhood. It is a girl's story, and a happy gift for any girl to find awaiting her on Christmas morning. At the same time we think that it will be freely borrowed from her by her "grown-ups." Mrs. Tynan "has a way with her," and the "way" has got into the book. It is a thoroughly good book, interesting, well illustrated, and containing a pretty love story with a happy ending.

ROUNABOUT WAYS.

Verses by FRIDA WOLFE. Pictures by P. A. Staynes.
3s. 6d. (Sidgwick & Jackson)

If you see "Roundabout Ways" in a shop window, you will probably want to go inside and look at it a little more closely. And if you do this you will assuredly come to the conclusion that it is a very jolly book, if only because Mr. Staynes' pictures are quite out of the ordinary. In fact, you are almost sure to buy it. Then, when you get home, you will look at the pictures again; and this will give you your opportunity of reading Miss Wolfe's delightful verses. When you have done both, you will certainly not want to give the book away as a Christmas present. We will hope that you will go out and buy another copy - which all sounds very good business for the author, the artist and Messrs. Sidgwick & Jackson. Anyhow, "Roundabout Ways" really is entirely a delightful book.

From Roundabout Ways
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Schoolgirl Honour
(Nisbet)

AN ADVENTURE BY THE SEA

From Herbert Strang's Annual
(Henry Frowde and Hodder
& Stoughton)

"THE ONLY CHANCE WE'VE GOT IS TO MAKE FOR THAT BIT OF BEACH."

HERBERT STRANG'S ANNUAL.

5s (Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton)

"Herbert Strang's Annual" has taken its assured place among the most popular of the Christmas volumes for boys. It comes again this year with its full complement of amusing, exciting or gallant stories—tales of war and school-life, adventures on land and sea in divers parts of the world, from the sunny South to the frozen North. It is packed with good reading and unusually rich in pictures. Among its many interesting articles—to name one or two at random—there are 'A Day in a Midshipman's Life' by R. I. Lusignan, 'Recreations, Scientific and Otherwise' by Dr. Sphinx, 'The Motive Power of the Future' by J. Owen F.R.G.S., and the 'Torpedo' by Captain Mathew R.M.A. Mr. A. I. Haydon gives a vivid account of the dangerous work done by the mounted police of Canada, and since, nowadays, no boys' volume could be complete without something about aeroplanes, we have a special article on them by Claude Grahame White and Harry Harper. There is plenty to amuse as well as to

From The Gateway to Chaucer
(Nelson)

"MALKIN, WITH THE
DISTAFF STILL IN HER HAND"

instruct, and one could go on praising each item in turn—by no means forgetting the excellent black-and-white drawings and the coloured illustrations by C. E. Brock, T. H. Robinson, Cyrus Cueno, Christopher Clark and other clever and well-known artists. But it is sufficient to say, if it is a large and full budget you are wanting of the best miscellaneous reading for boys, you will find all you want in Herbert Strang's new Annual.

THE GATEWAY TO CHAUCER STORIES FROM THE "CANTERBURY TALES."

Retold by EMILY UNDERDOWN. With 16 Coloured Plates and numerous marginal illustrations by Anne Anderson. 5s net (Nelson).

'The Gateway to Chaucer' is one of those charming books which embody a "good idea." Chaucer is one of the least read of poets, and we should imagine that he is almost wholly neglected by children. Yet there are many passages in the "Canterbury Tales" which are capable of adaptation to the requirements of young people. This is amply proved

From Tales of the Gods and Heroes (Nelson).

HECTOR AND ANDROMACHE.

by Miss Underdown, whose versions are pleasant to read, and, so far as we can see, faithful to the spirit of the original text. The volume is effectively produced, and Miss Anne Anderson's illustrations are very good indeed.

TALES OF THE GODS AND HEROES.

By Sir G. W. Cox, M.A. With 16 Coloured Plates by Innes Fripp 6s. net (Nelson).

The stories of the Greek gods and heroes are invariably attractive to young people, provided that they are told in a simple and unpretentious manner. This is the case with the versions of Sir G. W. Cox embodied in the handsome volume just published by Messrs. Nelson. Within these covers the young reader will find something of the spirit which inspired old Greece, and half-unconsciously will learn many a lesson destined to be useful in after-life. Mr. Fripp's illustrations are conscientiously done, and they add considerably to the attractions of the volume.

MORWENNA'S PRINCE.

By MARGARET BATCHELOR With 4 Illustrations in Colour, 2s. 6d. (Nelson).

No mere recapitulation of the plot can make you understand the charm of "Morwenna's Prince," certainly one of the most attractive and readable girls' books published this autumn. But you must at least be told that the action of the story takes place in Cornwall, and that it is quite clear that Miss Batchelor knows that part of the country intimately. Herein lies much of the charm of the book. It is a story of the open air—buoyant and fresh, with healthy, natural children for its protagonists. Morwenna, a daughter of the Rectory, has taken under her wing a little boy whom she styles her "prince," and who is supposed to be the grandson of an old witch woman (a really charming character, by the way). The plot concerns itself with the parentage of this little boy, which is, of course, discovered by Morwenna. If you think that it is not particularly fresh, you are totally wrong. Without any exaggeration it is one of the most delightful children's stories we have ever read, and we have no hesitation in pointing to Miss Batchelor as the coming author for girls.

THE MOTOR SCOUT.

By HERBERT STRANG. 6s. (Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.)

Put a reckless Irish lad on an equally reckless motor-bicycle, and plant the combination in a South American State seething in one of its periodic revolutions, and you may be sure that other things beside the motor-bike will begin to hum. It is a situation that would appeal to most authors of boys' tales, and in the experienced hands of Mr. Herbert Strang the possibilities of the motor-bicycle in time of war are exploited with the same skill and ingenuity which have made this author's "Air Scout" so deservedly popular. The high-spirited Irish lad, who is forced to take sides with the revolutionaries, rides buoyantly through the story on an ever-swelling wave of hairbreadth adventure. Now he is rescuing the governor from the clutches of brigands: now baffling burglars with the aid of ammonia gas: or the motor scout is pursued by the enemy and his only way of escape is to leap, motor-bike as well, across a yawning chasm thirty feet wide! In short "The Motor Scout" is an ideal adventure book for healthy minds. It contains several noteworthy coloured illustrations by Cyrus Cuneo.

THE WHITE RIVER RAFT.

By LEWIS B. MILLER. 6s. (Sampson Low, Marston & Co., Ltd.).

A book dealing with life on the Mississippi can hardly fail to challenge comparison with, or at any rate to awaken recollections of, Mark Twain's inimitable stories and sketches dealing with the same topic. And rafting too! The memory dwells fondly on the adventure of Huck Finn and Miss Watson's nigger Jim, and we open Mr. Miller's book with an appetite whetted by the promise of things fore-shadowed in the title. The author is not another Mark Twain—it is not to be expected—but he spins us an excellent yarn concerning a logging trip into the flooded forests of Arkansas, followed by an exciting voyage down the Mississippi, the period being about the same as that with which Mark Twain himself deals. The heroes of the story are two stalwart youngsters on the tramp for work. In St. Louis they meet a big prosperous-looking stranger on the look-out

From Morwenna's Prince "THE CONKEY ALLOWED HIMSELF TO BE CAUGHT" (Nelson).

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Motor Scout
(Henry Frowde and Hodder
& Stoughton).

"THE GOBERNADOR RIDES."

From The White River Raft "CRAIG TOOK A FEW TURNS OF (Sampson Low). THE ROPE AROUND THE TREE."

for two or three stout fellows to take to his timber land on the White River in Arkansas, and assist him in getting out a big raft of sawlogs and floating it down to New Orleans. And with this promising prelude the great adventure begins. We get pictures of life in the forest where the air rings with the stroke of axes and the atmosphere of a logging camp, and the "dismal swamp" is faithfully reproduced. The interest is strengthened by the weird and quaint episodes of the bewitched fiddle and the wild man of the swamp. Anon come vivid descriptions of the work, of the floating out of the great raft and its voyage down the mighty river. Here perils, mischances and hairbreadth escapes follow each other thick and fast until the raft is wrecked in a terrific storm, after saving and landing some four hundred of the passengers and crew of one of the great Mississippi steamers when on the point of foundering after a collision with the raft. It is a picturesque and romantic story—the

From Where Duty Calls
(Stanley Paul).

JUST IN TIME.

love interest is not forgotten—and it abounds in sketches of primitive American life in a region already historic. There are several full-page illustrations.

WHERE DUTY CALLS.

Edited by Alfred H. Miles. 5s. (Stanley Paul.)

"Where Duty Calls" is an inspiring book of courage and adventure for girls, edited by Mr. Alfred H. Miles, who says in his preface, "From old time girls have been limited to service in the sphere of duty, and boys have enjoyed the exclusive privilege of exploiting the danger zone; but we live in a wider world than our fathers did, and we realise that in this ever-widening sphere girls are destined to play a larger and ever-increasing part. In the mere exploitation of their wider range of duty girls need the inspiring and invigorating stimulus of adventurous experience. . . . Hence, real records of the brave and true are the seeds of new harvests of heroism and endurance." The book contains a fine collection of such records by such able writers as Evelyn Everett Green, Grace Stebbing, Margaret E. Sangster, Ena Fitzgerald, E. W. Tomson-F. W. Calkins, etc., etc., and should prove a most acceptable book for all those who are in search of tales that are exciting, wholesome, and a spur to good deeds.

From In the Lion's Mouth
(Stanley Paul).

A MARVELLOUS ESCAPE.

IN THE LION'S MOUTH.

Edited by Alfred H. Miles Illustrated (Stanley Paul)

Mr. Alfred Miles has shown his usual genius for collecting the things which are going to interest boys. The present series contains forty-two stories of fierce fights with wild men, wild animals, and wild Nature. The "lion's mouth," that is to say, is a figurative expression denoting hair-breadth escapes from any sort of danger. "We let ourselves down from a dormitory window to visit a neighbouring fair, and we find him waiting for us quietly in the shadow of the tuck-shop, clad in cap and gown." In short, whenever we attain to the supreme point of personal danger we are in the lion's mouth. Hence, beside one of Mr. Roosevelt's lion stories from his "African Game Trails," we find another of a plumber who got stranded in a water-tank in one of the highest buildings in Baltimore, and had an experience as thrilling as any big-game hunter, though he extricated himself in time to keep his wedding engagement. Mr. Frank R. Stockton is drawn upon for a panther story, "A Cat on a Catboat"; the noosing of a python, beguiled by music, in Sumatra, gives an idea of how animals

From The Flying Submarine
(Nisbet).

THE MAN VAULTED INTO SPACE."

From The Boy's Book of Aeroplanes
(Grant Richards).

BOATING BACK! F. K. MACLEAN
RETURNS UNDER TOWER BRIDGE.

THE 'BOOKMAN' CHRISTMAS 1912

From Oddle and Iddle
(Smith, Elder)

"SO OFF WE MOVED THE CROWD OF LIONS AND LEOPARDS ACCOMPANYING US" are secured for the Zoos and others are tales of fighting the sea the floods the fog the sun and the snow. Most of the adventures are of American extraction. Well selected as they are we are sorry to miss our own favourite of the ranger on the South African game reserve who was very literally in the lion's mouth especially as it is British and authentic.

THE FLYING SUBMARINE

By PETER F. WESTERMAN With 5 Illustrations 3s 6d
(Nisbet)

The invention of a fairly large sized ship which is able to undertake the double duties of submarine and airship has brought in its train the inevitable jealousy particularly as the inventor is the deposed but highly civilised president of a South American republic. With the aid of his machine Don Miguel O'Rourke hopes to restore himself to power while rumours of the invention having reached the Admiralty—Holmsby and his friend Tresillian desire

From Molly and Margaret (Longmans).

"SO SHE WOULDN'T SPEAK TO HIM FOR A LITTLE WHILE."

to secure the invention for the British Fleet. The interests of the two parties result in a fast-moving richly-coloured story told with all Mr. Westerman's practised skill. The Flying Submarine is as breathlessly exciting as any boys' book recently published and we feel perfectly safe in recommending it.

THE BOY'S BOOK OF AEROPLANES

By T. O'BRIEN HUBBARD and CHARLES C. TURNER With a Chapter on Model Aeroplanes by F. W. Twining With 66 Illustrations from Photographs and 54 Diagrams by G. A. Richards

Now that aeroplanes have come to stay it is surprising that comparatively few books have been written which expound the principle of flight in a popular manner.

From Tota
(Macmillan).

"HE DID NOT GIVE THE CHILD TIME TO ANSWER, BUT LIFTED HER FROM THE SADDLE AND CARRIED HER OVER THE THRESHOLD."

Messrs. Hubbard and Turner—the latter of whom wrote a good book on the science during its early days—have done their best to remedy this state of affairs with the excellent volume for boys now before us. The authors are both accredited “pilot aviators” so that in some portions of their book they are writing from their own personal experience. Their explanations, too, are clear and their arguments not difficult to follow. In fact this is quite an excellent book in its way, and every boy with a turn for engineering will be certain to thank you for it. There are many well-printed illustrations.

From Tabitha Smallways
(Chambers)

"FLUNG HERSELF DOWN ON THE FLOOR BESIDE THE MOTLEY COLLECTION DRAGGED OUT FROM TWIN CUPBOARDS"

ODDLE AND IDDLLE, OR THE GOBLINS OF ALOE SHAMBA

By LILY COLLIER With 9 Illustrations by Joyce Crawshaw Williams 3s 6d (Smith Elder)

The Hon Mrs Gerard Collier has given us in "Oddle and Iddle," one of the freshest and most original fairy tales that we have come across for a long time. The scene of the story takes place in Africa where the hero—thanks to eating a particular nut—at once comes into communication with the fairy world. It is while he is there that he falls in love with Felicity, a character which shares most of the hero's experiences. Thanks to the African setting the author is able to introduce a number of wild animals which would certainly be out of place in an English story. "Oddle and Iddle" has delightful moments of humour and the child that gets it will have reason to think himself very lucky.

TOTA.

By MRS HOBART HAMPDEN 3s 6d (Macmillan)

"Tota" by Mrs Hobart Hampden is a book that will assuredly stand apart from all children's books published this Christmas, on account of its quite unusual charm and originality. The idea will appeal to all boys and girls who love tales of adventure, for it is the story of a little English

From The English Fairy Book
(Usun)

From More Tales in the Land of Nursery Rhyme
(Allenson)

THE BOOKMAN. CHRISTMAS 1912.

girl named Gracie who lives among the Himalayan Mountains and who, while her parents are away from home, ventures into the territory of an Indian Rajah and is kidnapped and sold to the Rajah to be the bride of his little son, Tota. Gracie's sister, in whose charge she was left, disguises herself and with the help of a native servant and a woman they meet upon the way, tracks the child to the Rajah's palace and manages to rescue her in the nick of time. But Tota has discovered their plans and unknown to the rest of his father's court, insists on accompanying them, and it is he who manages to save them at the critical moment—who offers his life that they may escape. It is a book which grown-ups as well as children will find thrilling and interesting. Miss Alice B. Woodward's drawings making a most pleasing addition to an altogether pleasing book.

From The Book of Baby Birds
(Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton).

THE BLUE TIT.

THE BOOK OF BABY BIRDS.

By FLORENCE E. DUGDALE. With 19 Illustrations in Colour by E. J. Detmold. 6s. net. (Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.)

Last year Messrs. Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton published "The Book of Baby Beasts," with illustrations by Mr. Detmold, and it is pleasant to see that it must have been successful. Had it failed, we suppose that "The Book of Baby Birds" would have remained in limbo which would have been a loss to everybody. Nobody can draw birds and animals as can Mr. Detmold, and in this delightful volume he is quite at his best. To buy it, it only needs to see it. Miss Dugdale writes her descriptions very easily, and she contrives to give a good deal of useful information in a pleasant form.

MORE TALES IN THE LAND OF NURSERY RHYME.

By ADA M. MARZIALS. With Frontispiece. 1s. 6d. net. (Allenson.)

We have the happiest memories of Miss Marzials' first book, In the Land of Nursery Rhyme," and we are glad to think that it received a sufficiently warm welcome from the public for the author to be encouraged to make a further collection of her pleasant little stories. Miss Marzials is well acquainted with the demands of children, she writes with spirit and charm and she possesses a sufficiently keen sense of character and a sense of humour which are undoubtedly strong enough to carry these stories into the hands of a large public. The present volume contains half-a-dozen short stories founded on well-known nursery rhymes. For our own part, we confess that "Pussy Cat, Pussy Cat" is our favourite, but all are good.

THE STORY OF THE DISCONTENTED LITTLE ELEPHANT.

Told in Pictures and Rhyme by E. E. SOMERVILLE. 1s. 6d. net. (Longmans.)

Probably you know Miss Somerville best in her collaborating capacity—as part-author of "The Adventures of an Irish R.M.," and several other very humorous and very deservedly popular novels. But she has published a children's book before this—and a very jolly one too. This year she follows up "Slipper's A B C of Foxhunting" with a moral story told in verse and dealing with an imaginary period:

"Once, very, very long ago,
Before your curls began to grow,
The time when Beasts and Birds could talk,
(Before you'd even learned to walk),
There lived midst Indian trees and plants,
A family of Elephants."

From The Discontented Little Elephant
(Longmans)

"In flashing foam away he tore,
Jung Boo swam swiftly back to shore,
And started for the woods once more."

She goes on to tell how Jung Boo, the baby of the family, used to make a terrible fuss:

"The reason's too ridiculous—
All from this silly cause arose,
He wished to have a Longer Nose!"

How he went in search of a means for lengthening his nose, and what happened to him in his search, we are certainly not going to tell, but both you and more particularly your children are sure of amusement in the verse and in the humorous pictures in line and colour with which it is cleverly illustrated.

BABY BIRDS AT HOME.

By RICHARD KEARTON, F.Z.S., etc. With 4 Colour Plates and 60 Illustrations from Photographs by Cherry and Grace Kearton. 6s. (Cassell.)

Once more the Messrs Kearton put the public—on this occasion the juvenile public more particularly—deeply in their debt. "Baby Birds at Home" consists of sixty-four short articles, which nevertheless contain an enormous amount of information of an unhackneyed variety, and as many illustrations dealing with the young of different birds. It still remains wonderful to us to understand how these pictures can be taken, and it is wonderful also to note how artistic an effect is frequently obtained. Once more we are in the debt of the Keartons.

From Baby Birds at Home
(Cassell).

TREE PIPIT.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Story of Santa Claus
(Herbert & Daniel)

"A STRANGE CARAVAN
STARTING FORTH UPON THE NORTHERN ROAD"

THE STORY OF SANTA CLAUS.

By S R LITTLEWOOD With 4 Coloured Illustrations by Sidney Filmore and Gerald Leake (Herbert & Daniel)

Mr Littlewood is warmly to be congratulated upon the new and attractive rendering he has made of one of the most beautiful of all legends—that of Santa Claus. Nowadays, we doubt whether many people know much about him, and Mr Littlewood's book should be read for its information as much as for its more sympathetic qualities. That the author is a conscientious worker, and that the undertaking of even a short book upon the subject is no small matter, is proved by the long list of acknowledgments printed at the end of the volume. But you will find no traces of the midnight oil in these pages. The book is easily and pleasantly written, and it makes as good reading as you could wish for. The illustrations add considerably to the volume's attractions.

From The Ghost Rock
(Nisbet).

"THE GREAT ROCK BEGAN TO TREMBLE."

A PAIR OF SCHOOLGIRLS.

By ANGELA BRAZIL With Illustrations by John Campbell.
(Blackie & Son)

Angela Brazil has again proved her undoubted talent for writing a story of school-girls for other school-girls to read. "A Pair of Schoolgirls" is a mild title, but this pair of schoolgirls were more than "ordinary." One was rich, one was poor. One was the petted only child of her widowed mother, the other found out by chance that she was a waif, an unknown child saved in infancy from a wrecked train. But they were friends, these two school-fellows; circumstances and affection drew them together, and in the end a yet nearer tie was proved. Miss Brazil keeps her plot well in hand, and carefully manages the characteristics of her many characters. Dorothy Greenfield, the child of unknown parentage, is the author's heroine.

From A Pair of School Girls
(Blackie).

"'YOU'RE THE ABSOLUTE IMAGE,' DECLARED ALISON."

and we see her character developing in a perfectly natural and extremely interesting way Dorothy is so human, so quick-tempered, so good at heart and "straight," so sensitive and yet sensible, that her story will be a help as well as a pleasure to any girl reader The background of this development is a delightful series of chapters showing school-life and home-life in sunshine and shade We have thoroughly enjoyed the story, and recommend it wholeheartedly to hesitating parents and other generous relations

From The Captain of the King's Guard
(Chambers)

"CAUGHT HIM ROUND THE ANKLES, AND THREW HIM HEAVILY"

THE GHOST ROCK

By FREDERICK WATSON 3s 6d (Nisbet)

The boys who are lucky enough to find this adventure story among their Christmas presents will follow with envious thoughts the thrilling experiences of young Alan Mackenzie and his uncle in their quest for treasure hidden in the wilds of Brazil And most boys will wish they too could boast such an uncle as Alan's picturesque uncle of immense stature, blessed with a chestnut beard reaching to his waist, and, better still, with an aeroplane built on ultra-modern lines When it is mentioned that the treasure is supposed to be concealed in the mysterious Country of the Three Hills, and that unless you happen to know a secret passage, your only way into this country is over impassable mountains, the need for the aeroplane becomes obvious Other obstacles besides mountains have to be reckoned with, chief among them being "the man with the scar"—a really formidable villain, who dogs the treasure-hunters throughout and brings them many a time to the very door of death. Some clever illustrations by John Cameron adorn the book, which comes from the pen of a son of the late Ian Maclaren.

From Glen Eyre
(Ward, Lock)

"MY WORD! YOU WERE NEARLY IN" SAID NANCY"

From The Girls' Budget
(Nelson)

"ARABELLA RETURNED TO COURT AFTER THE MARRIAGE."

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From Brave Girls All
(Jarrold).

"'THERE'S A SEAT FOR THEE, LASS,' HE SAID."

From Two Troubadours
(Smith, Elder).

"THE LITTLE VIOLIN DID DOUBLE DUTY."

THE CAPTAIN OF THE KING'S GUARD.

By Commander E. H. CURREY, R.N. 5s. (W. & R. Chambers, Ltd.)

This romantic story has for its pivot the court of King Philip the Fourth of Spain, and the plot makes very neat use of the surreptitious visit to Spain of Buckingham and Charles, Prince of Wales, in their quest for a royal bride. Elvira, the heroine, is the beautiful ward of Philip's chief minister, and her unconventional ideas lead her into many an escapade, from which she is rescued by her lover, the Captain of the King's Guard, and on one occasion by Prince Charles himself. Subsequently, however, when these two brave men are hounded down by a fanatical Dominican friar and are about to be punished as heretics, Elvira, by a gallant feat is enabled to repay her debt with interest. The story, which is told excellently and with a wealth of careful detail, contains a number of bold illustrations in colour by W. H. C. Groome.

From The Green Door
(Gay & Hancock).

"BIDDEN TO LEARN THE DOCTRINE OF PREDESTINATION BEFORE BREAKFAST."

THE GIRLS' BUDGET OF SHORT STORIES.

Edited by JEAN M'INTOSH With 32 Coloured Plates.
6s net. (Nelson)

This is the first issue of what apparently is to be an annual publication; and a fine production it is. The volume makes 500 large pages, and the amount of reading it contains is therefore very considerable. Miss M'Intosh includes thirty-one well-written and well-contrasted stories in the book, among the authors of which we particularly notice Mrs. L. B. Walford, Annie S. Swan, Emily Underdown, and others who are well qualified to write for girls. The illustrations are from the brushes of several different artists, and they seem to us to be a little uneven in merit. The most generally successful are certainly the series, of four by E. F. Skinner, which illustrate scenes from "Lorna Doone." "The Girls' Budget" has made an excellent start, and if it maintains the good level of its first volume we predict a long life for it.

THE BIRDS' CHRISTMAS CAROL.

By KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN.

THE GREEN DOOR.

By MARY E. WILKINS. Both with 4 Coloured Illustrations by Francis E. Hiley. 1s. 6d net each (Gay & Hancock)

Two delightful little books are these published by Messrs. Gay & Hancock—short Christmas stories especially intended for children, though we believe they will appeal almost as strongly to adults. Miss Wiggin's "Birds' Christmas Carol" is a reprint of a tale written some years ago, and for quiet humour, pathos, and charming sentiment you will find it hard to discover its equal. Miss Wilkins's tale takes the reader back into the past, when the New England States were inhabited chiefly by Red Indians and the Puritan ancestors of the modern Americans. It points a moral rather more obviously than Miss Wiggin's story, but it is none the worse for that. Mr. Hiley's illustrations are very attractive.

From The Birds' Christmas Carol
"THE DOOR OPENED, AND THEY STRAGGLED IN."
(Gay & Hancock).

THE TWO TROUBADOURS.

By ESMÉ STUART. 3s 6d (Smith, Elder)

It is an ever potent charm to read the doings of original children, and Miss Esmé Stuart has given us a story of two most delightful boys; so delightful are they that "Helen's Babies" are instinctively brought to one's mind. Perhaps the strain of Australian blood may have added to the irrepressible charm of "The Two Troubadours," but suffice to say that the joy of following their doings cannot be gainsaid. Their mother desired to make the boys self-reliant and manly; at the commencement of the story they call upon their Great-aunt and announce themselves to the solemn butler as "Two Country Gentlemen." They acquaint their austere relatives of their formation of a Country Gentlemen's Association "only for men"—a sort of Association for the Promotion of Chivalry and Good Actions, and throughout their doings they conform to the rules they have set themselves. They confess, when home late, that they had made up their minds not to look at the clock, knowing they would be late: they could not tell a lie! On the first occasion upon which they are allowed to go out hunting, they rescue a fair lady, who had had an accident, and their attitude towards her is most amusing. One becomes very heartsore when poor little Louis seems likely to die, but his brother's simple prayer is answered and the young life is spared. It is an irresistible book, and one can only hope the author may some day give us some further doings of these delightful youngsters.

From Queer Cousin Claude
(Allen).

"CLAUDE MADE A DASH AT THE ANIMAL. HE CLUNG ON TO THE REIN WHICH THE COACHMAN WAS PULLING WITH ALL HIS STRENGTH."

From A Bush Mystery
(Nisbet).

"WATER!" HE CRIED.

From Ward, Lock & Co's Wonder Book

THE PICNIC

QUEER COUSIN CLAUDE

By BRENDA GIRVIN With Illustrations by E. S. Hardy
3s 6d (G. Allen & Co.)

When Cousin Claude came from Australia and finished his journey on top of the cab among the luggage instead of in the inside with Mademoiselle who had gone to the station to meet him we felt sure that he was going to be a 'handful'. He was. He was homesick for the wide plains; he was cramped in the formal town house; he wanted to continue his Colonial dress and manners in England, and he wanted to fail in the examination for a singing scholarship for St. George's Chapel, Windsor. There were some 'breezy' times between Claude and his cousins, and Mademoiselle was a governess of the angel class, judged by the manner in which she kept the peace, comforted the exile, and incidentally taught him manners. Incidents in plenty follow one another, and before the end of the book is reached we find Claude wishing to win the scholarship and live in London for ever. Miss Girvin has given us pictures of

From the title-page of The Rosebud Annual
(Jas. Clarke)

NELSON'S

Newest Gift Books.

Reduced Specimen Illustration (in Colour) from "Faust and Marguerite"

Beautifully Illustrated in Colours.

6/- Tales of the Gods and Heroes.

NET.

By Sir G. W. COX. Beautifully Illustrated with 16 high-class reproductions from Paintings by Prof. FRIPP. This large and handsome volume contains the stories from Sir G. W. Cox's famous book with the above title, together with his "Tales from Greek Mythology."

6/- Camp-Fire Tales.

NET.

Edited by RICHARD WILSON, B.A. 24 Coloured Drawings by EDWIN NOBLE, and numerous Pen and Ink Sketches.

The hunting books of recent years provide excellent reading for adventure-loving boys, and in this volume the editor makes judicious selection from some of the most striking episodes to be found in this class of literature.

6/- The Circling Year.

NET.

By W. P. WESTELL. 36 Beautiful Coloured Plates and nearly 150 line Illustrations.

This book has been prepared to meet the constant and insistent demand for young people's guides to the beauties and wonders of Nature.

6/- The Girl's Budget.

NET.

Edited by JEAN M'INTOSH. 32 Coloured Plates.

The aim of the editress of this attractive volume is to provide wholesome reading matter for growing girls, which allows for natural sentiment without giving way to sentimentality.

5/- The Gateway to Chaucer.

NET.

By EMILY UNDERDOWN. Numerous Coloured Plates and Dainty Sketches.

This beautiful book forms an excellent companion to Miss Underdown's well-known "Gateway to Romance," and contains the most suitable stories from those told by the Canterbury Pilgrims.

3/6 Masterman Ready. By Capt. MARRYAT. Coloured Plates and Line Decorations.

3/6 Miss Netherby's Niece. By ALICE CHESTERTON. Well Illustrated.

2/6 Memoirs of Napoleon. Abridged from Bourrienne.

2/6

The World's Romances.

each.

The style of reproduction of these books is that usually associated with a much higher price. Each is beautifully printed, bound in canvas with picture cover, and illustrated with 8 reproductions from drawings by a well-known artist. The stories are simply but vigorously told from the best available sources.

Faust and Marguerite. Illustrated by NORMAN LITTLE.

Lancelot and Guenevere. Illustrated by JAMES FRIPP.

3/6 Nelson's Children's Annual: The Jolly Book.

Cloth.
2/6 Paper
Boards.

This well-known Annual is literally a "bumper." It contains no less than 48 Plates in Full Colour and 300 pages of black-and-white Pictures.

2/6 The Story of Heather. By MAY WYNNE. Coloured Illustrations by DOROTHY POPE.

2/6

each.

Sigurd and Gudrun. Illustrated by FRANK C. PAPE.

Paola and Francesca. Illustrated by W. MATTHEWS.

I/- The Handbook for Girl Guides, or How Girls can help build the Empire. I/-
NET. By AGNES & SIR R. BADEN-POWELL. Fully Illustrated. NET.

Complete Catalogue post free on application to

THOMAS NELSON AND SONS,

(Dept. A19) 35 & 36, Paternoster Row, London, E.C., or Parkside, Edinburgh.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Boys' Froissart
(Harrop)

"HE WENT EVER FORWARD LIKE A HARDY HECTOR."

The schoolroom and every-day life of a family of well-cared-for children in a delightfully natural and unaffected style. The little mysteries and troubles are just enough to keep the reader's attention on the alert, and there are glimpses of fun, too, to complete the pleasure. It is a bright book which should find a warm welcome.

A BUSH MYSTERY

By JOHN MACKIL 3s 6d (Nisbet & Co)

This story is of very special interest in that it is woven around an actual mystery, no-light upon which has ever dawned. "About sixty years ago," the author tells us, "the great Australian explorer, Dr Ludwig Leichardt, with a party of eight, all told, started to cross Australia from east to west. None of the party ever returned." In the 'eighties, Mr Mackie himself was in the "Never-Never Land of tropical Australia" when the fact that an old blind white man had been seen with the blacks in the wilderness gave currency to the rumour that the lost explorer was still alive. Being one of the few who could speak the language of those savages, the Yuculas, the author was able to gain much good material which he turns to very practical account in this vigorous story, in which he offers a possible elucidation of Dr Leichardt's fate. It is an ingenious tale, and, if it lacks any great distinction, it moves briskly from adventure to adventure, and should make a winter night's exciting and wholesome reading for a boy who does not scorn, as we are told the boys of to-day do scorn, a good "yarn" of the old-fashioned type.

WARD, LOCK AND CO'S WONDER BOOK.

Edited by Harry Golding With 11 Coloured Plates and over 200 other Illustrations 3s 6d and 5s (Ward, Lock)

Messrs Ward, Lock's "Wonder Book" fully carries out the promise of its title this year—not that it has failed to do so in the past, but the 1913 edition is certainly better than ever. Let the taste of the child to whom you give it be what it may, he (or she) will find satisfying literary fare in the "Wonder Book," and plenty of it. Skilfully edited by Mr Harry Golding, the contributors include such well-known writers for children as Jessie Pope, Margaret Batchelor, Z Topelins, Agnes Grozier Herbertson, Emily Klickmann, etc, etc, while the wealth of illustration is supplied by so many artists that it would be invidious to single them out. There can be hardly a child in the country who will not want the "Wonder Book."

THE ROSEBUD ANNUAL.

With about 200 Illustration (Jas Clarke)

It will be a sad day for children—though happily there is no need to anticipate it—when The Rosebud Annual ceases to appear. So long established and so adequately produced an annual has already won its public, which is probably as large as it can be. But it is not until you have young children that you can realise how difficult it is to find suitable literature for them, and how completely the "Rosebud" supplies the deficiency. It is the first of all publications of its kind.

From Don Quichotte
(Siegle, Hill).

Messrs. METHUEN'S New Books

GENERAL LITERATURE

MY OWN TIMES. By LADY DOROTHY NEVILLE. Edited by her son. With a Frontispiece in Colour and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s net.

"Wherever one dips into the book something good comes to light."
[Second Edition]
Westminster Gazette

SIXTY YEARS OF A SOLDIER'S LIFE. By MAJOR GENERAL SIR ALFRED THURNER K.C.B. With Two Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s 6d net.

"A frank and attractive book of reminiscences of a varied life."
Daily Telegraph

BYRON. By I THEI COLBURN MAYN. With 2 Photographs and 16 other Illustrations. In two Volumes. Demy 8vo, 7s net.

"It is a realistic picture of the man full of lights and shadow."
Standard

FINE BOOKS. By ALFRED POLLARD. With the Engravings and 38 Plates in Colotype. Wide 10s 11s, gilt 11s 5s net.

[The Commissioners' Library]

A WANDERER IN FLORENCE. By J. A. LUCAS. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by HARRY MORLEY. 35 other Illustrations and a Map. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Acute, illuminative and admirable in artistic discernment."
Standard

"Mr. Lucas is admirable in his skilful blending of the impressions which Florence offers."
Athenaeum

A MISCELLANY OF MEN. By G. K. CHESTERTON. 12cp 8vo, gilt top 5s.

[Second Edition]

THIS AND THAT. By HILARY BELLOC. 12cp 8vo, gilt top 5s.

"Anywhere the book is good company."
Manchester Guardian

BUBBLES OF THE FOAM. By I. W. BAIN. Author of 'The Digit of the Moon'. 12cp 8vo, 3s 6d net.

"This impassioned and exquisitely worded story is charged with vigour of taking readers through a highly imaginative world."
Athenaeum

VIRGIL. By T. R. GLOVER. Fellow and Lecturer of St. John's College, Cambridge. A New Edition. Demy 8vo, 7s 6d net.

THE WINTER'S TALE. Edited by J. W. MOOKMAN. Demy 8vo, 2s 6d net.

[Fifteen Shakspeare]

MODERN PROBLEMS. By SIR OLIVER LODGE, F.R.S. Crown 8vo, 5s net.

"Live essays dealing with urgent problems."
Evening Standard

THE COMPLETE ASSOCIATION FOOTBALLER. By B. S. IVERS and C. L. HUGHES DAVIES. With 34 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 5s net.

[Complete Series]

THE CITIES OF LOMBARDY. By J. EDWARD HUTTON. With 12 Illustrations in Colour by MAXWELL ARMSTRONG and other Illustrations and a Map. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE ARMOURER AND HIS CRAFT. By CHARLES FFOULKES. With numerous Diagrams and 32 Plates. Royal 4to, gilt top, 42s net. Limited to 35 copies for Great Britain.

SIBERIA. By M. PHILLIPS PRICE. With Maps. Demy 8vo, 7s 6d net.

"A complete book dealing particularly with the commercial possibilities of the province."

HOW TO PLAY GOLF. By HARRY VARDON. With 48 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s net.

[Fourth Edition]

UNITED ITALY. By I. M. UNDERWOOD. With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s 6d net.

"An important book describing Italy of today."

"The present book represents the real Italy."
Morning Post

THE BRAVEST OF THE BRAVE: Michael Ney, Marshal of France. By A. HILLIARD ALFRED RIDGE.

With 8 Illustrations and 8 Maps. Demy 8vo, 10s 6d net.

"Mr. Atteridge's excellent monograph may be commended alike to students and to the general reader."
British Weekly

THE ENTHUSIASTS OF PORT ROYAL. By LILIAN REA. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s 6d net.

WERWOLVES. By F. H. IOTT O'DONNELL. Author of 'Some Haunted Houses of England and Wales'. Crown 8vo, 5s net.

THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF THE CONDÉS (1530-1740). By H. NOEL WILLIAMS. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s net.

PERFECT HEALTH FOR WOMEN AND CHILDREN. By J. ELIZABETH ST. OLAN CHISSLER M.B. Ch.B. Crown 8vo, 3s 6d net.

STUART LIFE AND MANNERS. By I. I. W. RYAN. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s 6d net.

THE INDIAN SCENE. By J. A. SPINDLER. Crown 8vo, 3s 6d net.

"A sober and considered criticism of Indian politics system and life which provides both stimulating and agreeable reading."
Globe

TWELVE YEARS WITH MY BOYS. C1 8vo, 3s 6d net.

"This book describes a woman's work among London boys."

"A manual of candour and sense in religious work is fascinating as a good novel."
Christian World

CARDINAL DE RICHELIEU. By LILIANOR PRICE. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s 6d net.

"A most wisely written but well equipped and vivid monograph."
World

THE OLD ENGLISH COUNTRY SQUIRE. By P. H. DITCHFIELD MA. I.S.A. With 24 Illustrations, of which 8 are in Colour. Demy 8vo, 10s 6d net.

A BOOK OF FAMOUS WITS. By WAITER JERROLD. With 12 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s 6d net.

"In this volume appear the 'sivers of good things' from the times of Tarkenton, Jonson and Taylor to those of Whistler, Wilde and Gilbert."

FICTION

LONDON LAVENDER: An Entertainment.

By I. A. LUCAS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It will freshen and sweeten any library shelf."
Manchester Courier

"Contrived with ease and tell with charm."
Pall Mall Gazette

"Alive with genuine human nature."
Daily Telegraph

"It is a novel entertainment."
Dundee Advertiser

"A book with the genuine Lucan flavour."
Daily News

"A happy and generous book."
Outlook

MANY CARGOES. By W. W. JACOBS. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by MAURICE GRILLIETH. Wide demy 8vo, 7s 6d net.

"This is an edition de luxe at an unusually moderate price."

THE HEATHER MOON. By C. N. and A. M. WILLIAMSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Another of these authors' full and fluent tales of motoring."
Fourth Edition

"With romance."
Times

"This humorous story goes swiftly to the sound of the motor horn among the dale in the hills of Scotland and never flag at all."
Daily Chronicle

THE STREET CALLED STRAIGHT.

By the author of 'The Wild Olive'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It is a charming and interesting story, and one presented with fine literary skill."
Daily Telegraph

BURIED ALIVE. By ARNOLD BENNETT. Author of 'Clayhanger'. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The story is adroitly contrived and carried through with much spirit and ingenuity."
Westminster Gazette

THE ANGLO-INDIANS. By ALICE PHERRIN. Author of 'The Chum'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"I admire particularly the skill with which she renders clear the points of view of her various characters, and still more her quiet and unaggressive method of imparting information."
Punch

THE ROYAL ROAD. By ALFRED OLIVIANI, Author of 'Owd Bob'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A book of fine originality and truth is this tale of the little London workman."
Manchester Guardian

"An exceedingly powerful piece of work."
Scotsman

MARY PECHELL. By Mrs. BELLOC LOWNDIS. Author of 'The Utmost Farthing'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It is just a simple story, admirably told of love and the country."
Bystander

THE HOLIDAY ROUND. By A. A. MILNE. Author of 'The Dicks Play'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The author gets sunlight into his pages, and his fun is real enthusiasm."
Daily News

"All who prize the gift of laughter will read this book again and again."
Dundee Advertiser

DEVOTED SPARKES. By W. PLATT RIDGL. Author of 'Thanks to Sanderson'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The book is packed with wise and brilliant things."
Standard

DARNEY PLACE. By RICHARD BAGOT, Author of 'Donna Diana'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It is a full and interesting story in which spiritualism and a Sicilian blood feud play important parts."
Daily Telegraph

THE QUEST OF THE GOLDEN ROSE. By JOHN OXFENHAM. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A fine novel of the glistening peaks of Switzerland that will hold and charm all readers."
Freeman's Journal

OLIVIA MARY. By J. MARIA ILLIANESI, Author of 'The Glad Heart'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A story of quiet interest in lot strength of feeling."
Daily Telegraph

SALLY. By DOROTHY A. CONYERS. Author of 'Two Impostors and Junk'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"It is just a breezy, exhilarating story of Irish life, and intensely amusing."
Liverpool Post

LAMORNA. By Mrs. A. SIDGWICK, Author of 'The Severins'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Mr. Sidgwick carries us breathlessly through an exciting story and keeps all our faculties on the alert."
Morning Post

THE SILVER DRESS. By Mrs. GEORGE NORMAN, Author of 'Lady Fanny'. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The Eve which opens a new world to a well-to-do clever woman is portrayed with much insight."
Times

METHUEN & CO., LTD., 36 Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.

From Gulliver's Voyages to Lilliput and Brobdingnag
(Sidgwick & Jackson).

"I HAD THREE HUNDRED COOKS TO DRESS MY VICTUALS."

THE BOY'S FROISSART.

Selected from Lord Berners' Translation of the "Chronicles," by Madelen Edgar. Illustrated. 5s. net. (Harrap.)

Miss Edgar has represented Froissart in this attractive volume with seventeen of the most gallant and heroic of his chronicles. If you have read the glorious old book, what memories of it will re-awaken in you at such chapter headings as "The Taking of Edinburgh Castle," "The Battle of Crécy," "The Siege of Calais," "The Battle of Poitiers," "At the Court of Richard II." But it is the battle stories that are the finest among these; how they grip the imagination and stir the blood, like the sound of a trumpet. Every boy who loves adventure and the colour and movement and music of old romance must needs love Froissart, if he has read him; and if he has not, here is a capital introduction for him to that world of knightly deeds and stately pageantry that Froissart has kept alive for us clasped within the magic covers of his inimitable book. The illustrations are admirable.

A NURSERY HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

By ELIZABETH O'NEILL. With many Illustrations in Colour and Black and White by George Morrow. 5s. net. (Jack.)

Here, in something under 200 pages, Miss Elizabeth O'Neill gives a complete history of England for children, from the earliest times to the coronation of King George V. It is a wonderful achievement, and we can find no fault whatever with the way in which it is done. Miss O'Neill's method is to take an incident or a character—promptly illustrated both in colour and black and white by Mr. George Morrow—and in a few short, readily comprehensible sentences to sketch out its main points of interest. The experiment was well worth making, and it has been made successfully.

OUR ISLAND SAINTS.

By AMY STEEDMAN. Illustrated in Colour by M. D. Spooner. 7s. 6d. net. (T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

This is a charming book for Sunday reading. There is no world that is more likely to appeal to the imagination of children than the world of the old saints. There is no book of golden deeds to compare with the book of saints' lives for conveying at once a sense of the mystery of life and a sense of the beauty of kindness and self-sacrifice. The present volume tells in simple language the story of the twelve most famous saints of the three kingdoms—of St. Alban and St. Edward of England, of St. Patrick and St. Bridget and St. Columcille of Ireland; of St. Cuthbert and St. Margaret of Scotland, and of St. David of Wales. Naturally, the stories are mere sketches, and do not enter

From A Nursery History of England
(Jack).

KING RICHARD OF THE LION HEART.

DO NOT MISS THIS LIST

GULLIVER'S VOYAGES to Lilliput and Brobdingnag

With 8 colour plates and over 80 drawings in the text. Printed in two colours throughout.

By P. A. STAYNES.

Large square 8vo. 6/- net.
(Ask your bookseller to show you the book.)

ROUNDABOUT WAYS

From "GULLIVER'S VOYAGES." (Greatly Reduced)

Verses by FRIDA WOLFE.
Pictures by P. A. STAYNES.
Authors of "The Orange Cat."

A charming book dealing with towns and countries, lakes and rivers, roads and mountains, from a fanciful and witty point of view. Demy 4to. 3/6.

THE GRANDEUR THAT WAS ROME

A SURVEY OF ROMAN CIVILISATION AND CULTURE.

By J. C. STOBART, M.A.

A Companion Volume to "The Glory that was Greece," issued last year—"A vivid picture of a wonderful civilisation," Profusely illustrated. 30/- net. Write for prospectus.

HISTORICAL VIGNETTES

By BERNARD CAPES.

22 of Mr. Capes' brilliant thumbnail sketches of historical characters, most of which have not been collected in book-form before. Fcap 8vo, cloth extra. 2/6 net.

JOHN MASEFIELD'S GREAT POEMS

THE EVERLASTING MERCY. (7th Impression)
THE WIDOW IN THE BYE-STREET.

Crown 8vo, 3/6 net each, cloth gilt. (2nd Impression.)

NEW FICTION

ROSEMARY & RUE. By BEATRICE STOTT.
(Author of "Rosemonde") 6/-.

THE TEMPLE ON THE HILL.

By ELSA DE SZASZ. 3/6 net.

PRIDE OF WAR.

By GUSTAF JANSON. 6/-.

UNDINE

Translated with a Critical Introduction

By EDMUND GOSSE, C.B.

With a Photogravure Frontispiece by W. E. F. BRITTEN.
Crown 8vo, cloth extra. 2/6 net.

1/-
net.

THE NEW CHILD'S GUIDE TO KNOWLEDGE

1/-
net.

By LAURENCE HOUSMAN.

A popular reprint with all the original illustrations.

PLAYS

HINDLE WAKES. By STANLEY HOUGHTON.

Cloth, 2/- net; paper, 1/6 net.

RUTHERFORD & SON. By GITHA SOWERBY.

Cloth, 2/6 net; paper, 1/6 net.

MARY BROOME. By ALLAN MONKHOUSE

Cloth, 2/- net; paper, 1/6 net.

THE NEW SIN. By B. MACDONALD HASTINGS.

Cloth, 2/- net; paper, 1/- net.

LOVE—AND WHAT THEN? By B. MACDONALD HASTINGS. Cloth, 2/- net; paper, 1/- net

SIDGWICK & JACKSON,
LONDON, W.C.

ALL AMERICAN & FOREIGN BOOKS AND PUBLICATIONS

may be obtained from

WM. DAWSON & SONS

LTD.,

Cannon House, Breems Bldgs.
London, E.C.

who specialize in supplying all English and foreign newspapers and periodicals at Publishers' rates.

The following journals are issued by them simultaneously with their publication in America:—

LIFE (New York) Weekly 6d.

JUDGE „ „ 6d.

LESLIE'S WEEKLY „ 6d.

SATURDAY

EVENING POST „ 3d.

Also

THE LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.

MONTHLY. ONE SHILLING.

These may be obtained through all Newsagents and Booksellers, or direct from . .

WM. DAWSON & SONS

LTD.,

Cannon House, Breems Bldgs.
LONDON, E.C.

Fetter Lane; 121, Cannon Street;

Northumberland Avenue;

S. Africa:

Cape Town, Durban, Johannesburg;

Canada: 91, Church Street, Toronto.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

THE OXFORD BOOK OF VICTORIAN VERSE.

Chosen by Sir ARTHUR QUILLER-COUCH. In Two Editions. Crown 8vo, 6s. net; f'cap 8vo, on Oxford India Paper, 7s. 6d. net. Also in leather bindings at higher prices.

Uniform with the Oxford Book of English Verse and the Oxford Book of Ballads by the same Editor.

THE OXFORD BOOK OF LATIN VERSE.

From the earliest fragments to the end of the Vth Century A.D. Chosen by H. W. GARROD. F'cap 8vo, containing 384 Pieces, with 51 English Translations and Imitations, an Introduction and Notes. 6s. net; on Oxford India Paper, 7s. 6d. net. Also in leather bindings at higher prices.

Uniform with the Oxford Books of French, German, and Italian Verse.

ESSAYS AND STUDIES BY MEMBERS OF THE ENGLISH ASSOCIATION.

Vol. III. (G. MURRAY, A. A. JACK, J. W. MACKAIL, T. S. OMOND, B. W. RANNIE, G. SAINTSBURY, H. C. BEECHING.) Collected by W. P. KER. 8vo, 5s. net.

ENGLISH LITERATURE AND THE CLASSICS.

(GILBERT MURRAY, J. A. STEWART, G. S. GORDON, J. S. PHILLIMORE, A. C. CLARK, H. W. GARROD, S. G. OWEN, R. J. E. TIDY, A. D. GODLEY.) Collected by G. S. GORDON. 8vo, 6s. net.

OXFORD ENGLISH TEXTS.

NEW VOLUMES.

THE POEMS OF JOHN DONNE.

Edited from old editions and numerous manuscripts, with Introductions and Commentary by F. J. C. GRIERSON. Two volumes, 8vo, with three portraits and numerous facsimiles of title-pages and musical settings. 18s. net.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.

Including Poems and Versions of Poems now published for the first time. Edited, with Textual and Bibliographical Notes, by E. H. COLERIDGE. In two vols. 8vo. Vol. I. Poems. Vol. II. Dramatic Works and Appendices. 16s. net.

THE WORKS OF GEORGE SAVILE, MARQUESS OF HALIFAX.

Edited by Sir WALTER RALEIGH. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE POEMS AND MASKS OF AURELIAN TOWNSHEND.

Edited by E. K. CHAMBERS. 5s. net.

[Oxford Tudor and Stuart Library.]

EARLY ENGLISH CLASSICAL TRAGEDIES.

Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by J. W. CUNLIFFE. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

COMPANION TO ROMAN HISTORY.

By H. STUART JONES. With many Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. 8vo, 15s. net.

THE OXFORD POETS.

Large crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.; on Oxford India Paper, from 5s. Each volume contains a Photogravure Portrait.

NEW VOLUMES NOW READY.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.

Including Poems and Versions of Poems now published for the first time. Edited, with Textual and Biographical Notes, by E. H. COLERIDGE.

POEMS OF JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

Containing the Vision of Sir Launfal, A Fable for Critics, The Biglow Papers, Under the Willows, and other Poems.

POETICAL WORKS OF ROBERT BRIDGES.

Excluding the eight Dramas.

THE RING AND THE BOOK, BY ROBERT BROWNING.

With an Introduction by EDWARD DOWDEN, and 4 Facsimiles.

The above may also be had in

THE OXFORD EDITIONS OF STANDARD AUTHORS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net each, as well as the following New Volumes:—

CHAUCER. Edited by the late Prof. W. W. SKELTON.

ADAM LINDSAY GORDON'S POEMS.

KINGSLEY'S 'HEREWARD THE WAKE.'

THE PAGEANT OF ENGLISH PROSE.

Edited by R. M. LEONARD. Uniform with 'The Pageant of English Poetry.'

OXFORD LIBRARY OF PROSE AND POETRY.

Uniform Volumes, f'cap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net each; lambskin, thin boards, gilt extra, 3s. 6d. net each.

NEW VOLUMES.

MORGANN'S ESSAY ON THE DRAMATIC CHARACTER OF SIR JOHN FALSTAFF.

Printed in Type-Facsimile from the First Edition, 1777. With an Introduction by W. A. GILL.

THE TOSA DIARY OF KI NO TSURAYUKI.

Translated from the Japanese by W. N. PORTER.

THE OXFORD MOMENT SERIES.

Six New Volumes, making 30 volumes in all, 6d. net, cloth, 1s. net, in leather, silk, or parchment.

NEW VOLUMES.

BROWNING'S PIED PIPER AND OTHER POEMS; HERRICK; CHRISTINA ROSSETTI;

D. G. ROSSETTI; RUSKIN'S MYSTERY OF LIFE AND ITS ARTS; ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

TENNYSON'S POEMS 1830-1870.

With an Introduction by T. HERBERT WARREN. With 91 Illustrations by ROSSETTI, MILLAIS, MULREADY, MACLISE, CLARKSON STANFIELD, and others, and Two Pictures in Colour after G. F. WATTS, Tennyson's Portrait and "Sir Galahad." Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

CHINESE POEMS.

Translated by CHARLES BUDD. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

KING BLACKSACK AND HIS SWORD.

Strange Tales for Children. By C. L. STAINER. With 20 Illustrations by C. W. PILCHER. Small 4to. 3s. 6d. net.

COMPLETE CATALOGUE (160 PAGES) POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THE BOOKMAN. CHRISTMAS 1912

into controversial matters. Thus, Miss Steedman makes St. Patrick a Scotsman of Dumbarton, whereas most authorities give the neighbourhood of Boulogne as his birthplace, and Professor Bury believes he was born near the shores of the Severn. Many young readers will be interested to learn that "Taffy," as the name for a Welshman, is a corruption of the name of the Welsh national saint. St. Augustine of Canterbury is naturally included in the volume, and the other "island saints" are St. Molios, St. Kentigern, and St. Hugh of Lincoln. The book is charmingly and decoratively illustrated with eight full-page colour plates.

ROBIN HOOD AND THE MEN OF THE GREENWOOD.

By HENRY GILBERT. With 16 Illustrations in Colour by Walter Crane. 7s. 6d. net. (Jack)

For his material Mr. Henry Gilbert has gone principally to the older ballads dealing with Robin Hood, but he informs us in his preface that he has also invented scenes and incidents for himself. The latter is a good deal less of a liberty than it sounds, for it must be remembered that in the casting of his chapters Mr. Gilbert has relied upon nobody's invention but his own, and the whole manner of the writing is his, and his only. Anyhow, he has written or compiled a bravely spirited book—one that will delight the heart of every boy and girl that reads it. Mr. Crane proves once again that his hand has not lost its cunning. His illustrations are full of colour, fanciful and humorous in conception, and have a good deal of the decorative effect of a piece of mediæval tapestry.

From Our Island Saints
(Jack).

"ONE BY ONE SHE FED EACH LITTLE ORPHAN WITH HER OWN GOLDEN SPOON."

From A Nursery History of England
(Jack).

ROBIN HOOD AND THE SHERIFF OF NOTTINGHAM.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

A CHILD'S BOOK OF WARRIORS.

By WILLIAM CANTON Illustrated by Herbert Cole 5s
(J. M. Dent & Sons)

There is always something fascinating about those warriors of ancient times whose heroic doings have cast a glamour over the past. In "A Child's Book of Warriors" Mr William Canton tells a series of thrilling tales of the gallant men who fought and conquered in the world of long ago. Even among heroes the name of Balt the Attacot shines out prominently for the splendid courage which made him willing to sacrifice his life rather than betray the trust which had been placed in him. At the time of the persecution of Diocletian, when war was raging against the Christians of Britain, Balt was charged to carry into safety Marcus, the little son of Prince Lucias. In holding the enemy back from following in the wake of the child he was struck by a spear, and lay for many years on the moors of Yorkshire "alive, yet not living, kept apart in a trance of being from the illimitable life that follows death." There and thus Marcus found him and beheld him surrender himself to the Lord at last. The book is rich in great legends and tells of noble and valorous deeds of the golden ages of romance. Mr Canton writes as one who has felt the charm and been taken with the poetry of these old-world heroisms, and he gathers all the charm and all the beauty of them up into the delightful simplicity of his manner of narrating them. It is an ideal gift-book for children: the colour pictures are exceptionally good, and it is very tastefully produced.

A GIRL WAS SINGING HALF-HIDDEN AMONG THE BRIGHT GREEN LEAVES OF THE TREES AND THE PRINCE CHECKED HIS HORSE TO LISTEN TO HER.

From A Child's Book of Warriors
(Dent)

JOLLY CALLE, AND OTHER SWEDISH FAIRY TALES.

By HJERNA NYBLOM With 8 Illustrations in Colours and 7 in Black and White and End Papers by Charles Folkard 5s net (Dent)

Whether or not children are obsessed with the longing for foreign art that is at present the fashion among their elders (as witness among many other things, modern concert and music-hall programmes), we believe that they are always ready to welcome good fairy stories. They get them in "Jolly Calle." The tales which comprise this volume are, it seems to us, exactly of the kind to appeal to children and they possess also a tang of strangeness given them by the Swedish setting, which is just sufficiently novel to be attractive. The tales are written in admirable English—whether that of the author herself or of a translator we cannot say. And Mr Folkard's illustrations are well worthy of that excellent artist.

PEGGY FROM KERRY

By L. T. MEADE With Coloured Illustrations by A. Anderson 6s (W & R Chambers)

Mrs Wyndham, a kind Lady Bountiful with a streak of worldliness in her, actually burst into tears when she realised that her husband was determined to go to Ireland and bring back with him the orphan daughter of his chief friend, a girl who had been running wild in an Irish cabin among Irish peasants. Peggy from Kerry comes into the gentle English household, and consternation reigns there in consequence. "Wurra," and "bedad" drop from her

From Jolly Calle
(Dent).

"CUT OFF THE VERY LAST WHITE TUFT OF HAIR."

FROM Messrs. JOHN OUSELEY'S AUTUMN LIST.

GENERAL.

AMERICA, OLD AND NEW. Prof. J. Nelson Fraser, M.A.

Punch says: "I have read very few books so free from prejudice. . . . It is packed with interesting facts." 7/6 net.

AN ENGLISHWOMAN IN GERMANY. Leonora Fairweather. 2/6 net.

"If this volume had not been published the loss would have been to the reading public."—Manchester Courier.

THE ENGLISH STAGE. D. E. Oliver. 1/6 net.

(2nd large Edition.)
The Athenaeum (in a two-column review) says: "May be commended as a model told correctly and succinctly."

THE SOUL OF JUDAS. Douglas Price, M.A. 2/- net.

"A delicacy of touch and charm of expression endow these allegories with more than passing interest."—Athenaeum.

HUMOUR OF SCIENCE. H. Armytage, LL.D., &c. 3/6 net.

"Should merit many readers."—Yorkshire Post.

JUST READY.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF NIETZSCHE: An Exposition and an Appreciation. G. Chatterton-Hill, Ph.D. 7/6 net.

FICTION (6/-).

SUSSEX OAK. Lewis Lusk.

"Good all through—a book to be read and remembered."—Pall Mall

BOADICEA. C. H. Dudley Ward.

"A strenuous and graphic tale with an amazingly virile heroine in the Queen."—Times.

IDINA'S LOVER. Capt. Henry Curties.

"A rattling story."—Daily Express.

UNTIL THAT DAY. Harold Wintle.

"Genuine ideals and large humanities."—Westminster Gazette

OUR NANCE. W. Braunston Jones.

"A thoroughly interesting story."—Sunday Times

TRUNKLES. S. H. Sadler. (2/- net.)

"A human story."—Liverpool Daily Courier

THE HOUSE OF THE KAID. John Finnemore.

"Always spirited and enjoyable."—Scotsman

THE MODERN HELOISE. Alfred Buchanan.

"Serious and well written novel into which much thought has been put."—Times.

DOROTHY GAYLE. Editha L. Blaikley.

"A fresh wholesome story in which the characters have life and interest"

SEND FOR COMPLETE LIST.

JOHN OUSELEY, Ltd.,

6, FLEET LANE, FARRINGTON STREET, LONDON, E.C.

W. HEFFER & SON'S, Ltd., PUBLICATIONS

DIVORCE PROBLEMS OF TO-DAY.

By F. S. P. HAYNES. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net. (Postage 3d.)
This book is by a writer who has for nearly ten years deeply concerned himself in the now growing agitation for sweeping reforms in the divorce law of England in its national, imperial and international aspects.

THE STORY OF THE CAMBRIDGE BAPTISTS and THE STRUGGLE FOR RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

By BERNARD NUTTER, M.A. Cr. 6vo, cloth illustrated, 2s. 6d. net. (Postage 4d.)
This book presents a brief and popular account of the rise and progress of the Baptists in the town and county of Cambridge to the beginning of the Nineteenth Century.

VOICE PRODUCTION WITH THE AID OF PHONETICS.

By CHARLES MACAN RICE, M.A. Chaplain of King's College, Cambridge
Crown 8vo, boards, 1s. 6d. net. (Postage 2d.)
" . . . A valuable text-book."—Medical Review.
" . . . Scientific in method and practical in treatment."—The Stage.
"We heartily commend this book."—Jewish World.

STONEGROUND GHOST TALES.

By E. G. SWAIN. 3s. 6d. (Postage 4d.)
Read what the Reviewers say:—
"The man with the roller is one of the best ghost stories we have ever read."—Englishwoman.
"Excellent entertainment for a leisure hour."—Daily News. "If it contains a dull page it has escaped us."—Pall Mall Gazette. "The reader who has no great liking for ordinary tales of the supernatural will, in spite of himself, appreciate these."—Nottingham Guardian.

NATURALISM OR IDEALISM? (The Nobel Lecture.)

By RUDOLF EUCKEN, Professor of Philosophy, University of Jena. Translated with an Introduction by ALBAN G. WIDGERY, M.A. Demy 8vo, sewed, 1s. net. (Postage 1d.)
"An admirable epitome of Prof. Eucken's philosophy."—Athenaeum.

BIBLICAL HISTORY FOR JUNIOR FORMS, OLD TESTAMENT.

By Canon FOAKES-JACKSON, D.D. Crown 8vo, 2s. pp., Maps, Tables, and Summaries, 2s. 6d. (Postage 4d.)
"This is a workmanlike volume, compact and admirably proportioned."—Athenaeum

BRITISH VIOLETS.

A Monograph by Mrs. E. S. GREGORY, with an Introduction by G. CLARIDGE DRUCE, M.A., F.L.S. Royal 8vo, numerous illustrations, 6s. net. (Postage 4d.)

A Charming Book of Selections—it forms an admirable present.

A MEDLEY OF BIRTHDAYS.

Collected by E. F. A. B. (Miss BAUMGARTNER) With a short memoir of the compiler by Miss D. J. STEPHEN.
Cr. 8vo, cloth, decorative title page, 380 pp. (Postage 4d.) 3s. net.

THE STORY OF NEWNHAM COLLEGE.

By I. B. J. SOLLAS, Staff Lecturer of Newnham College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, sewed, illustrations 6d. net. (Postage 1d.)

Cambridge: W. HEFFER & SON'S, Ltd.

London Agents: Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd.; and from all Booksellers.

MR. FIFIELD'S NEW LIST

BY GREVILLE
MAC-DONALD
M.D.

TRYSTIE'S QUEST: or Kit,

King of the Pigwidgeons. A Fairy Tale. With cover design, title page, and 30 delightful pictures. By ARTHUR HUGHES. Large octavo, cloth, 5s. net. Postage 4d.

The Irish Independent says: "This is a book in which the children will revel, and the wonderful people who figure in its pages will hold the youthful reader's attention all the time."

The Oxford Chronicle says: "One does not often in these days get such charming imaginative art as in the pictures here produced. The volume ought to enjoy high favour among the gift books of the year."

The Irish Homestead says: "The author, Greville MacDonald (a son of George MacDonald, that weaver of fine spiritual romances), understands children, enters into, with the most tender and delightful humour, the childish capacity for endowing the inanimate things that surround it, with life."

THE MAGIC CROOK, or

The Stolen Baby. A Fairy Tale. With 62 pictures and cover design by ARTHUR HUGHES. Cloth extra, large octavo, 5s. net. Postage 4d.

The Bookman says: "Dr. MacDonald's fantasy will set imaginative children laughing with delight."

THE Christmas
Books for Children this Year
5s. each, net.

BY PETER ROSEGGER

With an Appreciation, Biographical Sketch, and Portrait
2s. net.

THE FOREST FARM.

Tales of the Austrian Tyrol. Cloth, 2s. net. Postage 3d.

The Manchester Guardian says: "Without exception, the stories are very beautiful, as fine as Bjornson in his early manner. . . . He is sincere and his emotions are always pure and true. He leads us to his own childhood, and we do not ask to be led anywhere else."

The Irish Independent says: "Written in beautiful yet simple language, they convey a vivid picture of the author's early life in his forest home and the traditions and customs of his brave peasant people."

BY MARY ARGYLE TAYLOR
1s. 6d. net.

DELFINA OF THE DOLPHINS.

A Story of Modern Rome. Blue boards, deckle edge paper, 1s. 6d. net. Postage 2d.

The Times says: "A charming little story of the inner life of Rome."

"A pretty, well told tale."—Field.

The Western Daily Press says: "Really a most charming and poetic story. It has the true Italian atmosphere of love and beauty, passion and pain."

BY MAUDE ECERTON
KING
6s.

THE COUNTRY HEART, and other Stories.

Cloth gilt, 320 pp., 6s.
The British Weekly says: "It is not only able, it is sweet and refreshing, and brimming over with interest."

The Nation says: "This is a book for any season and any age."

HOW THE CHILDREN MET THE

THREE KINGS. A children's play, 4d. Postage 3d.

A Christmas play for nine children and adults, for school or home acting.

BY ETHEL M.
GATE
1s. 6d. net.

THE BROOM FAIRIES, and other

Stories. Decorated brown boards, deckle edge paper, 1s. 6d. net. Postage 2d.

The publisher strongly recommends these delightful old style fairy tales by a new writer to any parent or friend looking for an inexpensive but really good book.

"They are really well told, full of pretty fancy, and they attract and hold the attention from start to finish."—Field.

BY SAMUEL
BUTLER
6s. net.

THE NOTE-BOOKS OF SAMUEL

BUTLER, author of "Erewhon" and "The Way of all Flesh" With portrait, poems and index. 6s. net. Postage 4d.

The publication of these private unpublished notes is a literary event of the first importance. Butler's note-books are not only a commentary on the 19th century of consummate humour, but an autobiography of extraordinary intimacy and interest as well.

BY
Dr. LIONEL
TAYLER

THE NATURE OF WOMAN.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. net. Postage 3d.

"Dr. Tayler approaches the subject mainly as a biologist deeply convinced of the fundamental differences between man and woman which must always keep their spheres diverse."—The Times.

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 13, Clifford's Inn, E.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

lips almost every time she opens them; she eats with her fingers, and would far rather wash a floor than wash her own hands. But Peggy is one of the right sort in spite of her embarrassing behaviour, and when she goes to the fashionable school with the Wyndham girls she makes friends as well as enemies, and succeeds in righting wrong in a most Peggy-like and uncompromising way. Mrs. Meade has been writing stories for girls long enough for her early readers now to be possessors of nurseries and schoolrooms of their own, but the stories have lost none of their spirit and charm, their author has lost nothing of her knowledge and skill. The secret is—she has kept her heart young, and the readers feel that she knows and understands their tastes and their thoughts. "Peggy from Kerry" is a handsome book, beautifully illustrated, and the story is long and enthralling and full of freshness and vitality.

THE MAGIC WORLD.

By E. NESBIT. 6s. (Macmillan & Co.)

Christmas would scarcely seem Christmas to many children nowadays, unless it brought with it another of E. Nesbit's charming stories. "The Magic World" is composed of a number of short tales which will delight the heart of every boy or girl who is fortunate enough to secure a copy. There is something so weirdly fascinating about magic—real magic—and of course there could be no greater authority on the subject than E. Nesbit. What she does not know about it is really not worth knowing. Astonishingly wonderful things happen to the young hero and heroines who wander through her magic world. Yet the tales are so skilfully told that the various events—however unusual they may be—seem perfectly real and natural and are altogether convincing. For instance there is the remarkable case of Maurice Basingstokes who through unkindness to a cat gets turned into a cat himself, and there is Quentin de Ward who runs away from school and discovers accidental magic, and Kenneth who becomes a fish, and the princess who kisses the hedge-pig, and all the other ordinary and extraordinary folks whose surprising adventures will bring happiness to hundreds of young people this Christmas. E. Nesbit's works are too well known and too well liked for readers to need assuring that "The Magic World" is quite one of the healthiest and most delightfully entertaining books any boy or girl could wish for.

From Peggy from Kerry
(Chambers).

"THERE WAS THE IMP LOOKING AT HER FROM OVER THE BALUSTERS."

THE SEA MONARCH.

By PERCY F. WESTERMAN. With 12 Illustrations by E. S. Hodgson. 3s. 6d. (Black.)

Gerald Tregarthen, an officer in the Navy, and his friend Stockton have decided to spend one of the former's holidays cruising in a small yacht, and they propose first to cross the Channel. Half-way across they are run down by a mysterious and remarkable battleship, and are providentially rescued. The warship is the Olive Branch, the Sea Monarch of the title, a ship so powerful and so unusual that nothing can stand against it. The captain intends to stop war and warlike preparations, or let the offending nation know the reason why. How he does this, and what success attends his efforts, make up the plot of Mr. Westerman's latest book—a good rousing story of a type that is always popular with boys, for boys are always taken with the personality of a strong and masterful man, and the captain of the Sea Monarch is a masterful man of the most thrilling description. We must add a word of special praise for Mr. E. S. Hodgson's spirited drawings.

From The Magic World
(Macmillan).

"IT LANDED ON THE POINT OF THE CHIN OF SMITHSON MAJOR."

From JOHN LONG'S NEW LIST

GENERAL LITERATURE

THE VICEROYS OF IRELAND

By CHARLES O'MAHONY With Photogravure and numerous other Portraits and Illustrations Demy 8vo. 16s. net.
The First Complete History of the Viceroys.

SENSATIONS OF PARIS

By ROWLAND STRONG, Author of "Where and How to Dine in Paris," &c With upwards of 60 Illustrations typical of Paris life. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net

LORDS AND LADIES OF THE ITALIAN LAKES

By EDGUMBE STALEY. With Coloured Frontispiece and numerous Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

THROUGH DANTE'S LAND: Impressions in Tuscany

By Mrs. COLQUHOUN GRANT, Author of "Brittany to Whitehall," &c. Photogravure and 32 Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo 12s. 6d. net

PHEASANTS: In Covert and Aviary

By FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S. With 4 Coloured Plates from Life by H. GRONVOLD, and numerous other Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 4to. 10s. 6d. net. (Prospectus, with Coloured Plate, post free)

HOME EXERCISE AND HEALTH: Five Minutes' Care to the Nerves

The Rational System of Exercising for Health rather than mere Strength By PERCIVAL G. MASTERS, B.A. Cantab. With 32 Illustrations Crown 8vo. Cloth, 144 pages. 2s. 6d. net (Illustrated prospectus post free.)
A System of Exercises devised to promote health and not muscle development only. It particularly aims at building up the nervous system

KING RENÉ D'ANJOU AND HIS SEVEN QUEENS

By EDGUMBE STALEY, Author of "The Doge's of Venice," "Tragedies of the Medici," &c. With Coloured Frontispiece and numerous Portraits. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

PONIES AND ALL ABOUT THEM

By FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

COMPOSERS, IN LOVE AND MARRIAGE

By J. CUTHBERT HADDEN, Author of "Chopin," "Haydn," "The Operas of Richard Wagner," etc. With Photogravure and numerous Portraits and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 12s. 6d. net.

HOUNDS: Their Points and Management

By FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S. With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

GUN DOGS

By FRANK TOWNEND BARTON, M.R.C.V.S., Author of "Terriers: their Points and Management." With numerous Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

KING CHARLES I.: a Study

By WALTER PHELPS DODGE, Author of "The Crescent Moon," etc With Frontispiece Portrait. Crown 8vo. Price 1s. 6d. net.

CÉLINE: A True Story of the French Revolution

Translated from the French of Mdlle. V. de Regnier by FRANCES ELIZABETH FISHBOURNE. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

GOLF FOR THE LATE BEGINNER

By HENRY HUGHES (One of Them). With 32 Illustrations from Photographs specially taken for the work. Fcap. 8vo. 1s. net.

FICTION Crown 8vo. 6/-

LEVITY HICKS

THE LIGHT-BEARERS

BEYOND THE HILLS

MARY IN THE MARKET

QUEER LITTLE JANE

THE GATE OPENERS

THE TWO RIVERS

LEFT IN CHARGE

THE SLEEPING VILLAGE

THINGS AS THEY ARE Mrs. E. K. Williamson

THE BAD LORD LOCKINGTON

A YEAR WITHOUT A CHAPERONE

THE ULTIMATE CONCLUSION

Tom Gallon

M. Sylvestre

Maibey Whittington

H. Maxwell

Curtis Yorke

K. L. Montgomery

Ernest E. Briggs

Victor L. Whitechurch

Julia Neville

Mrs. E. K. Williamson

Florence Warden

Elsie M. Cawthorne

A. C. Fox-Davies

TWO CAN PLAY

OUR ALTY

M. E. Francis (Mrs. Francis Blundell)

THE IMPENITENT PRAYER Amy J. Baker

THE BARTENSTEIN CASE J. S. Fletcher

STEPHEN ORMOND F. Dickberry

THE TERRIBLE CHOICE Stephen Foreman

THE STORM-DOG Lilian Arnold

AFFAIRS OF MEN D. C. F. Harding

THE MODERN MARKET-PLACE By Coronet

THE ORDEAL OF SILENCE By a Peer

THE SPINSTER Hubert Wales

THE WASTER Mrs. Henry Tippet

MY ESCAPES By a Bachelor

THE WOMAN BETWEEN Edmund Bosanquet

PILLARS OF SMOKE Mrs. Stanley Wrench

Kindly write for John Long's General Catalogue, Just Out. It is a most interesting production.

LONDON: JOHN LONG, LTD., 12, 13, & 14, NORRIS STREET, HAYMARKET

THE BOOKMAN
CHRISTMAS 1912

From Robin Hood
(Jack).

ROBIN HOOD AND THE CURTALL FRIAR.

THE BIG BOOK OF FABLES.

Edited by Walter Jerrold and Illustrated by Charles Robinson. 7s. 6d. net. (Blackie.)

Mr. Walter Jerrold has had a very large and very varied store to draw upon for his "Big Book of Fables," and he has drawn upon it freely but with excellent discrimination. A delightfully entertaining selection of the wise, witty, humorous old fables that have been part of the common inheritance of nursery wisdom and merriment for ever so many generations are here brought together in one large and beautifully produced volume, finely and lavishly illustrated by Mr. Charles Robinson. There are fables in verse and prose, and of almost all lengths; but the longest of them is not long, for your good fable must be terse and pointed and go off with a quick, sharp snap, and these are the cream of all the best that have been written of this kind. Mr. Charles Robinson's pictures are an especial pleasure; the fables have given him scope for exercising both the grace and the humour of his versatile genius, and he has made the fullest and happiest use of it.

CAMP-FIRE TALES:

A Book of Stirling Episodes Collected from the Works of Mighty Hunters. With 24 Illustrations in Colour by Edwin Noble. 6s. net. (Nelson.)

Every boy likes a good story of sport, and here is a collection of some thirty or forty of the best. The authors of the excerpts of which the book is composed are almost all mighty hunters—one sees the names of such as Theodore Roosevelt, F. C. Selous, Captain F. D. Lugard, Sir Samuel Baker, Fridtjof Nansen, W. A. Bailhe-Grohman, Paul B. du Chaillu, and many others. The episodes described, we are informed, have all actually happened. They have taken place in all parts of the world, and they include adventures with every description of large and savage animal. For Mr. Edwin Noble's illustrations we have nothing but praise. He has already given us a taste of his quality in other books, but we honestly believe that he has never done better work than in "Camp-Fire Tales." Altogether a fine, stirring book, and one which should be in great request during this Christmas, and, indeed, through the rest of the year, for any season is a good season for a good book.

From The Sea Monarch
(Black).

"SEATED UP TO HIS WAIST IN THE WATER WAS THE AVIATOR, GLAD IN A PARTIALLY INFLATED SUIT."

MAUNSEL'S NEW BOOKS.

THE BEGINNINGS OF MODERN IRELAND (1533-1558).

By PHILIP WILSON. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.
 "Mr. Wilson writes with the calm and patience of the inquirer into causes and effects."—Daily News.
 "Mr. Wilson's book is one of great value—a fair and judicial statement of the facts of the English re-conquest of Ireland."—Athenæum.

Prospectus on application.

LIFE IN THE WEST OF IRELAND.

Drawn and Painted by JACK B. YEATS.
 Large 8vo. 5s. net.

Special edition with an original sketch on fly leaf, limited to 150 signed copies. 21s. net.

Scenes in Irish country towns, seaports, at fairs and on the race-courses; and types of farmers, sailors, jockeys and showmen, drawn in Mr. Yeats' inimitable style.

GREEN DAYS AND BLUE DAYS.

By PATRICK R. CHALMERS.
 F'cap 8vo. Cloth. 3s. 6d. net.

A selection from the brilliant series of this Author's sport and nature poems, which has been a feature of Punch for several years.

NEW POEMS.

By DORA SIGERSON SHORTER.
 F'cap 8vo. 1s. net.

"Mrs. Shorter needs no introduction by now. She has taken her place among the singers of England, and it is a high one."—The New Witness.

AGNUS DEI.

Poems by NANCY CAMPBELL.
 Frontispiece by JOSEPH CAMPBELL. Wrapper. 6d. net.

THE HILL OF VISION. Poems.

By JAMES STEPHENS.

Author of "Insurrections," "The Charwoman's Daughter," and "The Crock of Gold." Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

"He has this in common with the greatest poets, that it is impossible to imagine what he has said, said otherwise."—Evening Standard.

POEMS.

By SEUMAS O'SULLIVAN. With Portrait. 3s. 6d. net.
 "Not one among our younger poets has maintained a high level of achievement so consistently as Mr. Seumas O'Sullivan. . . . No modern poet possesses a more intensely penetrative imagination than Mr. O'Sullivan. He sees, but he also sees through."—The Irish Times.
 "Tremulous with Celtic beauty and passion."—James Douglass in The Star.

ETAIN THE BELOVED.

By JAMES H. COUSINS.
 Crown 8vo. With Portrait. 3s. 6d. net.

"In Mr. Cousins' 'Etain the Beloved' we notice at times the same radiant simplicity as there is in the 'Faery Queen'—and very nearly the same solidity. . . . It is a poem worthy of the name, passionate, musical and wise. It is the work of a man who thinks and who sets others thinking."—The Times Literary Supplement.

THOMAS ANDREWS, SHIPBUILDER.

The Story of his Life by SHAN F. BULLOCK.
 With an Introduction by SIR HORACE PLUNKETT.
 Cloth, 1s. net. Quarter leather, 3s. 6d. net.

"Surely a hero if ever there was one."—Westminster Gazette.

J. M. SYNGE'S WORKS.

"J. M. Synge is, perhaps, the one of the few authors of this generation of whom it may be confidently urged that his work will live."—The Times Literary Supplement.

Pocket Edition.

Eight Volumes, F'cap 8vo, quarter parchment, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net each. The set in box, 20s. net, or 4 Vols. of Plays, in case, 10s. net. 4 Vols. Prose and Poems, in case, 10s. net.

Vol. I. THE PLAYBOY OF THE WESTERN WORLD

Vol. II. DEIRDRE OF THE SORROWS.

Vol. III. THE WELL OF THE SAINTS.

Vol. IV. THE TINKER'S WEDDING, RIDERS TO THE SEA, and IN THE SHADOW OF THE GLEN.

New Volumes just added.

Vol. V. POEMS AND TRANSLATIONS.

Vols. VI. and VII. THE ARAN ISLANDS.

Vol. VIII. IN WICKLOW AND WEST KERRY.

"Well printed and bound with attractive dignity, the edition is worthy of the author's genius."—Evening Standard.

"The outward form of the volumes could hardly be more tasteful or attractive."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The printing and binding of the book are exceedingly attractive."—Glasgow Herald.

Library Edition.

A Uniform Edition in Five Volumes. Large Crown 8vo. Finely printed on antique paper. These Volumes are sold separately bound in Cloth Gilt, gilt top. When Complete Sets are ordered they can be supplied, if desired, in Buckram Binding without extra charge.

TWO PLAYS: The Playboy of the Western World and Deirdre of the Sorrows.

5s. net.

FOUR PLAYS: The Shadow of the Glen, Riders to the Sea, The Well of the Saints, and The Tinker's Wedding.

5s. net.

IN WICKLOW, WEST KERRY, AND CONNEMARA.

With Drawings by JACK B. YEATS. 6s. net.

THE ARAN ISLANDS.

With Drawings by JACK B. YEATS. 6s. net.

POEMS AND TRANSLATIONS.

3s. 6d. net.

Complete Catalogue Post Free on Application.

MAUNSEL & CO., LTD., 96, Mid Abbey Street, Dublin; Oakley House, Bloomsbury Street, London, W.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

From The Seashore
(Grant Richards).

OCTOPUS SWIMMING.

THE SEASHORE: A BOOK FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

By F. MARTIN DUNCAN, F.R.M.S., F.R.P.S. With 112 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. 6s. (Grant Richards.)

Mr. Duncan's book does something to bring back summer to us. It is designed as a companion for children upon their annual holiday at the seaside, and as such we can think of few books more acceptable. The author touches upon every aspect of his subject, from shells to geological formations, and he also introduces his readers to the inhabitants of tidal pools. The book is written in a style which is at once easy to understand, and designed to attract and hold the attention of the reader, while the illustrations are all exceedingly good.

THE STORY WITHOUT AN END.

By SARAH AUSTIN. From the German of Carové. Illustrated by Frank C Papé. 5s. net. (Duckworth.)

The best of the story is that you don't want it to have an end—it is that sort of story. It is the story of a child who lived in a little hut that had nothing in it but a little bed, and a looking-glass which hung in a dark corner. And if you are the kind of child you ought to be when you come upon a tale that begins like that you know you are going to like it, and you go on reading till you find out why the child left the hut and how he came to think no more of going back to it; and though in a manner of speaking it has no end, in another manner of speaking it has, for you reach a last page in due course and wish you had not; and then because of the charm and sweetness of it all you turn back and start to read it all over again, for it is much too good to be read only once. A fanciful, pretty, dream-like story, and if we tried to describe Mr. Papé's delightful colour pictures we should have to repeat the same words concerning them. It is a book for children, all about a child, and children will be fascinated by it.

BLACK EVANS.

By R. S. WARREN BELL.
Illustrated. 3s. 6d. (Black.)

Among modern writers of school stories none is more prolific or more readable than Mr. R. S. Warren Bell, whose work has a sparkle and gaiety about it which has already proved irresistible to more boys than we should care to number. In his latest book, dealing with the establishment of a new school on the remains of two old ones, Mr. Warren Bell shows his usual sureness of touch in the handling of situations beloved of every boy reader. Probably the latter will not at first be drawn to the hero of his new story, who originally appears, it must be confessed, as a somewhat sulky youth; but first appearances are notoriously deceptive, and by the time the end of the book is reached the reader will probably have had to change his earlier judgments. "Black Evans" is a good, rollicking school story which is certain to be popular. Mr. Warren Bell knows the boy mind, and he has a delightfully quaint vein of humour that is welcome to a reader—man and boy alike.

From The Story without an End
(Duckworth).

THE CHILD TRIES TO CATCH THE STAR.

Seeley, Service & Co Ltd

Founded 1795

EDINBURGH. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

With 24 Illustrations in colour by JAMES HERON. Crown 4to. Printed by T. & A. Constable, of Edinburgh. Ordinary Edition, 12s. 6d. net. EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 375 copies, printed on unbleached Arnold hand-made paper, and bound in buckram, with paper label, each copy numbered, 25s. net.

"An ideal gift book."—Graphic.
"A sumptuous setting for this well-known work."—Independent,
"A sumptuous setting for this well-known work."—Sheffield Daily

AMONG CONGO CANNIBALS.

Experiences, Impressions, and Adventures during a Thirty Years' Sojourn among the Boloki. By JOHN H. WEAKE. Demy 8vo, with 54 illus. & a Map. 16s. net.

"A mine of information on savage customs."—Globe

THROUGH HOLLAND IN THE VIVETTE.

The Cruise of a 4 Tonneur from the Solent to the Zuyder Zee through the Dutch Waterways. By E. KEDDIE CHATTERTON, Author of 'Down Channel in the Vivette,' &c. With 65 illus. and Charts. 6s. net.

"For the amateur yachtsman this book will undoubtedly have a great fascination."—Athenaeum.

SCIENCE OF TO-DAY SERIES. New Volume.

PHOTOGRAPHY OF TO-DAY.

A Popular Account of the Origin, Progress, and Latest Discoveries in the Photographer's Art. By H. CHAPMAN JONES, F.I.C., F.C.S., F.R.P.S. Ex. cr. 8vo, with 54 illus. and Diagrams. 5s. net.

"Thoroughly comprehensive, lucid and authoritative."—Liverpool Courier

THE THINGS SEEN SERIES.—New Volumes.

With 50 Illustrations, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net; buffed leather, in a box, 5s. net.

THINGS SEEN IN RUSSIA.

By W. BARNES STEVENI, Professor of English in the College of Peter the Great.

THINGS SEEN IN PALESTINE.

By A. GOODRICH-FREER, F.R.S.C.S.

ESCAPING FROM A SINKING SUBMARINE.
"ROMANCE OF SUBMARINE ENGINEERING."

Recently Issued in this series (28 volumes) 5s. each.

THE ROMANCE OF—Modern Invention
Modern Engineering
The Animal World
Modern Exploration
Modern Locomotion
Modern Electricity
Modern Mechanism
Insect Life
Mining
Plant Life
Animal Arts & Crafts
Early Exploration
Missionary Heroism
The Mighty Deep

THE ROMANCE OF—Polar Exploration
Savage Life
Modern Sieges
The World's Fisheries
Modern Photography
Early British Life
Modern Geology
Bird Life
Modern Chemistry
Modern Manufacture
The Ship
Modern Astronomy
Aeronautics

HEROES OF THE WORLD LIBRARY.—New Volume.

By CHARLES R. GIBSON, F.R.S.E., Author of 'Scientific Ideas of To-day,' &c. With 16 illus. Ex. cr. 8vo, 5s.

"Graphically told and of the deepest interest to any intellectual reader."—British Weekly.

THE LIBRARY OF ADVENTURE.

ADVENTURES IN SOUTHERN SEAS.

By RICHARD STEAD, B.A. With 16 illus. Ex. cr. 8vo, 5s.

"Vigorously told tales."—Liverpool Courier

THE PILGRIM'S WAY.

A little scrip of good counsel for travellers. By Sir A. T. QUILLER-ROUCH. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net; thin paper, leather, 5s. net; buffed leather yapp, in a box, 5s. net.

THE GOLDEN RECITER.

Recitations and Readings selected from the writings of RUDYARD KIPLING, R. L. STEVENSON, CONAN DOYLE, THOMAS HARDY, AUGUSTIN DOBSON, CHRISTINA ROSSETTI, MAURICE HEWLETT, A. W. PINERO, SYDNEY GRUNDY, &c. Ex. cr. 8vo, over 700 pages, cloth, 3s. 6d.; thin paper pocket edition, 5s.

"A more admirable book of its kind could not well be desired."—The Liverpool Courier.

THE GOLDEN HUMOROUS RECITER.

Recitations and Readings selected from the writings of F. ANSTEV, J. M. BARRIE, S. M. CROCKETT, MAJOR DRURY, JEROME K. JEROME, BARRY PAINE, A. W. PINERO, OWEN SEAMAN, G. B. SHAW, &c., &c. Ex. cr. 8vo, over 700 pages, cloth, 3s. 6d.; thin paper pocket edition, 5s.

"Unquestionably the best collection of modern humorous pieces for recitation which has yet been issued."—The Dundee Advertiser.

SEELEY, SERVICE & CO., Ltd. 38 Great Russell Street, W.C.

WASHBOURNE'S NEW BOOKS.

The Catholic Diary for 1913. Edited by a Priest. 5th year of issue, but still more compact and graceful. 400 pp. Art linen, 1s. net. Leather, gilt, 2s. net.

The Westminster Hymnal. The only collection authorized by the Hierarchy of England and Wales. Edited by RICHARD K. LERRY, Mus. D. 3s. 6d. net. Leather, gilt, 6s. net. Complete Words, 320 pp. Wrapper, 2d. net. Cloth, 4d. and 6d. Leather, 1s.

The "Summa Theologica" of St. Thomas Aquinas in English. Literally translated by the Fathers of the English Dominican Province. Part 1 in 3 vols. Now ready. 8vo. cloth, 6s. net each.

The Apocalypse of St. John. A Commentary on the Greek Version. By JAMES J. L. RAYTON, M.D., M.Ch., Q.U.I. 8vo 430 pp., 12s. net.

The Mustard Tree. An argument on behalf of the Divinity of Christ. By Rev. O. R. VASSALL-PHILLIPS. With a preface by Mgr. Benson, and an Epilogue by Hilaire Belloc. 360 pp. 5s. net.

The Orchard Floor. With a preface by Michael Field. Suggestive Messages for Every Day in the year from the words of a great Catholic preacher. 2s. 6d. net.

Spiritual Progress. 1. FROM LUKEWARMNESS TO FERVOUR. Art linen, 2s. 6d. net. 2. FROM FERVOUR TO PERFECTION. Same price.

The Unbeliever: A Romance of Lourdes. By a Non-Catholic. With eight illustrations. 3s. 6d.

The Angelus Series of Dainty Books. Art linen, gilt, with ingrained sides. Eleven vols. now ready. 1s. 3d. net each; leather, gilt, 2s. 6d. net each.

The Love Story of Gaynor Dace. By KIRKE BRAMPTON. 5s.

The Adventures of Turco Bullworthy. By J. S. FLETCHER. Author of "When Charles the First was King." Illustrated. 2s. 6d.

The Interior Life Simplified and Reduced to its Fundamental Principle. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Our Intelligencer of New Books sent free on request.

PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON.

MANCHESTER: BIRMINGHAM: GLASGOW:
74, Bridge Street. 39, John Bright Street. 248, Buchanan Street.

TO AUTHORS. The best offers for original MSS. are secured by THE SURREY LITERARY AGENCY. Novels, Short Stories, and Articles read and placed. Beginners' work a speciality. Write for free prospectus to "Locksley," Presburg Road, New Malden, Surrey.

TYPE WRITING. — MSS., Plays, Legal Work, etc., 1/- 1,000 words; Technical Work, 1/6. Correct and competent work; prompt return.—Miss d'Etlinger, Post Office, Lingfield, Surrey.

GLAISHER'S NEW BOOK CATALOGUE

No. 390, November 1912, is Now Ready.

Post Free on Application.

NEW REMAINDERS. REDUCED PRICES.

This New List of Publishers' Reminders contains many important and Valuable Additions to our Extensive Stock. WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd., 265, High Holborn, London.

MSS. — WIENER LIT. AGCY. 64, Strand, London (next to Tivoli). 1st, 2nd, and 3rd floors. Special facilities for placing literary and dramatic work, drawings, &c. Advice on and revision of MSS. undertaken. Particulars post free. Phone 369 Central. Wires and Cables "Outgeneral, London."

WANTED — TO PURCHASE. Copies of "The Wine on the Lees," by J. A. Stewart, and "The Bush Tract," by D. J. Hennessey. Send full particulars of price, etc., to Box 890, c/o THE BOOKMAN, 20, Warwick Square, London, E.C.

TYPEWRITING. — MSS. of every description copied accurately and promptly. 9d. per 1,000 words (postage inclusive). Testimonials from Authors, etc.—Miss Jacobs, 10, Primrose Road, South Woodford, N.E.

From The Sibyl of St. Pierre
(Wells, Gardner.)

"WOE, WOE, WOE! THE DAY IS AT HAND."

From Scholars and Scouts
(Jarrold).

"HE FELL FULL LENGTH."

THE SIBYL OF ST. PIERRE.

By BESSIE MARCHANT. 2s. 6d. (Wells Gardner.)

This story, with its setting in Martinique, will appeal to the heart of the British boy, for the youngsters of St. Pierre, with their pluck and decision, will inevitably make their way with young readers in this country. Around the disastrous eruptions of Mount Pelée, when over thirty thousand souls were hurried into eternity, the author draws vivid pen-pictures of the troubles that beset the Rowan family. When the eldest boy, Maurice, is left in charge, the appalling storm breaks. The Sibyl is an old native who foretells the eruption, but the people will not heed her warning, and it is only with considerable difficulty she is rescued from an infuriated mob by our young hero and his friends. "Gtshy," a native boy, is deputed by her to carry on the warning, but still the populace care nothing for the warning voice, and the awful flow of lava falls upon the town. Space is too brief to relate the thrilling adventures of our friends. Perhaps one of the most exciting episodes is Maurice's escape by

From Meinior's Dream and other Tales
(Bell).

"HOW YOU DO TREMBLE!"

water when a cordon of gendarmes is drawn round the town to prevent the panic-stricken community leaving its precincts. With the return of the parents to their ruined home, and the terrible search for the children we need not deal. It is a thrilling book and likely to possess great charm for the boy who likes a good setting to his story.

SCHOLARS AND SCOUTS.

By ERNEST PROTHEROE. 2s. 6d. (Jarrold & Sons.)

A story of school life and boy scouts, told in animated fashion and with abundance of incident in the way of prank and adventure, in which the old style and the new join hands with effective results. There is, for example, a dormitory feast with all its stепен delights, which has the charm of old acquaintance, while the Marathon race and the doings of the boy scouts bring in the attractions of the up-to-date side of things. But this is by no means all.

Romance of the hidden treasure and kidnapping order is also not lacking, as in the chapter which deals with the adventure of Frank Medland aboard the Santa Maria steam yacht, in which he is carried off to Spain and held to ransom in connection with the jewels discovered in an old Priory. However, this little matter is adjusted by Melton Lee, the detective, in quite the proper fashion. Then there is an adventure with anarchists, and a bomb on the Thames Embankment in which the boy scouts prove themselves indispensable to the activities of Scotland Yard. In a word, a thorough boy's book, with plenty of fun to vary the graver sensational interest. The volume belongs to the well-known series of Jarrold's "Empire Rewards," and, in addition to a coloured frontispiece, contains a number of illustrations in half-tone by Mr. Francis L. Hiley.

THE BRAN PIE.

Edited by S. H. Hamer With 8 Plates in Colour, 8 in Half-Tone, and 25 Line Drawings 3s 6d net (Duckworth.)

Mr. S. H. Hamer probably understands the taste of children in literature as well as anyone now living, and in "The Bran Pie," he has produced a presentation volume which is a sheer delight. The book is a miscellany of stories and sketches by the editor himself (a long story, his); and Messrs. Bernard Darwin and A. D. Bright. The illustrations, principally by Messrs. Harry Rountree and J. R. Monsell, are well calculated to arouse the enthusiasm of adults as well as children. The whole, in fact, is not only "something new"—which is what the publishers claim for it—but something very good.

From The Fairy of Old Spain (Delt).

"HE JUMPED RIGHT OUT OF THE FRAME."

TERRY, THE GIRL GUIDE.

By DOROTHEA MOORE With Illustrations by A. A. Dixon. 3s 6d. (Nisbet & Co.)

Girl guides will be proud to know that a story has been written about some of their comrades, and a very good story it is, too. There were no girl guides in the beginning of it, but the first chapter shows us Terry Vaughan, the only daughter of a soldier father, seeing off her five scout brothers as they start for their fortnight's camping, and wishing that she, too, could learn to do something for her country and her fellow-creatures. The wish is tragically intensified when, on the shore of the little Breton village, Terry has to witness the drowning of a little boy and the only-just-in-time rescue of a little girl, and feel that if only she had known how to swim both lives might have been saved. The little rescued girl proves to be the fatherless, motherless child of a young lieutenant and French Army nurse, who together, years before, had saved the life of Terry's father. This little girl, Lys, is taken home to England by Terry's father, and goes to school with Terry. Most of the story takes place at the school, and, in addition to a very life-like picture of the day-by-day life there, it gives the incident which again thrilled Terry into longing to be of use and to know how to do things beyond what the Manor School could teach her; and it describes the struggles to start a Patrol of Girl Guides, the difficulties, the perseverance, and the fine results. The tale is full of life and incident, naturally written and prettily illustrated. Miss Agnes Baden-Powell contributes an encouraging "Foreword."

From Our Nursery Rhyme-Book
(Herbert & Daniel).

"SHE HAD SO MANY CHILDREN SHE DIDN'T KNOW WHAT TO DO."

From Wood, and what we Make of It
(Blackie).

THE HAYES CREOSOTING WORKS OF THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.
By permission of the Great Western Railway.

WOOD AND WHAT WE MAKE OF IT.

By CYRIL HALL With 32 Illustrations from Photographs and 55 Text Drawings 3s 6d
(Blackie)

The latest volume of Messrs Blackie's "Triumphs of Enterprise" series is both useful and interesting. In addition to giving an account of the origin of wood, the author has chapters on the cultivation and uses of the trees of Britain, and the distribution of wood throughout the world, before he devotes himself entirely to practical hints on carpentry, joinery, boat-building, cabinet-making, etc. Mr Hall writes in an engagingly clear manner, and every practically-minded boy should get hold of his book by some means or other.

SONS OF THE SEA.

By Captain FRANK H. SHAW Illustrated
3s 6d. (Cassell)

"Sons of the Sea," is a story for boys. Internal evidence seems to say pretty clearly that life on the high seas, especially under sail, has been an uncommonly exciting experience to Mr. Frank H. Shaw, and he makes his yarn rattle along in a manner that cannot fail to delight boy readers. The thing is, in fact, a brisk, full-blooded nautical melodrama. It mostly concerns an apprentice in an up-to-date big "windjammer," an evil-minded mate of a particularly villainous variety, attempted murder, plot and counter plot, breezes aloft and aloft, and everything humming generally, as they say across the Atlantic, till the end comes and all is squared up as it should be. It is a capital yarn for younger readers, and it is bound to be popular among the gift books of this Christmas.

From Sons of the Sea
(Cassell).

"IT WAS A RACE BETWEEN MAN AND FISH. WHICH WOULD WIN?"

These Books Must Interest
You.

Sampson Low, Marston, & Co., Ltd.

Books of General Interest

COSTUME HAS ALWAYS A SIGNIFICANCE DEEPER THAN THE WHIMS OF FASHION

Dame Fashion, 1786-1911

By Julius M. Price. Demy 8vo. 150 Plates, mostly Coloured. Cloth gilt, gilt top. £2 2s. net. Detailed Prospectus post free. The publication of this book is unavoidably postponed till February.

THE ART BOOK OF THE SEASON
FRANK BRANGWYN, A.R.A.

Eothen ; or Traces of Travel brought home from the East

By A. W. Kinglake. With an Introduction by Samuel L. Bonsusan, A.R.A. Crown 4to, cloth gilt, gilt top, boxed. 12s. 6d. net. Full Prospectus on application.

Absolutely the most acceptable Present of the Season

The Broad Highway

By Jeffery Farnol. Small 4to, cloth, gilt extra, gilt top, special cover, and 25 Illustrations in Colour by C. E. Brock, R.I. Boxed. 10s. 6d. net. Detailed Prospectus post free.

TRAVELS IN FOUR CONTINENTS

Round the World for Gold : A Search for Minerals from Kansas to Cathay

By Herbert W. L. Way. Medium 8vo, cloth, with special Maps. £1 1s. net.

AN ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF A FAMOUS NOVEL

The Money Moon

By Jeffery Farnol. Edition de Luxe. Royal 8vo. Bound in special cover. With over 50 Illustrations, nearly half of which are full page, in Colours, by Arthur I. Keller. Boxed. 15s. net. Popular Edition 6s. Detailed Prospectus post free.

THE EYES OF THE COMMERCIAL WORLD ARE NOW LOOKING TOWARDS THE PANAMA CANAL

Panama and the Canal To-Day

By Forbes Lindsay. With 53 Illustrations from recent Photographs and 5 special Maps. Full crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, 474 pages. 12s. 6d. net. Detailed Prospectus post free.

If you have not commenced to collect Caldecott Pictures, BEGIN NOW.

Randolph Caldecott's Sketches

With an Introduction by Henry Blackburn. Crown 4to, cloth gilt. 116 Illustrations. Second Edition. 3s. 6d. net. Detailed Prospectus post free.

PHILHARMONIC AND OTHER REMINISCENCES

Reminiscences, Impressions & Anecdotes

By Francesco Berger, Hon. R.A.M. Demy 8vo, buckram, gilt extra, gilt top. 10s. 6d. net. Detailed Prospectus post free.

BART KENNEDY'S MASTERPIECE

A Tramp in Spain from Andalusia to Andorra

By Bart Kennedy, Author of "The Human Compass." Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 320 pages, 40 Full-page Illustrations, and special Map showing the author's route. 6s. net. Detailed Prospectus post free.

THE NEW WESTERN MOORS COPYRIGHT EDITION

Lorna Doone : A Romance of Exmoor

By the late R. D. Blackmore. 16 Full-page Illustrations in Colour by Christopher Clark. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt extra. Specially designed cover. 7s. 6d. net. Detailed Prospectus post free.

THE HISTORY OF A MARVELLOUS CAREER

Autobiography of Henry M. Stanley

Edited by Lady Stanley. With 16 illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt. New and Cheaper Edition. 6s. net.

Juvenile Literature

FOR THE IMPERIAL MARITIME AND OTHER LEAGUES

Tales of Pluck and Duty

Edited by Mrs. Frewen Lord, of the Imperial Maritime League Junior Section. Specially written by Famous Authors, such as Captain Mahan, &c. Crown 8vo. Handsomely bound, cloth gilt. Illustrated. 3s. 6d.

A DELIGHTFUL BOOK FOR CHILDREN

Round the Yule Log : Norwegian Folk and Fairy Tales

By P. Chr. Asbjornsen, translated by H. L. Braekstad, with an Introduction by Edmund W. Gosse. Small 4to. Cloth gilt, gilt top, boxed, label. 6s.

A CLASSIC AS A PLAY

The "Little Women" Play

A Two-Act Forty-five Minute Play, adapted by Elizabeth Lincoln Gould from Louisa May Alcott's famous story. With Illustrations by Reginald B. Birch. Crown 8vo, cloth. 1s. net.

Good Fiction

Chronicles of Avonlea

By L. M. Montgomery. Cloth decorative, with a new Picture of Anne from a Painting by George Gibbs. 6s. Prospectus post free.

The Fairest of the Stuarts : An Historical Romance

By Winifred Brooks Mylechreest. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt. Illustrated. 6s.

The Mesh

By John Haslette, Author of "Desmond Rourke". Crown 8vo, cloth gilt. 6s.

The Mountain Girl

By Payne Erakine. Crown 8vo, cloth. With 6 Illustrations by Duncan Gleason. 3rd Edition. 6s.

When the Gates Lift up Their Heads

By Payne Erakine. Crown 4to, cloth. 6s. First Edition sold out before publication.

The Broad Highway

By Jeffery Farnol. Crown 8vo. 512 pp. Cloth gilt. Sixteenth Edition. 6s.

Desmond Rourke : Irishman

By John Haslette. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Money Moon

By Jeffery Farnol. Crown 8vo. 6s.

PLEASE WRITE FOR DETAILED PROSPECTUSES & LATEST CATALOGUE.

Every House, 100, Southwark Street, S.E., & Tudor House, 32, Warwick Lane, E.C.

From Grimm's Fairy Tales
(Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton).

"AS HE LOOKED AROUND THERE STOOD ABOVE HIM ON ONE OF THE ROCKS A LITTLE DWARF."

From The Circling Year
(Nelson).

FOX AND MALLARD.

GRIMM'S FAIRY TALES

With 23 Coloured Illustrations and End-Papers by Noel Pocock. 7s. 6d. net. (Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.)

Mr. Noel Pocock's illustrations are no doubt the raison d'être of this new edition of Grimm just as much as they are its glory. For here the artist has a theme which suits him admirably. The grotesque elves and goblins and the broad humour of the "Tales" finds a reflection in the admirable series of colour pictures which decorate the book. The colouring is bold and striking and the designs are simple in execution. We doubt not that children will like these illustrations even better than we do ourselves. In other respects the volume is pleasantly produced, and at this season of the year it is sure to be in great demand.

THE CIRCLING YEAR.

By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, D.Sc., F.L.S. With 36 Plates in Colour and 145 Pen and Ink Drawings in the Text by C. F. Newall. 6s. net. (Nelson.)

Are you on the look-out for a Christmas present which shall be suitable for a child and yet mildly "serious"? Then you cannot do better than invest 6s. in the purchase of Mr. W. P. Westell's "Circling Year"—"records of a series of nature rambles." Mr. Westell writes with a simplicity and a charm which are certain to win the attention of his young readers, and his volume is well and carefully illustrated. The book is artfully calculated to foster the taste for natural history latent in almost every properly-conducted child.

From Sing a Song of Sixpence
(Warne).

GIFTS FOR XMAS.

ARE YOU INTERESTED

In any of these Books?
If so, send a Post-Card
for a Prospectus, or List.

THE COTTAGES AND VILLAGE LIFE OF RURAL ENGLAND.

By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A. With 52 Coloured Pictures and numerous Line Drawings by A. R. Quinton. Boxed with Coloured Illustrated top. Demy 4to. 21s. net.

THE HISTORY OF RUSSIA. Vol. II.

By Professor VALERIE KLUCHEVSKY, Professor of History at Moscow University. Translated by C. J. Hogarth. 3 Volumes. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. each vol. [Prospectus.]

ASPECTS OF ALGERIA: Historical— Pictorial—Colonial.

By ROY DEVEREUX. With Illustrations. Square Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. [Prospectus.]

"A serious work of history."—Spectator

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. OXFORD AND ITS STORY.

By CECIL HEADLAM. With 24 Tinted Lithographs and 30 Line Drawings by Herbert Railton. Imperial 8vo. Cloth, gilt, 10s. 6d. net.

CAMBRIDGE AND ITS STORY.

By the late Rt. Rev. C. W. STUBBS, Bishop of Truro. With 24 Tinted Lithographs and 30 Line Drawings by Herbert Railton. Imperial 8vo. Cloth, gilt, 10s. 6d. net.

CHANNELS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Edited by OLIPHANT SMEATON, M.A. Large Crown 8vo. 5s. net each volume. [Prospectus.]

ENGLISH PHILOSOPHERS AND SCHOOLS OF PHILOSOPHY. By Professor JAMES SETH, M.A., University of Edinburgh.

"A flood of light is thrown upon problems."—Morning Post.

ENGLISH EPIC AND HEROIC POETRY. By Professor W. MACNEILE DIXON, M.A., University, Glasgow.

"The problems take one into some of the best company in the world."—The Times.

A SELECTION FROM CHILDREN'S LIST.

MR. WILLIAM CANTON'S NEW BOOK.

A CHILD'S BOOK OF WARRIORS.

With Illustrations in Colour by HERBERT COLE. Large crown 8vo. 5s. net. Uniform with "A Child's Book of Saints."

BEE: The Princess of the Dwarfs.

By ANATOLE FRANCE. Retold in English by PETER WRIGHT. With Coloured Illustrations by CHARLES ROBINSON. Large Fcap 4to 7s. 6d. net.

THE FAIRY OF OLD SPAIN.

By Mrs. RODOLPH STAWELL. Illustrated with Pictures in Colour and in Line by FRANK C. PAPE. 3s. 6d. net.

THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN.

With many charming Full-page Drawings in Colours depicting the various episodes described in the famous Lyric. By MARGARET W. TARRANT. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

JOLLY CALLE and other SWEDISH FAIRY TALES.

By HELENA NYBLÖM. With several Illustrations in Colour by CHARLES FOLKARD. Sq. crown 8vo 5s. net.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.,
28, Aldine House, LONDON, W.C.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS FROM WITHIN

By the Right Hon. Robert Farquharson, P.C., M.D., LL.D., Author of "In and Out of Parliament." With a Sketch of the Author (never before published) by J. S. Sargent, R.A. Medium 8vo, cloth. 7s. 6d. net.

"A most remarkable human document."

WITHIN: Thoughts during Convalescence

By Sir Francis E. Younghusband, K.C.I.E., LL.D. In small demy 8vo, cloth 3s. 6d. net.

"A book of great beauty and the revelation of a mind tender, strong and spiritual. The man of action as a teacher of men."—Public Opinion.

THE LATTER DAY SAINTS

A Study of the Mormons in the Light of Economic Conditions. By Ruth Kauffman and Reginald Wright Kauffman. Medium 8vo, cloth. Nearly 400 pages. 10s. 6d. net.

CHARACTER AND LIFE

A Symposium. Arranged and Edited by Percy L. Parker. Editor of Public Opinion. The Contributors are:—Dr. Alfred Russel Wallace, John A. Hobson, Harold Begbie, Walter Crane, and Dr. Emil Reich. Crown 8vo, cloth. 3s. 6d. net.

THE LOST LANGUAGE OF SYMBOLISM

An Enquiry into the Origin of certain Letters, Words, Names, Fairy Tales, Folklore, and Mythologies. By Harold Bayley. With above 1,400 Facsimiles, in Two Volumes. Medium 8vo, cloth. 25s. net.

THE MINERAL KINGDOM

By Dr. Reinhard Brauns, Professor of Mineralogy in the University of Bonn. Translated, with Additions, by L. J. Spencer, M.A.F.C.S., Assistant in the Mineral Department of the British Museum. In One Volume, beautifully bound in half-morocco £2 16s. net.

Home University Library

OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE

1/- NET
256
PAGES CLOTH

Editors:
Herbert Fisher, M.A., F.B.A.
Prof. Gilbert Murray, D.Litt.,
LL.D., F.B.A.
Prof. J. Arthur Thomson, M.A.
Prof. Wm. T. Brewster.

LEATHER 256
PAGES
2/6 NET

Sixth Ten Volumes. Now Ready.

WARFARE IN ENGLAND (with Plans)

Hilaire Belloc, M.A.

GREAT WRITERS OF AMERICA

Profs. W. P. Trent & J. Erskine.

THE MAKING OF THE EARTH (Illustrated)

Prof. J. W. Gregory, F.R.S.

ETHICS

G. E. Moore, M.A.

MASTER MARINERS

J. R. Spears

MAKING OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

Prof. B. W. Bacon, LL.D., D.D.

THE HUMAN BODY (Illustrated)

Prof. Arthur Keith, M.D., F.R.C.S.

ELECTRICITY (Illustrated)

Dr. Gisbert Kapp, D.Eng., M.I.E.E.

POLITICAL ECONOMY

Prof. S. J. Chapman, M.A.

MISSIONS—THEIR RISE & DEVELOPMENT

Mrs. Creighton

"A priceless boon and comfort."—

The Nation

"A prodigy of well-organised learning."—

Daily News.

Reduced illustration of volumes beautifully bound in leather and specially suitable for presentation 256 pages 2s. 6d. net Three volumes in case, 7s. 6d. net.

COMPLETE DESCRIPTIVE LIST POST FREE.

LONDON:

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

THE ROSE FAIRY BOOK.

Edited by Mrs. Herbert Strang. With 12 Illustrations in Colour, 59 in Black and White, and Decorations by Lilian A. Govey. 6s. net. (Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.)

In this very charming volume Mrs. Herbert Strang has "brought together the fairy tales that were the delight of my childhood, and I have ventured to add some others, the discoveries of later years. I do not claim that they are the best fairy tales, for each lover of fairy literature who comes across this volume will doubtless regret the absence of one or more favourite stories, and the omissions taken together might make a better book." For ourselves, we have our doubts about the last statement. Nearly all the old favourites are here, while the lesser-known stories, such for instance as "The Gloves of Turlupin," all deserve inclusion in the book. Miss Govey's illustrations—more especially those in black and white—are really delightful, and the book as a whole is produced in a manner for which the best adjective is "sumptuous."

MAGIC DOMINIONS.

By ARTHUR F. WALLIS. 3s. 6d. (Smith, Elder.)

"Magic Dominions" is one of those works of fancy which make particular claim on book-buyers and present-givers at this generous season of the year. For now, with Santa Claus preparing his lists of deserving children, there is a special demand for wonder-tales of genii, fairies, beautiful princesses, monsters, dragons, magicians, enchanted horses, caves of jewels beyond counting, and earnest, adventurous princes. Mr. Wallis has a pretty pen, and a nice imagination. His eight stories belong to that chapter of fancy through which the great Haroun walked; but he has evidently not neglected the folk-lore of Ireland. As is proper in this department of fancy, there are any number of startling transformations. Nature has not a word to say when the genii are on the warpath. A mighty corsair becomes a sprat and fights with a wrinkle for the kingdom of fishes, a reigning king becomes running-water—a completely democratic institution—and, of course, there are the customary persons, princesses, princes, waiting to be released from the enchantments into which hags and magicians had cast them. Topsy-turveydom reigns. A comic revolution is always running, toppling over the thrones of turbaned princes, raising barbers and swineherds to majesty and greatness. It is a wonderful condition of things; and with all the inconveniences of too-sudden change, it would be rather nice if in this pushful and practical day we could find one of the wards of elfdom make a presto pass or two, and, lo, turn this politician into a bluebottle, that potentate into a whelk! But we must return to the present, pleasant business of thanking Mr. Wallis for the humour, fancy, and freshness wherewith he has told his tales.

THE PEEK-A-BOOS' HOLIDAY.

18 Illustrations in Colour by Chloë Preston. Verses by Tom Preston. 6s. net. (Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.)

Last year there appeared a little book called "The Peek-a-Boos," in which was introduced a new form of grotesquely humorous art for

From The Rose Fairy Book
(Henry Frowde and Hodder
& Stoughton).

"THERE STOOD ABOVE HIM ON ONE OF THE ROCKS A LITTLE DWARF."

children. Everybody bought it quite promptly in a way that must have been particularly gratifying for authors and publishers alike. It was only to be expected—and desired—that such a success should be followed up as soon as possible. Thus there appears this year another "Peek-a-Boo" book, with illustrations that are even more charming than their predecessors and verses that trip along with a rollicking swing. There is nothing quite like it published.

From The Peek-a-Boos' Holiday
(Henry Frowde and Hodder
& Stoughton).

"Meanwhile the black donkey was mounted by Paul,
Who stated that HE wasn't frightened at all;
And Peter came after and brandished a stick,
Which made the black donkey excited and quick."

THE STORY OF THE BORGIAS.

By JOHN FYVIE. 15s.
net. (Eveleigh Nash.)

The Borgias have been bulking rather largely in recent literature; but then they have been doing that in fiction, history, and biography for a good many years past. The atmosphere of mystery and crime that has gathered about the Borgia family invests its members with a curious fascination. Stories of their callous cruelties, of their cunning assassinations and the subtle devices by which they contrived to administer poison to their victims are part of the common stock-in-trade of romance. Latterly there have been attempts to whitewash their evil reputation and to ascribe it to the slanders of their enemies, and now comes Mr. John Fyvie with a painstaking history which neither paints the Borgias in unrelieved blacks nor fits them out with haloes. He has made a very able study of the characters of Cæsar Borgia, Lucrezia Borgia, and Pope Alexander VI., and they grow under his hands not into

On marseian

la lanca

From Gulliver à Lilliput et à Brobdingnag (Siegle, Hill).

unmitigated monsters, but into scheming, ambitious, almost diabolically clever human beings—with the graces, artistic temperaments, and some of the gentler qualities of their class, but treacherous and not to be trusted when their own interests were at stake. Not noble, but not wholly ignoble, Mr. Fyvie unfolds the story of their lives, and if he cannot make it a beautiful story, he makes it a deeply interesting, a strangely attractive one. He weighs and sifts the evidence carefully and without bias; his pictures of the life the Borgias lived and the society in which they moved are full of colour and virility. It is a sound and scholarly history written with such brilliant narrative skill that it reads like romance. We congratulate Mr. Fyvie on the care and ability with which he has done even justice to the House of Borgia, and produced a book that will have its place both among popular histories and those histories of more abiding value that are not called popular. The volume is well produced and well illustrated.

From Terry, the Girl-Guide
(Nisbet).

"A TALL FIGURE CAME THROUGH THE WATER."

From Corah's School Chums
(Chambers).

"'ALL RIGHT, LITTLE ONE:
I'LL TAKE CARE OF YOU,' SAID
A GENTLE VOICE BESIDE HER."

From The Air Patrol
(Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton).

RECONNOITRING IN THE AEROPLANE.

THE AIR PATROL.

By HERBERT STRANG. 6s. (Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton.)

In this romance of the aeroplane in war Mr. Strang has taken time by the forelock, and his book deals with the "Yellow Peril" in the shape of a Mongolian invasion of North-West India. Aided by a handful of Pathans, Robert and Laurence Appleton hold the invaders at bay. It is a new Thermopylæ—the little band of defenders occupying a pass in the mountains of the Hindu Kush, and checking the advance of the swarming Mongols until they can be rolled back by the regular troops. The story is told in graphic and spirited fashion, and the uses of the aeroplane in scouting and the dropping of bombs is well exemplified. There is a silver mine, too, to add the fascinating element of a treasure hunt. The characters are well indicated, and the dialogue racy and pungent. Humour is supplied by the introduction of a Babu graduate, Ditta Lal, whose pomposities of speech are exceedingly droll, recalling Mr. Anstey's "Bayard of Bengal." There is good fun in the incident of the "Ode in celebration of gorgeous defence of gorge by two young English sirs, who with handful of rude mechanicals, dauntless breasts and flying machine 100 h.p., withstood the might of 20,000 Mongols." In short, Mr. Strang has achieved a book which deftly combines adventure, romance and humour, and the interest of which never flags for a moment. There are excellent illustrations in colour by Mr. Cyrus Cuneo.

phere of those stormy times very successfully; he tells his story exceedingly well, and he has a neat gift of characterization. There are some stirring fights, danger, suspense, heroism—all the essentials of vigorous romance, and all used to the utmost. What more can a boy want? And Mr. Groome does well too in his illustrations.

From Merry Times in Animal-Land
(Jas. Clarke).

POOR PUPPY.

MERRY TIMES IN ANIMAL-LAND.

Verses and Stories by A. W. RIDLER. With numerous Illustrations by Louis Wain, Harry B. Neilson, Elsie Blomfield and others. 1s. (Jas. Clarke.)

The annual appearance of this favourite publication must be the signal for general rejoicing in the nurseries of the country. It is so exactly what is wanted by small children. The book is printed throughout in two colours and pictures run one or two to the page—animal pictures, which are, we have noticed, easily first in the affections of the particular public for which Messrs. Clarke's annual is designed. Mr. Ridler's verses and stories, too, have the swing and simplicity which is their first requisite. "Merry Times in Animal-Land," is as good as ever this year—which is high praise.

A CAVALIER OF FORTUNE.

By ESCOTT LYNN. With 6 Coloured Illustrations by W. H. C. Groome. 3s. 6d. (Chambers.)

If you are in search of a good, brisk exciting story for boys you can hardly do better than buy "A Cavalier of Fortune." Here Mr. Escott Lynn treats, among many other things, of the rebellion under Monmouth, and a very clean job has he made of it. Without any eccentricities of language or dialect he manages to convey the atmos-

GIFT BOOKS for OLD and YOUNG

*Prospectuses are obtainable for these volumes.
Please send Post Card.

The Story of the Renaissance*

By WILLIAM HENRY HUDSON

"We can confidently recommend his book to all who wish to get some real understanding of the most important and one of the most fascinating periods in all history"
—The Globe

With 8 full-page Illustrations. Large crown 8vo. 5/- 272 pages. Cloth gilt net

Happy Houses

By MARY ANSELL

"A book to be enjoyed by everyone concerned with life as an art, who loves gentle counsel and happy surroundings, and is ambitious about the great achievement of making a home" —Daily Sketch

Medium 8vo. 288 pages. 6/-
Cloth gilt net

Common - Sense Homes*

By SPENCER SILLS

This volume deals with matters of vital interest - the well-being and comfort of those who make a house into a home. Practical matters all, dealt with by a practical man, in a manner that renders them understandable by all.

With Colour Frontispiece, 20 Diagrammatic Illustrations, and 32 Plates. Demy 4to. Limp cloth 5/-
net

Famous Paintings*

With an Introduction by
G. K. CHESTERTON
and Descriptive Notes.

Being Reproductions in Colour of the Masterpieces of the famous British and European Galleries. Reproduced on canvas-surface paper
"Admirable reproductions" —Pall Mall
Gazette

Volume I. With 50 Pictures 12/-
Cloth gilt net

Architectural Drawing and Draughtsmen*

By REGINALD BLOMFIELD,
A.R.A., President Royal Institute of British Architects

"Valuable book By enlarging the student's knowledge of the old Masters of Architectural Draughtsman-ship, Mr Blomfield has done a service which should bear definite fruit" — Country Life
"Extremely interesting" —Times

With 96 pages of Illustrations. 10/6
Extra crown 4to net

King Solomon's Mines*

(New Colour Edition)

By H. RIDER HAGGARD

"Will be found eminently suitable as a present Handsomely bound, printed in clear, bold type on good paper, and adorned with Coloured Illustrations that all do justice to their picturesque subjects" —Field.

With 8 Colour Illustrations by A. C. MICHAEL. Large 7/6 crown 8vo. Cloth gilt net

Baby Birds at Home*

By RICHARD KEARTON, F.Z.S., F.R.P.S.

"A delightful Nature-Book for Boys and Girls, written with a sympathy, a knowledge, and a freshness that will captivate them" —Catholic Times

Illustrated with 64 Pictures in Colour and Black and White, from Photographs taken direct from Nature by Cherry and Grace Kearton. Cloth gilt 6/-

*A Post Card will bring you a Copy of Cassell's New Classified
Catalogue of over 2,000 Volumes.
Illustrations of some Cassell authors are a feature of this Catalogue.

Complete Illustrated Catalogue of Gift Books Post Free.

Personal Power*

By KEITH J. THOMAS

"He (the author) bristles with ideas, practical as well as abstract.
Even in detail Mr Thomas is fresh and versatile. He abounds in shrewd phrases which light up his philosophy.
These terse, incisive chapters should inspire many a young man." —Daily News and Leader.

312 pages, cloth gilt 6/-

All About Ships*

By LIEUT. TAPRELL
DORLING, R.N.

"It is a marine encyclopædia
The present time sees more boys interested in the sea than perhaps has ever been before, and these, we hope, will see their way to get this book. It might be called the companion for those who live near or are interested in the sea" —
Nautical Magazine.

With 4 Colour Plates and a large number of Black-and-White Illustrations and Photographs. Cloth gilt 6/-

Sons of the Sea

By CAPTAIN FRANK
H SHAW

His new book, an excellent yarn in his best style, tells the adventures which befell two lads during their first voyage as apprentices on board a modern sailing ship

With 4 Colour Illustrations by E. S. HODGSON. Cloth gilt 3/6

CASSELL & CO., LTD., LA BELLE SAUVAGE, LONDON, E.C.

From A Cavalier of Fortune
(Chambers).

"'LET I GIE UN A POKE WI' THIS.'"

From Legends of King Arthur and His Knights - (Warne).

"THEN THEY BEGAN THE BATTLE, AND TILTED AT THEIR HARDEST AGAINST EACH OTHER."

THE LEGENDS OF KING ARTHUR AND HIS KNIGHTS.

Compiled and Arranged by SIR JAMES KNOWLES, K.C.V.O. (J.T.K.). With 8 Illustrations in Colour and 12 in Black and White by Lancelot Speed. 6s net.
(Warne.)

This is the ninth edition of Sir James Knowles' excellent compilation of "The Legends of King Arthur," and when taken in conjunction with the illustrations of Lancelot Speed, it must assuredly be one of the best. The artist has caught the farciful atmosphere of the Malory legends with remarkable faithfulness, and in this book he is equally at home both in his colour and in his black and white work. In fact, this is a very pretty re-issue, a delightful book for a Christmas present.

From The Flying Submarine "NOTHING SEEMED TO WITHSTAND (Nisbet). "THE SWEEP OF HIS SWORD."

GULLIVER A LILLIPUT ET GULLIVER A BROBDINGNAG, and DON QUICHOTTE.

Translated into French and adapted for children by KATHLEEN FITZGERALD. Each with 8 Illustrations in Colour and Decorations by K. Clausen and Thomas Derrick. 1s. 6d. net each. (Siegle, Hill.)

Messrs. Siegle, Hill, are to be warmly congratulated upon their French series for children which, it seems, is proving a remunerative speculation. Quite rightly so, for any pleasanter books to serve as guides to the learning or improving of French it would be difficult to imagine. Miss Kathleen Fitzgerald has once more performed her task admirably. Her version is not by any means difficult, yet it is idiomatic, and at the same time her editing of two long books into a matter of eighty pages or so is very praiseworthy. The stories are all there, and they are told, moreover, in a way that should be attractive to children. The illustrations, both of Miss Clausen and of Mr. Derrick, are very clever.

Globe-Wernicke 'Elastic' Bookcases

GROW WITH YOUR LIBRARY. ALWAYS COMPLETE BUT NEVER FINISHED.

Built of inter-locking sections which can be arranged to suit the shape and size of any room, and re-arranged and added to at any time.

Simply start with just as many sections as are required to comfortably take your present book possessions. When you want more accommodation buy another Globe-Wernicke "unit" and place it on top or alongside the other "units." Thus at no time will you have unsightly empty shelves nor at other times an untidy overflow of books.

These Bookcases make most handsome Christmas Gifts.

SEND FOR FREE ILLUSTRATED BOOK 18B.

The Globe-Wernicke Co.

Office and Library Furnishers,
44, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.1

82, VICTORIA STREET, S.W.1
98, BISHOPSGATE, E.C.

Packing Free Orders of £2 carriage paid to any Goods Station in the British Isles.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912 .

NADIA TO THE RESCUE.

By DOROTHEA MOORE. 3s. 6d. (Nisbet.)

In "Nadia to the Rescue" Miss Dorothea Moore has written a most delightful story of adventure. At first one is almost lead to believe the thing is a dream, that Nadia had gone to sleep over the schoolroom fire, from which she must presently awaken. But the godmother was not the proverbial fairy. Nadia had been compelled to stay at home because of a spoilt party frock, but at the psychological moment her godmother visits her, and the happy child joins the revelries to which her sisters had gone, albeit a little late. Then next day brings forth fresh wonders; she is invited to go to a gorgeous country house with her godmother, and tremendous adventures await her. She learns of a poor little Russian girl, virtually a prisoner in that country of trouble. Nadia accompanies her newly-found friends to Russia—but we must leave Miss Moore to relate the wondrous things that befall her. It is all delightfully told, and is one of the most charming tales for the schoolroom that can be wished for.

From The Unwilling Schoolgirl
(Henry Frowde and Hodder
& Stoughton).

"YOU WILL NEVER GET ME TO GO TO SCHOOL, OR TO BE ORDINARY!" SAID SHE.

THE KING'S SCOUT.

By M. SMITH-MASTERS. With 8 Illustrations by C. E. Brock. 2s. (Wells, Gardner.)

Mr. Smith-Master's latest book is a straightforward and eventful story dealing principally with the Boy Scout movement, of which the author appears to be an enthusiastic advocate. But there are no tales of invasion and spying in this volume. The author is temperate and reasonable, and his chief aim seems to be to present his characters in a reasonable and natural manner. At the same time there are several dramatic moments in the book, and nobody need fear for a moment that it is dull. Quite the reverse. Mr. C. E. Brock's illustrations show this accomplished artist at his best.

From Nadia to the Rescue
(Nisbet).

NADIA ATTEMPTS THE RESCUE OF MICHAEL.

From The King's Scout
(Wells Gardner.)

"WE BEGIN AT THE BOTTOM, YOU SEE," SAID MAJOR GARMICHAEL.

Handsome Books for Christmas Presents.

Santa Claus at the Castle.

By W. E. CULE, Author of "Child Voices," etc. With coloured frontispiece and numerous black and white illustrations by Florence Meyerheim. Fancy cover, 1/- net post free 1/2.

Three Little

Wise-Men and the Star.

By W. E. CULE. Frontispiece in colour and numerous other illustrations by Florence Meyerheim. Fancy cover, 1/- net post free 1/2.

The Book of the Fire Brigade.

A Record of Fire Fighting from the Earliest Times to the present day.

By A. L. HAYDON, Author of "The Book of The V.C.," etc.

Coloured frontispiece and numerous other illustrations. Impl. 16mo, cloth boards 3/6.

The Earl's Signature

A Tale of Tudor Times.

By ALBERT LEE, Author of "The King's Treachery," etc.

Coloured frontispiece, and 4 illustrations by John F. Campbell. Impl. 16mo, cloth boards 3/6.

The King's Ring:

A Romance of the days of Gustavus Adolphus. By Z. TOPELIUS.

Coloured frontispiece and 4 illustrations by S. Travers Pope.

A BOOK FOR YOUNG MEN.

The Dedicated Life.

By F. B. MEYER, B.A., D.D.

Crown 8vo cloth board, 1/6 net.

In this book Dr. Meyer applies the teaching of the Gospel to every day life and builds thereon a model of Christian manhood.

A CHARMING GIFT BOOK FOR GIRLS.

Nearer the Ideal.

A translation from the French of Mr. Hoffman.

By H. M. CAPES.

Impl. 16mo cloth gift top, 3/6 net.

A series of winsome talks on life and character recalling the best work of the late Margaret Sangster.

A BOOK OF DAILY READINGS FOR A YEAR.

The Gates of Dawn

With a Scriptural Thought for each day and a Short Meditation.

By The Rev. W. L. WATKINSON, D.D., and a series of helpful Prayers by The Rev. Lancelian Maclean Watt, M.A., B.D. Impl. 16mo cloth boards gift top 3/6 net.

Sunshine and Moonshine: A Story of a little Girl's "Invisible Playmates," and certain grown up people she drew together.

By GRACE CARLTON.

Coloured frontispiece and other illustrations by Florence Meyerheim. Impl. 16mo cloth boards price 3/6.

THE PILGRIM PRESS, 16 Pilgrim Street, London, E.C.

ALFRED WILSON

Bookseller and Periodical Subscription Agent

Telephone:
7463 Central

18-19, GRACECHURCH ST., LONDON, E.C.

Bankers,
London County and Westminster
(Lombard Street)

ESTABLISHED 1851

London Agent for Libraries Abroad

BOOKS POSTED BY RETURN MAIL TO THE COUNTRY, OR TO ANY ADDRESS IN THE WORLD, AT LOWEST CASH RATES

BOOKS SHIPPED IN TIN-LINED CASES TO ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD

Colonial Editions for Addresses outside Europe

Subscription Newspaper and Periodical Agency for British and Foreign Publications.
List of 1,600 Subscription Rates Free on Application.

CATALOGUES SENT POST FREE

1. Reference Book Catalogue of 146 pp. of Standard Literature
2. Remainder Catalogue of over 1,000 Titles of Publishers' Reminders, in new condition as issued, at from 30% to 80% off published prices.
3. Colonial Librarian's Handbook, indispensable to Librarians outside Europe, with complete List of Colonial Editions, etc., etc.
4. Price List of Subscription Rates for British Periodicals abroad, with a selection of the most popular American, French, German, and Spanish periodicals.

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

TRYSTIE'S QUEST.

A Fairy Story by GREVILLE MACDONALD, M.D.
Illustrated by Arthur Hughes. 5s. net. (A. C. Fifield.)

When a fairy tale grows better and better to the very end, till at last it touches, as this one does, the deep places of the heart, and changes its child-doggerel into the poetry of exquisite little volkelieder, then, indeed, may we all clap hands with the children and say that a fairy minstrel has come to town. We may do more, and taking courage from his own courage—since, like Milton who dared to call Cynthia and Pan to welcome the Christ-child, Dr. MacDonald too has shown us His cradle in that great River of Love which is the life of the children's enchanted country—we may say a grace of thanksgiving for one who

From With Nature through the Year
(Jarrold).

THE PATHLESS DEPTHS OF THE WOODS.

seeks to bring home to us divine mysteries through the white magic of a fairy tale. It is a fairy tale that overflows sometimes with childish fun and frolic and does not disdain dog-proverbs that would have pleased Alice in Wonderland—such as "Every dog has his bray" and "Take care of the sense, and the sounds will take care of themselves." It includes too, in addition to irregular rhymes that children will gloat over, lyrics such as the following, full of enduring melody and charm:

"The wind she rose up and the sun he went down,
Down in the deep of the sea,
The Guard closed the door of the Fairy Town,
But opened a glad dream for me.

"The night it grew dark and the gusty Wind blew,
The Moon broke away from her shroud;
A fairy ship sailed out of dreams that were true,
And stood in a harbour of cloud."

From Trystie's Quest (Fifield).

"A SNAP-BITE OUT OF CRICKETY."

From Shakespeare's Stories of the English Kings (Harrop).

"FALSTAFF: COME, THOU MUST NOT BE IN THIS HUMOUR WITH ME!"
(Falstaff and Dame Quickly).

An Account of Medieval Figure-Sculpture in England

By EDWARD S. PRIOR, M.A., F.S.A., Slade Professor of Fine Art in the University of Cambridge, and ARTHUR GARDNER, M.A., F.S.A. With 855 photographs. Bound in Buckram. Gilt top.

Demy 4to £3 3 0 net.

"We can pay the work of Mr. Gardner and Mr. Prior no more sincere compliment than that of saying that it does for English sculpture what M. Maile has done for the sculpture of Reims, Amiens, and Chartres. . . . Monumental sculpture of this kind is to be distinguished from the decorative sculpture of the Byzantine or Romanesque ideal. That sculpture stood against a background; the Gothic sculpture was part of the building. Thus, partly because of its material, partly because of its workmen, and principally because of its intentions, it assumed an entirely different character. What that character was and how it was evolved, the authors describe with a thoroughness and illustrate with a completeness which is without parallel in any other volume, either German, French, or English. . . . This volume discloses a wealth of sculpture in England, a great deal of it neglected, of which very few English people are aware."—Daily Graphic.

Herbals: Their Origin and Evolution

A chapter in the History of Botany 1470-1670. By AGNES ARBER (Mrs. E. A. NEWELL ARBER), D.Sc., F.L.S. With Frontispiece, 21 plates, and 113 illustrations in the text. Bound in art cloth with cover design based upon a wood-cut in the Ortus Sanitatis of 1491, gilt top.

Royal 8vo 10s 6d net.

The main object of the book is to trace in outline the evolution of the printed herbal in Europe between the years 1470 and 1670, primarily from a botanical, and secondarily from an artistic standpoint. The book is founded principally upon a study of the herbals themselves, but the author has also drawn freely upon the historical and critical literature dealing with the period. Many of the herbals, especially the earlier ones, are not easily accessible, and an account of them, with reproductions of typical illustrations, is therefore of all the more value and interest. The book contains one hundred and thirty five illustrations, the majority of which are reproduced from photographs taken directly from the originals. An introductory chapter sketches the progress of Botany before the invention of printing in order to make clear the position of the Herbal in the history of the science.

London

Cambridge University Press

Fetter Lane

Byzantine and Romanesque Architecture

By THOMAS GRAHAM JACKSON, R.A. In two volumes. With 165 plates and 148 illustrations in the text. Bound in paper boards with parchment back, lettered and ornamented in gold, gilt top.

Crown 4to £2 2 0 net.

An account of the development in Eastern and Western Europe of Post-Roman architecture from the 4th to the 12th century. In it the author has endeavoured not merely to describe the architecture, but to explain its development from style to style, from the decline of classic art down to the dawn of gothic architecture, by connecting its constructive details and outward features with those social reasons which served to mould them into the forms we know. The buildings he has chosen for description and illustration are, so far as possible, those he has visited and studied himself, and the majority of the illustrations are from his own sketches, some of which, being made more than 50 years ago, have an added value as showing buildings that have since been altered or renovated. The description and illustrations of the churches at Constantinople and Salonica are of special interest at the present moment.

The Genus Iris

By WILLIAM RICKATSON DYKES. With forty-seven coloured drawings by F. H. ROUND, one coloured plate of seeds by Miss R. M. CARDEW, and thirty line drawings by C. W. JOHNSON. Handsomely bound in Roxburgh—dark green leather back and green cloth sides—with lettering in gold and gilt top.

Demy folio £6 6 0 net.

This comprehensive treatise on the Iris genus is finely illustrated by forty-eight coloured plates and thirty line drawings. The coloured plates are a special feature of the work, the dimensions of the book enabling the plants to be drawn life-size. The author deals first with the literature of the Iris—providing an extensive bibliography—with its structure, distribution and cultivation, Iris diseases and their remedies. An analytical key to the subdivisions of the genus is next given and he then proceeds to deal with the following sections, viz.: The Apogon, Pardonopsis, Evansia, Oncocyclus, Regelia, Pseudoregelia, Pogoniris, Nepalensis, Juno, Xiphium, Reticulata, and the Gynandrin. Iris Hybrids, raising Irises from seed, Orris root, and unidentified specific names, next claim attention, and a list of plants wrongly described as Irises, together with an index, complete the volume. The descriptions and notes are based for the most part on living plants; those species that are not known in cultivation have been described from herbarium specimens.

FRANK PALMER'S NEW BOOKS

THE MARK OF

The New Spirit in Drama and Art

By HUNTLY CARTER. Crown 4to. 5 Colour Plates and 7 other Illustrations. 12s. 6d. net.

The first extensive review of the new movements in Art and the Theatre, which have aroused so much attention in England by means of the exhibitions of the Post Impressionists, Futurists, and the Theatrical Productions of Gordon Craig and Max Reinhardt.

"There is no other book in English which covers the same ground."—Spectator.

The Book of the Tarpon

By W. H. & J. A. DIMOCK. With 93 striking Photographs of Leaping Fish. 7s. 6d. net.

"Contains the most sensational series of Photographs of living Tarpon ever assembled in one volume."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Florida Trails: A Naturalist's Rambles

By WINTHROP PACKARD. 41 Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

"The work of an enthusiastic lover of Nature, and written attractively. The illustrations are more than usually good."—Birmingham Post.

Oscar Wilde: Art and Morality

A record of the discussion which followed the publication of "Dorian Gray."

Edited by STUART MASON. 9 Illustrations. With complete Biography. 5s. net.

"Worth reviving; we recommend it as a curious commentary on humanity."—English Review.

Fortunes for Farmers

By BERNARD GILBERT. 4 Illustrations. Crown 8vo., cloth. 2s. net.

A book that will inspire a new hope in all agricultural assets, and encourage the movement of "Back to the Land."

SIX SHILLING NOVELS PRODIGAL PRO TEM.

By F. O. BARTLETT

The Second Novel published in England of this famous American writer.

A GOOD BOOK MARRIED

By AUGUST STRINDBERG

The first authorised translation of the book that made Strindberg famous.

EXCUSE ME

By RUPERT HUGHES

The author discusses no sex problems or other difficulties. He has written a frankly humorous tale which creates hearty laughter from beginning to end.

ASHTON KIRK: Investigator

By JOHN T. MCINTYRE

A Thrilling Detective Story.

BED OF ROSES

By W. L. GEORGE

(Ninth Impression.) This much-talked-of book is still attracting universal attention.

DAINTY XMAS GIFTS

FRANK PALMER'S VELLUM CALENDAR SERIES

Printed in Two Colours, charmingly bound in limp vellum. With Portraits. Each Volume consists of striking extracts from the works of the authors named.

G.B.S. (G. BERNARD SHAW)

OSCAR WILDE

H. G. WELLS

ARNOLD BENNETT

NAPOLEON

ANATOLE FRANCE

ROBERT BLATCHFORD

J. M. BARRIE

HILAIRE BELLOC

SIR ARTHUR PINERO

GEORGE MOORE

NIETZSCHE

THOREAU

Also issued in Limp Velvet Cal., 3s. 6d. net per Volume.

Each Volume is bound in five different colours, and the finest workmanship has been used to produce what are universally described as

THE DAINTIEST BOOKS OBTAINABLE.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE FREE.

FRANK PALMER, PUBLISHER, RED LION COURT, LONDON

THE BOOKMAN CHRISTMAS 1912

Mr. Arthur Hughes's wonderful series of illustrations—in themselves poems—are worthy of the beautiful Trystie, who conquers fear in her loving and obedient Quest and not only finds the other children's "choose-keys," but rescues Kit and Davie from the empty and hideous cruelty of the selfish Pigwidgeons. His pictures even befit Dr. MacDonald's Fairy Cobbler, who loved Trystie, but had to leave her, and is the most humanly bewitching leprechaun that I have yet encountered. Lucky, indeed, will be the child who finds this Fairy Book in his stocking and learns something of the love inside the Fairy Cobbler's lovely little song and the spirited marching measure that Kit piped on his "Recorder" in the "Dungeon of Woes." Dr. MacDonald incidentally introduces children to sympathetic and accurate knowledge of birds and beasts. In a footnote to the song sung by Kit's "recorder," he tells us, "Every blackbird is a piper. His lungs are the bag; his wind-pipe carries the fipple (or whistle); while every bone in his body is hollow and communicates with his lungs." Here is the refrain to the song:

"Now in the dawn is the pibroch heard
With ural and warblers and trill;
Black is the wing of the piper bird,
His melody martial and shrill."

The ural is the melody, to which the piper adds "warblers" and "trills."

WITH NATURE THROUGH THE YEAR.

By THEO CARRERAS.
With 24 Plates and many Illustrations in the Text. 2s. 6d. net.
(Jarrold.)

In a comparatively brief literary existence, Mr. Carreras has already made a reputation for himself as a particularly careful and understanding writer upon nature subjects, and anybody who has read one of his books will be careful to obtain as many more of them as he can. The author addresses himself primarily to young people, but his work should also appeal to adults with equal force. He is master of a clear and workmanlike method, and the illustrations with which his volumes are adorned—usually made, we believe, by Mr. Carreras himself—are particularly noteworthy. In the present volume, the author traces the course of nature through each month of the year, a subject which offers ample scope for the effective display of his knowledge and literary ability.

TANGLEWOOD TALES.

By NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE. With 6 Coloured Illustrations, 8 in Half-Tone, and 17 in Line, by George Soper. 5s. (Headley.)

The feature of Messrs. Headley's new edition of "Tanglewood Tales" lies in the fine illustrations of Mr. George Soper, who has, we think, seldom found a subject so well suited to his gifts. In whatever medium his pictures are reproduced—colour, half-tone, or line—all seem to us to be almost equally successful. Mr. Soper is an artist of very considerable ability, and we believe that this edition ought to attract a child as much as it does ourselves. In other respects also the production is good. The volume is light and easy to handle, it is well bound and well printed.

KIDNAPPED BY MOORS.

By Captain F. S. BRIRETON 6s. (Blackie & Son, Ltd.)

There is a fascinating villain in Captain Breerton's new story, and while detesting his dark machinations the reader, boy or girl, can but admire his skill in the art of disguising himself, his mastery of make-up. Hafine by name, he is a half-caste, half-Moor, half-American, and the leader of the formidable Star Band, a secret society in Morocco, whose trade consists chiefly in the gentle art of kidnapping. When Hafine learns that his old enemy, Henry K. Highclere, an American millionaire meat-packer, with his son Jim, is holiday-bound for Tangier, he makes arrangements for his cut-throat band to give them a warm reception. Thanks, however, to a gallant young Englishman, who throws in his lot with the Americans, the half-caste's plot does not win all along the line, and of the hard blows which resound throughout their numerous engagements Hafine receives far more than he gives. "Kidnapped by Moors" with its excellent illustrations by Edward S. Hodgson makes a handsome and agreeable gift-volume.

"LAW'S SAKE! EPAMINONDAS WHAT YOU GOT IN YOUR HAT P!"

From Stories to Tell to Children
(Harrop).

Enlarged from Our Nursery Rhyme-Book
(Herbert & Daniel).

TEN LITTLE NIGGER BOYS.

THE PRIVATE SECRETARY.

A NEW AID TO JOURNALISM.

It is with pleasure that we are able to record yet another advance in the production of time-saving devices, and we note with added delight that the boon is particularly adapted to the needs of the literary world which has hitherto been much neglected in this respect.

It is safe to say that almost every well-known Author is now equipped with a Standard Typewriter, which greatly expedites and improves his MS. to the delight of his Publisher. But the convenience and facility thus enjoyed has been limited to his office or chambers when in Town. He can with difficulty carry this convenience with him when travelling or visiting his country friends. Not so if he be fortunate enough to possess a "Bijou" Portable Typewriter, the only writing machine which, whilst incredibly compact and neat, comprises in its small compass all the refinements of the most up-to-date typewriters. The obvious need among Literary and Professional men was for just such a machine.

Journalists who have hitherto been debarred from the use of the typewriter, either on account of its bulky proportions, or the futility of the smaller productions, will welcome such a machine, which for the first time combines portability with efficiency.

When one reflects that in the short period of two years upwards of 17,000 of these machines have been sold, it certainly suggests that the claim of superiority has been admitted by popular consent.

THE BIJOU PORTABLE TYPEWRITER

AN AUTHORS' MACHINE PAR EXCELLENCE.

PERFECTLY PORTABLE.
EMINENTLY EFFICIENT.
DEPENDABLE & DURABLE BUILT ON STANDARD PRINCIPLES AND GUARANTEED

PRICE :
£12 12s.

IN CASE
COMPLETE.

PRODUCES ELEGANT MS.
CORRESPOND-ENCE.
IS NOT BULKY IS NOT HEAVY AND NOT EXPENSIVE.

WEIGHT 8½ lbs.

SIZE 6×10×12 ins.

To write beautifully and yet with ease and speed.

THE BIJOU TYPEWRITER CO., 5, WHITE ST., FINSBURY, E.C.

FIRST AND SCARCE EDITIONS

BOOKS BOUGHT.

On sale at

EDWARD BAKER'S GREAT BOOKSHOP,
14-16, JOHN BRIGHT STREET, BIRMINGHAM.BOOKS EXCHANGED.

Fairbairn's Book of Crests. 2 v. Last edition, 25s.
 Whistler as I Knew Him, by Mortimer Menpes, 1904, 30s.
 Walter Savage Landor, Gebir, Count Julian, and other Poems, 1st ed., bds., uncut, 21s. 1831 Galton's Inquiries into Human Faculty, 1883, 35s.
 The Dome, complete set, very scarce, 19 pts., £2 2s.
 Stephen Phillips' Christ in Hades, 1st ed., wrappers, 21s.
 As You Like It, ed.-de-luxe, coloured illustrations by Hugh Thomson, £2 10s.
 Dickens' (Chas.) Works, The famous "Chas. Dickens Edition," now scarce, 21 vols. new, half-calf, gilt, £4 4s., 1867, etc.
 Carroll (Lewis) Euclid and his Modern Rivals, 1885, rare, £3 3s.
 Dickens, first eds.—Complete in parts, very rare, Bleak House, £2 2s.; Our Mutual Friend, 35s.; Little Dorrit, 42s.
 Elliott (Frances M.), Old Court Life in Spain, 2 vols., 1893, 35s.
 Bute's Roman Breviary, £2 10s. 1908
 Bacon (Lord), Sylva Sylvarum, with portrait, folio, calf, £3 3s. 1635 Donne (J. D.), Poems, original calf, rare, 1630, £6 6s.
 Fitzgerald (Edward), Letters and Literary Remains, edited by Wright, 3 vols.: £2 2s. 1889
 Wordsworth's Poems, rare, 1st ed., 2 vols., 1807, £3 3s.
 Free Review (The), edited by J. M. Robertson, 10 vols., 1898-8, £2 10s.
 Dickens' Works, early reprints with all the original illus., 15 vols., half-calf gilt, £8 10s., 1871, etc.
 Works of Robert Herrick, edited, with Biographical Notice, by T. Maitland, 2 vols., half-morocco, 1823, rare, £2 10s.
 Dulac's Illustrations: Shakespeare's The Tempest, ed.-de-luxe, signed by the artist, £3.
 Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, illus. by Heath Robinson, ed.-de-luxe, signed by artist, £2 15s.
 Dublin University Magazine, vols. 1 to 53, £6 10s. 1832-59
 Rothenstein's English Portraits, folio, rare, 1898, 35s.
 Ruskin's Fors Clavigera, 9 vols., royal 8vo, half calf, wide margins. A rare collection, £4 10s., 1871. With this is a set of Photos illustrating Fors Clavigera and referred to in the work.
 — Fraeterita, 3 vols., bound to match above, illustrated, 1886, 30s.
 Ruskin's Seven Lamps of Architecture, 1st edition, fine copy Presentation Copy to Digby Wyatt, Esq., with the Author's Sincere Regards, original cloth, £5 5s. 1849
 Stephen Phillips' Eremus, 1st ed., small 4to, original pink bds., rare, £3 10s., 1894.
 Baisac's Works, 53 vols., Caxton Publishing Co., a bargain, £7 7s.
 Lady Charlotte Guest's Mahinogion, Quaritch, 1877, £2 2s.
 Dove's Domestday Studies, 2 vols., rare, £3.
 Royall Game of Chesse-play, 1656; containing fine bookplate of Sir Thomas Littleton, Baronet, Treasurer of Her Majesty's Navy, dated 1702, rare, £5 5s. 0d.
 Dowden's Life of Shelley, 2 vols., 1886, 30s.
 Rossetti's Own Copy with Notes and Sketches in the Margin by him of "Jameson's Sacred and Legendary Art," 2 vols., 1843, £4 4s.
 Proceedings of the Sheffield Shakespeare Club, 1829, rare, £2 2s.

Burton's The Jew, the Gypsy and El Islam, rare, 1898, £2 10s.
 Holy Grail, Studies on the Legend of the Holy Grail with especial reference to the Hypothesis of its Celtic Origin, by Alfred Nutt, 1888, very rare, £4 10s.
 Bowes, Japanese Marks and Seals, £2 2s.
 Beardsley, The Savoy, a set in 8 parts, very rare, £3 10s.
 Lord De Tabley's Poems, Dramatic and Lyrical, 2 vols., 1893, with autograph letter from the author inserted, 30s.
 Story of Nell Gwyn and the Sayings of Chas. II., related and collected by Peter Cunningham, 1st ed., 1852, £2 2s.
 Handel's Vocal Works arranged for the Organ or Pianoforte by Dr. John Clarke of Cambridge, 7 vols., folio, half morocco, £2 2s.
 George Eliot's Novels, original red cloth edition, now scarce, 1881, etc., 8 vols., 30s.
 George Barrington, or Life in London a Hundred Years Ago, illus., 1872, 25s.
 The She Tiger of Paris, profusely illus., 25s.
 Rackham's Grimm's Fairy Tales, large paper copy, £2 2s.
 Rossetti's Shadow of Dante, 1872, £2 5s.
 Thomas Lovell Beddoes' Poems, first ed., 2 vols., Pickering, 1851, 25s.
 Green's Illustrated History, 4 vols., £1 10s.
 Lord Byron, Complete Works, extra illustrated, Jules Didot, Paris, 1825, in English, 7 vols., 8vo, uncut, rare, £3 3s.
 Pearce Text Book of Astrology, 2 vols., rare, £5 10s.
 Myer's Human Personality, 2 vols., £1 12s. 6d.
 Lord Beaconsfield's 1st edits., original boards, very rare, Contarini Fleming, 4 vols., 1832, £4 4s.
 The Wondrous Tale of Alroy, 3 vols., 1833, £3 3s.
 Paracelsus, His Archidoxes, comprised in 10 books, Portrait, calf, 1661, £2 2s.
 Porter's Knights of Malta, 2 vols., 1858, £3 3s.
 Thackeray's Vanity Fair, rare 1st ed., new, half morocco, gilt top, £4 4s., 1848.
 Jesse's London and its Celebrated Characters, 1st ed., 3 vols., cloth, 1871, £2 10s.
 Lord Beaconsfield's Novels, 10 vols., 35s.
 Defoe's Four Voyages of Capt. George Roberts, first edit., very rare, 1726, £4 4s.
 Encyclopedia Biblica, edited by Cheyne & Black, 4 vols., a bargain, 28s.
 Works of Fielding, edited by Leslie Stephen, 9 vols. (should be 10), ed.-de-luxe, 1892, £2 2s.
 Goldwin Smith, Female Suffrage, very rare pamphlet, 1875, 15s.
 Lady Jackson's first edits. The Court of France in the 16th Century, 2 vols., 1836, £2 2s.
 — The Old Regime, 2 vols., 1880, £2 2s.
 Leland's Etruscan Roman Remains in Popular Tradition, 1892, 25s.
 — Gypsy Sorcery and Fortune Telling, 1891, 30s.
 Houssaye's 1815 Waterloo, trans. by Mann and edited by Euan Smith, 1900, 35s.
 Trelawny, Recollections of the Last Days of Shelley and Byron, 1858, 25s.
 Purchas's Voyages, 20 vols., 8vo., cloth, 1908, £9 9s.
 Harmsworth Encyclopedia, 10 vols., half persian, fine set, last edit. cost £5 5s., price £3 5s.
 100,000 Books in Stock, a most remarkable collection. State wants. If not in stock I can procure. Send for my lists.
 Drane's Christian Schools and Scholars, 3 vols., 1867, £2 2s.

Pater's Marius the Epicurean, 1st edition, 1885, 2 vols., £4 4s.
 — Plato and Platonism, 1st edit., 1893, 25s.
 Weininger's Sex and Character, 1906, 25s.
 Gurney Myers and Podmore, Phantasms of the Living, 2 vols., 1886, £2 12s. 6d.
 Lord Beaconsfield's Tancred, first edit., boards, rare, 1850, £3 3s.
 Curzon's Persia, 2 vols., very rare, £6 6s.
 Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, folio, old calf, 35s., 1651.
 Burton's English Porcelain, 1902, £4 4s.
 Baconiana, or certain Genuine Remains of Sir Francis Bacon, calf, 1679, £3 3s.
 Sanders, Carved Oak Woodwork, folio, 1883, 21s.
 The Scourge, with 18 coloured plates by Geo. Cruikshank, vols. 1 to 4 in 2 vols., 1811-12, £3 3s.
 Chaffer's Marks and Monograms on European and Oriental Pottery and Porcelain, over 5,000 Potters' Marks and Illustrations, last edition, £2 2s.
 Balzac's Novels, Temple edition, 40 vols., £3 15s.
 Whistler Portfolio, rare, "Studio" Office, £2 2s.
 Solon's Art Stoneware of the Low Countries and Germany, 2 vols., folio, 1892, £2 5s.
 Murray's Cathedrals, 8 vols., £2 2s.
 Barry's Ascent of Mont Blanc, presentation copy "To George Borrow with best regards from the Author Earham, 24th of 10th month (October), 1835," boards, rare, £3 3s., 1834.
 Jones' Explorations of the Aboriginal Remains of Tennessee, folio, 21s.
 Parry's, The Sacred Maya Stone of Mexico and its Symbolism, 1893, folio, 21s.
 The Plays of Henley and Stevenson, 1896, only 250 done, rare, £2 2s.
 Borrow's Works, Lavengro, Wild Wales, Etc., 6 vols., half calf, gilt, fine set, £2 10s.
 Burton's Arabian Nights, best edition, illustrated, £17 17s.
 Burton's Catullus, 25s.
 — Kasidah, £3 3s.
 — Another copy, only 100 printed, large paper, £5 5s.
 Sloane's Napoleon, best edition, fine copy, half red morocco, extra, 1906, 4 vols., £4 15s.
 Casanova's Memoirs in French, 8 vols., 35s.
 Casanova's Memoirs in German, 17 vols., £2 10s.
 Cambridge Modern History, 14 vols., £7 10s.
 The Times Historians History, 25 vols., cloth, £6 6s.
 Burton's Il Pentamerone in English, 2 vols., £3 3s. Another rare large paper copy, £5 5s.
 Beardsley Book of 50 Drawings, on Vellum paper; Second Book of 50 Drawings, 2 vols., cloth, rare, £6 10s.
 Spenser Faerie Queene, 2 vols., folio, Cambridge University Press, 1909, £1 11s. 6d. pub., £3 13s. 6d.
 Ingoldsby Legends, 3 vols., original cloth, £2 2s. 1852
 Scrap Book containing hundreds of comical engravings (old), folio, curious and scarce collection, £2 2s.
 Chalmers, An Apology for the Believers in the Shakespeare Papers, etc., 1797, rare, £4 10s.
 Shakespeare Library, a collection of Romances, Novels, Poems, Histories used by Shakespeare, 2 vols., 1843, £2 10s.
 Wordsworth's River Duddon with autograph of Daniel O'Connell on title page, 1st ed., £2 2s. 1820
 Hughes' Tom Brown at Oxford, 3 vols., 1st ed., £6 6s. 1861

FIRST AND SCARCE EDITIONS on Sale at EDWARD BAKER'S Great Bookshop, 14-16, John Bright Street, Birmingham (Continued).

- Roscoe's German Novelists, 4 vols., 1826, 25s.
 Shorthouse, John Inglesant, 2 vols., 1881, 35s.
 — Sir Percival, 1886. Presentation Copy with inscription from the author, £2 2s.
 Symon's Days and Nights, 1st ed., original cloth, 35s.
 Turner's Richmondshire, with intro. by Huish.
 — South Coast of England with intro. by Huish, folio, £2 2s. each.
 Science in Modern Life, 6 vols., 30s.; Gresham Pub. Co., 1908.
 King Henry VIII.'s Primer Black Letter, calf, 25s.
 Morley's Universal Library, 63 vols., 35s.
 Paul Bourget's "Divorce," as new, 6s. for 2s. 6d.
 Jones, Old Plate of the Cambridge Colleges, £4 4s. net for £2 10s.
 Hartshorne's Old English Glasses, £2 2s.
 Proc. Inst. Civil Engineers, 142 vols., cloth, £16 16s.
 Batty Langley's Pomona, or the Fruit Garden, illus., 2 vols., folio, 1729, £3 3s.
 Illustrated Library, Shakespeare, 9 vols., 4to cloth, gilt, pub. at £4 10s.; a bargain, 18s.
 Walpole's Mysterious Mother, 8vo, original pink wrappers as issued. Dublin, 1791, 25s.
 Wilde, Oscar, Ballad of Reading Gaol, 1st ed., 25s.
 — The Happy Prince, 1st ed., £2 2s.
 Zangwill's Children of the Ghetto, 1st ed., 3 vols., 21s.
 American Business Man's Library, 5 vols., pub., £2; as new, 15s. 1906
 Clement Shorter's Life and Letters of the Brontës, 2 vols., as new, 9s. 6d.; pub., 24s.
 Budge, Book of the Kings of Egypt; The Egyptian Heaven and Hell; The Rosetta Stone or the Decrees of Memphis and Canopus, 8 vols., pub. 42s. for 21s.
 Castles and Keeps of Scotland, 1908, 5s.
 Skene's Celtic Scotland, 3 vols., 1886, 27s. 6d.
 Richter's Golden Age of Classic Christian Art, 1904, £5 5s. for 30s.
 Gasquet's Greater Abbeys of England, 20s. net for 8s. 6d.
 Mather's Key of Solomon the King, 21s. net for 7s. 6d.
 Melville's Life and Letters of Lawrence Sterne, 2 vols., 10s. 6d.
 Manet and the French Impressionists, 7s. 6d.
 Solly's Life of David Cox the Artist, 1875, £2 2s.
 Turbayne's Monograms and Ciphers, 35s. net for 18s.
 Kipling's Complete Works: Poems, 4 vols., Novels and Tales, 21 vols., together 25 vols., half-polished calf, gilt, very handsome, set £12 12s.
 Gleeson White's English Illustration "The Sixties," 1855-1870, cloth, 1903, 25s.
 Hamerton's Man in Art, £3 13s. 6d. for 30s.
 Dewhurst's Impressionist Painting, 15s.
 Royal Academy Pictures, 1888 to 1904, £3s. 10s.
 Tom Merry's Political Cartoons; Marriage à la Mode, and the Rake's Progress, 2 vols., 6s.
 Prof. Huxley and Religion, new, 2s. 6d. for 1s. 3d.
 Heath Robinson's Illustrations; The Works of Rabelais, 2 vols., cloth, 15s.
 Brantome's Book of the Ladies and others, in English, 13 vols., illus., £3 3s.
 Howie's Scots Worthies, edited by Rev. A. A. Bonar, D.D., 30s. for 6s. 6d.
 Wordsworth and His Circle, 6s.
 Wilson's Tales of the Borders, 3 vols., 45s. for 12s. 6d.
 Boccaccio's Decameron with portrait and 16 plates by Stothard, 7s. 6d.
 British Empire at Home and Abroad, 6 vols., profusely illus., 30s. Gresham Pub. Co., 1903.
 Chronicles of Crime or the New Newgate Calendar with numerous engravings by Phiz, 2 vols., 1887, 25s.
 Dampier's Voyages, 3 vols., calf, 1699-1703, £3 10s.
 Haeckel, The Evolution of Man, 2 vols., 12s. 6d.
 Griffith's Mysteries of Police and Crime, 3 vols., 13s.
 Punch Library of Humour, 25 vols., £2 2s.
 Railways, Observations on a General Iron Railway with curious folding plate, 1822, £2 2s. This book by Thos. Gray has been termed "The Author of the Railway System," and "The Railway Pioneer."
 Lang's Ballads and Lyrics of Old France 1st ed., 1872, £3 10s.
 Wickham's Horace, beautifully printed in Kelmescott style, roy. 8vo boards. Lee Warner, in a case, 21s., 1910.
 Pennell's Pen Drawing and Pen Draughtsmen, 1894, £2 2s.
 Pennell's Modern Illustration, 1895, 25s.
 Children's Encyclopædia, 8 vols., half morocco, £2 15s.
 Noel: A Book of Carols for Christmastide by Foulkes, and Music by Ransom, 5s. for 2s.
 Prince Madoc, the Welshman who discovered America, A.D. 1170, with coloured illus., by Boyd, as new, 2s.; pub. 6s. net.
 Aubrey Beardsley's Drawings for the Sixth Satire of Juvenal, printed on vellum, very rare, £2 2s.
 Havelock Ellis's Affirmations, 1st ed., 1898, 25s.
 Hume and Marshall's Game Birds of India, Burmah and Ceylon, 3 thick vols., rare, £15 1879
 Strutt's Sports and Pastimes of the People of England, 1845, cloth coloured, Copy wide margins, L.P., 21s.
 Thackeray's Works, Centenary Biographical ed., 26 vols., 8vo cloth, £8 6s.
 R. L. Stevenson's Works "Swanston" ed., 25 vols., £10 10s.
 Chambers' Illustrated Encyclopædia, 10 vols., half morocco, gilt, 1904, a bargain, £3 10s.
 Yeats, Beltaine, The Organ of the Irish Literary Theatre, edited by W. B. Yeats, boards, 4s. 6d., 1899-1900.
 Woman Through the Ages, by Emil Reich, 2 vols., 21s. net for 7s. 6d. 1908
 Sir Evelyn Wood, from Midshipman to Field Marshal, 2 vols., as new, 25s. net, 10s. 6d.
 Thomas à Kempis: His Life and Work, 12s. for 4s. 6d.
 Balzac's Droll Stories, with 425 illus. by Doré, now scarce, 21s.
 John Timbs, History of Clubs and Club Life, 10s. 6d.
 — Doctors and Patients, 2 vols., 10s. 6d.
 — Anecdote Lives of Painters, 1881, 6s.
 Burchell's Travels in Africa, 2 vols., 1822, 25s. offered.
 Campan's Marie Antoinette, 2 vols., Bentley, 1833, 6s. offered.
 Children of the Chapel, 1864, 7s. 6d. offered.
 Dickens' Works, Edit.-de-Luxe, 30 vols., £9 offered.
 Doughty's Travels in Arabia Deserta, 2 vols., 1883, 25s. offered.
 Fleay's Chronicle of English Drama, 2 vols., 7s. 6d. offered.
 — History of the Stage, 1890, 10s. offered.
 Freer, Henry IV., Last Decade, 2 vols., 1863, 25s. offered.
 Gardiner, History of England, 2 vols., 1863, 25s. offered.
 Gissing's Workers in the Dawn, 3 vols., 1880, 5s. offered.
 Hamerton, Etchings and Etchers, 1868 or 1880, 30s. offered.
 Hancock, Steam Carriages, 1838, 5s. offered.
 Handley Cross, Pt. 17, 5s. offered.
 Hartland, Legend of Perseus, 3 vols., 1894-96, 20s. offered.
 Hewlett's Earthwork out of Tuscany, 1st ed., 1895, 10s. 6d. offered.
 Jackson, Old Paris, 2 vols., 1878, 25s. offered.
 — French Court and Society, 2 vols., 1881, 25s. offered.
 James's Painters and Their Works, 3 vols., 25s. offered.
 Jerrold's Men of Character, 1838, 3 vols., 25s. offered.
 Junot's Memoirs Napoleon, 3 vols., 1883, 20s. offered.
 Life of Faustus, coloured frontispiece, 1825, 7s. 6d. offered.
 Muller's Fertilisation of Plants, 1883, 10s. offered.
 Satan in Search of a Wife, 1831, 10s. offered.
 Thackeray's Works, Edit.-de-Luxe, £9 offered.
 — The Snob, 1829, £2 offered.
 Thornton's Don Juan, 2 vols., 1821-1822, 30s. offered.
 Titmarsh, Comic Tales and Sketches, 2 vols., 1841, £2 offered.
 — Second Funeral of Napoleon, 1841, pamphlet, £2 offered.
 — An Interesting Event, Bogue, 1849, 10s. offered.
 Todd's Rajasthan, 2 vols., 1829, £1 offered.
 Tuer's History of the Horn Book, 2 vols., 1896, 25s. offered.
 Turner's Ceramics of Swansea, 1897, 18s. offered.
 Under Greenwood Tree, 2 vols., 1872, 10s. 6d. offered.
 Untrodden Fields of Anthropology, 2 vols., with plates.
 Vancouver's Voyages, Atlas of Maps and Charts, atlas folio, boards, 1798, £1 offered.
 Vizetelly's Publications, any.
 Von Sybel's History of the Crusades, 1861, 4s. offered.
 Von Sybel, Hist. French Revolution, 4 vols., 1867, £2 offered.
 Warwickshire Hunt, 1837, 25s. offered.
 Weatherby's Stud Book, 20 vols., or Vols. 15 to 20 only.
 Webster's Works, edited by Dyce, 4 vols., 1830, 30s. offered.
 Wells, Joseph and his Brethren, 1876, 5s. offered.
 Westall and Owen's River Thames, 1828, £2 offered.
 White's History Selborne, 1789, £3 offered.
 Wilde's Salome, illus. by Beardsley, 1894, 25s. offered.
 Books Wanted with Autograph Inscriptions written inside by Kate Greenaway, Jane Austen, George Borrow, Browning, Carlyle, Coleridge, Craikshank, Dickens, George Eliot, Keats, Kipling, Chas. Lamb, Lander, Lang, Meredith, Scott, Shelley, Stevenson, Tennyson, Thackeray, Oscar Wilde, Wordsworth, etc., also First Editions of Eminent Authors. I also want to complete a set, Churchill, 3 vols., 1844, Chaucer, 6 vols., 1845—Piercing's Aldine Poets—and will give £10 for these 9 vols. I will give £5 for clean copy "Desperate Remedies," 3 vols., 1871.

BOOKS WANTED.

- Annals of Gallantry, 3 vols., 1814-15, £5 offered.
 Baxter's Cabinet of Painting, £2 offered.
 Borrow (G.), The Zincali, 2 vols., 1841, 1st ed., 15s. offered.
 — Romany Rye, 2 vols., 1857, 21s. offered.
 — Wild Wales, 1862, 3 vols., 25s. offered.
 — Word Book of the Romany, 1874, 10s. 6d. offered.
 — Bible in Spain, 1st ed., 3 vols., 1843, 15s. offered.
 Bourrienne's Napoleon, 3 vols., Bentley, 1833, 10s. offered.
 Brewer's Henry VIII., 2 vols., 1884, 15s. offered.
 Bryce American Commonwealth, 3 vols., 1888, 20s. offered.

BLOCKS ARE PERFECTION

AND

THE SAGSON SERVICE IS

THE LIMIT

SPECIAL NOTE TO PUBLISHERS & BOOKSELLERS!

When issuing your next Catalogue see that your Printer provides you with SIDE-SEAM ENVELOPES for same.

SIDE-SEAM ENVELOPES are the last word in Envelope manufacture, being made and printed complete at one operation—they are perfect in shape, no centre seams to disturb writing, typing or automatic addressing. Can be handled rapidly and without waste.

SIDE-SEAM ENVELOPES are a necessity for all mechanical addressing apparatus and are high-cut, forming a safe tuck-in for $\frac{1}{2}$ d. post.

PRINTED SIDE-SEAM ENVELOPES cost but little more than Plain Envelopes—enable you to call special attention to new issues and cause your Catalogue to stand out from the rest.

SIDE-SEAM ENVELOPES enable your Catalogues to reach the Receiver in better condition, having extra stiffness and greater strength at the sides.

SIDE-SEAM ENVELOPES can be obtained from all good Printers and Stationers.

HENRY STONE & SON, LTD.,

Process Engravers

and Printers.

Specialists in Book Illustration

LONDON OFFICE: 44 NEWMAN STREET, OXFORD STREET, W.

WORKS & STUDIO: BANBURY, OXON.

The Illustrations for most of the fine Colour Books advertised in this issue of The Bookman were engraved and printed by Henry Stone & Son, Ltd. ∴ ∴ ∴

Telephone Numbers :
LONDON—12696 CENTRAL.
BANBURY—21.

Telegraphic Addresses :
“UNWONTED, OX, LONDON.”
“STONE, BANBURY.”

William Brendon & Son, Limited

BOOK, CATALOGUE & GENERAL PRINTERS

BINDING IN ALL BRANCHES.

WEST HOE, PLYMOUTH.

LONDON OFFICE:
1 ROBERT STREET, ADELPHI,
W.C.

Latest Methods in Three-Colour & Art
Illustrated Printing
:: Private Editions ::

The Ideal

Waterman's (Ideal) Fountain Pen

Xmas Gift

Waterman's Ideal is the present which never comes amiss. It is a splendid gift to make, reflecting the greatest credit on the donor and constituting a high compliment to the recipient. Spend no more time thinking, but solve your difficulty by at once purchasing, for him or for her, a Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen.

If the nib selected be not right, it can be exchanged later for one which exactly suits recipient's hand. Waterman's Ideal is the simplest and best fountain pen made. It has no faults and with reasonable care will last a lifetime.

Prices: 10/6 and upwards for Regular and Self-filling Styles. 12/6 and upwards for Safety and Pump-filling Styles.

Of Stationers, Jewellers, &c.

Price List post free from
L. & C. HARDTMUTH, LTD.,
Koh-i-noor House, Kingsway,
London, W.C.

(New York: 273, Broadway. Paris: 6, Rue de Hanovre. Brussels: 14, Rue Pont Neuf. Dresden: Pragerstrasse 6. Milan: Via Bossi 4. Vienna: 1 Franzensring, 20. Zurich: Lowenstrasse 23. Barcelona: Provenza 255.)

Size No. 12. 10/6. Other sizes: Nos. 13, 15/-; 14, 17/6; 15, 21/-; 16, 25/-; 17, 30/-; 18, 35/-; 20, 45/-

Size No. 12 G.M. 15/- Other sizes: Nos. 13 G.M., 20/-; 14 G.M., 22/6; 15 G.M., 26/-; 16 G.M., 30/-

FLUTED (with Seal on cap). Silver, No. 412, 35/-; Rolled Gold, No. 414, 42/-; 9-ct. Gold, No. 412, 84/-; 18-ct. Gold, No. 412, 168/-

BARLEYCORN. Silver, No. 12, 21/-; No. 14, 31/6; 9-ct. Gold, No. 12, 42/-; 18-ct. Gold, No. 12, 84/-

GOLFER. Silver, No. 12, 21/-; No. 14, 31/6; 9-ct. Gold, No. 12, 42/-; No. 14, 52/6; 18-ct. Gold, No. 12, 84/-

SELF-FILLING. Gold Mounted, No. 12 S.F.G.M., 15/-; No. 14 S.F.G.M., 22/6; No. 15 S.F.G.M., 28/-; No. 16 S.F.G.M., 30/- This Self-Filling Pen can be had plain from 10/6 upwards.

Contractors to His Majesty's Stationery Office.

PRINTERS OF
THE EDINBURGH GAZETTE

Telegraphic Addresses—

Tanfield: "MAGAZINE, EDINBURGH."
Queen St.: "LONGPRIMER, EDINBURGH."
London: "LONGPRIMER, LONDON."

Telephones—

Tanfield: No. 4884. Queen St.: No. 23.
London: 535 CENTRAL.

MORRISON & GIBB

LIMITED

Book and General Printers,

Engravers,

Lithographers,

Chromo Printers,

Bookbinders,

Paper-Rulers,

Stereo and Electrotypers.

EDINBURGH: TANFIELD & 11, QUEEN STREET.

LONDON OFFICE: 12, NORFOLK STREET, STRAND, W.C.

We are Specialists in Half-Tone & Three-Colour Work

PERCY LUND HUMPHRIES

AND · CO · LIMITED
PRINTERS · BOOK-BINDERS · AND MANUFACTURING · STATIONERS

LONDON OFFICE
3 AMEN CORNER
LONDON · E · C
TELEGRAMS
"TOPOGRAPHY · BRADFORD"
"LUND · AMEN CORNER"
— LONDON —
TELEPHONES
BRADFORD 3408 (2 LINES)
LONDON 2050 CENTRAL

THE COUNTRY PRESS
B · R · A · D · F · O · R · D

FOUNDED 1781.

INCORPORATED 1891.

JAMES BURN & Co.,
LIMITED,

Wholesale

Bookbinders,

12, 13, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42 & 43,

KIRBY STREET,

AND

33, 34 & 35, HATTON GARDEN,

LONDON, E.C.,

And Royal Mills, Esher, Surrey.

The Spectator

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, THEOLOGY, AND ART.

Established 1828.

EVERY SATURDAY, Price 6d, by Post, 6½d

The Spectator, which circulates throughout the educated classes in the United Kingdom, the Empire and America has the following among other features—

The news of the week is compressed into an animated narrative and thus readers of the paper are insured against missing the true bearing and the essential details of current events.

The leading articles deal in an independent and unconventional spirit with the chief matters of political, economic, and general interest.

Other articles treat of literary, theological, social and artistic questions and discuss interesting and curious aspects of natural history and country life.

Books of special interest and importance are dealt with in the long reviews, while the shorter notices give in a compressed form the judgment of equally competent critics on contemporary literature.

In the weekly review of novels, readers of fiction may find a useful guide for making out their list for the circulating libraries.

The Spectator contains a List of all Books published during the week (not under one shilling in price) with the names of the publishers and the prices attached, a feature which will greatly increase its value to booksellers, librarians, literary institutions, and private persons.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

OUTSIDE PAGE (WHEN AVAILABLE), FOURTEEN GUINEAS
	£	s	d
Page	12	12	0
Half Page (Column)	6	6	0
Quarter Page (½ Column)	3	3	0
Column, two thirds width of page, 8s COMPANIES
Outside Page	£16	16	0
Inside Page	£14	14	0

Five lines (45 words) and under in broad column (half width), 5s and 1s a line for every additional line (containing on an average 10 words). Narrow column one third width of page, 8s an inch. Broad column half width of page, 12s an inch. Across two narrow columns two-thirds width of page, 16s an inch. Broad column following Publications of the Week, 15s an inch. Displayed advertisements according to space. Terms Net.

Terms of Subscription.

PAYABLE IN ADVANCE
	Yearly	Half yearly	Quarterly
Including postage to any part of the United Kingdom	£1 8 6	£0 14 3	£0 7 2
Including postage to any of the British Colonies, America, France, Germany, India, China, Japan, etc.	1 12 6	0 16 3	0 8 2

"SPECTATOR," Ltd., 1, Wellington Street, Strand, London, W.C.

On Sale at all Booksellers', News-vendors', and Bookstalls

A. W. BAIN & Co.,
PUBLISHERS' BOOKBINDERS

ESTABLISHED
MDCCLX.

EFFECTIVE ARTISTIC BINDINGS
IN CLOTH OR LEATHER

DRAWINGS AND ESTIMATES QUICKLY PREPARED AT 17-19 BISHOP'S ROAD,
CAMBRIDGE HEATH, N.E.
TELEPHONE: 2341 DALSTON

EVERY READER

of "THE BOOKMAN" may not be a "business" man, but every man interested in business ought to be a reader of this Book.

1. This 'Little Journey' to the Sign of the Grasshopper, is an attempt to record a worthy achievement and set forth a few ideas and suggestions of service to every business man.

2. History and romance interwoven with some present day facts of interest make it worth reading. Its unusual format and character, illustrations and typography, will please every lover of the unique—and it will surely find many a response to its appeal.

As the Edition (now in the Press) will be strictly limited, you should send the Coupon below (attached to your business letter paper) without delay.

Better cut it out and post it now.

Only one copy sent free to any one address—Extra copies 2s. 6d. each nett.

To—
UNWIN BROTHERS, Ltd.,
27 Pilgrim Street, LONDON, England.

Please send me a copy (when issued) of your book, "AT THE SIGN OF THE GRASSHOPPER," for which I enclose stamps (3d.) to cover postage and packing.

Name

Address

Signature

